Our little brawls remove;

That, as we grow to riper age,
Our hearts may all be love.

S O N G XVIII.

AGAINST SCOFFING AND CALLING NAMES.

OUR tongues were made to bless the Lord,
And not speak ill of men;
When others give a railing word,
We must not rail again.

Cross words and angry names require
To be chastis'd at school;
And he's in danger of hell fire,
That calls his brother fool.

But lips that dare be so profane,
To mock and jeer and scoff
At holy things or holy men,
The Lord shall cut them off.

When children in their wanton play
Serv'd old Elisha so;
And bid the prophet go his way,
"Go up, thou bald-head, go."

God quickly stopp'd their wicked breath,
And sent two raging bears,
That tore them limb from limb to death,
With blood and groans and tears.

Great God, how terrible art thou
To sinners e'er so young!
Grant me thy grace, and teach me how
To tame and rule my tongue.

S O N G XIX.

AGAINST SWEARING AND CURSING, AND TAKING GOD'S NAME IN VAIN.

ANGELS, that high in glory dwell,
Adore thy name, Almighty God!
And devils tremble down in hell,
Beneath the terrors of thy rod.

And yet how wicked children dare
Abuse thy dreadful glorious name!
And when they're angry, how they swear,
And curse their fellows and blaspheme!

How will they stand before thy face,
Who treated thee with such disdain,
While thou shalt doom them to the place
Of everlasting fire and pain?

Then never shall one cooling drop
To quench their burning tongues be given;
But I will praise thee here, and hope
Thus to employ my tongue in heaven.

My heart shall be in pain to hear
Wretches affront the Lord above;
'Tis that great God whose power I fear;
That heavenly Father whom I love.

If my companions grow profane,
I'll leave their friendship, when I hear
Young sinners take thy name in vain,
And learn to curse, and learn to swear.

SONG XX.

AGAINST IDLENESS AND MISCHIEF.

How doth the little busy bee
Improve each shining hour,
And gather honey all the day
From every opening flower?

How skilfully she builds her cell!
How neat she spreads the wax!
And labours hard to store it well
With the sweet food she makes.

In works of labour or of skill,
I would be busy too;
For Satan finds some mischief still
For idle hands to do.

In books, or work, or healthful play,
Let my first years be past,
That I may give for every day
Some good account at last.

SONG XXI.

AGAINST EVIL COMPANY.

Why should I join with those in play,
In whom I've no delight;
Who curse and swear but never pray;
Who call ill names and fight?

I hate to hear a wanton song:
Their words offend mine ears;
I should not dare defile my tongue
With language such as theirs.

Away from fools I'll turn mine eyes,
Nor with the scoffers go;
I would be walking with the wise,
That wiser I may grow.

From one rude boy that us'd to mock,
They learn the wicked jest:
One sickly sheep infects the flock,
And poisons all the rest.

My God, I hate to walk, or dwell
With sinful children here;
Then let me not be sent to hell,
Where none but sinners are.

SONG XXII.

AGAINST PRIDE IN CLOTHES.

Why should our garments, made to hide
Our parents shame, provoke our pride?
The art of dress did ne'er begin,
Till Eve our mother learnt to sin.

When first she put her covering on,
Her robe of innocence was gone;
And yet her children vainly boast
In the sad marks of glory lost.

How proud we are! how fond to show
Our clothes, and call them rich and new!
When the poor sheep and silk-worm wore
That very clothing long before.

The tulip and the butterfly
Appear in gayer coats than I;
Let me be drest fine as I will,
Flies, worms, and flowers, exceed me still.

Then will I set my heart to find
Inward adornings of the mind;
Knowledge and virtue, truth and grace
These are the robes of richest dress.

No more shall worms with me compare;
This is the raiment angels wear;
The Son of God, when here below,
Put on this blest apparel too.

It never fades, it ne'er grows old,
Nor fears the rain, nor moth, nor mould;
It takes no spot, but still refines;
The more 'tis worn, the more it shines.

In this on earth should I appear;
Then go to heaven and wear it there;
God will approve it in his sight;
'Tis his own work, and his delight.

SONG XXIII.

OBEDIENCE TO PARENTS.

Let children that would fear the Lord
Hear what their teachers say;
With reverence meet their parents word,
And with delight obey.

Have you not heard what dreadful plagues
Are threaten'd by the Lord,
To him that breaks his father's law,
Or mocks his mother's word?

What heavy guilt upon him lies!
How cursed is his name!
The ravens shall pick out his eyes,
And eagles eat the same.

But those who worship God, and give
Their parents honour due,
Here on this earth they long shall live,
And live hereafter too.

SONG XXIV.

THE CHILD'S COMPLAINT.

Why should I love my sport so well,
So constant at my play,
And lose the thoughts of heaven and hell
And then forget to pray?

What do I read my Bible for,
But, Lord, to learn thy will;
And shall I daily know thee more,
And less obey thee still?

How senseless is my heart and wild!
How vain are all my thoughts!
Pity the weakness of a child,
And pardon all my faults!

Make me thy heavenly voice to hear,
And let me love to pray;
Since God will lend a gracious ear
To what a child can say.

SONG XXV.

A MORNING SONG.

My God, who makes the sun to know
His proper hour to rise,
And to give light to all below,
Doth send him round the skies.

When from the chambers of the east
His morning race begins,
He never tires, nor stops to rest;
But round the world he shines.

So, like the sun, would I fulfil
The business of the day;
Begin my work betimes, and still
March on my heavenly way.

Give me, O Lord, thy early grace,
Nor let my soul complain
That the young morning of my days
Has all been spent in vain.

SONG XXVI.

AN EVENING SONG.

And now another day is gone,
I'll sing my Maker's praise;
My comforts every hour make known
His providence and grace.

But how my childhood runs to waste!
My sins, how great their sum!
Lord, give me pardon for the past,
And strength for days to come.

I lay my body down to sleep;
Let angels guard my head,
And through the hours of darkness keep
Their watch around my bed.

With cheerful heart I close my eyes,
Since thou wilt not remove;
And in the morning let me rise
Rejoicing in thy love.

SONG XXVII.

FOR THE LORD'S DAY MORNING.

This is the day when Christ arose
So early from the dead;
Why should I keep my eyelids clos'd,
And waste my hours in bed?

This is the day when Jesus broke
The power of death and hell;
And shall I still wear Satan's yoke,
And love my sins so well?

To-day with pleasure Christians meet,
To pray and hear the word:
And I would go with cheerful feet
To learn thy will, O Lord.

I'll leave my sport to read and pray,
And so prepare for heaven:
O may I love this blessed day
The best of all the seven!

SONG XXVIII.

FOR THE LORD'S-DAY EVENING.

LORD, how delightful 'tis to see
A whole assembly worship thee!
At once they sing, at once they pray;
They hear of heaven, and learn the way.

I have been there, and still would go:
'Tis like a little heaven below:
Not all my pleasure and my play
Shall tempt me to forget this day.

O write upon my memory, Lord,
The texts and doctrines of thy word;
That I may break thy laws no more,
But love thee better than before.

With thoughts of Christ and things divine
Fill up this foolish heart of mine;
That, hoping pardon through his blood,
I may lie down and wake with God.

THE TEN COMMANDMENTS, OUT OF THE OLD TESTAMENT,

PUT INTO SHORT RHYME FOR CHILDREN.

Exodus, Chap. xx.

1. Thou shalt have no more Gods but me.
2. Before no idol bow thy knee.
3. Take not the name of God in vain.
4. Nor dare the Sabbath-day profane.
5. Give both thy parents honour due.
6. Take heed that thou no murder do.
7. Abstain from words and deeds unclean.
8. Nor steal though thou art poor and mean.
9. Nor make a wilful lie, nor love it.
10. What is thy neighbour's dare not covet:

THE SUM OF THE COMMANDMENTS,
OUT OF THE NEW TESTAMENT.

Matthew xxii. 37.

With all thy soul love God above,
And as thyself thy neighbour love.

OUR SAVIOUR'S GOLDEN RULE.

Matthew vii. 12.

Be you to others kind and true,
As you'd have others be to you;
And neither do nor say to men,
Whate'er you would not take again.

DUTY TO GOD AND OUR NEIGHBOUR.

Love God with all your soul and strength,
With all your heart and mind:
And love your neighbour as yourself,
Be faithful, just, and kind.

Deal with another as you'd have
Another deal with you;
What you're unwilling to receive,
Be sure you never do.

Out of my Book of HYMNS I have here added the Hosanna, and Glory to the Father, &c. to be sung at the End of any of these Songs, according to the Direction of Parents or Governors.

THE HOSANNA; OR SALVATION
ASCRIBED TO CHRIST.

LONG METRE.

HOSANNA to king David's Son,
Who reigns on a superior throne:
We bless the Prince of heavenly birth,
Who brings salvation down on earth.

Let every nation, every age,
In this delightful work engage;
Old men and babes in Sion sing
The growing glories of her king.

COMMON METRE.

HOSANNA to the Prince of Grace;
Sion, behold thy king!
Proclaim the Son of David's race,
And teach the babes to sing.

Hosanna to th' eternal Word,
Who from the Father came;
Ascribe salvation to the Lord,
With blessings on his name.

SHORT METRE.

HOSANNA to the Son
Of David and of God,
Who brought the news of pardon down,
And bought it with his blood.

To Christ, th' anointed King,
Be endless blessings given;
Let the whole earth his glory sing,
Who made our peace with heaven.

GLORY TO THE FATHER AND THE SON, &c,

LONG METRE.

To God the Father, God the Son,
And God the Spirit, Three in One;
Be honour, praise and glory given,
By all on earth, and all in heaven.

COMMON METRE.

Now let the Father and the Son,
And Spirit, be ador'd,
Where there are works to make him known,
Or fairs to love the Lord.

SHORT METRE.

GIVE to the Father praise,
Give glory to the Son;
And to the Spirit of his grace;
Be equal honour done.

A SLIGHT SPECIMEN OF MORAL SONGS,

Such as I wish some happy and condescending genius would undertake for the use of children, and perform much better.

THE sense and subjects might be borrowed plentifully from the Proverbs of Solomon, from all the common appearances of nature, from all the occurrences of civil life, both in city and country (which would also afford matter for other divine songs). Here the language and measures should be easy, and flowing with cheerfulness, with or without the solemnities of religion, or the sacred names of God and holy things; that children might find delight and profit together.

This would be one effectual way to deliver them from those idle, wanton, or profane songs, which give so early an ill taint to the fancy and memory; and become the seeds of future vices,

I. THE SLUGGARD.

'Tis the voice of the sluggard; I heard him complain, [again.]

"You have wak'd me too soon, I must slumber
As the door on its hinges, so he on his bed, [head,
Turns his sides and his shoulders and his heavy

"A little more sleep and a little more slumber;"
Thus he wastes half his days, and his hours without number;

And when he gets up, he sits folding his hands,
Or walks about sauntering, or trifling he stands.

I pass'd by his garden, and saw the wild brier,
The thorn and the thistle grow broader and higher
The clothes that hang on him are turning to rags:
And his money still wastes till he starves or he begs.

I made him a visit, still hoping to find
He had took better care for improving his mind:
He told me his dreams, talk'd of eating and drinking; [ing.

But he scarce reads his Bible and never loves think-

Said I then to my heart, "Here's a lesson for me:"
That man's but a picture of what I might be;

But thanks to my friends for their care in my breeding, [ing.

Who taught me betimes to love working and read-

II. INNOCENT PLAY.

ABROAD in the meadows to see the young lambs
Run sporting about by the side of their dams,
With fleeces so clean and so white;

Or a nest of young doves in a large open cage,
When they play all in love, without anger or rage,
How much may we learn from the sight!

If we had been ducks, we might dabble in mud;
Or dogs, we might play till it ended in blood;

So foul and so fierce are their natures:

But Thomas and William, and such pretty names,
Should be cleanly and harmless as doves or as lambs,
Those lovely sweet innocent creatures.

Not a thing that we do, nor a word that we say,
Should hinder another in jesting or play;

For he's still in earnest that's hurt;

How rude are the boys that throw pebbles and mire!
There's none but a madman will fling about fire,
And tell you, "'Tis all but in sport."

III. THE ROSE.

How fair is the rose! what a beautiful flower
The glory of April and May!

A a iij

But the leaves are beginning to fade in an hour,
And they wither and die in a day.

Yet the rose has one powerful virtue to boast,
Above all the flowers of the field:
When its leaves are all dead, and fine colours are Still how sweet a perfume it will yield! [lost,
So frail is the youth and the beauty of men,
Though they bloom and look gay like the rose:
But all our fond care to preserve them is vain;
Time kills them as fast as he goes.

Then I'll not be proud of my youth or my beauty,
Since both of them wither and fade:
But gain a good name by well-doing my duty;
This will scent, like a rose, when I'm dead.

IV. THE THIEF.

Why should I deprive my neighbour
Of his goods against his will?
Hands were made for honest labour,
Not to plunder or to steal.

'Tis a foolish self-deceiving
By such tricks to hope for gain:
All that's ever got by thieving
Turns to sorrow, shame, and pain.

Have not Eve and Adam taught us
Their sad profit to compute?
To what dismal state they brought us
When they stole forbidden fruit?

Oft we see a young beginner
Practise little pilfering ways,
Till grown up a harden'd sinner;
Then the gallows ends his days.

Theft will not be always hidden,
Though we fancy none can spy:
When we take a thing forbidden,
God beholds it with his eye.

Guard my heart, O God of heaven,
Lest I covet what's not mine:
Lest I steal what is not given,
Guard my heart and hands from sin.

V. THE ANT, OR EMMET.

THESE Emmets how little they are in our eyes?
We tread them to dust, and a troop of them dies
Without our regard or concern:
Yet, as wise as we are, if we went to their school,
There's many a sluggard and many a fool,
Some lessons of wisdom might learn.

They don't wear their time out in sleeping or play,
But gather up corn in a sun-shiny day,
And for winter they lay up their stores:
They manage their work in such regular forms,
One would think they foresaw all the frosts and the storms,
And so brought their food within doors.

But I have less sense than a poor creeping ant,
If I take not due care for the things I shall want,
Nor provide against dangers in time.
When death or old age shall stare in my face,
What a wretch shall I be in the end of my days,
If I trifle away all their prime!

Now, now, while my strength and my youth are in bloom,
Let me think what will serve me when sickness shall
And pray that my sins be forgiven. [come,
Let me read in good books, and believe, and obey,
That when death turns me out of this cottage of
I may dwell in a palace in heaven. [clay,

VI. GOOD RESOLUTIONS.

THOUGH I am now in younger days,
Nor can I tell what shall befall me.
I'll prepare for every place,
Where my growing age shall call me.

Should I be rich or great,
Others shall partake my goodness;
I'll supply the poor with meat,
Never showing scorn or rudeness.

Where I see the blind or lame,
Deaf or dumb, I'll kindly treat them;
I deserve to feel the same
If I mock, or hurt, or cheat them.

If I meet with railing tongues,
Why should I return them railing,
Since I best revenge my wrongs,
By my patience never failing?

When I hear them telling lies,
Talking foolish, cursing, swearing;
First I'll try to make them wise,
Or I'll soon go out of hearing.

What though I be low and mean,
I'll engage the rich to love me,
While I'm modest, neat and clean,
And submit when they reprove me.

If I should be poor and sick,
I shall meet, I hope, with pity,
Since I love to help the weak,
Though they're neither fair nor witty.

I'll not willingly offend,
Nor be easily offended;
What's amiss I'll strive to mend,
And endure what can't be mended.

May I be so watchful still
O'er my humours and my passion,
As to speak and do no ill,
Though it should be all the fashion:

Wicked fashions lead to hell;
Ne'er may I be found complying;
But in life behave so well,
Not to be afraid of dying.

A SUMMER EVENING.

How fine has the day been, how bright was the sun,
How lovely and joyful the course that he run,
Though he rose in a mist when his race he begun,
And there follow'd some droppings of rain!
But now the fair traveller's come to the west,
His rays are all gold, and his beauties are best;
He paints the sky gay as he sinks to his rest,
And foretells a bright rising again.

Just such is the Christian: His course he begins,
Like the sun in a mist, while he mourns for his sins,
And melts into tears: Then he breaks out and
And travels his heavenly way; [shines,

But when he comes nearer to finish his race,
Like a fine setting sun he looks richer in grace,
And gives a sure hope at the end of his days
Of rising in brighter array.

Some Copies of the following Hymn having got abroad already into several hands, the Author has been persuaded to permit it to appear in public, at the end of these Songs for Children.

A CRADLE HYMN.

HUSH! my dear, lie still and slumber,
Holy angels guard thy bed!
Heavenly blessings without number
Gently falling on thy head.
Sleep, my babe; thy food and raiment,
House and home thy friends provide;
All without thy care or payment.
All thy wants are well supply'd.
How much better thou'rt attended
Than the Son of God could be,
When from heaven he descended,
And became a child like thee?
Soft and easy is thy cradle:
Coarse and hard thy Saviour lay:
When his birth-place was a stable,
And his softest bed was hay.
Blessed babe! what glorious features,
Spotless fair, divinely bright!
Must he dwell with brutal creatures!
How could angels bear the sight?
Was there nothing but a manger
Cursed sinners could afford,
To receive the heavenly stranger!
Did they thus affront their Lord?
Soft, my child; I did not chide thee,
Though my song might sound too hard;

'Tis thy { * Mother } fits beside thee,
Nurse that }
And her arms shall be thy guard.

Yet to read the shameful story,
How the Jews abus'd their King,
How they serv'd the Lord of glory,
Makes me angry while I sing.

See the kinder shepherds round him,
Telling wonders from the sky!
Where they fought him, there they found him,
With his virgin mother by.

See the lovely babe a-dressing;
Lovely infant, how he smil'd!
When he wept, the mother's blessing
Sooth'd and hush'd the holy child.

Lo, he slumbers in his manger,
Where the horned oxen fed;
Peace, my darling, here's no danger,
Here's no ox a-near thy bed.

'Twas to save thee, child, from dying,
Save my dear from burning flame,
Bitter groans and endless crying,
That thy blest Redeemer came.

May'st thou live to know and fear him,
Trust and love him all thy days;
Then go dwell for ever near him,
See his face, and sing his praise!

I could give thee thousand kisses,
Hoping what I most desire;
Not a mother's fondest wishes
Can to greater joys aspire.

bour, friend, &c.

THE LIFE OF A. PHILIPS.

AMBROSE PHILIPS, descended of an ancient family in Leicestershire, was born in 1671. Of the place of his birth, or the early part of his life, there are no memorials.

He received his academical education at St. John's College, Cambridge, of which he became a Fellow.

He was probably intended for the church, and seems to have taken the first orders; for Pope mentions him in "the Bathos," as a zealous protestant deacon.

He first tried his poetical powers, in contributing some English verses to the "Cambridge collection," on the death of Queen Mary.

He afterwards undertook to epitomize Hacket's "Life of Archbishop Williams," which he published in 1700, with an Appendix, giving an account of his benefactions to St. John's College.

In this work, he had an opportunity, which he wanted, to promote the principles of the Whig party, of which he was a zealous adherent, as the Archbishop was the perpetual antagonist to Laud, and a strenuous opposer of the high church measures.

About this time, it is probable, he left the University, and repaired to London, where he easily found access to Addison and Steele, by whom he was received with kindness; and, according to Jacob, he associated with the wits who frequented Button's Coffee-house.

Not long afterwards, he probably published his Six Pastorals; at least he must have published them before 1704, because they are evidently prior to those of Pope, his powerful rival in that species of composition.

This work, which he inscribed to the universal patron, the Earl of Dorset, first procured him the notice of the public, and completely established his poetical reputation.

He afterwards went abroad; but how he was employed, or in what situation, is not yet discovered.

It is certain that he was at Copenhagen in 1709, from whence he addressed A Poetical Epistle to the Earl of Dorset, which is justly esteemed one of his best performances.

It was published in "The Tatler," under the title of A Winter Piece, and mentioned by Steele in the following terms of approbation.

"This is as fine a piece as we ever had from any of the schools of the most learned painters: such images as these give us a new pleasure in our sight; and fix upon our minds traces of reflection which accompany us whenever the like objects occur."

Pope, when he affected to despise his other writings, always excepted this out of the number; and in one of his first letters, mentions it with high praise, as the production of a man "who could write nobly."

On his return to London, his friends were no longer in power; and having obtained no suitable provision, he was reduced to translate The Persian Tales for Tonson; for which, though liberally rewarded, he was afterwards reproached by Pope, with this addition of contempt, that he worked for half-a-crown.

The bard, whom pilfer'd pastorals renown,
Who turns a Persian tale for half-a-crown.

In the latter part of the reign of Queen Anne, he was secretary to the Hanover Club; who used to drink regular toasts to the health of those ladies who were most zealously attached to the Hanoverian succession; upon whom he wrote the following Epigram, not collected in his poems.

The reigning fair, on polish'd crystal shine,
Enrich our glasses, and improve our wine;
The favourite names we to our lips apply,
Indulge our thoughts, and drink with ecstasy.
While these, the chosen beauties of our isle,
Propitious on the cause of freedom smile;
The rash Pretender's hopes we may despise,
And trust Britannia's safety to their eyes.

In 1712, he brought upon the stage at Drury-Lane, The Disreputable Mother, a tragedy, which is almost a translation from the "Andromaque" of Racine. It is, however, very well translated, the poetry pleasing, and the incidents so affecting, that it never fails bringing tears into the eyes of a sensible audience.

Oft' as Andromache renews her woe,
The mothers sadden, and their eyes o'erflow;
Hermione, with love and rage oppress'd,
Now soothes, now animates each maiden breast.
From first to last, alternate passions reign,
And we resist the poet's art in vain.

The friends of Philips exerted every art to promote his interest with the town. Before the appearance of the play, a whole Spectator was devoted to its praise; and while it yet continued to be acted, another Spectator was written to tell what impression it made upon Sir Roger de Coverley; and on the first night, a select audience, says Pope, was called together to applaud it.

It was concluded with the most successful epilogue that ever was yet spoken on the English theatre. The three first nights it was recited twice, and not only continued to be demanded through the run of the play, but whenever it is recalled to the stage, the epilogue is still expected, and is still spoken.

Of this distinguished epilogue, the reputed author was Budgell; but it was known in Tonson's family, and told to Garrick, that Addison was the author of it; and that when it had been at first printed with his name, he came early in the morning, before the copies were distributed, and ordered it to be given to Budgell, that it might add weight to the solicitation which he was then making for a place.

Philips was now high in the ranks of literature. His play was applauded; his translations from Sappho had been published in "The Spectator;" he was an important and a distinguished associate of clubs, witty and poetical; and nothing was wanting to his happiness, but that he should be sure of its continuance.

It was his misfortune to become ridiculous, without his own fault, by the injudicious kindness and extravagant admiration of his friends, who were very willing to advance his reputation, but unhappily commended him too much.

Tickell, in "The Guardian," gave an account of pastoral, partly critical, and partly historical; in which, when the merit of the modern is compared, Tasso and Guarini are censured for remote thoughts and unnatural refinements; and the pipe of the pastoral muse is transmitted by lawful inheritance, from Theocritus to Virgil, from Virgil to Spenser, and from Spenser to Philips.

This inauguration of Philips offended Pope, and was the occasion of his writing the 40th number of "The Guardian," in which he drew a comparison of Philips's performance with his own; and though he has himself always the advantage, he gives the preference to Philips.

The design of aggrandizing himself, he disguised with such dexterity, that, though Addison discovered it, Steele was deceived, and was afraid of displeasing Pope by publishing his paper.

The enemies of Pope exulted to see him placed below Philips in a species of poetry upon which he was supposed to value himself, but were much mortified to find that Pope himself was the real author of that paper, and that the whole criticism was an artifice of irony.

From that time Pope and Philips lived in a perpetual reciprocation of malevolence.

In poetical powers, of either praise or satire, there was no proportion between the two combatants; but Philips, though he could not prevail by wit, hoped to hurt Pope with another weapon, and charged him as disaffected to the government.

Pope appears to have been extremely exasperated; for, in the first edition of his "Letters," he calls Philips "rascal;" and in the last, still charges him with detaining in his hands the subscriptions for "Homer," delivered to him by the Hanover club; that he might delay the gratification of him by whose prosperity he was pained; but he nowhere complains that Philips threatened to chastise him at Button's Coffee-house, as is commonly reported.

Upon the succession of the House of Hanover, Philips seems to have obtained too little notice: he was only made a Justice of the Peace for Westminster, which did not much elevate his character; and in 1717, a Commissioner of the Lottery.

In 1718, he projected a periodical paper, called, The Free-Thinker, in which he was assisted by Dr. Hugh Boulter, afterwards Archbishop of Armagh, the Right Honourable Richard West, Lord Chancellor of Ireland, the Reverend Gilbert Burnet, the Reverend Henry Stevens, and Wellsted, whose contributions were chiefly poetical. It has been re-printed in 3 vols. 8vo.; but it is now little read, though much of it is worthy of revival.

In 1722, he brought on the stage at Drury-Lane, The Briton, a tragedy, which was acted with considerable success; but is now neglected, though it deserves to be more known. One of the scenes between Vannoe, the British Prince, and Valens, the Roman general, is confessed to be written with great dramatic skill, animated by spirit truly poetical.

The same year he exhibited another tragedy at Drury-Lane, on the story of Humphrey Duke of Gloucester; which met with great success; but at present it is only remembered by its title.

Wellsted wrote a copy of verses in praise of this tragedy, which is printed among his "Poems," the general merit of which, particularly his "Genius, an Ode," entitles him to more attention than he has hitherto received from the readers of poetry.

In 1724, when Dr. Boulter was advanced to the Archbishopric of Armagh, he did not forget his friend Philips; but took him to Ireland, as partaker of his fortune, made him his secretary, and added such preferments as enabled him to represent the county of Armagh in the Irish parliament.

In December 1726, he was made Secretary to the Lord Chancellor; and in August 1733, became Judge of the Prerogative Court.

After the death of Dr. Boulter, in 1742, he continued some years in Ireland; but at last, having purchased an annuity of 400 l. he returned to England in 1748, having survived most of his friends and enemies, and among them his implacable antagonist Pope.

The same year, he collected and published his Poems, in one volume, with a dedication to the Duke of Newcastle, omitting the small epigram upon the Toasts of the Hanover Club; which is less to be wondered at, than that he should have adopted this short epigram on good Music and bad Dancers, written by Mr. Jeffreys.

How ill the motion with the music suits;
So fiddled Orpheus, and so danc'd the brutes.

He now certainly hoped to pass some years of life in plenty and tranquillity; but he did not long enjoy his fortune; he was struck with a palsy, and died at his lodgings near Vauxhall, June 18. 1749, in the 78th year of his age.

There is little transmitted of the personal character of Philips; only it is known, that he was distinguished for bravery and skill in the sword. To extreme susceptibility of censure, he added solemnity in conversation. Dr. Johnson relates, that Mr. Ing, a gentleman of great eminence in Staffordshire, happened to be once at table with him, and took occasion to ask him, "How came thy King of Epirus to drive oxen, and to say, 'I am goaded on by love?'" After which question, he never spoke again.

He appears, however, to have been a man of integrity; for P. Whitehead relates, that when Addison was Secretary of State, Philips applied to him for some preferment, but was coolly answered, that it was thought he was already provided for by being made a Justice of Westminster. To this observation, Philips, with some indignation, replied, "Though poetry was a trade he could not live by; yet he scorned to owe subsistence to another which he ought not to live by."

As a poet, Philips appears not to deserve the contempt with which he has been treated by Pope, nor the high praise he has received from Cooke, in "The Battle of the Poets." In his Pastorals, he takes Spenser for his pattern, and endeavours to be natural. By endeavouring to imitate too servilely, the manners and sentiments of vulgar rustics, he is sometimes flat and insipid. Pope's "Pastorals" are written in a very different form. He takes Virgil for his pattern, and labours to be elegant; but his topics are beaten, and his chief merit is the smoothness of his versification, which is musical to a degree of which rhyme could hardly be thought capable.

In the passages which Pope has imitated from Virgil, he has merited but little applause. The imitations of Philips have all the pastoral simplicity of Spenser, a true Doric dialect, and very lively description. Pope, therefore, may be allowed to be the best versifier, and Philips the better Arcadian.

As a general poet, he appears to disadvantage on a comparison with Pope; but though he is not a very animated or first-rate writer, his first and fifth Pastorals, his Epistle from Copenhagen, his Ode on the Death of Earl Cowper, his translations of the two Odes of Sappho, and the two first Olympic Odes of Pindar, and above all, his pleasing tragedy of The Distrest Mother, are a considerable acquisition to English poetry.

His character, as given by Dr. Johnson, is more favourable than might be expected from the well-known prejudices of that excellent biographer; yet he has omitted to notice his incomparable translation of the two fragments of Sappho; and might have mentioned that the name of Namby Pamby was first bestowed on him, by the facetious Henry Cary, in ridicule of his poems of short lines, which have been since burlesqued by the ingenious Isaac Hawkins Browne, Esq. in his excellent burlesque piece, on Swift, Pope, Thomson, Young, Philips and Cibber, called, "The Pipe of Tobacco," by such a close imitation, that it has not the appearance of a copy but an original.

"Of The Distrest Mother, not much is pretended to be his own, and therefore it is no subject of criticism: his other two tragedies, I believe, are not below mediocrity, nor above it. Among the poems comprised in the present collection, the Letter from Denmark may be justly praised: the Pastorals, which, by the writer of the "Guardian," were ranked as one of the four genuine productions of the rustic muse, cannot surely be despicable. That they exhibit a mode of life which did not exist, nor ever existed, is not to be objected; the supposition of such a state is allowed to pastoral. In his other poems, he cannot be denied the praise of lines sometimes elegant; but he has seldom much force, or much comprehension. The pieces that please best, are those which from Pope, and Pope's adherents, procured him the name of Namby Pamby: the poems of short lines, by which he paid his court to all ages and characters, from Walpole the "steerer of the realm" to Miss Pulteney in the nursery. The numbers are smooth and spritely; and the diction is seldom faulty. They are not loaded with much thought; yet if they had been written by Addison, they would have had admirers: little things are not valued, but when they are done by those who can do greater.

"In his translations from Pindar, he found the art of reaching all the obscurity of the Theban bard, however he may fall below his sublimity; he will be allowed, if he has less fire, to have more smoke.

"He has added nothing to English poetry, yet at least half his book deserves to be read; perhaps he valued most himself that part which the critic would reject."

THE WORKS OF A. PHILIPS.

TO HIS GRACE THOMAS, DUKE OF NEWCASTLE.

MY LORD,

THE honours of your ancient and illustrious family, which that noble writer, Algernon Sidney, places among the first in these kingdoms for prerogative of birth, the titles which you have long worn with distinguished lustre, and the high station which you have many years filled, and now fill, in the government, give your Grace a just pre-eminence in the community; but they are excellencies of a more exalted kind to which this tribute of my respect is paid. Your early zeal in the cause of liberty, which manifested itself at the close of a late reign, when the worst of schemes were promoted against this nation by the worst of men, the association (of which I had the honour to be an humble member) into which you then entered, with some others, eminent for their birth, fortune, and knowledge, for securing the succession of the house of Hanover to the throne of these kingdoms, your taste of useful and polite literature, and the encouragement which you have always been ready to give to it, your friendly regard to it, and connection with, that university which has been the nurse of the greatest statesmen, heroes, philosophers, and poets, of English growth, and the open liberality of your heart on all laudable occasions, must give you a place in the affections of all Englishmen who know the interest of their native country: and to those virtues, more than to the private friendship with which your Grace has long honoured me, I make this offering of the few Poetical Pieces, which were the produce of my leisure, but some of my most pleasant hours: your Grace will be able to distinguish those which have been printed before, from those which now make their first appearance: and I number among the felicities of my days, this opportunity of approaching you with something perhaps not unworthy your acceptance; and I have the honour to be,

My Lord,

Your Grace's

most devoted, obliged,

and most humble servant,

AMBROSE PHILIPS.

PREFACE TO THE PASTORAL POEMS.

"Nostra, nec erubuit sylvas habitare, Thalia." VIRG. Ecl. vi. 2.

IT is somewhat strange to conceive, in an age so addicted to the muses, how Pastoral Poetry comes to be never so much as thought upon; considering especially, that it is of the greatest antiquity, and hath ever been accounted the foremost, among the smaller poems, in dignity, Virgil and Spenser made use of it as a prelude to Epic Poetry: but, I fear, the innocency of the subject makes it so little inviting.

There is no kind of Poem, if happily executed, but gives delight; and herein may the Pastoral boast after a peculiar manner: for, as in painting, so in poetry, the country affords not only the most delightful scenes and prospects, but likewise the most pleasing images of life.

Gassendus (I remember) observes, that Peirefkius was a great lover of music, especially the melody of birds: because their simple strains have less of passion and violence, but more of a sedate and quiet harmony; and, therefore, do they rather befriend contemplation. In like manner, the Pastoral Song gives a sweet and gentle composure to the mind; whereas the Epic and Tragic Poems, by the vehemency of their emotions, raise the spirits into a ferment.

To view a fair stately palace, strikes us indeed with admiration, and swells the soul with notions of grandeur: but when I see a little country-dwelling, advantageously situated amidst a beautiful variety of hills, meadows, fields, woods, and rivulets, I feel an unspeakable sort of satisfaction, and cannot forbear wishing my kinder fortune would place me in such a sweet retirement.

Theocritus, Virgil, and Spenser, are the only poets who seem to have hit upon the true nature of Pastoral compositions: so that it will be sufficient praise for me, if I have not altogether failed in my attempt.

PASTORAL POEMS.

THE FIRST PASTORAL.

Lobbin.

If we, O Dorset, quit the city-throng,
To meditate in shades the rural song,
By your commend, be present; and, O bring
The muse along! The muse to you shall sing:
Her influence, Buckhurst, let me there obtain,
And I forgive the fam'd Sicilian Swain.

Begin.—In unluxurious times of yore,
When flocks and herds were no inglorious store,
Lobbin, a shepherd-boy, one evening fair,
As western winds had cool'd the sultry air,
His number'd sheep within the fold now pent,
Thus plain'd him of his dreary discontent;
Beneath a hoary poplar's whispering boughs,
He, solitary, sat to breathe his vows,
Venting the tender anguish of his heart,
As passion taught, in accents free of art:
And little did he hope, while, night by night,
His sighs were lavish'd thus on Lucy bright.

" Ah, well-a-day! how long must I endure
" This pining pain? Or who shall speed my cure!
" Fond love no cure will have, seek no repose,
" Delights in grief, nor any measure knows:
" And now the moon begins in clouds to rise;
" The brightening stars increase within the skies;
" The winds are hush; the dews distil; and sleep
" Hath clos'd the eye-lids of my weary sheep:
" I only, with the prowling wolf, constrain'd
" All night to wake: with hunger he is pain'd,
" And I with love. His hunger he may tame;
" But who can quench, O cruel love, thy flame?
" Whilom did I, all as this poplar fair,
" Up-raise my heedless head, then void of care,
" 'Mong rustic routs the chief for wanton game;
" Nor could they merry make, till Lobbin came.
" Who better seen than I in shepherds' arts,
" To please the lads, and win the lassies' hearts!
" How deftly, to mine oaten-reed so sweet,
" Wont they, upon the green to shift their feet?
" And, weary'd in the dance, how would they " yearn

" Some well-devised tale from me to learn?
" For many songs and tales of mirth had I,
" To chase the loitering sun adown the sky:
" But, ah! since Lucy coy, deep-wrought her
" Within my heart, unmindful of delight ["spight
" The jolly grooms I fly, and, all alone,
" To rocks and woods pour forth my fruitless
" moan.

" Oh! quit thy wonted scorn, relentless fair!
" Ere, lingering long, I perish through despair.

" Had Rosalind been mistress of my mind,
" Though not so fair, she would have prov'd more
" kind.

" O think, unwitting maid, while yet is time,
" How flying years impair thy youthful prime!
" Thy virgin-bloom will not for ever stay,
" And flowers, though left ungather'd, will decay:
" The flowers, anew, returning seasons bring!
" But beauty faded has no second spring.

" My words are wind! She, deaf to all my cries,
" Takes pleasure in the mischief of her eyes.
" Like frisking heifer, loose in flowery meads,
" She gads where'er her roving fancy leads;
" Yet still from me. Ah me, the tiresome chase!
" Shy as the fawn, she flies my fond embrace.
" She flies, indeed, but ever leaves behind,
" Fly where she will, her likeness in my mind.

" No cruel purpose, in my speed, I bear;
" 'Tis only love; and love why should'st thou fear?
" What idle fears a maiden-breast alarm!
" Stay, simple girl: a lover cannot harm.

" Two sportive kiddings, both fair-fleck'd, I rear;
" Whose shooting horns like tender buds appear:
" A lambkin too, of spotless fleece, I breed,
" And teach the fondling from my hand to feed:
" Nor will I cease betimes to cull the fields
" Of every dewy sweet the morning yields:

" From early spring to autumn late shalt thou
" Receive gay girlonds, blooming o'er thy brow:
" And when,—But, why these unavailing pains?
" The gifts, alike, and giver, she disdains:
" And now, left heiress of the glen, she'll deem
" Me, landless lad, unworthy her esteem:

" Yet, was she born, like me, of shepherd-fire;
" And I may fields and lowing herds acquire.
" O! would my gifts but win her wanton heart,
" Or could I half the warmth I feel impart,
" How would I wander, every day, to find
" The choice of wildings, blushing through the " rind!

" For glossy plumbs how lightsome climb the tree,
" How risk the vengeance of the thrifty bee!

" Or! if thou deign to live a shepherdess,
" Thou Lobbin's flock, and Lobbin, shalt possess:
" And, fair my flock, nor yet uncomely I,
" If liquid fountains flatter not; and why
" Should liquid fountains flatter us, yet show
" The bordering flowers less beauteous than they
" grow? " mean,

" O! come, my love; nor think th' employment
" The dams to milk, and little lambkins wean,
" To drive a-field, by morn, the fattening ewes,
" Ere the warm sun drink up the cool dew,

" While, with my pipe, and with my voice, I
 " cheer [" ear.
 " Each hour, and through the day detain thine
 " How would the crook bescem thy lily-hand !
 " How would my younglings round thee gazing
 " stand !
 " Ah, witlefs younglings ! gaze not on her eye :
 " Thence all my sorrow ; thence the death I die.
 " O, killing beauty ! and O, fore desire !
 " Must then my sufferings, but with life, expire ?
 " Though blossoms every year the trees adorn,
 " Spring after spring I wither, nipt with scorn :
 " Nor trow I when this bitter blast will end,
 " Or if yon stars will e'er my vows befriend.
 " Sleep, sleep, my flock ; for happy ye may take " Sweet nightly rest, though still your master
 " wake."

Now to the waning moon, the nightingale,
 In slender warblings, tun'd her piteous tale,
 The love-sick shepherd, listening, felt relief,
 Pleas'd with so sweet a partner in his grief,
 Till, by degrees, her notes and silent night
 To slumbers soft his heavy heart invite.

THE SECOND PASTORAL.

THENOT, COLINET.

Thenot.

Is it not Colinet I lonesome see,
 Leaning with folded arms against the tree ?
 Or is it age of late bedims my sight ?
 'Tis Colinet, indeed, in woeful plight.
 Thy cloudy look, why melting into tears,
 Unseemly, now the sky so bright appears !
 Why in this mournful manner art thou found,
 Unthankful lad, when all things smile around ?
 Or hearest not lark and linnet jointly sing,
 Their notes blithe-warbling to salute the spring ?

Colinet.

Though blithe their notes, not so my wayward fate ;
 Nor lark would sing, nor linnet, in my state.
 Each creature, Thenot, to his task is born,
 As they to mirth and music, I to mourn.
 Waking, at midnight, I my woes renew,
 My tears oft' mingling with the falling dew.

Thenot.

Small cause, I ween, has lusty youth to plain :
 Or who may, then, the weight of eld sustain,
 When every slackening nerve begins to fail,
 And the load presseth as our days prevail ?
 Yet, though with years my body downward tend,
 As trees beneath their fruit, in autumn, bend ;
 Spite of my snowy head, and icy veins,
 My mind a cheerful temper still retains :
 And why should man, mishap what will, repine,
 Sour every sweet, and mix with tears his wine ?
 But tell me, then : it may relieve thy woe,
 To let a friend thine inward ailment know.

Colinet.

Idly 'twill waste thee, Thenot, the whole day,
 Shouldst thou give ear to all my grief can say.
 Thine ewes will wander ; and the heedless lambs,
 In loud complaints, require their absent dams.

VOL. IX.

Thenot.

See Lightfoot he shall tend them close : and I,
 'Tween whiles, across the plain will glance mine eye.

Colinet.

Where to begin I know not, where to end.
 Doth there one smiling hour my youth attend ?
 Though few my days, as well my follies show,
 Yet are those days all clouded o'er with woe :
 No happy gleam of sunshine doth appear,
 My lowering sky, and wintery months, to cheer.
 My piteous plight in yonder naked tree,
 Which bears the thunder-scar, too plain I see :
 Quite destitute it stands of shelter kind,
 The mark of storms, and sport of every wind :
 The riven trunk feels not th' approach of spring ;
 Nor birds among the leafless branches sing :
 No more, beneath thy shade, shall shepherds
 throng,
 With jocund tale, or pipe, or pleasing song.
 Ill-fated tree ! and more ill-fated I !
 From thee, from me, alike the shepherds fly.

Thenot.

Sure thou in hapless hour of time wast born,
 When blighting mildews spoils the rising corn,
 Or blasting winds o'er blossom'd hedge-rows pass,
 To kill the promis'd fruits, and scorch the grass,
 Or when the moon, by wizard charm'd, fore-shows,
 Blood-stain'd in foul eclipse, impending woes.
 Untimely born, ill-luck betides thee still.

Colinet.

And can there, Thenot, be a greater ill ?

Thenot.

Nor fox, nor wolf, nor rot among our sheep,
 From this good shepherd's care his flock may keep :
 Against ill-luck, alas ! all forecast fails ;
 Nor toil by day, nor watch by night, avails.

Colinet.

Ah me, the while ! ah me, the luckless day !
 Ah, luckless lad ! befits me more to say.
 Unhappy hour ! when, fresh in youthful bud,
 I left, Sabrina fair, thy silvery flood.
 Ah, silly I ! more silly than my sheep,
 Which on thy flowery banks I wont to keep.
 Sweet are thy banks ! Oh, when shall I, once
 more,

With ravish'd eyes review thine amell'd shore ?
 When, in the crystal of thy water, scan
 Each feature faded, and my colour wan ?
 When shall I see my hut, the small abode
 Myself did raise, and cover o'er with sod ?
 Small though it be, a mean an humble cell,
 Yet is there room for peace and me to dwell.

Thenot.

And what enticement charm'd thee, far away
 From thy lov'd home, and led thy heart astray ?

Colinet.

A lewd desire, strange lads and swains to know :
 Ah, God ! that ever I should covet woe !
 With wandering feet unblest, and fond of fame,
 I sought I know not what besides a name.

Thenot.

Or, sooth to say, didst thou not hither roam
 In search of gains more plenty than at home ?
 A rolling-stone is, ever, bare of moss ;
 And, to their cost, green years old proverbs cross.

Colinet.

Small need there was, in random search of gain,
To drive my pining flock athwart the plain,
To distant Cam. Fine gain at length, I trow,
To hoard up to myself such deal of woe!
My sheep quite spent, through travel and ill-fare,
And, like their keeper, ragged grown and bare,
The damp, cold greenward, for my nightly bed,
And some slant willow's trunk to rest my head.
Hard is to bear of pinching cold the pain;
And hard is want to the unpractis'd swain:
But neither want, nor pinching cold, is hard,
To blasting storms of calumny compar'd:
Unkind as hail it falls; the pelting shower
Destroys the tender herb, and budding flower.

Thenot.

Slander we shepherds count the vilest wrong:
And what wounds sorer than an evil tongue?

Colinet.

Untoward lads, the wanton imps of spite,
Make mock of all the ditties I indite.
In vain, O Colinet, thy pipe, so shrill,
Charms every vale, and gladdens every hill:
In vain thou seeks the coverings of the grove,
In the cool shade to sing the pains of love:
Sing what thou wilt, ill-nature will prevail;
And every elf hath skill enough to rail:
But yet, though poor and artless be my vein,
Menalcas seems to like my simple strain:
And, while that he delighteth in my song,
Which to the good Menalcas doth belong,
Nor night, nor day, shall my rude music cease;
I ask no more, so I Menalcas please.

Thenot.

Menalcas, lord of these fair fertile plains,
Preserves the sheep, and o'er the shepherds reigns:
For him our yearly wakes, and feasts, we hold,
And choose the fairest firstling from the fold:
He, good to all, who good deserve, shall give
Thy flock to feed, and thee at ease to live,
Shall curb the malice of unbridled tongues,
And bounteously reward thy rural songs.

Colinet.

First, then, shall lightsome birds forget to fly,
The briny ocean turn to pastures dry,
And every rapid river cease to flow,
Ere I unmindful of Menalcas grow.

Thenot.

This night thy care with me forget; and fold
Thy flock with mine, to ward th' injurious cold.
New milk, and clouted cream, mild cheese and curd,
With some remaining fruit of last year's hoard,
Shall be our evening fare, and, for the night,
Sweet herbs and moss, which gentle sleep invite:
And now behold the sun's departing ray,
O'er yonder hill, the sign of ebbing day:
With songs the jovial hinds return from plough;
And unyok'd heifers, loitering homeward, low.

THE THIRD PASTORAL.

Albino.

WHEN Virgil thought no shame the Doric reed
To tune, and flocks on Mantuan plains to feed,
With young Augustus' name he grac'd his song:
And Spenser, when amid the rural throng

He caroll'd sweet, and graz'd along the flood
Of gentle Thames, made every sounding wood
With good Eliza's name to ring around;
Eliza's name on every tree was found:
Since then, through Anna's cares at ease we live,
And see our cattle unmolested thrive,
While from our Albion her victorious arms
Drive wasteful warfare, loud in dire alarms,
Like them will I my slender music raise,
And teach the vocal valleys Anna's praise.
Meantime, on oaten pipe a lowly lay,
As my kids browse, obscure in shades I play:
Yet, not obscure, while Dorset thinks no scorn
To visit woods, and swains ignobly born.

Two valley swains, both musical, both young,
In friendship mutual, and united long,
Retire within a mossy cave, to shun
The crowd of shepherds, and the noon-day sun.
A gloom of sadness overcasts their mind:
Revolving now, the solemn day they find,
When young Albino died. His image dear
Bedews their cheeks with many a trickling
tear:

To tears they add the tribute of their verse;
These Angelot, those Palin, did rehearse.

Angelot.

Thus, yearly circling, by-past times return;
And yearly, thus, Albino's death we mourn.
Sent into life, alas! how short thy stay:
How sweet the rose! how speedy to decay!
Can we forget, Albino dear, thy knell,
Sad-sounding wide from every village bell?
Can we forget how sorely Albion moan'd,
That hills, and dales, and rocks, in echo groan'd,
Presaging future woe, when, for our crimes,
We lost Albino, pledge of peaceful times,
Fair boast of this fair island, darling joy
Of nobles high, and every shepherd boy?
No joyous pipe was heard, no flocks were seen,
Nor shepherd found upon the grassy green,
No cattle graz'd the field, nor drank the flood,
No birds were heard to warble through the wood.
In yonder gloomy grove outstretch'd he lay
His lovely limbs upon the dampy clay;
On his cold cheek the rosy hue decay'd,
And, o'er his lips, the deadly blue display'd:
Bleating around him lie his plaintive sheep,
And mourning shepherds come, in crowds, to weep.

Young Buckhurst comes: and, is there no redress?
As if the grave regarded our distress!
The tender virgins come, to tears yet new,
And give, aloud, the lamentations due.
The pious mother comes, with grief oppress'd:
Ye trees, and conscious fountains, can attest
With what sad accents, and what piercing cries,
She fill'd the grove, and importun'd the skies,
And every star upbraided with his death,
When, in her widow'd arms, devoid of breath,
She clasp'd her son; nor did the nymph, for this,
Place in her darling's welfare all her bliss,
Him teaching, young, the harmless crook to wield,
And rule the peaceful empire of the field,
As milk-white swans on streams of silver show,
And silvery streams to grace the meadows flow,
As corn the vales, and trees the hills adorn,
So thou, to thine, an ornament was born.

Since thou, delicious youth, didst quit the plains,
Th' ungrateful ground we till with fruitless pains,

In labour'd furrows sow the choice of wheat,
And, over empty sheaves, in harvest sweat,
A thin increase our fleecy cattle yield;
And thorns, and thistles, overspread the field.
How all our hope is fled like morning-dew!
And scarce did we thy dawn of manhood view.
Who now shall teach the pointed spear to throw,
To whirl the sling, and bend the stubborn bow,
To toss the quoit with steady aim, and far,
With sinewy force, to pitch the maffy bar?
Nor dost thou live to bless thy mother's days,
To share her triumphs, and to feel her praise,
In foreign realms to purchase early fame,
And add new glories to the British name:
O, peaceful may thy gentle spirit rest!
The flowery turf lie light upon thy breast;
Nor shrieking owl, nor bat, thy tomb fly round,
Nor midnight goblins revel o'er the ground.

Palin.

No more, mistaken Angelot, complain:
Albino lives; and all our tears are vain:
Albino lives, and will for ever live,
With myriads mixt, who never know to grieve,
Who welcome every stranger-guest, nor fear
Ever to mourn his absence with a tear,
Where cold, nor heat, nor irksome toil annoy,
Nor age, nor sickness, comes to damp their joy:
And now the royal nymph, who bore him, deigns
The land to rule, and shield the simple swains,
While, from above, propitious he looks down:
For this, the welkin does no longer frown.
Each planet shines, indulgent, from his sphere,
And we renew our pastimes with the year.
Hills, dales, and woods, with shrilling pipes re-
found:

The boys and virgins dance, with chaplets crown'd,
And hail Albino blest: the valleys ring
Albino blest! O now, if ever, bring
The laurel green, the smelling eglantine,
And tender branches from the mantling vine,
The dewy cowslip, which in meadow grows,
The fountain-violet, and the garden-rose,
Marsh-lilies sweet, and tufts of daffodil,
With what ye cull from wood, or verdant hill,
Whether in open sun, or shade they blow,
More early some, and some unfolding slow,
Bring, in heap'd canisters, of every kind,
As if the summer had with spring combin'd,
And nature, forward to assist your care,
Did not profusion for Albino spare.
Your hamlets strew, and every public way;
And consecrate to mirth Albino's day:
Myself will lavish all my little store,
And deal about the goblet flowing o'er:
Old Moulin there shall harp, young Myco sing,
And Cuddy dance the round amid the ring,
And Hobbinol his antic gambols play:
To thee these honours, yearly, will we pay:
Nor fail to mention thee in all our cheer,
And teach our children the remembrance dear,
When we our shearing-feast, or harvest keep,
To speed the plough, and bless our thriving sheep.
While willow kids, and herbage lambs pursue,
While bees love thyme, and locust sip the dew,

While birds delight in woods their notes to strain,
Thy name and sweet memorial shall remain.

THE FOURTH PASTORAL.

MYCO, ARGOL.

Myco.

THIS place may seem for shepherd's leisure made,
So close these elms inweave their lofty shade;
The twining woodbine, how it climbs; to breathe
Refreshing sweets around on all beneath;
The ground with grass of cheerful green bespread,
Through which the springing flower up-rears the head:

Lo, here the kingcup of a golden hue,
Medly'd with daisies white and endive blue,
And honeyuckles of a purple dye,
Confusion gay! bright waving to the eye.
Hark, how they warble in that brambly bush,
The gaudy goldfinch, and the speckly thrush,
The linnet green, with others fram'd for skill,
And blackbird fluting through his yellow bill:
In sprightly concert how they all combine,
Us prompting in the various songs to join:
Up, Argol, then, and to thy lip apply
Thy mellow pipe, or voice more sounding try:
And since our ewes have graz'd, what harms if they

Lie round and listen while the lambkins play?

Argol.

Well, Myco, can thy dainty wit express
Fair nature's bounties in the fairest dress:
'Tis rapture all! the place, the birds, the sky;
And rapture works the finger's fancy high.
Sweet breathe the fields, and now a gentle breeze
Moves every leaf, and trembles through the trees:
Ill such incitements suit my rugged lay,
Befitting more the music thou canst play.

Myco.

No skill of music kon I, simple swain,
No fine device thine ear to entertain:
Albeit some deal I pipe, rude though it be,
Sufficient to divert my sheep and me;
Yet Colinet (and Colinet hath skill)
Oft guides my fingers on the tuneful quill,
And fain would teach me on what sounds to dwell,
And where to sink a note, and where to swell.

Argol.

Ah, Myco! half my flock would I bestow,
Should Colinet to me his cunning show:
So trim his sonnets are, I pr'ythee, swain,
Now give us, once, a sample of his strain:
For wonders of that lad the shepherds say,
How sweet his pipe, how ravishing his lay!
The sweetness of his pipe and lay rehearse;
And ask what boon thou wilt for thy verse.

Myco.

Since then thou list, a mournful song I choose:
A mournful song relieves a mournful muse,
Fast by the river on a bank he sat,
To weep the lovely maid's untimely fate,
Fair Stella hight: a lovely maid was she,
Whose fate he wept, a faithful shepherd he.

*Awake, my pipe; in every note express
Fair Stella's death, and Colinet's distress.*

B b ij

" O woeful day ! O, day of woe to me !
 " That ever I should live such day to see !
 " That ever she could die ! O, most unkind,
 " To go and leave thy Colinet behind !
 " From blameless love, and plighted troth to go,
 " And leave to Colinet a life of woe !"

*Awake, my pipe ; in every note express
 Fair Stella's death, and Colinet's distress.*

" And yet, why blame I her ! Full fain would " she
 " With dying arms have clasp'd herself to me :
 " I clasp'd her too, but death prov'd over-strong ;
 " Nor vows nor tears could fleeting life prolong :
 " Yet how shall I from vows and tears refrain ?
 " And why should vows, alas ! and tears be vain !"

*Awake, my pipe ; in every note express
 Fair Stella's death, and Colinet's distress.*

" Aid me to grieve, with bleating moan, my " sheep,
 " Aid me, thou ever-flowing stream, to weep ;
 " Aid me, ye faint, ye hollow winds, to sigh,
 " And thou, my woe, assist me thou to die.
 " Me flock nor stream, nor winds nor woes, re-
 " lieve ; [grieve.]
 " She lov'd through life, and I through life will

*Awake, my pipe ; in every note express
 Fair Stella's death, and Colinet's distress.*

" Ye gentler maids, companions of my fair,
 " With downcast look, and with dishevell'd hair,
 " All beat the breast, and wring your hands and
 " moan :
 " Her hour, untimely, might have prov'd your own :
 " Her hour, untimely, help me to lament ;
 " And let your hearts at Stella's name relent."

*Awake, my pipe ; in every note express
 Fair Stella's death, and Colinet's distress.*

" In vain th' endearing lustre of your eyes
 " We doat upon, and you as vainly prize.
 " What though your beauty bleis the faithful
 " swain,
 " And in th' enamour'd heart like queens ye reign ;
 " Yet in their prime does death the fairest kill,
 " As ruthless winds the tender blossoms spill."

*Awake, my pipe ; in every note express
 Fair Stella's death, and Colinet's distress.*

" Such Stella was ; yet Stella might not live !
 " And what could Colinet in ransom give ?
 " Oh ! if or music's voice, or beauty's charm,
 " Could milder death, and stay his lifted arm,
 " My pipe her face, her face my pipe might save,
 " Redeeming each the other from the grave."

*Awake, my pipe ; in every note express
 Fair Stella's death, and Colinet's distress.*

" Ah, fruitless wish ! fell death's uplifted arm
 " Nor beauty can arrest, nor music charm.
 " Behold ! oh, baleful sight ! see where she lies !
 " The budding flower, unkindly blasted, dies :
 " Nor, though I live the longest day to mourn,
 " I see again to life and me return."

*Awake, my pipe ; in every note express
 Fair Stella's death, and Colinet's distress.*

" Unhappy Colinet ! what boots thee now,
 " To weave fresh girlonds for thy Stella's brow ?
 " No girlond ever more may Stella wear,
 " Nor see the flowery season of the year,
 " Nor dance, nor sing, nor ever sweetly smile,
 " And every toil of Colinet beguile."

*Awake, my pipe ; in every note express
 Fair Stella's death, and Colinet's distress.*

" Throw by the lily, daffodil, and rose ;
 " Wreaths of black yew, and willow pale, com-
 " pose, [dress'd,
 " With baneful hemlock, deadly night-shade,
 " Such chaplets as may witness thine unrest.
 " If aught can witness : O, ye shepherds, tell,
 " When I am dead, no shepherd lov'd so well !"

*Awake, my pipe ; in every note express
 Fair Stella's death, and Colinet's distress.*

" Alack, my sheep ! and thou, dear spotless
 " lamb,
 " By Stella nurs'd, who wean'd thee from the dam,
 " What heed give I to aught but to my grief,
 " My whole employment, and my whole relief !
 " Stray where ye list, some happier master try :
 " Yet once, my flock, was none so blest'd as I."

*Awake, my pipe ; in every note express
 Fair Stella's death, and Colinet's distress.*

" My pipe, whose soothing sound could passion
 " move,
 " And first taught Stella's virgin heart to love,
 " Shall silent hang upon this blasted oak,
 " Whence owls their dirges sing, and ravens croak :
 " Nor lark, nor linnet, shall my day delight,
 " Nor nightingale suspend my moan by night :
 " The night and day shall undistinguish'd be,
 " Alike to Stella, and alike to me."

*No more, my pipe ; here cease we to express
 Fair Stella's death, and Colinet's distress.*

Thus, sorrowing, did the gentle shepherd sing,
 And urge the valley with his wail to ring.
 And now that sheep-hook for my song I crave.

Argol.

Not this, but one more costly, shalt thou have,
 Of season'd elm, where studs of brass appear,
 To speak the giver's name, the month, and year ;
 The hook of polish'd steel, the handle torn'd,
 And richly by the carver's skill adorn'd.
 O, Colinet ! how sweet thy grief to hear !
 How does thy verse subdue the listening ear !
 Soft falling as the still, refreshing dew,
 To slake the drought, and herbage to renew :
 Not half so sweet the midnight winds, which move
 In drowsy murmurs o'er the waving grove,
 Nor valley brook, that, hid by alders, speeds
 O'er pebbles warbling, and through whispering reeds,
 Nor dropping waters, which from rocks distil,
 And welly grotts with tinkling echoes fill.
 Thrice happy Colinet, who can relieve Heart-anguish sore, and make it sweet to grieve !

And next to thee shall Myco bear the bell,
Who can repeat thy peerless song so well:
But see! the hills increasing shadows cast;
The sun, I ween, is leaving us in haste:
His weakly rays faint glimmer through the wood,
And bluey mists arise from yonder flood.

Myco.

Bid then our dogs to gather in the sheep.
Good shepherds, with their flock, betimes should sleep.

Who late lies down, thou know'st, as late will rise,
And, sluggard-like, to noon-day snoring lies,
While in the fold his injur'd ewes complain,
And after dewy pastures bleat in vain.

THE FIFTH PASTORAL.

Cuddy.

In rural strains we first our music try,
And bashful into woods and thickets fly,
Mistrusting then our skill; yet if through time
Our voice, improving, gain a pitch sublime,
Thy growing virtues, Sackville, shall engage
My riper verse, and more aspiring age.

The sun, now mounted to the noon of day,
Began to shoot direct his burning ray;
When, with the flocks, their feeders sought the shade

A venerable oak wide-spreading made:
What should they do to pass the loitering time?
As fancy led, each form'd his tale in rhyme:
And some the joys, and some the pains of love,
And some to set out strange adventures, strove;
The trade of wizards some, and Merlin's skill,
And whence, to charms, such empire o'er the will.
Then Cuddy last (who Cuddy can excel
In neat device?) his tale began to tell.

"When shepherds flourish'd in Eliza's reign,
There liv'd in high repute a jolly swain,
Young Colin Clout; who well could pipe and sing,
And by his notes invite the lagging spring.
He, as his custom was, at leisure laid
In woodland bower, without a rival play'd,
Soliciting his pipe to warble clear,
Enchantment sweet as ever wont to hear
Belated wayfarers, from wake or fair
Detain'd by music, hovering on in air:
Drawn by the magic of th' enticing sound,
What troops of mute admirers flock'd around!
The steerlings left their food; and creatures,
"wild

By nature form'd, insensibly grew mild.
He makes the gathering birds about him throng,
And loads the neighbouring branches with his song:

There, with the crowd, a nightingale of fame,
Jealous, and fond of praise, to listen came:
She turn'd her ear, and pause by pause, with
Like echo to the shepherd's pipe reply'd. [pride.
The shepherd heard with wonder, and again,
To try her more, renew'd his various strain:
To all the various strain she plies her throat,
And adds peculiar grace to every note.
If Colin, in complaining accent grieve,
Of brisker motion to his measure give,

"If gentle sounds he modulate, or strong,
She, not a little vain, repeats the song:
But so repeats, that Colin half-despis'd
His pipe and skill, around the country priz'd:
And sweetest songster of the winged kind,
What thanks, said he, what praises, shall I find
To equal thy melodious voice? In thee
The rudeness of my rural life I see;
From thee I learn no more to vaunt my skill:
Aloft in air she fate, provoking still
The vanquish'd swain. Provok'd, at last, he

"strove

"To show the little minstrel of the grove
His utmost powers, determin'd once to try
How art, exerting, might with nature vie;
For vie could none with either in their part,
With her in nature, nor with him in art.
He draws-in breath, his rising breath to fill:
Throughout the wood his pipe is heard to shrill.
From note to note, in haste, his fingers fly;
Still more and more the numbers multiply:
And now they trill, and now they fall and rise,
And swift and slow they change with sweet
"surprise.

"Attentive she doth scarce the sounds retain;
But to herself first cons the puzzling strain,
And tracing, heedful, note by note repays
The shepherd in his own harmonious lays,
Through every changing cadence runs at
"length,

"And adds in sweetness what he wants in strength.
Then Colin threw his sife disgrac'd aside,
While she loud triumph sings, proclaiming wide
Her mighty conquest, and within her throat
Twirls many a wild unimitable note,
To foil her rival. What could Colin more?
A little harp of maple ware he bore:
The little harp was old, but newly strung,
Which, usual, he across his shoulders hung.
Now take, delightful bird; my last farewell,
He said, and learn from hence thou dost excel
No trivial artist: and anon he wound
The murmuring strings, and order'd every
"sound:

"Then earnest to his instrument he bends,
And both hands pliant on the strings extends:
His touch the strings obey, and various move,
The lower answering still to those above:
His fingers, restless, traverse to and fro,
As in pursuit of harmony they go:
Now, lightly skimming, o'er the strings they pass,
Like winds which gently brush the plying grass,
While melting airs arise at their command:
And now, laborious, with a weighty hand
He sinks into the cords with solemn pace,
To give the swelling tones a bolder grace;
And now the left, and now by turns the right,
Each other chase, harmonious both in flight:
Then his whole fingers blend a swarm of sounds,
Till the sweet tumult through the harp re-

"bounds,

"Cease, Colin, cease, thy rival cease to vex;
The mingling notes, alas! her ear perplex:
She warbles, diffident, in hope and fear,
And hits imperfect accents here and there,
And fain would utter forth some double tone,
When soon she falters, and can utter none:

" Again she tries, and yet again she fails ;
 " For still the harp's united power prevails :
 " Then Colin play'd again, and playing sung :
 " She, with the fatal love of glory stung,
 " Hears all in pain : her heart begins to swell :
 " In piteous notes she sighs, in notes which tell
 " Her bitter anguish : he still singing plies
 " His limber joints : her sorrows higher rise.
 " How shall she bear a conqueror, who, before,
 " No equal through the grove in music bore ?
 " She droops, she hangs her flagging wings, she " moans,
 " And fetcheth from her breast melodious groans.
 " Oppress'd with grief at last too great to quell,
 " Down, breathless, on the guilty harp she fell.
 " Then Colin loud lamented o'er the dead,
 " And unavailing tears profusely shed,
 " And broke his wicked strings, and curs'd his
 " skill ;
 " And best to make atonement for the ill,
 " If, for such ill, atonement might be made,
 " He builds her tomb beneath a laurel shade,
 " Then adds a verse, and sets with flowers the
 " ground,
 " And makes a fence of winding osiers round.
 " A verse and tomb is all I now can give ;
 " And here thy name at least, he said, shall live."
 Thus ended Cuddy with the setting sun,
 And, by his tale, unenvy'd praises won.

THE SIXTH PASTORAL.

GERON, HOBBINOL, LANQUET.

Geron.

How still the sea behold ! how calm the sky !
 And how, in sportive chase, the swallows fly !
 My goats, secure from harm, small tendance need,
 While high, on yonder hanging rock, they feed :
 And here below, the banky shore along,
 Your heifers graze. Now, then, to strive in song
 Prepare. As eldest, Hobbinol begin ;
 And Lanquet's rival verse, by turns, come in.

Hobbinol.

Let others stake what chosen pledge they will,
 Or kid, or lamb, or mazer wrought with skill :
 For praise we sing, nor wager ought beside ;
 And, whose the praise, let Geron's lips decide.

Lanquet.

To Geron I my voice, and skill, commend,
 A candid umpire, and to both a friend.

Geron.

Begin then, boys ; and vary well your song :
 Begin ; nor fear, from Geron's sentence, wrong.
 A boxen hautboy, loud, and sweet of sound,
 All varnish'd, and with brazen ringlets bound,
 I to the victor give : no mean reward,
 If to the ruder village-pipes compar'd.

Hobbinol.

The snows are melted ; and the kindly rain
 Descends on every herb, and every grain :
 Soft balmy breezes breathe along the sky ;
 The bloomy season of the year is nigh.

Lanquet.

The cuckoo calls aloud his wandering love ;
 The turtle's moan is heard in every grove ;
 The pastures change ; the warbling linnets sing :
 Prepare to welcome in the gaudy spring.

Hobbinol.

When locusts, in the ferny bushes, cry,
 When ravens pant, and snakes in caverns lie,
 Graze then in woods, and quit the shadeless plain,
 Else shall ye press the spongy teat in vain.

Lanquet.

When greens to yellow vary, and ye see
 The ground bestrew'd with fruits of every tree,
 And stormy winds are heard, think winter near,
 Nor trust too far to the declining year.

Hobbinol.

Woe then, alack ! befall the spendthrift swain,
 When frost, and snow, and hail, and sleet, and rain,
 By turns chastise him, while, through little care,
 His sheep, unshelter'd, pine in nipping air.

Lanquet.

The lad of forecast then untroubled sees
 The white-bleak plains, and silvery frosted trees :
 He sends his flock, and, clad in homely frize,
 In his warm cott the wintery blast defies.

Hobbinol.

Full fain, O blest'd Eliza ! would I praise
 Thy maiden-rule, and Albion's golden days :
 Then gentle Sidney liv'd, the shepherd's friend :
 Eternal blessings on his shade attend !

Lanquet.

Thrice happy shepherds now ! for Dorset loves
 The country-muse, and our resounding groves,
 While Anna reigns : O, ever may she reign !
 And bring, on earth, the golden age again.

Hobbinol.

I love, in secret all, a beauteous maid,
 And have my love, in secret all, repaid ;
 This coming night she plights her troth to me :
 Divine her name, and thou the victor be.

Lanquet.

Mild as the lamb, unharmed as the dove,
 True as the turtle, is the maid I love :
 How we in secret love, I shall not say :
 Divine her name, and I give up the day.

Hobbinol.

Soft on a cowslip-bank my love and I
 Together lay ; a brook ran murmuring by :
 A thousand tender things to me she said ;
 And I a thousand tender things repaid.

Lanquet.

In summer-shade, behind the cocking hay,
 What kind endearing words did she not say !
 Her lap, with apron deck'd, she fondly spread,
 And strok'd my cheek, and lull'd my leaning head.

Hobbinol.

Breathe soft, ye winds ; ye waters, gently flow ;
 Shield her, ye trees ; ye flowers, around her grow :
 Ye swains, I beg you, pass in silence by ;
 My love, in yonder vale, asleep does lie.

Lanquet.

Once Delia slept on easy moss reclin'd,
 Her lovely limbs half bare, and rude the wind :
 I smooth'd her coats, and stole a silent kiss :
 Condemn me, shepherds, if I did amiss.

Hobbinol.

As Marian bath'd, by chance I pass'd by ;
 She blush'd, and at me glanc'd a sidelong eye :
 Then, cowering in the treacherous stream, she try'd
 Her tempting form, yet still in vain, to hide.

Lanquet.

As I, to cool me, bath'd one sultry day,
Fond Lydia, lurking, in the sedges lay:
The wanton laugh'd, and seem'd in haste to fly;
Yet oft she stopt, and oft she turn'd her eye.

Hobbinol.

When first I saw (would I had never seen!)
Young Lyset lead the dance on yonder green,
Intent upon her beauties, as she mov'd,
Poor heedless wretch! at unawares I lov'd.

Lanquet.

When Lucy decks with flowers her swelling breast,

And on her elbow leans, dissembling rest,
Unable to refrain my madding mind,
Nor herds, nor pasture, worth my care I find.

Hobbinol.

Come, Rosalind, O come! for, wanting thee,
Our peopled vale a desert is to me.

Come, Rosalind, O come! My brinded kine,
My snowy sheep, my farm, and all, are thine.

Lanquet.

Come, Rosalind, O come! Here shady bowers,
Here are cool fountains, and here springing
flowers:

Come, Rosalind; Here ever let us stay;
And sweetly waste the live-long time away.

Hobbinol.

In vain the seasons of the moon I know,
The force of healing herbs, and where they grow:
No herb there is, no season, to remove
From my fond heart the racking pains of love.

Lanquet.

What profits me, that I in charms have skill,
And ghosts, and goblins, order as I will,
Yet have, with all my charms, no power to lay
The sprite that breaks my quiet night and day?

Hobbinol.

O, that, like Colin, I had skill in rhymes,
To purchase credit with succeeding times!
Sweet Colin Clout! who never, yet, had peer;
Who sung through all the seasons of the year.

Lanquet.

Let me, like Merlin, sing: his voice had power
To free th' 'clipping moon at midnight hour:
And, as he sung, the fairies with their queen,
In mantles blue, came tripping o'er the green.

Hobbinol.

Last eve of May did I not hear them sing,
And see their dance? And I can show the ring,
Where, hand in hand, they shift their feet so light:
The grass springs greener from their tread by night.

Lanquet.

But hast thou seen their king, in rich array,
Fam'd Oberon, with damask'd robe so gay,
And gemmy crown, by moonshine sparkling far,
And azure sceptre, pointed with a star?

Geron.

Here end your pleasing strife. Both victors are;
And both with Colin may, in rhyme, compare.
A boxen hautboy, loud, and sweet of sound,
All varnish'd, and with brazen ringlets bound,
To each I give. A mizzling mist descends
Adown that steepy rock: and this way tends Yon distant rain. Shoreward the vessels strive;
And, see, the boys their flocks to shelter drive.

THE STRAY NYMPH.

CEASE your music, gentle swains;

Saw ye Delia cross the plains?

Every thicket, every grove;

Have I rang'd, to find my love:

A kid, a lamb, my flock, I give,

Tell me only, doth she live?

White her skin as mountain-snow;

In her cheek the roses blow;

And her eye is brighter far

Than the beamy morning star.

When her ruddy lip ye view,

'Tis a berry moist with dew:

And her breath, oh, 'tis a gale

Passing o'er a fragrant vale,

Passing, when a friendly shower

Freshens every herb and flower.

Wide her bosom opens, gay

As the primrose-dell in May,

Sweet as violet-borders growing

Over fountains ever-flowing.

Like the tendrils of the vine,

Do her auburn tresses twine,

Glossy ringlets all behind

Streaming buxom to the wind,

When along the lawn she bounds;

Light, as hind before the hounds:

And the youthful ring she fires,

Hopeless in their fond desires,

As her flitting feet advance,

Wanton in the winding dance.

Tell me, shepherds, have ye seen

My delight, my love, my queen?

THE HAPPY SWAIN.

HAVE ye seen the morning sky,

When the dawn prevails on high,

When, anon, some purple ray

Gives a sample of the day,

When, anon, the lark, on wing,

Strives to soar, and strains to sing?

Have ye seen th' ethereal blue

Gently shedding silvery dew,

Spangling o'er the silent green,

While the nightingale, unseen,

To the moon and stars, full bright,

Lonesome chants the hymn of night?

Have ye seen the broider'd May

All her scented bloom display,

Breezes opening, every hour,

This, and that, expecting flower,

While the mingling birds prolong,

From each bush, the vernal song?

Have ye seen the damask-rose

Her unfully'd blush disclose,

Or the lily's dewy bell,

In her glossy white, excell,

Or a garden vary'd o'er

With a thousand glories more?

By the beauties these display,

Morning, evening, night, or day,

By the pleasures these excite,

Endless sources of delight!

Judge, by them, the joys I find,

Since my Rosalind was kind,

Since she did herself resign

To my vows, for ever mine.

E P I S T L E S.

TO A FRIEND,

WHO DESIRED ME TO WRITE ON THE DEATH OF
KING WILLIAM. April 20. 1702.

TRUST me, dear George, could I in verse but show
What sorrow I, what sorrow all men, owe
To Nassau's fate, or could I hope to raise
A song proportion'd to the monarch's praise,
Could I his merits, or my grief, express,
And proper thoughts in proper language dress,
Unbidden should my pious numbers flow,
The tribute of a heart o'ercharg'd with woe;
But, rather than profane his sacred herse
With languid praises, and unhallow'd verse,
My sighs I to myself in silence keep,
And inwardly, with secret anguish, weep.

Let Halifax's muse (he knew him well)
His virtues to succeeding ages tell.
Let him, who sung the warrior on the Boyne,
(Provoking Dorset in the task to join)
And show'd the hero more than man before,
Let him th' illustrious mortal's fate deplore;
A mournful theme: while, on raw pinions, I
But flutter, and make weak attempts to fly;
Content, if, to divert my vacant time,
I can but like some love-sick fopling rhyme,
To some kind-hearted mistress make my court,
And, like a modish wit, in sonnet sport.

Let others, more ambitious, rack their brains
In polish'd sentiments, and labour'd strains:
To blooming Phyllis I a song compose,
And, for a rhyme, compare her to the rose;
Then, while my fancy works, I write down morn,
To paint the blush that does her cheek adorn,
And, when the whiteness of her skin I show,
With ecstasy bethink myself of snow.
Thus, without pains, I tinkle in the close,
And sweeten into verse insipid prose.

The country scraper, when he wakes his crowd,
And makes the tortur'd cat-gut squeak aloud,
Is often ravish'd, and in transport lost:
What more, my friend, can fam'd Corelli boast,
When harmony herself from heaven descends,
And on the artist's moving bow attends?

Why then, in making verses, should I strain
For wit, and of Apollo beg a vein?
Who study Horace and the Stagyrte?
Why cramp my dulness, and in torment write?
Let me transgress by nature, nor by rule,
An artless idiot, not a study'd fool,
A Withers, not a Rymer, since I aim
At nothing less, in writing, than a name.

FROM HOLLAND, TO A FRIEND IN ENGLAND,

IN THE YEAR 1703.

FROM Utrecht's silent walks, by winds, I send
Health and kind wishes to my absent friend.

The winter spent, I feel the poet's fire;
The sun advances, and the fogs retire:
The genial spring unbinds the frozen earth,
Dawns on the trees, and gives the primrose birth.

Loos'd from their friendly harbours, once again
Confederate fleets assemble on the main:
The voice of war the gallant soldier wakes;
And weeping Cloë parting kisses takes.
On new-plum'd wings the Roman eagle soars:
The Belgick lion in full fury roars.
Dispatch the leader from your happy coast,
The hope of Europe, and Britannia's boast:
O, Marlborough, come! fresh laurels for thee rise!
One conquest more; and Gallia will grow wise.
Old Lewis makes his last effort in arms,
And shows how, ev'n in age, ambition charms.

Mean while, my friend, the thickening shades
I haunt,

And smooth canals, and after rivulets pant:
The smooth canals, alas, too lifeless show!
Nor to the eye, nor to the ear, they flow.
Studious of ease, and fond of humble things,
Below the smiles, below the frowns of kings,
Thanks to my stars, I prize the sweets of life:
No sleepless nights I count, no days of strife.
Content to live, content to die, unknown,
Lord of myself, accountable to none;
I sleep, I wake, I drink; I sometimes love;
I read, I write; I settle, and I rove,
When, and where-e'er, I please: thus, every hour
Gives some new proof of my despotic power.
All, that I will, I can; but then, I will
As reason bids; I meditate no ill;
And, pleas'd with things which in my level lie,
Leave it to madmen o'er the clouds to fly.

But this is all romance, a dream to you,
Who fence and dance, and keep the court in view.
White staffs and truncheons, seals and golden keys,

And silver stars, your towering genius please:
Such manly thoughts in every infant rise,
Who daily for some tinsel trinket cries.

Go on, and prosper, Sir: but first from me
Learn your own temper; for I know you free.
You can be honest; but you cannot bow,
And cringe, beneath a supercilious brow:
You cannot fawn; your stubborn soul recoils
At baseness; and your blood too highly boils.
From nature some submissive tempers have;
Unkind to you, she form'd you not a slave.
A courtier must be supple, full of guile,
Must learn to praise, to flatter, to revile,
The good, the bad, an enemy, a friend,
To give false hopes, and on false hopes depend.
Go on, and prosper, Sir; but learn to hide
Your upright spirit: 't will be construed pride.
The splendour of a court is all a cheat;
You must be servile, ere you can be great.

Besides, your ancient patrimony wasted,
Your youth run out, your schemes of grandeur
 blasted,

You may perhaps retire in discontent,
And curse your patron, for no strange event:
The patron will his innocence protest,
And frown in earnest, though he smil'd in jest.

Man, only for himself, can suffer wrong;
His reason fails, as his desires grow strong:
Hence, wanting ballast, and too full of sail,
He lies expos'd to every rising gale.
From youth to age, for happiness he's bound:
He splits on rocks, or runs his bark aground,
Or, wide of land, a desert ocean views,
And, to the last, the flying port pursues,
Yet, to the last, the port he does not gain,
And dying finds, too late, he liv'd in vain.

TO THE EARL OF DORSET.

Copenhagen, March 9. 1709.

FROM frozen climes, and endless tracts of snow,
From streams which northern winds forbid to flow,
What present shall the muse to Dorset bring,
Or how, so near the pole, attempt to sing?
The hoary winter here conceals from sight
All pleasing objects which to verse invite.
The hills and dales, and the delightful woods,
The flowery plains, and silver-streaming floods,
By snow disguis'd, in bright confusion lie,
And with one dazzling waste fatigue the eye.

No gentle breathing breeze prepares the spring,
No birds within the desert region sing.
The ships, unmov'd, the boisterous winds defy,
While rattling chariots o'er the ocean fly.
The vast leviathan wants room to play,
And spout his waters in the face of day.
The starving wolves along the main sea prow,
And to the moon in icy valleys howl.
O'er many a shining league the level main
Here spreads itself into a glassy plain:
There solid billows of enormous size,
Alps of green ice, in wild disorder rise.

And yet but lately have I seen, ev'n here,
The winter in a lovely dress appear.
Ere yet the clouds let fall the treasure'd snow,
Or winds begun through hazy skies to blow,
At evening a keen eastern breeze arose,
And the descending rain unsully'd froze.
Soon as the silent shades of night withdrew,
The ruddy morn disclos'd at once to view
The face of Nature in a rich disguise,
And brighten'd every object to my eyes:
For every shrub, and every blade of grass,
And every pointed thorn, seem'd wrought in glass;
In pearls and rubies rich the hawthorns show,
While through the ice the crimson berries glow.
The thick-sprung reeds, which watery marshes yield,

Seem'd polish'd lances in a hostile field.
The stag, in limpid currents, with surprise,
Sees crystal branches on his forehead rise:
The spreading oak, the beech, and towering pine,
Glaz'd over, in the freezing ether shine.
The frightened birds the rattling branches shun,
Which wave and glitter in the distant sun,

When if a sudden gust of wind arise,
The brittle forest into atoms flies,

The crackling wood beneath the tempest bends,
And in a spangled shower the prospect ends:
Or, if a southern gale the region warm,
And by degrees unbind the wintery charm,
The traveller a miry country sees,
And journeys sad beneath the dropping trees:
Like some deluded peasant, Merlin leads [meads.
Through fragrant bowers, and through delicious
While here enchanted gardens to him rise,
And airy fabrics there attract his eyes,
His wandering feet the magic paths pursue,
And, while he thinks the fair illusion true,
The trackless scenes disperse in fluid air,
And woods, and wilds, and thorny ways appear,
A tedious road the weary wretch returns,
And, as he goes, the transient vision mourns.

To the Right Honourable

CHARLES LORD HALIFAX,

One of the Lords Justices appointed by his Majesty. 1714.

PATRON of verse, O Halifax, attend,
The muse's favourite, and the poet's friend!
Approaching joys my ravish'd thoughts inspire:
I feel the transport; and my soul's on fire!

Again Britannia rears her awful head:
Her fears, transplanted, to her foes are fled.
Again her standard she displays to view;
And all its faded lilies bloom anew.
Here beauteous liberty salutes the sight,
Still pale, nor yet recover'd of her fright,
Whilst here religion, smiling to the skies,
Her thanks expresses with up-lifted eyes.

But who advances next, with cheerful grace,
Joy in her eye, and plenty in her face?
A wheaten garland does her head adorn,
O property! O goddess, English born! [mourn!
Where hast thou been? How did the wealthy
The bankrupt nation sigh'd for thy return,
Doubtful for whom her spreading funds were fill'd,
Her fleets were freighted, and her fields were till'd.

No longer now shall France and Spain combin'd,
Strong in their golden Indies, awe mankind.
Brave Catalans, who for your freedom strive,
And in your shatter'd bulwarks yet survive,
For you alone, worthy a better fate,
O, may this happy change not come too late!
Great in your sufferings!—But, my muse, forbear;
Nor damp the public gladness with a tear:
The hero has receiv'd their just complaint,
Grac'd with the name of our fam'd patron-saint:
Like him, with pleasure he foregoes his rest,
And longs, like him, to succour the distress'd.
Firm to his friends, tenacious of his word,
As justice calls, he draws or sheaths the sword:
Matur'd by thought, his councils shall prevail;
Nor shall his promise to his people fail.

He comes, desire of nations! England's boast!
Already he has reach'd the Belgian coast.
Our great deliverer comes! and with him brings
A progeny of late succeeding kings,
Fated to triumph o'er Britannia's foes
In distant years, and fix the world's repose.

The floating squadrons now approach the shore;
Loft in the sailors shouts, the cannons roar:
And now, behold, the sovereign of the main,
High on the deck, amidst his shining train,

Surveys the subject flood. An eastern gale
Plays through the shrouds, and swells in every fail:
Th' obsequious waves his new dominion own,
And gently waft their monarch to his throne.
Now the glad Britons hail their king to land,
Hang on the rocks, and blacken all the strand:
But who the silent ecstasy can show,
The passions which in nobler bosoms glow?
Who can describe the godlike patriot's zeal?
Or who, my Lord, your generous joys reveal?
Ordain'd, once more, our treasure to advance,
Retrieve our trade, and sink the pride of France,
Once more the long-neglected arts to raise,
And form each rising genius for the bays.

Accept the present of a grateful song;
This prelude may provoke the learned throng:
To Cam and Isis shall the joyful news,
By me convey'd, awaken every muse.
Ev'n now the vocal tribe in verse conspires;
And I already hear their sounding lyres:
To them the mighty labour I resign,
Give up the theme, and quit the tuneful nine.
So when the spring first smiles among the trees,
And blossoms open to the vernal breeze,
The watchful nightingale, with early strains,
Summons the warblers of the woods and plains,
But drops her music, when the choir appear,
And listens to the concert of the year.

To the Honourable
JAMES CRAGGS, ESQ.

Secretary at War, at Hampton-Court. 1717.

THOUGH Britain's hardy troops demand your care,
And cheerful friends your hours of leisure share;
O, Craggs, for candour known! indulge awhile
My fond desire, and on my labour smile:
Nor count it always an abuse of time
To read a long epistle, though in rhyme.

To you I send my thoughts, too long confin'd,
And ease the burden of a loyal mind;
To you my secret transports I disclose,
That rise above the languid powers of prose.
But, while these artless numbers you peruse,
Think 'tis my heart that dictates, not the muse;
My heart, which at the name of Brunswick fires,
And no assistance from the muse requires.

Believe me, Sir, your breast that glows with zeal
For George's glory, and the public weal,
Your breast alone feels more pathetic heats;
Your heart alone with stronger raptures beats.

When I review the great examples past,
And to the former ages join the last;
Still, as the godlike heroes to me rise,
In arms triumphant, and in councils wise,
The king is ever present to my mind;
His greatness, trac'd in every page, I find;
The Greek and Roman pens his virtues tell,
And under shining names on Brunswick dwell.

At Hampton, while he breathes untainted air,
And seems, to vulgar eyes, devoid of care;
The British muses to the grove will press,
Tune their melodious harps, and claim access:
But let them not too rashly touch the strings;
For fate allows no solitude to kings.

Hail to the shades, where William, great in arms,
Retir'd from conquest to Maria's charms!

Where George serene in majesty appears,
And plans the wonders of succeeding years!
There, as he walks, his comprehensive mind
Surveys the globe, and takes in all mankind:
While, Britain, for thy sake he wears the crown;
To spread thy power as wide as his renown:
To make thee umpire of contending states,
And poise the balance in the world's debates.

From the smooth terrais, as he casts his eye,
And sees the current sea-ward rolling by;
What schemes of commerce rise in his designs!
Pledges of wealth! and unexhausted mines!
Through winds and waves, beneath inclement skies,
Where stars, distinguish'd by no name, arise,
Our fleets shall undiscover'd lands explore,
And a new people hear our cannons roar.

The rivers long in ancient story fam'd,
Shall flow obscure, nor with the Thames be nam'd:
Nor shall our poets copy from their praise,
And Nymphs and Syrens to thy honour raise;
Nor make thy banks with Tritons shells resound,
Nor bind thy brows with humble sedges round:
But paint thee as thou art; a peopled stream!
The boast of merchants, and the sailors theme!
Whose swelling floods unnumber'd ships sustain,
And pour whole towns afloat into the main;
While the redundant seas waft up fresh stores,
The daily tribute of far distant shores.

Back to thy source I try thy silver-train,
That gently winds through many a fertile plain;
Where flocks and lowing herds in plenty feed,
And shepherds tune at ease the vocal reed:
Ere yet thy waters meet the briny tide,
And freighted vessels down thy channel ride;
Ere yet thy billows leave their banks behind,
Swell into state, and foam before the wind:
Thy sovereign's emblem! in thy course complete!
When I behold him in his lov'd retreat,
Where rural scenes their pleasing views disclose,
A sylvan deity the monarch shows;
And if he only knew the woods to grace,
To rouse the stag, and animate the chase:
While every hour, from thence, his high commands,

By speedy winds convey'd to various lands,
Control affairs; give weighty councils birth;
And sway the mighty rulers of the earth.

Were he, our island's glory and defence,
To reign unactive, at the world's expence;
Say, generous Craggs, who then should quell the
Of lawless faction, and reform the age? [rage
Who should our dear-bought liberties maintain?
Who fix our leagues with France, and treat with Spain?

Who check the headstrong Swede; assuage the Czar;
Secure our peace, and quench the northern war?
The Turk, though he the Christian name defies,
And curses Eugene, yet from Eugene flies,
His cause to Brunswick's equity dare trust;
He knows him valiant, and concludes him just:
He knows his fame in early youth acquir'd,
When turban'd hosts before his sword retir'd.

Thus while his influence to the poles extends,
Or where the day begins, or where it ends,
Far from our coasts he drives off all alarms;
And those his power protects, his goodness charms.
Great in himself, and undebas'd with pride,
The sovereign lays his regal state aside,

Pleas'd to appear without the bright disguise
Of pomp; and on his inborn worth relies.
His subjects are his guests; and daily boast
The condescension of their royal host:
While crowds succeeding crowds on either hand,
A ravish'd multitude, admiring stand.
His manly wit and sense, with candour join'd,
His speech with every elegance refin'd,
His winning aspect, his becoming ease,
Peculiar graces all, conspire to please,
And render him to every heart approv'd;
The king respected, and the man belov'd.
Nor is his force of genius less admir'd,
When most from crowds or public cares retir'd,
The learned arts, by turns, admittance find;
At once unbend and exercise his mind.
The secret springs of nature, long conceal'd,
And to the wise by slow degrees reveal'd,
(Delightful search!) his piercing thought descends
Oft through the concave azure of the skies
His soul delights to range, a boundless space,
Which myriads of celestial glories grace;
Worlds behind worlds, that deep in ether lie,
And suns, that twinkle to the distant eye;
Or call them stars, on which our fates depend,
And every ruling star is Brunswick's friend.

Soon as the rising sun shoots o'er the stream,
And gilds the palace with a ruddy beam,
You to the healthful chase attend the king,
And hear the forest with the huntsmen ring:
While in the dusty town we rule the state,
And from Gazettes determine England's fate.
Our groundless hopes and groundless fears prevail,
As artful brokers comment on the mail.
Deafen'd with news, with politics oppress'd,
I wish the wind ne'er vary'd from the west.
Secure on George's councils I rely,
Give up my cares, and Britain's foes defy.
What though cabals are form'd, and impious leagues!

Though Rome fills Europe with her dark in-
His vigilance, on every state intent,
Defeats their plots, and over-rules th' event.

But whither do my vain endeavours tend?
Or how shall I my rash attempt defend?
Divided in my choice, from praise to praise
I rove, bewilder'd in the pleasing maze.
One virtue mark'd, another I pursue,
While yet another rises to my view.
Unequal to the task, too late I find
The growing theme unfinish'd left behind.
Thus, the deluded bee, in hopes to drain
At once the thymy treasure of the plain,
Wide ranging on her little pinions toils,
And skims o'er hundred flowers for one she spoils:
When, soon o'erburden'd with the fragrant weight,
Homeward she flies, and flags beneath her freight.

TO LORD CARTERET,

DEPARTING FROM DUBLIN, 1726.

BEHOLD, Britannia waves her flag on high,
And calls forth breezes from the western sky,
And beckons to her son, and smooths the tide,
That does Hibernia from her cliffs divide.

Go, Carteret, go; and, with thee, go along
The nation's blessing, and the poet's song;
Loud acclamations, with melodious lays,
The kindest wishes, and sincerest praise.

Go, Carteret, go; and bear my joys away!
So speaks the muse, that fain would bid thee stay:
So spoke the virgin to the youth unkind,
Who gave his vows, and canvass, to the wind,
And promis'd to return; but never more
Did he return to the Threician shore.

Go, Carteret, go: alas, a tedious while
Hast thou been absent from thy mother-isle;
A slow-pac'd train of months to thee and thine,
A flight of moments to a heart like mine,
That feels perfections, and resigns with pain
Enjoyments I may never know again.

O, while mine eye pursues the fading sails,
Smooth roll, ye waves, and steady breathe, ye gales,
And urge with gentle speed to Albion's strand
A household fair, amidst the fairest land,
In every decency of life polite,
A freight of virtues wafting from my sight:
And now farewell, O early in renown,
Illustrious, young, in labours for the crown,
Just, and benign, and vigilant, in power,
And elegant to grace the vacant hour,
Relaxing sweet! Nor are we born to wear
The brow still bent, and give up life to care:
And thou, mild glory, beaming round his fame,
Francisca, thou, his first, his latest flame;
Parent of bloom! In pleasing arts refin'd!
Farewell, thy hand, and voice, in music join'd;
Thy courtesy, as soothing as thy song,
And smiles soft-gleaming on the courtly throng:
And thou, Charissa, hastening to thy prime,
And Carolina, chiding tardy time,
Who every tender wish of mine divide,
For whom I strung the lyre, once laid aside,
Receive, and bear in mind, my fond farewell,
Thrive on in life! and, thriving on, excel!
Accept this token, Carteret, of good-will,
The voice of nature, undebas'd by skill,
These parting numbers, cadenc'd by my grief,
For thy lov'd sake, and for my own relief,
If aught, alas, thy absence may relieve,
Now I am left, perhaps, through life to grieve:
Yet would I hope, yet hope I know not why,
(But hopes and wishes in one balance lie)
Thou may'st revisit, with thy wonted smiles,
Ierna, island set around with isles:
May the same heart, that bids thee now adieu,
Salute thy sails, and hail thee into view!

O D E S.

S O N G.

FROM White's and Will's
To purling rills
The love-sick Strephon flies;
There, full of woe,
His numbers flow,
And all in rhyme he dies.

The fair coquet,
With feign'd regret,
Invites him back to town;
But, when in tears
The youth appears,
She meets him with a frown.

Full oft the maid
This prank had play'd,
Till angry Strephon swore,
And, what is strange,
Though loth to change,
Would never see her more.

S O N G.

WHY we love, and why we hate,
Is not granted us to know:
Random chance, or wilful fate,
Guides the shaft from Cupid's bow.

If on me Zelinda frown,
Madness 'tis in me to grieve:
Since her will is not her own,
Why should I uneasy live?

If I for Zelinda die,
Deaf to poor Mizella's cries,
Ask not me the reason why:
Seek the riddle in the skies.

TO SIGNORA CUZZONI.

May 25. 1724.

LITTLE syren of the stage,
Charmer of an idle age,
Empty warbler, breathing lyre,
Wanton gale of fond desire,
Bane of every manly art,
Sweet enfeeblor of the heart!
O, too pleasing in thy strain,
Hence, to southern climes again;
Tuneful mischief, vocal spell,
To this island bid farewell;
Leave us as we ought to be,
Leave the Britons rough and free.

TO THE MEMORY OF THE LATE
EARL OF HALIFAX.

June 30, 1718.

WEEPING o'er thy sacred urn,
Ever shall the muses mourn;

Sadly shall their numbers flow,
Ever elegant in woe.

Thousands, nobly born, shall die,
Thousands in oblivion lie,
Names, which leave no trace behind,
Like the clouds before the wind,
When the dusky shadows pass,
Lightly fleeting o'er the grass.

But, O Halifax, thy name
Shall through ages rise in fame:
Sweet remembrance shalt thou find,
Sweet in every noble mind.

To the Honourable
MISS CARTERET.

Bloom of beauty, early flower
Of the blissful bridal bower,
Thou, thy parents' pride and care,
Fairest offspring of the fair,
Lovely pledge of mutual love,
Angel seeming from above,
Was it not thou day by day
Dost thy very sex betray,
Female more and more appear,
Female, more than angel dear,
How to speak thy face and mien,
(Soon too dangerous to be seen)
How shall I, or shall the muse,
Language of resemblance choose?
Language like thy mien and face,
Full of sweetness, full of grace!

By the next returning spring,
When again the linnets sing,
When again the lambkins play,
Pretty sportlings full of May,
When the meadows next are seen,
Sweet enamel! white and green,
And the year in fresh attire,
Welcomes every gay desire,
Blooming on shalt thou appear
More inviting than the year,
Fairer sight than orchard shows,
Which beside a river blows:
Yet, another spring I see,
And a brighter bloom in thee:
And another round of time,
Circling, still improves thy prime:
And, beneath the vernal skies,
Yet a verdure more shall rise,
Ere thy beauties, kindling flow,
In each finish'd feature glow,
Ere, in smiles and in disdain,
Thou exert thy maiden reign,
Absolute, to save or kill,
Fond beholders, at thy will,

Then the taper-moulded waste
With a span of ribbon brac'd,
And the swell of either breast,
And the wide high-vaulted chest,

And the neck so white and round,
 Little neck with brilliants bound,
 And the store of charms which shine
 Above, in lineaments divine,
 Crowded in a narrow space
 To complete the desperate face,
 These alluring powers, and more,
 Shall enamour'd youths adore;
 These, and more, in courtly lays,
 Many an aching heart shall praise.

Happy thrice, and thrice again,
 Happiest he of happy men,
 Who, in courtship greatly sped,
 Wins the damsel to his bed,
 Bears the virgin-prize away,
 Counting life one nuptial day:
 For the dark-brown dusk of hair,
 Shadowing thick thy forehead fair,
 Down the veiny temples growing,
 O'er the sloping shoulders flowing.
 And the smoothly pencil'd brow,
 Mild to him in every vow,
 And the fringed lid below,
 Thin as thinnest blossoms blow,
 And the hazely lucid eye,
 Whence heart-winning glances fly,
 And that cheek of health, o'erspread
 With soft-blended white and red,
 And the witching smiles which break
 Round those lips, which sweetly speak,
 And thy gentleness of mind,
 Gentle from a gentle kind,
 These endowments, heavenly dower!
 Brought him in the promis'd hour,
 Shall for ever bind him to thee,
 Shall renew him still to woo thee.

ON THE DEATH OF THE RIGHT HONOURABLE
 WILLIAM EARL COWPER. 1723.

STROPHE I.

Wake the British harp again,
 To a sad melodious strain;
 Wake the harp, whose every string,
 When Halifax resign'd his breath,
 Accurs'd inexorable death;
 For I, once more, must in affliction sing,
 One song of sorrow more bestow,
 The burden of a heart o'ercharg'd with woe:
 Yet, O my soul, if aught may bring relief,
 Full many, grieving, shall applaud thy grief,
 The pious verse, that Cowper does deplore,
 Whom all the boasted powers of verse cannot restore.

ANTISTROPHE I.

Not to her, his fondest care,
 Not to his lov'd offspring fair,
 Nor his country ever dear,
 From her, from them, from Britain torn:
 With her, with them, does Britain mourn:
 His name, from every eye, calls forth a tear;
 And, intermingling, sighs with praise,
 All good men wish the number of his days
 Had been to him twice told, and twice again,
 In that seal'd book, where all things which pertain
 To mortal man, whatever things befall,
 Are from eternity confirm'd, beyond recall:

EPODE I.

Where every loss, and every gain,
 Where every grief, and every joy,
 Every pleasure, every pain,
 Each bitter, and each sweet alloy,
 To us uncertain though they flow,
 Are pre-ordain'd, and fix'd, above.
 Too wretched state, did man foreknow
 Those ills, which man cannot remove!
 Vain is wisdom for preventing
 What the wisest live lamenting.

STROPHE II.

Hither sent, who knows the day
 When he shall be call'd away?
 Various is the term assign'd:
 An hour, a day, some months, or years,
 The breathing soul on earth appears;
 But, through the swift succession of mankind,
 Swarm after swarm! a busy race,
 The strength of cities, or of courts the grace,
 Or who in camps delight, or who abide
 Diffus'd o'er lands, or float on oceans wide,
 Of them, though many here long lingering dwell,
 And see their children's children, yet, how few excel!

ANTISTROPHE II.

Here we come, and hence we go,
 Shadows passing to and fro,
 Seen a while, forgotten soon:
 But thou, to fair distinction born,
 Thou, Cowper, beamy in the morn
 Of life, still brightening to the pitch of noon,
 Scarce verging to the steep decline,
 Hence summon'd while thy virtues radiant shine,
 Thou singled out the fosterling of fame,
 Secure of praise, nor less secur'd from blame,
 Shalt be remember'd with a fond applause,
 So long as Britons own the same indulgent laws.

EPODE II.

United in one public weal,
 Rejoicing in one freedom, all,
 Cowper's hand apply'd the seal,
 And levell'd the partition-wall.
 The chosen seeds of great events
 Are thinly sown, and slowly rise:
 And time the harvest-scythe presents,
 In season, to the good and wise:
 Hymning to the harp my story,
 Fain would I record his glory.

STROPHE III.

Pouring forth, with heavy heart,
 Truth unleaven'd, pure of art,
 Like the hallow'd bard of yore,
 Who chaunted in authentic rhymes
 The worthies of the good old times,
 Ere living vice in verse was varnish'd o'er,
 And virtue died without a song.
 Support of friendless right, to powerful wrong
 A check, behold him in the judgment seat!
 Twice, there, approv'd, in righteousness complete:
 In just awards, how gracious! tempering law
 With mercy, and reproving with a winning awe.

ANTISTROPHE III.

Hear him speaking, and you hear
 Reason tuneful to the ear!

Lips with thymy language sweet,
 Distilling on the hearer's mind
 The balm of wisdom, speech refin'd,
 Celestial gifts!—Oh, when the nobles meet,
 When next, thou sea-surrounded land,
 Thy nobles meet at Brunswick's high command.
 In vain they shall the charmer's voice desire!
 In vain those lips of eloquence require!
 That mild conviction which the soul assails
 By soft alarms, and with a gentle force prevails!

EPODE III.

To such persuasion, willing yields
 The liberal mind, in freedom train'd.
 Freedom, which, in crimson'd fields,
 By hardy toil our father's gain'd,
 Inheritance of long descent!
 The sacred pledge so dearly priz'd
 By that blest'd spirit we lament:
 Grief-easing lays, by grief devis'd,
 Plaintive numbers, gently flowing,
 Sooth the sorrows to him owing!

STROPHE IV.

Early on his growing heir,
 Stamp what time may not impair,
 As he grows, that coming years,
 Or youthful pleasures, or the vain
 Gigantic phantom of the brain
 Ambition, breeding monstrous hopes and fears,
 Or worthier cares, to youth unknown,
 Ennobling manhood; flower of life full-blown,
 May never wear the bosom-image faint.
 O, let him prove what words but weakly paint,
 The lively lovely semblance of his fire,
 A model to his son! that ages may admire!

ANTISTROPHE IV.

Every virtue, every grace,
 Still renewing in the race,
 Once thy father's pleasing hope,
 Thy widow'd mother's comfort now,
 No fuller bliss does heaven allow,
 While we behold yon wide-spread azure cope,
 With burning stars thick-luster'd o'er,
 Than to enjoy, and to deserve, a store
 Of treasure'd fame, by blameless deeds acquir'd,
 By all unenvied, and by all desired,
 Free-gift of men, the tribute of good-will!
 Rich in this patrimony fair, increase it still.

EPODE IV.

The fullness of content remains
 Above the yet unfathom'd skies,
 Where, triumphant, gladness reigns,
 Where wishes cease, and pleasures rise
 Beyond all wish; where bitter tears
 For dying friends are never shed;
 Where sighing, none desire pass'd years:
 Recall'd or wish'd the future fled.
 Mournful measures, O, relieve me!
 Sweet remembrance! cease to grieve me.

STROPHE V.

He the robe of justice wore
 Sully'd not, as heretofore,
 When the magistrate was fought
 With yearly gifts. Of what avail
 Are guilty hoards? for life is frail;
 And we are judg'd where favour is not bought.

By him, forewarn'd thou frantic ill,
 How did the thirst of gold thy sons beguile!
 Beneath the specious ruin thousands groan'd,
 By him, alas, forewarn'd, by him bemoan'd
 Where shall his like, on earth, be found? oh, when Shall I, once more, behold the most belov'd of men!

ANTISTROPHE V.

Winning aspect! winning mind!
 Soul and body aptly join'd!
 Searching thought, engaging wit,
 Enabled to instruct, or please,
 Uniting dignity with ease,
 By nature form'd for every purpose fit,
 Endearing excellence!—O, why
 Is such perfection born, and born to die?
 Or do such rare endowments still survive,
 As plants remov'd to milder regions thrive,
 In one eternal spring? and we bewail
 The parting soul, new-born to life that cannot fail.

EPODE V.

Where sacred friendship, plighted love,
 Parental joys, unmix'd with care,
 Through perpetual time improve?
 Or do the deathless blessed share
 Sublimar raptures, unreveal'd,
 Beyond or weak conception pure?
 But, while those glories lie conceal'd,
 The righteous count the promise sure,
 Trials to the last enduring,
 To the last their hope securing.

To the Right Honourable.

WILLIAM PULTENEY, ESQ.

May 1. 1723.

Who, much distinguish'd, yet is blest'd!
 Who, dignified above the rest,
 Does, still, unenvied live?
 Not to the man whose wealth abounds,
 Nor to the man whose fame resounds,
 Does heaven such favour give,
 Nor to the noble-born, nor to the strong,
 Nor to the gay, the beautiful, or young,

Whom then, secure of happiness,
 Does every eye beholding bless,
 And every tongue commend?
 Him, Pultney, who, possessing store,
 Is not solicitous of more,
 Who, to mankind a friend,
 Nor envies, nor is envied by, the great,
 Polite in courts, polite in his retreat.

Whose unambitious, active soul,
 Attends the welfare of the whole,
 When public storms arise,
 And in the calm a thousand ways
 Diversifies his nights and days,
 Still elegantly wise;
 While books, each morn, the lightsome soul invite,
 And friends, with season'd mirth, improve the night.

In him do men no blemish see;
 And factions in his praise agree,
 When most they vex the state:
 Distinguish'd favourite of the skies,
 Belov'd he lives, lamented dies;
 Yet, shall he not to fate

Submit entire; the rescuing muse shall save
His precious name, and win him from the grave.

Too frail is brass and polish'd stone;
Perpetual fame the muse alone
On merit can bestow:
Yet, must the time-enduring song,
The verse unrivall'd by the throng,
From nature's bounty flow:
Th' ungifted tribe in metre pass away,
Oblivion's sport, the poets of a day.

What laws shall o'er the ode preside?
In vain would art presume to guide
The chariot-wheels of praise.
When fancy, driving, ranges free,
Fresh flowers selecting, like the bee,
And regularly strays,
While nature does, disdaining aids of skill,
The mind with thought, her ears with numbers, fill.

As when the Theban hymns divine
Make proud Olympian victors shine
In an eternal blaze,
The varying measures, ever new,
Unbeaten tracts of fame pursue,
While through the glorious maze
The poet leads his heroes to renown,
And weaves in verse a never-fading crown.

TO MISS MARGARET PULTENEY,

DAUGHTER OF DANIEL PULTENY, ESQ. IN THE NURSERY.

April 27. 1727.

DIMPLY damsel, sweetly smiling,
All carefing, none beguiling,
Bud of beauty, fairly blowing,
Every charm to nature owing,
This and that new thing admiring,
Much of this and that inquiring,
Knowledge by degrees attaining,
Day by day some virtue gaining,
Ten years hence, when I leave chiming,
Beardless poets, fondly rhyming,
(Rescued now, perhaps in spelling,)
On thy riper beauties dwelling,
Shall accuse each killing feature
Of the cruel, charming, creature,
Whom I knew complying, willing,
Tender, and averse from killing.

TO MISS CHARLOTTE PULTENEY,

IN HER MOTHER'S ARMS,

May 1. 1724.

TIMELY blossom, infant fair,
Fondling of a happy pair,
Every morn, and every night,
Their solicitous delight,
Sleeping, waking, still at ease,
Pleasing, without skill to please,
Little gossip, blithe and hale,
Tattling many a broken tale,
Singing many a tuneless song,
Lavish of a heedless tongue,
Simple maiden, void of art,
Babbling out the very heart,

Yet abandon'd to thy will,
Yet imagining no ill,
Yet too innocent to blush,
Like the linnet in the bush.
To the mother-linnet's note
Moduling her slender throat
Chirping forth thy petty joys,
Wanton in the change of toys,
Like the linnet green, in May,
Flitting to each bloomy spray,
Wearied then, and glad of rest,
Like the linnet in the nest.
This thy present happy lot,
This, in time, will be forgot:
Other pleasures, other cares,
Ever-busy time prepares;
And thou shalt in thy daughter see,
This picture, once, resembled thee.

To the Right Honourable
ROBERT WALPOLE, ESQ.

June 15. 1724.

VOTARY to public zeal,
Minister of England's weal,
Have you leisure for a song,
Tripping lightly o'er the tongue,
Swift and sweet in every measure,
Tell me, Walpole, have you leisure?
Nothing lofty will I sing,
Nothing of the favourite king,
Something, rather, sung with ease,
Simply elegant to please.

Fairy virgin, British muse,
Some unheard-of story choose
Choose the glory of the swain,
Gifted with a magic strain,
Swaging grief of every kind,
Healing, with a verse, the mind:
To him came a man of power,
To him, in a cheerless hour;
When the swains by Druids taught,
Soon divin'd his irksome thought,
Soon the maple harp he strung,
Soon with silver accent, sung.

"Steerer of a mighty realm,
"Pilot waking o'er the helm,
"Blessing of thy native soil,
"Weary of a thankless toil,
"Cast repining thought behind,
"Give thy trouble to the wind.
"Mortal, destin'd to excel,
"Bear the blame of doing well,
"Like the worthies great of old,
"In the list of fame enroll'd.
"What, though titles thou decline?
"Still the more thy virtues shine.
"Envy, with her serpent eye,
"Marks each praise that soars on high.
"To thy lot resign thy will:
"Every good is mix'd with ill.
"See, the white unblemish'd rose
"On a thorny bramble blows:
"See, the torrent pouring rain
"Does the limpid fountain stain:
"See, the giver of the day
"Urgeth on, through clouds, his way:

" Nothing is entirely blest'd;
 " Envy does thy worth attest.
 " Pleasing visions, at command,
 " Answer to my voice and hand;
 " Quick, the blissful scene prepare,
 " Sooth the patriot's heavy care:
 " Visions, cheering to the sight,
 " Give him earnest of delight.
 " Wise disposer of affairs,
 " View the end of all thy cares!
 " Forward cast thy ravish'd eyes,
 " See the gladdening harvest rise:
 " Lo, the people reap thy pain!
 " Thine the labour, theirs the gain.
 " Yonder turn a while thy view,
 " Turn thee to yon spreading yew,
 " Once the gloomy tree of fate,
 " Once the plighted virgin's hate:
 " Now, no longer does it grow,
 " Parent of the warring bow:
 " See, beneath the guiltless shade,
 " Peasants shape the plow and spade,
 " Rescued, ever, from the fear
 " Of the whistling shaft and spear.
 " Lo, where plenty comes, with peace!
 " Hear the breath of murmur cease:
 " See, at last, unclouded days;
 " Hear, at last, unenvied praise.
 " Nothing shall thy soul molest;
 " Labour is the price of rest.
 " Mortal, destin'd to excel,
 " Bless the toil of doing well!"

SUPPLICATION FOR MISS CARTERET,

IN THE SMALL-POX.

Dublin, July 31. 1725.

POWER o'er every power supreme,
 Thou the poets hallow'd theme,
 From thy mercy seat on high,
 Hear my numbers, hear my cry.
 Breather of all vital breath,
 Arbiter of life and death,
 Oh, preserve this innocence,
 Yet unconscious of offence,
 Yet in life and virtue growing,
 Yet no debt to nature owing.
 Thou who giv'st angelic grace
 To the blooming virgin face,
 Let the fell disease not blight
 What thou mad'st for man's delight:
 O'er her features let it pass
 Like the breeze o'er springing grass,
 Gentle as refreshing showers
 Sprinkled over opening flowers.
 O, let years alone diminish
 Beauties thou wast pleas'd to finish.
 To the pious parents give
 That the darling fair may live:
 Turn to blessings all their care,
 Save their fondness from despair.
 Mitigate the lurking pains
 Lodg'd within her tender veins;
 Soften every throb of anguish,
 Suffer not her strength to languish:
 Take her to thy careful keeping,
 And prevent the mother's weeping.

TO MISS GEORGIANA,

YOUNGEST DAUGHTER TO LORD CARTERET.

August 10. 1725.

LITTLE charm of placid mien,
 Minature of beauty's queen,
 Numbering years, a scanty nine,
 Stealing hearts without design,
 Young inveigler, fond in wiles,
 Prone to mirth, profuse in smiles,
 Yet a novice in disdain,
 Pleasure giving without pain,
 Still caressing, still carefs'd,
 Thou and all thy lovers blest'd,
 Never teiz'd and never teizing,
 O, for ever pleas'd and pleasing!
 Hither, British muse of mine,
 Hither all the Grecian nine,
 With the lovely graces three,
 And your promis'd nursing see:
 Images of life refin'd;
 Make it, as a garden gay,
 Every bud of thought display,
 Till, improving year by year,
 The whole culture shall appear,
 Voice, and speech, and action, rising,
 All to human sense surprising.
 Is the filken web so thin
 As the texture of her skin?
 Can the lily and the rose
 Such unfully'd hue disclose!
 Are the violets so blue
 As her veins expos'd to view?
 Do the stars, in wint'ry sky,
 Twinkle brighter than her eye?
 Has the morning lark a throat
 Sounding sweeter than her note?
 Who e'er knew the like before thee?
 They who knew the nymph that bare thee.
 From thy pastime and thy toys,
 From thy harmless cares and joys,
 Give me now a moment's time:
 When thou shalt attain thy prime,
 And thy bosom feel desire,
 Love the likeness of thy fire,
 One ordain'd, through life, to prove
 Still thy glory still thy love.
 Like thy sister, and like thee,
 Let thy nurtur'd daughters be:
 Semblance of the fair who bore thee,
 Trace the pattern set before thee,
 Where the Liffy meets the main,
 Has thy sister heard my strain:
 From the Liffy to the Thames,
 Minstrel echoes sing their names,
 Wafting to the willing ear
 Many a cadence sweet to hear,
 Smooth as gently breathing gales
 O'er the ocean and the vales,
 While the vessel calmly glides
 O'er the level glassy tides,
 While the summer flowers are springing,
 And the new-sledg'd birds are singing.

EPIGRAMS AND SHORT POEMS.

UPON THE TOASTS OF THE HANOVER CLUB.

THE reigning fair on polish'd crystal shine,
 Enrich our glasses, and improve our wine.
 The favourite names we to our lips apply,
 Indulge our thoughts, and drink with ecstasy.
 While these, the chosen beauties of our isle,
 Propitious on the cause of freedom smile,
 The rash pretender's hopes we may despise,
 And trust Britannia's safety to their eyes.

ON A COMPANY OF BAD DANCERS TO GOOD MUSIC *.

How ill the motion with the music suits!
 So Orpheus fiddled, and so danc'd the brutes.

EPIGRAM.

GEORGE came to the crown without striking a

 Ah, quoth the Pretender, would I could do so!

IN ANSWER TO THE QUESTION, WHAT IS THOUGHT?

THE hermit's solace in his cell,
 The fire that warms the poet's brain,
 The lover's heaven, or his hell,
 The madman's sport, the wise man's pain.

TO MR. ADDISON ON CATO.

THE mind to virtue is by verse subdu'd,
 And the true poet is a public good:
 This Britain feels, while, by your lines inspir'd,
 Her free-born sons to glorious thoughts are fir'd.
 In Rome had you espous'd the vanquish'd cause,
 Inflam'd the senate and upheld her laws,
 Your manly scenes had liberty restor'd,
 And given the just success to Cato's sword,
 O'er Cæsar's arms your genius had prevail'd,
 And the muse triumph'd where the patriot fail'd.

ON WIT AND WISDOM.

A FRAGMENT.

IN search of wisdom far from wit I fly:
 Wit is a harlot beauteous to the eye,
 In whose bewitching arms our early time
 We waste, and vigour of our youthful prime:
 But when reflection comes with riper years,
 And manhood with a thoughtful brow appears,
 We cast the mistress off to take a wife,
 And, wed to wisdom, lead a happy life.

The following Epitaph on the monument of my kinswoman, was written at the request of her husband.

Within the burial-vault near this marble, lieth coheir with her sister Elizabeth) to Robert Philips of Newton-Regis, in the county of Warwick, Esq. She died in her six and thirtieth year, on the 25th day of January, 1726.

VOL. IX.

LET THIS INSCRIPTION,

(Appealing yet to testimonies manifold)
 Recall to every surviving witness,
 And, for ensample, record to posterity,
 Her endowments,
 Whether owing to the indulgency of nature,
 Or to the assiduous lessons of education,
 Or to the silent admonitions of reflection.
 To her parents, husband, children,
 In no care, no duty, no affection,
 Was she wanting,
 Reserving, deserving, winning,
 From them respectively,
 Equal endearments.
 Of countenance and of disposition,
 Open, cheerful, modest;
 Of behaviour, humble, courteous, easy;
 Of speech, affable, free, discreet;
 In civilities, punctual, sincere, and elegant;
 Prone to offices of kindness and good will;
 To enmity a stranger;
 Forward, earnest, impatient,
 To succour the distress'd,
 To comfort the afflicted;
 Solicitous for the poor,
 And rich in store of alms:
 Whereby she became
 The delight, the love, the blessing, of all.
 In her household flourished
 Cheerfulness, due order, thrift, and plenty.
 In the closet retired,
 In the temple public.
 Morning and evening did she worship;
 By instruction, by example,
 Sedulous to nurture her children in godliness:
 So prevalent her love to them,
 Visited with that sore disease,
 Which too often kills or blights
 The mother's fondest hopes,
 That (regardless of self-preservation)
 In piously watching over their lives
 She, catching the infection, lost her own,
 Triumphant, through resignation,
 Over sickness, pain, anguish, agony,
 And (encompassed with tears and lamentations)
 Expiring in the fervour of prayer.

To the Memory, ever dear and precious, of his most affectionate, most beloved, and most deserving Wife, is this monument raised by Henry Vernon, of Hilton, in the county of Stafford, Esquire. To him she bore five Sons and two Daughters, all surviving, saving Elizabeth; who dying, in her second year, of the small-pox, some few days before, rested by her mother.

THE FABLE OF THULE, UNFINISHED.

FAR northward as the Dane extends his sway,
 Where the sun glances but a sloping ray,
 Beneath the sharpest rigour of the skies,
 Disdainful Thule's wintry island lies.
 Unhappy maid! thy tale, forgotten long,
 Shall virgins learn from my instructive song,
 And every youth, who lingers in despair,
 By thy example warn the cruel fair.

C c

In Cyprus, sacred to the queen of love,
 (Where stands her temple, and her myrtle grove,)
 Was Thule born, uncertain how. 'Tis said
 Once Venus won Adonis to her bed,
 And pregnant grew, the birth to chance assign'd
 In woods, and foster'd by the feather'd kind.
 With flowers some strew the helpless orphan round,
 With downy moss some spread the carpet ground,
 Some ripen'd fruits, some fragrant honey, bring;
 And some fetch water from the running spring;
 While others warble from the boughs, to cheer
 Their infant-charge, and tune her tender ear.
 Soon as the sun forsakes the evening skies,
 And hid in shades the gloomy forest lies,
 The nightingales their tuneful vigils keep,
 And lull her, with their gentler strains, to sleep.

This the prevailing rumour: as she grew,
 No dubious tokens spoke the rumour true.
 In every forming feature might be seen
 Some bright resemblance of the Cyprian queen:
 Nor was it hard the hunter youth to trace,
 In all her early passion of the chase:
 And when, on springing flowers reclin'd, she sung,
 The birds upon the bending branches hung,
 While, warbling, she express'd their various strains,
 And, at a distance, charm'd the listening swains:
 So sweet her voice resounding through the wood,
 They thought the nymph some Syren from the Half human thus by lineage, half divine, [flood.
 In forests did the lonely beauty shine, [glades,
 Like woodland flowers, which paint the desert
 And waste their sweets in unfrequented shades.
 No human face she saw, and rarely seen
 By human face: a solitary queen
 She rul'd, and rang'd, her shady empire round.
 No horn the silent huntress bears; no hound,
 With noisy cry, disturbs her solemn chase,
 Swift, as the bounding stag, she wings her pace;
 And, bend where'er she will her ebon bow,
 A speedy death arrests the flying foe.
 The bow the hunting goddess first supply'd,
 And ivory quiver crosses her shoulders ty'd.

Th' imperious queen of heaven, with jealous
 Beholds the blooming virgin from the skies, [eyes,
 At once admires, and dreads her glowing charms,
 And sees the god already in her arms:

In vain, she finds, her bitter tongue reproves
 His broken vows, and his clandestine loves:
 Jove still continues frail: and all in vain
 Does Thule in obscurest shades remain,
 While Maja's son, the thunderer's winged spy,
 Informs him where the lurking beauties lie.
 What sure expedient then shall Juno find,
 To calm her fears, and ease her boding mind?
 Delays to jealous minds a torment prove;
 And Thule ripens every day for love.

She mounts her car, and shakes the filken reins;
 The harness'd peacocks spread their painted trains,
 And smooth their glossy necks against the sun:
 The wheels along the level azure run.
 Eastward the goddess guides her gaudy team,
 And perfects, as she rides, her forming scheme.

The various orbs now pass'd, adown the steep
 Of heaven the chariot whirls, and plunges deep
 In fleecy clouds, which o'er the mid-land main
 Hang pois'd in air, to bless the isles with rain:
 And here the panting birds repose a while:
 Nor so their queen; she gains the Cyprian isle,
 By speedy zephyrs borne in thicken'd air:
 Unseen she seeks, unseen she finds, the fair.

Now o'er the mountain tops the rising sun
 Shot purple rays: now Thule had begun
 Her morning chase, and printed in the dews
 Her fleeting steps. The goddess now pursues,
 Now overtakes her in the full career,
 And flings a javelin at the flying deer.
 Amaz'd, the virgin huntress turns her eyes;
 When Juno, (now Diana in disguise,)
 Let no vain terrors discompose thy mind;
 My second visit, like my first, is kind.
 Thy ivory quiver, and thy ebon bow,
 Did not I give?—Here sudden blushes glow
 On Thule's cheeks: her busy eyes survey
 The dress, the crescent; and her doubts give way.

I own thee, goddess bright, the nymph replies,
 Goddess, I own thee, and thy favours prize:
 Goddess of woods, and lawns, and level plains,
 Fresh in my mind thine image still remains.

Then Juno, beauteous ranger of the grove,
 My darling care, fair object of my love,
 Hither I come, urg'd by no trivial fears,
 To guard thy bloom, and warn thy tender years.

TRANSLATIONS.

THE FIRST OLYMPIONIQUE OF PINDAR.

TO HIERO OF SYRACUSE, VICTORIOUS IN THE HORSE-RACE.

ARGUMENT.

THE poet praises Hiero for his justice, his wisdom, and his skill in music. He likewise celebrates the horse that won the race, and the place where the Olympic games were performed. From the place (namely Peloponnesus) he takes an occasion of digressing to the known fable of Tan-
 talus and Pelops; whence, returning to Hiero,

he sets forth the felicity of the Olympian victors. Then he concludes, by praying to the gods to preserve the glory and dignity of Hiero, admonishing him to moderation of mind, in his high station; and, lastly, glories in his own excellency in compositions of this kind.

STROPHE I. Measures 18.

EACH element to water yields;
 And gold like blazing fire by night,
 Amidst the stores of wealth that builds
 The mind aloft, is eminently bright;

But if, my soul, with fond desire
To sing of games thou dost aspire,
As thou by day canst not descry,
Through all the liquid waste of sky,
One burnish'd star, that like the sun does glow,
And cherish every thing below,
So, my sweet soul, no toil divine,
In song, does like th' Olympian shine:
Hence do the mighty poets raise
A hymn, of every tongue the praise,
The son of Saturn to resound,
When far, from every land, they come
To visit Hiero's regal dome,
Where peace, where plenty, is for ever found:

ANTISTROPHE I. Measures 18.

Lord of Sicilia's fleecy plains,
He governs, righteous in his power,
And, all excelling while he reigns,
From every lovely virtue crops the flower:
In music, blossom of delight,
Divinely skill'd, he cheers the night,
As we are wont, when friends design
To feast and wanton o'er their wine:
But from the wall the Dorian harp take down,
If Pisa, city of renown,
And if the fleet victorious steed,
The boast of his unrivall'd breed,
Heart-pleasing raptures did inspire,
And warm thy breast with sacred fire,
When late, on Alpheus' crowded shore,
Forth-springing quick, each nerve he strain'd,
The warning of the spur disdain'd,
And swift to victory his master bore.

EPODE I. Measures 16.

The lov'd Syracusan, the prince of the course,
The king, who delights in the speed of the horse:
Great his glory, great his fame,
Throughout the land where Lydian Pelops came
To plant his men, a chosen race,
A land the ocean does embrace,
Pelops, whom Neptune, ruler of the main,
Was known to love, when into life again,
From the reviving cauldron warm,
Clotho produc'd him whole, his shoulder-blade,
And its firm brawn, of shining ivory made:
But truth, unvarnish'd, oft neglected lies,
When fabled tales, invented to surprise,
In miracles mighty, have power to charm,
Where fictions, happily combin'd,
Deceive and captivate the mind.

STROPHE II. Measures 18.

Thus Poësy, harmonious spell,
The source of pleasures ever new,
With dignity does wonders tell;
And we, amaz'd, believe each wonder true.
Day, after day, brings truth to light,
Unveil'd, and manifest to sight:
But, of the blest'd, those lips which name
Foul deeds aloud, shall suffer blame.
Thee, son of Tantalus, my faithful song
Shall vindicate from every wrong,
The glories of thy house restore,
And baffle falsehoods told before:
Now, in his turn, thy fire prepar'd
A banquet: when the gods appear'd

At Siplyus, his sweet abode,
To grace the due proportion'd feast:
There, first, the trident-bearing guest
Beheld thy lovely form; and now, he glow'd;

ANTISTROPHE II. Measures 18.

And now, his soul subdued by love,
Thee in his golden car he bore
Swift to the lofty towers of Jove,
Whose name the nations all around adore:
Thus Ganymede was caught on high,
To serve the power who rules the sky.
When thou no longer didst appear,
And those, who sought a pledge so dear,
Without thee to thy widow'd mother came,
Some envious neighbour, to defame
Thy father's feast, a rumour spread,
The rumour through the country fled,
That thou, to heighten the repast,
Wast into seething water cast,
Fierce bubbling o'er the raging fire,
Thy limbs without compassion carv'd,
Thy sodden flesh in messes serv'd,
To gorge the gods, and a voracious fire:

EPODE II. Measures 16.

But, in thought ever pure, shall I deem it amiss,
Vile gluttons to call the partakers of bliss:
Let me then refrain, and dread:
A curse hangs over the blasphemer's head.
If they, who supervise and ward
The heavens, did ever show regard
To mortal man, this Tantalus might boast,
Of mortal men that he was honour'd most:
But he not able to digest
The glut, the surfeit, of immortal joys,
One heinous forfeit all his bliss destroys:
For over him the godhead hung, in air,
A ponderous stone, a dreadful poise of care!
From his head to remove it, with terror oppress'd,
In vain he tries, and seeks in vain
One cheerful moment to regain:

STROPHE III. Measures 18.

A life of woe, beyond relief,
His portion now; ordain'd before
To torments of a three-fold grief,
This fourth was added to complete his store,
Since, high presuming in his soul,
He nectar and ambrosia stole,
To give to men; by which he knew
That, tasting, he immortal grew:
But be not man deceiv'd: the gods reveal
What most we labour to conceal:
For this the powers, who deathless reign,
To earth sent down his son again,
To dwell with men, a short-liv'd race,
Whose sudden fate come on apace.
His flowery age in all its pride,
When, o'er his chin, a blackening shade
Of down was cast, a vow he made,
Deep in his soul, to win the profer'd bride.

ANTISTROPHE III. Measures 18.

Hippodamia, boasted name,
From her great sire the Pisan proud.
Alone, by night, the lover came
Beside the hoary sea, and call'd aloud
On him who sways the triple spear,
And fills with din the deafen'd ear;

When, at his feet, the god arose:
 Then Pelops, eager to disclose
 His mighty care, "O Neptune, if thy mind
 "In love did ever pleasure find,
 "Let not Oenomaus prevail,
 "And let this brazen javelin fail:
 "Oh! bear me hence, on wheels of speed,
 "To Elis, to the glorious meed:
 "To victory oh! whirl me, strait:
 "Since, after ten, and other three,
 "Bold suiters slain, yet still we see,
 "From year to year, the promis'd nuptials wait

EPODE III. Measures 16.

"Of his daughter. No perilous toil can excite
 "The dastard in heart, who despairs of his might.
 "Since we all are born to die,
 "Who, overcast, would in oblivion lie,
 "In unrepented age decay,
 "And meanly squander life away,
 "Cut off from every praise? Then let me dare
 "This conflict, in the dusty lists, to share;
 "And prosper thou my glowing wheels."
 Thus Pelops spoke; nor was his fervent prayer
 Pour'd forth in fruitless words, to waft in air:
 The deity his whole ambition grants;
 Nor shining car, nor coursers, now he wants:
 In the golden bright chariot new vigour he feels,
 Exulting in the horses' feet,
 Unwearied ever, ever fleet:

STROPHE IV. Measures 18.

Oenomaus, he triumphs o'er
 Thy prowess, and, to share his bed,
 Claims the bright maid; who to him bore
 Six princely sons, to manly virtues bred.
 Now, solemniz'd with steaming blood,
 And pious rites, near Alpheus' flood
 Entomb'd, he sleeps, where th' altar stands,
 That draws the vows of distant lands:
 And round his tomb the circling racers strive:
 And round the wheeling chariots drive.
 In thy fam'd courses, Pelops, rise
 Th' Olympian glories to the skies,
 And shine afar: there we behold
 The stretch of manhood, strenuous, bold,
 In fore fatigues, and there the strife
 Of winged feet. Thrice happy he,
 Who overcomes! for he shall see
 Unclouded days, and taste the sweets of life:

ANTISTROPHE IV. Measures 18.

Thy boon, O victory! thy prize.
 The good that, in a day obtain'd,
 From day to day fresh joy supplies,
 Is the supreme of bliss to man ordain'd:
 But let me now the rider raise
 And crown him with Æolian lays,
 The victor's due: and I confide,
 Though every welcome guest were try'd,
 Not one, in all the concourse, would be found
 For fairest knowledge more renown'd,
 Nor yet a master more to twine,
 In lasting hymns, each wreathing line.
 The guardian god, who watchful guides
 Thy fortunes, Hiero, presides
 O'er all thy cares with anxious power:
 And soon, if he does not deny
 His needful aid, my hopes run high
 To sing more pleasing in the joyful hour.

EPODE IV. Measures 16.

On thy chariot, triumphant when thou shalt appear,
 And fly o'er the course with a rapid career,
 Tracing paths of language fair,
 As I to Cronion's sunny mount repair.
 Even now the muse prepares to raise,
 Her growth, the strongest dart of praise,
 For me to wield. Approv'd in other things,
 Do others rise, conspicuous, only kings,
 High mounting on the summit fix:
 There bound thy view, wide spread, nor vainly try
 Farther to stretch the prospect of thine eye:
 Be, then, thy glorious lot to tread sublime,
 With steady steps, the measur'd tract of time;
 Be mine, with the prize-bearing worthies to mix,
 In Greece, throughout the learned throng,
 Proclaim'd unrival'd in my song.

THE SECOND OLYMPIONIQUE.

TO THERON OF AGRIGENTUM, VICTORIOUS IN THE CHARIOT-RACE.

ARGUMENT.

He praises Theron king of Agrigentum, on account of the victory obtained in the Olympic Games, with a chariot and four horses; likewise for his justice, his hospitality, his fortitude, and the illustriousness of his ancestors; whose adventures are occasionally mentioned: then he interweaves digressions to Semele, Ino, Pelus, Achilles, and others, and describes the future state of the righteous and of the wicked. Lastly, he concludes with extolling his own skill in panegyric, and the benevolence and liberality of Theron.

STROPHE I. Measures 16.

SOVEREIGN hymns, whose numbers sway
 The sounding harp, what god, what hero, say,
 What man, shall we resound?
 Is not Pifa Jove's delight?
 And did not Hercules, with conquest crown'd
 To him ordain
 Th' Olympiad for an army slain,
 Thank-offering of the war?
 And must we not, in Theron's right,
 Exert our voice, and swell our song?
 Theron, whose victorious car
 Four coursers whirl, fleeting along,
 To stranger-guests indulgent host,
 Of Agrigentum the support and boast,
 Cities born to rule and grace,
 Fair blossom of his ancient race,

ANTISTROPHE I. Measures 16.

Worthies fore perplex'd in thought, [sought,
 Till, wandering far, they found, what long they
 A sacred feat, fast by
 Where the stream does rapid run,
 And reign'd, of Sicily the guardian eye,
 When happy days,
 And wealth, and favour, flow'd, and praise,
 That in-born worth inflames.
 Saturnian Jove, O! Rhca's son,
 Who o'er Olympus dost preside,
 And the pitch of lofty games,
 And Alpheus, of rivers the pride,

Rejoicing in my songs, do thou
Incline thine ear, propitious to my vow,
Blessing, with a bounteous hand,
The rich hereditary land.

Through their late lineage down. No power can actions past,
Whether deeds of right or wrong,
As things not done recall,
Not even time, the father, who produces all;
Yet can oblivion, waiting long,
Gathering strength
Through the length
Of prosperous times, forbid those deeds to last:
Such force has sweet-healing joy
The festering smart of evils to destroy,

STROPHE II. Measures 16.

When felicity is sent
Down by the will supreme with full content:
Thy daughters, Cadmus, they Greatly wretched here below,
Bless'd evermore, this mighty truth display.
No weight of grief,
But, whelm'd in pleasures, find relief,
Sunk in the sweet abyss.
Thou, Semele, with hair a-flow,
Thou by thunder doom'd to die,
Mingling with the gods in bliss,
Art happy, for ever on high:
Thee Pallas does for ever love,
Thee chiefly Jupiter, who rules above;
Thee thy son holds ever dear,
Thy son with the ivy-wreath'd spear.

ANTISTROPHE II. Measures 16.

Beauteous Ino, we are told,
With the sea-daughters dwells of Nereus old,
And has, by lot, obtain'd
Lasting life, beneath the deep,
A life within no bounds of time restrain'd.
The hour of death,
The day when we resign our breath,
That offspring of the sun,
Which bids us from our labours sleep,
In vain do mortals seek to know,
Or who destin'd is to run
A life unintangled with woe;
For none are able to disclose
The seasons of th' uncertain ebbs and flows
Now of pleasures, now of pains,
Which hidden fate to men ordains:

EPODE II. Measures 10.

Thus Providence, that to thy ancestry, long-fam'd,
Portions out a pleasing share
Of heaven-sprung happiness,
Does, ceasing in another turn of time to bless,
Distribute some reverse of care,
As from years
Past appears,
Since the predestin'd son, at Pytho nam'd,
Did Laius, blindly meeting kill,
And the oracle, of old pronounc'd, fulfil:

STROPHE III. Measures 16.

Fell Erinnyes, quick to view
The deed, his warlike sons in battle flew,
Each by the other's rage
But to Polynices slain

Surviv'd Thersander, glory of his age,
For feats of war,
And youthful contests, honour'd far,
The Scion, kept alive
To raise th' Adrastian house again:
From whence Ænefidamus' heir
Does his spreading root derive,
To branch out a progeny fair;
Who, springing foremost in the chase
Of fame, demands we should his triumph grace,
Tuning lyres to vocal lays,
Sweet union of melodious praise;

ANTISTROPHE III. Measures 16.

For not only has he borne
Th' Olympian prize, but, with his brother, worn
The garland of renown,
At Pytho and at Isthmus; where,
Victorious both, they shar'd th' allotted crown,
Joint-honour, won
In twelve impetuous courses, run
With four unwearied steeds.
To vanquish in the strife severe
Does all anxiety destroy:
And to this, if wealth succeeds
With virtues enamel'd, the joy
Luxuriant grows; such affluence
Does glorious opportunities dispense,
Giving depth of thought to find
Pursuits which please a noble mind,

EPODE III. Measures 10.

Refulgent star! to man the purest beam of light!
The possessor of this store,
Far-future things discerning, knows [woes
Obdurate wretches, once deceas'd, to immediate Consign'd, too late their pains deplore;
For below
Ere they go,
Sits one in judgment who pronounces right
On crimes in this wide realm of Jove;
Whose dire decree no power can e'er remove:

STROPHE IV. Measures 16.

But the good, alike by night,
Alike by day, the sun's unclouded light
Beholding, ever bless'd,
Live an unlaborious life,
Nor anxious interrupt the hallow'd-rest
With spade and plow,
The earth to vex, or with the prow
The briny sea, to eat
The bread of care in endless strife.
The dread divinities among
The few unaccustom'd to wrong,
Who never broke the vow they swore,
A tearless age enjoy for ever-more;
While the wicked hence depart
To torments which appall the heart;

ANTISTROPHE IV. Measures 16.

But the souls who greatly dare,
Thrice try'd in either state, to persevere
From all injus- e pure,
Journeying onward in the way
Of Jupiter, in virtue still secure,
Along his road
Arrive at Saturn's rais'd abode;
Where soft sea-breezes breathe
Round the island of the bless'd; where gay

The trees with golden blossoms glow;
Where, their brows and arms to wreath,
Bright garlands on every side below;
For, springing thick in every field,
The earth does golden flowers spontaneous yield;
And, in every limpid stream,
The budding gold is seen to gleam:

EPODE IV. Measures 10.

Fair heritage! by righteous Rhadamanth's award;
Who, coequal, takes his seat
With Saturn, fire divine,
Thy consort, Rhea, who above the rest doth shine,
High thron'd, thou matron-goddess great:
These among (Blissful throng!)
Does Peleus and does Cadmus find regard;
And, through his mother's winning prayer
To Jove, Achilles dwells immortal there:

STROPHE V. Measures 16.

He who Hector did destroy,
The pillar firm, the whole support, of Troy,
And Cynus gave to die,
And Aurora's Æthiop son.
My arm beneath yet many darts have I,
All swift of flight,
Within my quiver, sounding right
To every skilful ear:
But, of the multitude, not one
Discerns the mystery unexplain'd.
He transcendent does appear
In knowledge, from Nature who gain'd
His store: but the dull-letter'd crowd,
In censure vehement, in nonsense loud,
Clamour idly, wanting skill,
Like crows, in vain, provoking still.

ANTISTROPHE V. Measures 16.

The celestial bird of Jove:
But, to the mark, address thy bow, nor rove,
My soul: and whom do I
Single out with fond desire,
At him to let illustrious arrows fly?
My fix'd intent,
My aim, on Agrigentum bent,
A solemn oath I plight,
Sincere as honest minds require,
That through an hundred circling years,
With recorded worthies bright,
No rivaling city appears
To boast a man more frank to impart
Kind offices to friends with open heart,
Or, with hand antidist his store,
Delighting to distribute more.

EPODE V. Measures 10.

Than Theron: yet foul calumny, injurious blame,
Did the men of rancour raise
Against his fair renown,
Defamers who by evil actions strove to drown
His good, and to conceal his praise.
Can the sand,
On the strand,
Be number'd o'er? Then, true to Theron's fame,
His favours showering down delight
On thousands who is able to recite?

THE FIRST ODE OF ANACREON.

ON HIS LUTE.

THE line of Atreus will I sing;
To Cadmus will I tune the string:
But, as from string to string I move,
My lute will only sound of love.
The chords I change through every screw,
And model the whole lute anew.
Once more in song, my voice I raise,
And, Hercules, thy toils I praise:
My lute does still my voice deny,
And in the tones of love reply.
Ye heroes, then, at once farewell:
Loves only echo from my shell.

THE SECOND ODE.

ON WOMEN.

NATURE the bull with horns supplies,
The horse with hoofs she fortifies,
The fleeting foot on hares bestows,
On lions teeth, two dreadful rows!
Grants fish to swim, and birds to fly,
And on their skill bids men rely.
Women alone defenceless live,
To women what does nature give?
Beauty, she gives instead of darts,
Beauty, instead of shields, imparts;
Nor can the sword, nor fire oppose
The fair, victorious where she goes.

THE THIRD ODE.

ON LOVE.

ONE midnight when the Bear did stand
A-level with Böotes' hand,
And, with their labour sore oppress'd,
The race of men were laid to rest,
Then to my doors, at unawares,
Came Love, and tried to force the bars.
Who thus assails my doors, I cry'd?
Who breaks my slumbers? Love reply'd,
Open: a child alone is here!
A little child!—you need not fear:
Here through the moonless night I stray,
And, drench'd in rain, have lost my way.
Then mov'd to pity by his plight,
Too much in haste my lamp I light,
And open: when a child I see,
A little child, he seem'd to me;
Who bore a quiver, and a bow;
And wings did to his shoulders grow.
Within the hearth I bid him stand,
Then chafe and cherish either hand
Between my palms, and wring, with care,
The trickling water from his hair.
Now come, said he, no longer chill,
We'll bend this bow, and try our skill,
And prove the string, how far its power
Remains unslacken'd by the shower.
He bends his bow, and culls his quiver,
And pierces like a breeze, my liver:
Then leaping, laughing, as he fled,
Rejoice with me, my host, he said:
My bow is found in every part,
And you shall rue it at your heart.

AN HYMN TO VENUS.

FROM THE GREEK OF SAPPHO.

O VENUS, beauty of the skies,
To whom a thousand temples rise,
Gayly false in gentle smiles,
Full of love-perplexing wiles,
O, goddess! from my heart remove
The wasting cares and pains of love.

If ever thou hast kindly heard
A song in soft distress preferr'd,
Propitious to my tuneful vow,
O, gentle goddess! hear me now.
Descend, thou bright, immortal guest,
In all thy radiant charms confess'd.

Thou once didst leave almighty Jove,
And all the golden roofs above:
The car thy wanton sparrows drew;
Hovering in air they lightly flew;
As to my bower they wing'd their way,
I saw their quivering pinions play.

The birds dismiss'd (while you remain)
Bore back their empty car again:
Then you, with looks divinely mild,
In every heavenly feature smil'd,
And ask'd what new complaints I made,
And why I call'd you to my aid?

What frenzy in my bosom rag'd,
And by what care to be assuag'd?
What gentle youth I would allure,
Whom in my artful toils secure?
Who does thy tender heart subdue,
Tell me, my Sappho, tell me who?

Though now he shuns thy longing arms,
He soon shall court thy slighted charms;
Though now thy offerings he despise,
He soon to thee shall sacrifice;
Though now he freeze, he soon shall burn,
And be thy victim in his turn.

Celestial visitant, once more
Thy needful presence I implore!
In pity come and ease my grief,
Bring my distemper'd soul relief:
Favour thy suppliant's hidden fires,
And give me all my heart desires.

A FRAGMENT OF SAPPHO.

BLESS'D as the immortal gods is he,
The youth who fondly sits by thee,
And hears and sees thee all the while Softly speak, and sweetly smile.

'Twas this depriv'd my soul of rest,
And rais'd such tumults in my breast;
For while I gaz'd, in transport toss'd,
My breath was gone, my voice was lost.

My bosom glow'd: the subtle flame
Ran quickly through my vital frame;
O'er my dim eyes a darkness hung,
My ears with hollow murmurs rung.

In dewy damps my limbs were chill'd,
My blood with gentle horrors thrill'd;
My feeble pulse forgot to play,
I fainted, sunk, and dy'd away.

TO MR. AMBROSE PHILIPS,

ON HIS DISTRESS MOTHER.

Anonymous, from Steele's Collection.

LONG have the writers of this warlike age
With human sacrifices drench'd the stage;
That scarce one hero dares demand applause,
Till, weltering in his blood, the ground he gnaws:
As if, like swans, they only could delight
With dying strains, and while they please affright.

Our Philips, though 'twere to oblige the fair,
Dares not destroy, where Horace bids him spare:
His decent scene like that of Greece appears;
No deaths our eyes offend, no fights our ears.
While he from nature copies every part,
He forms the judgment, and affects the heart.

Oft' as Andromache renews her woe,
The mothers sadden, and their eyes o'erflow.
Hermione, with love and rage possess'd,
Now soothes, now animates, each maiden breast.
Pyrrhus, triumphant o'er the Trojan walls,
Is greatly perjur'd, and as greatly falls.
Love, and Despair, and Furies are combin'd
In poor Orestes, to distract his mind.
From first to last alternate passions reign;
And we resist the Poet's will in vain.

THE LIFE OF THE AUTHOR.

For the Author's Son, the Rev. Mr. James Hamilton, and the Author's Daughter, Miss Mary Hamilton,
the following Poems are published.

THE LIFE OF HAMILTON.

Of the personal history of HAMILTON, the compiler of this collection regrets his inability to give an account proportioned to his reputation among his contemporaries, or his rank among the writers of verse.

Little attention has been bestowed by the anonymous editor of his poems, in transmitting the incidents of his life, or in delineating his most prominent and observable particularities; and the intelligence which tradition has preserved, is general and scanty.

The life of a private gentleman, devoting part of his time to polite literature, is held by his acquaintance, to be little deserving of transmission to posterity. He rises to eminence by exertions, which, to ordinary discernment, do not distinguish him from other men. When his fame is established by time, it is generally too late to trace the events of his life, or to investigate minutely the peculiarities of habit and disposition which mark his character.

The account, therefore, which is here to be expected, may properly be proportioned to the means of information, rather than to his qualifications, which deserve more ample illustration than this brief memorial can bestow.

William Hamilton, was the second son of ——— Hamilton, Esq. of Bangour in Ayrshire; a gentleman of an opulent fortune, and of an ancient and honourable family. He was born in 1704.

He had all the advantages of a liberal and polite education. His taste, like his studies, was unconfined; but his peculiar genius for poetry appeared at an early time of life. It was improved by a lively imagination, an exquisite delicacy of sentiment, an extensive acquaintance with classical learning, and a thorough knowledge of the world.

The early part of his life seems to have been divided between the occupations of literature, the amusements of poetry, and the gaieties of elegant society, of which he was the unrivalled pride and ornament.

The latter part of his life was unfortunate.

Education, private affection, and friendship, have often a powerful influence on political principles. He had been bred a Jacobite, and was unhappily prompted, by his own misguided zeal, or the persuasions and example of his friends, to join the standard of the Pretender, in 1745.

The same year, he celebrated the success of the rebels at Prestonpans, in an Ode on the Battle of Gladsuir, which was printed at the time, and "married to the harmonies" of M'Gibbon. This was the only occasion he had of poetical triumph and exultation.

The year following, he saw the hopes of his party perish, in the suppression of the rebellion by the memorable victory obtained over the rebels by the Duke of Cumberland, at Culloden.

It is not certain whether he was present in the action; but it appears, that his life, for some time afterwards, was in imminent danger.

His reflections on this reverse of fortune, are expressed in A Soliloquy, wrote in June 1746.

Now in this sad and dismal hour
Of multiply'd distress,
Has any former thought the power
To make thy sorrows less.

When all around thee, cruel snares
Threaten thy destin'd breath,
And every sharp reflection bears
Want, exile, chains, or death.

He wandered about, for some time, in the Highlands, and experienced much personal inconvenience in eluding the diligence of the King's troops, employed in disarming the inhabitants; but at last, found means to escape to France.

For this intelligence, the present writer is obliged to Mr. John Home, the celebrated author of "Douglas," a very accurate observer of the passages of that time, which, he is happy to announce, will soon receive every possible illustration from his elegant and classical pen.

He resided several years abroad, chiefly in France and Italy, unconnected with the zealots of rebellion, and devoted to the milder ambitions of the ingenuous muse.

At length, having made his peace with the Government, he returned to Scotland to take possession of the family estate, which had devolved to him by the death of his brother.

He was of a delicate constitution; and, in his later years, his health was greatly impaired. This decay made him try the benefit of a warmer climate, in which he had passed a considerable part of his time. It had not, however, the desired effect. He died at Lyons, on the 25th of March, 1754, in the 50th year of his age. His corpse was brought to Scotland, and interred in the Abbey Church of Holyroodhouse.

He was twice married into families of distinction; and, by his first lady, daughter of Sir James Hall, Bart. of Dunglass, left an only son, who inherits his estate.

The character of Hamilton was amiable and respectable. He possessed the social virtues in an eminent degree. His writings breathe the passions which he felt; and are seldom cold or inanimated. The qualities of his heart and head were equally remarkable. His elegance and judgment were universally confessed. He was, in the proper sense of the word, a fine gentleman.

As he wrote verses entirely for his own amusement, and that of his particular friends, few of his pieces were prepared for the press by himself. A collection of several of them was first published at Glasgow, in 1748, not only without his name, but without his consent. He was then abroad; and it was hoped the appearance of that collection would have drawn from him a more perfect edition. But, though after his return, he corrected many errors of the Glasgow copy, occasioned by the inadvertency of transcribers, he did not live to make a new and complete publication. The improvements he made, were, however, inserted in the posthumous edition of his Poems on Several Occasions, printed at Edinburgh, in 8vo. 1760, with the addition of a great many valuable pieces taken from his own original manuscripts. They are now, with the Ode on the Battle of Gladsmuir, not inserted in the edition 1760, for the first time, received into a collection of classical English poetry.

As a poet, Hamilton does not seem to have hitherto received so much attention as he deserves. Party spirit, in our nation, has often influenced the judgment of poetical merit. His genius, perhaps, has been overlooked, because his political opinions were reprobated. In this liberal age, when the just tribute of praise is bestowed on talents and literary merit, of whatever party, it would be improper to take notice of his political opinions. He is certainly a pleasing and amiable writer, though not a first-rate poet. He is not distinguished for strength of intellect or fertility of invention. His taste was delicate, and refined by a careful perusal of the ancient classics. He writes with neatness and terseness, frequently with elevation and spirit. His compositions are characterised by sprightliness and elegance, simplicity and tenderness. His diction is commonly chaste and poetical; and his versification, in general, correct and harmonious. Of his addresses and smaller pieces, which are commonly personal and occasional, the greater part is panegyrical, and the chief source is gallantry. Of praise, he is very lavish in his light and amatory productions. Undoubtedly many beauties of that time were proud of his praises. Who they were, whom he dignifies with poetical names, cannot be easily known. Perhaps by traditions preserved in families, they may be discovered.

His Triumph of Love, if he had written nothing else, is sufficient to entitle him to the character and distinction of a poet. It was published separately in his life time; and, though in a careless dress, and even without a name, was received with the highest approbation. His Epistle to the Countess of Eglington, though incorrect, has many elegant passages. It was originally prefixed to the inimitable Gentle Shepherd, of Ramsay, with whom his wit, poetry, and political principles naturally connected him. His imitation of the Eighteenth Epistle of the first Book of Horace, addressed to Ramsay, is written in a strain of vigorous sense and easy versification. His other Imitations of Horace, deserve great praise, for elegance of expression and propriety of application. To be pleased with his fine Ode on the Battle of Gladsmuir, it is not necessary to think well of his opinions. Of his other Odes, the second and third deserve particular commendation. The second possesses all the exquisite delicacy, picturesque description, and appropriate imagery of Milton's "L'Allegro," of which it is evidently an imitation. His Epitaphs are among the most beautiful and pathetic compositions of that kind in our language. The Epitaphs on Mrs. Colquhoun and his Wife are truly admirable. The Episode of the Thistle abounds in poetical description, animated by patriotic enthusiasm. Of his song in the Scottish dialect, called, The Braes of Yarrow, the extensive popularity is the best encomium. The remaining pieces, it is not necessary to examine singly. They must be supposed to have faults and beauties of the same kind with the rest; but the author's finishing hand, it ought to be remembered, has been wanting to many.

THE WORKS OF HAMILTON.

TO A YOUNG LADY,

WITH THE FOLLOWING POEM.

READ here the pangs of unsuccessful love,
View the dire ills the weary sufferers prove,
When care in every shape has leave to reign,
And keener sharpens ev'ry sense of pain:
No charm the cruel spoiler can controul,
He blasts the beauteous features of the soul;
With various conflict rends the destin'd breast,
And lays th' internal fair creation waste:
The dreadful demon raging unconfin'd,
To his dire purpose bends the passive mind,
Gloomy and dark the prospect round appears,
Doubts spring from doubts, and fears engender
Hope after hope goes out in endless night, [fears;
And all is anguish, torture, and affright.

O! beauteous friend, a gentler fate be thine;
Still may thy star with mildest influence shine;
May heav'n surround thee with peculiar care,
And make thee happy, as it made thee fair;
That gave thee sweetness, unaffected ease,
The pleasing look, that ne'er was taught to please,
True genuine charms, where falsehood claims no
Which not alone entice, but fix the heart: [part,
And far beyond all these, supreme in place,
The virtuous mind, an undecaying grace.
Still may thy youth each fond endearment prove
Of tender friendship and complacent love;
May love approach thee, in the mildest dress,
And court thee to domestic happiness;
And bring along the pow'r that only knows
To heighten human joys and soften woes;
For woes will be in life; these still return,
The good, the beauteous, and the wise must mourn:

Doubl'd the joy that friendship does divide,
Lessen'd the pain when arm'd the social side:
But ah! how fierce the pang, how deep the groan,
When strong affliction finds the weak alone!
Then may a friend still guard thy shelter'd days,
And guide thee safe through fortune's mystic ways;

The happy youth, whom most thy soul approves,
Friend of thy choice and husband of thy loves,
Whose holy flame heav'n's altar does inspire,
That burns through life one clear unsully'd fire,
A mutual warmth that glows from breast to breast,
Who loving is belov'd and blessing blest.
Then all the pleasing scenes of life appear,
The charms of kindred and relations dear,
The smiling offspring, love's far better part,
And all the social meltings of the heart:

Then harlot pleasure, with her wanton train
Seduces from the perfect state in vain;
In vain to the lock'd ear the syren sings,
When angels shadow with their guardian wings.
Such, fair Monimia, be thy sacred lot,
When ev'ry memory of him forgot,
Whose faithful muse inspir'd the pious pray'r,
And weary'd heaven to keep thee in its care;
That pleas'd it would its choicest influence show'r,
Or on thy serious, or thy mirthful hour;
Conspicuous known in ev'ry scene of life,
The mother, sister, daughter, friend, and wife;
That joy may grow on joy, and constant last,
And each new day rise brighter than the past.

CONTEMPLATION: OR, THE TRIUMPH OF LOVE.

— Rursusque resurgens
Saevit amor. —

Virg. Aen. 4.

O VOICE divine, whose heavenly strain
No mortal measure may attain,
O powerful to appease the smart,
That festers in a wounded heart,
Whose mystic numbers can assuage
The bosom of tumult'ous rage,
Can strike the dagger from despair,
And shut the watchful eye of care.
Oft lur'd by thee, when wretches call,
Hope comes, that cheers or softens all;
Expell'd by thee, and dispossess'd
Envy forsakes the human breast.
Full oft with thee the bard retires,
And lost to earth, to heav'n aspires;
How nobly lost! with thee to rove
Through the long deep'ning solemn grove,
Or underneath the moonlight pale,
To silence trust some plaintive tale,
Of nature's ills, and mankind's woes,
While kings and all the proud repose;
Or where some holy aged oak
A stranger to the woodman's stroke;
From the high rock's aerial crown
In twisting arches bending down,
Bathes in the smooth pellucid stream,
Full oft he waits the mystic dream
Of mankind's joys right understood,
And of the all-prevailing good.
Go forth invoc'd, O voice divine!
And issue from thy sacred shrine;
Go search each solitude around,
Where Contemplation may be found,

Where'er apart the goddess stands
 With lifted eyes and heaven-raised hands;
 If rear'd on speculation's hill
 Her raptur'd soul enjoys its fill
 Of far transporting nature's scene,
 Air, ocean, mountain, river, plain;
 Or if with measur'd step she go
 Where meditation spreads below,
 In hollow vale her ample store,
 'Till weary fancy can no more;
 Or inward if she turn her gaze,
 And all th' internal world surveys;
 With joy complacent fees succeed
 In fair array, each comely deed.
 She hears alone thy lofty strain,
 All other music charms in vain;
 In vain the sprightly notes rebound,
 That from the fretted roofs rebound,
 When the dext minstrelsy advance
 To form the quaint and orb'd dance;
 In vain unhallow'd lips implore,
 She hearkens only to thy lore.
 Then bring the lonely nymph along,
 Obsequious to thy magic song;
 Bid her to bliss the secret bow'r
 And heighten wisdom's solemn hour.
 Bring faith, endu'd with eagle eyes,
 That joins this earth to distant skies;
 Bland hope that makes each sorrow less,
 Still smiling calm amidst distress;
 And bring the meek-eyed charity,
 Not least, though youngest of the three:
 Knowledge the sage, whose radiant light,
 Darts quick across the mental night,
 And add warm friendship to the train,
 Social, yielding, and humane;
 With silence, sober-suited maid,
 Seldom on this earth survey'd:
 Bid in this sacred band appear,
 That aged venerable seer,
 With sorrowing pale, with watchings spare,
 Of pleasing yet dejected air,
 Him, heavenly melancholy hight,
 Who flies the sons of false delight,
 Now looks serene through human life,
 Sees end in peace the moral strife,
 Now to the dazzling prospect blind,
 Trembles for heaven and for his kind,
 And doubting much, still hoping best,
 Late with submission finds his rest:
 And by his side advance the dame
 All glowing with celestial flame,
 Devotion, high above that soars,
 And sings exulting, and adores,
 Dares fix on heav'n a mortal's gaze,
 And triumph 'midst the seraph's blaze:
 Last to crown all, with these be join'd
 The decent nun fair peace of mind,
 Whom innocence ne'er yet betray'd,
 Bore young in Eden's happy shade:
 Resign'd, contented, meek and mild
 Of blameless mother, blameless child.
 But from these woods, O thou retire!
 Hood-wink't superstition dire;
 Zeal that clanks her iron bands,
 And bathes in blood her ruthless hands;
 Far hence hypocrisy away,
 With pious semblance to betray,

Whose angel outside fair contains
 A heart corrupt, and foul with stains;
 Ambition mad, that stems alone
 The boisterous surge, with bladders blown;
 Anger, with wild disorder'd pace;
 And malice pale of famish'd face;
 Loud-tongu'd clamour, get thee far
 Hence, to wrangle at the bar;
 With opening mouths vain rumour hung;
 And falsehood with her serpent tongue;
 Revenge, her bloodshot eyes on fire,
 And hissing envy's snaky tire;
 With jealousy, the fiend most fell
 Who bears about his inmate hell;
 Now far apart with haggard mien
 To lone suspicion list'ning seen,
 Now in a gloomy band appears
 Of fallow doubts and pale-eyed fears,
 Whom dire remorse of giant kind
 Pursues with scorpion lash behind;
 And thou self-love, who tak'st from earth,
 With the vile crawling worm, thy birth,
 Untouch'd with others' joy or pain,
 The social smile, the tear humane;
 Thy self thy sole intemperate guest,
 Uncall'd thy neighbour to the feast,
 As if heaven's universal heir
 'Twas thine to seize and not to share:
 With these away, base wretch accurst,
 By pride begot, by madness nurs'd,
 Impiety! of harden'd mind,
 Gross, dull, presuming, stubborn, blind,
 Unmov'd amidst this mighty all,
 Deaf to the universal call:
 In vain above the systems glow,
 In vain earth spreads her charms below,
 Confiding in himself to rise,
 He hurls defiance to the skies,
 And steel'd in dire and impious deeds
 Blasphemes his feeder whilst he feeds.
 But chiefly love, love far off fly,
 Nor interrupt my privacy;
 'Tis not for thee, capricious pow'r,
 Weak tyrant of a feverish hour,
 Fickle, and ever in extremes,
 My radiant day of reason beams,
 And sober contemplation's ear
 Disdains thy syren song to hear;
 Speed thee on changeful wings away,
 To where thy willing slaves obey,
 Go herd amongst thy wonted train,
 The false, th' inconstant, lewd, and vain;
 Thou hast no subject here; begone,
 Contemplation comes anon.
 Above, below, and all around,
 Now nought but awful quiet's found,
 The feeling air forgets to move,
 No zephyr stirs the leafy grove;
 The gentlest murmur of the rill,
 Struck by the potent charm is still,
 Each passion in this troubled breast
 So toiling once lies hush'd to rest,
 Whate'er man's bustling race employs,
 His cares, his hopes, his fears, his joys,
 Ambition, pleasure, interest, fame;
 Each nothing of important name;
 Ye tyrants of this restless ball,
 This grove annihilates you all.

Oh power unseen, yet felt, appear
 Sure something more than nature's here.
 Now on the flow'ring turf I lie,
 My soul conversing with the sky.
 Far lost in the bewildering dream
 I wander o'er each lofty theme;
 'Tis on inquiry's wings on high,
 And soar the heights of deity:
 Fain would I search the perfect laws
 That constant bind th' unerring cause;
 Why all its children, born to share
 Alike a father's equal care:
 Some weep by partial fate undone,
 The ravish'd portion of a son;
 Whilst he whose swelling cup o'erflows,
 Heeds not his suff'ring brother's woes;
 The good, their virtues all forgot,
 Mourn need severe, their destin'd lot;
 While vice, invited by the great,
 Feasts under canopies of state.
 Ah! when we see the bad prefer'd,
 Was it eternal justice err'd?
 Or when the good could not prevail,
 How could almighty prowess fail?
 When underneath the oppressor's blow
 Afflicted innocence lies low,
 Has not th' All-seeing eye beheld?
 Or has a stronger arm repell'd?
 When death dissolves this brittle frame,
 Lies ever quench'd the soul's bright flame?
 Or shall th' ethereal breath of day
 Relume once more this living ray?
 From life escape we all in vain?
 Heaven finds its creature out again,
 Again its captive to control,
 And drive him to another goal.
 When time shall let his curtain fall,
 Must dreary nothing swallow all?
 Must we the unfinish'd piece deplore,
 E'er half the pompous piece be o'er?
 In his all comprehensive mind,
 Shall not th' almighty poet find
 Some reconciling turn of fate
 To make his wondrous work complete;
 To finish fair his mingled plan,
 And justify his ways to man?
 But who shall draw these veils that lie
 Unpierc'd by the keen cherub's eye?
 Cease, cease, the daring flight give o'er,
 'Tis time to submit and to adore
 Learn then: Into thyself descend,
 To know thy being's use and end,
 For thee what nature's kind intent,
 Or on what fatal journey bent.
 Is mean self-love the only guide?
 Must all be sacrific'd to pride?
 What sacred fountains then supply
 The feeling heart and melting eye?
 Why does the pleading look disarm
 The hand of rage with slaughter warm?
 Or in the battle's generous strife,
 Does Britain quell the lust of life?
 Next the bold inquiry tries,
 To trace our various passions rise;
 This moment hope exalts the breast,
 The next it sinks by fear deprest;
 Now fierce the storms of wrath begin,
 Now all is holy calm within.

What strikes ambition's stubborn springs,
 What moves compassion's softer strings;
 How we in constant friendships join,
 How in constant hates combine;
 How nature, for her favourite, man,
 Unfolds the wonders of her plan;
 How fond to treat her chosen guest
 Provides for every sense a feast;
 Gives to the wide excursive eye
 The radiant glories of the sky;
 Or bids each odorous bloom exhale
 His soul t'enrich the balmy gale;
 Or pour upon th' enchanted ear
 The music of the op'ning year;
 Or bids the limpid fountain burst,
 Friendly to life, and cool to thirst;
 What arts the beauteous dame employs
 To lead us on to genial joys,
 When in her specious work we join
 To propagate her fair design,
 The virgin-face divine appears
 In bloom of youth and prime of years,
 And e'er the destin'd heart's aware
 Fixes Monimia's image there.
 Ah me! what helpless have I said?
 Unhappy by myself betray'd!
 I deem'd, but ah! I deem'd in vain,
 From the dear image to refrain;
 For when I fixt my musing thought,
 Far on solemn views remote;
 When wand'ring in the uncertain round
 Of mazy doubt, no end I found;
 O my unblest and erring feet!
 What most I sought to shun, ye meet.
 Come then my serious maid again:
 Come and try another strain;
 Come and nature's dome explore,
 Where dwells retir'd the matron hoar;
 There her wondrous works survey,
 And drive th' intruder love away.
 'Tis done. Ascending heaven's height
 Contemplation take thy flight:
 Behold the sun, thro' heav'n's wide space,
 Strong as a giant, run his race:
 Behold the moon, exert her light,
 As blushing bride on her love-night:
 Behold the sister starry train,
 Her bride-maids, mount the azure plain.
 See where the snows their treasures keep;
 The chambers where the loud winds sleep;
 Where the collected rains abide
 'Till heav'n set all its windows wide,
 Precipitate from high to pour
 And drown in violence of show'r:
 Or gently strain'd they wash the earth
 And give the tender fruits a birth.
 See where thunder springs his mine;
 Where the paths of lightning shine.
 Or tir'd those heights still to pursue,
 From heav'n descending with the dew,
 That soft impregns the youthful mead,
 Where thousand flowers exalt the head,
 Mark how nature's hand bestows
 Abundant grace on all that grows,
 Tinges, with pencil flow unseen,
 The grass that clothes the valley green;
 Or spreads the tulips parted streaks,
 Or sanguine dyes the rose's cheeks,

Or points with light Monimia's eyes,
And forms her bosom's beauteous rise.

Ah! haunting spirit art thou there!
Forbidden in these walks t' appear.
I thought, O love! thou wouldst disdain
To mix with wisdom's black stay'd train;
But when my curious searching look,
A nice survey of nature took,
Well pleas'd the matron set to show
Her mistress-work, on earth below.
Then fruitless knowledge turn aside,
What other art remains untry'd
This load of anguish to remove,
And heal the cruel wounds of love?
To friendship's sacred force apply
That source of tenderness and joy;
A joy no anxious fears profane,
A tenderness that feels no pain:
Friendship shall all these ills appease,
And give the tortur'd mourner ease.
Th' indissoluble tie, that binds
In equal chains, two sister minds:
Not such as servile int'rests choose,
From partial ends and sordid views;
Nor when the midnight banquet fires,
The choice of wine-inflam'd desires;
When the short fellowships proceed,
From casual mirth and wicked deed;
'Till the next morn estranges quite
The partners of one guilty night;
But such as judgment long has weigh'd
And years of faithfulness have try'd;
Whose tender mind is fram'd to share
The equal portion of my care;
Whose thoughts my happiness employs
Sincere, who triumphs in my joys;
With whom in raptures I may stray,
Through study's long and pathless way,
Obscurely blest, in joys, alone,
To the excluded world unknown.
Forsook the weak fantastic train
Of flatt'ry, mirth, all false and vain;
On whose soft and gentle breast
My weary soul may take her rest,
While the still tender look and kind
Fair springing from the spotless mind,
My perfected delights ensure
To last immortal, free and pure.
Grant, Heav'n, if Heav'n means bliss for me,
Monimia such, and long may be.

Here, here again! how just my fear!
Love ever finds admittance here;
The cruel spright intent on harm,
Has quite dissolv'd the feeble charm;
Assuming friendship's faintly guise,
Has past the cheated sentry's eyes,
And once attained his hellish end,
Displays the undissembled fiend.
O say! my faithful fair ally
How did'st thou let the traitor by?
I from the desert bade thee come*,
Invok'd thee from thy peaceful home,
More to sublime my solemn hour,
And curse this demon's fatal pow'r;
Lo! by superior force oppress'd,
Thou these three several times hast blest.

* Numbers, ch. 23.

Shall we the magic rites pursue,
When love is mightier far than thou;
Yes come, in blest enchantment skill'd,
Another altar let us build;
Go forth as wont, and try to find,
Where'er devotion lies reclin'd;
Thou her fair friend, by heaven's decree,
Art one with her, and she with thee.

Devotion come with sober pace,
Full of thought and full of grace;
While humbled on the earth I lie,
Wrapt in the vision of the sky,
To noble heights and solemn views
Wing my heav'n-aspiring muse;
Teach me to scorn, by thee refin'd,
The low delights of human kind:
Sure then to put to flight the boy
Of laughter, sport, and idle joy.

O plant these guarded groves about,
And keep the treach'rous felon out.

Now see! the spreading gates unfold,
Display'd the sacred leaves of gold.
Let me with holy awe repair,
To the solemn house of prayer.
And as I go, O thou! my heart,
Forget each low and earthly part.
Religion enter in my breast,
A mild and venerable guest!
Put off in Contemplation drown'd,
Each thought impure in holy ground,
And cautious tread with awful fear
The courts of heav'n;—for God is here!
Now my grateful voice I raise.
Ye angels swell a mortal's praise,
To charm with your own harmony,
The ear of him who sits on high.
Grant me, propitious heav'nly pow'r,
Whose love benign we feel each hour,
An equal lot on earth to share,
Nor rich, nor poor, my humble pray'r;
Lest I forget, exalted proud,
The hand supreme that gave the good;
Lest want o'er virtue should prevail,
And I put forth my hand and steal;
But if thy sov'reign will shall grant,
The wealth I neither ask nor want;
May I the widow's need supply,
And wipe the tear from sorrow's eye;
May the weary wand'rer's feet,
From me a blest reception meet!
But if contempt and low estate
Be the assignment of my fate,
O! may no hope of gain entice
To tread the green broad path of vice.
And bounteous O! vouchsafe to clear
The errors of a mind sincere.
Illumine thou my searching mind,
Groping after truth and blind.
With stores of science be it fraught
That bards have dream'd, or sages taught;
And chief the heav'n-born strain impart,
A muse according to thy heart;
That wrapt in sacred ecstasy,
I may sing and sing of thee;
Mankind instructing in thy laws,
Blest poet in fair virtue's cause,
Her former merit to restore,
And make mankind again adore,

As when conversant with the great,
 She fixt in palaces her seat.
 Before her all-revealing ray,
 Each sordid passion should decay:
 Ambition shuns the dreaded dame,
 And * pales his ineffectual flame;
 Wealth sighs her triumphs to behold,
 And offers all his sums of gold;
 † She in her chariot seen to ride,
 A noble train attend her side:
 A cherub first, in prime of years,
 The champion fortitude appears;
 Next temp'rance sober mistress seen,
 With look compos'd and cheerful mien;
 Calm patience still victorious found,
 With never-fading glories crown'd,
 Firm justice last the balance rears,
 The good man's praise, the bad man's fears;
 While chief in beauty as in place
 She charms with dear Monimia's grace.

Monimia still! here once again!
 O! fatal name. Oh! dubious strain!
 Say heav'n-born virtue, pow'r divine,
 Are all these various movements thine?
 Was it thy triumphs, sole inspir'd
 My soul to holy transports fir'd?
 Or say do springs less sacred move?
 Ah! much I fear, it's human love.
 Alas! the noble strife is o'er,
 The blissful visions charm no more;
 Far off the glorious rapture flown,
 Monimia rages here alone.
 In vain, love's fugitive, I try
 From the commanding pow'r to fly,
 Though grace was dawning on my soul,
 Possess'd by heav'n sincere and whole,
 Yet still in fancy's painted cells
 The soul-inflaming image dwells.
 Why didst thou, cruel love, again
 Thus drag me back, to earth and pain?
 Well hop'd I, love, thou would'st retire
 Before the blest Jesean lyre.
 Devotion's harp would charm to rest,
 The evil spirit in my breast;
 But the deaf adder fell disdains,
 Unlistning to the chanter's strains.

Contemplation, baffled maid,
 Remains there yet no other aid?
 Helpless and weary must thou yield
 To love supreme in ev'ry field?
 Let melancholy last engage,
 Rev'rend hoary mantled sage.
 Sure, at his sable flag's display
 Love's idle troop will flit away:
 And bring with him his due compeer,
 Silence, sad, forlorn, and drear.

Haste thee silence, haste and go,
 To search the gloomy world below.
 My trembling steps, O Sybil, lead,
 Through the dominions of the dead:
 Where care, enjoying soft repose,
 Lays down the burden of his woes;
 Where meritorious-want, no more
 Shiv'ring begs at grandeur's door;

Unconscious grandeur, seal'd his eyes,
 On the mould'ring purple lies.
 In the dim and dreary round,
 Speech in eternal chains lies bound.
 And see a tomb, it's gates display'd,
 Expands an everlasting shade.
 O ye inhabitants! that dwell
 Each forgotten in your cell,
 O say! for whom of human race
 Has fate decreed this hiding place?

And hark! methinks a spirit calls,
 Low winds the whisper round the walls,
 A voice, the sluggish air that breaks,
 Solemn amid the silence speaks.
 Mistaken man thou seek'st to know,
 What known will but afflict with woe;
 There thy Monimia shall abide,
 With the pale bridegroom rest a bride,
 The wan assistants there shall lay,
 In weeds of death, her beauteous clay.

O words of woe! what do I hear?
 What sounds invade a lover's ear?
 Must then thy charms, my anxious care,
 The fate of vulgar beauty share?
 Good heav'n retard (for thine the pow'r)
 The wheels of time, that roll the hour.—

Yet ah! why swells my breast with fears?
 Why start the interdicted tears?
 Love dost thou tempt again? depart
 Thou devil, cast out from my heart.
 Sad I forsook the feast, the ball,
 The sunny bow'r and lofty hall,
 And sought the dungeon of despair;
 Yet thou overtak'st me there.
 How little dream'd I thee to find
 In this lone state of human kind?
 Nor melancholy can prevail,
 The direful deed, nor dismal tale:
 Hop'd I for these thou would'st remove?
 How near akin is grief to love?
 Then no more I strive to shun
 Love's chains: O heav'n! thy will be done.
 The best physician here I find,
 To cure a sore diseased mind,
 For soon this venerable gloom
 Will yield a weary sufferer room;
 No more a slave to love decreed,
 At ease and free among the dead.
 Come then ye tears, ne'er cease to flow,
 In full satiety of woe:
 Though now the maid my heart alarms,
 Severe and mighty in her charms,
 Doom'd to obey, in bondage prest,
 The tyrant's love commands unblest;
 Pass but some fleeting moments o'er,
 This rebel heart shall beat no more;
 Then from my dark and closing eye,
 The form belov'd shall ever fly.
 The tyranny of love shall cease,
 Both laid down to sleep in peace;
 To share alike our mortal lot,
 Her beauties and my cares forgot.

TO THE COUNTESS OF EGLINTOUN,

WITH THE GENTLE SHEPHERD. 1726.

ACCEPT, O Eglington! the rural lays,
 Thine be the friends, and thine the poet's praise

 VOL. IX.

The muse that oft has rais'd her tuneful strains,
A frequent guest on Scotia's blissful plains,
That oft has sung, her list'ning youth to move,
The charms of beauty, and the force of love,
Once more resumes the still successful lay,
Delighted, through the verdant meads to stray:
O! come, invok'd, and pleas'd, with her repair,
To breathe the balmy sweets of purer air;
In the cool evening negligently laid,
Or near the stream, or in the rural shade;
Propitious hear, and, as thou hear'st, approve
The Gentle Shepherd's tender tale of love. [sings,

Learn from these scenes what warm and glowing
Inflame the breast that real love inspires;
Delighted read of ardor, sighs, and tears;
All that a lover hopes, and all he fears:
Hence too, what passions in his bosom rise,
What dawning gladness sparkles in his eyes,
When first the fair is bounteous to relent,
And blushing beauteous, smiles the kind consent.
Love's passion here in each extreme is shown,
In Charlotte's smile, or in Maria's frown.

With words like these, that fail'd not to engage,
Love courted beauty in a golden age,
Pure and untaught, such nature first inspir'd,
Ere yet the fair affected phrase admir'd.
His secret thoughts were undisguis'd with art,
His words ne'er knew to differ from his heart.
He speaks his loves so artless and sincere,
As thy Eliza might be pleas'd to hear.

Heaven only to the rural state bestows
Conquest o'er life, and freedom from its woes;
Secure alike from envy, and from care,
Nor rais'd by hope, nor yet depress'd by fear;
Nor want's lean hand its happiness constrains,
Nor riches torture with ill-gotten gains;
No secret guilt its steadfast peace destroys,
No wild ambition interrupts its joys.
Blest still to spend the hours that heav'n has lent,
In humble goodness, and in calm content;
Serenely gentle, as the thoughts that roll,
Sinless and pure, in fair Humeia's soul.

But now the rural state these joys has lost,
Even swains no more that innocence can boast.
Love speaks no more what beauty may believe,
Prone to betray, and practis'd to deceive.
Now happiness forsakes her blest retreat,
The peaceful dwellings where she fix'd her seat;
The pleasing fields she wont of old to grace,
Companion to an upright sober race;
When on the sunny hill, or verdant plain,
Free and familiar with the sons of men,
To crown the pleasures of the blameless feast,
She uninvited came a welcome guest:
Ere yet an age, grown rich in impious arts,
Seduc'd from innocence incautious hearts;
Then grudging hate, and sinful pride succeed,
Cruel revenge, and false unrighteous deed:
Then dow'rlless beauty lost the power to move;
The rust of lucre stain'd the gold of love.
Bounteous no more, and hospitably good, [blood.
The genial hearth first blush'd with stranger's
The friend no more upon the friend relies,
And semblant falsehood puts on truth's disguise.
The peaceful household fill'd with dire alarms,
The ravish'd virgin mourns her slighted charms;
The voice of impious mirth is heard around;
In guilt they feast, in guilt the bowl is crown'd.

Unpunish'd violence lords it o'er the plains,
And happiness forsakes the guilty swains.
O Happiness! from human search retir'd,
Where art thou to be found, by all desir'd?
Nun sober and devout! why art thou fled
To hide in shades thy meek contented head?
Virgin of aspect mild! ah why unkind,
Fly'st thou displeas'd, the commerce of mankind?
O! teach our steps to find the secret cell,
Where with thy fire content thou lov'st to dwell,
Or say, dost thou a duteous handmaid wait
Familiar, at the chambers of the great?
Dost thou pursue the voice of them that call
To noisy revel, and to midnight ball?
O'er the full banquet when we feast our soul,
Dost thou inspire the mirth, or mix the bowl?
Or with th' industrious planter dost thou talk,
Conversing freely in an ev'ning walk?
Say, does the miser e'er thy face behold,
Watchful and studious of the treasur'd gold?
Seeks knowledge, not in vain, thy much lov'd pow'r,
Still musing silent at the morning hour?
May we thy presence hope in war's alarms,
In S——'s wisdom, or Montgomery's arms!

In vain our flatter'ing hopes our steps beguile,
The flying good eludes the searcher's toil:
In vain we seek the city or the cell;
Alone with virtue knows the pow'r to dwell.
Nor need mankind despair these joys to know,
The gift themselves may on themselves bestow.
Soon, soon we might the precious blessing boast;
But many passions must the blessing cost;
Infernal malice, inly pining hate,
And envy grieving at another's state.
Revenge no more must in our hearts remain,
Or burning lust, or avarice of gain.
When these are in the human bosom nurs'd,
Can peace reside in dwellings so accurst;
Unlike, O Eglintoun! thy happy breast,
Calm and serene, enjoys the heavenly guest;
From the tumultuous rule of passions freed,
Pure in thy thought, and spotless in thy deed.
In virtues rich, in goodness unconfin'd,
Thou shin'st a fair example to thy kind;
Sincere and equal to thy neighbour's fame,
How f'ist to praise, how obstinate to blame!
Bold in thy presence bashful sense appears,
And backward merit loses all its fears.
Supremely blest by heav'n, heav'n's richest grace
Confer'd is thine, an early blooming race,
Whose pleasing smiles shall guardian wisdom arm,
Divine instruction! taught of thee to charm.
What transports shall they to thy soul impart!
(The conscious transports of a parent's heart.)
When thou behold'st them of each grace possess'd,
And sighing youths imploring to be blest,
After thy image form'd, with charms like thine,
Or in the visit, or the dance to shine.
Thrice happy! who succeed their mother's praise,
The lovely Eglintouns of future days.
Meanwhile pursue the following tender scenes,
And listen to thy native poet's strains.
In ancient garb the home bred muse appears,
The garb our muses wore in former years.
As in a glass reflected, here behold
How smiling goodness look'd in days of old.
Nor blush to read where beauty's praise is shown,
And virtuous love, the likeness of thy own;

While midst the various gifts that gracious heaven,
Bounteous to thee, with righteous hand has given;
Let this, O Eglintoun! delight thee most,
T' enjoy that innocence the world has lost.

O D E I.

TO FANCY.

FANCY, bright and winged maid!
In thy night drawn car convey'd,
O'er the green earth, and wide spread main,
A thousand shadows in thy train,
A vary'd air-embodiy'd host,
To don what shapes thou pleasest most;
Brandish no more thy scorpion stings
Around the destin'd couch of kings;
Nor in rebellion's ghastly size
A dire gigantic spectre rise:
Cease, for a while, in rooms of state
To damp the slumbers of the great;
In merit's lean look'd form t' appear,
And holla traitor in their ear:
Or freedom's holier garb bely,
While justice grinds her axe fast by:
Nor o'er the miser's eye-lids pour
The unrefreshing golden show'r;
Whilst, keen th' unreal bliss to feel,
His breast bedews the ruffian steel.

With these, (when next thou tak'st thy round)
The thoughts of guilty pride confound:
These swell the horrors and affright
Of conscience, keen condemning night.
For this (nor gracious pow'r! repine)
A gentler ministry be thine:
Whate'er inspires the poet's theme,
Or lover's hope enliven'd dream.
Monimia's mildest form assume;
Spread o'er thy cheeks her youthful bloom;
Unfold her eyes unblemish'd rays,
That melt to virtue as we gaze;
That envy's guiltiest with disarm,
And view benign a kindred charm:
Call all the graces from thy store,
'Till thy creative pow'r be o'er;
Bid her each breathing sweet dispense,
And robe in her own innocence.

My wish is giv'n; the spells begin;
Th' ideal world awakes within;
The lonely void of still repose
Pregnant with some new wonder grows;
See, by the twilight of the skies,
The beauteous apparition rise;
Slow in Monimia's form, along
Glides to the harmony of song.

But who is he the virgin leads,
Whom high a flaming torch proceeds,
In a gown of stainless lawn,
O'er each manly shoulder drawn?
Who, clad in robe of scarlet grain,
The boy that wears her flowing train?
Behind his back a quiver slung;
A bended bow across is hung;
His head and heels two wings unfold,
The azure feathers girt with gold.
Hymen! 'tis he who kind inspires
Joys unfeign'd and chaste desires.
And thou, of love deceitful child!
With tyger-heart, yet lamb-like mild,

Fantastic by thyself, and vain,
But seemly seen in Hymen's train;
If fate be to my wishes kind,
O! may I find ye ever join'd;
But if the fates my wish deny,
My humble roof come ye not nigh.
The spell works on: yet stop the day
While in the house of sleep I stay.
About me swells the sudden grove,
The woven arbourette of love;
Flow'rs spring unbidden o'er the ground,
And more than nature plants around.
Fancy, prolong the kind repose;
Still, still th' enchanting vision glows;
And now I gaze o'er all her charms,
Now sink transported in her arms.
Oh sacred energy divine!
All these enraptur'd scenes are thine.
Hail! copious source of pure delight;
All hail! thou heaven-revealed rite;
Endearing truth thy train attends,
And thou and meek-ey'd peace are friends:
Closer entwine the magic bow'r;
Thick rain the rose-empurpl'd show'r:
The mystic joy impatient flies
Th' unhallow'd gaze of vulgar eyes.

Unenvy'd let the rich and great
Turmoil without, and parcel fate,
Indulging here, in bliss supreme,
Might I enjoy the golden dream:
But, ah! the rapture must not stay;
For see! she glides, she glides away.

Oh fancy! why did'st thou decoy
My thoughts into this dream of joy,
Then to forsake me all alone,
To mourn the fond delusion gone?
O! back again, benign, restore
The pictur'd vision as before.

Yes, yes: once more I fold my eyes;
Arise, ye dear deceits, arise.
Ideas bland! where do ye rove?
Why fades my visionary grove?
Ye fickle troop of Morpheus' train,
Then will you, to the proud and vain,
From me, fantastic, wing your flight,
T' adorn the dream of false delight?
But now, seen in Monimia's air,
Can you assume a form less fair,
Some idle beauty's wish supply,
The mimic triumphs of her eye?
Grant all to me this live-long night,
Let charms detain the rising light;
For this one night my liv'ries wear,
And I absolve thee for the year.

What time your poppy-crowned God
Sends his truth-telling scouts abroad,
Ere yet the cock to matins rings,
And the lark with mounting wings,
The simple village-swain has warn'd
To shake off sleep, by labour earn'd;
Or on the rose's silken hem,
Aurora weeps her earliest gem;
Or, beneath the op'ning dawn,
Smiles the fair-extended lawn.
When in the soft encircled shade
Ye find reclin'd the gentle maid,
Each busy motion laid to rest,
And all compos'd her peaceful breast:

Swift paint the fair internal scene,
 The phantom labours of your reign;
 The living imag'ry adorn
 With all the limnings of the morn;
 With all the treasures nature keeps
 Conceal'd below the forming deeps;
 Or dress'd in the rich waving pride,
 That covers the green mountain's side,
 Or blooms beneath the am'rous gale
 In the wide embosom'd vale.
 Let pow'rful music too effay
 The magic of her hidden lay:
 While each harsh thought away shall fly
 Down the full stream of harmony,
 Compassion mild shall fill their place,
 Each gentle minister of grace;
 Pity, that often melts to love,
 Let weeping pity kind improve,
 The soften'd heart, prepar'd to take
 Whate'er impressions love shall make.
 Oh! in that kind, that sacred hour,
 When hate, when anger have no power;
 When fighting love, mild simple boy,
 Courtship sweet, and tender joy,
 Alone possess the fair one's heart;
 Let me then, fancy, bear my part.

Oh! Goddess how I long to appear;
 The hour of dear success draws near:
 See where the crowding shadows wait;
 Haste and unfold the iv'ry gate;
 Ye gracious forms, employ your aid,
 Come in my anxious look array'd;
 Come love, come Hymen, at my pray'r,
 Led by blythe hope, ye decent pair
 By mutual confidence combin'd,
 As erst in sleep I saw you join'd.
 Fill my eyes with heart swell'd tears,
 Fill my breast with heart born fears,
 Half-utter'd vows and half-suppress'd,
 Part look'd, and only wish'd the rest;
 Make sighs, and speaking sorrows prove,
 Suffering much, how much I love;
 Make the muses lyre complain,
 Strung by me in warbled strain;
 Let the melodious numbers flow
 Powerful of a lover's woe,
 Till, by the tender Orphean art,
 I through her ear shall gain her heart.

Now fancy, now the fit is o'er:
 I feel my sorrows vex no more:
 But when condemn'd again to mourn,
 Fancy, to my aid return.

O D E II.

BEGONE, pursuits so vain and light;
 Knowledge, fruitless of delight;
 Lean study, fire of fallow doubt,
 I put thy musing taper out;
 Fantastic all, a long adieu;
 For what has love to do with you?
 For, lo, I go, where beauty fires,
 To satisfy my soul's desires;
 For, lo, I seek the sacred walls
 Where love, and gentle beauty, calls:
 For me she has adorn'd the room,
 For me has shed a rich perfume:
 Has she not prepar'd the tea;
 The kettle boils—she waits for me.

I come, nor single, but along
 Youthful sports a jolly throng!
 Thoughtless joke, and infant wiles;
 Harmless wit, and virgin smiles;
 Tender words, and kind intent;
 Languish fond and blandishment;
 Yielding curtsy, whisper low;
 Silken blush, with cheeks that glow;
 Chaste desires, and wishes meet;
 Thin clad hope, a foot-man fleet;
 Modesty, that turns aside,
 And backward strives her form to hide;
 Healthful mirth, still gay and young,
 And meekness with a maiden's tongue;
 Satire, by good humour dress'd
 In a many-colour'd vest:
 And enter leaning at the door,
 Who send'st thy flaunting page before,
 The roguish boy of kind delight,
 Attendant on the lover's night,
 Fair his iv'ry shuttle flies
 Through the bright threads of mingling dyes,
 As swift his rosy fingers move
 To knit the silken cords of love;
 And stop who softly stealing goes
 Occasion high on her tiptoes,
 Whom youth with watchful look espies,
 To seize the forelock ere she flies,
 Ere he her bald pate shall survey,
 And well ply'd heels to run away.

But, anxious care, be far from hence;
 Vain surmise, and alter'd sense;
 Mishapen doubts, the woes they bring;
 And jealousy, of fiercest sting;
 Despair, that solitary stands,
 And wrings a halter in his hands;
 Flatt'ry false and hollow sound,
 And dread with eye still looking round;
 Avarice, bending under pelf;
 Conceit, still gazing on herself:
 O love! exclude high crested pride,
 Nymph of Amazonian stride:
 Nor in these walls, like waiting-maid,
 Be curiosity survey'd,
 That to the key-hole lays her ear,
 List'ning at the door to hear;
 Nor father time unless he's found
 In triumph led by beauty bound,
 Forc'd to yield to vigour's stroke,
 His blunted scythe and hour glass broke.

But come, all ye who know to please;
 Inviting glance, and downy ease;
 The heart born joy, the gentle care;
 Soft breath'd wish, and power of prayer;
 The single vow, that means no ill;
 Believing quiet, submissive will;
 Constancy of meekest mind,
 That suffers long and still is kind;
 All ye who put our woes to flight;
 All ye who minister delight;
 Nodes, and wreaths, and becks, and tips;
 Meaning winks, and roguish trips;
 Fond deceits, and kind surprises;
 Sudden sinks and sudden rises;
 Laughs, and toys, and gamesome fights;
 Jolly dance, and girds and flights:
 Then, to make me wholly blest,
 Let me be there a welcome guest.

O D E III.

Immortalia ne speres, monet annus—

HOR.

Now spring begins her smiling round,
 Lavish to paint th' enamell'd ground;
 The birds exalt their cheerful voice,
 And gay on every bough rejoice.
 The lovely graces, hand in hand,
 Knit in love's eternal band,
 With dancing step at early dawn,
 Tread lightly o'er the dewy lawn.
 Where'er the youthful sisters move,
 They fire the soul to genial love.
 Now, by the river's painted side,
 The swain delights his country bride:
 While, pleas'd she hears his artless vows;
 Above the feather'd songster woos.
 Soon will the ripen'd summer yield
 Her various gifts to ev'ry field;
 Soon fruitful trees, a beauteous show,
 With ruby tinctur'd births shall glow;
 Sweet smells, from beds of lilies born,
 Perfume the breezes of the morn.
 The sunny day, and dewy night,
 To rural play my fair invite;
 Soft on a bank of violets laid,
 Cool she enjoys the evening shade;
 The sweets of summer feast her eye:
 Yet soon, soon will the summer fly.

Attend, my lovely maid, and know
 To profit by the moral show:
 Now young and blooming thou art seen,
 Fresh on the stalk, for ever green;
 Now does th' unfolded bud disclose
 Full blown to fight the blushing rose:
 Yet, once the sunny season past,
 Think not the co'ring scene will last;
 Let not the flatt'ring hope persuade:
 Ah! must I say that this will fade?

For see the summer posts away,
 Sad emblem of our own decay.
 Now winter, from the frozen north,
 Drives his iron chariot forth;
 His grizly hand in icy chains
 Fair Tweda's silver flood constrains:
 Cast up thy eyes, how bleak and bare
 He wanders on the tops of Yare!
 Behold his footsteps dire are seen
 Confess'd on many a with'ring green.
 Griev'd at the sight, when thou shalt see,
 A snowy wreath clothe ev'ry tree,
 Frequenting now the stream no more,
 Thou fly'st, displeas'd the barren shore.
 When thou shalt miss the flow'rs that grew
 But late to charm thy ravish'd view,
 Shall I, ah horrid! wilt thou say,
 Be like to this another day?

Yet, when in snow and dreary frost
 The pleasure of the field is lost,
 To blazing hearths at home we run,
 And fires supply the distant sun;
 In gay delights our hours employ,
 We do not lose, but change our joy;
 Happy abandon ev'ry care,
 To lead the dance, to court the fair,
 To turn the page of ancient bards,
 To drain the bowl, and deal the cards.

But when the beauteous white and red
 From the pale ashy cheek is fled;
 When wrinkles dire and age severe,
 Make beauty fly we know not where:
 The fair whom fates unkind disarm,
 Have they for ever ceas'd to charm?
 Or is there left some pleasing art,
 To keep secure a captive heart?

Unhappy love! might lovers say,
 Beauty, thy food does swift decay;
 When once that short-liv'd stock is spent,
 What art thy famine can prevent?
 Virtues prepare with early care,
 That love may live on wisdom's fare;
 Though ecstasy with beauty flies,
 Esteem is born when beauty dies.
 Happy to whom the fates decree
 The gift of heav'n in giving thee:
 Thy beauty shall his youth engage;
 Thy virtues shall delight his age.

O D E IV.

ON THE NEW YEAR M.DCC.XXXIX.

JANUS, who with sliding pace,
 Run'st a never ending race,
 And driv'st about, in prone career,
 The whirling circle of the year,
 Kindly indulge a little stay,
 I beg but one swift hour's delay.
 O! while th' important minutes wait,
 Let me revolve the books of fate;
 See what the coming year intends
 To me, my country, kind and friends.
 Then may'st thou wing thy flight, and go,
 To scatter blindly joys and woe;
 Spread dire disease, or purest health,
 And, as thou lists, grant place or wealth.
 This hour, with-held by potent charms.
 Ev'n peace shall sleep in pow'rs mad arms?
 Kings feel their inward torments less,
 And for a moment wish to bleis.

Life now presents another scene,
 The same strange farce to act again;
 Again the weary human play'rs
 Advance, and take their several shares:
 Clodius riots, Cæsar fights,
 Tully pleads, and Maro writes,
 Ammon's fierce sons controuls the globe,
 And Harlequin diverts the mob.

To time's dark cave the year retreats,
 These hoary unfrequented seats;
 There from his loaded wing he lays
 The months, the minutes, hours, and days;
 Then flies, the seasons in his train,
 To compass round the year again.

See there, in various heaps combin'd,
 The vast designs of human kind;
 Whatever swell'd the statesman's thought,
 The mischiefs mad ambition wrought,
 Public revenge and hidden guilt,
 The blood by secret murder spilt,
 Friendships to sordid interest given,
 And ill-match'd hearts, ne'er pair'd in heaven;
 What avarice, to crown his store,
 Stole from the orphan, and the poor;
 Or luxury's more shameful waste,
 Squander'd on the unthankful feast.

Ye kings, and guilty great, draw near;
 Before this awful court appear:
 Bare to the muse's piercing eye
 The secret of all mortals lie;
 She, strict avenger, brings to light
 Your crimes conceal'd in darkest night;
 As conscience, to her trust most true,
 Shall judge between th' oppress'd and you.

This casket shows, ye wretched train,
 How often merit su'd in vain.
 See, there, undry'd, the widow's tears;
 See, there, unsooth'd, the orphan's fears:
 Yet, look, what mighty fumes appear,
 The vile profusion of the year.
 Could'st thou not, impious greatness, give
 The smallest alms, that want might live?
 And yet, how many a large repast,
 Pall'd the rich glutton's sickly taste!
 One table's vain intemp'rate load,
 With ambush'd death, and sickness strow'd,
 Had bless'd the cottage peaceful shade,
 And given its children health and bread:
 The rustic fire, and faithful spouse,
 With each dear pledge of honest vows.
 Had, at the sober-tasted meal,
 Repeated oft the grateful tale;
 Had hymn'd, in native language free,
 The song of thanks to heaven and thee;
 A music that the great ne'er hear,
 Yet sweeter to the internal ear,
 Than any soft seducing note
 E'er thrill'd from Farinelli's throat.

Let's still search on——This bundle's large.
 What's here? 'Tis science' plaintive charge.
 Hear wisdom's philosophic sigh,
 (Neglected all her treasures lie)
 That none her secret haunts explore,
 To learn what Plato taught before;
 Her sons seduc'd to turn their parts
 To flattery's more thriving arts;
 Refine their better sense away
 And join corruptions flag, for pay.
 See his reward the gameller share,
 Who painted moral virtue fair;
 Inspir'd the minds of gen'rous youth
 To love the simple mistress truth;
 The patriot path distinctly show'd,
 That Rome and Greece to glory trode;
 That self-applause is noblest fame,
 And kings may greatness link to shame;
 While honesty is no disgrace,
 And peace can smile without a place.
 Hear too astronomy repine,
 Who taught unnumber'd worlds to shine;
 Who travels boundless ether through,
 And brings the distant orbs to view.
 Can she her broken glass repair,
 Though avarice has her all to spare!
 What mighty secrets had been found,
 Was virtue mistress of five pound?
 Yet see where, given to wealth and pride,
 A bulky pension lies beside.

Avaunt then, riches; no delay;
 I spurn th' ignoble heaps away.
 What though your charms can purchase all
 The giddy honours of this ball;
 Make nature's germans all divide,
 And haughty peers renounce their pride;

Can buy proud Flavia's fordid smile,
 Or, ripe for fate, this destin'd isle.
 Though greatness condescends to pray,
 Will time indulge one hour's delay,
 Or give the wretch intent on self,
 One moment's credit with himself?
 Virtue, that true from false discerns,
 The vulgar courtly phrase unlearns,
 Superior far to fortune's frown,
 Bestows alone the stable crown,
 The wreath from honours root that springs,
 That fades upon the brows of kings.

O D E V.

ON THE BATTLE OF GLADSMUIR, 1745.

As over Gladsmuir's blood-stain'd field,
 Scotia, imperial goddess flew;
 Her lifted spear and radiant shield
 Conspicuous blazing to the view:
 Her visage, lately clouded with despair,
 Now reassum'd its first majestic air.

Such seen as oft in battle warm
 She glow'd through many a martial age;
 Or mild to breathe the civil charm,
 In pious plans and counsel sage:
 For, o'er the mangling glories of her face,
 A manly greatness heighten'd female grace.

Loud as the trumpet rolls its sound,
 Her voice the pow'r celestial rais'd;
 Whilst her victorious sons around
 In silent joy and wonder gaz'd:
 The sacred muses heard th' immortal lay,
 And thus to earth the notes of fame convey.

" 'Tis done! my sons! 'tis nobly done!"
 Victorious over tyrant pow'r;
 How quick the race of fame was run!
 The work of ages in one hour: [reigns;
 Slow creeps th' oppressive weight of slavish
 One glorious moment rose, and burst your chains.

But late, forlorn, dejected, pale;
 A prey to each insulting foe;
 I fought the grove and gloomy vale,
 To vent in solitude my woe:
 Now to my hand the balance fair restor'd;
 Once more I wield on high th' imperial sword.

What arm has this deliverance wrought?
 'Tis he! the gallant youth appears;
 O warm in fields, and cool in thought!
 Beyond the flow advance of years!
 Haste, let me, rescu'd now from future harms,
 Strain close the filial virtue in my arms.

Early I nurs'd this royal youth,
 Ah! ill detain'd on foreign shores;
 I fill'd his mind with love of truth,
 With fortitude and wisdom's stores:
 For when a noble action is decreed,
 Heav'n forms the hero for the destin'd deed.

Nor could the soft seducing charms
 Of mild Hesperia's blooming soil,
 E'er quench his noble thirst of arms,
 Of generous deeds and honest toil;

Fir'd with the warmth a country's love imparts,

He fled their weakness, but admir'd their

With him I plow'd the stormy main ;

My breath inspir'd th' auspicious gale ;

Reserv'd for Gladsmuir's glorious plain,

Through dangers wing'd his daring sail :

Where, form'd with inborn worth, he durst oppose

His single valour to an host of foes.

He came ! he spoke ! and all around,

As swift as heav'n's quick-darted flame,

Shepherds turn'd warriors at the sound,

And every bosom beat for fame :

They caught heroic ardour from his eyes,

And at his side the willing heroes rise.

Rouse, England ! rouse, fame's noblest son,

In all thy ancient splendor shine ;

If I the glorious work begun,

O let the crowning palm be thine :

I bring a prince, for such is heav'n's decree,

Who overcomes but to forgive and free.

So shall fierce wars and tumults cease,

While plenty crowns the smiling plain ;

And industry, fair child of peace,

Shall in each crowded city reign ;

So shall these happy realms for ever prove

The sweets of union, liberty, and love.

ON SEEING

LADY MARY MONTGOMERY

SIT TO HER PICTURE.

In Imitation of Spenser's Style.

WHEN Lindsay drew Montgomery, heavenly maid,

And gaz'd with wonder on that angel face,

Pleas'd I sat by, and joyfully survey'd

The daring pencil image every grace.

When as the youth, each feature o'er and o'er

Careful retouch'd with strict observant view ;

Estfoons I saw how charms unseen before

Swell'd to the sight, and with the picture grew.

With milder glances now he arms her eyes,

The red now triumphs to a brighter rose ;

Now heaves her bosom to a softer rise,

And fairer on her cheek the lily blows.

Last glow'd the blush that pure of female wile,

I whilom knew when so my stars decreed,

My pipe she deign'd to laud in pleasing smile,

All undeserving I such worthy meed.

The whiles I gaz'd, ah ! felice art thought I,

Ah ! felice youth that doen it possess ;

Couth to depeint the fair so verily,

True to each charm, and faithful to each grace.

Sythence she cannot emulate her skill,

Ne envy will the muse her sisters praise,

Then for the deed, O let her place the will,

And to the glowing colours join her lays.

Yet algates would the nine, that high on hill

Parnasse, sweet imps of Jove, with Jove reside,

Give me to reign the fiery steed at will,

And with kind hand thy lucky pencil guide.

Then certes mought we fate misprise, of praise

Secure, if the dear maid in beauties bloom

Survive, or in thy colours, or my lays,

Joy of this age, and joy of each to come.

MISS AND THE BUTTERFLY.

A FABLE.

In the manner of the late Mr. Gay.

A TENDER Miss, whom mother's care

Bred up in wholesome country air,

Far from the follies of the town,

Alike untaught to smile or frown ;

Her ear unus'd to flatt'ry's praise,

Unknown in woman's wicked ways ;

Her tongue from modish tattle free,

Undipp'd in scandal and bohea ;

Her genuine form and native grace

Were strangers to a looking-glass :

Nor cards she dealt, nor flirted fan,

And valu'd not quadrille or man ;

But simple liv'd, just as you know

Miss Cloe did—some weeks ago.

As now the pretty innocent

Walk'd forth to taste the early scent,

She tripp'd about the murmur'ing stream,

That oft had lull'd her thoughtless dream.

The morning sweet, the air serene,

A thousand flow'rs adorn'd the scene ;

The birds rejoicing round appear

To choose their comforts for the year ;

Her heart was light, and full of play,

And, like herself, all nature gay.

On such a day, as fages sing,

A Butterfly was on the wing ;

From bank to bank, from bloom to bloom,

He stretch'd the gold bespangled plume :

Now skims along, and now alights

As smell allures, or grace invites ;

Now the violet's freshness sips ;

Now kiss'd the rose's scarlet lips ;

Becomes anon the daisy's guest ;

Then press'd the lily's snowy breast ;

Nor long to one vouchsafes a stay,

But just salutes, and flies away.

The virgin saw with rapture fir'd ;

She saw, and what she saw desir'd,

The shining wings, and starry eyes,

And burns to seize the living prize :

Her beating breast and glowing face

Betray her native love of dress,

And all the woman full express

First flutters in her little breast :

Ensnar'd by empty outward show,

She swift pursues the insect-beau ;

O'er gay parterres she runs in haste,

Nor heeds the garden's flow'ry waste.

Long as the sun, with genial pow'r

Increasing, warm'd the sultry hour,

The nymph o'er every border flew,

And kept the shining game in view :

But when, soft breathing through the trees,

With coolness came the evening breeze ;

As hov'ring o'er the tulip's pride

He hung with wing diversify'd,

Caught in the hollow of her hand,

She held the captive at command.

D d iij

Flutt'ring in vain to be releas'd,
 He thus the gentle nymph address'd:
 Loose, gen'rous virgin, loose my chain;
 From me what glory canst thou gain?
 A vain, unquiet, glitt'ring thing,
 My only boast a gorgeous wing;
 From flow'r to flow'r I idly stray,
 The trisler of a summer's day:
 Then let me not in vain implore,
 But leave me free again to soar.

His words the little charmer mov'd,
 She the poor trembler's suit approv'd.
 His gaudy wings he then extends,
 And flutters on her fingers ends:
 From thence he spoke, as you shall hear,
 In strains well worth a woman's ear.

When now thy young and tender age
 Is pure, and heedless to engage;
 When in thy free and open mien
 No self-important air is seen;
 Unknowing all, to all unknown,
 Thou liv'st, or prais'd, or blam'd by none.
 But when, unfolding by degrees
 The woman's fond desire to please,
 Studious to heave the artful sigh,
 Mistress of the tongue and eye,
 Thou sett'st thy little charms to show,
 And sports familiar with the beau;
 Forsaking then the simple plain,
 To mingle with the courtly train,
 Thou in the midnight ball shalt see
 Things apparell'd just like me;
 Who round and round, without design,
 Tinsel'd in empty lustre shine:
 As dancing through the spacious dome,
 From fair to fair the friskers roam,
 If charm'd with the embroider'd pride,
 The victim of a gay out-side,
 From place to place, as me just now,
 The glitt'ring gew-gaw you pursue,
 What mighty prize shall crown thy pains?
 A butterfly is all thy gains!

TO A LADY,

ON HER TAKING SOMETHING ILL THAT THE AUTHOR SAID.

Why hangs that cloud upon thy brow?
 That beauteous heav'n ere while serene?
 Whence do these storms and tempests blow,
 Or what this gust of passion mean?
 And must then mankind lose that light,
 Which in thine eyes was wont to shine,
 And lie obscur'd in endless night,
 For each poor silly speech of mine?

Dear child, how could I wrong thy name?
 Thy form so fair, and faultless stands,
 That could ill tongues abuse thy fame,
 Thy beauty could make large amends:
 Or if I durst profanely try
 Thy beauty's pow'rful charms t' upbraid,
 Thy virtue well might give the lie,
 Nor call thy beauty to its aid.

For Venus every heart t' ensnare,
 With a l her charm; has deckt thy face,

And Pallas with unusual care,
 Bids wisdom heighten every grace.
 Who can the double pain endure?
 Or who must not resign the field
 To thee, celestial maid, secure
 With Cupid's bow and Pallas' shield?

If then to thee such pow'r is given,
 Let not a wretch in torment live,
 But smile, and learn to copy heaven;
 Since we must sin ere it forgive.
 Yet pitying heaven not only does
 Forgive th' offender and th' offence,
 But even itself appeas'd bestows,
 As the reward of penitence.

UPON HEARING HIS PICTURE WAS IN A LADY'S BREAST.

Ye gods! was Strephon's picture blest
 With the fair heaven of Chloe's breast?
 Move softer, thou fond flutt'ring heart.
 Oh gently throb,—too fierce thou art.
 Tell me thou brightest of thy kind,
 For Strephon was the bliss design'd?
 For Strephon's sake, dear charming maid,
 Didst thou prefer his wand'ring shade?

And thou blest shade, that sweetly art
 Lodged so near my Chloe's heart,
 For me the tender hour improve,
 And softly tell how dear I love.
 Ungrateful thing! it scorns to hear
 Its wretched master's ardent pray'r,
 Ingrossing all that beauteous heaven,
 That Chloe, lavish'd maid, has given.

I cannot blame thee: Were I lord
 Of all the wealth those breasts afford,
 I'd be a miser too, nor give
 An alms to keep a god alive.
 Oh smile not thus, my lovely fair,
 On these cold looks, that lifeless air;
 Prize him whose bosom glows with fire,
 With eager love and soft desire.

'Tis true thy charms, O powerful maid,
 To life can bring the silent shade:
 Thou can'st surpass the painter's art,
 And real warmth and flames impart.
 But oh! it ne'er can love like me,
 I've ever lov'd, and lov'd but thee:
 Then, charmer, grant my fond request,
 Say thou canst love, and make me blest.

TO A YOUNG LADY,

ON HER SINGING.

SUCH, skill'd the tender verse to frame,
 And softly strike the golden lyre;
 A stranger to the soft'ning flame,
 And new to ev'ry mild desire.

Sweets that crown the budding year,
 Pour'd from the zephyrs tepid wing,
 Saw Sappho in the grove appear,
 The rival of the vocal spring.

To try the heart-subduing strains,
 Anon the vernal scenes impell

O'er lofty rocks and rilly plains
Soft warbled from th' Eolian shell.
Or such as in the bright abodes,
The youngest muse with glories crown'd,
To whom the fire of men and gods
Gave all th' enchanting pow'r of sound.
As at the banquet of the sky,
Freed from the giant's impious arms,
She drew each heavenly ear and eye,
With beauty mingling music's charms.
Had such a voice sure to prevail,
Soft warbled from the syren strand,
What wonder, if each amorous sail
Spontaneous sought the tuneful land.
Even thou who cautious wing'st thy way,
Had given thy tedious wand'rings o'er;
By Julia's all-persuading lay
Fix'd ever to the pleasing shore.
A face so sweet had sure prevail'd
With wisdom's self to hear the voice,
Whilst both the yielding heart assail'd,
Here wisdom might have fix'd his choice.

S O N G.

Ye shepherds and nymphs that adorn the gay
plain, [strain;
Approach from your sports, and attend to my
Amongst all your number a lover so true,
Was ne'er so undone, with such bliss in his view.
Was ever a nymph so hard-hearted as mine?
She knows me sincere, and she sees how I pine;
She does not disdain me, nor frown in her wrath,
But calmly and mildly resigns me to death.
She calls me her friend, but her lover denies:
She smiles when I'm cheerful, but hears not my
A bosom so flinty, so gentle an air, [sighs.
Inspires me with hope, and yet bids me despair!
I fall at her feet, and implore her with tears:
Her answer confounds, while her manner endears;
When softly she tells me to hope no relief,
My trembling lips bless her in spite of my grief.
By night, while I slumber, still haunted with care,
I start up in anguish and sigh for the fair:
The fair sleeps in peace, may she ever do so!
And only when dreaming imagine my woe.
Then gaze at a distance, nor farther aspire;
Nor think she should love, whom she cannot admire;
Hush all thy complaining, and dying her slave,
Commend her to heaven, and thyself to the grave.

S O N G.

As the shepherd's mournful fate,
When doom'd to love, and doom'd to languish,
To bear the scornful fair one's hate,
Nor dare disclose his anguish.
Yet eager looks, and dying sighs,
My secret soul discover;
While rapture trembling through mine eyes,
Reveals how much I love her.
The tender glance, the redd'ning cheek,
O'erspread with rising blushes,
A thousand various ways they speak
A thousand various wishes.

For oh! that form so heavenly fair,
Those languid eyes so sweetly smiling,
That artless blush, and modest air,
So fatally beguiling.
Thy every look, and every grace,
So charm whene'er I view thee;
Till death o'ertake me in the chase,
Still will my hopes pursue thee.
Then when my tedious hours are past,
Be this last blessing given,
Low at thy feet to breathe my last,
And die in sight of heaven.

S O N G.

ADIEU ye pleasant sports and plays,
Farewell each song that was diverting;
Love tunes my pipe to mournful lays,
I sing of Delia and of Damon's parting.
Long had he lov'd, and long conceal'd
The dear tormenting pleasant passion,
Till Delia's mildness had prevail'd
On him to show his inclination.
Just as the fair one seem'd to give
A patient ear to his love story,
Damon must his Delia leave,
To go in quest of toilsome glory.
Half-spoken words hung on his tongue,
Their eyes refus'd the usual greeting;
And sighs supply'd their wonted song,
These charming sounds were chang'd to
A. Dear idol of my soul, adieu: [weeping.
Cease to lament, but ne'er to love me,
While Damon lives, he lives for you,
No other charms shall ever move me.
B. Alas! who knows, when parted far
From Delia, but you may deceive her?
The thought destroys my heart with care,
Adieu, my dear, I fear for ever.
A. If ever I forget my vows,
May then my guardian angel leave me:
And more to aggravate my woes,
Be you so good as to forgive me.

S O N G.

WOULDEST thou know her sacred charms
Who this destin'd heart alarms,
What kind of nymph the heavens decree
That maid that's made for love and me.
Who pants to hear the sigh sincere,
Who melts to see the tender tear,
From each ungentle passion free;
Such the maid that's made for me.
Who joys whene'er she sees me glad,
Who sorrows when she sees me sad;
For peace and me can pomp resign,
Such the heart that's made for mine.
Whose soul with gen'rous friendship glows;
Who feels the blessing she bestows;
Gentle to all, but kind to me,
Such be mine, if such there be.
Whose genuine thoughts devoid of art,
Are all the natives of her heart;
A simple train, from falsehood free,
Such the maid that's made for me.
Avaunt ye light coquets, retire
Whom glittering fops around admire;

Unmov'd your tinsel charms I see,
More genuine beauties are for me.
Should love, fantastic as he is,
Raise up some rival to my bliss;
And should she change, but can that be?
No other maid is made for me.

A S O N G

BY A YOUNG LADY, ON READING THE FOREGOING.

If you would know, my dearest friend,
The man whose merit may pretend
To gain my heart, that yet is free,
Him that's made for love and me:
His mind should be his chiefest care,
All his improvements centre there,
From each unmanly passion free;
That is the man who's made for me.
Whose generous bosom goodness warms,
Whom sacred virtue ever charms,
Who to no vice a slave will be;
This is the man who's made for me.
Whose tongue can easily impart
The dictates of his honest heart,
In plain good sense; from flatt'ry free;
Such he must be who's made for me.
He alone can love inspire,
Who feels the warmth of friendship's fire;
Humane and gen'rous, kind and free;
That is the man who's made for me.
If such an one, my friend e'er tries
To make me his by strictest ties,
The study of my life shall be,
To please the man so dear to me.
Ye powder'd beaux, from me retire,
Who only your dear selves admire;
Though deck'd in richest lace you be,
No tinsel'd fop has charms for me.
Glasgow.

REPLY BY THE AUTHOR.

—Sed que legat ipse Lysoris. VIRG.

O GENTLE maid! whoe'er thou art,
That seek'st to bless a friendly heart;
Whose muse and mind seem fram'd to prove
The tenderness of mutual love:
The heart that flutters in his breast,
That longs and pants to be at rest,
Roam'd all around thy sex, to find
A gentle mate; and hop'd her kind.
I saw a face—and found it fair;
I search'd a mind—saw goodness there:
Goodness and beauty both combin'd;
But heav'n forbade her to be kind.
To thee for refuge dare I fly,
The victim of another eye?
Poor gift! a lost, rejected heart,
Deep wounded by a foreign dart.
From this inevitable chain,
Alas! I hope to 'scape in vain.
Is there a pow'r can set me free,
A pow'r on earth—or is it thee?
Yet were thy cheek as Venus fair;
Bloom'd all the Paphian goddess there,
Such as she bless'd Adonis' arms;
Thou couldst but equal Laura's charms.

Or were thy gentlest mind replete
With all that's mild, that's soft, that's sweet;
Was all that's sweet, soft, mild, combin'd,
Thou couldst but equal Laura's mind.

Since beauty, goodness, is not found
Of equal force to sooth this wound,
Ah! what can ease my anguish'd mind?
Perhaps the charm of being kind.

Canst thou transported view the lays
That warble forth another's praise,
Indulgent to the vow unknown,
Well pleas'd with homage not thy own?

Canst thou the sighs with pity hear
That swell to touch another's ear?
Canst thou with soft compassion see
The tears that fall, and not for thee?

Canst thou thy blooming hopes resign,
The vow sincere, so dearly thine;
All these resign, and prove to me
What Laura would not deign to be?

When at thy feet I trembling fall,
My life, my soul, my Laura call;
Wilt thou my anxious cares beguile,
And o'er thy face spread Laura's smile.

Perhaps time's gently stealing pace
May Laura's fatal form efface,
Thou to my heart alone be dear,
Alone thy image triumph here.

Come then, best angel! to my aid;
Come, sure thou'rt such, the gentlest maid:
If thou canst work this cure divine,
My heart henceforth is wholly thine.

Edinburgh.

THE YOUNG LADY'S ANSWER.

Your Laura's charms I cannot boast;
For beauty I ne'er was a toast;
I'm not remarkable for sense;
To wit I've not the least pretence.

If gold and silver have the power
To charm, no thousands swell my dower;
No shining treasures I possess,
To make the world my worth confess.

An honest, plain, good natur'd lass,
(The character by which I pass),
I doubt will scarcely have the art
To drive your Laura from your heart.

But, Sir, your having been in love,
Will not your title to me prove:
Far nobler qualities must be
In him who's made for love and me.

'Tis true, you can with ease impart
The dictates of your honest heart,
In plain good sense, from flatt'ry free:
But this alone won't answer me.

Once more peruse my lines with care;
Try if you find your picture there:
For by that test you'll quickly see,
If you're the man who's made for me.

THE BRAES OF YARROW,

TO LADY JANE HOME,

In imitation of the ancient Scottish manner.

A. Busk ye, busk ye, my bony bony bride,
Busk ye, busk ye, my winsome marrow?

Busk ye, busk ye, my bony bony bride,
And think nae mair on the Braes of Yarrow.

B. Where gat ye that bony bony bride?
Where gat ye that winsome marrow?

A. I gat her where I dare nae weil be seen,
Puing the birks on the Braes of Yarrow.

Weep not, weep not, my bony bony bride,
Weep not, weep not, my winsome marrow,
Nor let thy heart lament to leive
Puing the birks on the Braes of Yarrow.

B. Why does she weep, thy bony bony bride?
Why does she weep thy winsome marrow?
And why dare ye nae mair weil be seen
Puing the birks on the Braes of Yarrow?

A. Lang maun she weep, lang maun she, maun she weep,
Lang maun she weep with dule and sorrow,
And lang maun I nae mair weil be seen
Puing the birks on the Braes of Yarrow.

For she has tint her luvver luvver dear,
Her luvver dear, the cause of sorrow,
And I hae slain the comeliest swain
That e'er pu'd birks on the Braes of Yarrow.

Why runs thy stream, O Yarrow, Yarrow red?
Why on thy braes heard the voice of sorrow?
And why yon melancholeous weids
Hung on the bony birks of Yarrow.

What yonder floats on the rueful rueful flude?
What's yonder floats? O dule and sorrow!
'Tis he the comely swain I flew
Upon the duleful Braes of Yarrow.

Wash, O wash his wounds his wounds in tears,
His wounds in tears with dule and sorrow,
And wrap his limbs in mourning weids,
And lay him on the Braes of Yarrow.

Then build, then build, ye sisters sisters sad,
Ye sisters sad, his tomb with sorrow,
And weep around in waeful wife,
His helpless fate on the Braes of Yarrow.

Curse ye, curse ye, his useless useless shield,
My arm that wrought the deed of sorrow,
The fatal spear that pierc'd his breast,
His comely breast, on the Braes of Yarrow.

Did I not warn thee not to lue,
And warn from fight, but, to my sorrow,
O'er rashly bald a stronger arm
Thou met'st, and fell on the Braes of Yarrow.

Sweet smells the birk, green grows, green grows
Yellow on Yarrow's bank the gowan, [the grass,
Fair hangs the apple frae the rock,
Sweet the wave of Yarrow flowan.

Flows Yarrow sweet? as, as sweet flows Tweed,
As green its grass, its gowan yellow,
As sweet smells on its braes the birk,
The apple frae the rock as mellow.

Fair was thy luvve, fair fair indeed thy luvve,
In floury bands thou him didst fetter,
Though he was fair and weil belov'd again,
Than me he never lued thee better.

Busk ye, then busk, my bony bony bride,
Busk ye, busk ye, my winsome marrow,

Busk ye, and lue me on the banks of Tweed,
And think nae mair on the Braes of Yarrow.

C. How can I busk a bony bony bride,
How can I busk a winsome marrow,
How lue him on the banks of Tweed,
That flew my luvve on the Braes of Yarrow.

O Yarrow fields, may never never rain,
No dew thy tender blossoms cover,
For there was basely slain my luvve,
My luvve, as he had not been a lover.

The boy put on his robes, his robes of green,
His purple vest, 'twas my awn sewing,
Ah! wretched me! I little little ken'd
He was in these to meet his ruin.

The boy took out his milk-white milk-white
steed,
Unheedful of my dule and sorrow,
But e'er the toofal of the night
He lay a corps on the Braes of Yarrow.

Much I rejoic'd that waeful waeful day;
I sang, my voice the woods returning,
But lang e'er night the spear was flown
That flew my love, and left me mourning,

What can my barbarous barbarous father do,
But with his cruel rage pursue me?
My luvver's blood is on thy spear,
How canst thou, barbarous man, then woo me?

My happy sisters may be may be proud,
With cruel and ungentle scoffin,
May bid me seek on Yarrow Braes
My luvver nailed in his coffin.

My brother Douglas may upbraid,
And strive with threatening words to move me,
My luvver's blood is on thy spear,
How canst thou ever bid me luvve thee?

Yes yes, prepare the bed, the bed of love,
With bridal sheets my body cover,
Unbar ye bridal maids the door,
Let in the expected husband lover.

But who the expected husband husband is?
His hands methinks are bath'd in slaughter,
Ah me! what ghastly spectre's yon,
Comes, in his pale shroud, bleeding after.

Pale as he is, here lay him lay him down,
O lay his cold head on my pillow;
Take aff take aff these bridal weids,
And crown my careful head with willow.

Pale tho' thou art, yet best yet best belov'd,
O could my warmth to life restore thee,
Yet lie all night between my breasts,
No youth lay ever there before thee.

Pale pale indeed, O lovely lovely youth,
Forgive, forgive so foul a slaughter,
And lye all night between my breasts,
No youth shall ever lye there after.

A. Return return, O mournful mournful bride,
Return and dry thy useless sorrow,
Thy luvver heeds nought of thy sighs,
He lyes a corps on the Braes of Yarrow.

THE FLOWER OF YARROW,

TO LADY MARY MONTGOMERY.

Go Yarrow flower, thou shalt be blest,
To lie on beauteous Mary's breast;
Go Yarrow flower so sweetly smelling,
Is there on earth so soft a dwelling?

Go lovely flower, thou prettiest flower,
That ever smil'd in Yarrow bower;
Go daughter of the dewy morning,
With Alves' blush the fields adorning.

Go lovely rose, what do'st thou here?
Ling'ring away thy short liv'd year,
Vainly shining, idly blooming,
Thy unenjoyed sweets consuming.

Vain is thy radiant Garlies hue,
No hand to pull, no eye to view;
What are thy charms no heart desiring?
What profits beauty none admiring?

Go Yarrow flower to Yarrow maid,
And on her panting bosom laid,
There all thy native form confessing,
The charm of beauty is possessing.

Come Yarrow maid from Yarrow field,
What pleasure can the desert yield?
Come to my breast O all excelling,
Is there on earth so kind a dwelling?

Come my dear maid, thou prettiest maid,
That ever smil'd in Yarrow shade;
Come sister of the dewy morning,
With Alves' blush the dance adorning.

Come lovely maid, love calls thee here,
Linger no more thy fleeting year,
Vainly shining, idly blooming,
Thy unenjoyed sweets consuming.

Vain is thy radiant Garlies hue,
No hand to press, no eye to view;
What are thy charms no heart desiring?
What profits beauty none admiring?

Come Yarrow maid with Yarrow rose,
Thy maiden graces all disclose;
Come blest by all, to all a blessing,
The charm of beauty is possessing.

SONG.

YE shepherds of this pleasant vale
Where Yarrow streams along,
Forfake your rural toils and join
In my triumphant song.
She grants, she yields; one heavenly smile
Atones her long delays,
One happy minute crowns the pains
Of many suff'ring days.
Raise, raise the victor notes of joy,
These suffering days are o'er;
Love fatiates now his boundless wish
From beauties boundless store:
No doubtful hopes, no anxious fears
This rising calm destroy,
Now every prospect smiles around
All opening into joy.
The sun with double lustre shone
That dear consenting hour,
Brighten'd each hill, and o'er each vale
New colour'd every flower:
The gales their gentle sighs withheld,
No leaf was seen to move,

The hov'ring songsters round were mute,
And wonder hush'd the grove.
The hills and dales no more resound
The lambkin's tender cry;
Without one murmur Yarrow stole
In dimpling silence by:
All nature seem'd in still repose
Her voice alone to hear,
That gently roll'd the tuneful wave,
She spoke and blest'd my ear.
Take, take, whate'er of bliss or joy
You fondly fancy mine,
Whate'er of joy or blest I boast
Love renders wholly thine;
The woods struck up to the soft gale,
The leaves were seen to move,
The feather'd choir resum'd their voice,
And wonder fill'd the grove.
The hills and dales again resound
The lambkins tender cry,
With all his murmurs Yarrow trill'd
The song of triumph by;
Above, beneath, around, all on
Was verdure, beauty, song.
I snatch'd her to my trembling breast,
All nature joy'd along.

SONG.

Go plaintive sounds! and to the fair
My secret wounds impart;
Tell all I hope, tell all I fear,
Each motion in my heart.

But she, methinks, is list'ning now
To some enchanting strain;
The smile that triumphs o'er her brow,
Seems not to heed my pain.

Yes plaintive sounds, yet, yet delay,
Howe'er my love repine;
Let that gay minute pass away,
The next perhaps is thine.

Yes plaintive sounds, no longer crost,
Your griefs shall soon be o'er;
Her cheek undimpled now, has lost
The smile it lately wore.

Yes plaintive sounds, she now is yours,
'Tis now your time to move;
Essay to soften all her pow'rs,
And be that softness love.

Cease plaintive sounds, your task is done,
That anxious tender air
Proves o'er her heart the conquest won,
I see you melting there.

Return ye smiles, return again,
Return each sprightly grace;
I yield up to your charming reign,
All that enchanting face.

I take no outward show amiss,
Rove where they will her eyes,
Still let her smiles each shepherd blest,
So she but hear my sighs.

SONG.

You ask me, charming fair,
Why thus I pensive go?
From whence proceeds my care,
What nourishes my woe?

Why seek'st the cause to find
Of ills that I endure?
Ah! why so vainly kind
Unless resolved to cure?

It needs no magic art,
To know whence my alarms;
Examine your own heart,
Go read them in your charms.

Whene'er the youthful quire,
Along the vale advance,
To raise at your desire,
The lay, or form the dance;

Beneficent to each,
You some kind grace afford,
Gentle in deed or speech,
A smile or friendly word.

Whilst on my love you put
No value;—or the same,
As if my fire was but
Some paltry village flame.

At this my colour flies,
My breast with sorrow heaves,
The pain I would disguise,
Nor man nor maid deceives.

My love stands all display'd,
Too strong for art to hide;
How soon the heart's betray'd
With such a clue to guide!

How cruel is my fate,
Affronts I could have borne,
Found comfort in your hate,
Or triumph'd in your scorn.

But whilst I thus adore,
I'm driven to wild despair;
Indifference is more
Than raging love can bear.

EPITAPH ON LORD NEWHAILE.

To fame let flatt'ry the proud column raise,
And guilty greatness load with venal praise,
This monument for nobler use design'd
Speaks to the heart, and rises for mankind;
Whose moral strain, if rightly understood,
Invites thee to be humble, wise and good.
Learn here of life, life's every sacred end,
Hence form the father, husband, judge and friend:
Here wealth and greatness found no partial grace;
The poor look'd fearless in th' oppressors face:
One plain good meaning through his conduct ran,
And if he err'd, alas! he err'd as man.
If then unconscious of so fair a fame
Thou read'st without the wish to be the same,
Though proud of titles, or of boundless store,
By blood ignoble, and by wealth made poor,
Yet read; some vice perhaps thou may'st resign,
Be ev'n that momentary virtue thine,

Heav'n in thy breast here work its first essay,
Think on this man, and pass unblam'd one day.

EPITAPH ON LORD BINNING.

BENEATH this sacred marble ever sleeps
For whom a father, mother, consort weeps;
Whom brothers, sisters, pious griefs pursue,
And children's tears with virtuous drops bedew:
The loves and graces grieving round appear,
Ev'n mirth herself becomes a mourner here;
The stranger who directs his steps this way
Shall witness to thy worth, and wond'ring say,
Thy life, though short, can we unhappy call!
Sure thine was blest, for it was social all:
O may no hostile hand this place invade,
For ever sacred to thy gentle shade,
Who knew in all life's offices to please;
Join'd taste to virtue, and to virtue ease;
With riches blest did not the poor disdain;
Was knowing, humble, friendly, great, humane;
By good men honour'd, by the bad approv'd,
And lov'd the muses, by the muses lov'd;
Hail! and farewell, who bore the gentlest mind,
For thou indeed hast been of human kind.

EPITAPH ON LORD BARGENY.

Go hence instructed from this early urn,
Wise as you weep, and better as you mourn:
This urn, where titles, fortune, youth repose:
How vain the fleeting good that life bestows!
Learn age, when now it can no more supply,
To quit the burden, and consent to die;
Secure, the truly virtuous never tell,
How long the part was acted, but how well:
Youth, stand convicted of each foolish claim,
Each daring wish of lengthen'd life and fame;
Thy life a moment, and thy fame a breath,
The natural end, oblivion and death:
Hear then this solemn truth, obey its call,
Submits adore, for this is mankind's all.

EPITAPH ON SIR JAMES SUTTIE.

THIS unambitious stone preserves a name
To friendship sanctify'd, untouch'd by fame,
A son this rais'd, by holy duty fir'd,
These sung a friend, by friendly zeal inspir'd.
No venal falsehood stain'd the filial tear;
Unbought, unask'd, the friendly praise sincere
Both for a good man weep; without offence,
Who led his days in ease and innocence.
His tear rose honest; honest rose his smile;
His heart no falsehood knew, his tongue no guile;
A simple mind with plain just notions fraught,
Nor warp'd by wit, nor by proud science taught,
Nature's plain light still rightly understood,
That never hesitates the fair and good—
Who view'd self balanc'd from his calm retreat,
The storms that vex the busy and the great,
Unmingling in the scene, whate'er beset
Pity'd his suff'ring kind, and wish'd 'em well:
Careless if monarchs frown'd, or statesmen smil'd,
His purer joy, his friend, his wife or child;
Constant to act the hospitable part,
Love in his look, and welcome in his heart;
Such unpriz'd blessings did his life employ,
The social moment, the domestic joy,

A joy beneficent, warm, cordial, kind,
That leaves no doubt, no grudge, no sting behind:
The heart-born rapture that from virtue springs,
The poor man's portion, God withheld from kings.
This life at decent time was bid to cease,
Finish'd among his weeping friends in peace.
Go traveller, with his shade eternal rest,
Go, be the same, for this is to be blest.

EPITAPH ON MRS. COLQUHOUN OF LUSS.

UNBLAM'D, O sacred shrine, let me draw near;
A sister's ashes claim a brother's tear.
No semblant arts this copious spring supply,
'Tis nature's drops, that swell in friendship's eye;
O'er this sad tomb see kneeling brothers bend,
Who wail a sister, that excell'd a friend;
A child like this each parent's wish engage,
Grace of his youth and solace of his age:
Hence the chaste virgin learn each pious art
Who fights sincere to bless a virtuous heart,
The faithful youth, when Heaven the choice inspires,
Such hope the partner of his kind desires.
Oh early lost! yet early all fulfill'd,
Each tender office of wife, sister, child;
All these in early youth thou hadst obtain'd;
The fair maternal pattern yet remain'd; {spare;
Heav'n sought not that—else Heav'n had bid to
To thine succeeds now Providence's care—
Amidst the pomp that to the dead we give,
To sooth the vanity of those that live,
Receive thy destin'd place, a hallow'd grave;
'Tis all we can bestow, or thou can'st crave.
Be these the honours that embalm thy name,
The matron's praise, woman's best silent fame;
Such to remembrance dear, thy worth be found,
When queens, and flatterers sleep forgot around,
'Till awful sounds shall break the solemn rest;
Then wake amongst the blest, for ever blest.
Meanwhile upon this stone, thy name shall live,
Sure heaven will let this pious verse survive.

EPITAPH ON MRS. KEITH.

WHATE'ER all-giving nature could impart,
Whate'er or charm'd the eye, or warm'd the heart,
Beauty, by candid virtue still approv'd,
Virtue, by beauty render'd most belov'd;
Whate'er kind friendship, or endearing truth,
For blest old age had treasur'd up in youth;
What blest old age, in its last calm adieu,
Might with applause and conscious joy review,
Reposes here to wake in endless bliss,
Too early ravish'd from a world like this!
Where fair examples strike, but not inspire
To imitate the virtues all admire:
Yet listen, virgins! to this saving strain,
If she has liv'd—let her not die in vain.

EPITAPH ON MRS. HEPBURN.

STAY, passenger; this stone demands thy tear;
Here rest the hopes of many a tender year:
Our sorrow now—so late our joy and praise!
Lost in the mild Aurora of her days.
What virtues might have grac'd her fuller day!
'But ah! the charm just shown and snatch'd away.'
Friendship, love, nature, all reclaim in vain;
Heav'n when it wills, resumes its gifts again,

EPITAPH ON MISS SETON,

INTERRED IN THE CHAPEL OF SETON-HOUSE.

IN these once hallowed walls' neglected shade,
Sacred to piety and to the dead,
Where the long line of Seton's race repose,
Whose tombs to wisdom, or to valour rose;
Though now a thankless age, to slavery prone,
Past fame despising, careless of its own,
Records no more; each public virtue fled,
Who wisely counsell'd, or who bravely bled.
Though here the warrior shield is hung no more,
But every violated trophy tore, [lot,
Heav'n's praise, man's honour, share one shameful
God and his image both alike forgot.
To this sweet maid a kindred place is due;
Her earth shall consecrate these walls anew;
The muse that listens to desert alone,
Snatches from fate, and seals thee for her own.

EPITAPH.

COULD this fair marble to the world impart
Half of the woes that rend a husband's heart,
Could it be taught to look with nature's eye,
Like friendship cou'd it breathe the tender sigh,
With each dear rapture bid the bosom glow,
Love e'er cou'd taste, or tenderness bestow,
Then might it tow'r unblam'd amid the skies,
And not to vanity, but virtue rise.
Its noblest pomp, the humble eye endure,
And pride, when most it swell'd, here find a cure.
Cease then—nor at the sovereign will repine;
It gives, we bliss; it snatches, we resign:
To earth what came from earth returns again,
Heav'n fram'd th' immortal part above to reign.

EPITAPH ON MR. CUNNINGHAM OF CRAIGENDS.

A son, a wife, bade the plain marble arise;
Beneath the sacred shade a good man lies.
In Britain's senate long unblam'd he sat,
And anxious trembled for her doubtful fate:
Above all giddy hopes, all selfish ends,
His country was his family and friends.
Children! weep not, thus cruelly bereft;
The fair example of his life is left;
Another far more lasting, safe estate
Than e'er descended from the rich and great;
Theirs fall to time or fortune soon a prey;
Or the poor gift of kings, kings snatch away:
Your blest succession never can be less,
Still as you imitate you still possess.

ON A SUMMER-HOUSE IN MY OWN GARDEN.

WHILST round my head the zephyrs gently play,
To calm reflection I resign the day;
From all the servitudes of life releas'd,
I bid mild friendship to the sober feast;
Nor beauty banish from the hallow'd ground,
She enters here to solace not to wound;
All else excluded from the sacred spot,
One half detested, and one half forgot:
All the mad human tumult, what to me?
Here chaste Calliope, I live with thee.

ON A DIAL IN MY GARDEN.

ONCE at a potent leader's voice it stay'd ;
Once it went back when a good monarch pray'd.
Mortals, howe'er we grieve, howe'er deplore,
The flying shadow shall return no more.

ON AN OBELISK IN MY GARDEN.

VIEW all around, the works of power divine,
Inquire, explore, admire, extol, resign ;
This is the whole of human kind below,
'Tis only giv'n beyond the grave to know.

INSCRIPTION ON A DOG.

CALM tho' not mean, courageous without rage,
Serious not dull, and without thinking sage ;
Pleas'd at the lot that nature has assign'd,
Snarl as I list, and freely bark my mind ;
As churchman wrangle not with jarring spite,
Nor statesman like carressing whom I bite ;
View all the canine kind with equal eyes,
I dread no mastiff, and no cur despise.
True from the first, and faithful to the end,
I balk no mistress, and forsake no friend.
My days and nights one equal tenor keep,
Fast but to eat, and only wake to sleep.
Thus stealing along life I live incog,
A very plain and downright honest dog.

THE WISH.

If join'd to make up virtue's glorious tale,
A weak, but pious aid can aught avail,
Each sacred study, each diviner page
That once inspir'd my youth, shall sooth my age.
Deaf to ambition, and to interest's call ;
Honour my titles, and enough my all ;
No pimp of pleasure, and no slave of state,
Serene from fools, and guiltless of the great,
Some calm and undisturb'd retreat I'll choose
Dear to myself and friends. Perhaps the muse
May grant, while all my thoughts her charms em-
If not a future fame, a present joy. [ploy,
Pure from each feverish hope, each weak desire ;
Thoughts that improve, and slumbers that inspire,
A steadfast peace of mind, rais'd far above
The guilt of hate and weaknesses of love ;
Studious of life, yet free from anxious care ;
To others candid, to myself severe ;
Filial, submissive to the sovereign will ;
Glad of the good, and patient of the ill ;
I'll work in narrow sphere, what heaven approves,
Abating hatreds, and increasing loves.
My friendship, studies, pleasures, all my own,
Alike to envy, and to fame unknown :
Such in some blest asylum let me lie,
Take off my fill of life, and wait, not wish to die.

A SOLILOQUY.

IN IMITATION OF HAMLET,

My anxious soul is tore with doubtful strife,
And hangs suspended betwixt death and life :
Life ! death ! dread objects of mankind's debate ;
Whether superior to the shocks of fate,
To bear its fiercest ills with steadfast mind,
To nature's order piously resign'd,

Or, with magnanimous and brave disdain,
Return her back th' injurious gift again.
O ! if to die, this mortal bustle o'er,
Were but to close one's eyes, and be no more ;
From pain, from sickness, sorrows, safe withdrawn,
In night eternal that shall know no dawn ;
This dread, imperial, wondrous frame of man,
Lost in still nothing, whence it first began :
Yes, if the grave such quiet could supply,
Devotion's self might even dare to die,
Left hapless victors in the mortal strife,
Through death we struggle but to second life,
But, fearful here, though curious to explore,
Thought pauses, trembling on the hidden shore :
What scenes may rise, awake the human fear ;
Being again resum'd, and God more near ;
If awful thunders the new guest appall,
Or the soft voice of gentle mercy call.
This teaches life with all its ills to please,
Afflicting poverty, severe disease ;
To lowest infamy gives power to charm,
And strikes the dagger from the boldest arm.
Then, Hamlet, cease ; thy rash resolves forego
God, nature, reason, all will have it so ;
Learn by this sacred horror, well suppress,
Each fatal purpose in the traitor's breast.
This damps revenge with salutary fear,
And stops ambition in its wild career,
Till virtue for itself begin to move,
And servile fear exalt to filial love.
Then in thy breast let calmer passions rise,
Pleas'd with thy lot on earth, absolve the skies.
The ills of life see friendship can divide ;
See angels warring on the good man's side.
Alone to virtue happiness is given,
On earth self-satisfy'd, and crown'd in heaven.

A SOLILOQUY.

WROTE IN JUNE 1746.

MYSTERIOUS innate of this breast,
Enkindled by thy flame ;
By thee my being's best express,
For what thou art I am.

With thee I claim celestial birth,
A spark of heaven's own ray ;
Without thee sink to vilest earth,
Inanimated clay.

Now in this sad and dismal hour
Of multiply'd distress,
Has any former thought the power
To make thy sorrows less.

When all around thee cruel snares
Threaten thy destin'd breath,
And every sharp reflection bears
Want, exile, chains or death.

Can ought that past in youth's fond reign
Thy pleasing vein restore,
Lives beauty's gay and festive train
In memory's soft store ?

Or does the muse ? 'Tis said her art
Can fiercest pangs appease,
Can she to thy poor trembling heart
Now speak the words of peace ?

Yet she was wont at early dawn
To whisper thy repose,
Nor was her friendly aid withdrawn
At grateful evening's close.

Friendship, 'tis true, its sacred might,
May mitigate thy doom;
As lightning shot across the night,
A moment gilds the gloom.

O God! thy providence alone
Can work a wonder here,
Can change to gladness every moan,
And banish all my fear.

Thy arm all powerful to save,
May every doubt destroy;
And from the horrors of the grave,
New raise to life and joy.

From this, as from a copious spring,
Pure consolation flows;
Makes the faint heart midst sufferings sing,
And midst despair repose.

Yet from its creature gracious Heaven,
Most merciful and just,
Asks but for life and safety given,
Our faith and humble trust.

A SERIOUS THOUGHT.

THRO' life's strange mystic paths, how mankind
A contradiction still in all their ways, [strays!
In youth's gay bloom, in wealth's insulting hour!
As heav'n all mercy was, they live secure,
Yet full of fears, and anxious doubts expire,
And in the awful judge forget the Sire.
Fair virtue then with faithful steps pursue,
Thy good deeds many, thy offences few;
That at the general doom thou may'st appear
With filial hope to sooth thy conscious fear;
Then to perpetual bliss expect to live,
Thy Saviour is thy judge, and may forgive.

DOVES.

A FRAGMENT.

Or doves sweet gentle birds, the heaven born muse
Prepares to sing, their manners and what law,
The blameless race obey, their cares and loves.
O sacred virgin, that, to me unseen
Yet present, whispers nightly in my ear
Love dited song or tale of martial knight,
As best becomes the time: and aidful grants
Celestial grace implor'd, O, bounteous, say
What fav'rite maid in her first bloom of youth
Wilt choose to honour? seem I not to see
The laurel shake, and hear the voice divine
Sound in mine ear: 'With Erskine best agrees
'The song of doves: herself a dove, well pleas'd
'Listen gracious to the tale benign, and hear
'How the chaste bird with words of fondling love,
'Soft billing, wooes his maid, their spousal loves,
'Pure and unstain'd with jealous fear of change;
'How studious they to build their little nests,
'Nature's artificers! and tender, breed [flight,
'Their unsledg'd children, till they wing their
'Each parent's care.' Come, as the muse ordains,
O thou of every grace, whose looks of love,
Erskine, attractive, draw all wond'ring eyes
Constant to gaze; and whose subduing speech
Drops as the honey comb, and grace is pour'd
Into thy lips: for ever thee attends
Sweetness thy handmaid, and, with beauty, clothes,
As with the morning's robe invested round:
O come, again invok'd, and smiling lend
Thy pleas'd attention, whilst in figur'd silk

Thy knowing needle plants th' embroider'd flower,
As in its native bed: so may'st thou find
Delight perpetual and th' inclining ear
Of heav'n propitious to thy maiden vow,
When thou shalt seek from love a youth adorn'd
With all perfection, worthy of thy choice,
To bless thy night of joy and social care.
O happy he, for whom the vow is made.

THE FLOWERS.

A FRAGMENT.

THE care of gardens, and the garden's pride,
To rear the blooming flowers, invites the muse;
A grateful task! To thee, O Hume, she sings
Well pleas'd amid the verdant walks to stray
With thee, her chief delight, when summer smiles.
Come now my love, nor fear the winter's rage;
For see the winter's past, the rains are gone:
Behold the singing of the birds is now,
Season benign; the joyous race prepare
Their native melody, and warbling airs
Are heard in ev'ry grove: the flowers appear,
Earth's smiling offspring, and the beautiful meads
Are cloth'd in pleasant green; now fruitful trees
Put forth their tender buds that soon shall swell
With rich nectareous juice, and woo thy hand
To pluck their ripen'd sweets. Forsake a while
The noise of cities, and with me retire
To rural solitude: Lo! for thy head
I weave a garland, deck'd with vernal flowers,
Violet, and hyacinth, and blushing rose
Of ev'ry rich perfume; here in this calm
And undisturb'd retreat, content to dwell,
Secluded from mankind, with thee and love,
Sweetener of human cares: But thou perhaps Delight'st to hear the voice that bids thee come
To festival and dance; thou long'st to meet
The raptur'd youth, that at assembly hour
Awaits thy coming: haste adorn'd in all
Thy native softness, fresh as breathing flowers
Sweet smelling in the morning dew, and fire
His soul, ill able to resist such charms,
Won with attractive smiles: while I far off
Bemoan thy absence, and thy image form
In ev'ry thicket and each secret grove,
To sooth my longing mind by fancy's aid,
Pleasing resemblance! until thou thyself,
O fairest among women, deign to grace
The bower that love prepares, from me to learn
The care and culture of the flowery kind.

THE EPISODE OF THE THISTLE.

FLOWERS, BOOK I.

NOR to the garden sole where fair resides
As in her court the scarlet queen, amid
Her train of flow'ry nymphs, does nature boon
Indulge her gifts: but to each nameless field,
When the warm sun rejoicing in the year
Stirs up the latent juice, she scatters wide
Her rosy children: then innumerable births,
As from the womb spring up, and wide perfume
Their cradles with ambrosial sweets around.
Far as the eye can reach all nature smiles,

Hill, dale, or valley, where a lucid stream
Leads, through the level-down, his silver maze,
Gliding, with even pace, direct, as one
On journey bent, and now meand'ring fair,
Unnumber'd currents to and fro convolv'd,
His pastime, underneath the azure green
The wanton fishes sport; and round his banks,
Sole or in consort, the aerial kind
Resound in air with song: the wild thyme here
Breathes fragrance, and a thousand glittering
flowers

Art never sow'd. Even here the rising weed
The landscape paints the lion's yellow tooth,
Th' enamell'd daisy, with its rose adorn'd
The prickly briar, and the thistle rude,
An armed warrior, with his host of spears.
Thrice happy plant! fair Scotia's greatest pride,
Emblem of modest valour, unprovok'd
That harmeth not, provok'd that will not bear
Wrong unreveng'd; what though the humble root
Dishonour'd erst, the growth of every field
Arose unheeded through the stubborn soil
Jeune: though softer flowers, disdainful, fly
Thy fellowship, nor in the nosegay join,
Ill match'd compeers: not less the dews of heav'n
Bathe thy rough cheeks, and wash thy warlike mail,

Gift of indulgent skies! though lily pure
And rose of fragrant leaf, best represent
Maria's snowy breast and ruddy cheek
Blushing with bloom: th' Ormond's laurel rear
Sublimar branch, indulging loftier shade
To heaven instructed bard, that strings beneath,
Melodious, his sounding wire, to tales
Of beauties praise, or from victorious camps
Heroes returning fierce. Unenvy'd may
The snowy lily flourish round the brow
Of Gallia's king: The thistle happier far
Exalted into nobler fame, shall rise
Triumphant o'er each flower, to Scotia's bards
Subject of lasting song, their monarch's choice;
Who, bounteous to the lowly weed, refus'd
Each other plant, and bade the thistle wave,
Embroider'd, in his ensigns, wide display'd
Along the mural breach: how oft, beneath
Its martial influence, has Scotia's sons
Through every age with dauntless valour fought
On every hostile ground? while o'er their breast,
Companion to the silver star, blest type
Of fame un sullied and superior deed,
Distinguish'd ornament! their native plant
Surrounds the faintest cross, with costly row
Of gems, emblaz'd, and flame of radiant gold,
A sacred mark, their glory and their pride.

But wouldst thou know how first th' illustrious plant
Rose to renown: hear the recording muse,
While back through ages that have roll'd she leads
Th' inquiring eye, and wakens into life
Heroes and mighty kings, whose godlike deeds
Are now no more, yet still the fame survives,
Victor o'er time, the triumph of the muse.

As yet for love of arts and arms renown'd,
For hoary fires with gifts of wisdom grac'd,
Unrival'd maids in beauteous bloom, desire
Of every eye, and youthful gallant chiefs
For courage fam'd and blest with sacred song,
Flourish'd, sublime, the Pictish throne; and shar'd,

VOL. IX.

Rival of Scotia's power, fair Caledon.
Equals in sway, while both alike aspired
To single rule, disdaining to obey:
Oft led by hate and thirst of dire revenge
For ravish'd beauty, or for kindred slain,
Wide-wasting others realms with inroads fierce,
Until the second Kenneth, great in arms,
Brandish'd th' avenging sword, that low in dust,
Humbled the haughty race: yet oft, of war
Weary, and havock dire, in mutual blood
Embru'd, the nations join'd in leagues of peace
Short space enjoy'd; when nice suspicious fears
By jealous love of empire bred, again,
With fatal breath, blew the dire flame of war,
Rekindling fierce: thus when Achaius reign'd,
By the disposing will of gracious Heav'n
Ordain'd the Prince of Peace. Fair Ethelind
Grace of the Pictish throne, in rosy youth,
Of beauties bloom, in his young heart, inspir'd
Spousal desires, soft love, and dove-ey'd peace,
Her dowry. Then, his hymeneal torch,
Concord, high brandish'd; and in bonds of love,
Link'd the contending race. But ah! how vain
Hopes mortal man, his joys on earth to last
Perpetual and sincere: for Athelstane,
Fierce from the conquest of great Alured,
Northumbrian ruler, came. On Tweda's shore
Full twenty thousand brazen spears, he fix'd,
Shining a deathful view; dismay'd the brave
Erst undismay'd: even he, their warlike chief,
Hungus, in arms, a great and mighty name,
Felt his fierce heart, suspended, if to meet
Th' outrageous Saxon, dreadful in the ranks
Of battle disarray'd. Suppliant of help,
He sues the Scottish race, by friendly ties
Adjur'd and nuptial rites and equal fears.
Led by their gallant prince, the chosen train
Forsoke their native walls. The glad acclaim
Of shouting crowds, and the soft virgins wish
Pursue the parting chiefs to battle sent,
With omens not averse. Darkness arose
O'er heav'n and earth, as now but narrow space
Sunder'd each hostile force: sole in his tent
The youthful chief, the hope of Albion, lay
Slumb'ring secure, when, in the hour of sleep,
A venerable form, St. Andrew, seen
Majestic, solemn, grand, before his sight
In vision, stood: his deep and piercing eye
Look'd wisdom, and mature sedateness weigh'd
To doubtful counsels, from his temples flow'd
His hair, white as the snowy fleece that clothes
The Alpine ridge, a-cross his shoulders hung
A baldric, where some heavenly pencil wrought
Th' events of years to come prophetic drawn,
Seasons and times: in his right hand he held
A cross, for beaming through the night; his left
A pointed thistle rear'd. Fear not, he cry'd,
Thy country's early pride; for lo! to thee
Commission'd I, from heav'n's eternal king,
Ethereal messenger of tidings glad,
Propitious now am sent. Then be thou bold,
To-morrow shall deliver to thy hand
The troops of Athelstane. But oh! attend,
Instructed from the skies, the terms of fate,
Conditional, assign'd; for, if mislead
By sacred lust of arbitrary sway,
Thou, or of thee to come, thy race shall wage
Injurious war, unrighteous to invade

E e

Conforted light, and near Hibernia's harp,
Breathing the sp'rit of peace and social love,
Harmonious power, the Scottish thistle fills
Distinguish'd place, and guards the English rose.

SPEECH OF RANDOLPH,

A FRAGMENT OF BRUCE, BOOK II.

DEMAND'ST thou, mighty Bruce, to know from whence

My lineage I derive: Then hear a tale
Well known through fair Stirling's fruitful bounds,
My native land. Of ancient Scottish kings,
Thy royal ancestry, O Bruce, am I
Undoubted offspring; and, forgive the boast,
From the same fount my blood united flows,
All'y'd to thine. As yet Cameldoun's walls
By Forth, delightful stream! encircled stood
The seat of Edenuther, Pictish king;
To whose destruction, eager to revenge
The breach of faith and hospitable laws,
Insulted—his embattled host
Fierce Corbred led: for, from Dunstaffnage towers,
Pretending love and Hymeneal rite,
The treacherous Pict, with meditated force,
Bore Ethelind, her country's justest pride,
Peerless and fair; a thousand heroes fought
For her to death, fierce raging round the walls
Of lofty Cameldoun: the guilty prince
Had dearly paid the price of faith forsworn,
But, studious of new frauds within his walls,
H' invites the Scottish train, friendly to meet
In amicable talk, fair Ethelind
To be the pledge of future peace, and join
The warring nations in eternal league
Of love connubial: the unweeting king
Enter'd the hostile gates; with feast and song
The towers resound, till the dark midnight hour
Awake the murderers: in sleep he fell
With all his peers, in early life, and left
His vow'd revenge and sister unredeem'd.

Now was the royal virgin left expos'd
To the fell victor's lust, no friend to aid,
Her brother slain, and fierce and mighty chiefs
That warr'd in her defence. How could, alas!
Unshelter'd, helpless innocence resist
Th' infernal ravisher? with stedfast mind
She scorn'd his profer'd love; by virtue's aid
Triumphant o'er his lust. In vain, with tears
And rough complaint that spoke a savage heart,
Strove he to gain and woo her to his will:
In vain, enrag'd and ruthless in his love,
He threat'ned. Death disdain'd, force was the last,
But that her arm oppos'd, resolv'd to strike
The poignard in her breast, her virtue's guard.
All arts thus try'd in vain, at last incens'd,
Deep in a dungeon, from the cheerful light
Far, far remov'd, the wretched maid he threw
Deplorable; doom'd in that dwelling drear
To waste her anxious days and sleepless nights.
Anguish extreme! ah, how unlike these hours
That in her father's palace wont to pass
In festival and dance. Her piteous shrieks
Mov'd her stern keeper's heart; secret he frees
The imprison'd maid, and to the king relates
Her death, dissembling. Then, with fell despite
And rage, inflam'd for unenjoyed love,

The monarch storm'd, he loth'd his food, and fled
All human converse, frustrate of his will.

Meanwhile the nymph forsakes the hostile walls
Flying by night; through pathless wilds unknown
Guideless she wanders, in her frightened ears
Still hears the tyrant's voice, in fancy views
His form terrific, and his dreaded front
Severe in frowns; her tender heart is vex'd
With every fear, and oft desires to die.
Now day return'd, and cheerful light began
T' adorn the heav'ns; lost in the hills she knew
No certain path; around the dreary waste
Sending her weeping eye, in vain requir'd
Her native fields, Dunstaffnage well known tow'rs,

And high Edelta's walls, her father's reign.

Three days the royal wanderer bore the heat
Intensely fervent, and three lonesome nights
Wet with the chilling dews; the forest oak
Supply'd her food, and at the running stream, Patient, she slack'd her thirst. But when the fourth

Arose, descending from the Ochell height,
The flow'ry fields beneath, she wander'd long
Erroneous, disconsolate, forlorn.
Jerne's stream she pass'd; a rising hill
Stood on the bank oppos'd, adorn'd with trees,
A silvan scene! thither she bent her flight,
O'ercome with toil, and gently laid her down
In the embow'ring shade: the dew of sleep
Fell on her weary eyes, then pleasing dreams
Began to lay the tempest in her mind,
Calming from troubled thoughts: to regal pomp
She seems restor'd, her brother's fate reveng'd,
The tyrant slain: she dream'd till morn awoke,
The fifth that rose since from Cameldoun's walls
She bent her flight: the cheerful day invites,
From fair Dundalgan's ever sunny towers,
Mildred t' arise, who oft in fields of death,
Victorious, led the Picts embattled race,
Illustrious chief! he to the hilly height,
His morning walk, pleas'd with the season fair,
Betakes him musing, there it was he saw
Fair Ethelind, surpris'd as Hengist's son,
Elfred asleep beheld, when, as she fled
From Saxony to shun a step-dame's rage
That sought her life, he, with prevailing words,
Woo'd the consenting maid: nor less amaz'd
The Pictish leader saw the beauteous form;
Fix'd in surprise and ardent gaze, he stood
Wond'ring! his beating heart with joy o'erflow'd.
He led her blushing from the sacred grove
In bashful modesty, and doubting joy
Chastis'd with fear, alternate in her breast,
Poor lovely mourner! to his parents show'd
The beauteous stranger; they in age rever'd
Lift up their trembling hands, and blest the maid,
Best workmanship of heaven! the youthful chief
Transported every day his guest beheld,
And every day beheld with new delight,
Her winning graces mild, and form divine,
That drew with soft attraction, kindling love,
Enflam'd his soul: still new delays he frames
To gain a longer stay, e'er he restore
The beauteous exile to her native land,
His promis'd faith. The story of her woes,
He o'er and o'er demands; she pleas'd relates
Her past adventures sad, but, prudent, kept

Unknown her royal race ; the ardent youth
Hangs on the speaker's lips, still more and more
Enamour'd of her charms, by courtly deed
He fought the virgin's love ; by pray'rs and vows
Won to consent ; the nuptial day arose,
Awak'd by music's sound ; the Pow'rs invok'd
To bliss the hallow'd rite, and happy night
'That to his arms bestow'd the much lov'd maid,
'The gift of Heaven : then gladness fill'd his heart
Unspeakable, as when the sapient King,
The son of David, on the happy day
Of his espousals, when his mother bound
His brow in regal gold, delighted saw
His fair Egyptian bride adorned with all
Perfection, blooming in celestial sweets.

While thus the royal exile liv'd remote,
In Hymen's softest joys, the Scottish chiefs
Prepare for battle, studious to redeem
Their captive queen, unknowing of her fate ;
With just success unblest'd, discomfited
They fell in ruthless fight, their mighty men
Unworthy bondage ! helpless exiles sold
To foreign lands. The Pictish king enrag'd
Collects an host, embattled as the sands
Along the Solway coast, from all the bounds
Of his wide empire, Brica's rising towers,
And Jeda's ancient walls, once seat of kings,
With Eden rais'd on rocks, and Cameldoun,
Send forth their chiefs and citizens to war,
Pour'd thro' their lofty gates. What anguish then,
O royal virgin, vex'd thy tender heart,
When thou, thy husband midst your country's foes,
Enroll'dst their leader ? much didst thou adjure
By nuptial ties, much by endearing love,
To spare thy country in the waste of war ;
He too, the youthful chief, long doubting stood
'Twixt love and duty, unresolv'd of choice,
Hard conflict ! to Dunstaffnage walls he flies,
And left the weeping fair, intent to drown
The voice of love, soft pleading in his heart,
In sounds of battle ; but in vain ! his wife
A beauteous form, still rises to his thoughts
In supplicating tears ; he grieves to see
The mingling hosts engage, and dreads to find
Amidst the slain, his kindred new ally'd.

But now the Pictish king with mighty chiefs
Selected from his peers, pursues his way
To raze the Scottish walls, Dundalgan's towers
Receive their monarch, proud to entertain
The mighty guest : exults the haughty king
With savage joy, when first his eyes beheld
The maid so lately lost, again restor'd
Sad victim to his lust : what could she do,
Hopeless of aid ! or how alas ! avert
The dire event that from the monarch's lust
Her fears presag'd ? 'twas heav'n her thoughts in-
In a hour of sad extreme, she flies the dome [spir'd
With two, alone of all her menial train,
Companions of her flight. The king meanwhile,
Fierce with desire and violent to enjoy,
Him nor the bowl delights, nor sprightly mirth,
Nor tale of martial knight in ancient time
Recited : the unfinished feast he leaves
With wine inflam'd and ill persuading lust,
Worst counsellors ! a secret way he found
That to the queen's apartment led unseen ;
Thither he flies through many a lofty hall,
Where heroes oft have met in wise consult,

Elate in thought ; but heavens ! what fell despite,
What raging pain tore his distracted mind,
When first he knew the royal fair was fled ?
Desp'rate in rage, he hopes his absent prey,
Intent to ravish. Hurrying to the camp
He sought the general's tent, begirt around
With noble Picts there weeping Ethelind,
In soft'ned anguish, on the hero's breast
He found reclining, sad : he would have seiz'd
The trembling fair one from her lover's arms,
Her surest refuge, miserably torn,
Victim to lust obscene, had not the youth
Withstood the dire attempt of sovereign sway.
Haughty, the monarch rag'd and call'd his chiefs
To aid, his chiefs refuse th' unjust command :
Then impotent of mind he storm'd, he rav'd,
Outrageous in his ire : then wild uproar,
Tumult, and martial din, sounds o'er the camp,
While these assist the king, and these the youth,
By fearless friendship led : the clash of swords,
Through the still night, heard on the Scottish walls,
Alarms the chiefs in midnight council met :
The boldest of their warrior train they choose
For secret ambush, sheath'd in jointed mail ;
Th' intrepid band beneath a bending hill,
Await the rising dawn ; Mildred they seiz'd,
The royal exile and their social train,
Flying the monarch's rage : the beauteous queen
Rejoices to behold her native walls,
Exil'd so long, her peers with lifted hands [turn'd,
Extoll'd the bounteous Pow'rs, their queen re-
The wondrous work of Fate ; now she relates
Her direful tale, the audience melt in tears.

Meanwhile the monarch raging in the camp,
Forsook of all his peers, for fierce assault
Prepar'd, attended with a desperate crew
Of men, that shar'd in partnership of crimes,
March'd forward to his fate ; the ambush'd train
Rise sudden, round them spread the slaughter'd
Himself, as furious in the front he warr'd [foe.
Bled by a well aim'd spear ; to punish'd ghosts
Of kings perfidious, fled his guilty soul.

The monarch slain, the Pictish chiefs that late Forsook the noisy camp, convene within
The Scottish walls, the princes joyful plight
In leagues of mutual peace ; in every fane
Each grateful altar blaz'd ; to heaven they paid
Their vows, their queen restor'd, and with her peace

The purchase of her love : through all the town
Public rejoicings reign'd, the voice of mirth
Was heard in ev'ry street, that blazing shone
Illuminated bright. The diadem
Instar'd with diamond gems and flaming gold,
Magnificent ! by Scotia's monarchs worn
From eldest times upon her beauteous brow
Plac'd by a mitr'd priest, in rich array,
Incircling, shines ; her native peers around,
Mix'd with the Pictish chiefs, admiring stand,
Pleas'd with her heavenly smiles, her gentle look,
The type of softer rule : then next they gave
The sceptre to her hands ; the precious stones
Blaz'd on the beaming point, hail ! Queen of Scots ;
Joyful they cry, hail ! to thy own return'd,
Safe from a thousand toils, beyond our hopes,
Crown'd where thy fathers reign'd : thus past the
In celebrated rites. When morn arose [night
Th' assembled senate, partner of her throne

Elect the noble youth; in times of peace
 To aid by counsel, and in war to lead
 Her marshall'd chiefs: thus ended all her woes.
 Bless'd in her husband's, and her subjects love,
 Peace flourish'd in her reign: three sons she bore,
 All men of valour known; well could they bend
 The bow in time of need. Her eldest grac'd
 With all the train of virtues that adorn
 A prince, succeeded to the Scottish rule,
 His mother's kingdom; in his happy days
 The Scottish prowess twice o'erthrew the Dane
 In bloody conflict, from our fatal shore
 Repuls'd with ignominious rout, disgrac'd.
 Her second hope, born to unluckier fate
 Matchless in fight and every gallant deed,
 The terror of his foes, his country's hope,
 In ruthless battle by ignoble hands
 Fell in his prime of youth, for ever wept,
 For ever honour'd. Athingart the last
 For prudence far renown'd, Elgidra's charms
 The heroic fir'd, as in her father's court
 A peaceful legate by his brother sent
 To Pictland's monarch; there the royal youth
 Graceful, in warlike tournament above
 His equals shone, and won the princely maid
 Courted by rival kings: from that embrace
 Descend a thousand chiefs, that lineal heir'd
 The virtues of their sire, witness the fields
 Of Loncart, and the streams that purple ran
 With stain of Danish blood: the brazen spears
 And crested helms, and antique shields, the spoils
 Of chiefs in battle slain, hung on the roof,
 Eternal trophies of their martial deeds,
 From son to son preserv'd with jealous care.
 My father in his country's quarrel met
 A glorious fate, when god-like Wallace fought;
 He, firm adherer to the nobler cause
 Shar'd all his toils, and bled in all his fights,
 Till Falkirk saw him fall; with Graham he fell,
 Wallace his bold compeer, whom, great in arms,
 Wallace alone surpass'd. With martial thoughts
 He fired my youthful mind, and taught betimes
 To build my glory on my country's love,
 His great example! to thy native reign
 If thee, thy fate propitious to the good,
 Restor'd, h' enjoin'd me to unite my force,
 From foreign victors to retrieve again
 Thy ravish'd kingdoms: then this sword he gave
 In dangers ever faithful to his arm,
 Pledge of paternal love; nor shall the foe
 Exult, I ween, to find the dastard son
 Degenerate from his sire, to wield in vain
 A father's gift. In me, O Bruce, behold
 A willing warrior, from Bodotria's stream
 I lead my native bands, hardy and bold,
 In fight distinguish'd by superior deed.
 He said and ceas'd; the arm'd assembly stood
 Silent in thought, till from his lofty seat
 Great Bruce arose—O noble youth! he cry'd,
 Descended from a line of noble sires,
 Accept thy monarch's thanks—Welcome thyself,
 Welcome thy sequent chiefs, thy country sore
 Oppress'd by dire usurpers, now demands
 Warriors like thee, where death and bloodshed
 reign
 In conflict stern; do thou approve thy might
 Above thy fellows, by transcendent acts
 To Fame endear'd; she, on thy praise well pleas'd

Constant to dwell, shall rear thee up on high
 The loftiest branch, to adorn thy ancient stem.

He spake, and gave the youth his plighted hand,
 Pledge of benevolence and kind intent;
 The chiefs around embrace and glad receive
 The youthful champion worthy of his race.

HORACE, BOOK I. ODE V. IMITATED.

WHAT happy youth Maria now
 Breathes in thy willing ear his vow!
 With whom thou spend'st thy evening hours,
 Amidst the sweets of breathing flowers;
 For whom retir'd to secret shade,
 Soft on thy panting bosom laid,
 Thou set'st thy looks with nicest care,
 And bind'st in gold thy flowing hair.
 O neatly plain! How oft shall he
 Bewail thy false inconstancy?
 Condemn'd perpetual frowns to prove,
 How often weep thy alter'd love?
 Who thee, too credulous, hopes to find,
 As now still golden and still kind;
 And heedless now of fortune's power
 Sets far away the evil hour.
 How oft shalt thou, ill-star'd, bewail
 Thou trusted to the faithless gale?
 When unaccustom'd to survey
 The rising winds and swelling sea;
 When clouds shall rise on that dear face,
 That shone adorn'd in every grace;
 That yet untaught in wicked wiles,
 Was wont to appear to thee in smiles.
 Wretch'd they to whom thou shin'st, untry'd
 Thy shifting calm and treacherous tide:
 For me once shipwreck'd, now on shore,
 I venture out my bark no more.

PALINODE.

O HAPPY youth, who now possessest
 Of my Maria's smiles are blest;
 Think not thy joys will constant prove,
 How many changes are in love!
 I once was happy too like thee,
 That sun of beauty shone on me:
 In darkness ever to deplore,
 The sun is set to shine no more;
 Doom'd near to view the rising light,
 But weep out love's eternal night.
 When first I spread the lover's sail,
 Love blew from shore a friendly gale;
 Sweet appear'd th' enchanting scene,
 All calm below, above serene:
 Joyous I made before the wind,
 Heedless of what I left behind;
 Nor rocks, nor quicksands did I dread,
 No adverse winds to check my speed;
 No savage pirate did I fear,
 To ravish all my soul held dear,
 Far off my treasure to convey,
 And sell in foreign lands away:
 Maria's hand unfurl'd the sails,
 Her prayers invok'd the springing gales:
 'Twas calm whate'er her eyes survey'd,
 Her voice the raging storm obey'd;
 And o'er the bosom of the tides,
 Her will the ruling rudder guides.

E c iii

But ah! the change, she flies away,
And will vouchsafe no longer stay.
See now the swelling seas arise,
Loud storming winds enrage the skies,
All weak the tempest to withstand,
Trembling and pale I put to land.
Wet from the tossing surge, aghast
I thank the gods, the danger's past;
And swear to venture out no more
Secure upon the safer shore;
Yet should the swelling seas subside,
And roll serene a silver tide;
Should yet the angry tempest cease,
And gently breathe a gale of peace;
Much, much I fear, I'd dare again
A second shipwreck on the main.

TO THE EARL OF STAIR.

LET others in exalted lays
The lofty dome of Hopetoun praise,
Or where of old, in lonely cell,
The musing Druid wont to dwell:
Or with the sacred sisters roam,
Near holy Melrose' ruin'd dome:
There are who paint with all their might
The fields where Forth's streams delight;
That winding through Stirlina's plain,
Rolls beauteous to the distant main:
Or faithful to the farmer's toil,
Extol fair Lothian's fertile soil;
Where Ceres her best gifts bestows,
And Edin town her structures shows.
Nor me delight those sylvan scenes,
Those chequer'd bow'rs and winding greens;
Where art and nature join to yield
Unnumber'd sweets to Marlefield:
Nor yet that soft and secret shade,
Where fair Aboyn asleep is laid;
Where gay in sprightly dance no more
She dreams her former triumphs o'er,
These scenes can best entice my soul,
Where smooth Blancatrina's waters roll;
Where beauteous Hume in smiling hour,
Plucks the green herb or rising flower;
Pleas'd on the borders to behold
The apple redden into gold.

But whate'er place thy presence boast,
Let not, O S——! an hour be lost.
When the rough north and angry storm,
Nature's lovely looks deform;
The south restores the wonted grace,
And wipes the clouds from heaven's face.
So thou to finish all thy care,
The flask of brisk Champaign prepare;
Invite thy friends with wife design,
And wash the ills of life with wine:
Whether beneath the open sky,
Stretch'd in the tented couch to lie
Thy fate ordains; to shine again
Great on some future Blenheim's plain;
Higher to raise thy deathless name
Triumphant to sublimer fame:
Or if secure from feverish heat,
Newliston cover thy retreat,
Where wit conspires with love's delights,
To grace thy days and bless thy nights.

When Fergus led in days of yore,
His exil'd bands to Scotia's shore;
The godlike founder of our state,
Sustain'd the shocks of adverse fate:
Yet brave, disdaining to repine,
Around his brows he bound the vine:
Let's follow still without delay
Wherever fortune shows the way;
Courage, my lads, let none despair,
When Fergus leads, 'tis base to fear:
With better auspice shall arise
Our empire in the northern skies:
Beauty and valour shall adorn,
Our happy offspring yet unborn:
Now fill the glass, come fill again,
To-morrow we shall cross the main.

TO MISS ERSK—.

ENQUIRE not E—— fair, what end
The gods for thee or me intend:
How vain the search, that but bestows
The knowledge of our future woes?
Far happier they who ne'er repine
To draw the lots their fates assign;
Then be advis'd, and try not thou
What spells and cunning men can do.
In mirth thy present years employ,
And consecrate thy charms to joy;
Whether the fates to thy old score
Propitious add a winter more;
Or this shall lay thee cold in earth,
Now raging o'er Edina's frith.
Let youth, while yet it blooms, excite
To mirth, and wit, and gay delight;
Nor thou refuse the voice that calls
To visits and to sprightly balls.
For time rides ever on the post,
Ev'n while we speak the moment's lost,
Then call each joy into this day,
And spend them now while now you may;
Have every pleasure at command,
Fools let them lie in fortune's hand.

TO R—— S——.

THE man sincere and pure of ill,
Needs not with shafts his quiver fill,
Nor point the venom'd dart,
O'er him no weapon can prevail,
Clad in the firmest coat of mail,
A brave and honest heart.

Secure in innocence he goes
Through boiling friths and highland snows;
Or if his course he guide,
To where far-fam'd Lochleven's wave
Does round his islands winding, lave
Buchannan's hilly side.

For in Glentannar, as I stood
And sung my Erskine to the wood,
Unheeding of my way;
My every care forsook behind,
While all on Erskine ran my mind,
It chanc'd my steps to stray.

When, lo! forth rushing from behind
A savage wolf of monstrous kind,
Fierce shook his horrid head:
Unarm'd I stood, and void of fear,
Beheld the monstrous savage near,
And me unarm'd, he fled.

A beast of such portentous size,
Such hideous tusks and glaring eyes,
Fierce Daunia never bred.
Nor Juba's land, without controul,
Where angry lions darkling howl,
His equal ever fed.

Place me where the summer breeze
Does ne'er refresh the weary trees,
All on the gloomy plain,
Which side of earth, offended heav'n
To the dominion foul has given,
Of clouds and beating rain.

Place me underneath the day,
Near neighbour to the burning ray;
Yet there the maid shall move,
There present to my fancy's eyes,
Sweet smiling Erskine will I prize,
Sweet speaking Erskine love.

TO MISS D——.

TELL me, Maria, tell me why
Thou dost from him that loves thee run;
Why from his fond embraces fly,
And every soft endearment shun.

So through the rocks, or dewy lawn,
With plaintive cries, its dam to find,
Flies wing'd with fears the youngling fawn,
And trembles at each breath of wind.

Ah! stop thy flight, why shouldst thou fly?
What canst thou in a lover fear?
No angry boar, nor lion I,
Pursue thy tender limbs to tear.

Cease then, dear wildness, cease to toy;
But haste all rivals to outshine,
And grown mature and ripe for joy,
Leave mamma's arms and come to mine.

TO A YOUNG LADY ON THE DEATH OF HER FATHER.

WHAT measure shall affliction know?
What bounds be set to such a woe,
That weeps the loss of one so dear!
Come, muse of mourning! haste, ordain
The sacred melancholy strain:
When virtue bids, 'tis impious to forbear.

Thy voice with powerful blessings fraught,
Inspires the solemn serious thought;
A heavenly sorrow's healing art,
That, whilst it wounds, amends the heart.
A far more pleasing rapture thine,
When bending over friendship's shrine,
Than mirth's fantastic varied lay,
Deceitful, idle, flutt'ring, vain,

Still shifting betwixt joy and pain,
Where sport the wanton, or where feast the gay.

In dust the good and friendly lies.
Must endless slumber seal those eyes?——
Oh! when shall modest worth again,
Integrity, that knows no stain,
Thy sister, justice, free from blame,
Kind truth, no false affected name,
To meet in social union, find
So plain, so upright and so chaste a mind?

By many good bewail'd, he's lost;
By thee, O beauteous virgin! most.
Thou claim'st, ah pious! ah, in vain!
Thy father from the grave again.
Not on those terms, by dooming heav'n,
His loan of mortal life was giv'n.
The equal lot is cast on all,
Obedient to the universal call.
Ev'n thou, each decent part fulfill'd,
Wife, sister, mother, friend and child,
Must yield to the supreme decree,
And every social virtue weep for thee.

What though thou boasts each soul subduing art,
That rules the movements of the human heart;
Though thine be every potent charm,
The rage of envy to disarm:
Thus far heav'n grants, the great reward
Of beauty, under virtue's guard:
Yet all in vain ascends thy pious pray'r,
To bid th' impartial Pow'r one moment spare;
That Pow'r who chastens whom he dearest loves,
Deaf to the filial sorrows he approves:
Seal'd sacred by th' inviolable fates,
Unlocks no more the adamant gates,
When once th' ethereal breath has wing'd its way,
And left behind its load of mortal clay.

Severe indeed! yet cease the duteous tear;
'Tis nature's voice that calls aloud, "Forbear."
See, see descending to thy aid,
Patience, fair celestial maid:
She strikes through life's dark gloom a bright'ning
And smiles adversity away. [ray,
White-handed hope advances in her train,
Leads to new life, and wakens joy again;
She renders light the weight of human woes,
And teaches to submit when 'tis a crime t'oppose.

TO HIS LYRE.

If e'er with thee, we fool'd away
Vacant beneath the shade a day,
Still kind to our desire,
A Scottish song we now implore,
To live this year, and some few more,
Come then my Scottish lyre.

First strung by Stewart's cunning hand,
Who rul'd fair Scotia's happy land,
A long and wide domain:
Who bold in war, yet whether he,
Reliev'd his wave-beat ship from sea,
Or camp'd upon the plain,

The joys of wine, and muses young,
Soft beauty, and her page he sang,
That still to her adheres:

E c iij

Margaret, author of his sighs,
Adorn'd with comely coal-black eyes,
And comely coal-black hairs.

O thou the grace of song and love,
Exalted to the feasts above,
The feast's supreme delight:
Sweet balm to heal our cares below;
Gracious on me thy aid bestow,
If thee I seek aright.

HORACE, BOOK I. ODE XXIII. IMITATED.

Why do'st thou still in tears complain,
Too mindful of thy love's disdain!
Why still in melancholy verse
Unmeek Maria's hate rehearse?
That Thirsis finds by fate's decree
More favour in her sight than thee!
The love of Cyrus does enthrall
Lycoris fair, with forehead small;
Cyrus declines to Pholoe's eyes,
Who unrelenting hears his sighs:
But wolves and lambs shall sooner join
Than they in mutual faith combine.
So seemeth good to love, who binds
Unequal forms, unequal minds,
Cruel in his brazen yoke,
Pleas'd with too severe a joke.
Myself, in youth's more joyous reign,
My laundress held in pleasing chain;
When pliable to love's delights
My age excus'd the poet's flights:
More wrathful she, than storms that rore
Along the Solway's crooked shore.

TO THE E— M— OF S— D.

Ne sit ancilla tibi amor pudori.

Avow my noble friend thy kind desires,
If Phillis' gentle form thy breast inspires,
Nor glory, nor can reason disapprove;
What though unknown her humble name,
Unchronicled in records old,
Or tale by flatt'ring poets told:
She to her beauties owes her noblest fame,
Her noblest honours to thy love.
Know Cupid scorns the trophy'd shield,
Vain triumph of some guilty field,
Where dragons hiss and lions roar,
Blazon'd with argent and with or,
His heraldry is hearts for hearts,
He stamps himself o'er all, and dignifies his darts.
Smote by a simple village maid,
See noble Petrarch night and day
Pour his soft sorrows through the shade;
Nor could the muse his pains allay:
What though with hands pontific crown'd,
With all the scarlet senate round;
He saw his brows adorn the living ray,
Though sighing virgins try'd each winning art,
To cure their gentle poet's love sick heart;
Cupid more pow'rful than them all,
Resolv'd his tuneful captive to enthrall,
Subdued him with a shepherdess's look;
He wreathes his verdant honours round her crook,

And taught Vall Clusa's smiling groves,
To wear the fable liveries of his loves.

But this example scarce can move thy mind,
The gentle power with verse was ever join'd:
Then hear, my Lord, a dreadful tale,
Not known in fair Arcadia's peaceful vale,
Nor in the academic grove,
Where mild philosophy might dwell with love;
But poring o'er the mystic page,
Of old Stagira's wond'rous sage,
In the dark cave of syllogistic doubt,
Where neither muse nor beauty's queen,
Nor wand'ring grace was ever seen,
Love found his destin'd victim out,
And put the rude militia all to rout:
For whilst poor Abelard, ah! soon decreed
Love's richest sacrifice to bleed,
Unweiting drew the argumental thread,
A finer net the son of Venus spread:
Involving in his ample category,
With all his musty schoolmen round,
Th' unhappy youth, alike renown'd
In philosophic and in amorous story.

Inflexible and stern the Czar,
Amidst the iron sons of war,
With dangers and distress encompass'd round,
In his large bosom deep receiv'd the wound.
No Venus she, surrounded by the loves,
Nor drawn by cooing harvest doves;
'Twas the caprice love to yoke,
Two daring souls, unharvest and unbroke,
When now the many-laurell'd Swede,
The field of death his noblest triumph fled,
And forc'd by fate, but unsubdu'd of soul,
To the fell victor left the—conquest of the pole.

Henry, a monarch to thy heart,
In action brave, in council wise,
Felt in his breast the fatal dart, [eyes;
Shot from two snowy breasts, and two fair lovely [eyes;
Though Galia wept though Sully frown'd,
Though rag'd the impious league around,
The little urchin entrance found,
And to his haughty purpose forc'd to yield
The virtuous conqueror of Coutra's field.

Who knows but some four-tail'd bashaw
May hail thee, peer, his son-in-law,
Some bright sultana, Asia's pride,
Was grandame to the beauteous bride:
For sure a girl so sweet, so kind,
Such a sincere and lovely mind,
Where each exalted virtue shines,
Could never spring from vulgar loins.
No, no, some chief of great Arfaces' line,
Has form'd her lineaments divine;
Who Rome's imperial fasces broke,
And spurn'd the nation's galling yoke,
Though now, oh! sad reverse of fate,
The former lustre of her royal state,
She sees injurious time deface,
And weeps the ravish'd sceptres of her race.

Her melting eye and slender waist,
Fair tap'ring from the swelling breast,
All nature's charms, all nature's pride,
Whate'er they show, whate'er they hide,
I own.—But swear by bright Apollo,
Whose priest I am, nought, nought can follow

Suspect not thou a poet's praise,
Unhurt I hear, uninjur'd gaze :
Alas! such badinage but ill would suit
A married man, and forty years to boot.

HORACE, BOOK II. ODE XVI. IMITATED.

TO THE EARL OF M——T.

EASE from the gods the sailor prays,
O'ertaken in the Ægean seas,
When storms begin to roar;
When clouds wrap up the moon from sight,
Nor shine the stars with certain light,
To guide him safe to shore,

Ease, fierce the Russian in war's trade:
Ease, graceful in his tartan plaid,
The highlander demands,
M——t, not to be bought or sold,
For purple, precious gems, or gold,
Or wide and large command.

For nor can wealth, nor golden mace,
Borne high before the great in place,
Make cares stand out o' the way;
The anxious tumults of the mind,
That round the palace unconfined,
Still roam by night and day.

Rich he lives on small, whose board
Shines with frugal affluence stor'd,
The wealth his fire possest;
Nor fear to lose, creates him pain,
Nor fordid love of greater gain,
Can break his easy rest.

Why do we draw too strong the bow,
Beyond our end our hopes to throw,
For warm with other suns
Why change our clime? to ease his toil,
What exile from his native soil,
From self an exile runs.

For vicious care the ship ascends,
On the way-faring troupe attends
First of the company:
Swifter than harts that seek the floods,
Swifter than roll wind driven clouds
Along the middle sky.

Glad in the present hour, a mind
Disdains the care beyond, assign'd
To all, content at heart;
Tempers of life the bitter cup,
With sweetning mirth, and drinks it up,
None blest in every part.

Dwindl'd thy fire in slow old age,
Young K——m from off this stage
Was ravish'd in his prime:
The hour perhaps benign to me,
Will grant what it denies to thee,
And lengthen out my time.

A numerous herd thy vallies fills,
The cattle on a thousand hills,
That low around are thine.
The well-pair'd mares, thy gilded car,
Draw through the streets, thyself from far,
In richest silks to shine,

Conspicuous seen: To me my fate,
Not much to blame, a small estate,
Of rural acres few:
A slender portion of the muse
Bounteous besides, the grace allows,
To scorn th' ill thinking crew.

HORACE BOOK IV. ODE I. IMITATED.

VENUS! call'st thou once more to arms?
Sound'st thou once more thy dire alarms?
Annoy'st my peaceful state again——
Oh, faith of treaties sworn in vain!
Seal'd with the signet of thy doves,
And ratify'd by all the loves.
Spare, Goddess! I implore, implore!
Alas! thy suppliant is no more
What once he was in happier time,
(Illustrated by many a rhyme)
When, skill'd in every ruling art,
Good A*s sway'd his yielding heart:
Love's champion then, and known to fame,
He boasted no inglorious name.
Now, cruel mother of desires!
That doubts and anxious joys inspires,
Ah why so long diffus'd, again
Leviest thou thy dreadful train;
That, when in daring fights he toil'd,
So oft his youthful ardor foil'd?
Oh! let thy hostile fury cease,
Thy faithful veteran rest in peace,
In the laborious service worn,
His arms decay'd, and ensigns torn.

Go, go, swan-wing'd! through liquid air,
Where the bland breath of youthful pray'r
Recals thee from the long delay,
And weeping, chides thee for thy stay.
My lowly roof, that knows no state,
Can't entertain a guest so great:
In P*th's dome, majestic queen,
With better grace thou shalt be seen,
If worthy of the Cyprian dart,
Thou seek'st to pierce a lovely heart
For he to noble birth has join'd
A graceful form and gentle mind;
And to subdue a virgin breast
The youth with thousand arts is blest;
Nor silent in his country's cause,
The anxious guardian of her laws.
He, in thy noblest warfare try'd,
Shall spread thy empire far and wide;
Confirm the glories of thy reign;
And not a glance shall fall in vain.
Then, when each rival shall submit
The prize of beauty and of wit,
And riches yield to fair desert
The triumph of a female heart;
Grateful thy marble form shall stand,
Fair breathing from the sculptor's hand,
Below the temple's pillar'd pride,
Fast by a sacred fountain's side.
Where Tweed sports round each winding maze,
There song shall warble, incense blaze;
Nor dumb shall rest the silver lyre,
To animate the festive choir.
There twice a-day fond boys shall come,
And tender virgins in their bloom,

(With fearful awe and infant shame)
 To call upon thy hallow'd name,
 As thrice about the wanton round
 With snowy feet they lightly bound.
 —For me no beauty now invites,
 Long recreant to the soft delights.
 Lost to the charming arts that move,
 Ah, dare I hope a mutual love!
 The fond belief, of pleasing pain,
 That hopes, fears, doubts, and hopes again.
 No wreaths upon my forehead bloom,
 Where flow'rs their vernal souls consume,
 No more the reigning toast I claim:
 I yield the fierce contended name,
 Though daring once to drink all up,
 While Bacchus could supply the cup.
 Farewell, delusive idle power!

" Welcome, contemplation's hour.
 " Now, now I search, neglected long,
 " The charms that lie in moral song,
 " How to assuage the boiling blood,
 " The lessons of the wise and good;
 " Now with fraternal sorrows mourn;
 " Now pour the tear o'er friendship's urn;
 " Or higher raise the wish refin'd,
 " The generous pray'r for human kind;
 " Or anxious for my Britain's fate,
 " To freedom beg a longer date,
 " To calm her more than civil rage,
 " And spare her yet one other age,
 " These, these the labours I pursue:
 " Fantastic love! a long adieu."

—Yet why, O bounteous  , why,
 Heaves the long forgotten sigh?
 Why, down my cheeks, when you appear,
 Steals drop by drop th' unbidden tear?
 Once skill'd to breathe the anxious vow,
 Why fails my tongue its master now,
 And, fault'ring, dubious strives in vain
 The tender meaning to explain?
 Why, in the visions of the night,
 Rises thy image to my sight?
 Now seized, thy much lov'd form I hold,
 Now lose again the transient fold;
 Unequal, panting far behind,
 Pursue thee fleetier than the wind,
 Whether the dear delusion strays
 Through fair Hope-park's enchanting maze,
 Or where thy cruel phantom glides
 Along the swiftly running tides.

HORACE, BOOK I. EPISTLE XVIII. IMITATED.

DEAR Ramsay, if I know thy soul aright,
 Plain-dealing honesty's thy dear delight:
 Not great, but candid born; not rich, but free;
 Thinks kings most wretched, and most happy me:
 Thy tongue untaught to lie, thy knee to bend,
 I fear no flatt'rer where I wish a friend.
 As the chaste matron's tender look and kind,
 Where sits the soul to speak the yearning mind,
 From the false colouring of the wanton shows
 Th' unhallow'd roses and polluted snows,
 A glare of beauty, nauseous to the sight,
 Gross but to feed desire, not raise delight:
 So differs far, in value, use and end,
 The praising foe from the reproving friend,

Such distance lies between, nay greater far,
 Who bears an honest heart, or bears a star.
 A fault there is, but of another sort,
 That aims by nastiness to make its court;
 By downright rudeness would attempt to please,
 And sticks his friendship on your lips in grease:
 With him (for such were Sparta's rigid rules)
 All the polite are knaves; the cleanly, fools;
 Good humour for impertinence prevails;
 So strangely honest—he'll not pair his nails.
 Know, virtuous Sir, if not indeed a slave
 Yet, sordid as the thing, thou art a knave;
 Virtue, its own, and every plain man's guide,
 Serenely walks with vice on every side,
 Keeps its own course, to its own point does bend,
 To follies deaf that call from either end.
 This simple maxim should a statesman doubt,
 Two characters shall make it plainly out.
 The first is his (the opposite of proud),
 By far more humble than a Christian should,
 Pursues, distasteful of plain sober cheer,
 Th' inhospitable dinner of a peer;
 Usurps, without the task of saying grace,
 The poor starv'd chaplain's perquisites and place;
 To vice gives virtue, to old age gives youth;
 So well bred he—he never spoke one truth:
 With watchful eyes sits full against my lord,
 And catches, as it falls, each heavy word;
 That, echo'd back, and sent from lungs more able,
 Assumes new force, and bandies round the table.
 All stare: "Was ever thing so pretty spoke?"
 You'd almost swear it was his Grace's joke.
 Yet such as these divide the great man's store,
 And flatter out the friendless and the poor.

Nor less the fool our censure must engage,
 Whom every trifle rouses into rage.
 He arms for all, so fierce the wordy war,
 Labeo far less tenacious at the bar;
 Words heap'd on words so fast together drive,
 Like clustering bees that darken from the hive,
 He fights, alas! what mortal dares confute him?
 With tongue, hand, eyes, and every inch about him?
 Deny me this; ah! rather than comply
 A thing so plain,—I'd sooner starve or die.
 But, pray, what all this mighty fury draws?
 Say, raves the patriot o'er expiring laws?
 Say, on th' oppressor does his anger fall?
 Pleads he for the distress'd, like good Newhall?
 Against corruption does his vengeance rise?
 The army; or the general excise?
 On trifling themes like these our man is mute,
 As S———, if fee-less you present your suit.
 More sacred truths his zealous rage supply;
 What all acknowledge, or what all deny:
 If rogues in red are worse than rogues in lawn;
 Or  be as great a dunce as —;
 Or if our Hannibal's fam'd Alpine road,
 Be thirty foot, or five and thirty broad.

The vicious man, though in the worst degree,
 His neighbour thinks more vicious still than he.
 Is there whom lawless love should bring to gallows?
 He cries, what vengeance wait on perjur'd fellows?
 Ruchead, who pin'd amidst his boundless store,
 Cou'd wonder why rich Selkirk wish'd for more:
 The youthful knight, who squanders all away,
 On whores, on equipage, on dress and play;
 The man who thirsts and hungers after gold;
 The tripping tradesman, and the merchant bold,

Whom fear of poverty compels to fly
Through seas, excisemen, rocks, oaths, perjury;
Start at each others crimes with pious fright,
Yet think themselves for ever in the right.

But above all, the rogue of wealth exclaims,
And calls the poorer sinner filthy names;
Though his foul soul, discolour'd all within,
Has deeper drank the tincture of each sin:
Or else advises, as the mother sage
Rebukes the hopes and torment of her age,
(And faith, though insolent of wealth, in this Methinks, good friend, he talks not much amiss)
"Yield, yield, O fool, to my superior merit,
"Without a sixpence thou, and sin with spirit?
"For me those high adventures kept by fate;
"For crimes look graceful with a large estate:
"Then cease, vain madman, and contend no more;
"Heav'n meant thee virtuous when it made thee
"poor."

But crimes like these to gold we can forgive;
What boots it how they die or how they live?
Then weep, my friend, when wicked wealth you
To change the species of the virtuous mind. [find,
You've doubtless heard how 'twas a statesman's way,
Whene'er he would oblige, that is, betray,
Invited first the destin'd prey to dine,
Then whisper'd in his ear, "You must be fine:
"Fine clothes, gay equipage, a splendid board
"Give youth a lustre, and become a lord.
"Why loiter meanly in paternal grounds,
"To neighbours owe thy ease, thy health to
"hounds!"

"Go roam about in gilded chariot hurl'd; [world:
"Make friends of strangers, child, and learn the
"These kind instructors teach you best of any,
"The wise Sir William, and the good Lord Fanny."
Guileless he hears of pension and of place,
Then sinks in honour as he swells in lace;
Each hardy virtue yields, and, day by day,
Melts in the sunshine of a court away.
At first (not every manly thought resign'd)
He wonders why he dares not tell his mind;
Feels the last footsteps of retiring grace,
And virtuous blushes ling'ring on his face:
The artful tempter plies the slavish hour,
And works the gudgeon now within his pow'r;
Then tips his fellow statesman, "He'll assume
"New modes of thinking in the drawing-room;
"See idle dreams of greatness strike his eyes,
"See pensions, ribbons, coronets arise."
"The man, whom labour only could delight,
"Shall loiter all the day, and feast all night:
"Who, mild, did once the kindest nature boast,
"Unmov'd shall riot at the orphan's cost;
"To pleasures vile, that health and fame destroy,
"Yield the domestic charm, the social joy.
"See, charm'd no more with Maro's rural page,
"He slumbers over Lucan's free born rage.
"Each action in inverted lights is seen;
"Meanness, frugality; and freedom, spleen;
"How foolish Cato! Cæsar how divine!
"In spite of Tully, friend to Catiline."
Thus to each fair idea long unknown,
The slave of each man's vices and his own,
Inroll'd a member of the hireling tribe,
He tow'rs to villany's last act, a bribe,
And turns to make his ruin'd fortune's clear,
Or gamester, bully, jobber, pimp, or peer

Till, late refracted through a purer air,
The beams of royal favour fall elsewhere:
Lo, vile, obscure he ends his bustling day,
All stain'd the lustre of his orient ray;
And envies, poor, unpity'd, scorn'd by all,
Marchmont the glories of a gen'rous fall.
Such sad examples can this land afford?
Why 'tis the history of many a Lord.

But you, perhaps, think odd whate'er I say;
Yet drink with such originals each day.
Then censure we no more, too daring friend,
Whom Scandalum Magnatum may offend.
How poor a figure should a poet make,
Ta'en into custody for scribbling's sake?
Ah how! (you know the muses never pay)
With all his verses earn five pounds a-day?
Leave we to Pope each knave of high degree,
Sing we such rules as suit or you or me.
Then, first, into no others secrets pry;
To such be deaf your ear, be blind your eye:
Of these, unask'd, why shou'd you claim a share?
But keep these safe intrusted to your care.
For this, beware the cunning low design,
That takes advantage of your rage or wine;
For rage no pause of cooler thought affords,
Is rash, intem'rate, headlong in its words.
Lock fast your lips, then, guard whate'er you say,
Lest in the fit of passion you betray;
And dread the wretch, who boasts the fatal pow'r
To cheat in friendship's unsuspecting hour.

There is a certain pleasing force that binds,
Faster than chains do slaves, two willing minds.
Tempers oppos'd each may it self controul,
And melt two varying natures in one soul.
This made two brothers diff'rent humours hit,
Though one had probity, and one had wit.
Of sober manners this, and plain good sense,
Avoided cards, wine, company, expence;
Safe from the tempting fatal sex withdrew,
Nor made advances further than a bow.
A diff'rent train of life his twin pursues;
Lov'd pictures, books, (nay authors write) the stews,
A mistress, op'ra, play, each darling theme;
To scribble, above all, his joy supreme.
Must these two brothers always meet to scold,
Or quarrel, like to Jove's fam'd twins of old?
Each yielding, mutual, could each other please,
And drew life's yoke with tolerable ease:
This thinking mirth not always in the wrong,
Wou'd sometimes condescend to hear a song;
And that, fatigu'd with his exalted fits,
His beauties, gewgaws, whirlegigs and wits,
Would leave them all, far happier, to regale
With prose and friendship o'er a pot of ale.
Then to thy friend's opinion sometimes yield,
And seem to lose, altho' thou gain'st the field;
Nor, proud that thy superior sense be shown,
Rail at his studies, and extol your own.
For when Aurora weeps the balmy dew,
(And dreams, as rev'rend dreamers tell, are true)
Sir George my shoulder flaps, just in the time
When some rebellious word consents to rhyme:
Sudden my verses take the rude alarm,
New-coin'd, and from the mint of fancy warm!
I start, I stare, I question with my eyes;
At once the whole poetic vision flies.
Up, up, exclaims the knight; the season fair;
See how serene the sky, how calm the air;

Hark! from the hills the cheerful horns rebound,
And echo propagates the jovial sound;
The certain hound in thought his prey pursues,
The scent lies warm, and loads the tainted dews,
I quit my couch, and cheerfully obey,
Content to let the younker have his way;
I mount my courser, fleetier than the wind,
And leave the rage of poetry behind.
But when, the day in healthful labour lost,
We eat our supper earn'd at common cost; [troul,
When each frank tongue speaks out without con-
And the free heart expatiates o'er the bowl;
Though all love prose, my poetry finds grace,
And, pleas'd, I chant the glories of the chase.

Of old, when Scotia's sons for empire fought,
Ere av'rice had debas'd each gen'rous thought,
Ere yet, each manlier exercise forgot,
One half had learn'd to dose, one half to vote,
Each hardy toil confirm'd their dawning age,
And mimic fights inspir'd to martial rage:
'Twas theirs with certain speed the dart to send,
With youthful force the stubborn yew to bend;
O'er came with early arm the fiercest floods,
Or rang'd 'midst chilling snows the pathless woods;
Toil'd for the savage boar on which they fed:
'Twas thus the chief of Bannockburn was bred:
That gave (not polish'd then below mankind)
Strength to the limbs, and vigour to the mind.
The smiling dame, in those victorious days,
Was woo'd by valour, not seduc'd by praise;
Who ne'er did fears, but for her country, feel,
And never saw her lover, but in steel;
Could make a Douglas' stubborn bosom yield,
And send her hero raging to the field;
Heard kind the honest warrior's one-tongu'd vow,
Pleas'd with the genuine heart, as H is now.
How would the gen'rous lass detest to see
An effenc'd fopling puling o'er his tea;
Ah how, distasteful of the mimic show,
Disdain the false appearance, as a foe!
'To greet, unfolding ev'ry social charm,
Her soldier from the field of glory warm.

But now, alas! these gen'rous aims are o'er;
Each foe insults, and Britain fights no more.
Yet humbler tasks may claim the patriot's toil:
Who aids her laws no more, may mend her foil.
Since, to be happy, man must ne'er be still,
'Th' internal void let peaceful labours fill;
When kind amusements hours of fame employ,
The working mind subsides to sober joy:
Behold, in fair autumnal honours spread,
The wheaten garland wreath the laurell'd head:
Where stagnant waves did in dull lakes appear,
Rich harvests wave, the bounty of the year;
In barren heaths, where summer never smil'd,
The rural city rises o'er the wild;
Along the cool canal, or shooting grove,
Disport the sons of mirth and gamefome love.

It now remains I counsel, if indeed
My counsel, friend, can stand thee ought in stead.
Judge well of whom you speak; nor will you find
It always safe to tell each man your mind.
Even honesty regard to safety owes;
Nor need it publish all it thinks and knows.
'Th' eternal quest'ner shun; a certain rule,
There is no blab like to the quest'ning fool;
Even scarce before you turn yourself about,
Whate'er he hears his leaky tongue runs out;

The word elanc'd no longer we controul,
Once fally'd forth, it bursts from pole to pole.

Guard well your heart, ah! still be beauty-proof
Beneath fair friendship's venerable roof,
What though she shines the brightest of the fair,
A form even such as Wallace self might wear!
What though no rocks, nor marble arm her breast,
A yielding Helen to her Trojan guest,
The dangerous combat fly: why wouldst thou gain
A shameful conquest won by years of pain?
For know, the short-liv'd guilty rapture past,
Reflection comes a dreadful judge at last:
'Tis that avenges (such its pointed stings)
The poor man's cause on statesmen and on kings.

To praise aright, is sure no easy art;
Yet prudence here directs the wise-man's part.
Let long experience then confirm the friend,
Dive to his depth of soul, ere you commend.
Should you extol the fool but slightly known,
Guileless you blush for follies not your own.
Alas! we err: for villains can betray,
And gold corrupt the saint of yesterday.
Then shield, convicted by the public voice,
And frankly own the weakness of your choice;
So greater credit shall your judgment gain,
When you defend the worth that knaves arraign;
Whose soul secure, confiding in your aid,
Hopes the kind shelter of your friendly shade;
When envy on his spotless name shall fall,
Whose venom'd tooth corrupts and blackens all;
This mutual help the kindred virtues claim;
For calumny eats on from fame to fame.
When o'er thy neighbour's roof the flames aspire,
Say, claims it not thy care to quench the fire?
When envy rages, small the space betwixt,
In worth ally'd, thy character is next.

Fir'd at the first with what the great impart,
Frank we give way, and yield up all the heart.
How sweet the converse of the potent friend!
How charming when the mighty condescend!
The smile so affable, the courtly word!—
And, as we would a mistress, trust a lord.
Th' experienc'd dread the cheat; with prudent care
Distrust alike the powerful and the fair.
Thou, when thy vessel flies before the wind,
Think on the peaceful port thou left behind;
Though all serene, yet bear a humble sail,
Lest veering greatness shift the treach'rous gale.
How various man! yet such are nature's laws,
With pow'rful force each diff'rent humour draws.
The grave the cheerful hate; these hate the sad;
Your sober wise man thinks the wit quite mad;
He, happy too in wit's inverted rule,
Thinks every sober wise man more than fool;
Whose active mind from toil to toil can run,
And join the rising to the setting sun,
Like Philip's son for fame, pursuing gains
While yet one penny unsubdu'd remains;
Admires how lovers waste th' inactive day,
Sigh, mid't the fair, their gentle souls away.
The tuneful bard, who boasts his vary'd strains,
Shares with the lark the glory of the plains,
Whose life th' impression of no sorrow knows,
So smoothly calm, he scarcely feels it flows.
In vocal woods each fond conceit pursues,
Pleas'd with the glingling bauble of a muse,
Pities the toiling madman's airy scheme,
When greatness sickens o'er th' ambitious dream;

Each boon companion, who the night prolongs,
In noise and rapture, festivals and songs,
Condemns the graver mortal for an ass,
Who dares refuse his bumper and his lass;
Still urging on, what boots it that you swear
You dread the vapours and nocturnal air;
Yet grant a little to the social vine,
Full on the friend with cloudless visage shine,
Oft fullen silence speaks a want of sense,
Or folly lurks beneath the wise pretence.
Is there severe, who baulks the genial hour?
He's not so sober, were he not so four.

But above all, I charge thee o'er and o'er,
Fair peace through all her secret haunts explore;
Consult the learn'd in life, (these best advise)
The good in this, more knowing than the wise,
Their sacred science learn, and what the art
To guard the sallies of th' impetuous heart;
With temper due th' internal poise to keep,
Not soaring impudent, nor servile creep;
How sure thyself, thy friends, thy God to please,
Firm health without, within unshaken peace;
Lest keen desire, still making new demands,
Should raise new foes unnumber'd on thy hands:
Or hope, or fear inspire th' unmanly groan,
For things of little use, perhaps of none.
Who best can purchase virtue's righteous dow'r,
The sage with wisdom, or the king with pow'r:
Or if the mighty blessing stands confin'd,
To the chaste nature and the heav'n-taught mind;
And chief th' important lesson wise attend,
What makes thee to thyself thyself's best friend:
If gold a pure tranquillity bestows,
Or greatness can insure a night's repose;
Or must we seek it in the secret road
That leads through virtue to the peaceful God;
A shaded walk, where, separate from the throng,
We steal through life all unperceiv'd along.

For me, afraid of life's tempestuous gale,
I make to port, and crowd on all my sail.
Soon may the peaceful grove and shelter'd seat
Receive me weary in the kind retreat;
Blest if my * be the destin'd shade,
Where childhood sported of no ills afraid,
Ere youth full grown its daring wing display'd. }
That often cross'd by life's intestine war,
Forefaw that day of triumph from afar,
When warring passions mingling in the fray,
Had drawn the youthful wand'rer from his way:
But recollecting the short error, mourn'd,
And duteous to the warning voice return'd.
No more the passions hurrying into strife,
My soul enjoys the gentler calms of life.
Like Tityrus, blest'd among the rural shades,
Whose hallow'd round no guilty wish invades;
No joy tumultuous, no depressing care;
All that I want is Amaryllis there;
While silver Forth each fair meander leads
Through breathing harvests and empurpl'd meads;
Whose russet swains enjoy the golden dream,
And thankful blest the plenty-giving stream.
There youth, convinc'd, forgoes each daring claim,
And settling manhood takes a surer aim;
Till age accomplish late the fair design,
And calm possess the good, if age be mine.
What think'st thou then, my friend, shall be my cares,
My daily studies, and my nightly pray'rs?

Of the propitious Pow' er this boon I crave,
Still to preserve the little that I have;
Nor yet repugnance at the lot express,
Should fate decree that little to be less,
That what remains of life to heav'n I live,
If life indeed has any time to give:
Or, if the fug'tive will no longer stay,
To part as friends should do, and slip away:
Thankful to heav'n, or for the good supply'd,
To heav'n submissive for the good deny'd;
Renounce the household charm, a bliss divine!
Heav'n never meant for me, and I resign:
In other joys th' allotted hours improve,
And gain in friendship what was lost in love:
Some comfort snatch'd, at each vain year return'd,
When nature suffer'd, or when friendship mourn'd,
Of all that stock so fatally bereft,
Once youth's proud boast, alas! the little left;
These friends, in youth belov'd, in manhood try'd,
Age must not change through avarice or pride:
For me let wisdom's sacred fountain flow,
The cordial draught that sweetens every woe:
Let fortune kind, the just enough provide,
Nor dubious float on hope's uncertain tide:
Add thoughts compos'd, affections ever even.—
Thus far suffices to have ask'd of heaven,
Who, in the dispensations of a day, [away:
Grants life, grants death; now gives, now takes
To scaffold oft the ribbon'd spoiler brings;
Takes power from statesmen, and their thrones
from kings;
From the unthankful heart the bliss decreed—
But leaves the man of worth still blest'd indeed:
Be life heav'n's gift, be mine the care to find,
Still equal to itself, the balanc'd mind;
Fame, beauty, wealth forgot, each human toy,
With thoughtful quiet pleas'd, and virtuous joy;
In these, and these alone, supremely blest,
When fools and madmen scramble for the rest.

PINDAR'S OLYMPIA.

ODE I. TRANSLATED *.

WATER, great principle where nature springs,
The prime of elements, and first of things,
Amidst proud riches' soul-inflaming store,
As through the night the fiery blaze
Pours all around the streaming rays,
Conspicuous glows the golden oar.
But if thee, O my soul, a fond desire
To sing the contests of the great,
Calls forth t' awake th' etherial fire,
What subject worthier of the lyre,
Olympia's glories to relate!
Full in the forehead of the sky,
The sun, the world's bright radiant eye,
Shines o'er each lesser flame;
On earth what theme suffices more
To make the muses' offspring soar,
Than the Olympian victor's fame?
But from the swelling column, where on high
It peaceful hangs, take down the Doric lyre,

* Lyricorum longè Pindarus princeps, spiritus magnificentiâ, sententiis, figuris, beatissima rerum verborumque copâ, et velut quodam eloquentiæ flumine; profertur quæ Horatius cum merito credit nemini imitabilem. Quintil. Instit. Orat. lib. x. cap. I.

If with sweet love of sacred melody,
 The steeds of Hiero thy breast inspire.
 When borne along the flow'ry fide,
 Where smooth Alpheus' waters glide,
 Their voluntary virtue flies,
 Nor needs the driver's rousing cries,
 But rapid sieze the dusty space,
 To reap the honours of the race
 The merit of their speed ;
 And bind, with laurel wreath, the manly brows
 Of him, the mighty king of Syracuse,
 Delighting in the victor steed.
 Far found his glory through the winding coast
 Of Lydia, where his wand'ring host
 From Elis, Pelops led to new abodes ;
 There prosper'd in his late found reign,
 Lov'd by the ruler of the main ;
 When, at the banquet of the gods,
 In the pure laver of the fates again,
 Clotho, the youth to life renew'd,
 With potent charm and mystic strain,
 When, by his cruel father slain,
 With ivory shoulder bright endow'd.
 Oft fables with a fond surprise,
 When shaded o'er with fair disguise,
 The wand'ring mind detain ;
 Deluded by the kind deceit,
 We joy more in the skilful cheat
 Than in truth's faithful strain.
 But chief to verse these wond'rous pow'rs belong,
 Such grace has heaven bestowed on song ;
 Blest parent ! from whose loins immortal joys,
 To mitigate our pain below,
 Soft'ning the anguish of our woe,
 Are sprung, the children of its voice :
 Song can o'er unbelief itself prevail,
 The virtue of its magic art,
 Can make the most amazing tale,
 With shafts of eloquence assail,
 Victorious, the yielding heart :
 But time, on never-ceasing wings,
 Experienc'd wisdom slowly brings,
 And teaches mortal race
 Not to blaspheme the Holy One
 That, deathless, fills the heav'nly throne,
 Inhabiting eternal space.
 Therefore, O son of Tantalus, will I
 In other guise thy wond'rous tale unfold,
 And juster to the rulers of the sky,
 With lips more hallow'd than the bards of old.
 For when thy fire, the gods above,
 To share the kind return of love,
 Invited from their native bow'rs,
 To his own lov'd Sipylian tow'rs,
 The trident pow'r, by fierce desire,
 Subdu'd, on golden steeds of fire
 Thee bore aloft to Jove on high ;
 Where, since young Ganymede, sweet Phrygian
 Succeeded to the ministry of joy, [boy,
 And nectar banquet of the sky.
 But when no more on earth thy form was seen,
 Conspicuous in the walks of men,
 Nor yet to sooth thy mother's longing sight,
 The searching train sent to explore
 Thy lurking place, could thee restore,
 The weeping fair's supreme delight :
 Then Envy's forked tongue began t' infest
 And wound thy fire's untainted fame,

That he to each ethereal guest
 Had serv'd thee up a horrid feast,
 Subdu'd by force of all-devouring flame ;
 But, the blest pow'rs of heav'n t' accuse,
 Far be it from the holy muse,
 Of such a feast impure ;
 Vengeance protracted for a time,
 Still overtakes the fland'ers crime,
 At heaven's slow appointed hour.
 Yet certain, if the Pow'r who wide surveys,
 From his watch-tow'r, the earth and seas,
 E'er dignify'd the perishable race ;
 Him, Tantalus they rais'd on high,
 Him, the chief fav'rite of the sky,
 Exalted to sublimest grace.
 But his proud heart was lifted up and vain,
 Swell'd with his envy'd happiness,
 Weak and frail his mortal brain,
 The lot superior to sustain,
 He fell degraded from his blifs.
 For on his head th' Almighty Sire,
 Potent in his kindled ire,
 Hung a rock's monstrous weight :
 Too feeble to remove the load,
 Fix'd by the sanction of the God,
 He wand'ring erring from delight.
 The watchful synod of the skies decreed
 His wasted heart a prey to endless woes,
 Condemn'd a weary pilgrimage to lead,
 On earth secure, a stranger to repose.
 Because, by mad ambition driv'n,
 He robb'd the sacred stores of heav'n :
 Th' ambrosial vintage of the skies
 Became the daring spoiler's prize,
 And brought to sons of mortal earth,
 The banquet of celestial birth,
 With endless blessings fraught ;
 And to his impious rev'lers pour'd the wine,
 Whose precious sweets make blest the pow'rs divine,
 Gift of the rich immortal draught.
 Foolish the man who hopes his crimes may lie
 Unseen by the supreme all-piercing eye :
 He, high enthron'd above all heav'ns height,
 The works of men with broad survey,
 And, as in the blazing flame of day,
 Beholds the secret deeds of night.
 Therefore his son the immortals back again
 Sent to these death-obnoxious abodes,
 To taste his share of human pain,
 Exil'd from the celestial reign,
 And sweet communion of the gods.
 But when the fleecy down began
 To clothe his chin, and promise man,
 The shafts of young desire,
 And love of the fair female kind,
 Inflam'd the youthful hero's mind,
 And set his amorous soul on fire.
 Won by fair Hippodamia's lovely eyes,
 The Pisan tyrant's blooming prize,
 High in his hopes he purpos'd to obtain ;
 O'ercome her savage fire in arms,
 The price of her celestial charms :
 For this the ruler of the main
 Invoking in the dreary solitude,
 And secret season of the night ;
 Oft, on the margin of the flood
 Alone, the raging lover stood,
 Till to his long-desiring sight,

From below the sounding deeps,
 His scaly herds where Proteus keeps,
 The fav'rite youth to please,
 Dividing swift the hoary stream,
 Refulgent on his golden team, [seas.
 Appear'd the trident-scepter'd king of
 To whom the youth: If e'er with fond delight,
 The gifts of Venus could thy soul inspire,
 Restrain fell Oenemaüs' spear in fight;
 And me, who dare advent'rous to aspire,
 Me grant, propitious, to succeed,
 Enduing with unrivall'd speed
 The flying car, decreed to gain
 The laurel wreath, on Elis' plain,
 Victorious o'er the father's pow'r;
 Who dire, so many hapless lovers slain,
 Does still a maid the wond'rous fair detain,
 Protractive of the sweet connubial hour.
 Danger demands a soul secure of dread,
 Equal to the daring deed!
 Since then th' immutable decrees of fate,
 Have fix'd, by their vicegerent death,
 The limits of each mortal breath,
 Doom'd to the urn, or soon or late:
 What mind resolv'd and brave would sleep away
 His life, when glory warms the blood,
 Only t' enjoy some dull delay,
 Inactive to his dying day,
 Not aiming at the smallest good?
 But the blooming maid inspires
 My breast to far sublimer fires,
 To raise my glory to the skies:
 Gracious, O fav'ring pow'r! give ear,
 Indulgent to my vow sincere,
 Prosp'ring the mighty enterprise.
 So pray'd the boy: nor fell his words in vain,
 Unheeded by the ruler of the main;
 A golden car, earth's shaking pow'r bestow'd,
 And to the glitt'ring axle join'd
 Unrivall'd steeds, fleet as the wind:
 Glad of the present of the god,
 The ardent youth demands the promis'd fight:
 In dust, the haughty parent laid,
 Neptune fulfils the youth's delight,
 And wings his chariot's rapid flight,
 To win the sweet celestial maid.
 She, with six sons, a fair increase,
 Crown'd the hero's warm embrace,
 Whom virtue's love inspir'd;
 Upright to walk in virtue's ways,
 The surest path to noblest praise,
 The noblest praise the youth acquir'd.
 Now by Alpheus' stream, meand'ring fair,
 Whose humid train wide spreads the Pisan plains,
 A sepulchre, sublimely rear'd in air,
 All, of the mighty man that was, contains.
 There frequent in the holy shade,
 The vows of stranger-chiefs are paid,
 And on the sacred altar lies
 The victim, smoking to the skies;
 When heroes, at the solemn shrine,
 Invoke the pow'rs with rites divine,
 From every distant soil,
 And drive about the consecrated mound
 The sounding car, or on the list'd ground
 Urge the fleet racers, or the wrestlers toi'.
 Happy the man whom fav'ring fate allows
 The wreaths of Pisa to surround his brows;

All wedded to delight, his after-days
 In calm and even tenor run,
 The noble dow'r of conquest won,
 Such conscious pleasure flows from praise.
 Thee, muse, great Hiero's virtue to prolong,
 It fits, and to resound his name:
 Exalting o'er the vulgar throng,
 In thy sweet Eolian song,
 His garland of Olympian fame.
 Nor shalt thou, O my muse! e'er find
 A more sublime or worthier mind,
 To better fortunes born:
 On whom the gracious love of God,
 The regal pow'r has kind bestow'd,
 And arts of sway, that power t' adorn.
 Still may thy God, O potent king! employ
 His sacred ministry of joy,
 Solicitous, with tutelary care,
 To guard from the attacks of fate
 Thy blessings, lasting as they're great,
 The pious poet's constant pray'r.
 Then to the mighty bounty of the sky,
 The muse shall add a sweeter lay,
 With wing sublime, when she shall flie
 Where Cronius rears his cliffs on high,
 Smote with the burning shafts of day;
 If the muses' quiver'd god
 Pave for song the even road,
 With sacred rapture warm,
 A further flight aloft in air
 Elanc'd, shall wing my tuneful spear,
 More vigorous from the muse's arm.
 To many heights the daring climber springs,
 Ere he the highest top of pow'r shall gain;
 Chief seated there the majesty of kings,
 The rest, at different steps, below remain:
 Exalted to that wondrous height,
 T' extend the prospect of delight,
 May'st thou, O Hiero! live content,
 On the top of all ascent.
 To thee, by bounteous fates, be giv'n
 T' inhabit still thy lofty heav'n:
 To me, in arts of peace,
 Still to converse with the fair victor host,
 For graceful song, an honourable boast,
 Conspicuous through the realms of Greece.

PINDAR'S OLYMPIA.

ODE II.

O SOVEREIGN hymns! that pow'rful reign
 In the harp, your sweet domain,
 Whom will ye choose to raise;
 What god shall now the verse resound;
 What chief, for godlike deed renown'd,
 Exalt to loftiest praise?
 Pisa is Jove's: Jove's conqu'ring son
 First the Olympic race ordain'd:
 The first fair fruits of glory won
 The haughty tyrant's rage restrain'd.
 He first the wond'rous game bestow'd,
 When breathing from Augean toils,
 He consecrates the dreadful spoils,
 An off'ring to his father-god.
 Theron, his virtues to approve,
 And imitate the seed of Jove,
 Th' Olympic laurel claims;

Whose swift-wheel'd car has borne away
 The rapid honours of the day,
 Foremost among the victor names.
 Therefore for Theron praise awaits,
 For him the lyre awakes the strain,
 The stranger welcom'd at his gates
 With hospitable love humane.
 Fix'd on the councils of his breast,
 As on the column's lofty height
 Remains secure the building's weight,
 The structure of his realm may rest.
 Of a fair stem, himself a fairer flow'r,
 Who soon transplanted from their native soil,
 Wander'd many climates o'er,
 Till, after long and various toil,
 On the fair river's destin'd bank they found
 Their sacred seat, and heav'n-chose ground;
 Where stood, delightful to the eye,
 The fruitful, beauteous Sicily,
 And could a num'rous issue boast, [the coast.
 That spread their lustre round, and flourish'd o'er
 The following years all took their silver flight,
 With pleasure wing'd and soft delight,
 And every year that flew in peace,
 Brought to their native virtues, store
 Of wealth and pow'r, a new increase, [more.
 Fate still confirm'd the sum, and bounteous added
 But son of Rhe' and Saturn old,
 Who dost thy sacred throne uphold
 On high Olympus' hill;
 Whose rule th' Olympic race obeys,
 Who guid'ft Alpheus' winding maze,
 In hymns delighting still;
 Grant, gracious to the godlike race,
 Their children's children to sustain,
 Peaceful through time's ne'er-ending space,
 The sceptre and paternal reign.
 For time, the aged sire of all,
 The deed impatient of delay,
 Which the swift hour has wing'd away,
 Just or unjust can ne'er recall.
 But when calmer days succeed,
 Of fair event and lovely deed,
 Our lot serene at last;
 The memory of darker hours,
 When heav'n severe and angry low'rs,
 Forgotten lies and past.
 Thus mild and lenient of his frown,
 When Jove regards our adverse fate,
 And sends his chosen blessings down
 To cheer below our mortal state:
 Then former evils, odious brood,
 Before the heav'n-born blessings fly,
 Or trodden down subjected lie,
 Soon vanquish'd by the victor-good.
 With thy fair daughters, Cadmus! best agrees
 The muse's song; who, after many woes
 At last on golden thrones of ease,
 Enjoy an undisturb'd repose.
 No more they think of Cadmus, mournful swain!
 Succeeding joys dispel his former pain.
 And Semele, of rosy hue,
 Whom the embracing thunderer slew,
 Exalted now to heav'n's abodes,
 Herself a goddess blythe, dwells with immortal
 Bath'd in ambrosial odours of the sky, [gods.
 Her long dishevell'd tresses fly:
 Her, Minerva still approves;

She is her prime and darling joy:
 Her, heav'n's Lord supremely loves;
 As does his rosy son, the ivy-crowned boy.
 Thou too! in pearly cells,
 Where Nereus' sea-green daughter dwells,
 Enjoy'ft a lot divine:
 No more of suff'ring mortal strain,
 An azure goddess of the main,
 Eternal rest is thine.
 Lost in a maze, blind feeble man,
 Knows not the hour he sure foresees,
 Nor with the eyes of nature can
 Pierce through the hidden deep decrees.
 Nor sees he if his radiant day,
 That in meridian splendour glows,
 Shall gild his ev'ning's quiet close,
 Soft smiling with a farewell ray.
 As when the ocean's reflux tides,
 Within his hollow womb subsides,
 Is heard to sound no more;
 Till rousing all its rage again,
 Flood roll'd on flood it pours amain,
 And sweeps the sandy shore:
 So fortune, mighty queen of life,
 Works up proud man, her destin'd slave,
 Of good and ill the stormy strife,
 The sport of her alternate wave;
 Now mounted to the height of bliss,
 He seems to mingle with the sky;
 Now looking down with giddy eye,
 Sees the retreating waters fly,
 And trembles at the deep abyss.
 As, by experience led, the searching mind
 Revolves the records of still-changing fate,
 Such dire reverses shall he find,
 Oft mark the fortunes of the great!
 Now bounteous gods, with blessings all divine,
 Exalt on high the sceptred line,
 Now the bright scene of laurell'd years,
 At once quick-shifting, disappears:
 And in their radiant room succeeds
 A dismal train of ills, and tyrannous misdeeds.
 Since the curst hour the fateful son
 Plung'd in the guilt he sought to shun,
 And saw beneath his hasty rage
 The hoary king, heav'n's victim, bleed;
 Deaf to a father's pleading age,
 His erring hands fulfill'd, what guilty fate decreed.
 Erynnis, dreadful fury! saw
 The breath of nature's holiest law,
 She mounts her hooked car;
 Through Phocis' death-devoted ground
 She flew, and gave the nations round
 To the wide waste of war:
 By mutual hands the brothers dy'd,
 Furious on mutual wounds they run;
 Sons, fathers, swell the sanguine tide;
 Fate drove the purple deluge on.
 Thus perish'd all the fated brood,
 Thus Eris wrought her dreadful will;
 When fated vengeance had its fill,
 Thersander clos'd the scene of blood.
 He, sprung from beauteous Argæa, shone,
 The glory of Adrastus' throne,
 When fierce in youthful fire,
 He rag'd around the Theban wall,
 And saw the sevenfold city fall
 A victim to his fire.

From him, as from a second root,
 Wide spreading to the lofty skies,
 The sons of martial glory shoot,
 And clust'ring chiefs on chiefs arise.
 There in the topmost boughs display'd,
 Great Theron sits with lustre crown'd,
 And verdant honours bloom around,
 While nations rest beneath his shade.
 Awake the lyre! Theron demands the lays,
 Yet all too low! Call forth a nobler strain!
 Decent is ev'n th' excess of praise:
 For Theron strike the sounding lyre again.
 Olympia's flow'ring wreath he singly wears;
 The Isthmian palm his brother shares.
 Delphi resounds the kindred name,
 The youths contend alike for fame,
 Fair rivals in the glorious chase, [giddy space.
 When twelve times darting round, they flew the Thrice blest! for whom the graces twine
 Fame's brightest plume, the wreath divine:
 Lost to remembrance, former woes
 No more reflection's sting employ;
 With triumph all the bosom glows,
 Pour'd through th' expanding heart, th' impetuous
 Riches, that singly are possess'd, [tide of joy.
 Vain pomp of life! a specious waste,
 But feed luxurious pride:
 Yet when with sacred virtues crown'd,
 Wealth deals its liberal treasures round,
 'Tis nobly dignify'd.
 To modest worth, to honour's bands,
 With conscious warmth he large imparts;
 And in his presence smiling stands
 Fair science, and her handmaid, arts.
 As in the pure serene of night,
 Thron'd in its sphere, a beauteous star
 Sheds its blest influence from afar
 At once beneficent and bright.
 But hear ye wealthy, hear ye great,
 I sing the fix'd decrees of fate,
 What after death remains,
 Prepar'd for the unfeeling kind
 Of cruel unrelenting mind,
 A doom of endless pains!
 The crimes that stain'd this living light,
 Beneath the holy eye of Jove,
 Meets in the regions drear of night,
 The vengeance but delay'd above.
 There the pale sinner drear aghast,
 Impartial, righteous, and severe,
 Unaw'd by pow'r, unmov'd by pray'r,
 Eternal justice dooms at last.
 Far otherwise the souls whom virtue guides
 Enjoy a calm repose of sacred rest,
 Nor light, nor shade, their time divides,
 With one eternal sunshine blest.
 Emancipated from the cares of life,
 No more they urge the mortal strife;
 No more with still-revolving toil,
 They vex a hard, ungrateful soil;
 Nor plow the furges of the main,
 Exchanging holy quiet for false deceitful gain.
 But to these sacred seats preferr'd,
 With gods they live, as gods rever'd,
 And tears are wip'd from every eye;
 While banish'd from the happy reign,
 The guilty souls in darkness lie,
 And weary out the frightful ministers of pain.

Vol. IX,

So heav'n decrees: The good and just,
 Who, true to life's important trust,
 Have well sustain'd the field;
 Whose souls undaunted, undismay'd,
 Nor flatt'ring pleasure could persuade,
 Nor passions taught to yield;
 These through the mortal changes past,
 Still list'ning to the heav'nly lore,
 Find this sublime reward at last,
 The trial of obedience o'er.
 Then bursting from the bonds of clay,
 Triumphant tread the heav'n-pav'd road
 That leads to Saturn's high abode,
 And Jove himself directs the way.
 There, where the blest reside at ease,
 Bland Zephyrs breathe the sea-born breeze
 O'er all the happy isle:
 Unnumber'd sweets the air perfume,
 'Tis all around one golden bloom,
 All one celestial smile.
 By living streams fair trees ascend,
 Whose roots the humid waters lave;
 The boughs with radiant fruitage bend,
 Rich produce of the fruitful wave.
 Thus sporting in celestial bow'rs,
 The sons of the immortal morn,
 Their heads and rosy hands adorn,
 With garlands of unfading flow'rs.
 There Rhadamanth, who great assessor reigns
 To Rhæa's son, by still unchanging right,
 Awarding all: To vice, eternal chains;
 To virtue opes the gates of light.
 Rhæa! who high in heav'n's sublime abodes
 Sits thron'd, the mother of the gods.
 Cadmus to this immortal choir
 Was led; and Peleus' noble fire!
 And glorious son! since Thetis' love
 Subdu'd with pray'r, the yielding mind of Jove.
 Who Troy laid prostrate on the plain,
 His country's pillar, Hector, slain;
 By whom unhappy Cygnus bled;
 By whom the Ethiopian boy,
 That sprung from Neptune's godlike bed,
 The aged Tithon's, and Aurora's highest joy.
 What grand ideas crowd my brain!
 What images! a lofty train
 In beauteous order spring:
 As the keen store of feather'd fates
 Within the braided quiver waits,
 Impatient for the wing:
 See, see they mount! The sacred few
 Endu'd with piercing flight,
 Alone through darling fields pursue
 Th' aerial regions bright.
 This nature gives, her chiefest boast;
 But when the bright ideas fly,
 Far soaring from the vulgar eye,
 To vulgar eyes are lost.
 Where nature sows her genial seeds,
 A lib'ral harvest straight succeeds,
 Fair in the human soil;
 While art, with hard laborious pains,
 Creeps on unseen, nor much attains,
 By slow progressive toil.
 Resembling this, the feeble crow,
 Amid the vulgar winged crowd,
 Hides in the dark'ning copse below,
 Vain, strutting, garrulous, and loud.

F f

While genius mounts th' etherial height,
 As th' imperial bird of Jove
 On sounding pinions soars above,
 And dares the majesty of light.
 Then fit an arrow to the tuneful string,
 O thou my Genius? warm with sacred flame;
 Fly swift, etherial shaft! and wing
 The godlike Theron unto fame.
 I solemn swear, and holy truth attest,
 That sole inspires the tuneful breast,
 That, never since th' immortal sun
 His radiant journey first begun,
 To none the gods did e'er impart
 A more exalted mind, or wide-diffusive heart.
 Fly, envy, hence, that durst invade
 Such glories, with injurious shade;
 Still, with superior lustre bright,
 His virtues shine, in number more
 Than are the radiant fires of night, [shore.
 Or sands that spread along the sea-surrounding

THE PARTING OF HECTOR AND ANDROMACHE.

FROM THE VI. ILIAD OF HOMER, TRANSLATED LITERALLY.

Beginning ver. 407. Δυσμάρτυς, φίλῳ τε τὸ σὸν μένος.

O DARING thou! to thy own strength a prey,
 Nor pity moves thee for thy infant son,
 Nor miserable me, a widow soon!
 For, rushing on thy single might, at once
 The Greeks will overwhelm thee: Better far
 I had been wrapt in earth, than live of thee
 Forlorn, and desolate; if thou must die,
 What further comfort then for me remains,
 What solace, but in tears? No father mine,
 Nor mine no venerable mother's care.
 Noble Achilles' hand my father flew,
 And spread destruction through Cilicia's town,
 Where many people dwelt, high-gated Thebes.
 He flew Aetion, but despoil'd him not,
 For inly in his mind he fear'd the gods;
 But burnt his body with his polish'd arms,
 And o'er him rear'd a mound: the mountain
 The daughters fair of Ege-bearing Jove, [nymphs,
 Planted with elms around the sacred place.
 Seven brothers flourish'd in my father's house;
 All in one day descended to the shades,
 All slain by great Achilles, swift of foot,
 'Midst their white sheep, and heifers flexile-hoof'd,
 My mother, woody Hypoplacia's queen,
 Brought hither, number'd in the victor's spoils;
 Till loos'd from bands, for gifts of mighty price,
 By chase-delighting Dian's dart she fell,
 Smote in my father's house: But, Hector, thou,
 Thou art my sire, my hoary mother thou,
 My brother thou, thou husband of my youth!
 Ah pity, Hector, then! and in this tow'r
 With us remain, nor render by thy fall
 Him a sad orphan, me a widow'd wife.
 Here at this fig-tree station, where the town
 Is easiest of ascent, and low the walls,
 Here thrice the bravest of the foes have try'd
 To pass; each Ajax, brave Idomeneus,
 Th' Atridae too, and Tydeus warlike son;
 Whether some seer, in divination skill'd,

Prompted th' attempt, or their own valour dar'd
 To execute a deed, their wisdom plan'd.

To whom plume-nodding Hector thus reply'd:
 These, woman, are my care; but much I fear
 The Trojan youth, and long-gown'd Trojan dames,
 If, coward-like, I shun afar the fight:
 Not so my courage bids; for I have learnt
 Still to be brave, and foremost to defend
 My father's mighty glories, and my own.
 For well I know, and in my mind foresee,
 A day will come, when sacred Ilion sinks,
 Old Priam perishes, the people too
 Of Priam aspen-spear'd: Yet not so much
 The woes the Trojans yet in after-times
 Must undergo, not Hecuba herself,
 Nor princely Priam, nor my brothers dear,
 Who numerous and brave, have fall'n in dust
 Below the boasting foe, distract my soul,
 As thou: Then when some brazen-coated Greek,
 In the sad day of thy distress shall drag
 Thee weeping; or in Argos, breathing sad,
 To some imperious mistress handmaid, thou
 Shalt weave the web, or fetch the water's weight
 From Meleis or Hyperia's springs, against
 Thy will, but hard necessity compells.
 Then shall he say, who sees thee sunk in tears,
 Lo! Hector's wife, who far the chief of all
 The Trojan steed subduing race excell'd
 Who fought at Ilion. Thus shall they say.
 But thee new pangs shall seize; on thee shall come
 Desire of such a husband, to repel
 The evil hour: but may I low beneath
 The monumental earth be laid to rest,
 Nor thy soft sorrows, nor the melting voice
 Of thy captivity e'er reach my ear.

So saying, the illustrious Hector stretch'd
 His hands to reach his child; the child averse,
 In the soft bosom of the fair zon'd nurse
 Weeping, fell back abhorrent, from his fire
 Of warlike aspect: for he fear'd the shine
 Of armour, and the horse-hair horrid crest
 That nodded dreadful on the helmet's top.
 The loving father smil'd, the mother smil'd;
 Strait from his head th' illustrious Hector took
 His helm, and plac'd it blazing on the ground;
 Then fondled in his arms his much-lov'd son
 He took; thus praying Jove, and all the gods.

Jove, and ye other gods, grant this my son,
 Grant he may too become, as I am now,
 The grace of Troy, the same in martial strength,
 And rule his Ilion with a monarch's sway;
 That men may say when he returns from fight,
 "This youth transcends his sire:" Then may he
 The bloody spoils aloft of hostile chiefs [bear
 In battle slain, and joy his mother's heart.

He said: and to his much-lov'd spouse resign'd
 His child; she, on her fragrant bosom lull'd
 Smiling through tears, receiv'd him: at the sight,
 Compassion touch'd her husband's heart; her cheek
 With gentle blandishment he stroak'd, and spoke:

O best beloved! oh sadden not thy heart
 With grief beyond due bounds: I trust, no hand
 Shall send me down to shades obscure, before
 My day of doom decreed; for well I ween
 No man of mortal men escapes from death,
 Fearful or bold: whoe'er is born must die.
 But thou returning to thy home, attend
 The spindle and the loom, thy peaceful cares,

And call thy duteous maidens round to share
Their tasks by thee assign'd; for war belongs
To men, and chief to me, of Ilion's sons.

This said, illustrious Hector seiz'd his helm,
And to her home return'd his much lov'd spouse,
Oft looking back, and shedding tears profuse.
Then sudden at the lofty dome arriv'd,
With chambers fair adorn'd, where Hector dwelt,
The godlike Hector! There again she wept!
In his own house the living Hector wept;
For now foreboding in their fears, no more
They hop'd to meet him with returning step
From battle 'scap'd the rage and force of Greece.

FIRST SCENE OF THE PHILOCTETES OF SOPHOCLES.

[ULYSSES SPEAKS.]

SON of Achilles! brave Neoptolemus,
You tread the coast of sea-surrounded Lemnos,
Where never mortal yet his dwelling rear'd.
Here, in obedience to the Grecian chiefs,
I erst expos'd the son of noble Pæan,
Consuming with his wounds, and wasting slow
In painful agonies; wild from despair,
He fill'd the camp with lamentations loud,
And execrations dire: No pure libation,
No holy sacrifice could to the gods
Be offer'd up: ill-omen'd sounds of woe
Profan'd the sacred rites: But this no more—
Should he discover my return, 'twere vain
The plan my wakeful industry has wove,
Back to restore yet to the aid of Greece
This most important chief. 'Tis thine, brave youth,
To ripen into deed, what I propose.
Cast round thy eyes, if thou by chance may'st find
The double rock, where from the winter's cold
He shrouds his limbs, or when the summer glows
Amid the cool, the zephyrs gentle breath
Lulls him to his repose; fast on the left
Flows a fresh fountain; if the hero sees
This living light, one of the attendant train
Speed with the hour to glad my list'ning ears,
If in that savage haunt he harbours yet,
Or in some other corner of this isle;
Then farther I'll disclose, what chief imports
Our present needs, and claims our common care.

THE

EPISODE OF LAUSUS AND MEZENTIUS.

FROM THE X. BOOK OF VIRGIL'S ÆNEIS.

Beginning line 689. Written in the year 1719.

Now Jove inflames Mezentius great in arms,
His ardour rouses, and his courage warms;
Fir'd by the god, to Turnus he succeeds;
Beneath his arm the Trojan battle bleeds;
The Tuscan troops invade their common foe,
Alike in hate their kindling bosoms glow
Fierce to destroy, on him alone they pour
Darts following darts, a thick continu'd shower:
But he undaunted, all the storm sustains,
And scorns th' united fury of the plains;
As some huge rock high tow'ring 'midst the waves,
Of seas and skies the mingling tumult braves,
On its eternal basis fix'd is found,
Though tempests rage, and oceans foam around.

First by his arm unhappy Hebrus bled,
The issue of fam'd Dolicaon's bed;
Then Latagus submits to fate, his way
Adverse he took, the chief with furious sway
Uprear'd a pond'rous rock, the shatter'd brain
Confus'd with blood and gore, o'er spreads the
At flying Palmus next his dart he threw, [plain.
The speedy dart o'ertook him as he flew,
Full in the ham he feels the smarting wound,
Left by the victor grow'ling on the ground:
His arms surround his Lausus' manly breast,
The waving plume adorns his shining crest:
Evas and Mimas, both of Trojan seed,
By the same arm were mingled with the dead;
Mimas, companion of the youthful cares
Of Paris, and the equal of his years: [queen
For, big with fancy'd flames, when Phrygia's
Brought forth the cause of woes, but ill foreseen;
T'extend his blooming race, that self-same night
The spouse of Amycus, Theano bright,
That night so fatal to the peace of Troy,
Blest her lov'd husband with a parent's joy:
But fate to diff'rent lands their deaths decreed,
This in his father's town was doom'd to bleed;
Unthinking Mimas, by Mezentius slain,
Now rolls his carcase o'er the Latian plain.
And as a tusky boar, whom dogs invade,
Of Vesulus bred in the piny shade,
Or near Laurentia's lake, with forest mast,
His feasts obscene supply'd in wild repast;
Rous'd from his savage haunt, a deep retreat,
A length of years his unmolested seat;
When once in toils enclos'd no flight appears,
Turns sudden, foaming fierce, his bristles rears;
All safe at distance stand, and none is found,
Whose valour dares inflict a nearer wound:
Dreadless meanwhile, to ev'ry side he turns,
His teeth he gnashes, and with rage he burns;
Th' united vengeance of the field derides,
A forest rattles as he shakes his sides:
So fare the Tuscan troops; with noisy rage,
And shouts, in the mixt tumult they engage;
All from afar their missile weapons throw,
Fearful in equal arms to meet the foe.
Next, Grecian Acron rush'd into the plain,
Who came from Coritus's ancient reign:
Him thirst of fame to warlike dangers led,
The joys untasted of the bridal bed;
From far Mezentius ey'd him with delight,
In arms refulgent, as he mix'd in fight;
Full o'er his breast, in gold and purple known,
The tokens of his love conspicuous shone.
Then, as a lion thirsting after blood,
(For him persuades the keen desire of food,)
If, or a frisking goat he chance to view,
Or branching stag, that leads the stately crew;
Rejoices, gaping wide, he makes his way,
Furious, and clings incumbent on the prey,
That helpless pants beneath his horrid paws,
The blood o'erflowing, laves his greedy jaws:
So keen Mezentius rushes on each foe;
Unhappy Acron sinks beneath his blow,
Mad in the pangs of death, he spurns the ground,
The blood distains the broken spear around:
Then fled Orodes shameful from the fight;
The victor scorn'd th' advantage of his flight;
But fir'd with rage thro' cleaving ranks he ran,
And face to face oppos'd, and man to man:

F f ij

Not guileful from behind his spear to throw,
 A wound unseen, but strikes an adverse blow.
 Then with his foot his dying foe he press'd,
 Lean'd on his lance, and thus his friends address'd:
 Lo! where Orodes gasps upon the sand,
 His death was due to this victorious hand,
 Large portion of the war! Exulting cries
 Ascend amain, and ring along the skies.
 To whom the vanquish'd with imperfect sound,
 All weak, and faint, and dying of the wound;
 Nor long my ghost shall unreveng'd repine,
 Nor long the triumph of my fall be thine;
 Thee, equal fates, insulting man, remain;
 Thee, death yet waits, and this the fatal plain.
 Him, as he roll'd in death, Mezentius spy'd,
 He smil'd severe, and thus contemptuous cry'd:
 Die thou the first; as he thinks fit, for me,
 The fire of heav'n and earth, let Jove decree.
 He said: and pull'd the weapon from the wound;
 The purple life ebb'd out upon the ground:
 Death's clay-cold hand shut up the sinking light,
 And o'er his closing eyes drew the dark mist of
 By Cædicus' great arm Alcathous fell; [night.
 Sacrator sent Hydaspes down to hell:
 Parthenius dies, by Rapo slain in fight;
 And Orfes vast, of more than mortal might.
 Next sunk two warriors, Clonius the divine,
 And Ericetes of Lycaon's line;
 The issue of the god, their deaths renown'd,
 Whose forked trident rules the deep profound.
 His courser unobedient to the rein,
 Great Ericetes tumbled to the plain.
 Prone as he lay, swift fled the thirsty dart,
 And found the mortal passage to his heart.
 Then lights the victor from his lofty steed,
 And foot to foot engag'd made Clonius bleed.
 Then Lycian Agis, boastful of his might,
 Provok'd the bravest foe to single fight;
 Him boldly Tuscan Valerus assail'd,
 And in the virtues of his fire prevail'd.
 By Salius' arm the swift Antronius bled;
 Nealces javelin struck the victor dead;
 Nealces, skill'd the sounding dart to throw,
 And wing the treach'rous arrow to the foe.
 Mars, raging god, and stern! the war confounds;
 Equals the victor's shouts, and dying sounds.
 Encount'ring various on th' imbattl'd field,
 Now fierce they rush, now fierce retreating, yield.
 With equal rage, each adverse battle glows,
 Nor flight is known to these, nor known to those.
 Typhione enjoys the direful fight.
 Pale, furious, fell! and storms amidst the fight.
 The gods, from Jove's immortal dome survey
 Each army toiling, through the dreadful day;
 With tender pity touch'd, lament the pain,
 That human life is destin'd to sustain.
 On either side two deities are seen;
 Jove's awful consort, and soft beauty's queen:
 The wife of Jove the conqu'ror's palm implores,
 Soft beauty's queen her Trojans' loss deploras.
 Again, his jav'lin huge, Mezentius wields,
 Again tumult'ous he invades the fields:
 Large as Orion, when the giant stalks,
 A bulk immense! through Nereus midmost walks;
 Secure he cleaves his way; the billows braves,
 His sin'wy shoulders tow'r above the waves;
 Bearing an ash, increas'd in strength with years,
 That huge upon the mountain's height appears;

He strides along, each step the earth divides;
 In clouds obscure his lofty head resides:
 In stature huge, amidst the war's alarms,
 Such shone the tyrant in gigantic arms.
 Him as exulting in the ranks he stood,
 At distance seen, and rioting in blood,
 Æneas hastes to meet; in all his might
 He stands collected, and awaits the fight:
 First measuring, as he stood in act to throw,
 With nice survey, the distance of his foe:
 This arm, this spear, he cry'd, assert my might;
 These are my gods, and these assist in fight:
 His armour from the boastful robber won,
 Shall tow'r a trophy to my conqu'ring son.
 He said; and flings the dart with dreadful force;
 The dart drove on unerring from the course;
 It reach'd the shield, the shield the blow repell'd:
 Nor fell the jav'lin guiltless on the field;
 But piercing 'twixt the side and bowels, tore
 The fam'd Anthores, and deep drank the gore:
 He, in his lusty years, from Argos sent,
 With fam'd Alcides, on his labours went:
 Tir'd with his toils, a length of woes o'erpass'd,
 In the Evandrian realm he fix'd at last:
 Call'd back again to war, where glory calls,
 Unhappy, by a death unmeant, he falls:
 To heav'n his mournful eyes, the dying throws:
 In his last thoughts his native Argos rose.
 Straight then, his beaming lance the Trojan threw;
 Swift hissing on the wind the weapon flew;
 The plates of threefold brags were forc'd to yield;
 And three bull's hides that bound the solid shield:
 Deep in his lower groin, an arm so strong,
 Drove the sharp point, but brought not death
 Then joyful as the Trojan hero spy'd [along.
 The spouting blood pour down his wounded side,
 Like lightning, from his thigh his sword he drew,
 And furious on th' astonish'd warrior flew.
 As Lausus saw, full sore he heav'd the sigh;
 The ready tear flood trembling in his eye:
 His father's danger touch'd the youthful chief:
 With pious haste he ran to his relief.
 Nor shalt thou sink unnoted to the tomb,
 Unsung thy noble deed, and early doom:
 If future times to such a deed will give
 Their faith, to future times thy name shall live.
 Disabled, trembling for a death so near,
 The father slow-receding, drags the spear:
 Just in that moment, as suspended high
 The flaming sword shone adverse to the sky,
 The daring youth rush'd in, and fronts the foe,
 And from his father turns th' impending blow.
 His friends, with joyful shouts, reply around;
 Through all their echoes, all the hills resound:
 As wond'ring they beheld the wounded fire,
 Protected by the son, from fight retire.
 A dark'ning flight of singing shafts annoy,
 From ev'ry quarter pour'd, the Prince of Troy:
 He stands against the fury of the field,
 And rages, cover'd with his mighty shield.
 And as when stormy winds encount'ring loud,
 Burst with rude violence the bellowing cloud,
 Precipitate to earth, the tempest pours
 The vexing hailstones thick in sounding show'rs:
 The delug'd plains then ev'ry plowman flies,
 And ev'ry hind, and trav'ller shelter'd lies;
 Or, when the rock high over-arch'd impends,
 Or, when the river's shelving bank defends;

That, pow'rful o'er the storm, when bright the ray
Shines forth, they each may exercise the day.
Loud sounds the gather'd storm o'er all the field
The cloud of war pours thund'ring on his shield.
Yet still he try'd with friendly care to save
Th' unhappy youth, unfortunately brave.
Ah! whither dost thou urge thy fatal course,
In daring deeds! unequal to thy force?
Too pious in thy love, thy love betrays;
Nor such the vigour crowns thy youthful days.
Not thus advis'd the youth still fronts the foe
Exulting, and provokes the ling'ring blow:
For now, his martial bosom all on fire,
The Trojan leader's tide of rage swell'd higher;
For now, the sisters view'd the fatal strife,
And wound up the last threads of Lausus' life:
Deep plung'd the shining falchion in his breast,
Pierc'd his thin armour, and embroider'd vest,
That, rich in ductile gold, his mother wove
With her own hands, the witness of her love.
His breast was fill'd with blood; then, sad and slow
Through air resolv'd, the spirit fled below:
As ghastly pale, the chief the dying spy'd,
His hands he stretch'd to heav'n, and pitying sigh'd;
His sire Anchises rose an image dear
Sad in his soul, and forc'd the tender tear.
What praise, O youth! unhappy in thy fate,
What can Æneas yield to worth so great?
Worth, that distinguish'd in thy deed appears,
Ripe in thy youth, and early in thy years:
Thy arms, once pleasing objects of thy care,
Inviolable from hostile spoil I spare;
Thy breathless body on thy friends bestow,
To mitigate thy pensive spirit's woe,
If ought below the separate soul can move,
Solicitous of what is done above;
(Yet in the grave, perhaps, from ev'ry care
Releas'd, nor knowledge, nor device is there;)
That, gather'd to thy fires, thy friends may mourn
Thy hapless fall, and dust to dust return:
This be thy solace in the world below,
'Twas I the great Æneas struck the blow.
He said; and beck'ning, chides his friends delay;
And pious to assist, directs the way,
To rear him from the ground, with friendly care;
Dishonour'd foul with blood, his comely hair.

The wretched father now, by Tyber shore
Wash'd from his streaming thigh, the crimson gore:
Pain'd with his wound, and weary from the fight,
A tree's broad trunk supports his drooping weight:
A bough, his helmet beaming far, sustains:
His heavier armour rest along the plains.
Panting, and sick, his body downward bends,
And to his breast his length of beard descends:
He leans his careful head upon his hand;
Around him wait a melancholy band:
Much of his Lausus asks, and many sent,
To warn him back, a father's kind intent:
How vainly sent! for breathless from the field
They bear the youth, extended on his shield;
Loud wailing, mourn'd him slain in early bloom,
Mighty, and by a mighty wound o'ercome.

Far off the sounds of woe the father hears;
He trembles in the foresight of his fears:
With dust the hoary honours of his head
Sad, he deforms, and cleaves into the dead,
Then both his hands to heav'n aloft he spread;
And thus, in fullness of his sorrows, said:

Could then this lust of life so warp my mind,
That I could think of leaving thee behind
Whom I begot, unhappy in my stead
To meet the warrior, and for me to bleed?
Now fate severe has struck too deep a blow,
Now first I feel a wretched exile's woe.
And is it thus I draw this wretched breath,
Sav'd by thy wound, and living by thy death?
I too, my son, with horrid guilt profan'd
Thy sacred virtues, and their lustre stain'd:
Outcast, abandon'd by the care of heav'n,
From empire, and paternal sceptres driv'n,
My people's hatred, and insulting scorn,
The merit of my crimes, I've justly borne:
To thousand deaths this wicked soul could give,
Since now 'tis crime enough that I can live,
Can yet sustain the light, and human race,
Wretch'd as I am:—but short shall be the space.
He said; and as he said, he rear'd from ground
His fainting limbs, yet stagg'ring from the wound:
But whole and undiminish'd still remains
His strength of soul, unbroke with toil and pains.
He calls his steed, successful from each fight,
With whom he march'd, his glory and delight;
With words like these his conscious steed address'd,
That mourn'd, as with his master's ills oppress'd:
Rhoëbus, we long have liv'd in arms combin'd,
(If long the frail possessions of mankind;)
This day thou shalt bring back, to crown our toils,
The Trojan hero's head, and glitt'ring spoils
Torn from the bloody man! with me shalt take
A dear revenge, for murder'd Lausus' sake:
If strength shall fail to ope the destin'd way,
Together fall, and press the Latian clay;
For, after me, I trust thou wilt disdain
A Trojan leader, and an alien rein.
He said. The steed receives his wonted weight,
The tyrant arm'd, and furious for the fight:
His blazing helmet, formidably grac'd
With nodding horse-hair bright'ning o'er the crest:
With deathful jav'lins next he fills his hands;
And spurs his steed, and seeks the fighting bands;
Grief mix'd with madness, shame of former flight,
And love by rage inflam'd to desp'rate height,
And conscious knowledge of his valour wrought
Fierce in his breast, and boil'd in ev'ry thought.
He calls Æneas thrice: Æneas heard
The welcome sound; and thus his pray'r preferr'd,
May Jove, supreme of gods, who rules on high!
And he, to whom 'tis giv'n to rule the sky,
Far shooting king! inspire thee to draw near
Swift to thy fate, and grant thee to my spear.
But he:—My Lausus ravish'd from my sight,
Me, with vain words, O! cruel, would'st affright;
With age, with watchings, and with labours worn,
Death is below my fear, and God I scorn!
I come resolv'd to die; but, ere I go,
Receive this dart the present of a foe.
He said: the jav'lin hiss'd along the skies;
Another after, and another flies;
Thick, and incessant, as he rides the field;
Still all the storm sustains the golden shield,
Firm, as Æneas stood: thrice rode he round,
Urging his darts, the compass of the ground:
Thrice wheel'd Æneas; thrice his buckler bears
About, a brazen wood of rising spears:
Press'd in unrighteous fight, with just disdain
To wrench so many darts, and wrench in vain,

Much pond'ring in his mind the chief resolv'd
 Each rising thought; at last he springs resolv'd:
 Full at the warrior steed, the hostile wood [blood.
 He threw, that pierc'd his brain, and drank the Stung with the pain, the steed up-rear'd on high
 His founding hoofs, and lash'd the yielding sky:
 Prone fell the warrior from his lofty height;
 His shoulders broad receiv'd the courser's weight.
 From host to host the mingling shouts rebound,
 Deep echoing all in fire the heav'ns resound;
 Unsheath'd his flaming blade, Æneas flies,
 And thus address'd the warrior as he lies:
 Say, where is now Mezentius great, and bold,
 That haughty spirit, fierce, and uncontroul'd?
 To whom the Tuscan, with recover'd breath,
 As faint he view'd the skies, recall'd from death:
 Dost thou the stroke, insulting man! delay?
 Haste! let thy vengeance take its destin'd way:
 Death never can disgrace the warrior's fame
 Who dies in fight; nor conquest was my aim:
 Slain savage! by thy hand in glorious strife,
 Not so my Lausus bargain'd for my life:
 Depriv'd of him, sole object of my love,
 I seek to die;—for joy is none above.
 Yet, piteous of my fate, this grace allow,
 If pity to the vanquish'd foe be due,
 Suffer my friends my gather'd bones to burn,
 And decent lay me in the funeral urn:
 Full well I know my people's hate, decreed
 Against the living, will pursue the dead;
 My breathless body from their fury save,
 And grant my son the partner of my grave.
 He said, and stedfast ey'd the victor foe.
 Then gave his breast undaunted to the blow.
 The rushing blood distain'd his arms around;
 The soul indignant fought the shades profound.

KING LEAR'S SPEECH TO EDGAR,

TAKING A VIEW OF MAN FROM THE SIDE OF HIS MISERIES.

Is man no more than this? Consider him well.
 Thou ow'st the worm no silk, the beast no hide,
 the sheep no wool, the cat no perfume. Ha!
 here's three of us are sophisticated. Thou art the thing itself; unaccommodated man is no more but such a poor, bare, forked animal as thou art. Off, off, you lendings; come unbut-ton here.

SHAKESPEARE.

SEE where the solitary creature stands,
 Such as he issued out of nature's hands;
 No hopes he knows, no fears, no joys, no cares,
 Nor pleasure's poison, nor ambition's snares;
 But shares, from self-forg'd chains of life releast,
 The forest kingdom with his fellow beast.
 Yes, all we see of thee is nature's part;
 Thou art the creature's self;—the rest is art.
 For thee, the skilful worm of specious hue,
 No shining threads of ductile radiance drew;
 For thee no sun the rip'ning gem refin'd;
 No bleeting innocence the fleece resign'd:
 The hand of luxury ne'er taught to pour
 O'er thy faint limbs, the oil's refreshing show'r:
 His bed the flinty rock; his drink, his food,
 The running brook, and berries of the wood.
 What have we added to this plain account?
 What passions? what desires? a huge amount!

Cloth'd, fed, warm'd, cool'd, each by his brother's
 We live upon the wide creation's spoil. [toil,
 Quit, monarch, quit thy vain superfluous pride;
 Lay all thy foreign ornaments aside:
 Bid art no more its spurious gifts supply;
 Be man, mere man; thirst, hunger, grieve, and die.

TO A SWALLOW.

FROM ANACREON.

MALICIOUS bird! what punishment,
 Due to thy crimes, can love invent?
 Or clip thy wings, or cut thy tongue,
 And spoil thy flight, and future song:
 That thus, unseasonable guest,
 Thou dar'st disturb a lover's rest,
 And tear the maid, profuse of charms,
 My fair Maria, from my arms.

TO A DOVE.

FROM ANACREON.

SAY, beauteous dove, where dost thou fly?
 To what new quarter of the sky
 Dost thou with silken plumes repair,
 To scent with sweets the ambient air?
 Stay, gentle bird, nor thou refuse
 To bear along a lover's vows.

O tell the maid, of me belov'd,
 O tell how constant I have prov'd;
 How she to me all nymphs excell'd,
 The first my eyes with joy beheld;
 And since she treats me with disdain,
 The first my eyes beheld with pain.
 Yet whether, to my wishes kind,
 She hear my pray'r with gracious mind,
 Or, unrelenting of her will,
 Her riot displeasure kindle still,
 I, in her beauty's chains bound fast,
 Shall view her with indiff'rence last.
 Fly swift, my dove, and swift return
 With answer back to those that mourn:
 O! in thy bill, bring soft and calm
 A branch of silver-flow'ring palm.
 But, why should I thy flight delay?
 Go fleet, my herald, speed away,

THE XIX. ODE OF ANACREON.

FAIR Niobe, old times survey'd,
 In Phrygian hills, a marble maid.
 Chang'd Pandion! to the swallow's hue,
 On swallow's wings thy daughter flew.

But I a looking-glass would be,
 That thou might'st see thyself in me.
 No; I would be a morning gown,
 That so my dear might be put on.
 But I a silver stream would flow,
 To wash thy skin, as pure as snow.
 I would myself in ointment pour,
 To bathe thee with the fragrant show'r.
 But I would be thy tucker made,
 Thy lovely swelling bosom's shade.
 I would, a diamond necklace, deck
 The comely rising of thy neck.
 I would thy slender feet enclose,
 To tread on me transform'd to shoes.

THE XXI. ODE OF ANACREON.

FILL with Bacchus' blessings fraught,
 Ye virgins, fill a mighty draught:
 Long since dry'd up by heat, I faint,
 I scarcely breathe, and feverish pant.
 O! with these fresher flow'rs, renew
 The fading garland, on my brow,
 For, oh! my forehead's raging heat
 Has rifled all their graces sweet;
 The rage of thirst I yet can quell,
 The rage of heat I can repell;
 But, love, thy heat which burns my soul,
 What draughts can quench? what shades can cool?

THE XXII. ODE OF ANACREON.

COME, sit beneath this shade with me,
 My lovely maid, how fair the tree!
 Its tender branches wide prevail,
 Obedient to each breathing gale;
 Summer's loom industrious weaves,
 In mazy veins the silken leaves,
 Soft as the milky veins I view,
 O'er thy fair breast meand'ring blue;
 Hard by a fount with murmur'ing noise
 Runs a sweet persuasive voice;
 What lover, say, my lovely maid,
 So foolish as to pass this shade?

By various youths admir'd, by all approv'd,
 By many sought, by one sincerely lov'd,
 Chief of Edina's fair I flourish'd long,
 First in the dance, the visit, and the song;
 Beauty, good nature, in my form combin'd,
 My body one adorn'd, and one my mind.
 When youthful years, a foe to lonely nights,
 Impells young hearts to Hymen's chaste delights,
 I view'd th' admiring train with equal eye,
 True to each hope, and faithful to each sigh:
 The happy hours of admiration past,
 The hand of nuptial love was giv'n at last;
 Not to the faithful youth my charms inspir'd
 Nor those who sought my charms, nor who ad-
 He not prefer'd for merit, wit, or sense, [mir'd;
 Not chose, but suffer with indifference,
 Who neither knew to love, or be belov'd,
 Approv'd me not, and just not disapprov'd,
 Nor warmth pretended, nor affection show'd;
 Ask'd, not implor'd; I yielded, not bestow'd:
 Without or hopes, or fears, I join'd his side,
 His mistress never, and but scarce his bride.
 No joys at home, abroad was only show;
 I neither gain'd a friend, nor lost a foe;
 For, lost alike to pleasure, love, and fame,
 My person he enjoys, and I his name.
 Yet patient still I lead my anxious life,
 Pleas'd that I'm call'd my formal husband's wife.

LOVE TURNED TO DESPAIR.

'Tis past! the pangs of love are past,
 I love, I love no more;
 Yet who would think I am at last
 More wretched than before?
 How bless'd, when first my heart was freed
 From love's tormenting care,
 If cold indiff'rence did succeed,
 Instead of fierce despair?

But ah! how ill is he releas'd,
 Though love a tyrant reigns,
 When the successor in his breast
 Redoubles all his pains:
 In vain attempts the woeful wight,
 That would despair remove,
 Its little finger has more weight,
 Than all the loins of love:
 Thus the poor wretch that left his dome,
 With spirit foul accurs'd,
 Found sev'n, returning late, at home
 More dreadful than the first.
 Well hop'd I once that constancy
 Might soften rigour's frown,
 Would from the chains of hate set free,
 And pay my ransom down:
 But ah! the judge is too severe,
 I sink beneath his ire;
 The sentence is gone forth, to bear
 Despair's eternal fire.
 The hopes of sinners, in the day
 Of grace, their fears abate;
 But ev'ry hope flies far away,
 When mercy shuts her gate:
 The smallest alms could oft suffice
 Love's hunger to assuage;
 Despair, the worm that never dies,
 Still gnaws with ceaseless rage.

THE YOUNGEST GRACE.

A LOVE-ELEGY.

Addressed to a Lady who had just finished her fifteenth Year.

*His saltem accumulem donis et fungar inani
 Munere— VIRG. Æneid vi.*

As beauty's queen, in her aerial hall,
 Sublimely seated on a golden throne,
 Before her high tribunal summon'd all
 Who or on earth, sea, air, her empire own.
 First came her son, her pow'r, her darling boy,
 Whose gentlest breath can raise the fiercest flame,
 Oft working mischief, though his end be joy,
 And though devoid of sight, yet sure of aim.
 With him, his youthful consort, sad no more
 Psyche, infranchis'd from all mortal pain,
 Who, ev'ry trial of obedience o'er,
 Enjoys the blessings of the heav'nly reign.
 Next, as it well beseem'd, the tuneful nine,
 Daughters of memory, and dear to Jove,
 Who, as they list, the hearts of men incline
 To wit, to music, poetry, or love.
 She, who with milder breath inspiring fills
 Than ever zephyr knew, the heart-born sigh,
 Or else from nature's pregnant source distils
 The tender drops that swell the love-sick eye.
 Or she, who from her copious store affords,
 When love decrees, the faithful youth to bless,
 The sacred energy of melting words,
 In the dear hour, and season of success.
 Last in the train, two sisters fair appear'd, [sweet;
 Sorrowing they seem'd, yet seem'd their sorrow
 Nor ever from the ground their eyes they rear'd,
 Nor tripp'd, as they were wont, on snowy feet,
 The Cyprian goddess cast her eyes around,
 And gaz'd o'er all, with ever new delight.

So bright an host was no where to be found :
 Her heart dilates, and glories in its might.
 But when without their lov'd companion dear,
 Two solitary graces hand in hand
 Approach'd, the goddess inly 'gan to fear
 What might befall the youngest of the band.
 Ah ! whither is retir'd my darling joy,
 My youngest grace, the pride of all my reign,
 First in my care, and ever in my eye,
 Why is she now the lag of all my train ?
 Ah me ! some danger threatens my Cyprian state,
 Which, goddess as I am, I can't foresee ;
 Some dire disaster labours, (ah my fate !)
 To wrest love's sceptre from my son and me.
 She wept : not more she wept, when first her eyes
 Saw low in dust her Ilion's tow'ry pride ;
 Nor from her breast more frequent burst the sighs,
 When her lov'd youth, her dear Adonis dy'd.
 Yet, yet, she cry'd, I will a monarch reign,
 In my last deed my greatness shall be seen :
 Ye loves, ye smiles, ye graces, all my train,
 Attend your mother, and obey your queen.
 Wisdom's vain goddess weaves some treach'rous
 wile,
 Or haughty Juno, heav'n's relentless dame :
 Haste ! bend each bow, haste ! brighten ev'ry smile,
 And launch from ev'ry eye the light'ning's flame.
 Then had fell discord broke the golden chain
 That does the harmony of all uphold,
 And where these orbs in beauteous order reign,
 Brought back the anarchy of Chaos old :
 When Cupid keen unlocks his feather'd store,
 When Venus burns with more than mortal fire,
 Mortals, immortals, all had fled before
 The loves, the graces, and the smiles in ire :
 In vain, t' avert the horrors of that hour,
 Anxious for fate, and fearing for his sky,
 The fire of gods and men had try'd his pow'r,
 And hung his golden balances on high :
 Had not the eldest grace, serene and mild,
 Who wish'd this elemental war might cease,
 Sprung forward, with persuasive look, and smil'd
 The furious mother of desires to peace.
 Ah whence this rage, vain child of empty fear !
 With accent mild thus spoke the heav'nly maid :
 What words, O sov'reign of hearts ! severe
 Have pass'd the roses of thy lips unweigh'd ?
 Think not mankind forsake thy mystic law :
 Thy son, thy pride, thy own Cupido reigns ;
 Hard with respect, and seen with tender awe ;
 Mighty on thrones, and gentle on the plains.
 Remember'st not how in the blest abodes
 Of high Olympus, an ethereal guest,
 Mix'd with the synod of th' assembled gods,
 Thou shar'd'st the honours of th' ambrosial feast ?
 Celestial pleasures reigning all around,
 Such as the pow'rs who live at ease enjoy,
 The smiling bowl with life immortal crown'd,
 By rosy Hebe, and the Phrygian boy :
 Hermes, fly god, resolv'd thy spleen to hit,
 Thy spleen, but, of itself, too apt to move ;
 Prone to offend with oft-mistaking wit,
 That foe perverse to nature and to love.
 Much glaz'd he spiteful, how rebellious youth,
 Lost to thy fear, and recreant from thy name,
 False to the int'rest of the heart, and truth
 On foreign altars kindles impious flame.

Much glaz'd he tauntful, how to nobler aims
 The youth awak'ning from each female wile,
 No longer met in love's opprobrious flames,
 Slaves to an eye, or vassals to a smile.
 Now fifteen years the still returning spring
 With flow'rs the bosom of the earth has sow'd,
 As oft the groves heard Philomela sing,
 And trees have pay'd the fragrant gifts they ow'd,
 Since our dear sister left the heav'nly bow'rs :
 So will'd the fates, and such their high command,
 She should be born in high Edina's tow'rs,
 To thee far dearer than all other lands.
 There, clad in mortal form, she lies conceal'd,
 A veil more bright than mortal form e'er knew ;
 So fair was ne'er to dreaming bard reveal'd,
 Nor sweeter e'er the shad'wing pencil drew.
 Where'er the beauteous heart-compeller moves,
 She scatters wide perdition all around :
 Blest with celestial form, and crown'd with loves,
 No single breast is refractory found.
 Vain Pallas now th' unequal conflict shuns ;
 Vain are the terrors of her Gorgon shield :
 Wit bends ; but chief Apollo's yielding sons :
 To thy fair doves Juno's proud peacocks yield,
 No rival pow'rs thy envy'd empire share ;
 Revolted mortals crowd again thy shrine ;
 Duteous to love, and ev'ry pleasing care,
 All hearts are hers, and all her heart is thine.
 So mild a sway the willing nations own ;
 By her thou triumph'st o'er this subject ball ;
 Whilst men (the secret of the skies unknown)
 The beauteous apparition Laura call.

TO MRS. A. R.

Now spring begins her smiling round,
 Lavish to paint th' enamell'd ground :
 The birds exalt their cheerful voice,
 And gay on ev'ry bough rejoice :
 The lovely graces, hand in hand,
 Knit in love's eternal band,
 With dancing step at early dawn,
 Tread lightly o'er the dewy lawn ;
 Where'er the youthful sisters move,
 They fire the soul to genial love.
 Now by the river's painted side,
 The swain delights his country bride,
 While pleas'd she hears his artless vows :
 Above the feather'd songster woes.
 Soon will the rip'ned summer yield
 Her various gifts to ev'ry field :
 The fruitful trees, a beauteous show,
 With ruby-tinctur'd births shall glow :
 Sweet smells, from beds of lilies borne,
 Perfume the breezes of the morn :
 The sunny day, and dewy night,
 To rural play my fair invite,
 Soft on a bank of violets laid,
 Cool she enjoys the ev'ning shade ;
 The sweets of summer feast her eye—
 Yet soon soon will the summer fly.
 Attend, my lovely maid, and know
 To profit by th' instructive show.
 Now young and blooming thou art seen,
 Fresh on the stalk, for ever green ;
 Now does th' unfolded bud disclose
 Full blown to fight the blushing rose :

Yet, once the sunny season past,
Think not the co'ning scene will last.
Let not the flatt'ring hope persuade ;
Ah ! must I say that it will fade ?
For see the summer posts away,
Sad emblem of our own decay.
Now winter, from the frozen north
Drives his stiff iron chariot forth ;
His grisly hand in icy chains
Fair Tueda's silver flood constrains :
Cast up thy eyes, how bleak and bare
He wanders on the tops of Yare ;
Behold, his footsteps dire are seen,
Confest on ev'ry with'ring green ;
Griev'd at the sight, when thou shalt see
A snowy wreath to clothe each tree :
Frequenting now the stream no more,
Thou fly'st displeas'd the frozen shore :
When thou shalt miss the flow'rs that grew
But late to charm thy ravish'd view :
Shall I, ah horrid ! wilt thou say,
Be like to this some other day ?

Yet when in snow and dreary frost
The pleasure of the field is lost,
To blazing hearths at home we run,
And fires supply the distant sun,
In gay delights our hours employ,
We do not lose, but change our joy.
Happy, abandon ev'ry care,
To lead the dance, to court the fair ;
To turn the page of sacred bards ;
To drain the bowl ; and deal the cards.
But when the lovely white and red,
From the pale ashy cheek is fled ;
When wrinkles dire, and age severe,
Make beauty fly we know not where ;
The fair whom fates unkind disarm,
Have they for ever ceas'd to charm ?
Or is there left some pleasing art
To keep secure a captive heart ?
Unhappy love ! might lovers say,
Beauty thy food does swift decay :
When once that short-liv'd stock is spent,
What art thy famine can prevent ?
Lay virtues in with early care,
That love may live on wisdom's fare.
Though ecstasy with beauty flies,
Esteem is born when beauty dies.
Happy to whom the fates decree
The gift of heav'n in giving thee :
Thy beauty shall his youth engage,
Thy virtues shall delight his age.

TO H. H. IN THE ASSEMBLY.

WHILE crown'd with radiant charms divine,
Unnumber'd beauties round thee shine ;
When Erskine leads her happy man,
And Johnston shakes the flutt'ring fan ;
When beauteous Pringle shines confest,
And gently heaves her swelling breast,
Her raptur'd partner still at gaze,
Pursuing through each winding maze ;
Say, youth, and canst thou keep secure
Thy heart from conqu'ring beauty's pow'r ?
Or, hast thou not, how soon ! betray'd
The too believing country maid ?

Whose young and unexperienc'd years
From thee no evil purpose fears ;
And, yielding to love's gentle sway,
Knows not that lovers can betray.
How shall she curse deceiving men ?
How shall she e'er believe again ?
For me, my happier lot decrees
The joys of love that constant please ;
A warm, benign, and gentle flame,
That clearly burns, and still the same ;
Unlike these fires that fools betray,
That fiercely burn, but swift decay ;
Which warring passions hourly raise,
A short and momentary blaze.
My Hume, my beauteous Hume ! constrains
My heart in voluntary chains :
Well pleas'd, for her my voice I raise ;
For daily joys claim daily praise.
Can I forsake the fair, complete
In all that's soft, and all that's sweet ;
When heav'n has in her form combin'd
The scatter'd graces of her kind ?
Has she not all the charms that lie
In Gordon's blush, and Lockhart's eye ;
The down of lovely Haya's hair,
Killochia's shape, or Cockburn's air ?
Can time to love a period bring
Of charms, for ever in their spring ?
'Tis death alone the lover frees,
Who loves so long as she can please.

TO A GENTLEMAN GOING TO TRAVEL.

Trabit sua quemque voluptas.

WELL sung of old, in everlasting strains,
Horace, sweet lyrist ; while the Roman harp
He strung by Tyber's yellow bank, to charm
Tuscan Mecenes, thy well-judging ear ;
How in life's journey, various wishes lead
Through diff'rent roads, to diff'rent ends, the race
Diverse of human kind. The hero runs
Careless of rest, of sultry Libyan heat
Patient, and Russian cold, to win renown ;
Mighty in arms, and warlike enterprise ;
Vain efforts ! the coquettish nymph still flies
His swift pursuit, and jilts ambition's hope.
At home, this man with ease and plenty blest'd
The tow'ring dome delights ; and gardens fair,
And fruitful fields, with sylvan honours crown'd
Stretch'd out in wide extent ; the gay machine
Dear to the female race, the gilded coach,
With liv'ry'd servants in retinue long,
Adorn'd with splendid robes, the pompous train
Of pageantry and pride. His neighbour sits
Immur'd at home, a miser dire ! nor dares
To touch his store, through dread of fancy'd want :
Industrious of gain, he treasures up
Large heaps of wealth, to bless a spendthrift heir,
That wastes in riot, lux'ry, and misrule,
The purchase of his want ; naught shall he reck
His father's pine, when lavish he ordains
The feast in pillar'd hall, or sunny bow'r,
With lust-inflaming wine, and wicked mirth
Prolong'd to morning hour, and guilty deed.
Others again, the woods of Astry
Love to inhabit, or where down the mount
Sky-climbing Parnass', her sweet-sounding wave
Castalia pours, with potent virtue's blest'd ;

Pow'rful to charm the year of furious wrath,
To close the eye of anguish, or to strike
The lifted dagger from despairing breast.
Such Addison; and such, with laurel crown'd,
Immortal Conreve; such the muses' grace,
Mæonian Pope: nor do the nine refuse
To rank with these, Fergusian nightingale
Untaught with wood-note wild, sweet Allan hight;
Whether on the flow'r-blushing bank of Tweed,
Or Clyde, or Tay's smouth-winding stream, his
Choose to reside; or o'er the snowy hills [muse
Benlomon, or proud Mormount, all the day,
Clad in tartana, vary'd garb, she roves,
To hear of kings' and heroes' godlike deeds:
Or, if delighted on the knee she lies
Of lovely nymph, as happy lap-dog grac'd;
Intent to sooth the Scottish damsel's ear,
Cochrane, or Hamilton; with pleasing song
Of him who sad beneath the wither'd branch
Sat of Traquair, complaining of his lass;
Or the fond maid, that o'er the wat'ry brink
Wept sleepless night and day; still wafting o'er
Her flying love, from Aberdour's fair coast.

Others again, by party rage inflam'd,
Blindfolded zeal, and superstition dire,
Offspring of ignorance, and cloyster-born,
With undistinguish'd violence, assault
Both good and bad.

There is, who studious of his shape and mien
On dress alone employs his care to please,
Aspiring with his outward show; who, vain
Of flaxen hair perfum'd, and Indian cane,
Embroider'd vest, and stockings silver-clock'd,
Walks through th' admiring train of ladies bright;
Sole on himself intent; best liken'd to
The painted insect, that in summer's heat
Flutters the gardens round, with glossy wing,
Distinct with eyes; him oft the tender Miss,
Escap'd from sampler and the boarding-school,
Pursues with weary foot, from flow'r to flow'r,
Tulip, or lily bright, or ruby'd rose;
And often in the hollow of her hand
Retains him captive, sweet imprisonment.
But ah! how vain the joys the beau can boast;
A while he shines in tavern, visit, dance,
Unrival'd, clad in rich resplendent garb,
Lac'd or brocaded; till the merchant bold,
With messenger conspiring, mortal dire!
Of merc'less heart, throw him in dungeon deep
Recluse from ladies: what avails him then
The love of women? or the many balls
He made to please the fair? there must he lie
Remediless, if not by pity won
Fair Cytherea, sea-begotten dame,
By spousal gifts from sooty Vulcan earn
Fallacious key; as erst, by love o'ercome,
He forg'd celestial arms, to grace her son
Anchises-born; and in the borrow'd form
Of longing widow, or of maiden aunt,
(While fly Cyllenius, with opiate charm
Of Ceres, the still-watching Argus eyes
Of ke-per drench in sleep profound), release
The captive knight from the enchanted dome.

Thus others choose, their choice affects not me;
For each his own delight, with secret force
Magnetic, as with links of love, constrains.
Behoves me then to say what bias rules
My inclinations, since desire of fame

Provokes me not to win renown in arms,
Nor at Pieria's silver spring to stake
Th' insatiate thirst; to write on the coy nymph
Love-labour'd sonnet; nor in well dress'd beau
To please the lovely sex: For me at Keith's
Awaits a bowl, capacious for my cares;
There will I drown them all, no daring thought
Shall interrupt my mirth, while there I sit Surrounded with my friends; and envy not
The pomp of needless grandeur, insolent.
Nor shall alone the bowl of punch delight,
Compounded fluid! rich with juicy spoil
Of fair Iberia's sunny coast, combin'd
With the auxiliar aid of rack or rum,
Barbade, or Samatra, or Goan-born;
The luscious spirit of the cane, that in Fermenting cups with native element
Of water mixt, pure limpid stream! unite
Their social sweets. For us, her ruddy soul
The Latian grape shall bleed; nor will thy hills
Far-flowing Rhine withhold their clust'ring vines.
Haste then! to friendship sacred let us pour
Th' exhilarating flood, while, as our hands
In union knit, we plight our mutual hearts
Close as the loving pair, whom holy writ
Renowns to future times, great Jonathan,
And Jesse's son: Now this delights my soul.

There was a time we would not have refus'd
Macdougall's lowly roof, the land of ale;
Flowing with ale, as erst is Canaan said
To flow with honey: there we often met,
And quaff'd away our spleen, while fits of mirth
Frequent were heard: nor wanted am'rous song,
Nor jocund dance; loud as in Eden town,
Where the tir'd writer pens the live long day,
Summons and horning, or the spousal band
Of Strephon, and of Cloc lovely lass:
Spent with his toil when thirsty twilight falls,
He hies him gladsome, to the well-known place,
Bull-cellar; or, O Johnstoun's, thine! where fond
Of drink, and knowledge, erst philosophers
Have met: or Cout's dark cymmerian cell,
Full many a fathom deep: from far he hears
The social clamour through the dome resound;
He speeds amain to join the jovial throng.
So we delighted once: The bowl meanwhile
Walk'd ceaseless still the round, to some fair name
Devoted; thine Maria toasted chief,
Duty obsequious! and thy looks benign
Miss'd not their due regard. Dundasica fair
Claim'd next the kindred lay; nor didst thou pass,
Constance, uncelebrated or unsung.
Hail, sacred three! hail, sister minds! may heav'n
Pour down uncommon blessings on your heads.

Thus did our younger years in pleasing stream
Flow inoffensive; friendship grac'd our days,
And dream of loving mistress bless'd our night.
Now from these joys convey'd, (so fate ordains)
Thou wander'st into foreign realms, from this Far, far sejoin'd; no more with us to drain
The ample bowl; or, when in heav'n sublime
The monthly virgin, from full gather'd globe
Pours down her amber streams of light, till wide
The ether flame, with choral symphony
Of voice, attemper'd to sweet hautboy's breath,
Mixt with the violin's silver sound, below
The window of some maid belov'd, shall ply
The nightly serenade: To other joys

Thou now must turn, when on the pleasing shore
Of mild Hesperia, thou behold'st amaz'd,
The venerable urns of ancient chiefs,
Who stern in arms, and resolute to dare
In freedom's cause, have dy'd, or glorious liv'd:
Camillus; Brutus, great from tyrant's blood;
Coriolanus, famous in exile;
Laurel'd Zamean Scipio, the scourge
Of Punic race; or liberty's last hope,
Self murder'd Cato; consecrate to fame
They live for ever in the hearts of men,
Far better monument, than costly tomb
Of Egypt's kings; time with destructive hand,
Shall moulder into dust, the pil'd-up stone,
With all its praises; ah! how vain is fame!
With virtue then immortalise thy life.

But these, so potent nature's will decrees,
Delight not me, on other thoughts intent;
Not studious at midnight lamp to pore
The medal, learned coin! where laurel wreathes
The sacred head of kings, or beauty bright
Of kings sweet paramour, the letter'd sage
Or prudent senator, by eating time
Defac'd injurious; the faithless trust
Of human greatness! Nor do I incline
To pass the frith that parts from Gallia's reign
My native coast, solicitous to know
What other lands impart: all my delights
Are with my friends in merry hour, at Steel's
Assembled, while unrespited the glass [name,
Swift circles round the board, charg'd with fair
Erskine, or Pringle thine, until the sun
That, setting, warn'd us to the friendly cups
Awake, and view our revels uncomplete.
But if the Heaven's disposer of our fate,
Force me, unwilling, shift my native land;
O! in whatever soil my weary feet
Are doom'd to stray, O might I meet my friend!
Or, if the rising sun shall gild my steps
On fruitful fields of Ind, Bengala's shore,
Spice-bearing Tidor's isle, or where at eve,
Near western Califurn, beneath the main
He sinks in gold; or on vine-foft'ring hills
Of nearer Latium, nurse of kings and gods.
O! might I view thee on the flow'ry verge
Of Tyber, stream renew'd in poets song;
Or in the Roman streets, with curious eye
Studying the polish'd stone, or trophy'd arch,
Trajan, or Antonin; not long content
With toil unprofitable. Thee I'd lead
Well pleas'd to Horace tomb, dear laughing bard!
Where the Falernian vintage should inspire
Sweet thoughts of past delight; the goblet rough
With sculptur'd gold rosy from Chios' isle,
Should warm our hearts sacred to Pringle's cheek
Still glowing, and to sweet Humeia's lip,
To Drummond's eye, Maria's snowy breast
Soft-heaving, or to lovely Erskine's smile;
While on the wounded glass the diamond's path,
Faithful, shall show each fav'rite virgin's name;
Not without verse and various emblem grac'd;
The Latian youth at merry revels met,
In fancy shall admire the Scottish maid
Bright as the ruddy virgin Roman-born;
Nor with their native dames refuse to join
Impartial, their health belov'd: and would
The nine inspire me equal to my choice,
In lays such as the Roman swan might sing,
Fair as Horatian Lydia should my Hume
For ever flourish, or Næra bright,

Of soft Tibullus' muse the lovely theme.
Nor should alone in melancholy strains,
Of cruel nymph, and constant vows refus'd,
Gallus complain, when on the flinty rock,
Or wailing near earth-diving Arethuse,
Sicilian stream, he made to woods his moan,
Despairing of his loves: Maria's scorn
Cloth'd in the style of Mantua, should shine
As thine, Lycoris! theme of future song
Surviving as itself. Maria's scorn
For ever I endure. Ah! hard return
To warmth like mine: Nathless the mourning muse
Must praise the maid still beauteous in her eye, Crown'd with each lovely grace, and warm in bloom;

Though fullen to my suit, her ear be shut
Against my vows, ungracious to my love.

But this as time directs; thy health demands
The present care, and joys within our pow'r;
Nor shall we not be mindful of thy love,
Met in our festivals of mirth: but when
Thou to thy native Albion shalt return,
From whate'er coast, or Russia's northern bear,
Inclement sky! or Italy the blest
Indulgent land, the muse's best belov'd;
Over a wondrous bowl of flowing punch
We'll plight our hands a-new, at Don's, or Steel's—
Who bears the double keys, of plenty sign;
Or at facetious Thom's, or Adamson
Who rears alone (what needs she more?) the vine,
Emblem of potent joys; her self with looks
Suasive to drink, fills up the brimming glass,
Well-pleas'd to see the sprightly healths go round.
Hail, and farewell! may Heav'n defend thee
And to thy natal shore and longing friends [safe;
Restore thee, when thy destin'd toils are o'er,
Polish'd with manners, and enrich'd with arts.

TO LADY MARY MONTGOMERY.

SAY, thou with endless beauty crown'd,
Of all the youth that sigh around,
Thy worshippers, and anxious wait
From thy bright eyes their future fate;
Say, whom do most these eyes approve;
Whom does Montgomery choose to love?
Not him who strives to build a name,
From ruins of another's fame:
Who proud in self-conceit throws down
His neighbour's wit, to raise his own.
Shou'd the vain man expect success,
The fool of compliment and dress?
Thy eyes undazzled can behold,
The gaudy nothing deckt in gold.
Thy wise discernment soon discries,
Where folly lurks in wit's disguise;
Trac'd through each shape in which 'tis seen,
Through the grave look, the solemn mien;
The proud man's front, the vain man's walk,
The foplin's dress, the coxcomb's talk.
A large estate, and little sense,
To charms like thine have no pretence.
Shalt thou, O insolent! prevail?
Heav'n never meant its goods for sale:
Beauty the pearl of price, is giv'n,
Not bought, 'tis the free grace of heav'n.

The happy youth with arts refin'd,
Simple of heart, of stedfast mind:
Whom thirst of gain, could never draw
To trespass friendship's sacred law:

Whose soul the charms of sense inspire;
 Who loves, where reason bids admire:
 Cautious to shun, with wise disdain,
 The proud, the airy, and the vain.
 Him whom these virtues shall adorn,
 Thou, fair Montgomery, wilt not scorn:
 Of all the gifts of heav'n possest,
 To him thou yield'st thy willing breast;
 For him the blush, with modest grace,
 Glows rosy, o'er thy blooming face:
 For him thy panting bosom swells,
 And on thy lips such sweetness dwells.
 Crown'd with success, the happy boy
 Shall revel in excess of joy:
 While in thy presence, heav'n appears
 In sweets laid up for many years.
 The beau and witling then shall fly,
 The fop in secret corner sigh;
 Condemn'd to cry in love's despair,
 Ah! why so wise who was so fair?

Did thy example, beauteous maid,
 The rest of womankind persuade;
 Nor injur'd merit would complain,
 That it may love, and love in vain:
 Nor flattery false, and impudence,
 Usurp the room of bashful sense;
 No more at midnight ball appear,
 To gain on beauty's list'ning ear.
 Beauty would hear the vows of truth;
 Nor love would speak with folly's mouth.

Yet some there are, the better few,
 Wise thy example to pursue;
 Who rich in store of native charms,
 Employ no artificial arms.
 Such heav'nly Charlotte, form divine!
 Love's universal kingdom's thine,
 Anointed queen; all unconfin'd,
 Thine is the homage of mankind:
 Thy subjects, willing to obey,
 Bless thy mild rule, and gentle sway;
 With loyal mind each zealous pays
 His tribute dutious to thy praise.
 Yet nought to greatness dost thou owe;
 Thy merit from thy self does flow;
 Alike our wonder and our theme,
 In beauty as in place supreme.
 Such thy fair sister fram'd to please,
 Of aspect gay, and graceful ease.
 Pure flows her wit, and unrestrain'd;
 By envy, and by hate unstain'd:
 Not as the rushing torrent pours,
 Increas'd by snows, and wint'ry show'rs;
 Involving in its furious sway,
 The lab'ring hinds, a helpless prey;
 Now wide o'erspreads the watery scene,
 And now decreas'd, no more is seen:
 But as a constant river leads
 Its winding stream through purple meads;
 That through the blushing landscape roll'd
 Reflects the bord'ring flow'rs in gold;
 And, borne along with gentle force,
 Distributes wealth through all its course;
 Nor does the faithful spring deny
 The alimental just supply.

Thou, Douglas too, in whom combine
 A spirit and a noble line;
 Engaging looks, that mild inspire,
 Fond delight, and young desire;
 All-winning sweetness, void of pride,
 Thou hast no faults for art to hide.

Maria such, whose op'ning bloom
 Foreshows the pregnant fruits to come.
 O blest! for whom the seasons' flight
 Ripens that harvest of delight;
 To whom, the autumn shall resign,
 To press the rich luxuriant vine.
 Unwounded who can thee espy,
 Maid of the black and piercing eye!
 Too rashly bold, we take the field
 Against thy shafts with wisdom's shield:
 Pierc'd helpless in our guarded side,
 We fall the victims of our pride.

Nor Erskine less the song demands,
 Not least in beauty's blooming bands.
 Erskine, peculiar care of heav'n,
 To whom the pow'r of sound is giv'n;
 Artist divine! to her belong
 The heav'nly lay, and magic song:
 How do we gaze with vast delight
 Her fingers swift harmonious flight,
 When o'er th' obedient keys they fly,
 To waken sleeping harmony?
 Whene'er she speaks, the joy of all,
 Soft the silver accents fall:
 Whene'er she looks, in still amaze,
 The eyes of all enamour'd gaze:
 Each word steals gently on the ear;
 'Tis heav'n to see, 'tis heav'n to hear.

In everlasting blushes seen,
 Such Pringle shines of sprightly mien:
 To her the pow'r of love imparts,
 Rich gift! the soft successful arts,
 That best the lover's fires provoke,
 The lively step, the mirthful joke,
 The speaking glance, the am'rous wile,
 The sportful laugh, the winning smile;
 Her soul awak'ning ev'ry grace,
 Is all abroad upon her face;
 In bloom of youth still to survive,
 All charms are there, and all alive.

Fair is the lily, sweet the rose,
 That in thy cheek, O Drummond! glows;
 Pure is the snow's unfully'd white
 That clothes thy bosom's swelling height.
 Majestic looks her soul express,
 That awe us from desir'd access;
 Till sweetness soon rebuke the fear,
 And bid the trembling youth draw near.
 See, how sublime she does advance,
 And seems already in the dance;
 Exalted how she moves along,
 Ten thousand thousand graces strong!
 Such Marchmont's daughter, unprov'd,
 The maid by men of sense belov'd;
 Who knows with modesty to scorn
 The titles that may fools adorn:
 She claims no merit from her blood,
 Her greatest honour to be good:
 Heedless of pomp, with open heart
 Well has she chose the better part.
 Such Hamilla's looks divine,
 Earth's wonder, Tinnegham, and thine!
 Her soul all tenderness and love,
 Gentle as the harmless dove:
 Who artless charms without design,
 She! of the modest look benign.

Eliza young in beauty bright,
 Though new to every soft delight,
 Yet soon her conquests shall extend,
 Soon shall the sprightly maid ascend

The rival of each kindred name,
And triumph to her mother's fame.
Full in the pleasing list appears
Robertoun, in prime of years;
With skill she does her smiles bestow,
For Pallas bends her Cupid's bow:
Wisely she shuns to entertain
The designing, and the vain;
To these 'tis all forbidden ground,
Prudence, a cherub guards her round,
With flaming sword fools to expel;
In Paradise fools must not dwell.

Strike again the golden lyre,
Let Hume the notes of joy inspire;
O lovely Hume! repeat again
My lyre the ever-pleasing strain.
Dear to the muse, the muse approves
Each charm, the muse the virgin loves:
The muse preserves in lasting lays,
The records of soft beauties praise;
In vain would triumph beauties eye,
Unsung these triumphs soon would die;
Fate overcomes the fair and strong,
But has no pow'r o'er sacred song;
Verse the dying name can save,
And make it live beyond the grave.
Thus Hume shall unborn hearts engage,
Her smile shall warm another age;
Her race of mortal glory past,
Th' immortal fame shall ever last;
Last shall the look that won my heart,
The pleasing look sincere of art.
O! pow'rful of persuasive face,
Adorn'd and perfected in grace;
What joys await, joys in excess,
The youth whom thou decreest to bless;
Ordain'd thy yielding breast to move,
Thy breast yet innocent of love?

But who is she, the gen'ral gaze
Of sighing crowds, the world's amaze;
Who looks forth as the blushing morn
On mountains of the east new born?
Is it not Cochrane fair? 'Tis she
The youngest grace of graces three.
The eldest fell to death a prey,
Ah! snatch'd in early flow'r away;
The second, manifold of charms,
Blesses a happy husband's arms;
The third a blooming form remains;
O'er all the blameless victor reigns:
Where-e'er she gracious deigns to move,
The public praise, the public love.

Superior these shall still remain,
The lover's wish, the poet's strain;
Their beauties shall all hearts engage,
Victorious over spite and age;
Like thee Montgomery shall they shine,
And charm the world with arts like thine.

PART OF THE XI. EPISTLE OF THE

FIRST BOOK OF HORACE IMITATED.

WHEN through the world fate led the destin'd way,
Tell me, my Mitchell, in the broad survey,
What country pleas'd thy roving fancy most?
Say, wast thou smit with Baia's sunny coast?
Or wisht thou rather weary to repose
In some cool vale where peaceful Arno flows?

Or in Ombrosa dream the lonely hour,
Where high arch'd hills th' Etrurian shades em-
bow'r;

Where plenty pours her golden gifts in vain,
That dubious swell for Carlos or Lorrain?
Or charm'd thee more the happy viny plains,
And lofty tow'rs, where mighty Louis reigns?
Say, is it true what travellers report
Of glories shining in the Gallic court?
Or, do they all, though e'er so pompous, yield
To the thatch'd cottage in thy native field?

But hark, methinks I hear thee anxious say,
That thou at Palestine wouldst choose to stay.
Yes, Palestine; I know the place full well,
Where holy dotards riot in each cell,
The hapless peasant pines with want and sorrow,
And all unpeopled as a royal burrow.
Yet there for ever would thy friend remain,
Rather than change once more the frantic scene,
And distant hear the rollings of the main;
Unenvy'd, calm, enjoy a peaceful lot,
My friends rememb'ring nor by them forgot.

THE CORYCIAN SWAIN.

FROM GEORG. IV. LINE CXVI.

BUT, were I not, before the fav'ring gale,
Making to port, and crowding all my sail,
Perhaps I might the garden's glories sing,
The double roses of the Pæstan spring;
How endive drinks the rill, and how are seen
Moist banks with celeri for ever green;
How, twisted in the matted herbage, lies
The bellying cucumber's enormous size;
What flow'rs Narcissus late, how nature weaves
The yielding texture of acanthus' leaves:
Of ivy pale, the culture next explore,
And whence the lover-myrtle courts the shore.
For I remember, where Galefus yields
His humid moisture to the yellow fields,
And high Oebalia's tow'rs o'erlook the plain,
I knew in youth an old Corycian swain;
A few and barren acres were his share,
Left and abandon'd to the good man's care;
Nor these indulg'd the grassy lawn, to feed
The fatt'ning bullock, nor the bounding steed,
Nor gave to cattle browse, nor food to kine,
Bacchus averse refus'd the mantling vine.
What happy nature to his lands deny'd,
An honest, painful industry supply'd;
For, trusting pot-herbs to his bushy ground,
For bees, fair candid lilies flourish'd round,
Vervain for health, for bread he poppies plants,
With these he satisfy'd all nature's wants;
And late returning home from wholesome toil,
Enjoy'd the frugal bounty of the soil.
His mind was royal in a low estate,
And dignify'd the meanness of his fate.
He first in spring was seen to crop the rose,
In autumn first to unload the bending boughs;
For every bud the early year bestow'd,
A redd'ning apple on the branches glow'd.
Ev'n in the midst of winter's rigid reign,
When snow and frost had whiten'd o'er the plain,
When cold had split the rocks, and stript the woods,
And shackled up the mighty running floods,
He then, anticipating summer's hopes,
The tendrils of the soft acanthus crops;

His industry awak'd the lazy spring,
 And hasten'd on the zephyr's loit'ring wing.
 For this with pregnant bees he chief was known
 'T' abound: the balmy harvest all his own.
 Successive swarms reward his faithful toil;
 None press'd from richer combs the liquid spoil.
 He crown'd his rural orchard's plain design,
 With flow'ring lime-trees, and a wealth of pine.
 He knew, in graceful order, to dispose
 Large-body'd elms, transplanted into rows.
 Hard pear-trees flourish'd near his rustic dome,
 And thorns already purple with the plumb;
 Broad planes arose to form an ample bow'r,
 Where mirth's gay sons refresh'd the sultry hour.
 But I this grateful subject must discard,
 The pleasing labour of some future bard.

THE RHONE AND THE ARAR.

Two rivers in fam'd Gallia's bounds are known,
 The gentle Arar, and the rapid Rhone; [dream,
 Through pleasing banks, where love-sick shepherds
 Mild Arar softly steals her ling'ring stream:
 Her wave so still, th' exploring eye deceives,
 That sees not if it comes, or if it leaves:
 With silver graces ever dimpled o'er,
 Reflects each flow'r, and smiles on ev'ry shore;
 Each youth with joy th' enchanting scene surveys,
 And thinks for him the amorous stream delays;
 While the fly nymph above unseen to flow,
 To her own purpose true, steals calm below.
 More rapid rolls the Rhone, tumultuous flood,
 All raging unwithheld, and unwithstood;
 In vain or fertile fields invite its stay,
 In vain or roughest rocks oppose its way;
 It bounds o'er all, and, insolent of force,
 Still hurries headling on, a downward course.
 Sometimes, 'tis true, we snatch with painful fight,
 Across the working foam a moment's light;
 The momentary vision snatch'd again,
 The troubled river boils and froths amain.
 To which of these, alas! shall I confide?
 Say, shall I plunge in Rhone's impetuous tide,
 And by the various eddies roll'd about,
 Just as the whirlpools guide, suck'd in, cast out!
 Till through a thousand giddy circles tost,
 In the broad ocean's boundless floods I'm lost?
 Or, tell me, friend,—less vent'rous, shall I lave
 My glowing limbs in Arar's gentle wave?
 In whose fair bosom beauteous prospects rise,
 The earth in verdure, and in smiles the skies:
 With thoughtless rapture ev'ry charm explore,
 Heav'd by no breeze, or wafted to no shore:
 Till trusting cred'lous to the false serene,
 I sink to ruin in the pleasing scene.

THE PARODY: BY MR. W**.

Two toasts at ev'ry public place are seen,
 Godlike Elizabeth and gentle Jean:
 Mild Jeany smiles at ev'ry word you say,
 Seems pleas'd herself, and sends you pleas'd away.
 Her face so wondrous fair, so soft her hands,
 We're tempted oft to think—she understands:
 Each fop with joy the kind endeavour sees,
 And thinks for him the anxious care to please:
 But the fly nymph has motives of her own,
 Her lips are open'd, and—her teeth are shown,

Befs blunders out with ev'ry thing aloud,
 And rattles unwithheld and unwithstood:
 In vain the sighing swain implores a truce,
 Nor can his wit one moment's pause produce;
 She bounds o'er all, and conscious of her force,
 Still pours along the torrent of discourse.
 Sometimes, 'tis true, just as her breath she draws,
 With watchful eye we catch one moment's pause:
 But when that instantaneous moment's o'er,
 She rattles on incessant as before.
 To which of these two wonders of the town,
 Say, shall I trust, to spend an afternoon?
 If Betty's drawing-room should be my choice,
 Intoxicate with wit, struck down with noise,
 Pleas'd, and displeas'd, I quit the Bedlam scene,
 And joyful hail my peace of mind again:
 But if to gentle Jeany's I repair,
 Regal'd on syllabub, and fed on air,
 With study'd rapture yawning I commend,
 Mov'd by no cause, directed to no end,
 Till half asleep, though flatter'd, not content,
 I come away as joyless as I went.

SONG.

TO A LADY WHO RIDICULED THE AUTHOR'S
 LOVES.

A FEMALE friend advis'd a swain
 Whose heart she wish'd at ease,
 Make love thy pleasure, not thy pain,
 Nor let it deeply seize.

Beauty, where vanities abound,
 No serious passion claims:
 Then, till a phoenix can be found,
 Do not admit the flames.

But griev'd, she finds all his replies
 (Since prepossess'd when young)
 Take all their hints from Silvia's eyes,
 None from Ardelia's tongue.

Thus, Cupid, all their aim they miss,
 Who would unbend thy bow;
 And each slight nymph a phoenix is,
 If thou would'st have it so.

EPIGRAM

ON A LION ENRAGED AT SEEING A LAD IN THE HIGHLAND DRESS.

CALM and serene th' imperial lion lay,
 Mildly indulging in the solar ray,
 On vulgar mortals with indiff'rence gaz'd,
 All unconcern'd, nor angry, nor amaz'd;
 But when the Caledonian lad appear'd,
 Sudden alarm'd, his manly mane he rear'd,
 Prepar'd in fierce encounter to engage
 The only object worthy of his rage.

MITHRIDATES.

ACT I. SCENE I.

After the manner of the French dramatic rhyme of RACINE.

XIPHARES. ARBATES.

Xiphares.

'Tis true, Arbates! what all tongues relate,
 Rome triumphs, and my father yields to fate:

He whose wide empire stretch'd from shore to shore,
The mighty Mithridates is no more.

Pompey, wide scatt'ring terror and affright,
Surpris'd his prudence in the shades of night;
Through all his camp a sudden ruin spread,
And heap'd it round with mountains of the dead:
On broad Euphrates' bank the monarch lies——
His diadem is fall'n the victor's prize.
Thus he whom Asia forty years beheld
Still rising nobler from each well-fought field,
Who bold aveng'd, high-rais'd on valour's wings,
The common cause of empire and of kings,
Dies, and behind him leaves, by fortune cross'd,
Two sons, alas! in mutual discords lost.

Arbates.

How, Prince! so soon does fell ambition move
To break the union of fraternal love?

Xiphbares.

Far, far such guilt be from Xiphbares' breast,
Far such ambition, which the good detest;
Nor glory shines so tempting in my eye,
Nor rate I empire at a price so high;
True to the kindred honours of my name,
I recognize a brother's juster claim;
Nor further does my highest wish aspire,
Than those fair kingdoms left me by my fire;
The rest without regret I see become
His valour's purchase, or the gift of Rome.

Arbates.

The gift of Rome, say'st? can Pharnaces owe?—
Can Mithridates' son?——

Xiphbares.

Arbates, know.

In vain Pharnaces veils himself in art,
Long since become all Roman at the heart;
Lost to his father's glories and his own,
He longs to mount a tributary throne:
Whilst I, more desp'rate from my father's fate,
Nourish within my breast immortal hate.
But yet, not all the rage that hatred breeds,
Not all the jealousies ambition feeds,
Not all the glories Pontus' realms can boast,
Not these divide our wretched bosoms most.

Arbates.

What nearer care Xiphbares' fear alarms?

Xiphbares.

Then hear astonish'd friend, Monimia's charms,
Whom late our father honour'd with his vows,
And now Pharnaces with bold zeal pursues.

Arbates.

Monimia!

Xiphbares.

I love, nor longer will conceal
A flame which truth and honour bid reveal:
Nor duty further binds my tongue, since here
I now no rival but a brother fear:
Nor is this flame the passion of a day,
A sudden blaze that hastens to decay;
Long in my breast I pent the rising groan,
Told it in secret to my heart alone:
O could I faithful to its rage, express
Its first uneasiness, my last distress!
But lose not now the moments to disclose
The long long story of my am'rous woes.——
Suffice it thee to know, that ere my fire
Beheld this beauteous object of desire,
I saw and felt the charmer in my heart,
And holy passion dignify'd the dart.

My father saw her too; nor sought to move
With vows that she and virtue could approve;
Haughty of sov'reign rule, he hop'd to find
An easy conquest o'er a woman's mind:
But when he found in honour resolute,
She scorn'd indignant his imperious suit,
'Twas then he sent in Hymen's sacred name
His diadem, the pledge of purer flame.
Judge then, my friend! what agonizing smart,
Tore up my senses, and transfix'd my heart,
When first from fame the dreadful tale I heard,
The fair Monimia to his throne prefer'd,
And that Arbates with his beauteous prey
Shap'd for Nymphaea's walls the destin'd way.

'Twas then the more to aggravate my doom,
My mother listen'd to the arts of Rome:
Whether by her great zeal for me misled,
Or stung with rage for her deserted bed,
Betray'd to Pompey (impotent of mind)
The fort and treasures to her charge consign'd.
How dreadful did my mother's guilt appear!
Soon as the fatal tidings reach'd my ear,
No more I saw my rival in my fire,
My duty triumph'd o'er my fond desire;
Alone in the unhappy man survey'd
The father injur'd, and the king betray'd:
My mother saw me, prodigal of breath,
In ev'ry field encounter ev'ry death;
Keen to redeem the honours of my name,
Repair her wrongs, and disavow her shame.
Then the broad Euxine own'd my father's sway,
I made the raging Hellespont obey;
His happy vessels flew without controul,
Wherever winds could waft, or oceans roll.
My filial duty had attempted more,
Ev'n hop'd his rescue on Euphrates' shore;
Sudden I heard, amid the martial strife,
A hostile arm had cut his thread of life.
'Twas then, I own, amid my various woes,
Monimia dear to my remembrance rose:
I fear'd the furious king, the dire excess
Of am'rous rage, and jealous tenderness:
Hither I flew, some mischief to prevent,
With all the speed presaging passion lent:
Nor less my fears sinister omens drew,
When in these walls Pharnaces struck my view.
Pharnaces, still impetuous, haughty, bold,
Rash in design, in action uncontroll'd,
Solicits the fair queen, again renews
His interrupted hopes, and former vows,
Confirms his father's death, and longs to move
Her gentle bosom to more equal love.
I own, indeed, whilst Mithridates reign'd,
My love was by parental law restrain'd,
Rever'd submissive his superior pow'r,
Who claim'd my duty from my natal hour;
Enfranchis'd by his death, it scorns to yield
To any other's hopes so dear a field.
Either Monimia adverse to my claim;
Rejects, ah heav'n forbid! my tender claim;
Or—but whatever danger's to be run,
'Tis by my death alone the prize is won.
'Tis thine to choose, which of the two to save,
Thy royal master's son, or Pompey's slave.
Proud of the Romans who espouse his cause,
Pharnaces proudly thinks to dictate laws;
But let him know, that here that very hour
My father dy'd, I knew no rival pow'r.

The realms of Pontus own his sov'reign sway,
Him Colchos and its provinces obey,
And Colchos princes ever did maintain
The Bosphorus a part of their domain.

Arbates.

My lord, what pow'r I boast you justly claim,
My duty and affection are the same;
Arbates has but one plain point in view,
To honour and his royal master true:
Had Mithridates reign'd, nor force nor art
Had e'er seduc'd this faithful loyal heart;
Now by his death releas'd, my duteous care
His royal will declar'd, awaits his heir:
The self-same zeal I to your succour bring,
With which I serv'd your father and my king,
Had heav'n Pharnaces' impious purpose sped,
I the first victim of his rage had bled;
Those walls so long his entrance which withstood,
Ere this had redden'd with my odious blood.
Go, to the blooming queen your suit approve,
And mould her gentle bosom to your love:
Affianc'd in my faith, dismiss your fear;
Either Arbates has no credit here,
Or else Pharnaces, by my arts o'ercome,
Elsewhere shall boast him of the aids of Rome.

EPITAPH

ON MR. BAILLIE OF JERVISWOOD.

THE pious parents rais'd this hallow'd place,
A monument for them and for their race.
Descendants, be it your successive cares,
That no degen'rate dust e'er mix with theirs.

EPITAPH

ON MR. BASIL HAMILTON.

THIS verse, O gentle Hamilton! be thine,
Each softer grace, below thy darling shrine.
Nature to thee, did her best gifts impart,
The mildest manners, and the warmest heart;
Honour erected in thy breast its throne,
And kind humanity was all thy own.

EPITAPH.

Does great and splendid villany allure?
Go search in W——'s trial for a cure.
Blest with enough, wouldst thou increase it still?
Examine Ch——'s life, and R——'d's will.
Wouldst thou be happy? then these rules receive,
Read this verse gratis, and thy soul shall live.
Learn from this man, who now lies five feet deep,
To drink when doubting, and when tempted
sleep:
This led him safe thro' life's tempestuous steerage,
Poor by no place, ignoble by no peerage;
An easy mind, by no entails devis'd;
An humble virtue, by no kings excis'd:
Stated no law case, and no critic quoted; [voted.
Spoke what he thought, and never swore nor
Courts he abhor'd, their errors, their abuses,
St. James, Versailles; all, all, but Sancta Crucis*:
There where no statesman buys, no bishop sells;
A virtuous palace, where no monarch dwells.

* Holyroodhouse.

With kind Bargeny, faithful to his word, [lord;
Whom heav'n made good and social, though a
The cities view'd of many-languag'd men,
Popes, pimps, kings, gamesters; and saw all was vain.
Enjoy'd, what Hopetoun's groves could never yield,
The philosophic rapture of the field!
Nor ask'd, nor fear'd. His life, and humble lays,
No critic's envy, and no flatt'ers praise.
Sure those who know how hard to write and live,
Would judge with candour, pity and forgive.
Know'n but to few, as if he ne'er had been,
He stole through life unheeded and unseen.
He often err'd, but broke no social duty;
Unbrib'd by statesmen, and unhurt by beauty.

PSALM LXV. IMITATED.

THRICE happy he! whom thy paternal love
Allows to tread the radiant courts above,
To range the climes where pure enjoyments grow,
Where blessings spring, and endless pleasures flow:
Awful in majesty, thy glories shine,
Thy mercy speaks its author all divine.
Thy tender and amazing care is own'd,
Where-e'er old ocean walks his wavy round;
Those that explore the terrors of the main,
Embroid'd with storms in search of paltry gain,
Where tides encounter with tumultuous roar,
Derive their safety from thy boundless pow'r:
Within their stated mounds thy nod contains
The lawless waves, where headlong tumult reigns;
At thy despotic call the rebels cease,
Sink to a smiling calm,—and all is peace.
Those that inhabit earth's remotest bound,
Trembling survey thy terrors all around,
When kindling meteors redden in the air,
And shake thy judgments from their sanguine hair;
At thy command fair blushes lead the day,
And orient pearls glow from each tender spray,
Night with her solemn gloom adores a God,
And spreads her fable horrors at his nod,
Whole nature cheerful owns her Maker's voice,
Each creature smiles, and all his works rejoice.
Thy bounty streams in soft descending show'rs,
And wakens into bloom the drooping flow'rs;
Pregnant on high thy cloudy cisterns move,
And pour their genial treasures from above;
Earth smiles, array'd in all her youthful charms. }
Her flow'ry infants ope their blushing arms, }
And kindling life each vernal blossom warms. }
Thus the glad year with circling mercies crown'd,
Enjoys thy goodness in an endless round.
Whene'er thou smil'st, fresh beauties paint the
And flow'rs awaken'd vegetate to birth. [earth
The dreary wilds, where no delights are found,
Where never spring adorn'd the sterile ground,
At thy command a pompous dress assume,
Fair roses glow, and op'ning lilies bloom:
Here verdant hills arise on ev'ry side,
And shoot their tops aloft with conscious pride;
There lowing herds adorn the fertile soil,
And crown with fleecy wool the shepherd's toil:
While tender lambs their infant voices raise,
And sweetly bleat th' Almighty Giver's praise.
Here loaded vallies smile with waving corn,
And golden prospects ev'ry field adorn;
They shout for joy, and lowly bending sing,
With sweet harmonious notes, their gracious King.

Albion exult! Thy sons a voice divine have heard,
The Man of Thebes hath in thy vales appear'd.
Hark! with fresh rage, and undiminish'd fire,
The sweet enthusiast smites the British lyre;

THE LIFE OF G. WEST.

GILBERT WEST was the son of the Rev. Dr. West, prebendary of Winchester, and was born in 1706. His father was of an ancient family, and eminent for his worth and learning. He superintended the Oxford edition of "Pindar," in folio, with the Greek Scholia, 1697. Bishop Burnet gave him the living of Hundred in Berkshire; and, in the reign of Queen Anne, Lord Orford procured him a stall in the Cathedral of Winchester. At the accession of King George, he was appointed one of his first Chaplains, and had a promise from his Majesty of the first vacant Bishopric, which he did not live to obtain. He died in 1718.

His mother, Maria Temple, was sister to Sir Richard Temple, Bart. afterwards Lord Cobham, a woman of exemplary prudence, piety, and virtue, who lost her right of inheritance to her brother's estate, by marrying a man without one; and her sister, Hesther, married to Richard Grenville, Esq. of Wotton in Buckinghamshire, and her issue, received the honours and fortune he had to bequeath, with remainder to her sister Christian, married to Sir Thomas Lyttleton, Bart. of Hagley in Worcestershire, and her issue. She married a second husband, Sir John Langham, Bart. of Cottesbroke in Northamptonshire.

His mother, purposing to educate him for the church, soon after his father's death, sent him to Eton school, of which he became Captain, and went off to Oxford, and became a Student of Christ-Church.

His studious and serious turn inclined him to embrace the clerical profession; but he was seduced to a more airy mode of life, by obtaining a Cornetcy in his uncle's Regiment of Horse.

He continued some time in the army; though it is reasonable to suppose that, as his uncle exempted him from country quarters, he never sunk into a mere soldier, nor ever lost the love, or neglected the pursuit of learning; and afterwards, finding himself more inclined to civil employment, he resigned his commission, and engaged in business, with other young gentlemen, trained by government for public service, under Lord Townshend, then Secretary of State, with whom he attended the King to Hanover.

Lord Townshend showed him particular marks of his regard; and Walpole testified the strongest inclination to serve him; but Lord Cobham's opposition to the administration obstructed his preferment; the minister acknowledging, that he must not expect to have his merit distinguished by government, as any favours conferred on him would be imputed as done to his uncle.

Finding that he was to be sacrificed, he took his leave of the secretary's office, and all views of advancing his fortune; his uncle dissuading him from going to the Temple, where he had been entered, and studying the law, which he proposed to himself, as his last resource.

His adherence to Lord Townshend ended in nothing but a nomination, May 1729, to be Clerk Extraordinary of the Privy Council, procured of the Duke of Devonshire, then President of the Council, by one of his sons, with whom he had contracted a friendship at school, which produced no immediate profit; for it only placed him in a state of expectation and right of succession; and it was very long before a vacancy admitted him to profit.

Soon afterwards, he married a daughter of Mr. Bartlett, and settled himself in a very pleasant house at Wickham in Kent, where he devoted himself to learning and to piety.

He was very often visited by his cousin Lyttleton, and Pitt, who, when they were weary of faction and debate, used at Wickham to find books and quiet, a decent table, and literary conversation. Lyttleton's epigram to him in 1744, contains a just character both of the master and of his habitation.

Fair nature's sweet simplicity,
With elegance refin'd,
Well in thy seat, my friend, I see,
But better in thy mind.
To both, from courts and all their state,
Eager I fly, to prove
Joys far above a courtier's fate,
Tranquillity and love.

There is a walk at Wickham made by Pitt; and, what is of far more importance, at Wickham, Lyttleton received that conviction which produced his "Dissertation on the conversion of St. Paul." Hammond also came often from the busy world to see him, and found at Wickham a temporary relief from the anxieties of love.

And you, O West, with her, your partner dear,
Whom social mirth and useful sense commend,
With learning's feast my drooping mind shall cheer,
Glad to escape from love to such a friend.

Of his piety, the influence has probably been extended far by his Observations on the Resurrection of Christ, published in 1747, for which the University of Oxford created him a Doctor of Laws, by diploma, March 30, 1748; and would doubtless have reached yet farther had he lived to complete what he had for some time meditated, the Evidence of the Truth of the New Testament.

Of his learning, the present collection exhibits evidence, in his version of Pindar, which would have been yet fuller if the Dissertation on the Olympic Games, which accompanies it, had not been omitted. "I am now revising and preparing for the press," he writes Dr. Doddridge, March 14, 1748, "some papers which have lain by me many years; the translations of some Odes of Pindar, and some other pieces, both in verse and prose, translated from the Greek, to all which will be prefixed a Dissertation on the Olympic Games, which yet wants something of being finished. Though I look upon these subjects as mere trifles in comparison of the other, [Observations upon Celsus] yet I am sensible they have a weight, indeed too great a weight in the opinion of the world.

Hæ nugæ seria ducent
In bona, laudatum semel, acceptumque benigne.

"Works of this kind sometimes gain a man a reputation and authority which may serve him upon better and more useful subjects. You will not think I am either too vain or sanguine in my expectations, when I tell you that these papers have passed their examination, and received the approbation of Mr. Lyttleton, the best critic, the best friend, and the best man in this world."

In 1749, he published his version of the Odes of Pindar, with a dissertation on the Olympic Games, and notes critical and explanatory, in 4to.; which was praised in a recommendatory "Ode," by Dr. Warton, the present respectable master of Winchester school.

The same year, he translated from the Greek, the Hymn of Gleanthes, at the request of Dr. Doddridge, to whom he writes, "I am weary of translating; but would willingly put a force upon myself to oblige you."

In 1751, he wrote his Canto on Education, in the manner of Spenser, which received the approbation of Dr. Doddridge. In return, he writes him, "I am glad my Canto pleased you; though, to tell you the truth, I expected no less. You are a lover of the author as well as of virtue and religion, and must therefore be disposed to read it with a favourable, if not a partial eye."

This was followed, or preceded, by another poem in the same stanza, and a translation of the Iphigenia in Tauris, from the Greek of Euripides, with critical remarks and historical explanations, and a version of a part of the Argonautics of Apollonius Rhodius.

His income was not large, and his friends endeavoured, but without success, to obtain an augmentation. It is reported that the education of the young prince was offered to him, but that he required "a more extensive power of superintendence than it was thought proper to allow him."

In 1752, he succeeded to one of the lucrative clerkships of the Privy Council; and when Pitt was made Paymaster-General, he had it in his power to make him Treasurer of Chelsea Hospital.

Soon after, he published his Poems and Translations, which he affectionately inscribed to his two illustrious friends, Pitt and Lyttleton.

He was now sufficiently rich; but wealth came too late to be long enjoyed; nor could it save him from the calamities of life.

In 1755, he lost his only son, in the 20th year of his age; an affliction which he felt very severely.

The year after, a stroke of the palsy brought to the grave, in the emphatical language of Dr. Johnson, "one of the few poets to whom the grave might be without its terrors." The expression might be interpreted to the dishonour of poetry; but, as it ought rather to be considered as a pointed sentence, than a just censure, it would be improper to take notice of it. He died March 26, 1756, in the 50th year of his age.

His works, in prose and verse, containing the Odes of Pindar, a Dissertation on the Olympic Games, Gymnastic Exercises, a Dialogue from Lucian, Iphigenia in Tauris, Argonautics of Apollonius Rhodius, a Dialogue of Plato, a Dramatic Poem of Lucian upon the Gout, the Institution of the Order of the Garter, a dramatic poem, and Original Poems on several occasions, were re-printed in 3 vols. 12mo. 1766. The Odes of Pindar, and the Poems on several occasions, were printed in the collection of "The English Poets," 1779 and 1790. The anonymous translation of the Six Olympic Odes of Pindar, omitted by West, published in 1775, is incorporated with the translation of West in the present edition; and The Institution of the Order of the Garter, omitted in the collection of "The English Poets," is now arranged with his Original Poems, and Translations from Apollonius Rhodius. "The Swallows," an elegy, printed in the "Adventurer," and attributed by Hawkesworth to West, was the production of Jago, the "poet of the birds."

The works of West bear ample testimony of his genius and learning; and his contemporaries are lavish in praise of his piety, probity, and amiable benevolence.

Pope, the most celebrated of his poetical contemporaries, in testimony of his esteem, left him 5 l. in his will, "to be laid out on a ring, or any other memorial," and 200 l. "after the decease of Mrs. Blount." "Crashaw," says Dr. Johnson, "is now not the only maker of verses to whom may be given the venerable names of Poet and Saint."

Of his private character, and domestic habits, the following account is given in the "Gentleman's Magazine," 1783, from the MSS. of Mr. Jones, once Curate to Young at Welwyn, and afterwards Vicar of Hitchin, and well known by the active share he took in the "Free and Candid Disquisitions." It will be no disparagement to these particulars, to observe, that they have furnished some useful hints to Dr. Johnson, in the improved edition of his "Lives of the Poets."

"Mr. West was a person of great discernment, and of a very quick apprehension, and readily saw into men and things. He was lively and agreeable in conversation, and very much of a gentleman in all his behaviour.

"I have heard him say, that in his younger days he had gone over into the quarters of infidelity. His uncle, the late Lord Cobham, did all in his power to instill such principles into his mind, and that of his cousin Lyttleton, when they paid their visits to him. But the latter, he said, happily stood his ground, and made little or no progress in these perverse principles.

"When his Treatise on the Resurrection, &c. was first advertised in the public papers, numbers of those who had conceived an opinion of his continuing a staunch unbeliever, sent for it to his bookseller, hoping to find their own disbelief therein confirmed. But, finding themselves disappointed, some of them were pleased afterwards to rank him in the class even of Methodists, others ranked him among the Socinians. But his true character, to my certain knowledge, was a Christian, a Scholar, and a Gentleman.

"He was very regular and exemplary in family religion; offered up prayers (those of the public liturgy) every day, when well, at eleven in the morning; and then, when the weather was fair, rode out for his health. On Sundays, he went to church (not to that of his own parish, but to that of St. James's, Dr. Clarke's church), and at evening ordered his servants to come into the parlour, when he read to them the late Dr. Clarke's sermons, and then went to prayers. He read them always himself.

"One thing was somewhat singular; he always said grace himself at his table, though a clergyman was present. He gave me his reasons of his own accord, and I did not disapprove them.

"He bore his last illness in a very exemplary manner, very patient, and entirely resigned to the Divine Will.

"He had formed an excellent design of proving the authenticity of the New Testament, from many observations that had occurred to him from time to time, which he had begun to note down; and I remember he showed me some valuable hints that had been communicated to him by Dr. Doddridge, particularly drawn from the concessions of Celsus and others, amongst the more early opposers of Christianity. He seemed to delight in that subject, and to be fully resolved to pursue it if God should give him opportunities. I have heard him expatiate upon it in conversation, with great clearness of judgment and strength of argument. What became of his preparatory papers upon it, since his decease, I know not; but have reason to believe, from what I have heard, that they were soon after destroyed, with many others, and perhaps all that he had left remaining upon any topics of theology. Let his memory be ever dear to me, and sacred to the friends of Christianity in all succeeding ages."

His poetical character, as given by Dr. Johnson, is candid and judicious, and may be generally allowed; but with some exceptions in favour of the Choruses in The Institution of the Order of the Garter, unjustly overlooked; and making due allowance for his injurious and degrading estimate of the merit of poetical imitation.

"Of his translations, I have only compared the first Olympic Ode with the original, and found my expectation surpassed, both by its elegance and exactness. He does not confine himself to his author's train of stanzas; for he saw that the difference of the languages required a different mode of versification. The first strophe is eminently happy; in the second he has a little strayed from Pindar's meaning, who says, "If thou, my soul, wishest to speak of games, look not on the desert sky for a planet hotter than the sun, nor shall we tell of nobler games than those of Olympia." He is sometimes too paraphrastical. Pindar bestows upon Hiero an epithet which, in one word, signifies delighting in horses; a word, which, in the translation, generates these lines:

Hiero's royal brows, whose care
Tends the courser's noble breed;
Pleas'd to nurse the pregnant mare;
Pleas'd to train the youthful steed.

"Pindar says of Pelops, that "he came alone in the dark to the White Sea," and West:

Near the billow-beaten side
Of the foam-besilver'd main,
Darkling and alone he stood.

which, however, is less exuberant than the former passage.

"A work of this kind, must, in a minute examination, discover many imperfections; but West's version, so far as I have considered it, appears to be the product of great labour and great abilities.

"His Institution of the Garter, is written with sufficient knowledge of the manners that prevailed in the age to which it is referred; and with great elegance of diction; but for want of a process of events, neither knowledge nor elegance preserve the reader from weariness.

"His Imitations of Spenser are very successfully performed, both with respect to the metre, the language, and the fiction; and being engaged at once by the excellence of the sentiments and the artifice of the copy, the mind has two amusements together. But such compositions are not to be reckoned among the great achievements of the intellect, because their effect is local and temporary; they appeal not to reason or passion, but to memory, and presuppose an accidental or artificial state of mind. An imitation of Spenser, is nothing to a reader, however acute, by whom Spenser has never been perused. Works of this kind may deserve praise, as proofs of great industry and great nicety of observation; but the highest praise, the praise of genius, they cannot claim. The noblest beauties of art are those of which the effect is co-extended with rational nature, or at least with the whole circle of polished life; what is less than this can be only pretty, the play-thing of fashion, and the amusement of a day."

THE SONG OF ORPHEUS, AND THE SETTING OUT OF THE ARGO.

FROM THE ARGONAUTICKS OF APOLLONIUS RHODIUS.

THEN too the jarring heroes to compose
Th' enchanting bard, Oeagrian Orpheus rose,
And thus, attuning to the trembling strings:
His soothing voice, of harmony he sings.
In the beginning how heaven, earth, and sea,
In one tumultuous chaos blended lay;
Till nature parted the conflicting foes,
And beauteous order from disorder rose:
How roll'd incessant o'er th' ethereal plain
Move in eternal dance the starry train;
How the pale orb of night, and golden sun,
Through months and years their radiant journeys run;
Whence rose the mountains clad with waving
The rushing rivers, and resounding floods,
With all their nymphs; from what celestial seed
The various tribes of animals proceed.
Next how Ophion held his ancient reign,
With his fam'd consort, daughter of the main:

On high Olympus' snowy head enthron'd,
The new-created world their empire own'd:
Till force superior, and successful war,
Divested of their crowns the regal pair;
On Saturn's head Ophion's honours plac'd,
And with his consort's glories Rhea grac'd.
Thence to old Ocean's watery kingdoms hurl'd
Thus they resign'd the sceptre of the world:
And Saturn rul'd the blest Titanian gods,
While infant Jove possess'd the dark abodes
Of Dicte's cave; his mind yet uninform'd
With heavenly wisdom, and his hand unarm'd:
For'd by the Cyclops, earth's gigantic race,
Flam'd not as yet the lightning's scorching blaze,
Nor roar'd the thunder through the realms above,
The strength and glory of almighty Jove.
This said, the tuneful bard his lyre unstrung,
And ceas'd th' enchanting music of his tongue.

But, with the sound entranc'd, th' attentive ear
Thought him still singing, still flood fix'd to hear.
In silent rapture every chief remains;
And feels within his heart the thrilling strains.
Forthwith the bowl they crown with rosy wine,
And pay due honours to the power divine.
The pure libations on the fire they pour,
While rising flames the mystic tongues devour.

Now sable night ascends her starry throne,
And Argo's chiefs her drowsy influence own.
But when the bright-ey'd morning rear'd her
head,

And look'd o'er Pelion's summits ting'd with red;
Light skimm'd the breezes o'er the watery plain,
And gently swell'd the fluctuating main.
Then Tiphys rose, and, summon'd by his care,
Embark'd the heroes, and their oars prepare.
Portentous now along the winding shores
Hoarse-sounding Pagasæan Neptune roars.
Impatient Argo the glad signal took,
While from her vocal keel loud murmurs broke;
Her keel of sacred oak divinely wrought
Itonian Pallas from Didona brought.

On their allotted posts now rang'd along
In seemly order fate the princely throng:
Fast by each chief his glittering armour flames;
The midmost station bold Ancæus claims,
With great Alcides, whose enormous might
Arm'd with a massy club provokes the fight,
Now plac'd beside him: in the yielding flood
The keel deep-sinking feels the demi-god.

Their hausers now they loose, and on the brine
To Neptune pour the consecrated wine.
Then from his native shores sad Jason turns
His oft-reverted eye, and silent mourns.
As in Ortygia, or the Delphic fane,
Or where Ismenus laves Bœotia's plain,
Apollo's altars round, the youthful choir,
The dance according with the sounding lyre,
The hallow'd ground with equal cadence beat,
And move in measure their harmonious feet:
Together so Thessalia's princes sweep
With well-tim'd oars the silver-curling deep.
While, raising high the Thracian harp, presides
Melodious Orpheus and the movement guides.
On either side the dashing surges broke,
And fierce remurmur'd to each mighty stroke;
Thick flash'd the brazen arms with streaming light,
While the swift bark pursues her rapid flight,
And ever as the sea-green tide she cleaves,
Foams the long tract behind, and whitens all the waves:

So shines the path, across some verdant plain
Trac'd by the footsteps of the village swain.

Jove on that day from his celestial throne,
And all th' immortal powers of heaven look'd
The godlike chiefs and Argo to survey [down,
As through the deep they urg'd their daring way.
Then too on Pelion's cloud-top'd summit stood
The nymphs, and fauns, and sisters of the wood,
With wonder viewing the tall pine below,
That shaded once the mountain's shaggy brow,
Now fram'd by Pallas o'er the sounding sea
Thessalia's mighty heroes to convey.
But, lo! from Pelion's highest cliff descends,
And downward to the sea his footsteps bends
The Centaur Chiron; on the beach he stood
And dipp'd his fetlocks in the hoary flood.

Then waving his broad hand, the bark he hales,
And speeds with prosperous vows the parting sails.
With him advanc'd his consort to the shore;
The young Achilles in her arms she bore:
Then, raising high in air the pleasing load,
To his fond fire the smiling infant show'd.

THE STORY OF PHINEUS.

THE following day Bithynia's coast they reach,
And fix their hausers to the sheltering beach.
There on the margin of the beating flood
The mournful mansions of sad Phineus stood,
Agenor's son; whom heaven ordain'd to bear
The grievous burden of unequal'd care.
For taught by wise Apollo to descry
Th' unborn events of dark futurity,
Vain of his science, the presumptuous seer
Deign'd not Jove's awful secrets to reverē;
But wantonly divulg'd to frail mankind
The sacred purpose of th' omniscient mind.
Hence Jove indignant gave him length of days,
But quench'd in endless shade his visual rays.
Nor would the vengeful god permit him taste
The cheerful blessings of the genial feast;
Though the large tribute of the nations round
Their prophet's board with wealth and plenty crown'd.

For, lo! descending sudden from the sky,
Round the pil'd banquet shrieking harpies flie,
Who with rapacious claws incessant tear
Forth from his famish'd lips th' untasted fare.
Yet would some slender pittance oft remain,
What might suffice to keep up life and pain.
But then such odours the foul scraps exhal'd,
That with the stench the loathing stomach fail'd,
Aloof the hungry guests and wondering stood,
While their sick hearts abhor'd the putrid food.

But now the princely crew approaching near,
The welcome sound invades the prophet's ear.
Taught by th' inspiring god that now was come
The long-wish'd period of heaven's vengeful doom,

That by these heroes destin'd aid restor'd,
Peace should thenceforward bless his feastful board.
Then heaves he from the couch his haggard head,
Like some pale, lifeless, visionary shade;
And leaning on his staff with faltering steps,
Along the walls his way exploring creeps.
Diseas'd, enfeebled, and by age unbrac'd,
Trembled his tottering limbs as forth he pass'd.
Shrunk was his form, adust with want and care,
And bursting through his hide the pointed bones appear.

But faint and breathless as he reach'd the gate,
Down on the threshold over-toil'd he fate.
In dizzy fumes involv'd, his brain runs round,
And swims beneath his feet the solid ground.
No more their functions the frail senses keep,
And speechless sinks the seer in death-like sleep.

This saw the chiefs amaz'd, and gather'd round;
When from his labouring lungs a hollow sound,
With breath and utterance scarce recover'd broke,
And thus th' enlighten'd seer prophetic spoke:

"Princes of Greece, attend; if ye be they Whom o'er the main Thessalia's pines convey,
And Jason leads to Colchos' magic land,
Such is your cruel tyrant's stern command.

Yes, ye be they; for yet my mental eye
 Undimm'd past, present, future, can descry.
 Thanks to thy son, Latona, who bestows
 This grace, this only solace of my woes.
 By Jove, to whom the suppliant's cause belongs,
 Who hates the merciless, who avenges wrongs,
 By Phœbus, by Saturnia wife of Jove,
 By all the blest immortal powers above,
 Who lead you o'er the main with watchful care,
 O help! O save from famine and despair
 A wretch ill-fated, to affliction born,
 Nor leave me here unpitied and forlorn.
 For not these orbs alone depriv'd of sight
 Vindictive heaven hath veil'd in doleful night;
 But to extreme old age his cruel law
 Dooms me th' unwasting thread of life to draw.
 Nor end my sorrows here; a heavy chain
 Of woes succeeds, and pain still link'd to pain.
 From secret haunts aerial, unexplor'd,
 Flights of devouring harpies vex my board.
 Swift, instantaneous, sudden they descend,
 And from my mouth the tasteful morsel rend.
 Meanwhile my troubled soul, with woes oppress'd,
 No means of aid, no comfort can suggest.
 For when the feast I purpose to prepare,
 They see that purpose, and prevent my care.
 But cloy'd and glutted with the luscious spoil
 With noisome ordure parting they defile
 Whate'er remains, if ought perchance remain,
 That none approaching may the stench sustain,
 Though his strong heart were wrapt in plated mail,
 The filthy fragments such dire steams exhale:
 Yet me fell hunger's all-subduing pain
 Compells, reluctant, lothing, to remain;
 Compells the deadly odours to endure,
 And gorge the craving maw with food impure.
 From these invaders (so hath fate decreed)
 By Boreas' offspring shall my board be freed.
 Nor on a stranger to your house and blood,
 O sons of Boreas, is your aid bestow'd.
 Phineas behold, Agenor's hapless son,
 Once for prophetic skill and riches known;
 Who, while I sway'd the Thracian sceptre, led
 Your dower'd sister to my spousal bed."
 Here Phineus ceas'd, each pitying hero groans,
 But chief, O Boreas, thy relenting sons
 Feel kind compassion swelling in their souls,
 While down their cheeks the generous torrent rolls.
 Then Zetes near approaching, closely press'd
 His hand, and thus the labouring seer address'd:
 "O most disastrous of all human kind,
 Whence sprung the evils that o'erwhelm thy mind?
 Hast thou, intrusted with the book of fate,
 By folly merited celestial hate?
 Hence falls this indignation on thy head?
 Fain would the sons of Boreas grant thee aid;
 Fain would they execute what heaven ordains,
 But awful dread their willing hands restrains.
 To frighted mortals well thy sufferings prove,
 How fierce the vengeance of the gods above.
 Then swear, or never shall this righteous sword,
 Though drawn for thy deliverance, aid afford;
 Swear, that th' assistance which our arms shall lend,
 Shall no immortal angry God offend." [wide
 He spoke; when straight tow'r'd heav'n disclosing
 His frightless balls, the senior thus reply'd:
 "My son, th' injustice of thy tongue restrain,
 Nor let such thoughts thy pious soul profane:

By Phœbus, heavenly Augur, who inspires
 My conscious bosom with prophetic fires:
 By this my wretched lot of woe and care,
 These eyes involv'd in dark'ning clouds, I swear,
 By the fell demons of the realms below,
 Whom ever unpropitious may I know,
 From their resentments not in death secure,
 If falsely their dread godheads I adjure:
 That your assisting hands shall never move
 Wrath or displeasure in the powers above."

Then acquiescing in the solemn prayer,
 To aid the prophet Boreas' sons prepare.
 The ready youth a banquet spread, the last
 That those fell harpies were decreed to taste:
 Nigh stand the brothers, ardent to oppose
 With glittering faulchions their invading foes.
 But scarce the first sweet morsel Phineus took,
 When from the clouds with swift prevention broke
 Swift as the lightning's glance, or stormy blast
 Whose rapid fury lays the forest waste,
 Shrill clamouring for their prey the birds obscene,
 The watchful heroes shouting rush'd between;
 But they with speediest rage the cakes devour'd,
 And round intolerable odours pour'd;
 Then o'er th' Ægean far away they flew;
 Upspringing swift with threatening blades pursue
 The feather'd chiefs. That day Saturnus steel'd
 Their vigorous nerves with force untaught to yield;
 And did not Jove their wearying strength sustain,
 Their flitting pinions had they spread in vain:
 For when to Phineus furious they repair,
 Or quitting Phineus seek the fields of air,
 The light wing'd monsters fleetier than the wind,
 Leave the impetuous zephyrs far behind.
 As when the hound experienc'd in the chase,
 Through some wide forest o'er the scented grass
 A bounding hind or horned goat pursues,
 And near his panting prey, and nearer views;
 Eager he stretches the short space to gain,
 And, snapping, grinds his gnashing fangs in vain:
 So ever-near th' insulting chiefs pursued:
 The harpies so their catching hands elude.
 But now far off in the Sicilian main,
 By the wing'd brothers, sons of Boreas, slain,
 The race of harpies (though heav'n disallow'd)
 Had stain'd the Plotian isles with sacred blood;
 Their sore distress had Iris not survey'd,
 And darting from the skies the heroes staid.
 O sons of Boreas, the dread laws above
 Permit ye not to wound the dogs of Jove.
 And, lo! my oath I pledge, that never more
 Shall those fell dogs approach Bithynia's shore.
 This said, adjuring the tremendous floods,
 Most fear'd, most honour'd by th' immortal gods:
 By the flow-dripping urn of Styx she swore,
 The prophets peaceful mansions evermore
 From those rapacious spoilers should be free;
 Such was the fatal sister's fixt decree.
 The goddess swore, the brothers straight obey,
 And back to Argo wing their airy way.
 The Strophades from thence derive their name,
 The Plotian islands styl'd by ancient fame.
 Then part the harpies and Thaumantian maid,
 In thousand various mingling dies array'd.
 These to the grotts retir'd and dark retreat
 Of Dictæ's caverns in Minoian Crete.
 While the gay goddess of the watery bow
 Gain'd in a moment high Olympus' brow.

Meanwhile the princes in the cleansing wave
 With purifying rites the senior lave.
 Next from the spoil, which on Bybricia's shore
 From vanquish'd Amycus stern Pollux tore,
 A victim they select with pious care;
 And sooth the gods with sacrifice and prayer.
 Then in the palace each heroic guest
 Partakes the pleasures of the sumptuous feast.
 With them sat Phineus, and refresh'd his soul
 With savory viands and the cheering bowl.
 Unfatiated he feeds, and bates in streams
 Of ecstacy beyond the bliss of dreams.

THE HYMN OF CLEANTHES *.

O UNDER various sacred names ador'd!
 Divinity supreme! all potent lord!
 Author of nature! whose unbounded sway
 And legislative power all things obey!
 Majestic Jove! all hail! To thee belong
 The suppliant prayer, and tributary song:
 To thee from all thy mortal offspring due;
 From thee we came, from thee our being drew;
 Whatever lives and moves, great Sire! is thine,
 Embodied portions of the soul divine.
 Therefore to thee will I attune my string,
 And of thy wondrous power for ever sing.
 The wheeling orbs, the wandering fires above,
 That round this earthly sphere incessant move,
 Through all this boundless world admit thy sway,
 And roll spontaneous where thou point'st the way.
 Such is the awe impress'd on nature round
 When through the void thy dreadful thunders
 found,
 Those flaming agents of thy matchless power:
 Astonish'd worlds hear, tremble, and adore.

* Cleantes, the author of this hymn, was a stoick philosopher, a disciple of Zeno. He wrote many pieces, none of which are come down to us, but this and a few fragments, which are printed by H. Stephens, in a collection of philosophical poems. This hymn was translated at the request of a very learned and ingenious friend of mine, who was pleas'd to find such just sentiments of the Deity in a heathen, and so much poetry in a philosopher.

Thus paramount to all, by all obey'd,
 Ruling that reason which through all convey'd
 Informs this general mass, though reign'd ador'd,
 Supreme, unbounded, universal lord.
 For nor in earth, nor earth-encircling floods,
 Nor yon ethereal pole, the seat of gods,
 Is aught perform'd without thy aid divine;
 Strength, wisdom, virtue, mighty Jove, are thine!
 Vice is the act of man, by passion tost,
 And in the shoreless sea of folly lost.
 But thou, what vice disorders, canst compose;
 And profit by the malice of thy foes;
 So blending good with evil, fair with foul,
 As hence to model one harmonious whole;
 One universal law of truth and right;
 But wretched mortals shun the heavenly light;
 And, though to bless directing still their choice,
 Hear not, or heed not, reason's sacred voice,
 That common guide ordain'd to point the road
 That leads obedient man to solid good.
 Thence quitting virtue's lovely paths they rove,
 As various objects various passions move. [war
 Some through opposing crowds and threatening
 Seek power's bright throne, and fame's triumphal car,
 Some, bent on wealth, pursue with endless pain
 Oppressive, sordid, and dishonest gain:
 While others, to soft indolence resign'd,
 Drown in corporeal sweets th' immortal mind.
 But, O great Father, thunder-ruling god!
 Who in thick darkness mak'st thy dread abode!
 Thou, from whose bounty all good gifts descend,
 Do thou from ignorance mankind defend!
 The clouds of vice and folly, O controul;
 And shed the beams of wisdom on the soul!
 Those radiant beams, by whose all piercing flame
 Thy justice rules this universal frame.
 That, honour'd with a portion of thy light,
 We may essay thy goodness to requite
 With honorary songs and grateful lays,
 And hymn thy glorious works with ceaseless praise,
 The proper task of man; and sure to sing
 Of nature's laws, and nature's mighty king,
 Is bless supreme. Let gods with mortals join!
 The subject may transport a breast divine.

SCENE, A CHAMBER.

*Enter Ocypus * lame, and leaning on the nurse.Ocyp.* WHENCE, without wound, proceeds this horrid pain,That robs me of th' assistance of my feet?
While, like a bow-string by the forceful arm
Of some bold archer strain'd, the cracking
finews [plain,Labour and stretch; and force me to com-
That length of time but strengthens the disease.Nur. Raise thyself up, my son, nor bear so hard,
Lest, helpless as thou art, with thee I fall.Ocyp. Less weighty then, to humour thee, I'll lean,
And rest upon my foot, and bear my pain.
For shame it is, that youth should ask the aid
Of such a prating, old, decrepit wretch.Nur. Forbear, vain boy, thy scoffing insolence.
Nor vaunt too much thy youth; for well
thou know'st,In sickness youth is impotent as age.
Be govern'd; for this arm should I withdraw,
Thou fall'st, while my old feet unshaken stand.Ocyp. But if thou fall'st, through age thou fall'st, not sickness:Old age is weak, though prompt and willing ever—

* Ocypus, the son of Podalirius and Aftasia, was eminent for his strength and beauty, a great lover of hunting, and all gymnastic exercises. This young man, having been accustomed to insult and deride whomsoever he saw grievously afflicted with the gout, telling them at the same time that their pains were nothing, brought upon himself the indignation of the goddess who presides over that distemper, and was at last, by the violence of the disease, driven to a psecantation. Lucian had composed an entire drama upon this subject; but as only the beginning of this piece remains, I have translated it, and, with very little alteration in either, have made it a part of his other drama, whose subject is the triumph of the gout over physic.

Nur. Leave arguing; and tell me by what chance
This pain hath got possession of thy toe.Ocyp. As in the course I exercis'd, awry
My ancle turn'd, and thence the pain ensued,Nur. Why, as the fellow said, who careless sat
Clipping his grisly beard, then run again.Ocyp. Or wrestling might I not the hurt receive,
When lock'd together were our grappling limbs?Nur. A trusty champion by my troth thou art,
If all thy fury light upon thyself.

But this is a mere circle of evasions,

And I myself the like discourse have held

In former times and try'd to varnish o'er,

Ev'n to my dearest friends, th' unpleasing truth;But now when every swelling member speaks.
And burning colours torture thy whole body—Enter PHYSICIAN.Phy. O! where is Ocypus, illustrious youth?

For lame, I hear, are his victorious feet.

And therefore to assist him am I come.

But see! where careless on the couch diffus'd,
Supine he lies!—Heaven grant thee health,
my son,

And to thy feet restore their wonted strength.

Declare to me, O Ocypus, the cause

Of thy complaint: perhaps my powerful art

May for thy anguish find some quick relief.

Ocyp. Intolerable pain my foot consumes.Phy. Whence came it? how? what accident?
explain.Ocyp. Or in the straining race, or haply while
My gymnick exercises I perform'd,

Some hurt from my companions I receiv'd.

Phy. Then where's the sore and angry inflammation?

And why no fomentation on the part?

Ocyp. The woollen bandage I abhor.Nur. Alas!

How baneful is the pride of handsome looks

Phy. What therefore must be done? shall I lay open

Thy tumid foot? But, Ocypus, be sure
If once I seize upon it, I shall drain,
At many bleeding wounds, thy arteries.

Ocyp. Put all thy new devices now in practice,
So from this horrid pain my foot be freed.

Pby. Then lo! my steely instrument I draw,
This crooked, sharp, blood-thirsting instrument.

Ocyp. Hey! ho!

Nur. Physician, what dost thou intend?
Would'st thou with sharp incisions vex him more? [danger?

And, without knowing why, his foot en-
He hath abus'd thee with an idle tale.
For neither in the straining race, nor while
His gymnastic exercises he perform'd,
From his companions did he hurt receive.
'Then listen to my tale. Healthful he came,
And all unwounded home; and greedily
'The evening feast devour'd, and drain'd the bowl;

Then falling on the couch securely slept.
But at midnight awaking, loud he roar'd,
As smitten by some god: fear seiz'd us all.
And, Oh! he cried, whence came this dire mischance?

Some torturing demon seizes on my foot.
Thus on his couch up-sitting all night long
His foot in sad solemnity he moan'd.
But when the cock's shrill sounding trump proclaims

The dawning day, lamenting forth he comes,
And on my shoulder leans his feverish hand,
While his disabled footsteps I upheld,
All that he told thee is a forg'd device
To veil the secret of his dire disease,
Which now in every limb begins to rack him,
Nor yet is able to extort the truth.

Ocyp. Old age is ever arm'd with mighty words;
Vaunting in speech, but impotent in action.
He, who when sick his nursing friends de-ceives,
Like the starv'd wretch that hungry mastic *
chews,

But cheats himself, and fosters his disease.

Pby. Thou cheatest all; now that, now saying this,
Confessing pain, but not explaining what.

Ocyp. And how shall I explain it? I indeed
Know that I suffer pain; and that is all.

Pby. When pain, without apparent cause, invades
The swelling foot, a man may please himself
In hunting after this and that solution,
But can't mistake the nature of his evil.
And now hear this, howe'er unpleasing truth,
At length, with vengeance due, 'tis come upon thee.

Ocyp. It? what? alas! what terrible disease,
That needs such preface to its horrid name?

Nur. The gout, O wretched Ocypus, whose pangs
And gnawing tortures thou didst once deride.

Ocyp. But what, O skilful artist, what say'st thou?

Pby. Farewell, to serve thee I neglect myself.

* Mastic is a great strengthener of the stomach, and consequently promotes appetite; which to a man dying of hunger is so far from being a relief, that it rather increases his complaint: this I take to be the meaning of this passage.

Ocyp. What accident or business calls thee hence?

Pby. Into a cureless evil thou art fall'n.

Ocyp. Must I then, ever lame, tormented ever,
Drag on a life of everlasting woe?

Pby. Fear not: thou shalt not be for ever lame.

Ocyp. What worse have I to fear?

Pby. On either leg
Her galling fetters will the goddess bind.

Ocyp. Alas! in t'other sympathizing foot
Methinks I feel a new unusual pain.
Or am I motionless? Or wherefore dread I

[rising up.
To place these once so nimble feet on earth?
Seiz'd like a child with vain and sudden fear:
Now by the gods, th' immortal gods, I beg,
If aught thy art suggests of aid or comfort,
Thy friendly help impart, and heal my pain,
Or surely I shall die: within I feel
The secret venom, and the thrilling arrow
That pierces through my feet, and tears my finews.

Pby. Not to amuse thee with unmeaning words,
Like some of those who call themselves physicians,

But of the healing science nothing know,
I'll briefly show the state of thy complaint:
An insurmountable and strong disease
Is fall'n upon thee: bonds more hard and stubborn

Than those steel-temper'd shackles, which the hand

Of justice fixes on the bold offender:
A dreadful, undiscover'd, secret ill,
Whose burden human nature scarce can bear.

Ocyp. Alas! oh! oh! what inward smart is this,
That penetrates my foot? oh! on thy arm
Support me, ere I fall, and lead me on
As the young satyrs reeling Bacchus lead.

[falls on the couch.
Pby. There leave him on the couch; refreshing
sleep

His much-exhausted spirits will recruit.
[Exeunt Nurse and Physician.

Ocypus solus.

Ocyp. O horrid name! detested by the gods!
Gout, rueful gout! of sad Cocytus born!
Whom in the mirky caves of Tartarus
The fiend Megæra in her womb conceiv'd,
And nourish'd at her breast: Alecto too
With her fell milk the wayward infant fed.
But oh! what god brought thy disastrous power
To taint this light, and harass human-kind?
If punishment condign pursue the dead,
For crimes committed in their days of nature,
What need was there in Pluto's dreary realms
With streams forbidden Tantalus to vex?
To whirl Ixion on the giddy wheel?
And weary Sisyphus with fruitless toil?
It sure had been sufficient punishment
Had each offender the sharp pains endur'd
That tear this meagre miserable carcase:
While through th' obstructed pores the strug-
ling vapour
And bitter distillation force their way.
Ev'n through the bowels runs the scalding
plague,

And wastes the flesh with floods of eddying
fire.

So rage the flames in Ætna's sulphureous womb :

So 'twixt Charybdis and vex'd Scylla rave
Th' imprison'd tides, and in wild whirlpools
toss'd [foaming surge.

Dash'd 'gainst the mouldering rocks the
O evil unexplor'd ! how oft in vain

We fondly try to mitigate thy woes,
And find no comfort, by false hopes abus'd.

[Sleeps.

Scene changes, and discovers the Chorus, consisting of Gouty Men and Women, marching in Procession to the Temple of the Gout, with Music and Dancing.

CHORUS.

To tender Attis, beardless boy,
The howling Phrygian throng,
On Cybele's high mountain chant
Th' enthusiastic song.

On yellow Tmolus' flowery top
The Lydian youth around
For Comus mix the warbling voice
And flute's melodious sound.

With clashing arms, in frantic mood,
The mad Idæan train
Attemper to the Cretan dance
Their holy ritual strain.

To Mars, the furious God of war,
The swelling trumpets breathe,
Preluding to contentious strife,
To battle, blood, and death.

But we, O Gout, afflictive power !
We thy sad votaries,
In sighs and groans to thee perform
Our annual sacrifice :

When usher'd by the blushing hours
The genial spring appears ;
And every flower-embroider'd vale
Its verdant mantle wears :

When zephyr on each pregnant tree
Calls forth the tender leaves ;
And her sad nest the swallow builds
Beneath the friendly caves :

When in the grove, at midnight hour,
Disconsolate, alone,
For Itys lost th' Athenian bird
Renews her plaintive moan.

[Exit Chorus.

SCENE, A CHAMBER.

Ocypus solus.

Ocyp. Come, O my comfort, my supporter, come,
My staff, my third best leg, O ! now uphold
My tottering footsteps, and direct my way,
That lightly on the earth my foot may tread.
Wretch, from thy pallet raise thy heavy limbs,
And quit the cover'd closeness of the room.
Dispel the cloud, that weighs thy eyelids
In open day, and in the golden sun [down,
On purer air thy enliven'd spirit feast.

For now my willing mind invites me forth ;
But the weak flesh refuses to comply.

Be resolute, my soul ; for well thou know'st,
The gouty wretch, that would, but cannot
move,

Ought to be number'd with th' inactive dead.
Come on.

[Exit Ocypus.

SCENE changes.

Enter Ocypus, who discovers the Chorus before a Temple offering Sacrifices to the Gout, with Music and Dancing. Dance.

Ocyp.—But who are they, whose hands with crutches fill'd,
Whose tossing heads with eldern garlands
bound,

Seem in wild dance some feast to celebrate ?
Do they to thee, Apollo, Pæans sing ? [brows.
Then would the Delphic laurel shade their
Or chant they rather Bacchanalian hymns ?
Then would their temples be with ivy
wreath'd,

Whence are ye, strangers ? speak : the truth declare.

Declare, O friends, what deity ye worship.

Chor. But who art thou, that mak'st us this demand ? [ferr'd,

Thou too, as from thy crutch may be in-
And hobbling pace, thou art a votary
Of the invincible divinity.

Ocyp. I am ; nor am unworthy of the name.

Chorus. When Cyprian Venus, queen of love,
In pearly dew fell from above,
Nereus amass'd her scatter'd frame,
And form'd the fair-proportion'd dame.

Fast by the fountains of the deep,
Where on their ouze the surges sleep,
On her broad bosom Tethys laid
The partner of Jove's regal bed.

Minerva, virgin bold and wise,
From the great Monarch of the skies,
Saturnian Jove, her birth receiv'd,
In his immortal brain conceiv'd.

But old Ophion, hoary god,
Our goddess first embrac'd ;
First in his fond paternal arms
The mighty infant plac'd.

What time primeval Chaos ceas'd,
And night eternal fled ;
Bright rose the morning, and the sun
His new-born radiance shed.

Then from the womb of fate sprung forth
The Gout's tremendous power,
Heaven with portentous thunders rung,
And hail'd her natal hour.

Clotho receiv'd and swath'd the babe,
Thence at the streaming breast
Of wealth by fostering Plutus fed,
Her awful force increas'd.

Ocyp. Say by what rites mysterious to her altar
Doth the dread power her votaries admit ?

Cho. Nor * with the biting steel ourselves we wound,
Or sprinkle with our blood the hallow'd
Nor are our necks with galling collars worn;
Or livid backs with founding scourges torn:
Nor at the altar, when the victim dies,
Gorge we the raw and bleeding sacrifice:
But when the spring the rising sap impells.
And the young elm with genial moisture swells.

When in the hedges on the budding spray
The blackbird modulates her various lay:
Then unperceiv'd she drives her piercing dart,
And wounds the inmost sense with secret smart;

The hip, the nervous thigh, the ankles swell,
The bending knee, and firm supporting heel:
The strong-knit shoulder and the sinewy arm,
And hand mechanic, feel th' intestine harm,
Through every joint the thrilling anguish pours,

And gnaws, and burns, and tortures, and
Till length of suffering the dire power appease,

And the fierce torments at her bidding cease.

Oryp. Unweeting then her votary am I.
Thou, goddess, gentle and benign, approach!
And I, with these thy votaries, will begin
Thy sacred, solemn, customary song.

[Dance.

Chorus. Thou air, be still; thou sky, serene;
Thy groans, thou gouty wretch, forbear:
Propt on her staff, behold the queen
Deigns at our altars to appear!

[The Goddess of the Gout descends or enters.]

Hail! gentlest of the heavenly powers!

Propitious on thy servants smile;

And grant in spring's fermenting hours

A quick deliverance from our toils.

Godd. Lives there on earth to whom I am unknown,

Unconquerable queen of mighty woes!

Whom nor the fuming censer can appease,

Nor victim's blood on blazing altars pour'd.

Me not Apollo's self with all his drugs,

High Heav'n's divine physician, can subdue;

Nor his learn'd son, wise Æsculapius.

Yet, ever since the race of man begun,

All have essay'd my fury to repel,

Racking th' invention of still-baffled physic.

Some this receipt 'gainst me, some that explore.

Plantane they bruise, the parsleys odorous

The lenient lettuce, and the purslain wild.

These bitter horehound, and the watery plant

That on the verdant banks of rivers grows;

Those nettles crush, and comfrey's viscid root,

And pluck the lentils in the standing pools.

Some parsnips, some the glossy leaf apply

That shades the downy peach, benumbing

henbane,

The poppies soothing gum, th' emollient

Rind of the Punic apple, fleawort hot,

The costly frankincense, and searching root
Of potent hellebore, soft fenugreek
Temper'd with rosy wine, collamphacum,
Nitre and spawn of frogs, the cypress-cone,
And meal of bearded barley, and the leaf
Of colworts unprepar'd, and ointments made
Of pickled garus, and (O vain conceit!)
The dung of mountain-goats, and human ordure,

The flower of beans, and hot sarcophagus.
The poisonous ruddock *, some, and shrew-

mouse boil,
The weasel some, the frog, the lizard green,
The fell hyæna, and the wily fox, †

And branching stone-buck † bearded like a

What kind of metals have ye left untry'd?

What juice? what weeping tree's medicinal tear?

What beasts, what animals, have not bestow'd

Their bones, or nerves, or hides, or blood,

or marrow,

Or milk, or fat, or excrement, or urine?

The draught of four ingredients some compose,

Some eight, but more from seven expect re-

Some from the purging hiera seek their cure,

On mystic verses vainly some depend;

The tricking Jew gulls other fools with charms;

While to the cooling fountains others fly,

And in the crystal current seek for health.

But to all these fell anguish I denounce,

To all who tempt me ever more severe.

But they who patiently my visit take,

Nor seek to combat me with anodynes,

Still find me gentle and benevolent.

For in my rites whoe'er participates,

His tongue with eloquence I strait endow,

And teach him with facetious wit to please,

A merry, gay, jocular companion boon:

Round whom the noisy crowd incessant laugh,

As to the baths the crippled wretch is borne.

For that dire Ate, of whom Homer sings,

That dreaded powerful deity am I:

Who on the heads of men insulting tread,

And silent, soft, and unobserv'd approach.

But as for me the acid drop descends,

The drop of anguish, I the Gout am call'd.

Now then, my votaries all, my orgies sing,

And praise with hymns th' unconquerable goddess.

Chorus. Hear, stubborn virgin, fierce and strong,
Impracticable maid!

O listen to our holy song!

And grant thy servants aid!

Thy power, imperious dame, dismays

The monarch of the dead,

And strikes the ruler of the seas

And thundering Jove with dread.

Thee soft reposing beds delight

And flannel's warm embrace,

* The Chorus here allude to several religious ceremonies performed by several Priests to their Gods. The Scripture mentions the Priests of Baal cutting and flaying themselves with knives, &c.

* A kind of red land-toad.

† A beast with shaggy hair and a beard like a goat, but otherwise like a stag.

And bandag'd legs nor swift in flight,
Nor victors in the race.

Thy flames the tumid ankles feel,
The finger maim'd, the burning heel,
And toe that dreads the ground.
Thy pains unclos'd our eye-lids keep,
Or grant at best tumultuous sleep
And slumbers never found.

Thy cramps our limbs distort,
Thy knots our joints invade:
Such is thy cruel sport!
Inexorable maid!

Enter Messenger, with two Mountebanks bound.

Mef. O! Mistress, opportunely art thou met.
Attend no vain or idle tale I bring,
But well supported by authentic facts.
As through the town (for so thou didst enjoin)
With slow and gentle pace I lately rang'd,
Searching if haply I might chance to find
A mortal bold enough to brave thy power;
There quiet all, and patient, I beheld,
Subdu'd, O goddess, by thy mighty arm.
All but these two presumptuous daring
wretches,
Who to the gaping crowd with oaths deny'd
To pay due reverence to thy deity,
Boasting that they would banish thee from earth: [bound,
Wherefore with fetters strong their legs I
And after five days search have brought them hither,

Godd. A weary march of twice five hundred feet.
Swift hast thou come, my winged messenger.
Say, from what regions, through what rugged paths,

Hast thou thy tedious longsome way pursued?
Explain, that I may comprehend thy speed?
Mef. Five stairs, whose weak and dislocated frame
Trembled beneath my tread, descending
First to the level pavement I arriv'd, [down,
That 'gainst my feet its jarring surface turn'd;
Which having with uneasy footsteps cross'd,
I enter'd next the rough and flinty street,
Whose pointed stones the gouty foot abhors:
Here meeting with a smooth, though slippery path,

I hurried on, but with backsliding haste,
The trodden slime my tottering ankle turn'd.
Thus as I journey'd, down on every side
The streaming sweat descended, and my legs
Faint and relax'd no longer firmly trod.
Thence lab'ring in each limb, and overtoil'd,
A broad, but dangerous way receiv'd me
next:

For on each hand the whirling chariots flew,
And urg'd, and press'd, and drove me faster
But I with nimble action ply'd my feet, [on;
And quick into an alley stept aside,
Till every rattling hasty wheel was pass'd.
For, as to thee, O goddess, I belong'd,
Thy votary, I ought not, could not, run.

Godd. Servant, thou hast not well perform'd in

Nor shall thy prompt obedience want reward.
In recompence this pleasing boon receive,
Three years of light and gentler pains to bear.

What and whence are ye, that so proudly
The lists to enter with the mighty Gout,
Whose power not Jove himself can overcome?
Speak, wretches—many a hero have I tam'd,
As all the wise and learn'd can testify.
Priam * was gouty, as old poets sing,
And by the gout the swift Achilles fell.
Bellerophon, and Thebes' unhappy lord,
The mighty Oedipus, my prowess own'd,
And, of maim'd Pelops' race, young Phlisthenes.

He too, who led to Troy his warrior bands,
The halting son of Pæas felt my dart,
And by my dart the † Lord of Ithaca,
Not by the poisonous trygon's bone expir'd.
Wherefore, ill-fated wretches, be assur'd,
Your wicked deeds shall meet their due re-

But urg'd by want, and hungry poverty,
O'er earth and sea like vagabonds we roam,
And with this ointment, which our father gave,

We comfort and relieve the sick and lame.

Godd. What is your ointment, say, and how pre-
2 Mo. We dare not tell, to secrecy oblig'd [par'd?
Both by the solemn oath of our profession,
And last injunctions of a dying father; [true
Who charg'd us to conceal the powerful vir-
Of this our medicine, whose strong efficacy,
O gout, can ev'n thy madding fires allay.

Godd. Ha! miserable wretches, say ye so?
Is there on earth a medicine, whose effect
My power is not sufficient to controul?
Come on, upon this issue let us join.
Let us experience now the prevalence
Of your strong medicine or my raging flames.
Hither, tormenting spirits, who preside
O'er my distracting sorrows, hither come.

Spirits descend.

Thou from the tender sole to every toe
Round all the foot the burning anguish spread.
Thou in the heel shalt settle from the thigh,
Thou on the knee shalt pour the bitter drop,
And each of you a finger shall torment.

Spir. Behold, O queen, thy orders are perform'd.
See! where the wretches maim'd and roaring lie,

Their limbs distorted with our fierce attack.

Godd. Now, friends, inform us of the truth; declare
If aught your boasted ointment now avail.
For if my forces it indeed subdue,
Far, to the dark recesses of the earth,

* Priam was gouty, &c.] Lucian had this circumstance from some secret histories that are not come down to us; or possibly there may be some conceit which we do not understand, since one cannot help thinking that he alludes to the lameness of Philoctetes, which he got by the fall of one of Hercules' arrows on his foot; and to the wound which Achilles received in his heel from Paris, which wound was the occasion of his death.

† Telegonus, the son of Ulysses by Circe, coming to Ithaca to see his father, was denied entrance by the servants; upon which a quarrel ensued, in which he unfortunately slew his father Ulysses with a spear or arrow, pointed with the bone of a trygon, a poisonous fish.

The depths profound of Tartarus, I'll fly,
Henceforth unknown, unhonour'd, and unseen.

Mo. Behold the ointment is apply'd! but, oh!
The flames relent not. Oh! I faint, I die!
A secret poison all my leg consumes.
Not so pernicious is the bolt of Jove:
Nor rages so the wild tempestuous sea:
Nor more resistless is the lightning's blast.
Sure three-mouth'd Cerberus my sinews
gnaws:

Or on my flesh some poisonous viper preys;
Or to my limbs th' envenom'd * mantle
clings,

Drench'd in the Centaur's black malignant
gore!

O queen, have mercy! freely we acknow-
That nor our ointment, nor aught else on
Thy unresisted fury can restrain, [earth
O mighty conquerers of human kind!

Ocy. "I too, O potent goddess, grace implore.
"Once in the wanton pride of vigorous youth,
"Vain of my beauteous limbs and active strength,

"I mock'd thy dolours, and thy power defy'd.

"But now chastis'd by thy afflictive arm,

"And by thy nearer influence subdued,

"My impious vaunts, O goddess, I retract,

"Adore thy might, and deprecate thy wrath."

Godd. Spirits, forbear, and mitigate their woes.
See they repent them of the dire contention.
Now let the world confess my stubborn
power,

Nor mov'd by pity, nor by drugs subdued.

Goddess and Spirits re-ascend.

* The mantle of the Centaur Nessus, who having proffered Hercules his service to carry his wife over the river Evenus, when he had her on the other side would have forced her. Whereupon Hercules shot him with an arrow. Nessus, seeing he must die, in revenge presents Deianira with his mantle stained with his own blood, telling her it was a charm for love. She believing this, when Hercules was sacrificing in Mount Oeta, sent him this mantle to put on; which he no sooner did, but the poison worked so strongly that he grew mad, and threw himself into the fire.

IN IMITATION OF SPENSER.

THE ARGUMENT.

Archimage tempts the Red-Crofs Knight
From love of Fairy land,
With shew of foreign pleasures all,
The which he doth withstand.

Wise was that Spartan Law-giver of old,
Who rais'd on Virtue's base his well-built state,
Exiling from her walls barbaric gold,
With all the mischiefs that upon it wait,
Corruption, luxury, and envious hate;
And the distinctions proud of rich and poor,
Which among brethren kindle foul debate,
And teach ambition that to fame would soar,
To the false lure of wealth her stooping wing to lower.

Yet would corruption soon have entrance found,
And all his boasted schemes eftssoon decay'd,
Had not he cast a pow'rful circle round,
Which to a distance the arch felon fray'd,
And ineffectual his foul engines made:
This was, to weet, that politic command,
Which from vain travel the young Spartan stay'd,
Ne suffer'd him forsake his native land,
To learn deceitful arts, and science contraband.

Yet had the ancient world her courts and schools;
Great kings and courtiers civil and refin'd;
Great rabbins deeply read in wisdom's rules,
And all the arts that cultivate the mind,
Embellish life, and polish human-kind.
Such, Asia, birth-place of proud monarchy,
Such, elder Egypt, in thy kingdoms shin'd,
Mysterious Egypt, the rank nursery
Of superstitions fond, and learned vanity.

But what accomplishments, what arts polite,
Did the young Spartan want his deeds to grace,
Whose manly virtues, and heroic spright,
Check'd by no thought impure, no falsehood base,
With natural dignity might well outface
The glare of manners false, and mimic pride?
And wherefore should they range from place to place,

Who to their country's love so firm were ty'd,
All homely as she was, that for her oft they dy'd?

And * foorth it is (with reverence may ye hear,
And honour due to passion so refin'd)
The strong affection which true patriots bear
To their dear country zealous is and blind,

* True.

And fond as is the love of womankind,
So that they may not her defects espy,
Ne other * paragone may ever find,
But gazing on her with an awful eye
And superstitious zeal, her learn to deify.

And, like as is the faith unsound, untrue,
Of him who wandering aye from fair to fair,
Conceiveth from each object passion new,
Or from his heart quite drives the troublous
So with the patriot-lover doth it fare, [care;
Who through the world delighting aye to rove,
His country changeth with each change of air,
Or weening the delights of all to prove,
On none, or all alike, bestows his vagrant love.

† Als doth corruption in a distant soil,
With double force † assay the youthful heart,
Expos'd suspectless to the traitor's wile,
Expos'd unwarn'd to pleasure's poison'd dart,
Expos'd unpractis'd in the world's wide mart,
Where each one lies, imposes, and betrays,
Without a friend due counsel to impart,
Without a parent's awe to rule his ways,
Without the check of shame, or spur of public praise.

§ Forthy, false Archimago, traytor vile,
Who burnt 'gainst Fairy-land with ceaseless ire.
'Gan cast with foreign pleasures to beguile
Her faithful knight, and quench the heavenly
That did his virtuous bosom aye inspire [fire
With zeal unfeign'd for her service true,
And send him forth in chivalrous attire,
Arm'd at all points adventures to pursue,
And wreak upon her foes his vowed vengeance due.

So as he journeyed upon the way,
Him soon the sly enchaunter || over-hent,
Clad like a fairy knight in armour gay, [bent,
With painted shield, and spear right forward
In knightly ¶ guise and shew of  hardiment,
That aye prepared was for bloody fight.

* Rival, or one to compare with her.

|| Overtook.

 Courage.

Whereat the * Elfin knight with speeches gent
Him first saluted, who, well as he might,
Him fair salutes again, as † seemeth courteous
knight.

Then 'gan he ‡ purpose frame of valiant deeds
Atchiev'd by foreign knights of § prowess great,
And mighty fame, which emulation breeds
In virtuous breast, and kindleth martial heat;
Of arts and sciences for warrior || meet,
And knight that would in feats of arms excel,
Or him, who ¶ lieber choosing calm retreat,
With peace and gentle virtue aye would dwell,
Who have their triumphs, like as hath Bellona fell.

These as he said, beseeemed knight to know,
And all be they in Fairy-land ytaught,
Where every art and all fair virtues grow;
Yet various climes with various fruits are fraught,
And such in one hath full perfection  raught
The which no skill may in another rear.
So glaz'd th' enchaunter till he hath him brought
To a huge rock that clomb so high in air,
That from it he †† uneath the murmuring surge mote hear.

Thence the salt wave beyond in prospect wide
A spacious plain the false enchaunter shew'd,
With goodly castles deck'd on every side,
And silver streams, that down the champain
flow'd,
And wash'd the vineyards that beside them stood,
And groves of myrtle; als the lamp of day
His orient beams display'd withouten cloud,
Which lightly on the glistening waters play,
And tinge the castles, woods, and hills, with purple ray.

So fair a landscape charm'd the wondering
knight;
And eke the breath of morning fresh and sweet
Inspir'd his jocund spirit with delight,
And ease of heart for soft persuasion meet.
Then him the traitor base 'gan fair entreat,
And from the rock as downward they descend,
Of that blest land his praises 'gan repeat,
Till he him moved hath with him to †† wend;
So to the billowy shore their hasty march they bend.

There in a painted bark all trim and gay,
Whose sails full glad embrac'd the wanton wind.
There sat a stranger §§ wight in quaint array,
That seem'd of various garbs ||| attone combin'd,
Of Europe, Afric, east and western Inde.
Als round about him many creatures stood,
Of several nations and of divers kind, [dow'd,
Apes, serpents, birds with human speech en-
And monsters of the land, and wonders of the flood.

He was to weet a mighty traveller,
Who curiosity thereafter ¶¶ hight

* Fairy. † Beseeemb. ‡ Discourse, or argument. § Might, valour.
|| Proper, fit. ¶ Rather.  Reach'd. †† Hardly.
‡‡ To go. §§ Man or woman. ||| Together. ¶¶ Was called.

And well he knew each coast and harbour fair,
And every nation's latitude and site,
And how to steer the wandering bark aright.
So to him strait the false encounter bore,
And with him likewise brought the red-cross
knight.

Then fairly him besought to waft them o'er;
Swift flew the dauncing bark, and reach'd the adverse shore.

There when they landed were, them ran to
A bevy bright of damsels gent and gay, [greet
Who with soft smiles and salutation sweet,
And courteous violence would force them stay,
And rest them in their bower not far away;
Their bower that most luxuriously was * dight
With all the dainties of air, earth, and sea,
All that mote please the taste and charm the sight, [bright.
The pleasure of the board, and charm of beauty

Als might he therein hear a mingled sound
Of feast and song and laughing jollity,
That in the noise was all distinction drown'd
Of graver sense, or music's harmony.
Yet were there some in that blithe company
That aptly could discourse of virtuous lore,
Of manners, wisdom, and sound policy;
Yet † nould they often ope their sacred store,
Ne might their voice be heard mid riot and uproar.

Thereto the joys of idleness and love,
And luxury, that besots the noblest mind,
And custom prevalent at distance drove
All sense and relish of a higher kind,
Whereby the soul to virtue is refin'd.
Instead whereof the arts of slavery
Were taught, of slavery perverse and blind,
That vainly boasts her native liberty, [tony.
Yet wears the chains of pride, of lust, and glut-
Of which the red-cross knight right well aware,
Would in no wise agree with them to go,
Albeit with courtly glee their leader fair,
‡ Hight Politeffa him did kindly woo.
But all was false pretence and hollow show,
False as the flowers which to their breasts they ty'd,
Or those which seemed in their cheeks to glow,
For both were false, and not by nature dy'd,
False rivals of the spring, and beauty's rosy pride.

Then from behind them straightway 'gan ad-
An uncouth stripling quaintly habited, [vaunce
As for some revel mask, or antic daunce,
All chequer'd o'er with yellow, blue, and red;
Als in a vizer black he shrouds his head,
The which he tossed to and fro amain,
And § est his lathy falchion brandished,
As if he meant fierce battle to || darrain,
And like a wanton ape est skipp'd he on the plain,

And est about him skip'd a gaudy throng
Of youthful gallants, frolic, trim, and gay,
Chanting in careless notes their amorous song,
Match'd with like careless guests, like amorous play.

Als were they gorgeous, dress'd in rich array,

* Adorned, set forth. † Would not.
‡ Called. § Often. || Attempt.

And well accepted of that female train,
Whose hearts to joy and mirth devoted aye,
Each proffer'd love receive without disdain,
And part without regret from each late favour'd
swain.

And now they do accord in wanton daunce
To join their hands upon the flowery plain;
The whiles with amorous leer and eyes askaunce
Each damsel fires with love her glowing swain;
Till, all impatient of the tickling pain,
In sudden laughter forth at once they break,
And ending so their daunce, each tender twain
To shady bowers forthwith themselves betake,
Deep hid in myrtle groves, beside a silver lake.

Thereat the red-crofs knight was much enmov'd,
And 'gan his heart with indignation swell,
To view in forms so made to be lov'd,
Ne faith, ne truth, ne heavenly virtue dwell;
But lust instead, and falsehood, child of hell;
And glutton sloth, and love of gay attire:
And sooth to say, them well could parallel
Their lusty * paramours in vain desire;
Well fitted to each dame was every gallant squire.

Yet when their sovereign calls them forth to arms, [vere,
Their sovereign, whose † behests they most re-
Right wisely can they menage war's alarms,
And wield with valour great the martial spear,
So that their name is dreaded far and near.
Oh! that for liberty they so did fight!
Then need not fairy-land their prowess fear,
Ne give in charge to her adventurous knight
Their friendship to beware, and sense-deluding fleight.

But not for liberty they wagen war,
But solely to ‡ aggrate their mighty lord,
For whom their dearest blood they nillén § spare,
When so him listeth draw the conquering sword;
So is that idol vain of them ador'd,
Who ne with might beyond his meanest thrall
Endued, ne with superior wisdom stor'd,
Sees at his feet prostrated millions fall,
And with religious dread obey his princely call.

Thereto so high and stately was his port,
That all the petty kings him sore envy'd,
And would him imitate in any sort,
With all the mimic pageantry of pride,
And worship'd be like him, and deify'd,
Of courtly sycophants and || caitifs vile,
Who to those services themselves apply'd,
And in that school of servitude erewhile [guile.

Where grown enamour'd of the gaudy train,
And, courteous haviour gent and debonair,
They cast to imitate such semblaunce fair;
And, deeming meanly of their native lond,
Their own rough virtues they disdain to wear,
And back returning drest by foreign hond,
Ne other matter care, ne other understond.

* Lovers. † Commands. ‡ Please.
§ Will not. || Scoundrels.

Wherefore th' enchaunter vile, who fore was griev'd
To see the knight reject those damsels gay,
Wherewith he thought him sure to have deceiv'd,

Was minded to that court him to convey,
And daze his eyen with majesty's bright ray:
So to a stately castle he him brought,
Which in the midst of a great garden lay,
And wisely was by cunning craftsmen wrought,
And with all riches deck'd surpassing human thought.

There underneath a sumptuous canopy,
That with bright ore and diamonds glitter'd far,
Sate the swoln form of royal * surquedry,
And deem'd itself † allgates some creature rare,
While its own haughty state it mote compare
With the base countenance of the vassal fry,
That seem'd to have nor eye, nor tongue, nor Ne any sense, ne any faculty, [ear;
That did not to his throne owe servile ministry.

Yet wist he not that half that homage low
Was at a wizard's shrine in private pay'd,
The which conducted all that goodly shaw,
And as he list th' imperial puppet play'd,
By secret springs and wheels right wisely made,
That he the subtle wires mote not ‡ avize,
But deem in sooth that all he did or said,
From his own motion and free grace did rise,
And that he justly hight immortal, great, and wise.

And eke to each of that same gilded train,
That meekly round that lordly throne did
stand,
Was by that wizard ty'd a magic chain,
Whereby their actions all he mote command,
And rule with hidden influence the land.
Yet to his lord he outwardly did bend,
And those same magic chains within his hand
Did seem to place, albeit by the end
He held them fast, that none them from his gripe mote rend.

He was to weet an old and wrinkled mage,
Deep read in all the arts of policy,
And from experience grown so crafty sage,
That none his secret counsels mote descry,
Ne search the mines of his deep subtlety.
Thereto fair peace he lov'd and cherish'd;
And traffic did promote, and industry,
Whereby the vulgar were in quiet fed,
And the proud lords in ease and plenty wallowed.

Thence all the gorgeous splendour of the court,
§ Sith the sole business of the rich and great,
Was to that hope-built temple to resort,
And round their earthly god in glory wait,
Who, with their pride to swell his royal state,
Did pour large sums of gold on every one,
Brought him by harpies fell, him to aggrate,
And torn from peasants vile, beneath the throne,
Who lay deep sunk in earth, and inwardly did groan.

Behold, says Archimage, the envy'd height
Of human grandeur to the gods ally'd!

* Pride. † By all means, omnino.

Behold yon sun of power, whose glorious light,
O'er this rejoicing land out-beaming wide,
Calls up those princely flowers on every side;
Which like the painted daughters of the plain
Ne toil, ne spin, ne stain their silken pride
With care, or sorrow, sith withouten pain,
Them in eternal joy those heavenly beams maintain.

Them morn and evening joy eternal greets,
And for them thousands and ten thousands * moil,
Gathering from land and ocean honied sweets
For them who in soft indolence the while
And slumbering peace enjoy the luscious spoil;
And as they view around the careful bees
† Forespent with labour and incessant toil,
With the sweet contrast learn themselves to please,
And heighten by compare the luxury of ease.

Ungenerous man, quoth then the fairy knight,
That can rejoice to see another's woe!
And thou, unworthy of that glory bright,
Wherewith the gods have deck'd thy princely
That doth on sloth and gluttony bestow [brow,
The hard-earn'd fruits of industry and pain,
And to the dogs the labourer's morsel throw,
Unmindful of the hand that sow'd the grain,
The poor earth-trodden root of all thy greatness vain.

O foul abuse of sacred majesty,
That boasteth her fair self from heaven y-sprong!
Where are the marks of thy divinity?
Truth, mercy, justice steady, bold and strong,
To aid the meek, and curb oppressive wrong?
Where is the care and love of public good,
That to the people's father doth belong?
Where the vice-gerent of that bounteous God,
Who bids dispense to all, what he for all bestow'd?

Dwell'st thou not rather, like the prince of hell,
In Pandemonium full of ugly fiends?
Dissimulation, discord, malice fell,
Reckless ambition, that right onward † wends,
Though his wild march o'erthrow both fame
and friends,
And virtue and his country; crooked guile,
Obliquely creeping to his treacherous ends,
And flattery, curs'd assassin, who the while
He holds the murderous knife, can fawn, and kifs, and smile.

Then 'gan he strait unvail the mirror bright,
The which fair § Una gave him heretofore,
Ere he as yet, with || Paynim foe to fight,
For foreign land had left his native shore.
This in his careful breast he always bore,
And on it oft would cast his wary eye;
For it by magic framed was of yore,
So that no falsehood mote it well abye,
But it was plainly seen, or fearfully did fly.

This on that gay assembly did he turn,
And saw confounded quite the gaudy scene;

Of lords and princes; saw the magic chain
That each did wear, but deem'd he wore unseen,
That whiles with count'naunce glad he hid his pain, [swain.
And homage did require from each poor lowly

And though to that old mage they louted down,
Yet did they dearly wish for his decay:
Als trembled he, and aye upon the throne
Of his great lord his tottering steps did stay,
And oft behind him skulk'd for great dismay;
Als shook the throne, when so the villain crew,
That underneath oppress'd and groveling lay,
Impatient of the grievous burthen grew,
And loudly for redress and liberty did sue.

There mote he likewise see a ribbald train
Of dancers, broiderers, slaves of luxury,
Who cast o'er all those lords and ladies vain
A veil of semblaunce fair, and richest dye,
That none their inward baseness mote descry.
But nought was hidden from that mirror bright,
Which when false Archimago 'gan espy,
He feared for himself, and warn'd the knight
From so detested place to maken speedy flight.

So on he passed, till he comen hath
To a small river, that full flow did glide,
As it uncath mote find its watry path
For stones and rubbish, that did choak its tide,
So lay the mouldering piles on every side,
Seem'd there a goodly city once had been,
Albeit now fallen were her royal pride,
Yet mote her ancient greatness still be seen,
Still from her ruins prov'd the world's imperial queen.

For the rich spoil of all the continents,
The boast of art and nature there was brought,

With hieroglyphic sculptures all inwrought,
And Parian marbles, by Greek artists taught
To counterfeit the forms of heroes old,
And set before the eye of sober thought
Lycurgus, Homer, and Alcides bold. [told.
All these and many more that may not here be

There in the midst of a ruin'd pile,
That seem'd a theatre of circuit vast,
Where thousands might be seated, he erewhile

Seem'd a huge heap of stone together cast
In nice disorder and wild symmetry,
Urns, broken freezes, statues half defac'd,
And pedestals with antique imagery

For she was vain of her great ancestry,
But vainer still of that prodigious store

Him through the rich apartments all to lead,
And show him all the wonders of her state,
Whose names and price they wisely can * arced,
And tell of coins of old and modern date,
And pictures false and true right well discriminate.

Als are they named after him, whose tongue
Shook the dictator in his curule chair,
And thundering through the Roman senate, rung
His bold Phillippicks in Antonius' ear;
Which when the fairy heard, he sigh'd full dear,
And, casting round his quick discerning eye,
At every † deal he dropt a manly tear,
As he the stately buildings mote descry,
Baths, theatres, and fanes, in mouldering fragments lie.

And, oh! imperial city! then he said,
How art thou tumbled from thine Alpine throne!
Whereon, like Jove on high Olympus' head,
Thou sittedst erst unequal'd and alone, [known:
And madest through the world thy greatness
While from the western isles, to Indus' shore,
From seven-mouth'd Nilus, to the frozen Don,
Thy dradded bolts the strong pounc'd eagle
bore,
And taught the nations round thy fasces to adore,

And doth among thy reliques nought remain,
No little portion of that haughty spright,
Which made thee whilom scorn soft pleasure's chain,
And in free virtue place thy chief delight,
Whereby through ages shone thy glory bright?
And is there nought remaining to confound
Those who, regardless of thy woeful plight,
With idle wonder view thy ruins round,
And without thought survey thy memorable
wound?

Arise, thou genuine Cicero, and declare
That all these mighty ruins scatter'd wide
The sepulchres of Roman virtue were,
And trophies vast of luxury and pride,
Those fell diseases whereof Rome erst dy'd.
And do you then with vile mechanic thought
Your course, ye sons of fairy, hither guide,
That ye those gay refinements may be taught,
Which liberty's fair lond to shame and thralldom brought?

Let Rome those vassal arts now meanly boast,
Which to her vanquish'd thralls she erst resign'd;
Ye who enjoy that freedom she has lost,
That great prerogative of human-kind,
Close to your hearts the precious jewel bind,
And learn the rich possession to maintain,
Learn virtue, justice, constancy of mind,
Not to be mov'd by fear or pleasure's train;
Be these your arts, ye brave; these only are humane.

As he thus spake, th' enchaunter half asham'd
Wist not what fitting answer to devise,

* Relate or declare. These under sort of antiquaries, who go about with strangers to show them the antiquities, &c. of Rome, are called Ciceroni.

† At every turn, every now and then.

As was his captive heart well nigh inflam'd,
By that same knight so virtuous, brave, and wife,
That long he doubts him farther to entise.

But he was harden'd and remorseless grown,
Through practice old of villainy and vice;
So to his former wiles he turns him soon,
As in another place hereafter shall be shown.

EDUCATION. A POEM.

WRITTEN IN IMITATION OF THE STYLE AND MANNER OF SPENSER'S FAERY
QUEEN.

INSCRIBED TO LADY LANGHAM, WIDOW OF SIR JOHN LANGHAM, BARONET.

"Unum studium verè liberale est, quod liberum facit. Hoc sapientiæ studium est, sublime, forte,
"magnanimum: cætera pusilla et puerilia sunt.—Plus scire velle quàm sit satis intemperantiæ genus
"est. Quid, quòd ista liberalium artium consecratio molestos, verbosos, intempestivos, sibi placentes
"facit, et ideo non dicentes necessaria, quia supervacua didicerunt." SEN. EP. 88.

O GOODLY discipline! from heaven ysprong!
Parent of science, queen of arts refin'd!
To whom the graces, and the nine belong:
O! bid those graces, in fair chorus join'd
With each bright virtue that adorns the mind!
O bid the mules, thine harmonious train,
Who by thy aid erst humaniz'd mankind,
Inspect, direct, and moralize the strain,
That doth essay to teach thy treasures how to gain!

And thou, whose pious and maternal care,
The substitute of heavenly Providence,
With tenderest love my orphan life did rear,
And train me up to manly strength and sense;
With mildest awe, and virtuous influence,
Directing my unpractis'd wayward feet
To the smooth walks of truth and innocence;
Where happiness heart-felt, contentment sweet,
Philosophy divine, aye hold their blest retreat.

Thou, most lov'd, most honour'd, most rever'd!
Accept this verse, to thy large merit due!
And blame me not, if, by each tie endear'd,
Of nature, gratitude, and friendship true,
The whiles this moral thesis I pursue,
And trace the plan of goodly * nurture o'er,
I bring thy modest virtues into view;
And proudly boast that from thy precious store,
Which erst enrich'd my heart, I drew this sacred lore.

And thus, I ween, thus shall I best repay
The valued gifts, thy careful love bestow'd;
If, imitating thee, well as I may,
I labour to diffuse th' important good,
Till this great truth by all be understood,
"That all the pious duties which we owe,
"Our parents, friends, our country, and our God;
"The seeds of every virtue here below,
"From discipline alone, and early culture, grow."

CANTO I.

ARGUMENT.

The knight, as to * Pædia's house
He his young son conveys,
Is staid by Custom; with him fights,
And his vain pride disdains.

A GENTLE knight there was, whose noble deeds
O'er fairy land by fame were blazon'd round:
For warlike enterprise, and sage † areeds
Among the chief alike was he renown'd;
Whence with the marks of highest honours
 crown'd
By Gloriana, in domestic peace,
That port, to which the wise are ever bound,
He anchor'd was, and chang'd the tossing seas
Of bustling busy life, for calm sequester'd ease.

There in domestic virtue rich and great,
As erst in public, 'mid his wide domain,
Long in primæval patriarchal state,
The lord, the judge, the father of the plain,
He dwelt; and with him, in the golden chain
Of wedded faith ylink'd, a matron sage
Aye dwelt; sweet partner of his joy and pain,
Sweet charmer of his youth, friend of his age,
Skill'd to improve his bliss, his sorrows to assuage.

From this fair union, not of sordid gain,
But merit similar and mutual love,
True source of lineal virtue, sprung a train
Of youths and virgins; like the beauteous grove,
Which round the temple of Olympic Jove,
Begirt with youthful bloom the ‡ parent tree,
The sacred olive; whence old Elis wove

* Pædia is a Greek word, signifying education.

† Areeds, counsels.

‡ Parent tree, the sacred olive.] This tree grew in the Altis, or sacred grove of Olympic Jupiter at Olympia, having, as the Eleans pretended, been originally planted there by Hercules. It was esteemed sacred, and from that were taken the Olympic crowns.

Her verdant crowns of peaceful victory,
The * guerdons of bold strength and swift activity.

So round their noble parents goodly rose
Those generous scyons: they with watchful care
Still, as the swelling passions 'gan disclose
The buds of future virtues, did prepare
With prudent culture the young shoots to rear:
And aye in this endearing pious toil
They by a † palmer sage instructed were,
Who from deep thought and studious search erewhile [soil.
Had learnt to mend the heart, and till the human

For by celestial wisdom whilom led [mind,
Through all th' apartments of th' immortal
He view'd the secret stores, and mark'd the ‡
To judgment, wit, and memory assign'd; [sted
And how sensation and reflection join'd
To fill with images her darksome grotte,
Where, variously disjointed or combin'd,
As reason, fancy, or opinion wrought,
Their various masks they play'd, and fed her pensive thought.

¶ Alse through the fields of science had he stray'd
With eager search, and sent his piercing eye
Through each learn'd school, each philosophic
shade,
Where truth and virtue erst were deem'd to lie;
If haply the fair vagrants he § mote spy,
Or hear the music of their charming lore:
But all unable there to satisfy
His curious soul, he turn'd him to explore
The sacred writ of faith; to learn, believe, adore.

Thence foe profess'd of falsehood and deceit,
Those fly artificers of tyranny,
¶ Aye holding up before uncertain feet
His faithful light to knowledge, liberty,
Mankind he led, to civil policy,
And mild religion's charitable law;
That, fram'd by mercy and benignity
The persecuting sword forbids to draw,
And free-created souls with penal terrors awe.

 Ne with the glorious gifts elate and vain
Lock'd he his wisdom up in churlish pride;
But, stooping from his height, would even deign
The feeble steps of infancy to guide.
Eternal glory him therefore betide,
Let every generous youth his praise proclaim;
Who, wandering through the world's rude forrest wide,
By him hath been y-taught his course to frame
To virtue's sweet abodes, and heaven-aspiring fame!

For this the fairy knight with anxious thought,
And fond paternal care, his counsel pray'd;
And him of gentlest courtesy besought
His guidance to vouchsafe and friendly aid;
The while his tender offspring he convey'd,
Through devious paths to that secret retreat;
Where sage Pædia, with each tuneful maid,

On a wide mount had fix'd her rural seat,
'Mid flowery gardens plac'd, untrod by vulgar feet.

And now forth-pacing with his blooming heir,
And that same virtuous palmer them to guide;
Arm'd all to point, and on a courser fair
Y-mounted high, in military pride,
His little train before he slow did ride.

With his young lord aye marching side by side,
His counsellour and guard, in goodly † thews,
Who well had been brought up, and nurs'd by every muse.

Thus as their pleasing journey they pursued,
With cheerful argument beguiling pain:
Ere long descending from an hill they view'd
Beneath their eyes out-stretch'd a spacious plain,
That fruitful show'd, and apt for every grain,
For pastures, vines, and flowers; while nature fair
Sweet-smiling all around with countenance ‡ fain
Seem'd to demand the tiller's art and care,
Her wildness to correct, her lavish waste repair.

Right good, I ween, and bounteous was the soil
Aye wont in happy season to repay
With tenfold usury the peasant's toil.
But now 'twas ruin all, and wild decay;
Untill'd the garden and the fallow lay,
The sheep shorn down with barren ¶ brakes o'er-grown
The whiles the merry peasants sport and play.
All as the public evil were unknown,
Or every public care from every breast was flown.

Astonish'd at a scene at once so fair
And so deform'd; with wonder and delight
At man's neglect, and nature's bounty rare,
In studious thought a while the fairy knight
Bent on that goodly § lond his eager sight:
Then forward rush'd, impatient to descry
What towns and castles there-in were ¶ empight;
For towns him seem'd, and castles he did spy,
As to th' horizon round he stretch'd his roaming
eye.

Nor long way had they travell'd, ere they came
To a wide stream, that with tumultuous roar
Amongst rude rocks its winding course did frame.
Black was the wave and fordid, cover'd o'er
With angry foam, and stain'd with infants' gore.
Thereto along th' unlovely margin flood
A birchen grove, that waving from the shore,
Aye cast upon the tide its falling bud,
And with its bitter juice empoison'd all the flood.

Right in the centre of the vale empight,
Not distant far a forked mountain rose;
In outward form presenting to the sight
That fam'd Parnassian hill, on whose fair brows
The Nine Aonian Sisters wont repose;
Lisening to sweet Castalia's sounding stream,
Which through the plains of Cirrha murmuring flows,

But this to that compar'd more justly seem
Ne fitting haunt for gods, ne worthy man's esteem.

For this nor founded deep, nor spreaden wide,
Nor high up-rais'd above the level plain,
By toiling art through tedious years applied,
From various parts compil'd with studious pain,
Was * erst up-thrown; if so it mote attain,
Like that poetic mountain, to be † hight
The noble seat of learning's goodly train.
Thereto, the more to captivate the sight,
It like a garden fair most curiously was ‡ dight.

In figur'd plots with leafy walls inclos'd,
By measure and by rule it was out-lay'd;
With symmetry so regular dispos'd,
That plot to plot still answer'd, shade to shade;
Each correspondent twain alike array'd
With like embellishments of plants and flowers,
Of statues, vases, spouting founts, that play'd
Through shells of Tritons their ascending showers, [ers.]

And labyrinths involv'd, and trelice-woven-bow-
There likewise mote be seen on every side
The yew obedient to the planter's will,
And shapely box of all their branching pride
Ungently shorne, and with preposterous skill
To various beasts and birds of sundry quill [size;
Transform'd, and human shapes of monstrous
Huge as that giant-race, who, hill on hill [prize,
High-heaping, fought with impious vain || em-
Despite of thundering Jove, to scale the steepy skies.

Alse other wonders of the sportive shears
Fair nature mis-adorning there were found:
Globes, spiral columns, pyramids and piers
With sprouting urns and budding statues crown'd;
And horizontal dials on the ground
In living box by cunning artists trac'd;
And gallies trim, on no long voyage bound,
But by their roots there ever anchor'd fast [blast.

§ All were their bellying sails out-spread to every O'er all appear'd the mountain's fork'd brows
With terrasses on terrasses up-thrown;
And all along arrang'd in order'd rows,
And vists broad, the velvet slopes adown
The ever-verdant trees of Daphne shone.
But, aliens to the clime, and brought of old
From Latian plains, and Grecian Helicon,
They shrunk and languish'd in a foreign mold,
By changeful summers starv'd, and pinch'd by winter's cold.

Amid this verdant grove with solemn state,
On golden thrones of antique form reclin'd,
In mimic majesty nine virgins sat,
In features various as unlike in mind:
Alse boasted they themselves of heavenly kind,
And to the sweet Parnassian nymphs allied;
Thence round their brows the Delphic bay they
twin'd,

And matching with high names their apish pride,
O'er every learned school aye claim'd they to preside.

¶ Whilom, formerly.

Of various woofs, and variously distain'd;
With tints of every hue, were they array'd;
And here and there ambitiously display'd
A purple shred of some rich robe, prepar'd
Erst by the muses o'er the Aonian maid,
To deck great Tullius or the Mantuan bard;
Which o'er each motley vest with uncouth splendor glar'd.

And well their outward vesture did express
The bent and habit of their inward mind,
Affecting wisdom's antiquated dress,
And usages by time cast far behind.
Thence, to the charms of younger science blind,
The customs, laws, the learning, arts and phrase
Of their own countries they with scorn declin'd;
Ne sacred truth herself would they embrace,
Unwarranted, unknown in their fore-fathers' days.

Thus ever backward casting their survey;
To Rome's old ruins and the groves forlorn;
Of elder Athens, which in prospect lay [turn
Stretch'd out beneath the mountain would they
Their busy search, and o'er the rubbish mourn.
Then, gathering up with superstitious care
Each little scrap, however foul or torn,
In grave harangues they boldly would declare,
This Ennius, Varro: This the Stagarite did wear.

Yet, under names of venerable sound,
While o'er the world they stretch'd their awful
rod;

Through all the provinces of learning own'd
For teachers of whate'er is wise and good.
Alse from each region to their * drad abode
Came youth unnumber'd, crowding all to taste
The streams of science; which united flow'd
Adown the mount, from nine rich sources cast;
And to the vale below in one rude torrent pass'd.

O'er every source, protectress of the stream,
One of those virgin sisters did preside;
Who, dignifying with her noble name
Her proper flood, aye pour'd into the tide
The heady vapours of scholastic pride
Despotical and abject, bold and blind,
Fierce in debate, and forward to decide;
Vain love of praise, with adulation join'd,
And disingenuous scorn, and impotence of mind.

Extending from the hill on every side,
In circuit vast a verdant valley spread;
Across whose uniform flat bosom glide
Ten thousand streams, in winding mazes led,
By various sluices from one common head;
A* turbid mass of waters, vast, profound,
Hight of philology the lake; and fed
By that rude torrent, which with roaring sound
Came tumbling from the hill, and flow'd the level
round.

And every where this spacious valley o'er,
Fast by each stream was seen a numerous throng
Of beardless striplings to the birch-crown'd shore,
By nurses, guardians, fathers, dragg'd along:
Who, helpless, meek, and innocent of wrong,
Were torn reluctant from the tender side
Of their fond mothers, and by † faitours strong.

* Drad, dreadful. † Faitour, doer, from faire, to do, and fait; deed, commonly used by Spenser in a bad sense.

By power made insolent, and hard by pride,
Were driven with furious rage, and lash'd into the tide.

On the rude bank with trembling feet they stood,
And, casting round their oft-reverted eyes,
If haply they mote 'scape the hated flood,
Fill'd all the plain with lamentable cries;
But far away th' unheeding father flies,
Constrain'd his strong compunctions to repress;
While close behind, assuming the disguise
Of nurturing care, and smiling tenderness, [press.
With secret scourges, arm'd, those grievously fattours

As on the steepy margin of a brook,
When the young sun with flowery Maia rides :
With innocent dismay a bleating flock
Crowd back, affrighted at the rolling tides :
The shepherd-swain at first exhorting chides
Their * seely fear; at length impatient grown,
With his rude crook he wounds their tender
And, all regardless of their piteous moan, [sides;
Into the dashing wave compels them furious down.

Thus urg'd by mastering fear and dolorous † teen
Into the current plung'd that infant crowd.
Right piteous was the spectacle, I ween,
Of tender striplings stain'd with tears and blood,
Perforce conflicting with the bitter flood;
And labouring to attain the distant shore,
Where holding forth the gown of manhood stood
The syren liberty, and ever-more
Solicited their hearts with her enchanting lore.

Irkfome and long the passage was, perplex'd
With rugged rocks on which the raving tide
By sudden bursts of angry tempests vex'd [abide
Oft dash'd the youth, whose strength mote ill
With head up-lifted o'er the waves to ride.
Whence many wearied ere they had o'er-past
The middle stream (for they in vain have try'd)
Again return'd ‡ astounded and aghast;
No one regardful look would ever backward cast.

Some, of a rugged, more enduring frame,
Their toilsome course with patient pain pursued;
And, though with many a bruise and || muchel
blame,
Eft hanging on the rocks, and eft embrued,
Deep in the muddy stream, with hearts subdued
And quail'd by labour, gain'd the shore at last,
But in life's practis'd § lear unskill'd and rude,
Forth in that forked hill they silent pac'd;
Where hid in studious shades their fruitless hours
they waste.

Others of rich and noble lineage bred, [strain'd,
Though with the crowd to pass the flood con-
Yet o'er the crags with fond indulgence led
By hireling guides, and in all depths sustain'd,
Skimm'd lightly o'er the tide, undipt, unstain'd,
Save with the sprinkling of the watery spray,
And aye their proud prerogative maintain'd,
Of ignorance and ease, and wanton play,
Soft harbingers of vice, and premature decay.

* Seely, simple. † Teen, pain, grief.

And to the true ‡ Parnasse and heaven-throng'd glory flew.

Dire was the tumult, and from every shore
Discordant echoes struck the deafen'd ear,
Heart-thrilling cries, with sobs and || singults fore
Short-interrupted, the imploring tear,
And furious stripes, and angry threats severe,
Confus'dly mingled with the jarring sound
Of all the various speeches that § while-ere
On Shinar's wide-spread champain did astound
High Babel's builders vain, and their proud works confound.

Much was the knight empassion'd at the scene,
But more his blooming son, whose tender breast
Empierced deep with sympathizing teen
On his pale cheek the signs of drad impress'd,
And fill'd his eyes with tears, which fore distres'd
Up to his fire he rais'd in mournful wife;
Who with sweet smiles paternal soon redress'd
His troublous thoughts, and clear'd each sad
furmise;

Then turns his ready steed, and on his journey hies.

But far he had not march'd ere he was stay'd
By a rude voice, that like th' united sound
Of shouting myriads, through the valley bray'd,
And shook the groves, the floods, and solid
ground:

The distant hills rebellow'd all around.
" Arrest, Sir Knight, it cried, thy fond career,
" Nor with presumptuous disobedience wound
" That awful majesty which all revere!
" In my commands, Sir Knight, the voice of na-

Quick turn'd the knight, and saw upon the plain
Advancing tow'rd him with impetuous gait,
And visage all inflam'd with fierce disdain,
A monstrous giant, on whose brow elate
Shone the bright ensign of imperial state;
Albeit lawful kingdom he had none;
But laws and kingdoms wont he oft create,
And oft times over both erect his throne,
While senates, priests, and kings his ¶ sov'ran sceptre own.

Custom he height; and aye in every land
Usurp'd dominion with despotic sway
O'er all he holds; and to his high command
Constrains even stubborn nature to obey;
Whom dispossessing oft, he doth assay
To govern in her right: and with a pace
So soft and gentle doth he win his way,
That she unwares is caught in his embrace,
And though deflower'd and thrall'd nought feels

And on his bugle clear a strain of triumph blew.

There-at the multitude, that stood around,
Sent up at once a universal roar
Of boisterous joy: the sudden-bursting sound,
Like the explosion of a warlike store
Of nitrous grain, th' afflicted * welkin tore.
Then turning towards the knight, with scoffings
Heart-piercing insults, and revilings fore, [lewd,
Loud bursts of laughter vain, and hisses rude,
As through the throng he pass'd, his parting steps pursued.

Alse from that forked hill the boasted seat
Of studious peace and mild philosophy,
Indignant murmurs mote be heard to threat,
Mustered their rage; eke baleful infamy,
Rous'd from her den of base obscurity
By those same maidens nine, began to sound
Her brazen trump of blackening obloquy:
While satire, with dark clouds encompass'd round,
Sharp, secret arrows shot, and aim'd his back to
wound.

But the brave fairy knight, no whit dismay'd,
Held on his peaceful journey o'er the plain;
With curious eye observing, as he stray'd
Through the wide provinces of custom's reign,
What mote afresh admonish him remain
Fast by his virtuous purpose; all around
So many objects mov'd his just disdain;
Him seem'd that nothing serious, nothing found,
In city, village, bower, or castle, mote be found.

In village, city, castle, bower, and hall,
Each sex, each age, each order and degree,
To vice and idle sport abandon'd all,
Kept one perpetual general jubilee.
Ne suffer'd ought disturb their merry glee;
Ne sense of private loss, ne public woes,
Restraint of law, religion's drad decree,
Intestine desolation, foreign foes,
Nor heaven's tempestuous threats, nor earth's convulsive throes.

But chiefly they whom heaven's disposing hand
Had seated high on fortune's upper stage;
And plac'd within their call the sacred band
That waits on nurture and instruction sage,
If happy their wife † hefts mote them engage
To climb through knowledge to more noble
And as they mount, enlighten every age [praise;
With the bright influence of fair Virtue's rays;
Which from the awful heights of grandeur brighter blaze.

* Welkin, sky.

† Hefts, behests, precepts, commands.

They, O perverse and base ingratitude!
Despising the great ends of providence,
For which above their mates they were endued
With wealth, authority, and eminence,
To the low services of brutal sense
Abus'd the means of pleasures more refin'd,
Of knowledge, virtue, and beneficence; [mind,
And, fettering on her throne th' immortal
The guidance of her realm to passions wild re-
sign'd.

Hence thoughtless, shameless, reckless, spiritless,
Nought worthy of their kind did they essay;
But or benumb'd with palsied Idleness
In merely living loiter'd life away.
Or, by false taste of pleasure led astray,
For-ever wandering in the sensual bowers
Of feverish debauch, and lustful play,
Spent on ignoble toils their active powers,
And with untimely blasts diseas'd their vernal hours.

Ev'n they to whom kind nature did accord
A frame more delicate, and purer mind, [board
Though the foul brothel and the wine-stain'd
Of beastly Comus, loathing they declin'd,
Yet their soft hearts to idle joys resign'd;
Like painted insects through the summer-air
With random flight aye ranging unconfin'd;
And tasting every flower and blossom fair,
Withouten any choice, withouten any care.

For choice them needed none, who only sought
With vain amusements to beguile the day;
And wherefore should they take or care or
thought,
Whom nature prompts, and fortune calls to play?
"Lords of the earth, be happy as ye may!"
So learn'd, so taught the leaders of mankind;
Th' unreasoning vulgar willingly obey,
And, leaving toil and poverty behind, [find.
Ran forth by different ways the blissful boon to

Nor tedious was the search; for every where,
As nigh great custom's royal towers the knight
Pass'd through th' adjoining hamlets, mote he
The merry voice of festival delight [hear
Saluting the return of morning bright
With matin revels, by the mid-day hours
Scarce ended; and again with dewy night,
In cover'd theatres, or leafy bowers, [powers.
Offering her evening-vows to pleasure's joyous

And ever on the way mote he espy
Men, women, children, a promiscuous throng
Of rich, poor, wise and simple, low and high,
By land, by water, passing aye along
With mummers, antics, music, dance, and song,
To pleasure's numerous temples, that beside
The glistening streams, or tufted groves among,
To every idle foot stood open wide,
And every gay desire with various joys supplied.

For there each earth with diverse charms to
move,
The sly inchantress summoned all her train:
Alluring Venus, queen of vagrant love,
The boon companion Bacchus, loud and vain,
And tricking Hermes, god of fraudulent gain,
Who, when blind fortune throws, directs the
And Phœbus tuning his soft Lydian strain [die,

To wanton motions, and the lover's sigh,
And thought-beguiling shew, and masking revelry.

Unmeet associates these for noble youth,
Who to true honour meaneth to aspire;
And for the works of virtue, faith, and truth,
Would keep his manly faculties entire.

The which avizing well, the cautious fire
From that soft syren land of Pleasaunce vain,
With timely haste was minded to retire,

* Or ere the sweet contagion mote attain [stain.
His son's unpractis'd heart, yet free from vicious

So turning from that beaten road aside, [pac'd,
Through many a devious path at length he
As that experienc'd palmer did him guide,
Till to a mountain hoare they came at last;
Whose high-rais'd brows with sylvan honours
Majestically frown'd upon the plain, [grac'd,
And over all an awful horror cast.

Seem'd as those villas gay it did disdain, [train.
Which spangled all the vale like Flora's painted

The hill ascended strait, ere-while they came
To a tall grove, whose thick-embowering shade,
Impervious to the sun's meridian flame,
Ev'n at mid-noon a dubious twilight made;
Like to that sober light, which, disarray'd
Of all its gorgeous robe, with blunted beams,
Through windows dim with holy acts pour-
tray'd,

Along some cloister'd abbey faintly gleams,
Abstracting the rapt thought from vain earth-
musing themes.

Beneath this high o'er-arching canopy
Of clustering oaks a sylvan colonnade,
Aye listening to the native melody
Of birds sweet-echoing through the lonely shade,
On to the centre of the grove they stray'd;
Which, in a spacious circle opening round,
Within its sheltering arms securely laid,
Disclos'd to sudden view a vale profound,

With nature's artless smiles and tranquil beauties
crown'd.

There, on the basis of an ancient pile, [wood,
Whose cross-surmounted spire o'erlook'd the
A venerable matron they e'erwhile
Discover'd have, beside a murmuring flood
Reclining in right sad and pensive mood.
Retir'd within her own abstracted breast,
She seem'd o'er various woes by turns to brood;
The which her changing cheer by turns exprest,
Now glowing with disdain, with grief now
* over-kest.

Her thus immers'd in anxious thought profound
When-as the knight perceiv'd, he nearer drew;
To weet what bitter bale did her astound,
And whence th' occasion of her anguish grew.
For that right noble matron well he knew;
And many perils huge, and labours sore,
Had for her sake endur'd; her vassal true,
Train'd in her love, and practis'd evermore
Her honour to respect, and reverence her lore,

O dearest drad! he cried, fair island queen!
Mother of heroes! empress of the main!

* Or ere, before.

† Over-kest, for over-cast.

What means that stormy brow of troublous teen?

* Sith heaven-born Peace, with all her smiling
Of sciences and arts, adorns thy reign [train
With wealth and knowledge, splendour and renown? [plain!

Each port how throng'd! how fruitful every
How blithe the country! and how gay the town!
While liberty secures and heightens every boon!

Awaken'd from her trance of pensive woe
By these fair flattering words, she rais'd her head;
And, bending on the knight her frowning brow,
Mock'dst thou my sorrows, fairy son? she said.
Or is thy judgment by thy heart misled
To deem that certain which thy hopes suggest?
To deem them full of life and * lustihead,
Whose cheeks in Hebe's vivid tints are drest,
And with joy's careless mien, and dimpled smiles
imprest?

Thy unsuspecting heart how nobly good
I know, how sanguine in thy country's cause!
And mark'd thy virtue, singly how it stood
Th' assaults of mighty custom, which o'erawes
The faint and timorous mind, and oft withdraws
From reason's lore th' ambitious and the vain
By the sweet lure of popular applause,
Against their bitter knowledge to maintain
The lawless throne of vice, or folly's childish
reign.

How vast his influence, how wide his sway!
Thyself ere-while by proof didst understand:
And saw'st, as through his realms thou took'st
thy way,
How vice and folly had o'erspread the land.
And canst thou then, O fairy son, demand
The reason of my woe? or hope to ease
The throbbings of my heart with speeches bland,
And words more apt my sorrows to increase,
The once dear names of wealth, and liberty, and peace?

Peace, wealth, and liberty, that noblest boon,
Are blessings, only to the wise and good.
To weak and vicious minds their worth unknown,
And thence abus'd but serve to furnish food
For riot and debauch, and fire the blood
With high-spiced luxury; whence strife, debate,
Ambition, envy, faction's viperous brood,
Contempt of order, manners profligate
The symptoms of a foul, diseas'd, and bloated state.

Ev'n wit and genius, with their learned train
Of arts and muses, though from heaven above
Descended, when their talents they profane
To varnish folly, kindle wanton love,
And aid eccentric sceptic pride to rove
Beyond celestial truth's attractive sphere,
This moral system's central sun, aye prove
To their fond votaries a curse severe,
And only make mankind more obstinately err.

And stand my sons herein from censure clear?
Have they considered well, and understood,
The use and import of those blessings dear,
Which the great Lord of nature hath bestow'd

* Sith, since.

† Lustihead, strong health, vigour.

As well to prove as to reward the good? [seas
Whence are these torrents then, these billowy
Of vice, in which, as in his proper flood,
The fell Leviathan licentious plays, [preys?
And upon shipwreck'd faith and sinking virtue

To you, ye noble, opulent and great!
With friendly voice I call, and honest zeal!
Upon your vital influences wait
The health and sickness of the commonweal;
The maladies you cause, yourselves must heal.
In vain to the unthinking harden'd crowd
Will truth and reason make their just appeal;
In vain will sacred wisdom cry aloud; [blood.
And justice drench in vain her vengeful sword in

With you must reformation first take place:
You are the head, the intellectual mind
Of this vast body politic whose base,
And vulgar limbs, to drudgery consign'd,
All the rich stores of science have resign'd
To you, that by the craftsman's various toil,
The sea-worn mariner, and sweating hind,
In peace and affluence maintain'd, the while
You, for yourselves and them, may dress the mental soil.

Bethink you then, my children, of the trust
In you repos'd: ne let your heaven-born mind
Consume in pleasure, or unactive rust;
But nobly rouse you to the task assign'd,
The godlike task to teach and mend mankind:
Learn, that ye may instruct: to virtue lead
Yourself the way: the herd will crowd behind,

And gather precepts from each worthy deed:
"Example is a lesson, that all men can read."

But if (to all or most I do not speak)
In vain and sensual habits now grown old,
The strong Circean charm you cannot break,
Nor re-assume at will your native * mould,
Yet envy not the state you could not hold;
And take compassion on the rising age:
In them redeem your errors manifold;
And, by due discipline and nurture sage,
In virtue's lore betimes your docile sons engage.

You chiefly, who like me in secret mourn
The prevalence of custom lewd and vain;
And you, who, though, by the rude torrent
Unwillingly along, you yield with pain [borne
To his behests, an act what you disdain,
Yet nourish in your hearts the generous love
Of piety and truth, no more restrain
The manly zeal; but all your sinews move
The present to reclaim, the future race improve!

Eftsoons by your joint efforts shall be quell'd
Yon haughty giant, who so proudly sways
A sceptre by repute alone upheld;
Who, where he cannot dictate strait obeys.
Accustom'd to conform his flattering phrase
To numbers and high-plac'd authority,
Your party he will join, your maxims praise,
And, drawing after all his menial fry,
Soon teach the general voice your act to ratify.

Ne for the achievement of this great emprise
The want of means or counsel may ye dread.

* Mould, shape, form.

From my Twin-daughter's fruitful wombs shall
A race of letter'd sages, deeply read [rise
In learning's various writ: by whom yled
Through each well-cultur'd plot, each beauteous
grove,

Where antique wisdom whilom wont to tread,
With mingled glee and profit may ye rove,
And cull each virtuous plant, each tree of knowledge prove.

Yourselves with virtue thus and knowledge
fraught

Of what, in ancient days of good or great
Historians, bards, philosophers, have taught;
Join'd with whatever else of modern date
Maturer judgment, search more accurate,
Discover'd have of nature, man, and God,
May by new laws reform the time-worn state
Of cell-bred discipline, and smoothe the road
That leads through learning's vale to wisdom's bright abode.

By you invited to her secret bowers,
Then shall Pædia reascend her throne,
With vivid laurels girt and fragrant flowers;
While from their forked mount descending
Yon supercilious pedant train shall own [down
Her empire paramount, ere-long by her
Ytaught a lesson in their schools unknown,
"To learning's richest treasures to prefer
"The knowledge of the world, and man's great business there."

On this prime science, as the final end
Of all her discipline and nurturing care,
Her eye Pædia fixing aye shall bend
Her every thought and effort to prepare
Her tender pupils for the various war,
Which vice and folly shall upon them wage,
As on the perilous march of life they fare
With prudent lore fore-arming every age
'Gainst pleasure's treacherous joys, and pain's embattled rage.

Then shall my youthful sons, to wisdom led
By fair example and ingenuous praise,
With willing feet the paths of duty tread;
Through the world's intricate or rugged ways
Conducted by religion's sacred rays;
Whose soul-invigorating influence
Shall purge their minds from all impure allays
Of fordid selfishness and brutal sense, [volence,
And swell th' ennobled heart with blest bene-

Then also shall this emblematic pile,
By magic whilom fram'd to sympathize
With all the fortunes of this changeful isle,
Still, as my sons in fame and virtue rise, [skies
Grow with their growth, and to th' applauding
Its radiant cross uplift; the while, to grace
The multiplying niches, fresh supplies
Of worthies shall succeed, with equal pace
Aye following their fires in virtue's glorious race.

Fir'd with th' idea of her future fame,
She rose majestic from her lowly stead;
While from her vivid eyes a sparkling flame,
Out-beaming, with unwonted light o'erspread
That monumental pile; and as her head
To every front she turn'd, discovered round
The venerable front of heroes dead;

Who, for their various merit erst renown'd,
In this bright fane of glory shrines of honour found.

On these that royal dame her ravish'd eyes
Would often feast, and ever as she spy'd
Forth from the ground the lengthening structure rise

With new-plac'd statues deck'd on every side,
Her parent-breast would swell with generous pride.

And now with her in that sequester'd plain,
The knight awhile constraining to abide,
She to the fairy youth with pleasure fain
Those sculptur'd chiefs did shew, and their great lives explain.

FATHER FRANCIS'S PRAYER.

Written in Lord Westmoreland's hermitage.

Ne gay attire, ne marble-hall,
Ne arched roof, ne pictur'd wall;
Ne cook of Fraunce, ne dainty board,
Bestow'd with pyes of perigord;
Ne power, ne such like idle fancies,
Sweet Agnes grant to Father Francis;
Let me ne more myself deceive;
Ne more regret the toys I leave;
The world I quit, the proud, the vain,
Corruption's and ambition's train;
But not the good, perdie, nor fair,
'Gainst them I make ne vow, ne prayer;
But such aye welcome to my cell,
And oft, not always with me dwell;
Then cast, sweet faint, a circle round,
And blest from fools this holy ground;
From all the foes to worth and truth,
From wanton old, and homely youth;

The gravely dull, and pertly gay,
Oh banish these, and, by my fay,
Right well I ween that in this age,
Mine house shall prove an hermitage.

AN INSCRIPTION ON THE CELL.

Beneath these moss-grown roots, this rustic cell,
Truth, liberty, content, sequester'd dwell;
Say, you who dare our hermitage disdain,
What drawing-room can boast so fair a train?

AN INSCRIPTION IN THE CELL.

Sweet bird, that sing'st on yonder spray,
Pursue unharm'd thy sylvan lay;
While I beneath this breezy shade,
In peace repose my careless head;
And joining thy enraptur'd song,
Instruct the world-enamour'd throng,
That the contented harmless breast
In solitude itself is blest.

INSCRIPTION ON A SUMMER-HOUSE

BELONGING TO MR. WEST, AT WICKHAM, IN KENT.

(An imitation of Ausonius, "Ad Villam.")

Nor wrapt in smoky London's sulphurous clouds
And not far distant, stands my rural cot:
Neither obnoxious to intruding crowds,
Nor for the good and friendly too remote.

And when too much repose brings on the spleen,
Or the gay city's idle pleasures cloy;
Swift as my changing wish, I change the scene;
And now the country, now the town enjoy.

INSTITUTION
ORDER OF THE GARTER; A DRAMATIC POEM.

———Lectos ex omnibus Oris

*Evebis ; & meritum, non quæ cunabula quæris,
Et qualis, non unde satus : sub teste benigno
Vivitur ; egregios invitant præmia mores,* CLAUD.
HONI SOIT QUI MAL Y PENSE.

DRAMATIS PERSONÆ.

EDWARD the Third, King of England, &c.
PHILIPPA, Queen of England, &c.
EDWARD, Prince of Wales.
JOHN, * King of France, &c.
SPIRITS, { Genius of England.
 { Bards.
 { Druids.
Heralds, Attendants, &c.

SCENE,

Windfor Park, with a Prospect of the Castle.

Flourish of ærial music at a distance, after which the following verses are sung in the air by Spirits, while the Genius of England descends.

First Spirit.

HITHER, all ye heav'nly pow'rs,
From your empyreal bow'rs;
From the fields for ever gay,
From the star-pav'd milky way,

From the moon's reluctant horil,
From the star that wakes the morn;
From the bow, whose mingling dyes
Sweetly cheer the frowning skies;
From the silver cloud that sails
Shadowy o'er the darken'd vales;
From th' Elysium's of the sky,
Spirits immortal, hither fly!

Chorus of Spirits.

Fly, and through the limpid air
Guard in pomp the sliding car,
Which to his terrestrial throne
Wafts Britannia's genius down:

Second Spirit.

Hither, all ye heav'nly pow'rs!
From your empyreal bow'rs!
Chiefly ye, whose brows divine
Crown'd with starry circlets shine;
Who in various labours try'd,
Once Britannia's strength and pride,
Now in everlasting rest
Share the glories of the blest!
Peers and nobles of the sky,
Spirits immortal, hither fly!

Chorus of Spirits.

Fly, and through the limpid air
Guard in pomp the sliding car,
Which to his terrestrial throne
Wafts Britannia's genius down.

* The Order of the Garter was instituted on St. George's day, the 23d of April 1350. King John came into England in 1357. I have taken the advantage of the licence usually allowed to poets, of departing a little from chronology; and having postponed for a few years the institution of this order, for the sake of rendering that solemnity more august, by introducing King John of France, who, though a prisoner, was treated both by Edward and his son the Prince of Wales with all the regard due to the quality and virtue of so great a prince. To alleviate his captivity, Edward entertained him and the other French prisoners with diversions of various kinds: among which a tournament he held at Windfor on the 23d of April, to solemnize the feast of St. George, the patron of the Order of the Garter, held the chief place; and was, as Rapin tells us, the most sumptuous and magnificent that had ever been seen in England. The duke of Brabant, with several other sovereign princes, and an infinite number of knights of all nations were present, and splendidly entertained.

Third Spirit.

Hither too, ye tuneful throng,
 Masters of enchanting song,
 Sacred bards! whose rapt'rous strains
 Sooth the toiling heroe's pains,
 Sooth the patriot's gen'rous cares;
 Sweetly through their ravish'd ears
 Whisp'ring to th' immortal mind
 Heav'nly visions, hopes refin'd;
 Hopes of endless peace and fame,
 Safe from envy's blasting flame,
 Pure, sincere, in those abodes,
 Where to throngs of list'ning gods,
 Hymning bards, to virtues' praise,
 Tune their never-dying lays.
 Sweet encomiasts of the sky,
 Spirits immortal, hither fly!

Chorus of Spirits.

Fly, and charm the limpid air,
 While the softly-sliding car,
 To his sea-encircled throne
 Wafts Britannia's genius down.

Chorus of Bards descends, dress'd in long flowing sky-colour'd robes spangled with stars, with garlands of oaken boughs upon their heads, and golden harps in their hands, made like the Welch, or old British harp. Before they appear, they sing the chorus, and afterwards, as they descend, the following songs; at the last stanza of which, the chariot of the Genius appears, and descends gradually all the while that and the grand chorus is singing.

Chorus of Bards.

Gentle spirit, we obey;
 Thus along th' ethereal way,
 We attend our monarch's car;
 Thus we charm the silent air.

SONG.

First Bard.

YE southern gales, that ever fly
 In frolic April's vernal train,
 Who, as ye skim along the sky,
 Dip your light pinions in the main,
 Then shake them fraught with genial show'rs,
 O'er blooming Flora's primrose bow'rs:
 Now cease a while your wanton sport,
 Now drive each threat'ning cloud away;
 Then to the flow'ry vale resort,
 And hither all its sweets convey;
 And ever as ye dance along,
 With softest murmurs aid our song.

SONG.

Second Bard.

But lo! fair Windsor's tow'rs appear,
 And hills with spreading oaks imbrown'd!
 Hark! hark! the voice of joy I hear,
 Sung by a thousand echoes round;
 And now I view a glitt'ring train,
 In triumph march o'er yonder plain.

Grand Chorus of Spirits and Bards.

Hail mighty nation! ever fam'd in war!
 Lo! heav'n descends thy festivals to share;

To view those heroes, whose immortal praise
 Celestial bards shall sing in living lays.

At the conclusion of this chorus, the Genius alights from his chariot, the front of which resembling the head of a man of war, is adorned with a carved lion, holding before his breast the arms of England, as they were borne by Edward. Behind, on a raised seat, sits the Genius, leaning upon an anchor of silver, and bearing in his right hand the vindicta, or wand of enfranchisement, and in his left a roll of parchment, upon which is written, in large letters of gold, MAGNA CHARTA. On his head is a corona rostrata, or naval crown; and his robe, of a sea-green colour, is embroidered with cornucopia's and golden tridents.

Genius.

Disdain not, ye blest denizens of air,
 To breathe this grosser atmosphere a while,
 Your service I shall need; mean time resort
 To yon imperial palace, and in air
 Draw up your squadrons in a radiant orb,
 Suspended o'er those lofty battlements,
 Like the bright halo that invests the moon,
 Or Saturn's lucid ring: thence shed benign
 Your choicest influence on the noble train,
 There on this solemn day assembled round
 The throne of British Edward: I awhile
 Must here await th' approach of other spirits,
 Sage Druids, Britain's old philosophers;
 Fetch'd by my summons from the western isles,
 That, scatter'd o'er the rough Hibernian flood,
 Seem like huge fragments by the wild wave torn
 From stormy Scotland, and the Cambrian shore.
 There, from the world retir'd, in sacred shades,
 Chiefly where Breint and Meinai wash'd the oaks
 Of ancient Mona, their academies
 And schools of sage and moral discipline
 They held; and to the neighb'ring Britons round,
 From their rever'd tribunals, holy mounts,
 Dispens'd at once their oracles and laws.
 'Till fierce Paulinus, and his Roman bands,
 Them and their gods defying, drove them thence
 To seek for shelter in Hibernian shades.
 Yet still enamour'd of their ancient haunts,
 Unseen of mortal eyes, they hover round
 Their ruin'd altars, consecrated hills,
 Once girt with spreading oaks, mysterious rows
 Of rude enormous obelisks, that rise
 Orb within orb, stupendous monuments
 Of artless architecture, such as now
 Oft times amaze the wand'ring traveller,
 By the pale moon discern'd on Sarum's plain.
 But hence, aerial spirits: lo, they come!

Here the Spirits and Bards, together with the chariot of the Genius, reascend, and at the same time the Druids enter cloib'd in dark-colour'd coarse stuff gowns which before hang no lower than the knee, but behind almost touch the ground. The sleeves of these gowns reach down below the elbow, and from behind comes up a sort of hood or coul, which hangs loose about the head and fore-head. From the left shoulder hangs in a string a kind of pouch, or scrip, and rests on the right hip. In their right hands they hold a staff, and in their left an oaken branch. Their beards are very large and long, reaching below their waists. Their legs are naked, and their feet shod with sandals, which are fastened by thongs wound about the foot and the small of the leg*.

ENTER DRUIDS.

Chief Druid.

Inform us, happy spirit, protecting pow'r
Of this our ancient country, wherefore now
From our sequester'd vallies, pensive groves
And dark recesses, thou hast summon'd us
To wait thy orders on this flow'ry hill?

Genius.

A great event, sage Druids, that no less
Imports than this your ancient country's fame,
From contemplation, and your silent shades,
Calls you to meet me on this flow'ry hill.

Know, in yon castle, whose proud battlements
Sit like a regal crown upon the brow
Of this high-climbing lawn, doth Edward hold
This day his solemn session, to receive
The pleas of all th' aspiring candidates,
Who, summon'd by the † herald's public voice,
To Windsor, as to Fame's bright temple, haste
From every shore; the noble, wise, and brave,
Knights, senators, and statesmen, lords and kings;
Ambitious each to gain the splendid prize,
By Edward promis'd to transcendent worth.
For who of mortals is so great and high
In the career of virtue to contend?

Of these, selecting the most glorious names,
Doth England's monarch purpose to compose
A princely brotherhood, himself the chief,
And worthy sovereign of th' illustrious band;
A band of heroes list'd in the cause
Of honour, virtue, and celestial truth,
Under the name and holy patronage
Of Cappadocian George, Britannia's saint.

Such is the plan by gen'rous Edward form'd;
A plan of glory, that beyond the reach
Of his own conqu'ring arms, shall propagate
The sovereignty of Britain, and erect
Her monarchs into judges of mankind.

But from this day's decisions, from the choice
Of his first colleagues, shall succeeding times
Of Edward judge, and on his fame pronounce.
For dignities and titles, when misplac'd
Upon the vicious, the corrupt and vile,
Like princely virgins to low peasants match'd,
Descend from their nobility, and soil'd
By base alliance, not their pride alone
And native splendor lose, but shame retort
Ev'n on the sacred throne, from whence they
So may the lustre of this order bright [sprung.
This eldest child of chivalry be stain'd,
If at her first espousals her great sire,
Caught by the specious outides that deceive
And captivate the world, admit the suit
Of vain pretenders void of real worth;

* See a cut of the chief Druid in Rowland's Mona Antiqua restaurata, taken from a statue, p. 65.

† Edward having communicated his intention of instituting the Order of the Garter to the great council of his realm, and having received their approbation, dispatched his heralds to several parts of Europe, to invite all that were eminent for military virtue, &c. to be present at its institution. And his queen Philippa, on her part, assembled a train of 300 of the fairest ladies to grace the solemnity, and add to its magnificence.

VOL. IX.

Light empty bubbles, by the wanton gale
Of fortune swell'd, and only form'd to dance
And glitter in the sun-shine of a court.

Begin we then with Edward; first let him
At his own high tribunal undergo
The rigid inquisition—I for this
Have left my lucid star-encircled throne:
For this, immortal sages, have requir'd
Your wise and prudent ministry, well skill'd
In various science and the human heart.
Search Edward's to the bottom: sound the depths
And shallows of his soul; if he possess
That first of regal talents, to discern
With quick-ey'd penetration, through the veil
Of art, each character's intrinsic worth,
And all the labyrinths of the human mind.
Nor blush for this good end yourselves to wear
Fallacious forms to plead the cause of false
But specious merit: at his throne appear
In borrow'd shapes, and there with artful guile,
When the shrill trumpet cites the candidates,
Urge your pretensions: all the pow'r employ
Of wit and eloquence: Edward, I trust,
The trial shall abide; which shall but tend
To manifest, that not from arrogance,
But conscious virtue, hath he thus assum'd
Above all other kings, to be the judge
And great rewarder of heroic deeds.
Nor wholly unassisted will I leave
My royal charge, but with blest influence clear
His intellectual eye from the dim mists
It happily hath contracted from a long
Unebbing current of felicity,
Unhop'd, unequall'd triumphs from the view
Of captive monarchs, and the glitt'ring throng,
Who at his summons from all climates come,
To take, as from their sovereign, honours new.
When heav'n tries mortals in unusual ways,
'Tis fit it should afford unusual aid.

Now, sages, to yon spreading oaks retire,
There wait my summons; and meantime advise
How best to execute the task enjoin'd.

Ex. Gen. and Druids.

The SCENE changes to a large room in the castle (St. George's Hall) at the upper end of which is a royal canopy with the figure of St. George, and the motto of the Garter, HONI SOIT QUI MAL Y PENSE, beneath it, embroider'd in gold. Under this canopy appears seated on an elevation of two or three steps, King Edward, in the habit of the Order of the Garter, with a sceptre in his right hand, and a globe in his left. On his left hand is seated Queen Philippa, with a crown upon her head, and dress'd in a royal mantle of crimson velvet, powder'd with embroider'd garters, and an enamel'd* garter bound like a bracelet upon her left arm. By her stand a great number of ladies very richly dress'd. On Edward's right hand is seated King John, in the imperial robes of France; and on the same side, but a step lower, sits Edward the Black Prince, in the robes belonging to the Prince of Wales. Next to Queen Philippa are seated the rest of Edward's children; and next to the Black Prince, on the other side, stand the French prisoners, and a great number of lords, &c. richly dressed.

* That ladies of the Knights of the Garter wore this ensign of the order upon their left arms, may be seen in Asmole's History of the Garter.

On the floor, at some distance, stands Garter king at arms in the habit of his office, holding in his hand a garter, with the grand collar of the order. Near him stand other heralds, ushers, attendants, &c.

Flourish of trumpets, kettle-drums, &c. After which, Edward, rising up from his throne, addresses himself to the assembly.

Edward.

That hither from your distant residence,
By solemn invitation, noble guests,
I have entreated your illustrious train,
Misconstrue not to levity and pride,
Or ostentatious vain magnificence,
Unworthy the grave majesty of kings,
Unworthy your attention, my renown.
This bright assemblage of the wise, the brave,
The noble, the magnificent, the fair,
The ornaments of Europe, have I sought
To grace the pomp of virtue, to adorn
With noblest off'rings her unspotted shrine,
Attracting thus to her divine commands
The awful veneration of mankind,
This was the cause, great princes, this the call,
The voice of virtue, not of England's king,
That with respectful zeal ye heard and follow'd:
From Burgundy's rich vineyards, from the meads
Of Hainault and Brabant, the rocky wave
Of Danube, from Germania's warlike tow'rs,
Imperial mother of an hundred states;
From Spain, long exercis'd by Moorish arms,
From Italy's fair princedoms, and the walls
Of sea-wash'd Venice, Adria's haughty spouse.
With me then, all ye virtuous, by what style
Recorded in the registers of fame,
Knights, senators, or soldiers, ermin'd lords,
Or sceptr'd princes; from whatever clime
Ye come, ennobled by heroic acts,
With me unite the splendor of your names
To dignify th' erection of a new
And noble order, which to heav'n's high praise,
And to heav'n's champion Cappadocian George,
On this his holy festival I mean
To found, a recompence for worthiest deeds.
Thus as the orient sun, ador'd of old
By prostrate Persia, ow'd his deity
Less to that genial and benignant heat
That cherishes and warms the seeds of life, [gold,
Than to those gorgeous beams, that deck with
And crimson the gay portals of the morn;
So shall this rising order owe its fame
And brightest lustre to the splendid train
Of lords and purpled princes, who are met
This day to usher and adorn its birth.

Nor deem that to allure heroic minds,
My private int'rests partially to serve,
To lift the valiant in ambition's cause,
And form a league of conquest, I have laid
In subtle policy this great design:

* ASHAM'D BE HE WHO WITH MALIGNANT EYE
SO READS MY PURPOSE: and be he accurs'd

* Edward being engaged in a war with France, for the obtaining that crown, in order to draw into England great multitudes of foreigners, with whom he might negotiate, either for their personal service, or aids of troops

Whoe'er in after-times shall so pervert
This sacred institution. To the world
I here consign it, to the good and great
Of every age and clime, and them alone.

Now sound the trumpet; bid the candidates
With confidence appear, and urge their claims.

Flourish of trumpets, &c. which is answered by another trumpet from without; then enter a grandee of Spain, magnificently attir'd in the Spanish habit, holding in his hand the pedigree of his family, and preceded by heralds, &c. bearing achievements, banners, coats of armour, helmets, gauntlets, spurs, &c.

Spaniard.

Illustrious monarch! emp'ror of the isles!
My name is Guzman—from those heroes sprung,
Who with Pelagio 'mid th' Asturian rocks
Against th' invasion of unnumber'd Moors,
Maintain'd the fame and empire of the Goths,
And founded at Oviedo once again
The Spanish monarchy and cath'lic faith, to assist him in that undertaking, ordered, during the truce that then subsisted between the two crowns, publication to be made of a great tournament, to be held at Windsor; an expedient, says Rapin, which could not fail of success, because it was entirely agreeable to the taste of that age. Accordingly, many persons of distinction came over, to all of whom he gave an honourable reception, caressing them in such a manner that they could never sufficiently admire his politeness, magnificence, and liberality. To render these entertainments the more solemn, and to free himself also from the ceremonies, to which the difference of rank and condition would have subjected him, he caused a circular hall of boards to be run up at Windsor, 200 feet diameter. There it was that he feasted all the knights at one table, which was called the Round Table, in memory of the great Arthur, who, as it is pretended, instituted an order of knighthood by that name. Next year he caused a more solid building to be erected, that he might continue yearly the same diversions. During that time he treated with these several lords about the aids, wherewith each could furnish him, in proportion to his forces. His rival king Philip could not see without jealousy, Spaniards, Italians, Germans, Flemings, and Frenchmen themselves flock to England to assist at these tournaments. He suspected some hidden design in these entertainments, and to break Edward's measures, caused the like to be published in his dominions; which meeting with success, proved a countermine to Edward's main design, so that he did not long continue to keep up his round table. From thence, however, it is generally agreed, he took the first hint of instituting the Order of the Garter. But as his purpose in erecting this order was very different from that which had induced him to revive Arthur's round table, as he had in this no private views, no ambitious scheme of engaging such as should be admitted into this fraternity to assist him in his wars, he thought proper, in order to obviate the like jealousies and suspicion as had alarmed King Philip, to signify by his motto the purity of his intentions, and to retort shame upon all those who should put any malignant construction upon his design in instituting this order. This therefore I take to be the true meaning and import of the famous motto, HONI SOIT QUI MAL Y PENSE. The not understanding the purport of which, gave rise, in all probability, to that vulgar story of the Countess of Salisbury's garter, rejected by all the best writers.

Transporting from the mountain's dreary womb
To glitt'ring temples her most holy altars.
Thence on the bordering Moor their valiant sons
Waging incessant war, ere long regain'd
Their ancient realms of Leon, Arragon,
And rich Castalia: in which great exploits
My brave progenitors, by valour, zeal,
And loyalty distinguish'd, from their kings
Gain'd those high honours, princely signories,
And proud prerogatives, which have extoll'd
The name of Guzman to such envy'd grandeur,
That scarce above it tow'rs the regal throne.

These honours undiminish'd, undefil'd,
To me deliver'd down, might well content
A vulgar mind; but spirits highly born
Are full of gen'rous and aspiring thoughts;
And use the vantage ground of rank and pow'r
But to ascend still higher. Thus I come
Thy Garter to solicit; pleas'd, great prince,
With thee to be enroll'd thy brother knight,
And fearing no repulse. Nobility,
As nearest in her orbit, first receives
The beams of majesty; alone can bear
The fullness of that glory, which o'erpow'rs
Inferior natures. Virtue's self would blush,
Did she at once approach too near the throne;
But the young eagle borne amid the blaze
Of glancing lightnings, with undazzled eye
Soars to the courts of heav'n, and perches bold
On the bright sceptere of imperial Jove.

The greatest king is he, who is the king
Of greatest subjects. Seek'st thou to advance
The glory of thy order? To thyself
Associate those, whose high-exalted names
For ages past from envy's selves have forc'd
Habitual veneration, never paid
To new and upstart merit. Such am I,
Whose pure and gen'rous blood descending down
From noblest fountains, in its course enrich'd
By glorious mixture with each royal stream
That fair Iberia boasts, might ev'n pretend
To thy alliance, Edward. View this scroll,
The faithful blazon of my ancient line;
A line of potentates whose every son
Deserv'd to wear the Garter I demand.
In me their representative, the heir
Of all their honours, son of their renown,
Do thou reward their virtues: in their names
I claim, and on hereditary right,
The right of monarchs, Edward, rest my plea.

Edward.

The high desert of thy renown'd forefathers
Well hast thou shown; but hast thou therefore Thyself deserving to be call'd their son? [prov'd
To thee their prosp'rous virtues have indeed
Transmitted lineal rank, and titles proud,
By them more hardly gain'd; for which thou stand'st

To custom and th' indulgence of thy country
Indebted, Guzman, in a large account;
Which thou must first discharge by noble deeds,
Ere thou canst style those dignities thine own.
This if thou hast not paid, why dost thou seek,
Like thriftless prodigals, to swell the debt,
And overwhelm thyself with obligations?

Virtue is honour, and the noblest titles
Are but the public stamps set on the ore
To ascertain its value to mankind.

It were a kind of treason to my crown,
To mark base metal with the royal impress,
And put off lazy pride in virtue's name.

Wouldst thou attain my Garter? Seek it there
Where thy heroic ancestors acquir'd
Their glorious honours, in th' embattl'd field
Among the squadrons of the warlike Moors:
Or in the council of thy king, by truth
And wisdom equal to th' important trust.
Be what thy fathers were, and then return
To ask the pledge of merit from my hand,
And be the fit companion of a king. [Exit Spaniard.

Flourish of trumpets, &c. which, as before, is answered by another trumpet from without; then enter an usurer and senator of Genoa (at that time the bank of Europe) dressed in his senatorial gown of black velvet, profusely, but awkwardly adorned with jewels, pearls, and diamond necklaces, pendants, bracelets, rings, such as he may be supposed to have received as presents, and to wear rather as marks of his great riches, than as ornaments of his dress. He is attended by a large train of people of every profession, appearing to be his debtors, by their abject and timid countenances, at the head of whom, and next to the usurer, marches a scrivener, bearing a large bundle of bonds, mortgages, &c.

Genoese.

From Genoa the opulent, the bank
And treasury of the world, most puissant king,
Invited by thy heralds, am I come
To claim the honour by thy promise due,
Due by thy justice to superior worth;
Due then to me, great Edward, who possess
That object of the toils, the cares, the vows
Of all mankind, that comprehensive good,
Source of all pow'r and grandeur, boundless wealth:
Behold yon glitt'ring train, whose sumptuous
pride,

Bright with the treasures of each precious mine,
Invests with glory thy imperial throne:
Whence is their dignity? The ray august,
That awes and dazzles the respectful crowd,
Proceeds it from nobility, from virtue,
Their wisdom, or their valour, or their fame?
Comes it not rather from the beaming ore?
The diamond's star-like radiance? Wealth, O king,
Wealth is the sun that decks the gorgeous scene;
That cherishes, adorns, and calls to view
These princely flowers of honour, virtue, fame,
Which in the shades of poverty were lost.

Whatever men desire or venerate,
On wealth attends; ev'n empire's self is bought.
Nor could the mighty Julius have attain'd
By wisdom or by valour sov'reign pow'r,
Had not the gold of vanquish'd Gaul subdu'd
The liberties of Rome. On wretched want,
Contempt and narrow-soul'd dependence wait.
Ev'n kings, of necessary wealth depriv'd,
In powerless indigence lose all respect,
All homage from their subjects: while the rich,
Like gods ador'd, o'er every neck extend
Their potent sceptres, and in golden chains
Fierce faction and rebellious freedom bind.

The glory, strength, importance of a realm.
Is measur'd by its riches: Venice thus,
Thus Genoa's petty state out-balances,
In Europe's scale, the boundless wilds that clothe
With tributary furs the Russian Czar.

With like pre-eminence exalted shines
In every land above the proudest names,
The blest possessor of all-worshipp'd gold.

My birth or rank I boast not here, though born
A senator of Genoa. The desert,
On which I found my claim, is all my own;
To have adorn'd and dignify'd the state
Of my declining house with greater wealth
Than e'er my thriftless ancestors possess'd;
Whose richest acquisitions were but sprigs
Of barren laurel, or the flaunting rags
Of some torn ensign, to their needy son
A worthless heritage. Yet not to swell
My narrow fortunes would my soul descend
To the base methods of ignoble trade,
And vulgar mercantile pursuit of gain.
Mine were the noble arts of raising gold
From gold, of nursing and improving wealth
By gainful use; arts practis'd heretofore
By senators and sages of old Rome,
Illustrious Crassus, and wise Seneca.
Thus have I grac'd the splendour of my name
With suitable possessions; thus I hold
In firm subjection to my will the poor
Of every rank and order, soldier, priest,
The vent'rous merchant, and the sumptuous lord,
Who in a lower vassalage to me,
Than to thy sceptre, Edward, bow their heads,
Pledging their lands and liberties for gold.

Hence am I bold to stand before thy throne
A candidate for glory's highest prize:
And let me add, that policy alone
Should teach thy prudence to approve my claim;
Should teach thee in thy subjects to excite,
By honours on superior wealth bestow'd,
An useful emulation to be rich:
Which once inspir'd, thy Albion shall become
The first of nations, thou the first of kings.

Edward.

Hadst thou by op'ning to thy native land
The golden veins of commerce, by employing
The useful hands of industry in works
Of national advantage, by uniting
Remotest regions in the friendly bands
And honest intercourse of mutual trade;
Hadst thou by these humane and generous arts,
Which thy mistaken pride so much disdains,
Enrich'd at once thy country and thyself,
Then not unworthy hadst thou been to wear
The brightest marks of honour; but thy wealth,
The base-born child of sordid usury,
That foe to commerce, nurse of idleness,
Stains and degrades thee from thy noble birth;
Nor in the usurer can I discern
The senator of Genoa.—To enlarge
The mind with gen'rous sentiments, to raise
Its aims by virtuous emulation, here
I sit; but not to gild with honour's beams
That selfish passion which congeals the heart,
And stops the streams of sweet benevolence,
Mean avarice, the vice of narrowest souls,
Incapable of glory.—Wealth, thou say'st,
Can buy ev'n empire, and to Julius gave
Dominion o'er his country.—Fatal gift,
And ruinous to both! But what to Rome,
What to that Cæsar's successors avail'd
The boundless treasures of the ravag'd world,
When they had lost their virtue? Did not soon

The valiant sons of poverty, the Goths,
The Huns and Vandals, from their barren hills
And rugged woods descending, to their steel
Subject the Roman gold? Yet I deny not
The pow'r and use of riches; to the wife
And good, in public or in private life,
They are the means of virtue, and best serve
The noblest purposes; but in the use,
Not in the bare possession, lies the merit.
Show me thy merit then, thy bounteous acts,
Public munificence, or private alms,
The hungry, and the naked, and the sick,
Sustain'd and cherish'd by thy saving hand;
Plead this, and I allow thy worthy claim,
For this is virtue, and deserves reward. [Ex. Gen.]

Flourish of trumpets, &c. which is answered by a symphony of flutes, violins, &c. playing a light amorous air; then appears a Neapolitan courtier, a favourite of queen Joan, who then reign'd at Naples, and whose Court was the most debauched and dissolute of that age. He comes in with a gay and affected gesture, and is dress'd in loose silken robes, rich, but finical and effeminate; on his hair, which is curled and spread all over his shoulders down to the middle of his back, he wears a chaplet of roses, and is attended by a train of beautiful boys, habited like Cupids, and musicians, who, as he marches towards the throne, continue playing their soft and wanton airs.

Neapolitan.

Not on my wealth, nor on my noble blood,
Shall I presume to claim thy royal gift,
Auspicious prince, but on the skill to give
That splendor to nobility and wealth,
That elegance of taste, from which alone
Their value they derive; of this to judge,
This to direct, I boast, fit arbiter
Of all refin'd delights.—But chief to kings
My happy talents I devote; on them
My genius waits with duteous care, and wasts
The golden cup of pleasure to their lips,
Like Ganymede before the throne of Jove.
And who indeed would wish to be a god
Only to thunder, and to hear the pray'rs
Of clam'rous suitors? 'Tis the nectar'd feast,
The dance of graces, and the wanton charms
Of Venus, sporting with the smiles and loves,
That make the court of heav'n a blest abode.
Far happier were the meanest peasant's lot,
Who sleeps or sings in careless ease beneath
The sun-burnt hay-cock, or the flow'ry thorn,
Than to be plac'd on high in anxious pride,
The purple drudge and slave of tiresome state,
If to superior pow'r superior means
Of joy were not annex'd, and larger scope
For every wish the lavish heart can form;
If the soft hand of pleasure did not wreath
Around the royal diadem, whose weight
Oppressive loads the monarch's aching brow,
Her fairest growth of ever-blooming flow'rs.

On thee, victorious prince, propitious fortune
Hath pour'd her richest gifts, renown and wealth,
And greatness equal to thy mighty mind;
One only bliss is wanting to thy court,
Voluptuous elegance, the lovely child
Of ease and opulence; that never comes,
But like a bird of summer to attend
The brightest sun-shine of a glorious state.

To her, and her alone belongs the task,
By learned delicacy to remove
What yet remains in this thy ancient realm
Of Gothic barbarism, the rust of war,
And valiant ignorance.—Her artful hand
Thy rugged Britons shall refine, and teach
More courtly manners to their sovereign's will
Politely pliant; do but thou command
Thy willing servant, with thy favours grac'd,
From fair Joanna's ever-smiling court,
Under whose happy influence I was train'd,
From polish'd Naples, her delightful seat,
The blooming goddess to transport, with all
Her train of joys, and fix them here beneath
Thy great protection.—But perhaps thou fear'st
The voice of censure, and the grave reproof
Of moralizing dullness: idle fear!
The vulgar herd, indeed, religious craft
And policy of state have well confin'd
With wise severity to rigid laws:
Else would that headstrong beast, the multitude,
Forget obedience, and its rider's voice
Disdain. But shall the rider put a curb
In his own mouth? The laws that kings have made,
Shall they restrain the makers? Edward, no!
For thee indulgent justice shall relax
Her harsh decrees, and piety shall wait
To give her rev'rend sanction to thy will.
'Tis thine to rove at large through nature's field,
Crop every flow'r, and taste of every fruit;
By sweet variety provoking still
The languid appetite to new desires.
Nor useless to thy pleasures, happy prince,
Shall be my faithful service; nicer joys,
Joys of a quicker, more exalted taste,
Than ever ripen'd in this northern clime,
The growth of softer regions, shall my hand
By skilful culture in thy Britain raise.

To them, whose gross and dull capacities
Are fit to bear the burthens of the state,
The lab'ring mules, that through the mire of forms
Draw the slow car of government along,
Gladly the task of business I resign.
Be mine the brighter province, to direct
Thy pleasures, Edward, minister supreme
Of all thy softer hours: to serve the king
Be theirs the glory, let me serve the man.

But should thy sterner genius, only pleas'd
With arms and royalty's important cares,
The duties of a king, my gentle arts
Too lightly prize, and thence reject my suit:
Permit at least, that to Philippa's ear,
Divine Philippa, thine and beauty's queen,
And her attendant graces, I may plead
The cause of bliss, a cause so much their own:
They will approve my claim, to whom the cares,
The labours of my life, my head, my heart
Are all devoted—Let me from their hands
Receive the Garter, and be call'd their knight.

Philippa.

Permit me, gracious Edward, to reply
To this irreverent flatt'rer, who presumes
Before a matron and a queen to plead
The cause of vice, and impudently hopes
To find in her a fautress of his suit.
But know, pernicious sophister, my heart [rank
Hath learn'd from Edward's love, and this high

Which I partake with him, a noble pride,
That ill can brook the too familiar eye
And saucy tongue of riot and debauch;
In whose unmanner'd light society,
Nor majesty, nor virtue can maintain
That dignity which is their proper guard.

Thy vile refinements, and luxurious arts,
Miscall'd politeness, I detest; and feel,
In the soft duties of a virtuous love,
Such pure, serene delight, as far transcends
What thou styl'st pleasure, the delirious joy
Of an intoxicated feverish brain.
Behold my royal lord, the first and best
Of kings, the love and wonder of mankind!
Behold my children, worthy their great sire,
The gen'ral theme of praise and benediction;
These are my pleasures; can thy skill bestow
Superior bliss? Ah no, the vain attempt
Would only bring disgust, remorse, and shame.

Edward.

That I have lov'd, Philippa, and esteem'd thee
More for thy virtues than those females charms,
Which this vile flatterer deems singly worth
His panegyric, be thy happiness
And glory, as it is thy Edward's pride.

With the like spirit have I also woo'd
And wedded sov'reign power: nor weakly caught
With outward pomp, or seeking to myself
A privilege to riot uncontroul'd
In sensual pleasures, and behind the throne
To laugh securely at restraint and law.
No: I embrac'd her as the child of heav'n,
Dowr'd with the ample means of doing good;
From whose espousals I might hope to raise
An offspring, worth th' ambition of a king,
Immortal glory! to a gen'rous mind
As far surpassing all the wanton toys,
Which he calls pleasure, as thy faithful love
(The sweet o'erflowing of heart-felt delight)
Excels, Philippa, the lascivious smile
Of common prostitutes, carefs'd and loath'd.

Hence from my sight with thy detested arts,
Base minister of luxury, the bane
Of every flourishing and happy state:
Presume no more within my court to sing
Thy Syren-song, nor soften into slaves
And cowards my brave subjects.—I disdain
That elegance, which such as thou can teach.
Virtue alone is elegant, alone
Polite; vice must be sordid and deform'd,
Though to adorn her every art contend.
And rather would I see my Britons roam
Untutor'd savages among the woods,
As once they did, in naked innocence,
Than polish'd like the vile degenerate race
Of modern Italy's corrupted sons.

Exit Neap.

Trumpet sounds, and is answered from without by another trumpet, which sounds a march, accompanied by kettle-drums, and other warlike instruments: then enters, preceded by soldiers playing upon fifes, and others bearing tatter'd ensigns, standards and trophies, a leader of mercenary bands, completely arm'd from head to foot, and carrying in his right hand a baton or truncheon. On each side of him march his 'squires, one bearing is ce, the other his shield. Behind him, as hi

Of Venus, sporting with the smiles and loves,
That make the court of heav'n a blest abode.
Far happier were the meanest peasant's lot,
Who sleeps or sings in careless ease beneath
The sun-burnt hay-cock, or the flow'ry thorn,
Than to be plac'd on high in anxious pride,
The purple drudge and slave of tiresome state,
If to superior pow'r superior means
Of joy were not annex'd, and larger scope
For every wish the lavish heart can form:
If the soft hand of pleasure did not wreath
Around the royal diadem, whose weight
Oppressive loads the monarch's aching brow,
Her fairest growth of ever-blooming flow'rs.

On thee, victorious prince, propitious fortune
Hath pour'd her richest gifts, renown and wealth,
And greatness equal to thy mighty mind;
One only bliss is wanting to thy court,
Voluptuous elegance, the lovely child
Of ease and opulence; that never comes,
But like a bird of summer to attend
The brightest sun-shine of a glorious state.

To her, and her alone belongs the task,
By learned delicacy to remove
What yet remains in this thy ancient realm
Of Gothic barbarism, the rust of war,
And valiant ignorance.—Her artful hand
Thy rugged Britons shall refine, and teach
More courtly manners to their sovereign's will
Politely pliant; do but thou command
Thy willing servant, with thy favours grac'd,
From fair Joanna's ever-smiling court,
Under whose happy influence I was train'd,
From polish'd Naples, her delightful seat,
The blooming goddess to transport, with all
Her train of joys, and fix them here beneath
Thy great protection.—But perhaps thou fear'st
The voice of censure, and the grave reproof
Of moralizing dullness: idle fear!
The vulgar herd, indeed, religious craft
And policy of state have well confin'd
With wise severity to rigid laws:
Else would that headstrong beast, the multitude,
Forget obedience, and its rider's voice
Disdain. But shall the rider put a curb
In his own mouth? The laws that kings have made,
Shall they restrain the makers? Edward, no!
For thee indulgent justice shall relax
Her harsh decrees, and piety shall wait
To give her rev'rend sanction to thy will.
'Tis thine to rove at large through nature's field,
Crop every flow'r, and taste of every fruit;
By sweet variety provoking still
The languid appetite to new desires.
Nor useless to thy pleasures, happy prince,
Shall be my faithful service; nicer joys,
Joys of a quicker, more exalted taste,
Than ever ripen'd in this northern clime,
The growth of softer regions, shall my hand
By skilful culture in thy Britain raise.

To them, whose gross and dull capacities
Are fit to bear the burthens of the state,
The lab'ring mules, that through the mire of forms
Draw the slow car of government along,
Gladly the task of bus'ness I resign.
Be mine the brighter province, to direct
Thy pleasures, Edward, minister supreme
Of all thy softer hours: to serve the king
Be theirs the glory, let me serve the man.

But should thy sterner genius, only pleas'd
With arms and royalty's important cares,
The duties of a king, my gentle arts
Too lightly prize; and thence reject my suit:
Permit at least, that to Philippa's ear,
Divine Philippa, thine and beauty's queen,
And her attendant graces, I may plead
The cause of bliss, a cause so much their own:
They will approve my claim, to whom the cares,
The labours of my life, my head, my heart
Are all devoted—Let me from their hands
Receive the Garter, and be call'd their knight.

Philippa.

Permit me, gracious Edward, to reply
To this irreverent flatt'rer, who presumes
Before a matron and a queen to plead
The cause of vice, and impudently hopes
To find in her a fautress of his suit.
But know, pernicious sophister, my heart [rank
Hath learn'd from Edward's love, and this high

Which I partake with him, a noble pride,
That ill can brook the too familiar eye
And saucy tongue of riot and debauch;
In whose unmanner'd light society,
Nor majesty, nor virtue can maintain
That dignity which is their proper guard.

Thy vile refinements, and luxurious arts,
Miscall'd politeness, I detest; and feel,
In the soft duties of a virtuous love,
Such pure, serene delight, as far transcends
What thou styl'st pleasure, the delirious joy
Of an intoxicated feverish brain.
Behold my royal lord, the first and best
Of kings, the love and wonder of mankind!
Behold my children, worthy their great sire,
The gen'ral theme of praise and benediction;
These are my pleasures; can thy skill bestow
Superior bliss? Ah no, the vain attempt
Would only bring disgust, remorse, and shame.

Edward.

That I have lov'd, Philippa, and esteem'd thee
More for thy virtues than those females charms,
Which this vile flatterer deems singly worth
His panegyric, be thy happiness
And glory, as it is thy Edward's pride.

With the like spirit have I also woo'd
And wedded sov'reign power: nor weakly caught
With outward pomp, or seeking to myself
A privilege to riot uncontroul'd
In sensual pleasures, and behind the throne
To laugh securely at restraint and law.
No: I embrac'd her as the child of heav'n,
Dow'd with the ample means of doing good;
From whose espousals I might hope to raise
An offspring, worth th' ambition of a king,
Immortal glory! to a gen'rous mind
As far surpassing all the wanton toys,
Which he calls pleasure, as thy faithful love
(The sweet o'erflowing of heart-felt delight)
Excels, Philippa, the lascivious smile
Of common prostitutes, carefs'd and loath'd.

Hence from my sight with thy detested arts,
Base minister of luxury, the bane
Of every flourishing and happy state:
Presume no more within my court to sing
Thy Syren-song, nor soften into slaves
And cowards my brave subjects.—I disdain
That elegance, which such as thou can teach.
Virtue alone is elegant, alone
Polite; vice must be fordid and deform'd,
Though to adorn her every art contend.
And rather would I see my Britons roam
Untutor'd savages among the woods,
As once they did, in naked innocence,
Than polish'd like the vile degenerate race
Of modern Italy's corrupted sons.

With like pre-eminence exalted shines
In every land above the proudest names,
The blest possessor of all-worshipp'd gold.

My birth or rank I boast not here, though born
A senator of Genoa. The desert,
On which I found my claim, is all my own;
To have adorn'd and dignify'd the state
Of my declining house with greater wealth
Than e'er my thriftless ancestors possess'd;
Whose richest acquisitions were but sprigs
Of barren laurel, or the flaunting rags
Of some torn ensign, to their needy son
A worthless heritage. Yet not to swell
My narrow fortunes would my soul descend
To the base methods of ignoble trade,
And vulgar mercantile pursuit of gain.
Mine were the noble arts of raising gold
From gold, of nursing and improving wealth
By gainful use; arts practis'd heretofore
By senators and sages of old Rome,
Illustrious Crassus, and wise Seneca.
Thus have I grac'd the splendour of my name
With suitable possessions; thus I hold
In firm subjection to my will the poor
Of every rank and order, soldier, priest,
The vent'rous merchant, and the sumptuous lord,
Who in a lower vassalage to me,
Than to thy sceptre, Edward, bow their heads,
Pledging their lands and liberties for gold.

Hence am I bold to stand before thy throne
A candidate for glory's highest prize:
And let me add, that policy alone
Should teach thy prudence to approve my claim;
Should teach thee in thy subjects to excite,
By honours on superior wealth bestow'd,
An useful emulation to be rich:
Which once inspir'd, thy Albion shall become
The first of nations, thou the first of kings.

Edward.

Hadst thou by op'ning to thy native land
The golden veins of commerce, by employing
The useful hands of industry in works
Of national advantage, by uniting
Remotest regions in the friendly bands
And honest intercourse of mutual trade;
Hadst thou by these humane and generous arts,
Which thy mistaken pride so much disdains,
Enrich'd at once thy country and thyself,
Then not unworthy hadst thou been to wear
The brightest marks of honour; but thy wealth,
The base-born child of sordid usury,
That foe to commerce, nurse of idleness,
Stains and degrades thee from thy noble birth;
Nor in the usurer can I discern
The senator of Genoa.—To enlarge
The mind with gen'rous sentiments, to raise
Its aims by virtuous emulation, here
I sit; but not to gild with honour's beams
That selfish passion which congeals the heart,
And stops the streams of sweet benevolence,
Mean avarice, the vice of narrowest souls,
Incapable of glory.—Wealth, thou say'st,
Can buy ev'n empire, and to Julius gave
Dominion o'er his country.—Fatal gift,
And ruinous to both! But what to Rome,
What to that Cæsar's successors avail'd
The boundless treasures of the ravag'd world,
When they had lost their virtue? Did not soon

The valiant sons of poverty, the Goths,
The Huns and Vandals, from their barren hills
And rugged woods descending, to their steel
Subject the Roman gold? Yet I deny not
The pow'r and use of riches; to the wise
And good, in public or in private life,
They are the means of virtue, and best serve
The noblest purposes; but in the use,
Not in the bare possession, lies the merit.
Show me thy merit then, thy bounteous acts,
Public munificence, or private alms,
The hungry, and the naked, and the sick,
Sustain'd and cherish'd by thy saving hand;
Plead this, and I allow thy worthy claim,
For this is virtue, and deserves reward. [Ex. Gen.]

Flourish of trumpets, &c. which is answered by a symphony of flutes, violins, &c. playing a light amorous air; then appears a Neapolitan courtier, a favourite of queen Joan, who then reign'd at Naples, and whose Court was the most debauched and dissolute of that age. He comes in with a gay and affected gesture, and is dress'd in loose silken robes, rich, but finical and effeminate; on his hair, which is curled and spread all over his shoulders down to the middle of his back, he wears a chaplet of roses, and is attended by a train of beautiful boys, habited like Cupids, and musicians, who, as he marches towards the throne, continue playing their soft and wanton airs.

Not on my wealth, nor on my noble blood,
Shall I presume to claim thy royal gift,
Auspicious prince, but on the skill to give
That splendor to nobility and wealth,

Their value they derive; of this to judge,
This to direct, I boast, fit arbiter
Of all refin'd delights.—But chief to kings
My happy talents I devote; on them
My genius waits with duteous care, and wafts

Like Ganymede before the throne of Jove.

Nor riches, nor nobility of birth,
Nor the soft arts of base effeminate ease,
Which justly thou rejectest, valiant prince,
But thy own darling attribute I boast,
Undaunted courage, try'd in many a field,
In every clime, and under every banner,
That for these forty summers have been wav'd
O'er Europe's plains, by Ister, Rhine and Po,
Hungarian and Bohemian, Flemish, French,
Venetian, Spanish, Guelph and Gibbeline:
Whence in just confidence secure I come
This military honour to demand,
Due to my toils and service, to my wounds,
My laurels, and that generous love of glory,
Which without any call, or public cause,
Or private animosity, alone [sword.
Rais'd my strong arm, and drew my dreadful
Wherever Mars his crimson flag display'd,
That was my country; thither swift I bore
My ready valour, and the dauntless band
Of various nations, under my command,
Prepar'd to sell their blood, their limbs, their lives.
Nor where the right, nor where the justest cause,
Deign'd we to ask—those intricate debates
We left to lazy penmen in the shade
Of coward ease; while our impetuous fire
Still bore us forward, ardent to pursue
Through danger's roughest paths the steps to fame.
On such a spirit should thy favour smile.

But let me wonder, Edward, that so long
Thy ear the vain pretensions could endure
Of men unknown to war, attendants meet
Of some luxurious Asiatic court,
Or female distaff-reign; but suiting ill
The presence of a monarch great in arms.
Hadst thou to those inglorious sons of peace
Thy martial order giv'n, the warrior-saint
Had blush'd to see his image so profan'd,
Which on my manly breast, indented o'er
With many a noble scar, will fitly shine.
But wherefore stand I thus harranguing here,
Unskilful as I am in smooth discourse,
The coward's argument? On force alone
I rest my title: let the glorious prize
Be hung on high amid the lifted field,
And let me there dispute it; there my lance
Shall plead my cause far better than my tongue,
If any dare deny my rightful claim.

Edward.

Not for the brave alone have I ordain'd
This institution, but for all desert,
All public virtue, wisdom, all that serves,
Improves, defends, or dignifies a state:
Though first indeed to valour, as the guard
Of all the rest, when in the public cause,
With justice and benevolence employ'd.

But thou, base mercenary, canst thou dare
The glorious name of valour to usurp,
Who know'st no public cause, no sense of right,
Nor pity, nor affection, nor remorse?
Who under any chief, in any quarrel,
Canst stain with gore thy prostituted arms?
Call it not love of glory; that is built
On acts for the deliv'rance of mankind;

On gen'rous principles, and noble scorn
Of sordid int'rest: call it cruel pride,
And savageness of nature, that delights
To conquer, and oppress, afflict, insult;
Or call it love of plunder, that can draw,
Unauthoris'd, uninjur'd, unprovok'd,
The sword of war; that bravo-like can lift
For hire the venal hand to perpetrate
Assassinations, murders, massacres.

But thou hast serv'd with courage; be it so—
Thou hast thy pay, and with it thy reward:
Pretend no farther, nor compare thy deeds,
Dishonour'd by the mean desire of gain,
With his, who for his country and his king
Resigns his ease, his fortune, or his life.
Those battles thou hast fought, those forty years
Of blood and horror, which thy vaunting tongue
So high hath founded, are indeed thy crimes,
Flagitious crimes; for which th' impartial bar
Of reason would condemn thee, as the foe
Of human nature, did not custom screen
By her unjust esteem thy guilty head.
But hope not honour or employment here.
Unsafe and wretched is that monarch's state
Who weakly trusts to mercenary bands,
The guard or of his person, or his realm;
Unfaithful, insolent, rapacious, base
He soon shall prove them, and become himself
Their slave, to hold his kingdom at their will.
For this within my Britain have I sought
To raise a martial spirit, and ordain'd
These new incitements, honours, and rewards,
To virtuous chivalry, that never king
Who wears hereafter my imperial crown,
May need to stoop to the precarious aid
Of venal foreign swords; but in the hearts
Of his brave subjects find a stronger guard,
Prepar'd with zeal unbought, and English valour
His rights to vindicate, and save their own.

*Trumpet sounds, to which another from without replies
Then enters an Italian politician, habited like a Venetian nobleman, who advancing with a solemn and important air towards the throne, makes a low reverence to king Edward, and proceeds.*

Politician.

Well has thy sovereign wisdom, royal judge,
The suit refus'd of these pretenders vain,
And, by rejecting them, embolden'd me.
For valour, and nobility, and wealth,
Though by their proud possessors, vaunted high
Are but subordinate, the slaves and tools,
Not the companions, and the counsellors
Of godlike monarchy; whose awful throne
By darksome clouds envelop'd, far beyond
The ken of vulgar eyes, supported stands
On that deep-rooted prop, the craft of state,
Mysterious policy.—Who best hath learn'd
Her wily lessons, best deserves to share
The honours, counsels, and the hearts of kings.
By him instructed, ev'n the meanest prince
Shall rise to envy'd greatness, shall advance
His dreaded pow'r above restraint and fear,
And all the rules that in fantastic chains
Inferior minds confine. Thus Milan's dukes,
Thus Padua's lords above their country's laws

Have rais'd their heads, and trampled to the dust
 The pride of freedom that essays in vain
 Their high superior genius to controul.
 These were my masters, mighty prince; beneath
 Their rule, and in their councils was I form'd
 To know the false corrupted heart of man,
 His every weakness, every vice, and thence
 To tempt or break his passions to the yoke:
 To scorn the public as an empty name,
 And on the helpless multitude impose
 The adamantine bonds of fraud and force.
 Thus was I train'd, thus fitted to conduct
 The fate of proudest empires; thus I come
 To claim thy Garter, Edward, the just meed
 Of worth pre-eminent, and in return
 My services to offer, which no doubt
 Thy wisdom gladly will accept: for who
 So fit to serve the majesty of kings,
 As he, who slighting every meaner tie,
 Friends, parents, country, to advance their pow'r
 Devotes his toil, experience, fortune, fame,
 Nor other favour courts, nor refuge hopes
 But in their high protection? Led by me,
 Thou, royal Edward, shalt attain that height,
 That glorious summit of imperial power,
 Which not thy mighty ancestors have reach'd;
 Where in a freer air, a more enlarg'd
 Horizon, bounded only by thy will,
 Thou shalt exalted sit, and view beneath,
 In humbler distances and safer bounds,
 Those subjects, who presumptuous now approach
 Too near, and with rude hands profane thy throne.

Nor let weak scruples check thy manly soul
 In the bright task of glory; know, great prince,
 A king's divinity is sov'reign pow'r,
 The only god, before whose shrine the wise
 Their incense offer; whence inspir'd they draw
 Divine ambition, and heroic scorn
 Of vulgar prejudices, vulgar fears.
 Virtue's the people's idol, and by them
 Rewarded well with popular applause,
 That idle breath, the gift and prize of fools.
 'Tis thine to govern, not to court mankind,
 Nor on their smiles precarious to depend,
 But nobly force them to depend on thine.
 O sacred sir, can virtue give thee this,
 This bright supremacy? Trust not her boasts,
 Her idle pageantry of barren praise:
 Reject her saucy claims, importunate,
 And self-supported; nor admit her train,
 Proud independency, and public zeal,
 Those factious demagogues, the foes of kings.

Edward.

Are virtue then, and love of public good,
 The foes of monarchy? and are deceit,
 Injustice and oppression, qualities
 Becoming and expedient in a king?
 Then know I not to govern; but have nurs'd
 For twice these fifteen years ev'n in my heart,
 A pois'nous viper; nay unking'd myself,
 By yielding to restrain my sov'reign pow'r
 With laws and charters of enfranchisement,
 Not due, it seems, from monarchs to their slaves.

But know, vile counsellor of infamy,
 That I disdain thy politics, those false
 And shallow politics, by which my fire,
 Weak judging Edward, was betray'd to shame
 And foul destruction, while to such as thee

His ear and heart incautious he resign'd,
 And was indeed their slave, not England's king.

By maxims different far have I sustain'd
 The strength and splendor of my regal state,
 On the broad basis of true wisdom fix'd
 With solid firmness. By encouraging
 The gen'rous love of virtue and of fame,
 That source of valour, pledge of victory.

By granting to my subjects, what indeed
 Is their inherent right, security,
 The cheerful father of content and peace,
 Of industry and opulence, which fills
 With smiling multitudes the land, and pays
 In willing subsidies that prince's care,
 Who lays up treasure in his people's hearts,
 By holding with a firm impartial hand
 The steady scale of justice; not alone
 Betwixt my subjects in their private rights,
 But in the gen'ral, more important cause
 Betwixt the crown and them, the different claims
 Of freedom and of just prerogative;
 Transgressing not myself my boundless pow'r,
 Nor suffering others to transgress those laws,
 That in their golden chain together bind,
 For common good, the whole united state.

But more than all, by guarding from contempt,
 Or impious violation, that supreme
 Protectress of all government and law,
 Religion; in whose train for ever wait
 Obedience, order, justice, mercy, love,
 A guard of angels plac'd around the throne.
 Her sacred counsels have I still rever'd,
 Her high commands enforc'd, her pow'r implor'd,
 O'er all my subject nations to call down
 From heav'nly wisdom, her eternal fire,
 A fix'd secure felicity, beyond
 The force of human prudence to attain.

These are my arts of government, those arts
 By which my British crown I have advanc'd
 Above th' imperial diadem, above
 The pride of Afric's, or of Asia's thrones.
 I would not tell thee this, but that thou seem'st
 A stranger to my fame, as to my realm,
 And to the real greatness of a king,
 Whose sacred dignity, by thee traduc'd,
 Much it behoves a king to vindicate;
 Not by rejecting only with disdain
 Thy arrogant pretensions, but in thee
 Dishonouring and branding with reproach
 Thy tenets also, the pernicious lore
 Of tyrants and usurpers, which thy tongue,
 Blaspheming justice, government, and law,
 Hath in a land of freedom dar'd to vent.
 Hence! from my kingdom with thy quickest speed,
 Lest the revenge of an insulted king
 With sudden ruin intercept thy flight.

From weak unmanly princes the rich prize
To virtue due and wisdom, not to these
The cankers of a state; but least of all
Due to that traitor of his king and country,
Who lab'ring to build up the regal throne
Beyond its due proportion, and the strength
Of those foundations which the laws have laid,
O'erwhelms the people, and at once o'erturns
His royal master, places him at best
On an uneasy tott'ring pinnacle,
The mark of execration and reproach.

These claims hast thou rejected; like a king
Discerning in mankind, and knowing well
The value of his favours: like a king
Deserving the high office of the judge
And arbiter of Europe: like a king
Equal to his great fame, and worth the care
Of those immortal spirits, who this day
Have quitted their celestial residence,
To view and to approve thy glorious deeds.

But, Edward, be not thou amaz'd to find
That those who lately for thy favour su'd,
Were not the personages they assum'd.
O king! thou art beset with counterfeits
The very opposite to us, who seem
Far better than they are. For flattery,
Cameleon-like, accommodates with care
To the court-hue his changeful countenance.
And when a prince is brave, magnanimous,
And high in spirit, then ambition wears
A face of dignity, and nothing breathes
But lofty enterprises, conquest, pow'r,
And schemes of glory to the sov'reign ear,
Pretending love and care for his renown
With more than dutious zeal.—Of these beware!
For as the Theban queen, in fables old,
Was, by the specious guile of fraudulent Jove,
In her Amphitryon's form to guilt betray'd,
So by these counterfeits are kings seduc'd,
Ev'n in the most belov'd suspectless shapes,
To take a traitor to their royal arms.
But thou shalt know them, Edward, by their works.
And of this truth be most assur'd, that he,
Who in his private commerce with mankind
Is mean, dishonest, interested, false,
Can ne'er be true to thee; nor can he love
His prince, who feels not for his country's good.

Thus warn'd we leave thee, mighty prince: be
Be constant in the paths of fair renown. [firm,

Think it thy duty to revere thyself
The sacred laws of chivalry, the wise
Injunctions by thy order laid on all
The garter'd knights; so shall thy fame remain
The great example of all future kings.
Farewell! for lo! the genius of thy realm
With all his pomp attended, comes to share,
And grace the glories of this signal day.
These clouds of fragrance, that far-beaming blaze
Of heav'nly brightness, his approach declare.

Druids vanish.

Flashes of light, and symphony of aërial music. Genius of England descends in his chariot attended by spirits and bards; then alighting, he advances towards the throne, and addresses himself to Edward.

Genius.

From the gay realms of cloudless day I come,
Where in the glitter of unnumber'd worlds,
That like to isles of various magnitudes
Float in the ocean of unbounded space;
On my invisible aërial throne
I sit, attended with a radiant band
Of spirits immortal, whose pure essences,
While clad in human shapes on earth they dwelt,
Through the dull clay of gross mortality
Disclos'd their heav'nly vigour, and burst forth
In godlike virtues and heroic deeds,
Their Albion gracing with as fair a growth
Of fame, as e'er enrich'd imperial Rome.
Thence ripe for heav'n and immortality,
To me, the genius of this happy isle,
They fly, and claim the meed of their desert,
Celestial crowns, and ever-living praise
Recorded in the songs of heav'nly bards, [sing
That round my throne their hymns of triumph
Attuning to the sweet harmonious spheres,
Their undiscording lyres and voice divine.

Nor thus remov'd to heav'n, and thus employ'd
In careless raptures, wont they to forget
Their native country, and the public weal,
To which on earth their labours and their lives
They once devoted; but pursuing still
The bent and habit of their souls, with me
They watch the British empire, still intent
To check alternately th' encroaching waves
Of regal pow'r and popular liberty:
I, chief attentive near the royal throne,
Take up my watchful station, to infuse
My sage and mod'rate counsels in those ears,
Which wisdom hath prepar'd and purify'd
To relish honest, though unpleasing truth.

Thus am I always, though invisible,
Attendant, Edward, on thy glorious deeds.
But on this solemn day have I vouchsaf'd
To manifest my presence; to declare,
Not in those whispers which have often spoke
Peace to thy conscious heart, but audibly
And evident to all, th' assent of heav'n
To the great business which hath gather'd here
This troop of princes from all nations round.
Hence all may know that virtue hath a train
More bright than earthly empire can command:
Know, that those actions which are great and good,
Receive a nobler sanction from the free
And universal voice of all mankind,
Which is the voice of heav'n, than from the highest,
The most illustrious act of regal pow'r.

This nobler sanction, Edward, in the name

Not of this age alone, but latest time,
 Here do I solemnly annex to each
 Of thy great acts, but chief to this most wise,
 Most virtuous institution, which extends
 Wide as thy fame, beyond thy empire's bound,
 A prize of virtue publish'd to mankind.

Ye registers of heav'n, record the deed.

Bards.

Now tune, ye bards, the British lyre;

Now wake the vocal string; [spire,

While heav'n and earth in Edward's praise con-
 Join to the gen'ral voice your sacred choir,

And on your soaring wing,

From time and envy waft his glorious name,
 And place it in the shrine of incorruptive fame.

Begin: the list'ning echoes round

Shall catch with joy the long-forgotten sound,

And warbling through each grove the British strain [reign.

To Windsor's smiling nymphs, recal their Arthur's

Ye nymphs of Windsor's bow'ry woods,

Ye pow'rs who haunt yon glist'ning floods,

That with reluctant fond delay

Around yon flow'ry valley stray;

Say, from your minds hath time eras'd

The pleasing images of glory pass'd?

Review ye now those scenes no more?

When nobly stain'd with Saxon gore,

From Badon's long-contended plain

Great Arthur with his martial train

To Windsor's chosen shades repair'd,

And with his knights the festive banquet shar'd.

Then first exulting Thames beheld

The triumphs of the list'd field;

Beheld along his level meads

Careering knights, encount'ring steeds,

Heroic games, whose toils inspire

The thirst of praise, and kindle martial fire.

Fair peace in war's bright mail array'd,

With smiles the glorious lists survey'd;

So should the brave (she cry'd) prepare

Their hearts and sinewy arms for war:

Such combats break not my repose,

Such sons best guard my rights from daring foes.

Then too in feastful hall or bow'r,

Attendant on the genial hour,

The British harp sweet lyrist strung,

And Albion's generous victors sung:

While valiant Arthur's copious fame

Incessant fed the bright poetic flame.

But mortals erring in excess,

O'erwhelm the virtue they carefs.

Thus Arthur his great story mourn'd,

By too fond praise to fable turn'd:

Mourn'd the companions of his toils,

Mock'd with false glory and fantastic spoils.

'Till through the dark romantic tale,

Through superstition's magic veil,

Sage Edward piercing view'd, and own'd

The chief with genuine lustre crown'd:

View'd the great model, and restor'd

The long-lost honours of his martial board.

Hail British prince! these faithful lays,

Eternal records of heroic worth,

Shall reassert thy ancient praise,

And from the cloud of fiction call thee forth,

In glory's sphere thy orbit to reclaim, [fame.

And at great Edward's beam relume thy darken'd

But see in heav'nly panoply array'd, [gold,

Whose streaming radiants skirts the clouds with

I view Pendragon burst the veiling shade,

And all his blazing magnitude unfold!

O'er yon broad tow'r he takes his airy stand,

And pointing, Edward, towards the royal throne,

To his fam'd knights around, a laurell'd band,

Shows on thy knee the bright sky-tinctur'd zone.

Virtue, he cries, (th' ethereal sound

Thy gross material organ cannot hear)

Virtue on earth by British Edward crown'd.

Her rev'rend throne once more shall rear.

To her own self-applauding breast

Forc'd for reward no longer to retreat,

She sees her awful charms by kings carefs'd,

Sees honour woo her for his mate.

Honour, her heav'n-elected spouse,

From her embrace by lawless pow'r withheld,

Now at yon altar plights his holy vows,

Vows by assenting Edward seal'd.

And now the fair angelic bride

Gath'ring her noble train from every land,

To her late wedded lord with decent pride

Presents the venerable band.

The great procession Edward leads;

I see yon hallow'd dome with heroes throng'd:

Incessant still the white-plum'd pomp proceeds,

Through time's eternal course prolong'd.

And you, dear partners of my fame,

Your ancient honours now again shall boast;

This noble order shall retrieve our name.

In visionary fables lost.

This from our martial board deriv'd,

These for our brethren let us proudly own,

More pleas'd to view our deeds by thee reviv'd,

Than griev'd, great king, to be outdone.

Chorus.

Hail British prince! these faithful lays

Shall reassert thy ancient praise.

Nor thee, O Windsor, shall I pass unsung,

Mansions of princes, and fit haunt of gods,

Who frequent shall desert their bright abodes,

To view thy sacred walls with trophies hung:

Thy walls by British Arthur first renown'd,

The early feat of chivalry and fame;

By Edward now with deathless honours crown'd,

Illustrious by his birth, his Garter, and his name.

Genius.

Conferring just rewards, most worthy prince,

Is the first attribute of sov'reign pow'r,

And that which best distinguishes a king:

For punishment, and all the nice awards

Of civil justice, by the laws are fix'd,

And kings but execute what they decree.

While in rewarding merit, uncontroul'd,

Unguided, unassisted is the hand

Of majesty; the prince himself alone

There judges, and his wisdom is the law.

Well does thy court, great king, with every worth

And every virtue fill'd, this wisdom show

In thee transcendent: well hast thou approv'd
 Its force in this great trial, which my pow'r
 Commanded, in no common ways to prove
 Thy royal mind.—But that a father's name
 May not restrain thy justice in the choice
 Of the first knights-companions of St. George,
 Myself here take upon me to present
 A candidate, whom, were not he thy son,
 Thou wouldst thyself select from all mankind.
 His modesty compels me to declare
 That candidate is Edward, prince of Wales.

Prince Edward.

Inhabitant of heav'n! I not presume
 To deprecate or question that high will,
 To which it best becomes me to submit.
 But, gentle spirit, be propitious to me;
 And thou, my gracious liege, if I request
 That this illustrious monarch, whose desert
 Is equal to the grandeur of his crown,
 May stand before me in this list of fame.

King John.

O generous youth! in vain thy goodness strives
 To raise thy captive thus above his fortune,
 The king that is not free, is not a king;
 Nor can thy bounteous favour reconcile
 Honour and bondage.—To thy conqu'ring son
 Do thou, great Edward, give this noble mark
 Of prosperous virtue; ill becomes it me,
 To wear at once thy Garter and thy chains.
 Though, by my former dignity I swear,
 That were I reinstated in my throne,
 The throne of Capet and of Charlemagne,
 Thus to be join'd in fellowship with thee,
 Would be the first ambition of my soul;
 A ray of glory I would sue to gain,
 And prize it equal with my diadem.

Genius.

Wisely thou hast determin'd, worthy prince,
 For thine and Edward's honour, and hast fix'd
 Its proper value on his royal gift,
 Which as the meed of merit, may become
 The proudest monarchs, by this Garter mark'd
 For something more than monarchs, virtuous men.
 This be the glory of thy order, Edward.
 And * never shall it want the greatest names
 Of all succeeding times to grace its annals.
 France, Sweden, Poland, Germany, and Spain,
 Each realm of Europe's wide-extended bounds,
 Shall count among thy knights its mightiest lords,
 And see, in emulation of thy fame,
 New royal founders of like orders rise:
 Proceed then, mighty king, and set the world
 The precedent of glory; thou begin
 The radiant list of sov'reigns, while thy son,
 Like a young bride, that on her nuptial morn
 Leads on with modest pride the virgin-choir,
 Herself the brightest, heads the shining band
 Of knights-companions, nobly seconding
 His father's glorious deeds with equal fame.

Edward.

The testimony of heav'n to thee, my son,

* Besides the great persons of our own nation, that have been admitted of this order, the English reader may be glad to be informed, that in the annals of the Garter are found the names of Charles V. emperor of Germany; of Francis I. and Henry IV. kings of France; and of Gustavus Adolphus king of Sweden.

Thus gloriously accorded, renders vain
 All farther trial.—To my people's voice,
 By this their tutelary pow'r declar'd,
 With pleasure I consent, directing still
 By theirs my choice, my judgment, my desires.

Approach then, my belov'd, my noble son,
 Strength of my crown, and honour of my realm;
 In whom my heart more joys, and glories more,
 Than in the highest pride of sov'reign pow'r.

* Thus I admit thee, Edward prince of Wales,
 First founder of the order of St. George;
 In evidence whereof, about thy knee
 I bind this mystic Garter; to denote
 The bond of honour that together ties
 The brethren of St. George in friendly league,
 United to maintain the cause of truth
 And justice only.—† “May propitious heav'n
 Grant thou may'st henceforth wear it to his praise,
 “The exaltation of this noble order,
 “And thy own glory.”—With like reverence,
 My son, receive and wear this golden chain,
 “Grac'd with the image of Britannia's saint,
 “Heav'n's valiant soldier, Cappadocian George;
 “In imitation of whose glorious deeds,
 “May'st thou triumphant in each state of life,
 “Or prosperous or adverse, still subdue
 “Thy spiritual and carnal enemies;
 “That not on earth alone thou may'st obtain
 “The guerdon of thy valour, endless praise,
 “But with the virtuous and the brave above,
 “In solemn triumph, wear celestial palms,
 “To crown thy final noblest victory.”

Embraces Pr. Edw.

Prince Edward.

Accept, my sovereign liege, my grateful thanks,
 That thou hast thus vouchsaf'd to place thy son
 First next thyself upon the roll of fame,
 As he indeed is first in filial love,
 And emulation of thy royal virtues.
 And may thy benediction, gracious lord,
 May thy paternal vows be heard in heav'n!
 That he, whom thou hast list'd in the cause
 Of truth and virtue, never may forget
 His vow'd engagements, nor defraud thy hopes,
 By foiling with dishonourable deeds
 The lustre of that order, which thy name
 Should teach him to respect and to adorn.

O D E.

STROPHE I. BARDS.

Celestial maid!

Bright spark of that ethereal flame,
 Whose vivid spirit through all nature spread,
 Sustains and actuates this boundless frame!
 O by whatever style to mortals known,
 Virtue, benevolence, or public zeal,
 Divine assessor of the regal throne,
 Divine protectress of the commonweal,

* The Prince of Wales advances to his father, and kneels; while the king, taking the Garter from the herald, buckles it round his left leg.

† The sense, and almost the words in the verses of this speech, mark'd thus “are taken from the admonition read to the knights, at the time of their receiving the garter and the ribbon or collar of the order. Vide Asmole's history of the order of the Garter.

O in our hearts thy energy infuse!
 Be thou our muse,
 Celestial maid,
 And, as of old, impart thy heav'nly aid
 To those, who warm'd by thy benignant fire,
 To public merit and their country's good
 Devoted ever their recording lyre,
 Wont along Deva's sacred flood,
 Or, beneath Mona's oak retir'd,
 To warble forth their patriot lays,
 And nourish with immortal praise
 The bright heroic flames by thee inspir'd.

ANTISTROPHE I.

I feel, I feel

Thy soul-invigorating heat;
 My bounding veins distend with fervant zeal,
 And to Britannia's fame responsive beat.—
 Hail Albion, native country! but how chang'd
 Thy once grim aspect, how adorn'd and gay
 Thy howling forests! where together rang'd
 The naked hunter and his savage prey:
 Where amid black inhospitable woods
 The sedge-grown floods
 All cheerless stray'd.
 Nor in their lonely wand'ring course survey'd,
 Or tow'r, or castle, heav'n-ascending fane,
 Or lowly village, residence of peace
 And joyous industry, or furrow'd plain,
 Or lowing herd, or silver fleece
 That whitens now each verdant vale;
 While laden with their precious store
 For trading barks to every shore,
 Swift heralds of Britannia's glory, sail.

EPODE I.

These are thy shining works: this smiling face
 Of beauteous nature thus in regal state,
 Deck'd by each handmaid art, each polish'd grace,
 That on fair liberty and order wait.

This pomp, these riches, this repose,
 To thee imperial Britain owes.

To thee, great substitute of heav'n,
 To whom the charge of earthly realms was giv'n;
 Their social systems by wise nature's plan
 To form and rule by her eternal laws;
 To teach the selfish soul of wayward man
 To seek the public good, and aid the common cause.

So didst thou move the mighty heart
 Of Alfred, founder of the British state:

So to Matilda's scepter'd son,

To him whose virtue and renown

First made the name of Edward great,

Thy ample spirit so didst thou impart:

Protecting thus in every age,

From greedy power and factious rage,

The law of freedom, which to Britain's shore

From Saxon Elva's many-headed flood,

The valiant sons of Odin with them bore,

Their national, ador'd, inseparable good.

STROPHE II.

* On yonder plain,

Along whose willow-fringed side

The silver-footed Naiads, sportive train,

Down the smooth Thames amid the cygnets glide,

I saw, when at thy reconciling word,

Injustice, anarchy, intestine jar,

* Runnymede near Stains, where the Grand Charter was signed by king John.

Despotic insolence, the wasting sword,
 And all the brazen throats of civil war,
 Were hush'd in peace; from his imperious throne
 Hurl'd furious down,
 Abash'd, dismay'd,

Like a chas'd lion to the savage shade
 Of his own forests, fell oppression fled,
 With vengeance brooding in his sullen breast.

Then justice fearless rear'd her decent head,
 Heal'd every grief, each wrong redress'd;
 While round her valiant squadrons stood,
 And bade her awful tongue demand,
 From vanquish'd John's reluctant hand,
 The deed of freedom purchas'd with their blood.

ANTISTROPHE II.

O vain surmise!

To deem the grandeur of a crown
 Consists in lawless pow'r! to deem them wise
 Who change security and fair renown,
 For detestation, shame, distrust, and fear!
 Who, shut for ever from the blissful bow'rs
 With horror and remorse at distance hear
 The music that enchants th' immortal pow'rs,
 The heavenly music of well-purchas'd praise,
 Seraphic lays

The sweet reward

On heroes, patriots, righteous kings conferr'd.
 For such alone the heav'n-taught poets sing.
 Tune ye for Edward, then, the mortal strain,
 His name shall well become your golden string,
 Begirt with this ethereal train,
 Seems he not rank'd among the gods?
 Then let him reap the glorious meed
 Due to each great heroic deed,
 And taste the pleasures of the blest abodes.

EPODE II.

Hail, happy prince! on whom kind fate bestows
 Sublimar joys, and glory brighter far [grows
 Than Cressy's palm, and every wreath that
 In all the blood-stain'd field of prosp'rous war;
 Joys that might charm an heavenly breast,
 To make dependent millions blest,
 A dying nation to restore,
 And save fall'n liberty with kingly pow'r;
 To quench the torch of discord and debate,
 Relume the languid spark of public zeal,
 Repair the breaches of a shatter'd state,
 And gloriously complete the plan of England's
 Complete the noble Gothic pile, [weal:
 That on the rock of justice rear'd shall stand,
 In symmetry, and strength, and fame,
 A rival of that boasted frame
 Which virtue rais'd on Tiber's strand.
 This, Edward, guardian, father of our isle,
 This godlike task, to few assign'd,
 Exalts thee above human-kind,
 And from the realms of everlasting day
 Calls down celestial bards thy praise to sing;
 Calls this bright troop of spirits to survey
 Thee, the great miracle of earth, a Patriot-King.

Genius.

Now reascend your skies, immortal spirits!
 Th' important act, that drew you down to earth
 Is finish'd. Spare we now their mortal sense,
 That cannot long endure th' unshrouded beam
 Of higher natures. Well hath Edward laid,
 Under your happy auspices, the base
 Of his great order: let him undisturb'd,

But not unaided by the heav'nly powers,
Complete th' illustrious work, which future kings,
Struck with the beauty of the noble plan,
Shall emulously labour to maintain.

And may thy spirit, Edward, be their guide!
In every chapter, thou henceforth preside,

In every breast infuse thy virtuous flame,
And teach them to respect their country's fame.

Genius and Spirits reascend to a loud symphony of music.

THE LIFE OF COLLINS.

WILLIAM COLLINS was born at Chichester in Suffex, on the 25th of December, 1721. His father was a hatter, of good reputation, and an Alderman of that city.

He received his early education in his native place. In 1733, he was admitted a scholar of Winchester College, where he continued seven years, under the care of Dr. Burton, and had for his schoolfellow, Dr. Warton, the present respectable master of that seminary. He was distinguished for his proficiency in classical learning, and his turn for elegant composition; but it was observed, that his English exercises were better than his Latin. His first poetical production, was the following epigram To Miss Aurelia C——r, on her weeping at her Sister's Wedding, published in the "Gentleman's Magazine," a repository in which several eminent men have begun their literary career.

Cease, fair Aurelia, cease to mourn,
Lament not Hannah's happy state;
You may be happy in your turn,
And seize the treasure you regret.

With love united, Hymen stands,
And softly whispers to your charms,
"Meet but your lover in my hands,
"You'll find your sister in his arms."

In 1740, he stood first in the list of the scholars to be received in succession at New College, Oxford; but unhappily there was no vacancy. This appears to have been the original misfortune of his life. In the hope that a vacancy might soon happen, he became a Commoner of Queen's College, probably with a scanty maintenance. During his residence at Queen's, he was at once distinguished for genius and indolence; his exercises, when he could be prevailed upon to write, bearing the visible characteristics of both. No vacancy happening in New College, he was recommended by his tutor to the society of Magdalen, where he was chosen a Demy, in July 1741. The uncommon abilities and learning which he displayed upon this occasion principally contributed to his election.

He continued at Magdalen College till he had taken his Bachelor's degree; and poetry being his principal pursuit, he wrote, about this time, his Epistle to Sir Thomas Hanmer, on his Edition of Shakspeare's Works, and his Oriental Eclogues, which were published in 1742, under the title of Persian Eclogues. Notwithstanding their merit, they were not attended with any great success.

During his residence at Magdalen College, it happened one afternoon, at a tea visit, when several intelligent friends were assembled at his rooms, Hampton, the translator of "Polybius," as remarkable at that time for his haughtiness as for his learning, came in, and being determined to quarrel, kicked the tea-table and all its contents to the other side of the room. Collins, though of a warm temper, was so confounded at the unexpected downfall, and so astonished at the unmerited insult, that he took no notice of the aggressor; but, getting up from his chair calmly, he began picking up the slices of bread and butter, and the fragments of his china, repeating very mildly, Invenias etiam disiecta membra poetæ.

As he brought with him to the university a high opinion of his school acquisitions, and a foreign contempt for all academic studies and discipline, he never looked with any complacency on his situation, but was always complaining of the dulness of a college life.

Weary of the confinement and uniformity of an academical life, and fondly imagining that his superior abilities would draw the attention of the great world, and make his fortune, in 1744, he suddenly left the university, and came to London, a literary adventurer, with many projects in his head, and very little money in his pocket. To acquaint himself with life, he commenced a man of the town, became an assiduous frequenter of the theatres, and spent his time in all the dissipation of Ranelagh, Vauxhall, and other places of public resort. In this pleasurable way of life, he was soon overtaken by poverty, from which he endeavoured to escape, by planning schemes for elaborate publications. He designed a variety of works; but his great fault was irresolution; or the frequent calls of necessity broke his schemes, and suffered him to pursue no settled purpose.

"A man doubtful of his dinner," says Dr. Johnson, "or trembling at a creditor, is not much disposed to abstracted meditation, or remote inquiries. He published proposals for a History of the Revival of Learning. I have heard him speak with great kindness of Leo X., and with keen resentment of his tasteless successor. But probably not a page of the history was ever written. He planned several tragedies; but he only planned them."

He was not, however, wholly idle; for, in 1746, he published his Odes, Descriptive and Allegorical, the success of which was even inferior to that of the Oriental Eclogues.

Millar the bookseller purchased the copy at a very handsome price (for those times); but the sale was not sufficient to pay the expence of printing. Justly offended at the bad taste of the public, as soon as it was in his power to do justice to his own delicacy, he returned Millar the copy-money, indemnified him for the loss he had sustained, and consigned the remainder of the impression to the flames.

It is not surprising that his Odes were not popular at their first appearance. Allegorical and abstract poetry was above the taste of the times, and will ever be above the taste of the bulk of readers. It is in the lower walks, "the plain and practical paths of the muses only," says his biographer and commentator, Langhorne, "that the generality of men can be entertained. The higher efforts of imagination are above their capacity."

About this time Dr. Johnson fell into his company. "His appearance," says he, "was decent and manly, his knowledge considerable, his views extensive, his conversation elegant. By degrees I gained his confidence, and one day was admitted to him when he was immured by a bailiff that was prowling in the street. On this occasion, recourse was had to the bookellers, who, on the credit of a translation of "Aristotle's Poetics," which he engaged to write, with a large commentary, advanced as much money as enabled him to escape into the country. He showed me the guineas safe in his hand."

In 1748, he wrote an Ode on the Death of Thomson, and, about the same time, the beautiful Dirge in Shakspeare's "Cymbeline."

In 1749, he wrote An Ode on the Popular Superstition of the Highlands, considered as the subject of Poetry, addressed to Mr. John Home, the author of "Douglas," which, Dr. Johnson says, he showed, in his last illness, to Dr. Warton and his brother, who thought it superior to his other works; but no search has yet found the manuscript.

It happened, however, that Dr. Carlyle, minister of Inveresk, had the first rude draught of the Ode, in the hand-writing of Collins, but in a mutilated form, which he communicated to the Royal Society of Edinburgh, who inserted it in the first volume of their "Transactions," 1788.

"The manuscript," says Dr. Carlyle, in his letter to Alexander Fraser Tytler, Esq. which accompanies the communication, "fell into my hands, among the papers of a friend of mine and Mr. John Home's, who died as long ago as the year 1754. Soon after, I found the poem; I showed it to Mr. Home, who told me that it had been addressed to him, by Mr. Collins, on his leaving London in the year 1749; that it was hastily composed, and incorrect; but that he would one day find leisure to look it over with care. Mr. Collins and Mr. Home had been made acquainted by Mr. John Barrow (the cordial youth mentioned in the first stanza), who had been for some time at the University of Edinburgh; had been a volunteer along with Mr. Home in the year 1746; had been taken prisoner with him at the battle of Falkirk; and had escaped together with him and five or six other gentlemen from the castle of Down. Mr. Barrow resided, in 1749, at Winchester, where Mr. Collins and Mr. Home were, for a week or two, together on a visit. Mr. Barrow was paymaster in America, in the war that commenced in 1756; and died in that country."

"I thought no more of the poem till a few years ago; when, on reading Dr. Johnson's life of Collins, I conjectured that it might be the very copy of verses which he mentions, which he says was much praised by some of his friends, and for the loss of which he expresses regret. I sought for it among my papers; and perceiving that a stanza and a half were wanting, I made the most diligent search I could for them, but in vain. Whether or not this great chasm was in the poem when it came into my hands, is more than I can remember at this distance of time."

To give a continued context, Mr. Frazer Tytler prevailed on Mr. Henry Mackenzie, author of the "Man of Feeling," to supply the fifth stanza and half of the sixth. In a few places, some words, either omitted or grown illegible, were added by Dr. Carlyle, and marked with inverted commas.

It is to be regretted, that the copy shown to Dr. Warton and his brother, which had probably received the last touches of a master's hand, is not somewhere extant; yet, that so much has been saved, the public is much obliged to Dr. Carlyle.

Soon after the appearance of this curious and valuable fragment in the "Edinburgh Transactions," a perfect copy, said to have been found in "the drawers of a bureau," was printed at London, in 4to. by Bell the bookseller, with a dedication to the Wartons; but the evidence of its authenticity was withheld from the public. The lines that supply the chasm in the fifth and half of the sixth stanza, introduce the execution of Charles I. the rebellion in 1745, the battles of Preston-pans, Falkirk, and Culloden; but the style does not seem to be in the manner of Collins. This copy has been received into the edition of the "English Poets," 1790; and reprinted, with the supplementary verses from the Edinburgh edition, in the present collection.

His misfortunes had already made a deep impression on his mind, but he found some consolation in changing the scene, and visiting his uncle, Lieutenant Colonel Martin, who was then with the British army in Flanders. His uncle died, soon after his arrival, and left him about 2000 l.; a sum which he could scarcely think exhaustible, and which he did not live to exhaust. The money he obtained from the booksellers, on the credit of translating "Aristotle's Poetics," was then repaid, and the translation neglected. But this accession of fortune came too late to be of any essential service to him. He had been so long harassed by anxiety, dissipation, and distress, that he fell into a nervous disorder, accompanied with an unconquerable depression of spirits, which at length reduced the finest understanding to the most deplorable dulness. His disorder was not alienation of mind, but general laxity and feebleness, a deficiency rather of vital than intellectual powers. What he spoke wanted neither judgment nor spirit; but a few minutes exhausted him, so that he was forced to rest upon his couch; till a short cessation restored his powers, and he was again able to talk with his former vigour.

The approaches of this dreadful malady he began to feel soon after his uncle's death, and with the usual weakness of men so diseased, eagerly snatched that temporary relief with which the table and the bottle flatter and seduce. But his health continually declined, and he grew more and more burthensome to himself. He was for some time confined in a house of lunatics, and afterwards retired to the care of his sister in Chester; where death came to his relief, in 1756, in the 35th year of his age.

Such was the end of Collins, a man of an elevated genius and extensive learning, who was lost to the world in the prime of life, without availing himself of fine abilities, which, properly improved, might have raised him to eminence in any profession, and have rendered him a blessing to his friends, and an ornament to his country.

An account of his person, and some of his more remarkable particularities, was communicated to the public, by an intelligent writer, in the "Gentleman's Magazine" for 1781.

"Collins I was intimately acquainted with, from the time that he came to reside at Oxford. In London I met him often, and remember he lodged in a little house with a Miss Bundy, at the corner of King's Square Court, Soho, now a warehouse, for a long time together. How he got down to Oxford I do not know; but I myself saw him under Merton wall in a very affecting situation, struggling, and conveyed by force, in the arms of two or three men, towards the parish of St. Clement, in which was a house that took in such unhappy objects.

"He was of a moderate stature, of a light and clear complexion, with grey eyes, so very weak at times as hardly to bear a candle in the room, and often raising within him apprehensions of blindness. He was passionately fond of music, good-natured, and affable, warm in his friendships, and visionary in his pursuits, and, as long as I knew him, temperate in his eating and drinking."

His character was written by Dr. Johnson, "while it was yet distinctly impressed upon his memory;" and printed in the twelfth volume of "The Poetical Calendar," 1764.

"Collins was a man of extensive literature, and of vigorous faculties. He was acquainted, not only with the learned tongues, but with the Italian, French, and Spanish languages. He had employed his mind chiefly upon works of fiction and subjects of fancy; and, by indulging some peculiar habits of thought, was eminently delighted with those flights of imagination which pass the bounds of nature, and to which the mind is reconciled only by a passive acquiescence in popular traditions. He loved fairies, genii, giants, and monsters; he delighted to rove through the meanders of enchantment, to gaze on the magnificence of golden palaces, to repose by the water-falls of Elysian gardens.

"This was, however, the character rather of his inclination than his genius; the grandeur of wildness, and the novelty of extravagance were always desired by him, but were not always attained. Yet, as diligence is never wholly lost, if his efforts sometimes caused harshness and obscurity, they sometimes produced, in his happier moments, sublimity and splendour. This idea which he had formed of excellence, led him to oriental fictions and allegorical imagery; and perhaps, while he was intent upon description, he did not sufficiently cultivate sentiment. His poems are the productions of a mind not deficient in fire, nor unfurnished with knowledge, either of books or life, but somewhat obstructed in its progress, by deviation in quest of mistaken beauties.

"His morals were pure, and his opinions pious. In a long continuance of poverty, and long habits of dissipation, it cannot be expected that any character should be exactly uniform. There is a degree of want by which the freedom of agency is almost destroyed, and long association with festiuitous companions, will at last relax the strictness of truth, and abate the fervour of sincerity. That this man, wise and virtuous as he was, passed always unentangled through the snares of life, it would be prejudice and temerity to affirm; but it may be said, that at least he preserved the source of action unpolluted; that his principles were never shaken; that his distinctions of right and wrong were never confounded; and that his faults had nothing of malignity or design, but proceeded from some unexpected pressure, or casual temptation.

"The latter part of his life cannot be remembered but with pity and sadness. He languished some years under that depression of mind which enchains the faculties without destroying them, and leaves reason the knowledge of right without the power of pursuing it. These clouds which he perceived gathering on his intellects; he endeavoured to disperse, by travel, and passed into France; but found himself constrained to yield to his malady, and returned.

"After his return from France, the writer of this character paid him a visit at Islington, where he was waiting for his sister, whom he had directed to meet him. There was then nothing of disorder discernible in his mind by any but himself; but he had withdrawn from study, and travelled with no other book than an English Testament, such as children carry to the school. When his friend took it into his hand to see what companion a man of letters had chosen, "I have but one book," said Collins, "but that is the best."

Of this portrait, the features are certainly very strong, but the character does not appear sufficiently explicit. Of the genius of Collins, in particular, the picture is very imperfect; but the veil which is drawn over the unhappy circumstances of his life, is drawn by the hand of humanity.

His Oriental Eclogues, written for the Entertainment of the Ladies of Tauris, were reprinted, in 4to. 1757. His Poetical Works, with Memoirs of the Author, and Observations on his Genius and Writings, were published by Langhorne, in 8vo. 1764. An Essay on his Oriental Eclogues, appeared in a posthumous volume of "Critical Essays," by Scott, in 1785. The "Observations" of Langhorne have been received into the edition of the "English Poets," 1790, and retained in the present collection.

Collins has written but little; and by those with whom the bulk of an author's performances is the criterion for estimating his merit, he will be deemed a minor poet. There are, however, volumes of verses of no mean character, which contain less genuine poetry than the few pages which he produced.

Of his Oriental Eclogues, according to Dr. Johnson, he spoke with disapprobation to Dr. Warton and his brother, in his last illness, as not sufficiently expressive of Asiatic manners, and called them his Iris Eclogues. It is very probable, when his judgment was improved by experience, he might discover, and be hurt by their faults, among which may possibly be found some few instances of inconsistency or absurdity. But the idea of manners seems mistakenly substituted for the idea of language. He has seldom violated the great outline of eastern customs; and his subjects did not often lead him to a description of minute particulars. His diction, as Langhorne has justly remarked, is not the diction of the east; it is mostly simple, and often elegant, but not flowery or metaphorical. But he seems rather mistaken, when he observes, that Collins was one of the few Poets who have sailed to Delpbi without touching at Cythera. Collins possessed a mind that could not be insensible to the amorous impressions. Of this, the warmth of expression with which he treats the passion of love, in the Eclogues, may be thought a sufficient indication. His compositions discover much of the tender, though nothing of the licentious. The Eclogues, with some marks of puerility, have nothing to fear from a comparison with any of their predecessors. They have all the requisites of good poetry; description, incident, sentiment, and moral. They have simplicity of thought, and melody of language.

His Odes, descriptive and allegorical, rank among the first lyric performances in the English language. They display a luxuriance of imagination, a wild sublimity of fancy, and a felicity of expression so extraordinary, that it might be supposed to be suggested by some superior power, rather than to be the effect of human judgment or capacity. They entitle Collins to an indisputable pre-eminence above all his competitors in that province of poetry, except Dryden and Gray.

Of his first ode, the measure is happily chosen to express that tenderness and pathos which must be inseparable from an Ode to Pity.

Long, Pity, let the nations view
Thy sky-worn robes of tenderest blue,
And eyes of dewy light.

The dewy light is a stroke which the happiest imagination alone could execute.

On a subject of tenderness, Collins could not possibly omit to mention his countryman, Otway, who was indeed "the Priest of Pity;" like him ingenious, and like him unhappy.

Wild Arun too has heard thy strains,
And Echo, 'midst my native plains,
Been sooth'd by Pity's lute!
There first the wren thy myrtles shed,
On gentlest Otway's infant head;
To him thy cell was shown.
And while he sung the female heart,
With youth's soft notes, unspoil'd by art,
Thy turtles mix'd their own!

The Ode to Fear is so nervous, so expressive, and so picturesque throughout, that it may challenge the whole compass of allegorical poetry.

Ah Fear! ah frantic Fear!
I see, I see thee near!
I know thy hurried step, thy haggard eye;
Like thee I start, like thee disorder'd fly!
For lo! what monsters in thy train appear.

The abbreviation of the measure in the two first lines is most happily adapted to the suddenness of the motion excited. Danger, who is introduced in the train of Fear, is so characteristically described, that there is no looking upon the picture without horror.

Danger, whose limbs of giant mold
What mortal eye can fix'd behold?
Who stalks his round, an hideous form,
Howling amidst the midnight storm,
Or throws him on the ridgy steep
Of some loose hanging rock to sleep.

It is not in the power of human invention to produce an image of greater force and propriety than that which is exhibited in the two last lines, when Danger is represented as sleeping on the loosely hanging rock of a precipice. The dreadful beings that attend him are described with equal strength of imagination. The effects of Fear on the Grecian theatre, and the superstition of St. Mark's Eve

The dreadful beings that attend him are described with equal strength of imagination. The effects of Fear on the Grecian theatre, and the superstition of St. Mark's Eve are introduced with great poetical propriety. Of the Ode to Simplicity, it would be superfluous to point out the beauties; they are so obvious that no eye can overlook them. The allusion to scenes of ancient enthusiasm and poetry are happily designed, and beautifully expressed.

By all the honey'd store
On Hybla's thymy shore,
By all her bleoms, and mingled murmurs dear,
By her, whose love-lorn woe,
In evening musings flow,
Sooth'd sweetly sad Electra's poet's ear.

Simplicity is essentially necessary to the perfection of every poetical work; and Collins has exemplified by all his performances, but particularly by his Oriental Eclogues, the truth of the following stanza.

Though taste, though genius blest
To some divine excess,
Faint's the cold work till thou inspire the whole;
What each, what all supply,
May court, may charm our eye,
Thou, only thou, canst raise the meeting soul!

His Ode on the Poetical Character is so extremely wild and extravagant, that it seems to have been written wholly during the tyranny of imagination. It is entirely abstracted, and, in some parts it may be thought blameably obscure; but there are some, however, whose congenial spirits may keep pace with him in his most eccentric flights; and, from some of his casual strokes, may catch those sublime ideas which, like him, they have experienced, but have never been able to express. Some to whom Fancy

The cest of amplest power has given,
To whom the god-like gift assigns,
To gaze her visions wild, and feel unmix'd her flame.

The Ode written in the Year 1746, will be more generally pleasing, as it is equally beautiful and simple. The strophe in the Ode to Mercy, affords the finest subject for a picture that imagination can form.

O thou, who sit'st a smiling bride
By Valour's arm'd and awful side,
Gentlest of sky-born forms, and best ador'd:
Who oft with songs, divine to hear,
Win'st from his fatal grasp the spear,
And hid'st in wreaths of flowers his bloodless sword!

There is something perfectly classical in Collins's manner, both with respect to his imagery and his composition; and Horace's rule of ut Pictura Poesis was never better observed than in this instance. The same style of painting, though somewhat bolder, characterises the Ode to Liberty.

Who shall awake the Spartan life! &c.

The ruin of the liberties and of the state of Rome is described in a most picturesque and pathetic manner.

No, Freedom, no, I will not tell,
How Rome, before thy weeping face,
With heaviest sound, a giant-statue, fell,
Push'd by a wild and artless race,
From off its wide ambitious base,
When Time his northern sons of spoil awoke,
And all the blended work of strength and grace,
With many a rude repeated stroke,
And many a barbarous yell, to thousand fragments broke.

The ancient tradition, that there was formerly a temple of liberty in Britain, awakes at once the enthusiasm and the patriotism of Collins; and he dwells with rapture on the thought.

Then too, 'tis said, an hoary pile,
'Midst the green navel of our isle;
Thy shrine in some religious wood,
O soul-enforcing goddess flood, &c.

In the Passions, an Ode for Music, the emotions of the soul are described, and the movements of the verse adapted to them with equal happiness. "Other pieces of the same nature," says Langhorne, "have derived their greatest reputation from the perfection of the music that accompanied them; but in this we have the whole soul and power of poetry: expression that, even without the aid of music, strikes to the heart, and imagery of power enough to transport the attention without the forceful alliance of corresponding sounds. Upon the whole, there may be very little hazard in asserting, that this is the finest ode in the English language."

His Ode to Evening, is an admirable effort of fancy, expression, and versification. It is written in unrhyming metre, a measure in which, according to Dr. Warton, he had a design of writing many more odes. It seems to be an agreed point, that lyric poetry cannot exist without rhyme, in our language. In this measure, however, Milton wrote his translation of "The Fifth Ode of Horace;" and there are extant, other odes in our language, of the truest taste, written in rhyming metre, particularly some trochaics of Glover, which are not inharmonious, and some lyric pieces of Dr. Sayers, an elegant living poet, whose genius, like that of Collins, is above the common taste. But it may be doubted, whether there is sufficient precision and elegance in the English language for metre without rhyme.

Of the Ode on the popular Superstition of the Highlands of Scotland, a superficial reading will not discover its real beauties. It is the sacred charm of simplicity that pervades the whole. The design is gracefully introduced. The first stanza shows at once the sentiments of his heart for his friends, and his taste for poetical subjects. The tales of the Fairies, and the legends of the Runic Bards, are recommended to the poet, as they enlarge his province, and give energy to the "heart-commanding strain. Gray was of the same opinion. The Songs of the Bards, in commemoration of some departed chieftain, are finely introduced. The Second Sight of the Highlanders is well described. Of Mr. Mackenzie's supplement, it is sufficient praise, that it cannot easily be distinguished from the context. The attributes of the fiend, who directs the Ignis fatuus to mislead the wandering traveller, are delineated with the classical pencil of Collins. The eighth stanza pathetically describes the distressed family of one who has been lost in the fens, or in the sea:

For him in vain his anxious wife shall wait,
Or wander forth to meet him on his way, &c.

The wife's dream, in which she sees her husband's ghost, is both natural and tender. The Spirit of the Waters, is a fiction that powerfully impresses the imagination. The description of St. Kilda is in a style of beautiful simplicity. Having exhibited the superstitions of Scotland, of which he shows a perfect knowledge, he recommends these themes, which, "in elder time, filled the historic page." He cites the example of Shakspeare, and of Tasso, and pays a tribute of applause to his translator, Fairfax:

How have I sat, where pip'd the pensive wind,
To hear his harp, by British Fairfax strung.
Prevailing poet! whose undoubting mind
Believ'd the magic wonders which he sung!

In the last stanza, he gives a picture of Scotland, with its friths and lakes, of which, as was natural, he grows enamoured, and longs to travel into that country, as Jonson had done before him, on a visit to a poet:

Then will I dress once more the faded bower
Where Jonson sat in Drummond's social shade, &c.

The reading of this beautiful ode leaves on the mind a tender sorrow for the drooping hand that left its work unfinished.

The Ode to Peace, the Dirge in Cymbeline, Manners, an Ode, the Odes on the Death of Thomson and Sir Charles Roß, are highly poetical, and have all their brighter passages, which are particularly marked out by Langhorne. The Epistle to Sir Thomas Hanmer, has some vigorous, and some happy lines; though it is the least interesting of his performances. The portraits from Shakspeare, are happily selected, and forcibly delineated; and the lines with which they are introduced, may reasonably be supposed to have attracted the notice of Mr. Boydell, and excited the emulation of the British artists of the present day.

O, might some verse with happiest skill persuade
Expressive picture to adopt thine aid!
What wondrous draughts might rise from every page!
What other Raphaels charm a distant age!

To the estimate of the genius and writings of Collins, given by Dr. Johnson in the "Poetical Calendar," he made the following severe and injurious addition, in his "Lives of the Poets."

"The diction of Collins was often harsh, unskilfully laboured, and injudiciously selected. He affected the obsolete, when it was not worth revival, and he puts his words out of the common order, seeming to think, with some later candidates for fame, that not to write prose is certainly to write poetry. His lines commonly are of slow motion, clogged and impeded with clusters of consonants. As men are often esteemed who cannot be loved, so the poetry of Collins may sometimes extort praise when it gives little pleasure."

A very different opinion of his poetical excellence is maintained by critics of undoubted reputation.

Mr. Warton, the learned historian of English poetry, speaking of Collins, calls him his lamented friend, "whose odes will be remembered while any taste for true poetry remains."

"The genius of Collins," says Dr. Knox in his elegant "Essays," "seems, in some measure, to have resembled that of Tickell. Dignity, solemnity, and pathos, are the striking features of his compositions. None but a true poet could have written his song over Fidele in Shakspeare's Cymbeline."

Mr. Potter, the ingenious translator of "Æschylus" and "Euripides," treating of the ode, asserts, that Collins was the first of our poets who reached its excellence. "His mind was impressed with a tender melancholy, but without any mixture of that sullen gloom which deadens its powers; it led him to the softest sympathy, that most refined feeling of the human heart. His faculties were vigorous, and his genius truly sublime; his style is close and strong, and his numbers in general harmonious. He was well acquainted with Æschylus and Euripides, and drew deep from their fountains. His thoughts had a romantic cast, and his imagination a certain wild grandeur which sometimes perhaps approaches to the borders of extravagance; but this led him to descriptions and allegories wonderfully poetical. Such, for instance, is the antistrophe in his Ode to Liberty, and the first part of his Ode to Fear. Æschylus himself has not a bolder conception, and the grandeur of thought is as greatly expressed. Dr. Johnson speaks of this great poet with a tenderness that reflects honour on himself: He allows him sometimes to have sublimity and splendour; but, in the coldness of criticism, expresses some disapprobation of his allegorical imagery, and is unjust to his harmony."

With these ingenious critics, the present writer is happy to agree, in giving Collins a much higher rank as a poet than Dr. Johnson has allowed him; but, while he condemns, with Mr. Potter, the excess to which Dr. Johnson's strictures are carried, he acknowledges that they are not, in every respect, destitute of foundation. Collins is occasionally, though not frequently, harsh in his numbers; his personifications appear, in a few instances, to be multiplied beyond just cause; and he is sometimes blameably obscure. But when every possible deduction is made from his merit, he will still stand entitled to a very large proportion of praise; and his Ode on the Passions must ever be joined with the "St. Cecilia" of Dryden, and the "Bard" of Gray, as among the boldest and brightest efforts of the lyric muse.

THE WORKS OF COLLINS.

ORIENTAL ECLOGUES.

ECLOGUE I.

SELIM; OR THE SHEPHERD'S MORAL.

Scene, a Valley near Bagdat. Time, the Morning.

YE Persian maids attend your poet's lays,
And hear how shepherds pass their golden days,
Not all are blest whom fortune's hand sustains
With wealth in courts, nor all that haunt the plains:
Well may your hearts believe the truths I tell!
'Tis virtue make the bliss, where'er we dwell.

Thus Selim sung, by sacred truth inspir'd;
Nor praise, but such as truth bestow'd, desir'd:
Wise in himself, his meaning songs convey'd
Informing morals to the shepherd maid;
Or taught the swains that surest bliss to find,
What groves nor streams bestow, a virtuous mind.

When sweet and blushing, like a virgin bride
The radiant morn resum'd her orient pride,
When wanton gales along the vallies play,
Breathe on each flower, and bear their sweets away:
By 'Tigris' wandering waves he sat, and sung
This useful lesson for the fair and young,

Ye Persian dames, he said, to you belong,
Well may they please, the morals of my song:
No fairer maids, I trust, than you are found,
Grac'd with soft arts, the peopled world around!
The morn that lights you, to your loves supplies
Each gentler ray delicious to your eyes:

For you those flowers her fragrant hands bestow,
And yours the love that kings delight to know.

Yet think not these, all beauteous as they are,
The best kind blessings heaven can grant the fair!
Who trust alone in beauty's feeble ray,
Boast but the worth Bassora's pearls display;
Drawn from the deep we own their surface bright,
But, dark within, they drink no lustrous light:
Such are the maids, and such the charms they
By sense unaided, or to virtue lost. [boast,

Self-flattering sex! your hearts believe in vain
That love shall blind, when once he fires the
Or hope a lover by your faults to win, [swain;
As spots on ermin beautify the skin:

Who seeks secure to rule, be first her care
Each softer virtue that adorns the fair;
Each tender passion man delights to find,
The lov'd perfections of a female mind! [reign,

Blest were the days, when wisdom held her
And shepherds fought her on the silent plain;
With truth she wedded in the secret grove,
Immortal truth, and daughters blest'd their love.

O haste, fair maids! ye virtues come away,
Sweet peace and plenty lead you on your way!
The balmy shrub for you shall love our shore,
By Ind excell'd, or Araby, no more.

Lost to our fields, for so the fates ordain,
The dear deserters shall return again. [clear,
Come thou, whose thoughts as limpid springs are
To lead the train sweet modesty appear:

Here make thy court amidst our rural scene,
And shepherd-girls shall own thee for their queen,
With thee be chastity, of all afraid,
Distrusting all, a wise suspicious maid;
But man the most—not more the mountain doe
Holds the swift falcon for her deadly foe.

Cold is her breast, like flowers that drink the dew,
A silken veil conceals her from the view.
No wild desires amidst thy train be known,
But faith, whose heart is fix'd on one alone:
Desponding meekness with her downcast eyes,
And friendly pity full of tender sighs;
And love the last: by these your hearts approve,
These are the virtues that must lead to love.

Thus sung the swain; and ancient legends say,
The maids of Bagdat verified the lay:
Dear to the plains the virtues came along,
The shepherds lov'd, and Selim bliss'd his song.

ECLOGUE II.

HASSAN; OR THE CAMEL DRIVER.

Scene, the Desert. Time, Mid-day.

IN silent horror o'er the boundless waste
The driver Hassan with his camels past:
One cruise of water on his back he bore,
And his light scrip contain'd a scanty store:
A fan of painted feathers in his hand,
To guard his shaded face from scorching sand.
The sultry sun had gain'd the middle sky,
And not a tree and not an herb was nigh;
The beasts, with pain, their dusty way pursue,
Shrill roar'd the winds, and dreary was the view!
With desperate sorrow wild, th' affrighted man
Thrice sigh'd, thrice struck his breast, and thus began:

"Sad was th' hour, and luckless was the day,
"When first from Schiraz' walls I bent my way!"
Ah! little thought I of the blasting wind,
The thirst, or pinching hunger, that I find!
Bethink thee, Hassan, where shall thirst assuage,
When fails this cruise, his unrelenting rage?

Soon shall this scrip its precious load resign;
Then what but tears and hunger shall be thine?

Ye mute companions of my toils, that bear
In all my griefs a more than equal share!
Here, where no springs in murmurs break away,
Or moss-crown'd fountains mitigate the day,
In vain ye hope the green delights to know,
Which plains more blest, or verdant vales bestow:
Here rocks alone, and tasteless sands are found,
And faint and sickly winds for ever howl around.
"Sad was the hour, and luckless was the day,
"When first from Schiraz' walls I bent my
"way!"

Curst be the gold and silver which persuade
Weak men to follow far-fatiguing trade!
The lily peace outshines the silver store;
And life is dearer than the golden ore:
Yet money tempts us o'er the desert brown,
To every distant mart and wealthy town.
Full oft we tempt the land, and oft the sea:
And are we only yet repaid by thee?
Ah! why was ruin so attractive made,
Or why fond man so easily betray'd?
Why heed we not, while mad we haste along,
The gentle voice of peace, or pleasure's song?
Or wherefore think the flowery mountain's side,
The fountain's murmurs, and the valley's pride,
Why think we these less pleasing to behold,
Than dreary deserts, if they lead to gold?
"Sad was the hour, and luckless was the day,
"When first from Schiraz' walls I bent my
"way!"

O cease, my fears!—all frantic as I go,
When thought creates unnumber'd scenes of woe,
What if the lion in his rage I meet!—
Oft in the dust I view his printed feet:
And, fearful! oft, when day's declining light
Yields her pale empire to the mourner night,
By hunger rous'd, he scours the groaning plain,
Gaunt wolves and sullen tigers in his train:
Before them death with shrieks directs their way,
Fills the wild yell, and leads them to their prey.
"Sad was the hour, and luckless was the day,
"When first from Schiraz' walls I bent my
"way!"

At that dead hour the silent asp shall creep,
If aught of rest I find, upon my sleep:
Or some swoln serpent twist his scales around,
And wake to anguish with a burning wound.
Thrice happy they, the wise contented poor,
From lust of wealth, and dread of death secure!
They tempt no deserts, and no griefs they find;
Peace rules the day, where reason rules the mind.
"Sad was the hour, and luckless was the day,
"When first from Schiraz' walls I bent my
"way!"

O, hapless youth! for she thy love hath won,
The tender Zara will be most undone! [maid,
Big swell'd my heart, and own'd the powerful
When fast she drops her tears, as thus she said:
"Farewell the youth whom sighs could not detain,
"Whom Zara's breaking heart implor'd in vain!
"Yet as thou go'st, may every blast arise
"Weak and unfelt as these rejected sighs!
"Safe o'er the wild, no perils may'st thou see,
"No griefs endure, nor weep, false youth, like
"me."

O, let me safely to the fair return,
Say with a kiss, she must not, shall not mourn;
O! let me teach my heart to lose its fears,
Recall'd by Wisdom's voice, and Zara's tears.
He said, and call'd on heaven to bless the day,
When back to Schiraz' walls he bent his way.

ECLOGUE III.

ABRA; OR, THE GEORGIAN SULTANA.

Scene, a Forest. Time, the Evening.

IN Georgia's land, where Teflis' towers are seen,
In distant view along the level green,
While evening dews enrich the glittering glade,
And the tall forests cast a longer shade,
What time 'tis sweet o'er fields of rice to stray,
Or scent the breathing maize at setting day;
Amidst the maids of Zagen's peaceful grove,
Emyra sung the pleasing cares of love.

Of Abra first began the tender strain,
Who led her youth with flocks upon the plain:
At morn she came those willing flocks to lead,
Where lilies rear them in the watery mead;
From early dawn the live-long hours she told,
Till late at silent eve she penn'd the fold.
Deep in the grove, beneath the secret shade,
A various wreath of odorous flowers she made:
* Gay-motley'd pinks and sweet jonquils she chose,
The violet blue that on the moss-bank grows;
All-sweet to sense, the flaunting rose was there:
The finish'd chaplet well-adorn'd her hair.

Great Abbas chanc'd that fated morn to stray,
By love conducted from the chase away;
Among the vocal vales he heard her song,
And sought the vales and echoing groves among:
At length he found, and woo'd the rural maid;
She knew the monarch, and with fear obey'd.

"Be every youth like royal Abbas mov'd,
"And every Georgian maid like Abra lov'd!"

The royal lover bore her from the plain;
Yet still her crook and bleating flock remain:
Oft as she went, she backward turn'd her view,
And bade that crook and bleating flock adieu.
Fair happy maid! to other scenes remove,
To richer scenes of golden power and love!
Go leave the simple pipe, and shepherd's strain;
With love delight thee, and with Abbas reign.

"Be every youth like royal Abbas mov'd,
"And every Georgian maid like Abra lov'd!"

Yet midst the blaze of courts she fix'd her love
On the cool fountain, or the shady grove:
Still with the shepherd's innocence her mind
To the sweet vale, and flowery mead inclin'd;
And oft as spring renew'd the plains with flowers,
Breath'd his soft gales, and led the fragrant hours,
With sure return she sought the sylvan scene,
The breezy mountains, and the forests green.
Her maids around her mov'd, a duteous band!
Each bore a crook all rural in her hand:
Some simple lay, of flocks and herds they sung;
With joy the mountain and the forest rung.
"Be every youth like royal Abbas mov'd,
"And every Georgian maid like Abra lov'd!"

* That these flowers are found in very great abundance in some of the provinces of Persia, see the modern history of Mr. Salmon.

And oft the royal lover left the care
 And thorns of state, attendant on the fair;
 Oft to the shades and low-roof'd cots retir'd,
 Or fought the vale where first his heart was fir'd:
 A russet mantle, like a swain, he wore,
 And thought of crowns and busy courts no more.
 "Be every youth like royal Abbas mov'd,
 "And every Georgian maid like Abra lov'd!"
 Blest was the life, that royal Abbas led:
 Sweet was his love, and innocent his bed.
 What if in wealth the noble maid excel;
 The simple shepherd-girl can love as well.
 Let those who rule on Persia's jewel'd throne,
 Be fam'd for love, and gentlest love alone;
 Or wreath, like Abbas, full of fair renown,
 The lover's myrtle with the warrior's crown.
 O happy days! the maids around her say;
 O haste, profuse of blessings, haste away!
 "Be every youth like royal Abbas mov'd;
 "And every Georgian maid like Abra lov'd!"

ECLOGUE IV.

AGIB AND SECANDER; OR, THE FUGITIVES.

Scene, a Mountain in Circassia. Time, Midnight.

In fair Circassia, where, to love inclin'd,
 Each swain was blest, for every maid was kind;
 At that still hour, when awful midnight reigns,
 And none, but wretches, haunt the twilight plains;
 What time the moon had hung her lamp on high,
 And past in radiance through the cloudless sky;
 Sad o'er the dews, two brother shepherds fled,
 Where wildering fear and desperate sorrow led:
 Fast as they prest their flight, behind them lay
 Wild ravag'd plains, and vallies stole away.
 Along the mountain's bending sides they ran,
 Till, faint and weak, Secander thus began:

Secander.

O stay thee, Agib, for my feet deny,
 No longer friendly to my life, to fly.
 Friend of my heart, O turn thee and survey,
 Trace our sad flight through all its length of way!
 And first review that long-extended plain,
 And yon wide groves, already past with pain!
 Yon ragged cliff, whose dangerous path we try'd!
 And last this lofty mountain's weary side!

Agib.

Weak as thou art, yet hapless must thou know
 The toils of flight, or some severer woe!
 Still as I haste, the Tartar shouts behind,
 And shrieks and sorrows load the saddening wind:
 In rage of heart, with ruin in his hand,
 He blasts our harvests, and deforms our land.

Yon citron grove, whence first in fear we came,
 Droops its fair honours to the conquering flame:
 Far fly the swains, like us, in deep despair,
 And leave to ruffian bands their fleecy care.

Secander.

Unhappy land, whose blessings tempt the sword,
 In vain, unheard, thou call'st thy Persian lord!
 In vain thou court'st him, helpless, to thine aid,
 To shield the shepherd, and protect the maid!
 Far off, in thoughtless indolence resign'd,
 Soft dreams of love and pleasure sooth his mind,
 'Midst fair sultanas lost in idle joy,
 No wars alarm him, and no fears annoy.

Agib.

Yet these green hills, in summer's sultry heat,
 Have lent the monarch oft a cool retreat.
 Sweet to the sight is Zabran's flowery plain,
 And once by maids and shepherds lov'd in vain!
 No more the virgins shall delight to rove
 By Sargis' banks, or Irwan's shady grove,
 On Tarkie's mountain catch the cooling gale,
 Or breathe the sweets of Aly's flowery vale:
 Fair scenes! but, ah! no more with peace possess'd,
 With ease alluring, and with plenty blest.
 No more the shepherd's whitening tents appear,
 Nor the kind products of a bounteous year;
 No more the date, with snowy blossoms crown'd:
 But ruin spreads her baleful fires around.

Secander.

In vain Circassia boasts her spicy groves,
 For ever fam'd for pure and happy loves;
 In vain she boasts her fairest of the fair,
 Their eyes' blue languish, and their golden hair!
 Those eyes in tears their fruitless grief must send;
 Those hairs the Tartar's cruel hand shall rend.

Agib.

Ye Georgian swains, that piteous learn from far
 Circassia's ruin, and the waste of war;
 Some weightier arms than crooks and staffs prepare,

To shield your harvests, and defend your fair:
 The Turk and Tartar like designs pursue,
 Fix'd to destroy, and stedfast to undo.
 Wild as his land, in native deserts bred,
 By lust incited, or by malice led,
 The villain Arab, as he prowls for prey,
 Oft marks with blood and wasting flames the way;
 Yet none so cruel as the Tartar foe,
 To death inur'd, and nurs'd in scenes of woe.

He said; when loud along the vale was heard
 A shriller shriek, and nearer fires appear'd:
 Th' affrighted shepherds, through the dews of
 night,
 Wide o'er the moon-light hills renew'd their flight.

ODES, DESCRIPTIVE AND ALLEGORICAL.

ODE TO PITY.

O THOU, the friend of man assign'd,
 With balmy hands his wounds to bind,
 And charm his frantic woe:

When first distress, with dagger keen,
 Broke forth to waste his destin'd scene,
 His wild unfated foe!

By Pella's bard, a magic name,
 By all the griefs his thought could frame;

Receive my humble rite :
 Long, Pity, let the nations view
 Thy sky-worn robes of tenderest blue,
 And eyes of dewy light !
 But wherefore need I wander wide
 To old Ilissus' distant side,
 Deserted stream, and mute ?
 Wild * Arun too has heard thy strains,
 And echo, 'midst my native plains,
 Been sooth'd by Pity's lute.

There first the wren thy myrtles shed,
 On gentlest Otway's infant head,
 To him thy cell was shown ;
 And while he sung the female heart,
 With youth's soft notes unspoil'd by art,
 Thy turtles mix'd their own.

Come, Pity, come, by fancy's aid,
 Ev'n now my thoughts, relenting maid,
 Thy temple's pride design :
 Its southern site, its truth complete
 Shall raise a wild enthusiast heat,
 In all who view the shrine.

There picture's toil shall well relate,
 How chance, or hard involving fate,
 O'er mortal bliss prevail :
 The buskin'd muse shall near her stand,
 And sighing prompt her tender hand,
 With each disastrous tale.

There let me oft, retir'd by day,
 In dreams of passion melt away,
 Allow'd with thee to dwell :
 There waste the mournful lamp of night,
 Till, virgin, thou again delight
 To hear a British shell !

ODE TO FEAR.

THOU, to whom the world unknown
 With all its shadowy shapes is shown ;
 Who seest appall'd, th' unreal scene,
 While fancy lifts the veil between :
 Ah, Fear ! ah, frantic Fear !
 I see, I see thee near.
 I know thy hurried step, thy haggard eye !
 Like thee I start, like thee disorder'd fly,
 For, lo, what monsters in thy train appear !
 Danger, whose limbs of giant mold
 What mortal eye can fix'd behold ?
 Who stalks his round, an hideous form,
 Howling amidst the midnight storm,
 Or throws him on the ridgy steep
 Of some loose hanging rock to sleep :
 And with him thousand phantoms join'd,
 Who prompt to deeds accurs'd the mind :
 And those, the fiends, who near allied,
 O'er nature's wounds and wrecks preside ;
 While vengeance in the lurid air,
 Lifts her red arm, expos'd and bare :
 On whom that ravening brood of fate,
 Who lap the blood of sorrow, wait ;
 Who, Fear, this ghastly train can see,
 And look not madly wild, like thee ?

* A river in Sussex.

EPODE.

In earliest Greece, to thee, with partial choice,
 The grief-full muse address her infant tongue ;
 The maids and matrons, on her awful voice,
 Silent and pale, in wild amazement hung.
 Yet he, the bard * who first invok'd thy name,
 Disdain'd in Marathon its power to feel :
 For not alone he nurs'd the poet's flame,
 But reach'd from virtue's hand the patriot's steel.

But who is he whom later garlands grace,
 Who left a while o'er Hybla's dew to rove,
 With trembling eyes thy dreary steps to trace,
 Where thou and furies shar'd the baleful grove ?
 Wrapt in thy cloudy veil th' incestuous queen †
 Sigh'd the sad call her son and husband heard,
 When once alone it broke the silent scene,
 And he the wretch of Thebes no more appear'd.

O Fear, I know thee by my throbbing heart,
 Thy withering power inspir'd each mournful
 line,

Though gentle pity claim her mingled part,
 Yet all the thunders of the scene are thine.

ANTISTROPHE.

Thou who such weary lengths hast past,
 Where wilt thou rest, mad nymph, at last ?
 Say, wilt thou shroud in haunted cell,
 Where gloomy rape and murder dwell ?
 Or in some hollow seat,
 'Gainst which the big waves beat,
 Hear drowning seamen's cries in tempests brought !
 Dark power, with shuddering meek submitted
 Be mine, to read the visions old, [thought,
 Which thy awakening bards have told.

And, lest thou meet my blasted view,
 Hold each strange tale devoutly true ;
 Ne'er be I found, by thee o'eraw'd,
 In that thrice-hallow'd eve abroad,
 When ghosts, as cottage maids believe,
 Their pebbled beds permitted leave,
 And goblins haunt from fire, or fen,
 Or mine, or flood, the walks of men !
 O thou, whose spirit most possessest
 The sacred seat of Shakspeare's breast !
 By all that from thy prophet broke,
 In thy divine emotions spoke !
 Hither again thy fury deal,
 Teach me but once like him to feel :
 His cypress wreath my meed decree,
 And I, O Fear, will dwell with thee !

ODE TO SIMPLICITY.

O THOU, by nature taught,
 To breathe her genuine thought,
 In numbers warmly pure, and sweetly strong :
 Who first on mountains wild,
 In fancy, loveliest child,
 Thy babe, and pleasure's, nurs'd the powers of
 song !

Thou, who with hermit heart
 Disdain'st the wealth of art,

* Æschylus.

† Jocasta.

And gauds, and pageant weeds, and trailing pall :
 But com'ft a decent maid,
 In Attic robe array'd,
 O chafte, unboaftful nymph, to thee I call !

By all the honey'd ftore
 On Hybla's thymy ftore,
 By all her blooms, and mingled murmurs dear,
 By her, whose love-lorn woe,
 In evening mufings flow,
 Sooth'd sweetly fad Electra's poet's ear :

By old Cephifus deep,
 Who fpread his wavy fweep
 In warbled wanderings round thy green retreat,
 On whose enamell'd fide,
 When holy freedom died,
 No equal haunt allur'd thy future feet.

O fifter meek of truth,
 To my admiring youth,
 Thy sober aid and native charms infufe !
 The flowers that sweeteft breathe,
 Though beauty cull'd the wreath,
 Still ask thy hand to range their order'd hues.

While Rome could none efteem,
 But virtue's patriot theme,
 You lov'd her hills, and led her laureate band ;
 But ftaid to fmg alone
 To one diftinguifh'd throne,
 And turn'd thy face, and fled her alter'd land.

No more, in hall or bower,
 The paffions own thy power,
 Love, only love, her forcelefs numbers mean :
 For thou haft left her fhine,
 Nor olive more, nor vine,
 Shall gain thy feet to blefs the fervile fcene.

Though tafte, though genius blefs
 To fome divine excefs,
 Faint 's the cold work till thou infpire the whole ;
 What each, what all fupply,
 May court, may charm our eye,
 Thou, only thou, canft raife the meeting foul !

Of thefe let others ask,
 To aid fome mighty task,
 I only feek to find thy temperate vale :
 Where oft my reed might found
 To maids and fhepherds round,
 And all thy fons, O Nature, learn my tale.

ODE ON THE POETICAL CHARACTER.

As once, if not with light regard,
 I read aright that gifted bard,
 (Him whose fchool above the reft
 His lovelieft Elfin queen has bleft)
 One, only one unrivall'd fair *,
 Might hope the magic girdle wear,
 At folemn tourney hung on high,
 The wifh of each love-darting eye ;
 Lo ! to each other nymph in turn applied,
 As if, in air unfeen, fome hovering hand,
 Some chafte and angel-friend to virgin-fame,

* Florimel. See Spenser, Leg. 4.

With whisper'd fpell had burft the ftarting band
 It left unbleft her loath'd difhonour'd fide ;
 Happier hopelefs fair, if never
 Her baffled hand with vain endeavour
 Had touch'd that fatal zone to her denied !
 Young Fancy thus, to me divineft name,
 To whom, prepar'd and bath'd in heaven,
 The celt of ampleft power is given,
 To few the godlike gift affigns,
 To gird their bleft prophetic loins,
 And gaze her vifions wild, and feel unmix'd her
 flame.

The band, as fairy legends fay,
 Was wove on that creating day,
 When he, who call'd with thought to birth
 Yon tented fky, this laughing earth,
 And drest with fprings, and forests tall,
 And pour'd the main engirthing all,
 Long by the lov'd enthufiaft woo'd,
 Himfelf in fome diviner mood,
 Retiring, fate with her alone,
 And plac'd her on his fapphire throne,
 The whiles, the vaulted fhine around,
 Seraphic wires were heard to found,
 Now fublimeft triumph swelling ;
 Now on love and mercy dwelling ;
 And fhe, from out the veiling cloud,
 Breath'd her magic notes aloud :
 And thou, the rich-hair'd youth of morn,
 And all thy fubject life was born ?
 The dangerous paffions kept aloof,
 Far from the fainted growing woof :
 But near it fate ecftatic wonder,
 Lifting the deep applauding thunder :
 And Truth, in funny veft array'd,
 By whose the Tarfol's eyes were made ;
 All the shadowy tribes of mind,
 In braided dance their murmurs join'd,
 And all the bright uncounted powers,
 Who feed on heaven's ambrofial flowers,
 Where is the bard, whose foul can now
 Its high prefuming hopes avow ?
 Where he who thinks, with rapture blind,
 This hallow'd work for him design'd ?
 High on fome cliff, to heav'n up-pil'd,
 Of rude access, of profpect wild,
 Where, tangled round the jealous fteep,
 Strange fshades o'erbrow the vallies deep,
 And holy Genii guard the rock,
 Its glooms embrown, its fprings unlock,
 While on its rich ambitious head,
 An Eden, like his own, lies fspread.
 I view that oak, the fancied glades among,
 By which as Milton lay, his evening ear,
 From many a cloud that dropp'd ethereal dew,
 Nigh fpher'd in heaven its native ftrains could hear :
 On which that ancient trump he reach'd was Thither oft his glory greeting, [hung ;
 From Waller's myrtle fshades retreating,
 With many a vow from Hope's afpiring tongue,
 My trembling feet his guiding fteps purfue ;
 In vain---Such blifs to one alone,
 Of all the fons of foul was known,
 And Heaven, and Fancy, kindred powers,
 Have now o'erturn'd th' infpiring bowers,
 Or curtain'd clofe fuch fcene from every future view.

O D E.

Written in the year 1746.

How sleep the brave, who sink to rest,
By all their country's wishes blest!
When Spring, with dewy fingers cold,
Returns to deck their hallow'd mold,
She there shall dress a sweeter sod,
Than Fancy's feet have ever trod.

By fairy hands their knell is rung,
By forms unseen their dirge is sung;
There Honour comes, a pilgrim gray,
To bless the turf that wraps their clay,
And Freedom shall a while repair,
To dwell a weeping hermit there!

ODE TO MERCY.

STROPHE.

O THOU, who sit'st a smiling bride
By Valour's arm'd and awful side,
Gentlest of sky-born forms, and best ador'd:
Who oft with songs, divine to hear,
Win'st from his fatal grasp the spear,
And hid'st in wreaths of flowers his bloodless sword!
Thou who, amidst the deathful field,
By godlike chiefs alone beheld,
Oft with thy bosom bare art found,
Pleading for him the youth who sinks to ground:
See Mercy, see, with pure and loaded hands,
Before thy shrine my country's genius stands,
And decks thy altar still, though pierc'd with many a wound!

ANTISTROPHE.

When he whom ev'n our joys provoke,
The fiend of nature join'd his yoke,
And rush'd in wrath to make our isle his prey;
Thy form, from out thy sweet abode,
O'ertook him on his blasted road.
And stopp'd his wheels, and look'd his rage away.
I see recoil his fable steeds,
That bore him swift to savage deeds,
Thy tender melting eyes they own;
O maid, for all thy love to Britain shown,
Where Justice bars her iron tower,
To thee we build a roseate bower,
Thou, thou shalt rule our queen, and share our monarch's throne!

ODE TO LIBERTY.

STROPHE.

Who shall awake the Spartan fire,
And call in solemn sounds to life,
The youths, whose locks divinely spreading,
Like vernal hyacinths in fullen hue,
At once the breath of fear and virtue shedding,
Applauding Freedom lov'd of old to view?
What new Alceus, fancy-blest,
Shall sing the sword, in myrtles dress'd,
At wisdom's shrine a while its flame concealing,
(What place so fit to seal a deed renown'd?)
Till she her brightest lightnings round revealing,
It leap'd in glory forth, and dealt her prompted
wound!

O Goddess, in that feeling hour,
When most its sounds would court thy ears,
Let not my shell's misguided power,
E'er draw thy sad, thy mindful tears.
No, Freedom, no, I will not tell,
How Rome, before thy face,
With heaviest sound, a giant statue, fell,
Push'd by a wild and artless race,
From off its wide ambitious base,
When time his northern sons of spoil awoke,
And all the blended work of strength and grace,
With many a rude repeated stroke,
And many a barbarous yell, to thousand fragments broke.

EPODE.

Yet, ev'n where'er the least appear'd,
Th' admiring world thy hand rever'd;
Still, 'midst the scatter'd states around,
Some remnants of her strength were found;
They saw, by what escap'd the storm,
How wondrous rose her perfect form;
How in the great, the labour'd whole,
Each mighty master pour'd his soul;
For sunny Florence, seat of art,
Beneath her vines preserv'd a part,
Till they, whom Science lov'd to name,
(O, who could fear it?) quench'd her flame.
And, lo, an humbler relic laid
In jealous Pisa's olive shade!
See small Marino joins the theme,
Though least, not last in thy esteem;
Strike, louder strike th' ennobling strings
To those, whose merchants sons were kings;
To him, who, deck'd with pearly pride,
In Adria weds his green hair'd bride:
Hail port of glory, wealth and pleasure,
Ne'er let me change this Lydian measure:
Nor e'er her former pride relate,
To sad Liguria's bleeding state.
Ah, no! more pleas'd thy haunts I seek,
On wild Helvetia's mountains bleak:
(Where, when the favour'd of thy choice,
The daring archer heard thy voice;
Forth from his eery rouz'd in dread,
The ravening eagle northward fled.)
Or dwell in willow'd meads more near,
With those * to whom thy stork is dear:
Those whom the rod of Alva bruis'd,
Whose crown a British queen refus'd!
The magic works, thou feel'st the strains,
One holier name alone remains;
The perfect spell shall then avail,
Hail, nymph, ador'd by Britain, hail!

ANTISTROPHE.

Beyond the measure vast of thought,
The works, the wizard time has wrought!

* The Dutch, amongst whom there are very severe penalties for those that are convicted of killing this bird. They are kept tame in almost all their towns, and particularly at the Hague, of the arms of which they make a part. The common people of Holland are said to entertain a superstitious sentiment, that if the whole species of them should become extinct, they should lose their liberties.

The Gaul, 'tis held of antique story,
 Saw Britain link'd to his now adverse strand *,
 No sea between, nor cliff sublime and hoary,
 He pass'd with unwet feet through all our land.
 To the blown Baltic then, they say,
 The wild waves found another way,
 Where Orcashowls, his wolfish mountains rounding;
 Till all the banded west at once 'gain rise,
 A wide wild storm ev'n Nature's self confounding,
 Withering her giant sons with strange uncouth
 surprise.
 This pillar'd earth so firm and wide,
 By winds and inward labours torn,
 In thunders dread was push'd aside,
 And down the shouldering billows borne.
 And see, like gems, her laughing train,
 The little isles on every side,
 Mona†, once hid from those who search the main,
 Where thousand elfin shapes abide,
 And Wight who checks the westering tide,
 For thee consenting heav'n has each bestow'd,
 A fair attendant on her sovereign pride:
 To thee this blest divorce she ow'd,
 For thou hast made her vales thy lov'd, thy last abode!

SECOND EPODE.

Then too, 'tis said, an hoary pile,
 'Midst the green naval of our isle,
 Thy shrine in some religious wood,
 O soul enforcing Goddess, stood!
 There oft the painted native's feet
 Were wont thy form celestial meet:
 Though now with hopeless toil we trace
 Time's backward rolls, to find its place;
 Whether the fiery-tressed Dane,
 Or Roman's self o'erturn'd the fane,
 Or in what heav'n left age it fell,
 'Twere hard for modern song to tell.
 Yet still, if truth those beams infuse,
 Which guide at once, and charm the muse,
 Beyond yon braided clouds that lie,
 Paving the light embroider'd sky:
 Amidst the bright pavilion'd plains,
 The beauteous model still remains.

* This tradition is mentioned by several of our old historians. Some naturalists too have endeavoured to support the probability of the fact, by arguments drawn from the correspondent disposition of the two opposite coasts. I do not remember that any poetical use has been hitherto made of it.

† There is a tradition in the Isle of Man, that a mermaid becoming enamoured of a young man of extraordinary beauty, took an opportunity of meeting him one day as he walked on the shore, and opened her passion to him, but was received with a coldness, occasioned by his horror and surprise at her appearance. This, however, was so misconstrued by the sea-lady, that, in revenge for his treatment to her, she punished the whole island, by covering it with a mist, so that all who attempted to carry on any commerce with it, either never arrived at it, but wandered up and down the sea, or were on a sudden wrecked upon its cliffs.

There happier than in islands blest,
 Or bowers by spring or Hebe drest,
 The chiefs who fill our Albion's story,
 In warlike weeds, retir'd in glory,
 Hear their consoled Druids sing
 Their triumphs to th' immortal string.
 How may the poet now unfold,
 What never tongue or numbers told?
 How learn delighted, and amaz'd,
 What hands unknown that fabric rais'd?
 Ev'n now, before his favour'd eyes,
 In Gothic pride it seems to rise!
 Yet Grecia's graceful orders join,
 Majestic, through the mix'd design;
 The secret builder knew to choose,
 Each sphere found gem of richest hues:
 Whate'er heaven's purer mold contains,
 When nearer suns emblaze its veins;
 There on the walls the patriots fight
 May ever hang with fresh delight,
 And, grav'd with some prophetic rage,
 Read Albion's fame through every age.

Ye forms divine, ye laureate band,
 That near her inmost altar stand!
 Now soothe her, to her blissful train
 Blithe Concord's social form to gain:
 Concord, whose myrtle wand can steep
 Ev'n Anger's blood-shot eyes in sleep:
 Before whose breathing bosom's balm,
 Rage drops his steel, and storms grow calm;
 Her let our fires and matrons hoar
 Welcome to Britain's ravag'd shore,
 Our youths, enamour'd of the fair,
 Play with the tangles of her hair,
 Till, in one loud applauding sound,
 The nations shout to her around,
 O, how supremely art thou blest,
 Thou, lady, thou shalt rule the west!

ODE TO A LADY,

ON THE DEATH OF COLONEL CHARLES ROSS IN THE ACTION AT FONTENOY.

Written May 1745.

WHILE, lost to all his former mirth,
 Britannia's genius bends to earth,
 And mourns the fatal day:
 While stain'd with blood he strives to tear
 Unseemly from his sea-green hair
 The wreaths of cheerful May:

The thoughts which musing Pity pays,
 And fond Remembrance loves to raise,
 Your faithful hours attend:
 Still Fancy, to herself unkind,
 Awakes to grief the soften'd mind,
 And points the bleeding friend.

By rapid Scheld's descending wave
 His country's vows shall bless the grave,
 Where'er the youth is laid:
 That sacred spot the village hind
 With every sweetest turf shall bind,
 And peace protect the shade.

O'er him, whose doom thy virtues grieve,
 Aërial forms shall sit at eve,

And bend the pensive head;
And, fall'n to save his injur'd land,
Imperial Honour's awful hand
Shall point his lonely bed!

The warlike dead of every age,
Who fill the fair recording page,
Shall leave their faintest rest:
And, half-reclining on his spear,
Each wondering chief by turns appear,
To hail the blooming guest.

Old Edward's sons, unknown to yield,
Shall crowd from Cressy's laurel'd field,
And gaze with fix'd delight:
Again for Britain's wrongs they feel,
Again they snatch the gleamy steel,
And wish th' avenging fight.

But, lo! where, sunk in deep despair,
Her garments torn, her bosom bare,
Impatient Freedom lies!
Her matted tresses madly spread,
To every sod which wraps the dead,
She turns her joyless eyes.

Ne'er shall we leave that lowly ground,
Till notes of triumph bursting round
Proclaim her reign restor'd:
Till William seek the sad retreat,
And, bleeding at her sacred feet,
Present the fated sword.

If, weak to soothe so soft an heart,
These pictur'd glories nought impart,
To dry thy constant tear:
If yet, in Sorrow's distant eye,
Expos'd and pale thou see'st him lie,
Wild war insulting near:

Where'er from time thou court'st relief,
The muse shall still with social grief,
Her gentlest promise keep:
Ev'n humble Harting's cottag'd vale
Shall learn the sad repeated tale,
And bid her shepherds weep.

ODE TO EVENING.

If aught of oaten stop, or pastoral song,
May hope, chaste Eve, to soothe thy modest ear,
Like thy own solemn springs,
Thy springs, and dying gales;

O nymph reserv'd, while now the bright-hair'd
Sits in yon western tent, whose cloudy skirts, [Sun
With brede ethereal wove,
O'erhang his wavy bed:

Now air is hush'd, save where the weak-ey'd bat,
With short shrill shriek flits by on leathern wing,
Or where the beetle winds
His small but fullen horn,

As oft he rises 'midst the twilight path,
Against the pilgrim borne in heedless hum:
Now teach me, maid compos'd,
To breathe some soften'd strain,

Whose numbers stealing through thy darkening
May not unseemly with its stillness suit, [vale,
As, musing slow, I hail
Thy genial lov'd return!

For when thy folding-star arising shows
His paly circlet, at his warning lamp
The fragrant hours, and elves
Who slept in buds the day,

And many a nymph who wreathes her brows with
sedge,
And sheds the freshening dew, and lovelier still,
The pensive pleasures sweet
Prepare thy shadowy car.

Then let me rove some wild and heathy scene,
Or find some ruin 'midst its dreary dells,
Whose walls more awful nod
By thy religious gleams.

Or if chill blustering winds, or driving rain,
Prevent my willing feet, be mine the hut,
That from the mountain's side,
Views wilds, and swelling floods,

And hamlets brown, and dim-discover'd spires,
And hears their simple bell, and marks o'er all
Thy dewy fingers draw
The gradual dusky veil.

While Spring shall pour his showers, as oft he wont,
And bathe thy breathing tresses, meekest Eve!
While Summer loves to sport
Beneath thy lingering light:

While fallow Autumn fills thy lap with leaves,
Or Winter yelling through the troublous air,
Affrights thy shrinking train,
And rudely rends thy robes:

So long, regardless of thy quiet rule,
Shall Fancy, Friendship, Science, smiling Peace,
Thy gentlest influence own,
And love thy favourite name!

ODE TO PEACE.

O THOU, who bad'st thy turtles bear
Swift from his grasp thy golden hair,
And fought'st thy native skies:
When war, by vultures drawn from far,
To Britain bent his iron car,
And bade his storms arise!

Tir'd of his rude tyrannic sway,
Our youth shall fix some festive day,
His fullen shrines to burn:
But thou, who hear'st the turning spheres,
What sounds may charm thy partial ears,
And gain thy blest return!

O Peace thy injur'd robes up-bind!
O rise, and leave not one behind
Of all thy beamy train:
The British lion, goddess sweet,
Lies stretch'd on earth to kiss thy feet,
And own thy holier reign.

Let others court thy transient smile,
But come to grace thy western isle,
By warlike honour led!
And, while around her ports rejoice,
While all her sons adore thy choice,
With him for ever wed!

THE MANNERS. AN ODE.

FAREWELL, for clearer ken design'd;
The dim-discover'd tracts of mind:

Truths which, from action's paths retir'd,
My silent search in vain requir'd !
No more my sail that deep explores,
No more I search those magic shores,
What regions part the world of soul,
Or whence thy streams, opinion, roll :
If e'er I round such fairy field,
Some power impart the spear and shield,
At which the wizard passions fly,
By which the giant follies die !

Farewell the porch, whose roof is seen,
Arch'd with th' enlivening olive's green :
Where science, prank'd in tissued vest,
By reason, pride, and fancy drest,
Comes like a bride, so trim array'd,
'To wed with doubt in Plato's shade !

Youth of the quick uncheated sight,
Thy walks, observance, more invite !
O thou, who lov'st that ampler range,
Where life's wide prospects round thee change,
And, with her mingled sons ally'd,
Throw'st the prattling page aside :
To me in converse sweet impart,
To read in man the native heart,
To learn, where science sure is found,
From nature as she lives around :
And gazing oft her mirror true,
By turns each shifting image view !
Till meddling art's officious lore
Reverse the lessons taught before,
Alluring from a safer rule,
To dream in her enchanted school ;
Thou, Heaven, whate'er of great we boast,
Hast blest this social science most.

Retiring hence to thoughtful cell,
As Fancy breathes her potent spell,
Not vain she finds the charming task,
In pageant quaint, in motley mask,
Behold, before her musing eyes,
The countless manners round her rise ;
While, ever varying as they pass,
To some Contempt applies her glass :
With these the white-rob'd maid combine,
And those the laughing satyrs join !
But who is he whom now she views,
In robe of wild contending hues ?
Thou by the passions nurs'd ; I greet
The comic sock that binds thy feet !
O humour, thou whose name is known
To Britain's favour'd isle alone :
Me too amidst thy band admit,
There where the young-ey'd healthful wit,
(Whose jewels in his crisped hair
Are plac'd each other's beams to share,
Whom no delights from thee divide)
In laughter loos'd attends thy side !

By old Miletus * who so long
Has ceas'd his love-inwoven song :
By all you taught the Tuscan maids,
In chang'd Italia's modern shades :
By him †, whose knight's distinguish'd name
Refin'd a nation's lust of fame ;
Whose tales ev'n now, with echoes sweet,
Castilia's Moorish hills repeat :

* Alluding to the Milesian tales, some of the earliest romances.

† Crevantes.

Or him †, whom Seine's blue nymphs deplore,
In watchet weeds on Gallia's shore,
Who drew the sad Sicilian maid,
By virtues in her fire betray'd :

O Nature boon, from whom proceed
Each forceful thought, each prompted deed ;
If but from thee I hope to feel,
On all my heart imprint thy seal !
Let some retreating Cynic find
Those oft-turn'd scrolls I leave behind,
The sports and I this hour agree
You rove thy scene-full world with thee !

THE PASSIONS.

AN ODE FOR MUSIC.

WHEN Music, heavenly maid, was young,
While yet in early Greece she sung,
The Passions oft, to hear her shell,
Throng'd around her magic cell,
Exulting, trembling, raging, fainting,
Possess'd beyond the muse's painting ;
By turns they felt the glowing mind
Disturb'd, delighted, rais'd, refin'd.
Till once, 'tis said, when all were fir'd,
Fill'd with fury, rapt, inspir'd,
From the supporting myrtles round
They snatch'd her instruments of sound,
And as they oft had heard apart
Sweet lessons of her forceful art,
Each, for madness rul'd the hour,
Would prove his own expressive power.

First Fear his hand, its skill to try,
Amid the chords bewilder'd laid,
And back recoil'd, he knew not why,
Ev'n at the sound himself had made.

Next Anger rush'd, his eyes on fire,
In lightnings own'd his secret stings,
In one rude clash he struck the lyre,
And swept with hurried hand the strings.

With woeful measures wan Despair—
Low sullen sounds his grief beguil'd,
A solemn, strange, and mingled air,
'Twas sad by fits, by starts 'twas wild.

But thou, O Hope, with eyes so fair,
What was thy delighted measure ?
Still it whisper'd promis'd Pleasure,
And bade the lovely scenes at distance hail !
Still would her touch the strain prolong,
And from the rocks, the woods, the vale,
She call'd on Echo still through all the song ;
And where her sweetest theme she chose,
A soft responsive voice was heard at every close,
And Hope enchanted smil'd, and wav'd her golden hair.

And longer had she sung—but, with a frown,
Revenge impatient rose,
He threw his blood-stain'd sword in thunder down,
And, with a withering look,
The war-denouncing trumpet took,
And blew a blast so loud and dread,
Were ne'er prophetic sounds so full of woe.

† Monsieur Le Sage, author of the incomparable adventures of Gil Bias de Santillane, who died in Paris in the year 1745.

And ever and anon he beat
The doubling drum with furious heat;
And though sometimes, each dreary pause be-
Dejected Pity at his side [tween,
Her soul-subduing voice applied,
Yet still he kept his wild unalter'd mien,
While each strain'd ball of sight seem'd bursting from his head.

Thy numbers, jealousy, to nought were fix'd
Sad proof of thy distressful state,
Of differing themes the veering song was mix'd,
And now it courted Love, now raving call'd on
With eyes up-rais'd, as one inspir'd, [Hate.
Pale Melancholy sat retir'd,
And from her wild sequester'd seat,
In notes by distance made more sweet,
Pour'd through the mellow horn her pensive soul:
And dashing soft from rocks around,
Bubbling runnels join'd the sound; [stole,
Through glades and glooms the mingled measure
Or o'er some haunted streams with fond delay,
Round an holy calm diffusing,
Love of peace and lonely musing,
In hollow murmurs died away.

But, O, how alter'd was its sprightlier tone!
When Cheerfulness, a nymph of healthiest hue!
Her bow across her shoulder slung,
Her buskins gemm'd with morning dew,
Blew an inspiring air, that dale and thicket rung,
The hunter's call to Faun and Dryad known;
The oak-crown'd sisters, and their chaste-ey'd
Satyrs and sylvan boys were seen, [queen,
Peeping from forth their alleys green;
Brown Exercise rejoic'd to hear,
And Sport leapt up, and seiz'd his beechen spear.
Last came Joy's ecstatic trial,
He, with viney crown advancing,
First to the lively pipe his hand address'd,
But soon he saw the brisk-awakening viol,
Whose sweet entrancing voice he lov'd the best.
They would have thought, who heard the strain,

They saw in Tempe's vale her native maids,
Amidst the festal sounding shades,
To some unwearied minstrel dancing,
While, as his flying fingers kiss'd the strings,
Love fram'd with Mirth a gay fantastic round,
Loose were her tresses seen, her zone unbound,
And he, amidst his frolic play,

As if he would the charming air repay,
Shook thousand odours from his dewy wings.

O Music, sphere-descended maid,
Friend of pleasure, wisdom's aid,
Why, goddess, why to us denied?
Lay'st thou thy ancient lyre aside?
As in that lov'd Athenian bower,
You learn'd in all-commanding power,
Thy mimic soul, O nymph endear'd,
Can well recal what then it heard.
Where is thy native simple heart,
Devote to Virtue, Fancy, Art?
Arise, as in that elder time,
Warm, energetic, chaste, sublime!
Thy wonders, in that godlike age,
Fill thy recording sister's page—
I said, and I believe the tale,
The feeblest reed could more prevail,

Had more of strength, diviner rage,
Than all which charms this laggard age,
Ev'n all at once together found
Cecilia's mingled world of sound---
O, bid our vain endeavours cease,
Revive the just designs of Greece,
Return in all thy simple state!
Confirm the tales her sons relate!

AN EPISTLE

ADDRESSED TO SIR THOMAS HANMER, ON HIS EDITION OF SHAKSPEARE'S WORKS.

WHILE, born to bring the muse's happier days,
A patriot's hand protects a poet's lays;
While, nurs'd by you, she sees her myrtles bloom,
Green and unwither'd o'er his honour'd tomb:
Excuse her doubts, if yet she fears to tell
What secret transports in her bosom swell:
With conscious awe she hears the critic's fame,
And blushing hides her wreath at Shakspeare's
name.

Hard was the lot those injur'd strains endur'd,
Unknown by science, and by years obscur'd:
Fair Fancy wept; and echoing sighs confess'd
A fixt despair in every tuneful breast.
Not, with more grief th' afflicted swains appear,
When wintry winds deform the plenteous year;
When lingering frosts the ruin'd seats invade
Where Peace resorted, and the Graces play'd.

Each rising art by just gradation moves,
Toil builds on toil, and age on age improves:
The muse alone unequal dealt her rage,
And grac'd with noblest pomp her earliest stage.
Preserv'd through time, the speaking scenes impart
Each changeful wish of Phædra's tortur'd heart:
Or paint the curse that mark'd the * Theban's
A bed incestuous, and a father slain. [reign,
With kind concern our pitying eyes o'erflow,
Trace the sad tale, and own another's woe.

To Rome remov'd, with wit secure to please,
The comic sisters keep their native ease.
With jealous fear declining Greece beheld
Her own Menander's art almost excell'd!
But every muse essay'd to raise in vain
Some labour'd rival of her tragic strain;
Ilyssus' laurels, though transfer'd with toil, [soil.
Droop'd their fair leaves, nor knew th' unfriendly
As arts expir'd, resistless dulness rose; [toes.
Goths, priests, or Vandals,---all were learning's
Till † Julius first recall'd each exil'd maid,
And Cosmo own'd them in th' Etrurian shade:
Then, deeply skill'd in love's engaging theme,
The soft Provençal pass'd to Arno's stream:
With graceful ease the wanton lyre he strung.
Sweet flow'd the lays---but love was all he sung.
The gay description could not fail to move;
For, led by nature, all are friends to love.

But heaven, still various in its works, decreed
The perfect boast of time should last succeed.
The beauteous union must appear at length,
Of Tuscan fancy, and Athenian strength:
One greater muse Eliza's reign adorn,
And ev'n a Shakspeare to her fame be born!

* The Oedipus of Sophocles.

† Julius II. the immediate predecessor of Leo. X

Yet, ah ! so bright her morning's opening ray,
In vain our Britain hop'd an equal day !
No second growth the western isle could bear,
At once exhausted with too rich a year.
Too nicely Jonson knew the critic's part ;
Nature in him was almost lost in art.
Of softer mold the gentle Fletcher came,
The next in order, as the next in name.
With pleas'd attention 'midst his scenes we find
Each glowing thought, that warms the female

mind,
Each melting sigh, and every tender tear,
The lover's wishes, and the virgin's fear.
His * every strain the smiles and graces own ;
But stronger Shakspeare felt for man alone :
Drawn by his pen, our ruder passions stand
Th' unrival'd picture of his early hand.

† With gradual steps, and slow, exacter France
Saw art's fair empire o'er her shores advance :
By length of toil a bright perfection knew,
Correctly bold, and just in all she drew.
Till late Corneille, with ‡ Lucan's spirit fir'd,
Breath'd the free strain, as Rome, and he inspir'd :
And classic judgment gain'd to sweet Racine
The temperate strength of Maro's chaster line.

But wilder far the British laurel spread,
And wreaths less artful crown our poet's head.
Yet he alone to every scene could give
Th' historian's truth, and bid the manners live.
Wak'd at his call I view, with glad surprise,
Majestic forms of mighty monarchs rise.
There Henry's trumpets spread their loud alarms,
And laurel'd conquest waits her hero's arms.
Here gentler Edward claims a pitying sigh,
Scarce born to honours, and so soon to die !
Yet shall thy throne, unhappy infant, bring
No beam of comfort to the guilty king :
The time shall come when Glo'ster's heart shall
In life's last hours, with horror of the deed : [bleed
When dreary visions shall at last present
Thy vengeful image in the midnight tent :
Thy hand unseen the secret death shall bear,
Blunt the weak sword, and break th' oppressive spear.

Where'er we turn, by fancy charm'd, we find
Some sweet illusion of the cheated mind.
Oft, wild of wing, she calls the soul to rove
With humbler nature, in the rural grove ;
Where swains contented own the quiet scene,
And twilight fairies tread the circled green :
Dress'd by her hand, the woods and vallies smile,
And spring diffusive decks th' enchanted isle.

O, more than all in powerful genius blest,
Come, take thine empire o'er the willing breast !
Whate'er the wounds this youthful heart shall feel,
Thy songs support me, and thy morals heal !

* Their characters are thus distinguished by Mr. Dryden.

† About the time of Shakspeare, the poet Hardy was in great repute in France. He wrote, according to Fontenelle, six hundred plays. The French poets after him applied themselves in general to the correct improvement of the stage, which was almost totally disregarded by those of our own country, Jonson excepted.

‡ The favourite author of the elder Corneille.
VOL. IX.

There every thought the poets warmth may raise,
Their native music dwells in all the lays.
O, might some verse with happiest skill persuade
Expressive picture to adopt thine aid !

What wondrous draughts might rise from every
What other Raphaels charm a distant age ! [page !

Methinks ev'n now I view some free design,
Where breathing nature lives in every line :
Chaste and subdued the modest lights decay
Steal into shades, and mildly melt away.

---And see, where * Anthony, in tears approv'd,
Guards the pale relics of the chief he lov'd :
O'er the cold corse the warrior seems to bend,
Deep sunk in grief, and mourns his murder'd
Still as they press, he calls on all around, [friend !
Lifts the torn robe, and points the bleeding wound.

But † who is he, whose brows exalted bear
A wrath impatient, and a fiercer air ?
Awake to all that injur'd worth can feel,
On his own Rome he turns th' avenging steel.
Yet shall not war's insatiate fury fall,
(So heaven ordains it) on the destin'd wall.
See the fond mother, 'midst the plaintive train,
Hung on his knees, and prostrate on the plain :
Touch'd to the soul, in vain he strives to hide
The son's affection, in the Roman's pride :
O'er all the man conflicting passions rise,
Rage grasps the sword, while pity melts the eyes

Thus, generous critic, as thy hard inspires,
The sister arts shall nurse their drooping fires :
Each from his scenes her stores alternate bring,
Blend the fair tints, or wake the vocal string :
Those Sibyl-leaves, the sport of every wind,
(For poets ever were a careless kind)
By thee dispos'd, no farther toil demand,
But, just to nature, own thy forming hand.

So spread o'er Greece, th' harmonious whole unknown,

Ev'n Homer's numbers charm'd by parts alone.
Their own Ulysses scarce had wander'd more,
By winds and waters cast on every shore :
When rais'd by fate, some former Hammer join'd
Each beauteous image of the boundless mind ;
And bade, like thee, his Athens ever claim
A fond alliance with the poet's name.

DIRGE IN CYMBELINE.

Sung by Guiderus and Arviragus over Fidele, supposed to be dead.

To fair Fidele's grassy tomb
Soft maids and village hinds shall bring
Each opening sweet, of earliest bloom,
And rifle all the breathing spring.

No wailing ghost shall dare appear
To vex with shrieks this quiet grove,
But shepherd lads assemble here,
And melting virgins own their love.

No wither'd witch shall here be seen,
No goblins lead their nightly crew ;
The female fays shall haunt the green,
And dress thy grave with pearly dew ;

* See the tragedy of Julius Cæsar.

† Coriolanus. See Mr. Spence's dialogue on the Odyssey.

The red-breast oft at evening hours
Shall kindly lend his little aid,
With hoary moss, and gather'd flowers,
To deck the ground where thou art laid.

When howling winds, and beating rain,
In tempests shake thy sylvan cell;
Or 'midst the chase on every plain,
The tender thought on thee shall dwell.

Each lonely scene shall thee restore,
For thee the tear be duly shed;
Belov'd, till life can charm no more;
And mourn'd, till pity's self be dead.

O D E

ON THE DEATH OF MR. THOMSON.

The Scene of the following Stanzas is supposed to lie on the Thames, near Richmond.

In yonder grave a Druid lies
Where slowly winds the stealing wave!
The year's best sweets shall duteous rise,
To deck its poet's sylvan grave!

In yon deep bed of whispering reeds
His airy harp * shall now be laid,
That he, whose heart in sorrow bleeds,
May love through life the soothing shade.

Then maids and youths shall linger here,
And, while its sounds at distance swell,
Shall sadly seem in pity's ear
To hear the woodland pilgrim's knell.

Remembrance oft shall haunt the shore
When Thames in summer wreaths is drest,
And oft suspend the dashing oar
To bid his gentle spirit rest!

And oft as ease and health retire
To breezy lawn, or forest deep,
The friend shall view yon whitening † spire,
And 'mid the varied landscape weep.

But thou, who own'st that earthly bed,
Ah! what will every dirge avail?
Or tears, which love and pity shed,
That mourn beneath the gliding sail!

Yet lives there one, whose heedless eye
Shall scorn thy pale shrine glimmering near?
With him, sweet bard, may fancy die,
And joy desert the blooming year.

But thou, lorn stream, whose fullen tide
No sedge-crown'd sisters now attend,
Now waft me from the green hill's side
Whose cold turf hides the buried friend!

And see, the fairy vallies fade,
Dun night has veil'd the solemn view!
Yet once again, dear parted shade,
Meek nature's child, again adieu!

The genial meads ‡ assign'd to blest
Thy life, shall mourn thy early doom!

* The harp of Æolus, of which see a description
in the Castle of Indolence.

† Mr. Thomson was buried in Richmond church.

‡ Mr. Thomson resided in the neighbourhood of Richmond some time before his death.

Their hinds and shepherd girls shall dress
With simple hands thy rural tomb.

Long, long, thy stone, and pointed clay
Shall melt the musing Briton's eyes,
O! vales, and wild woods, shall he say,
In yonder grave your Druid lies!

VERSES WRITTEN ON A PAPER,

WHICH CONTAINED A PIECE OF BRIDE-CAKE.

YE curious hands, that hid from vulgar eyes,
By search profane shall find this hollow'd cake,
With virtue's awe forbear the sacred prize,
Nor dare a theft, for love and pity's sake!

This precious relic, form'd by magic power,
Beneath the shepherd's haunted pillow laid,
Was meant by love to charm the silent hour,
The secret present of a matchless maid.

The Cyprian queen, at Hymen's fond request,
Each nice ingredient chose with happiest art;
Fears, sighs, and wishes of th' enamour'd breast,
And pains that please, are mixt in every part.

With rosy hand the spicy fruit she brought,
From Paphian hills, and fair Cytherea's isle;
And temper'd sweet with these the melting
thought,
The kiss ambrosial, and the yielding smile.

Ambiguous looks, that scorn and yet relent,
Denials mild, and firm unalter'd truth,
Reluctant pride, and amorous faint consent,
And meeting ardours, and exulting youth.

Sleep, wayward God! hath sworn, while these remain,

With flattering dreams to dry his nightly tear,
And cheerful hope, so oft invoc'd in vain,
With fairy songs shall sooth his pensive ear.

If, bound by vows to friendship's gentle side,
And fond of soul, thou hop'st an equal grace,
If youth or maid thy joys and griefs divide,
O, much entreated leave this fatal place.

Sweet peace, who long hath shunn'd my plaintive
day,

Consents at length to bring me short delight,
Thy careless steps may scare her doves away,
And grief with raven note usurp the night.

O D E.

ON THE POPULAR SUPERSTITIONS OF THE HIGH-
LANDS OF SCOTLAND;Considered as the subject of Poetry.Inscribed to Mr. John Home.

HOME, thou return'st from Thames, whose Naiads long

Have seen thee lingering with a fond delay,
Mid those soft friends, whose hearts some future
day,

Shall melt, perhaps, to hear thy tragic song *.

* How truly did Collins predict Home's tragic powers!

Go, not unmindful of that cordial youth *
 Whom, long endear'd, thou leav'st by Lavant's
 Together let us wish him lasting truth, [side;
 And joy untainted with his destin'd bride.
 Go! nor regardless, while these numbers boast
 My short-liv'd bliss, forget my social name;
 But think, far off, how, on the southern coast,
 I met thy friendship with an equal flame!
 Fresh to that soil thou turn'st, where every vale
 Shall prompt the poet, and his song demand:
 To thee thy copious subjects ne'er shall fail;
 Thou need'st but take thy pencil to thy hand,
 And paint what all believe, who own thy genial land.

There, must thou wake perforce thy Doric quill;
 'Tis fancy's land to which thou sett'st thy feet;
 Where still, 'tis said, the fairy people meet,
 Beneath each birken shade, on mead or hill.
 There, each trim lass, that skims the milky store
 To the swart tribes their creamy bowls allots;
 By night they sip it round the cottage door,
 While airy minstrels warble jocund notes.
 There, every herd, by sad experience, knows
 How, wing'd with fate, their elf-shot arrows fly,
 When the sick ewe her summer food foregoes,
 Or, stretch'd on earth, the heart-smit heifers lie,
 Such airy beings awe th' untutor'd swain: [gleet;
 Nor thou, tho' learn'd, his homelier thoughts ne-
 Let thy sweet muse the rural faith sustain;
 These are the themes of simple, sure effect,
 That add new conquests to her boundless reign,
 And fill, with double force, her heart-commanding strain.

Ev'n yet preserv'd, how often may'st thou hear,
 Where to the pole the Boreal mountains run,
 Taught by the father, to his listening son;
 Strange lays, whose power had charm'd a Spenser's ear.

At every pause, before thy mind possest,
 Old Runic bards shall seem to rise around,
 With uncouth lyres, in many-colour'd vest,
 Their matted hair with boughs fantastical crown'd:
 Whether thou bid'st the well-taught hind repeat
 The choral dirge, that mourns some chieftain brave,
 When every shrieking maid her bosom beat,
 And strew'd with choicest herbs his scented grave;
 Or whether, sitting in the shepherd's shield †,
 Thou hear'st some sounding tale of wars alarms;
 When at the bugle's call, with fire and steel,
 The sturdy clans pour'd forth their brawny swarms, [arms.

 " Or, if the drifted snow perplex the way,
 " With treacherous gleam he lures the fated wight,
 " And leads him floundering on and quite astray."

† By young Aurora, Collins undoubtedly meant the first appearance of the northern lights, which happened about the year 1715; at least, it is most highly probable from this peculiar circumstance, that no ancient writer whatever, has taken any notice of them, nor even any one modern, previous to the above period.

These, too, thou'lt sing! for well thy magic muse
Can to the topmost heaven of grandeur soar;
Or stoop to wail the swain that is no more!
Ah, homely swains! your homeward steps ne'er loose;
Let not dank Will ‡ mislead you to the heath:
Dancing in mirky night, o'er fen and lake,
He glows, to draw you downward to your death,
In his bewitch'd, low, marshy, willow brake!
What though far off, from some dark dell espied,
His glimmering mazes cheer th' excursive sight,
Yet turn, ye wanderers, turn your steps aside,
Nor trust the guidance of that faithless light;
For watchful, lurking, 'mid th' unrustling reed,
At those mirk hours the wily monster lies,
And listens oft to hear the passing steed,
And frequent round him rolls his sullen eyes,
If chance his savage wrath may some weak wretch
surprise.

Ah, luckless swain, o'er all unblest, indeed!
Whom late bewilder'd in the dank, dark fen,
Far from his flocks, and smoking hamlet, then!
To that sad spot where hums the sedge weed:
On him, enrag'd, the fiend, in angry mood,
Shall never look with pity's kind concern,
But instant, furious, raise the whelming flood
O'er its drown'd banks, forbidding all return!
Or, if he meditate his wish'd escape,
To some dim hill that seems uprising near,
To his faint eye, the grim and grisly shape,
In all its terrors clad, shall wild appear.
Meantime the watery surge shall round him rise,
Pour'd sudden forth from every swelling source!
What now remains but tears and hopeless sighs?
His fear-shook limbs have lost their youthly force,
And down the waves he floats, a pale and breathless corse!

For him in vain his anxious wife shall wait,
Or wander forth to meet him on his way;
For him in vain at to-fall of the day,
His babes shall linger at th' unclosing gate!
Ah, ne'er shall he return! Alone, if night,
Her travel'd limbs in broken slumbers sleep!
With drooping willows drest, his mournful sprite
Shall visit sad, perchance, her silent sleep:
Then he, perhaps, with moist and watery hand,
Shall fondly seem to press her shuddering cheek,
And with his blue-swoln face before her stand,
And, shivering cold, these piteous accents speak:

And forth the monarchs stalk with sovereign power,
In pageant robes; and, wreath'd with sheeny gold
And on their twilight tombs aerial council hold.

Ye lowland hamlets moan:
A dewy turf lies o'er his head,
And at his feet a stone.
His shroud, which death's cold damps destroy,
Of snow-white threads was made:

In earth forever laid.
Pale pansies o'er his corpse were plac'd,
Which, pluck'd before their time,
Bestrew'd the boy like him to waste,
And wither in their prime.

OBSERVATIONS ON THE ORIENTAL ECLOGUES.

THE genius of the pastoral, as well as of every other respectable species of poetry, had its origin in the East, and from thence was transplanted by the muses of Greece; but whether from the continent of the Lesser Asia, or from Egypt, which, about the era of the Grecian pastoral, was the hospitable nurse of letters, it is not easy to determine. From the subjects, and the manner of Theocritus, one would incline to the latter opinion, while the history of Bion is in favour of the former.

However, though it should still remain a doubt through what channel the pastoral travelled westward, there is not the least shadow of uncertainty concerning its oriental origin.

In those ages, which, guided by sacred chronology, from a comparative view of time, we call the early ages, it appears from the most authentic historians, that the chiefs of the people employed themselves in rural exercises, and that astronomers and legislators were at the same time shepherds. Thus Strabo informs us, that the history of the creation was communicated to the Egyptians by a Chaldean shepherd.

From these circumstances it is evident not only that such shepherds were capable of all the dignity and elegance peculiar to poetry, but that whatever poetry they attempted would be of the pastoral kind; would take its subjects from those scenes of rural simplicity in which they were conversant, and, as it was the offspring of harmony and nature, would employ the powers it derived from the former to celebrate the beauty and benevolence of the latter.

Accordingly we find that the most ancient poems treat of agriculture, astronomy, and other objects within the rural and natural systems.

What constitutes the difference between the Georgic and the Pastoral, is love and the colloquial or dramatic form of composition peculiar to the latter: this form of composition is sometimes dispensed with, and love and rural imagery alone are thought sufficient to distinguish the pastoral. The tender passion, however, seems to be essential to this species of poetry, and is hardly ever excluded from those pieces that were intended to come under this denomination: even in those eclogues of the Amœbean kind, whose only purport is a trial of skill between contending shepherds, love has its usual share, and the praises of their respective mistresses are the general subjects of the competitors.

It is to be lamented that scarce any oriental compositions of this kind have survived the ravages of ignorance, tyranny, and time; we cannot doubt that many such have been extant, possibly as far down as that fatal period, never to be mentioned in the world of letters without horror, when the glorious monuments of human ingenuity perished in the ashes of the Alexandrian library.

Those ingenious Greeks whom we call the parents of pastoral poetry were, probably, no more than imitators, that derived their harmony from higher and remoter sources, and kindled their poetical fires at those then unextinguished lamps which burned within the tombs of oriental genius.

It is evident that Homer has availed himself of those magnificent images and descriptions so frequently to be met with in the books of the Old Testament; and why may not Theocritus, Moschus, and Bion, have found their archetypes in other eastern writers, whose names have perished with their works? yet, though it may not be illiberal to admit such a supposition, it would certainly be invidious to conclude, what the malignity of cavillers alone could suggest with regard to Homer, that they destroyed the sources from which they borrowed, and, as it is fabled of the young of the pelican, drained their supporters to death.

As the Septuagint-translation of the Old Testament was performed at the request, and under the patronage, of Ptolemy Philadelphus, it were not to be wondered if Theocritus, who was entertained at that prince's court, had borrowed some of his pastoral imagery from the poetical passages of those books.—I think it can hardly be doubted that the Sicilian poet had in his eye certain expressions of the prophet Isaiah, when he wrote the following lines:

Νυν ια μὲν φορεῖτε βατοί, φορεῖτε δ' ἀκανθὰν.
Ἄ δε καλὰ νερκισσὸς ἐπ' ἀρεκυθαῖσι κομάσαι.

Πάντα δ' ἐναλλα γένοιτο, καὶ ἅ πῖτος ὄχνησεν ἐνείακαι

καὶ τὰς κυνάς ὠλαφός ἐλκοί.

Let vexing brambles the blue violet bear,
On the rude thorn Narcissus drefs his hair,
All, all revers'd—The pine with pears be crown'd, [hound.
And the bold deer shall drag the trembling

The cause, indeed, of these phænomena is very different in the Greek from what it is in the Hebrew poet; the former employing them on the death, the latter on the birth, of an important person: but the marks of imitation are nevertheless obvious.

It might, however, be expected, that if Theocritus had borrowed at all from the sacred writers, the celebrated epithalamium of Solomon, so much within his own walk of poetry, would not certainly have escaped his notice. His epithalamium on the marriage of Helena, moreover, gave him an open field for imitation; therefore, if he has any obligations to the royal bard, we may expect to find him there. The very opening of the poem is in the spirit of the Hebrew song:

Οὕτω δὲ πρῶϊζα κατιδραθεῖς, ὦ φιλε γαμβροῖ;

The colour of imitation is still stronger in the following passage:

Ἄως αὖν ἐλλοισα καλὸν διεφαίνει πρόσωπον,
Ποτνια νυξ ἄτε, λευκὸν εὖ χειμένος ἀνέντος.
Ὡδὲ καὶ ἡ χρυσεὰ Ἑλένα διεφαίνεται ἐν ἡμῖν,
Πιερε, μεγάλη. αὖτ' ἀνεδράμεν οὔμος ἀρερεῖ,
Ἡ καπὼ κυπαρισσὸς, ἡ ἄρματι Θεσσαλὸς ἵππος

This description of Helen is infinitely above the style and figure of the Sicilian pastoral—"She is like the rising of the golden morning, when the night departeth, and when the winter is over and gone. She resembleth the cypress in the garden, the horse in the chariots of Thessaly." These figures plainly declare their origin; and others, equally imitative, might be pointed out in the same Idyllium.

This beautiful and luxuriant marriage pastoral of Solomon is the only perfect form of the oriental eclogue that has survived the ruins of time; a happiness for which it is, probably, more indebted to its sacred character than to its intrinsic merit. Not that it is by any means destitute of poetical excellence: like all the eastern poetry, it is bold, wild, and unconnected in its figures, allusions, and parts, and has all that graceful and magnificent daring which characterises its metaphorical and comparative imagery.

In consequence of these peculiarities, so ill adapted to the frigid genius of the North, Mr. Collins could make but little use of it as a precedent for his oriental eclogues; and even in his third eclogue, where the subject is of a similar nature, he has chosen rather to follow the mode of the Doric and the Latin pastoral.

The scenery and subjects then of the following eclogues alone are oriental; the style and colouring are purely European; and, for this reason, the author's preface, in which he intimates that he had the original, from a merchant who traded to the East, is omitted, as being now altogether superfluous.

With regard to the merit of these eclogues, it may justly be asserted, that in simplicity of description and expression, in delicacy and softness of numbers, and in natural and unaffected tenderness, they are not to be equalled by any thing of the pastoral kind in the English language.

ECLOGUE I.

THIS eclogue, which is entitled Selim, or the Shepherd's Moral, as there is nothing dramatic in the subject, may be thought the least entertaining of the four: but it is by no means the least valuable. The moral precepts which the intelligent shepherd delivers to his fellow-swains and the virgins, their companions, are such as would infallibly promote the happiness of the pastoral life.

In impersonating the private virtues, the poet has observed great propriety, and has formed their genealogy with the most perfect judgment, when he represents them as the daughters of truth and wisdom.

The characteristics of modesty and chastity are extremely happy and peinturesque:

"Come thou, whose thoughts as limpid springs
are clear,
To lead the train, sweet modesty appear;
With thee be chastity, of all afraid,
Distrusting all, a wife, suspicious maid;
Cold is her breast, like flowers that drink the dew.

A silken veil conceals her from the view."

The two similes borrowed from rural objects are not only much in character, but perfectly natural and expressive. There is, notwithstanding, this defect in the former, that it wants a peculiar propriety; for purity of thought may as well be applied to chastity as to modesty; and from this instance, as well as from a thousand more, we may see the necessity of distinguishing, in characteristic poetry, every object by marks and attributes peculiarly its own.

It cannot be objected to this eclogue, that it wants both those essential criteria of the pastoral, love and the drama; for though it partakes not of the latter, the former still remains an interest in it, and that too very material, as it professedly consults the virtue and happiness of the lover, while it informs what are the qualities —that must lead to love.

ECLOGUE II.

ALL the advantages that any species of poetry can derive from the novelty of the subject and scenery, this eclogue possesses. The rout of a camel-driver is a scene that scarce could exist in the imagination of an European, and of its attendant dis-treasures he could have no idea.—These are very happily and minutely painted by our descriptive poet. What sublime simplicity of expression! what nervous plainness in the opening of the poem!

The driver Hassan with his camels past."

The magic pencil of the poet brings the whole scene before us at once, as it were by enchantment, and in this single couplet we feel all the effect that arises from the terrible wildness of a region unenlivened by the habitations of men. The verses that describe so minutely the camel-driver's little provisions, have a touching influence on the imagination, and prepare the reader to enter more feelingly into his future apprehensions of distress:

"Bethink thee, Hassan, where shall thirst assuage,
When fails this cruise, his unrelenting rage!"

It is difficult to say whether his apostrophe to the "mute companions of his toils," is more to be admired for the elegance and beauty of the poetical imagery, or for the tenderness and humanity of the sentiment. He who can read it without being affected, will do his heart no injustice, if he concludes it to be destitute of sensibility:

"Ye mute companions of my toils, that bear
In all my griefs a more than equal share!
Here, where no springs in murmurs break away,
Or moss-crown'd fountains mitigate the day,
In vain ye hope the green delights to know,
Which plains more blest, or verdant vales bestow:
Here rocks alone, and tasteless sands are found,
And faint and sickly winds for ever howl around."

Yet in these beautiful lines there is a slight error, which writers of the greatest genius very frequently fall into.—It will be needless to observe to the accurate reader, that in the fifth and sixth verses there is a verbal pleonism where the poet speaks of the green delights of verdant vales. There is an oversight of the same kind in the Manners, an Ode; where the poet says

"—Seine's blue nymphs deplore
In watchet weeds—"

This fault is indeed a common one, but to a reader of taste it is nevertheless disgusting; and it is mentioned here as the error of a man of genius and judgment, that men of genius and judgment may guard against it.

Mr. Collins speaks like a true poet, as well in sentiment as expression, when, with regard to the thirst of wealth, he says,

"Why heed we not, while mad we haste along
The gentle voice of peace, or pleasure's song?
Or wherefore think the flowery mountain's side,
The fountain's murmurs, and the valley's pride,
Thy think we these less pleasing to behold,
Than dreary deserts, if they lead to gold?"

But however just these sentiments may appear to those who have not revolted from nature and simplicity, had the author proclaimed them in Lombard-street, or Cheap-side, he would not have been complimented with the understanding of the bellman.—A striking proof, that our own particular ideas of happiness regulate our opinions concerning the sense and wisdom of others!

It is impossible to take leave of this most beautiful eclogue, without paying the tribute of admiration so justly due to the following nervous lines:

“What if the lion in his rage I meet!—
Oft in the dust I view his printed feet:
And, fearful! oft, when day’s declining light
Yields her pale empire to the mourner night,
By hunger rous’d, he scours the groaning plain,
Gaunt wolves and fullen tigers in his train:
Before them death with shrieks directs their way,
Fills the wild yell, and leads them to their prey.”

This, amongst many other passages to be met with in the writings of Collins, shows that his genius was perfectly capable of the grand and magnificent in description, notwithstanding what a learned writer has advanced to the contrary. Nothing, certainly, could be more greatly conceived, or more adequately expressed, than the image in the last couplet.

That deception, sometimes used in rhetoric and poetry, which presents us with an object or sentiment contrary to what we expected, is here introduced to the greatest advantage:

“Farewell the youth, whom sighs could not detain,
Whom Zara’s breaking heart implor’d in vain!
Yet, as thou go’st, may every blast arise—
Weak and unfelt as these rejected sighs!”

But this, perhaps, is rather an artificial prettiness, than a real or natural beauty.

ECLOGUE III.

THAT innocent and native simplicity of manners, which, in the first eclogue, was allowed to constitute the happiness of love, is here beautifully described in its effects. The sultan of Persia marries a Georgian shepherdess, and finds in her embraces that genuine felicity which unperverted nature alone can bestow. The most natural and beautiful parts of this eclogue are those where the fair sultana refers with so much pleasure to her pastoral amusements, and those scenes of happy innocence in which she passed her early years; particularly when, upon her first departure,

“Oft as she went, she backward turn’d her view,
And bade that crook and bleating flock adieu.”

This picture of amiable simplicity reminds one of that passage, where Proserpine, when carried off by Pluto, regrets the loss of the flowers she has been gathering.

“Collecti flores tunicis cecidere remissis;
Tantaque simplicitas puerilibus adfuit annis,
Hæc quoque virginium movit jactura dolorem.”

ECLOGUE IV.

THE beautiful, but unfortunate country, where the scene of this pathetic eclogue is laid, had been recently torn in pieces by the depredations of its savage neighbours, when Mr. Collins so affectedly described its misfortunes. This ingenious man had not only a pencil to pourtray, but a heart to feel for the miseries of mankind; and it is with the utmost tenderness and humanity he enters into the narrative of Circassia’s ruin, while he realizes the scene, and brings the present drama before us. Of every circumstance that could possibly contribute to the tender effect this pastoral was designed to produce, the poet has availed himself with the utmost art and address. Thus he prepares the heart to pity the distresses of Circassia, by representing it as the scene of the happiest love.

“In fair Circassia, where, to love inclin’d,
Each swain was blest, for every maid was kind.”

To give the circumstances of the dialogue a more affecting solemnity, he makes the time midnight, and describes the two shepherds in the very act of flight from the destruction that swept over their country:

“Sad o’er the dews, two brother shepherds fled,
Where wildering fear and desperate sorrow led:”

There is a beauty and propriety in the epithet wildering, which strikes us more forcibly, the more we consider it.

The opening of the dialogue is equally happy, natural, and unaffected; when one of the shepherds, weary and overcome with the fatigue of flight, calls upon his companion to review the length of way they had passed. This is certainly painting from nature, and the thoughts, however obvious, or destitute of refinement, are perfectly in character. But, as the closest pursuit of nature is the surest way to excellence in general, and to sublimity in particular, in poetical description, so we find that this simple suggestion of the shepherd is not unattended with magnificence. There is a grandeur and variety in the landscape he describes:

“And first review that long-extended plain,
And yon wide groves, already past with pain!
Yon ragged cliff, whose dangerous path we
try’d!
And, last, this lofty mountain’s weary side!”

There is, in imitative harmony, an act of expressing a slow and difficult movement by adding to the usual number of pauses in a verse. This is observable in the line that describes the ascent of the mountain:

And last || this lofty mountain’s || weary side ||.

Here we find the number of pauses, or musical bars, which, in an heroic verse, is commonly two, increased to three.

The liquid melody, and the numerous sweetness of expression in the following descriptive lines is almost inimitably beautiful:

"Sweet to the sight is Zabran's flowery plain,
And once by nymphs and shepherds lov'd in vain!

No more the virgins shall delight to rove
By Sargis' banks, or Irwan's shady grove;
On Tarkie's mountain catch the cooling gale,
Or breathe the sweets of Aly's flowery vale."

Nevertheless in this delightful landscape there is an obvious fault: there is no distinction between the plain of Zabran, and the vale of Aly: they are both flowery, and consequently undiversified. This could not proceed from the poet's want of judgment, but from inattention: it had not occurred to him that he had employed the epithet flowery twice within so short a compass; an oversight which those who are accustomed to poetical, or, indeed, to any other species of composition, know to be very possible.

Nothing can be more beautifully conceived, or more pathetically expressed, than the shepherd's apprehensions for his fair country-women, exposed to the ravages of the invaders.

"In vain Circassia boasts her spicy groves,
For ever fam'd for pure and happy loves:
In vain she boasts her fairest of the fair,
Their eyes' blue languish, and their golden hair!
Those eyes in tears their fruitless grief shall send;
Those hairs the Tartar's cruel hand shall rend."

There is certainly some very powerful charm in the liquid melody of sounds. The editor of these poems could never read or hear the following verse repeated, without a degree of pleasure otherwise entirely unaccountable:

"Their eyes' blue languish, and their golden hair."

Such are the Oriental Eclogues, which we leave with the same kind of anxious pleasure, we feel upon a temporary parting with a beloved friend.

OBSERVATIONS ON THE ODES, DESCRIPTIVE AND ALLEGORICAL.

THE genius of Collins was capable of every degree of excellence in lyric poetry, and perfectly qualified for that high province of the muse. Possessed of a native ear for all the varieties of harmony and modulation, susceptible of the finest feelings of tenderness and humanity, but, above all, carried away by that high enthusiasm, which gives to imagination its strongest colouring, he was, at once, capable of soothing the ear with the melody of his numbers, of influencing the passions by the force of his pathos, and of gratifying the fancy by the luxuriancy of his description.

In consequence of these powers, but, more particularly, in consideration of the last, he chose such subjects for his lyric essays as were most favourable for the indulgence of description and allegory; where he could exercise his powers in moral and personal painting; where he could exert his invention in conferring attributes on images or objects already new known, and described by a determinate number of characteristics; where he might give an uncommon eclat to his figures, by placing them in happier attitudes, or in more advantageous lights, and introduce new forms from the moral and intellectual world into the society of impersonated beings.

Such, no doubt, were the privileges which the poet expected, and such were the advantages he derived from the descriptive and allegorical nature of his themes.

It seems to have been the whole industry of our author (and it is, at the same time, almost all the claim to moral excellence his writings can boast) to promote the influence of the social virtues, by painting them in the fairest and happiest lights, would be no improper motto to his poems in general, but of his lyric poems it seems to be the whole moral tendency and effect. If, therefore, it should appear to some readers that he has been more industrious to cultivate description than sentiment; it may be observed, that his descriptions themselves are sentimental, and answer the whole end of that species of writing, by embellishing every feature of virtue, and by conveying, through the effects of the pencil, the finest moral lessons to the mind.

"Melior fieri tuendo,"

Horace speaks of the fidelity of the ear in preference to the uncertainty of the eye; but if the mind receives conviction, it is certainly of very little importance through what medium, or by which of the senses, it is conveyed. The impressions left on the imagination may possibly be thought less durable than the deposits of memory, but it may very well admit of a question, whether a conclusion of reason, or an impression of imagination, will soonest make its way to the heart. A moral precept, conveyed in words, is only an account of truth in its effects; a moral picture is truth exemplified; and which is most likely to gain upon the affections, it may not be difficult to determine.

This, however, must be allowed, that those works approach the nearest to perfection which unite these powers and advantages; which at once influence the imagination, and engage the memory; the former by the force of animated and striking description, the latter by a brief, but harmonious conveyance of precept: thus, while the heart is influenced through the operation of the passions, or the fancy, the effect, which might otherwise have been transient, is secured by the co-operating power of the memory, which treasures up in a short aphorism the moral scene.

This is a good reason, and this, perhaps, is the only reason that can be given, why our dramatic performances should generally end with a chain of couplets. In these the moral of the whole piece is usually conveyed; and that assistance which the memory borrows from rhyme, as it was probably the original cause of it, gives it usefulness and propriety even there.

After these apologies for the descriptive turn of the following odes, something remains to be said on the origin and use of allegory in poetical composition.

By this we are not to understand the trope in the schools, which is defined "aliud verbis, aliud sensu ostendere," and of which Quintilian says, "usus est, ut tristitia dicamus melioribus verbis, aut bonæ rei quædam contrariis significemus, &c." It is not the verbal, but the sentimental allegory, not allegorical expression (which, indeed, might come under the term of metaphor) but allegorical imagery, that is here in question.

When we endeavour to trace this species of figurative sentiment to its origin, we find it coeval with literature itself. It is generally agreed that the most ancient productions are poetical, and it is certain that the most ancient poems abound with allegorical imagery.

If, then, it be allowed that the first literary productions were poetical, we shall have little or no difficulty in discovering the origin of allegory.

At the birth of letters, in the transition from hieroglyphical to literal expression, it is not to be wondered if the custom of expressing ideas by personal images, which had so long prevailed, should still retain its influence on the mind, though the use of letters had rendered the practical application of it superfluous. Those who had been accustomed to express strength by the image of an elephant, swiftness by that of a panther, and courage by that of a lion, would make no scruple of substituting, in letters, the symbols for the ideas they had been used to represent.

Here we plainly see the origin of allegorical expression, that it arose from the ashes of hieroglyphics; and if to the same cause we should refer that figurative boldness of style and imagery which distinguish the oriental writings, we shall, perhaps, conclude more justly than if we should impute it to the superior grandeur of eastern genius.

From the same source with the verbal, we are to derive the sentimental allegory, which is nothing more than a continuation of the metaphorical or symbolical expression of the several agents in an action, or the different objects in a scene.

The latter most peculiarly comes under the denomination of allegorical imagery; and in this species of allegory we include the imperfection of passions, affections, virtues and vices, &c. on account of which, principally, the following odes were properly termed by their author, allegorical.

With respect to the utility of this figurative writing, the same arguments that have been advanced in favour of descriptive poetry, will be of weight likewise here. It is, indeed, from imperfection, or, as it is commonly termed, personification, that poetical description borrows its chief powers and graces. Without the aid of this, moral and intellectual painting would be flat and unanimated, and even the scenery of material objects would be dull, without the introduction of fictitious life.

These observations will be most effectually illustrated by the sublime and beautiful odes that occasioned them; in those it will appear how happily this allegorical painting may be executed by the genuine powers of poetical genius, and they will not fail to prove its force and utility by passing through the imagination to the heart.

ODE TO PITY.

"By Pella's bard, a magic name,
By all the griefs his thought could frame,
Receive my humble rite:
Long, pity, let the nations view
Thy sky-worn robes of tenderest blue,
And eyes of dewy light!"

The propriety of invoking pity through the mediation of Euripides is obvious.—That admirable poet had the keys of all the tender passions, and, therefore, could not but stand in the highest esteem with a writer of Mr. Collins's sensibility.—He did, indeed, admire him as much as Milton professedly did, and probably for the same reason; but we do not find that he has copied him so closely as the last mentioned poet has sometimes done, and particularly in the opening of Samson-Agonistes, which is an evident imitation of the following passage in the Phœnissæ.

Ἡς προπαροιθε, θυγατερ, ὡς τυφλῶ ποδὶ
Ὀφθαλμὸς ἐσσι, γαυδοταῖσιν ἀστρὸν ὡς
Δευρ' εἰς τὸ λευρὸν πῆδιον ἰχθὺς τιθεῖσ' ἐμὸν,
Προδῶναι.— Act III. Sc. I.

The "eyes of dewy light" is one of the happiest strokes of imagination, and may be ranked among those expressions which

"—give us back the image of the mind."
"Wild Arun too has heard thy strains,
And echo, 'midst my native plains,
Been sooth'd with pity's lute."
"There first the wren thy myrtles shed
On gentlest Otway's infant head."

Suffex, in which county the Arun is a small river, had the honour of giving birth to Otway as well as to Collins: both these, unhappily, became the objects of that pity by which their writings are distinguished. There was a similitude in their genius and their sufferings. There was a resemblance in the misfortunes and in the dissipation of their lives; and the circumstances of their death cannot be remembered without pain.

The thought of painting in the temple of pity the history of human misfortunes, and of drawing the scenes from the tragic muse, is very happy, and in every respect worthy the imagination of Collins.

ODE TO FEAR.

MR. COLLINS, who had often determined to apply himself to dramatic poetry, seems here, with the same view, to have addressed one of the principal powers of the drama, and to implore that mighty influence she had given to the genius of Shakespeare :

" Hither again thy fury deal,
Teach me but once like him to feel :
His cypress wreath my meed decree,
And I, O fear, will dwell with thee !"

In the construction of this nervous ode, the author has shown equal power of judgment and imagination. Nothing can be more striking than the violent and abrupt abbreviation of the measure in the fifth and sixth verses, when he feels the strong influence of the power he invokes :

" Ah, fear, ah, frantic fear !
I see, I see thee near."

The editor of these poems has met with nothing in the same species of poetry, either in his own, or in any other language, equal, in all respects, to the following description of danger :

" Danger, whose limbs of giant mold,
What mortal eye can fix'd behold ?
Who stalks his round, an hideous form,
Howling amidst the midnight storm,
Or throws him on the ridgy steep
Of some loose hanging rock to sleep."

It is impossible to contemplate the image conveyed in the two last verses without these emotions of terror it was intended to excite. It has, moreover, the entire advantage of novelty to recommend it ; for there is too much originality in all the circumstances, to suppose that the author had in his eye that description of the penal situation of Catiline in the ninth Æneid :

" — Te, Catilina, minaci Pendentem scopulo"

The archetype of the English poet's idea was in nature, and probably to her alone he was indebted for the thought. From her, likewise, he derived that magnificence of conception, that horrible grandeur of imagery, displayed in the following lines :

" And those, the fiends, who near allied,
O'er nature's wounds and wrecks preside ;
While vengeance in the lurid air,
Lifts her red arm, expos'd and bare :
On whom that ravening brood of fate,
Who lap the blood of sorrow, wait."

That nutritive enthusiasm, which cherishes the seeds of poetry, and which is, indeed, the only soil wherein they will grow to perfection, lays open the mind to all the influences of fiction. A passion for whatever is greatly wild, or magnificent in the works of nature, seduces the imagination to attend to all that is extravagant, however unnatural. Milton was notoriously fond of high romance and Gothic diableries ; and Collins, who in genius and enthusiasm bore no very distant resemblance to Milton, was wholly carried away by the same attachments,

" Be mine, to read the visions old,
Which thy awakening bards have told :
And, lest thou meet my blasted view,
Hold each strange tale devoutly true."
" On that thrice hallow'd eve, &c."

There is an old traditional superstition, that on St. Mark's eve the forms of all such persons as shall die within the ensuing year, make their solemn entry into the churches of their respective parishes, as St. Patrick swam over the channel, without their heads.

ODE TO SIMPLICITY.

THE measure of the ancient ballad seems to have been made choice of for this ode, on account of the subject ; and it has, indeed, an air of simplicity not altogether unaffecting :

" By all the honey'd store
On Hybla's thymy shore,
By all her blooms, and mingled murmurs dear,
By her whose love-lorn woe,
In evening musings flow,
Sooth'd sweetly sad Electra's poet's ear."

This allegorical imagery of the honey'd store, the blooms, and mingled murmurs of Hybla, alluding to the sweetness and beauty of the Attic poetry, has the finest and the happiest effect : yet, possibly, it will bear a question, whether the ancient Greek tragedians had a general claim to simplicity in any thing more than the plans of their drama. Their language, at least, was infinitely metaphorical ; yet it must be owned that they justly copied nature and the passions, and so far, certainly, they were entitled to the palm of true simplicity : the following most beautiful speech of Polyxenes, will be a monument of this so long as poetry shall last.

πολυδακρυς δ' αφικομενη
Χρονιος ιδων μελαθρα, και βαμεις θρων,
Γυμνασια δ' οισιν εντραφην, Διεκνης δ' υδωρ.
Ων ε δικαιως απελαθεις, ξενη πολιν
Ναιω, δι' οστων ομμ' εχων δακρυερρον.
Αλλ' (εκ γαρ αλγος αλγος) αυ σε διεκομα,
Κατα ξυρηκες, και πεπλες μελαγχιμης
Εχυσαν, EURIP. Phœniss. ver. 369.

" But staid to sing alone
To one distinguish'd throne."

The poet cuts off the prevalence of simplicity among the Romans with the reign of Augustus ; and indeed, it did not continue much longer, most of the compositions, after that date, giving into false and artificial ornament.

"No more, in hall or bower,
The passions own thy power,
Love, only love, her forcelefs numbers mean."

In these lines the writings of the Provençal poets are principally alluded to, in which, simplicity is generally sacrificed to the rhapsodies of romantic love.

ODE ON THE POETICAL CHARACTER.

Procul! O! procul este profani!

THIS ode is so infinitely abstracted and replete with high enthusiasm, that it will find few readers capable of entering into the beauty of it, or of relishing its beauties. There is a style of sentiment as utterly unintelligible to common capacities, as if the subject were treated in an unknown language; and it is on the same account that abstracted poetry will never have many admirers.

The authors of such poems must be content with the approbation of those heaven-favoured geniuses, who, by a familiarity of taste and sentiment, are enabled to penetrate the high mysteries of inspired fancy, and to pursue the loftiest flights of enthusiastic imagination. Nevertheless, the praise of the distinguished few is certainly preferable to the applause of the undiscerning million; for all praise is valuable in proportion to the judgment of those who confer it.

As the subject of this ode is uncommon, so are the style and expression highly metaphorical and abstracted; thus the sun is called "the rich-hair'd youth of morn," the ideas are termed "the shadowy tribes of mind," &c. We are struck with the propriety of this mode of expression here, and it affords us new proofs of the analogy that subsists between language and sentiment.

Nothing can be more loftily imagined than the creation of the Cestus of fancy in this ode: the allegorical imagery is rich and sublime: and the observation that, the dangerous passions kept aloof, during the operation, is founded on the strictest philosophical truth; for poetical fancy can exist only in minds that are perfectly serene, and in some measure abstracted from the influences of sense.

The scene of Milton's "inspiring hour" is perfectly in character, and described with all those wild-wood-appearances of which the great poet was so enthusiastically fond:

"I view that oak, the fancied glades among,
By which as Milton lay, his evening ear,
Nigh spher'd in heaven, its native strains could hear."

ODE TO MERCY.

WRITTEN IN THE YEAR 1746.

THE ode written in 1746, and the ode to mercy, seem to have been written on the same occasion, viz. the late rebellion; the former in memory of those heroes who fell in defence of their country, the latter to excite sentiments of compassion in favour of those unhappy and deluded wretches who became a sacrifice to public justice.

The language and imagery of both are very beautiful; but the scene and figures described and the strophe of the Ode to Mercy are exquisitely striking, and would afford a painter one of the finest subjects in the world.

ODE TO LIBERTY.

THE ancient states of Greece, perhaps the only ones in which a perfect model of liberty ever existed, are naturally brought to view in the opening of the poem.

"Who shall awake the Spartan life,
And call in solemn sounds to life,
The youths, whose locks divinely spreading,
Like vernal hyacinths in fullen hue."

There is something extremely bold in this imagery of the locks of the Spartan youths, and greatly superior to that description Jocasta gives us of the hair of Polynices.

Βοτρυχων τε κυανοχρωτα χαιτας
Πλοκαμον.

"What new Alceus, fancy-blest,
Shall sing the sword, in myrtles drest, &c."

This alludes to a fragment of Alcæus still remaining, in which the poet celebrates Harmodius and Aristogiton, who slew the tyrant Hipparchus, and thereby restored the liberty of Athens.

The fall of Rome is here most nervously described in one line:

"With heaviest sound, a giant-statue, fell.

The thought seems altogether new, and the imitative harmony in the structure of the verse is admirable.

After bewailing the ruin of ancient liberty, the poet considers the influence it has retained, or still retains among the moderns; and here the free republics of Italy naturally engage his attention.—Florence, indeed, only to be lamented on account of losing its liberty under those patrons of letters, the Medicean family; the jealous Pisa, justly so called in respect to its long impatience and regret under the same yoke; and the small Marino, which, however unrespectable with regard to power or extent of territory, has, at least, this distinction to boast, that it has preserved its liberty longer than any other state, ancient or modern, having, without any revolution, retained its present mode of government near 1400 years. Moreover the patron saint who founded it, and from whom it takes its name, deserves this poetical record, as he is, perhaps, the only saint that ever contributed to the establishment of freedom.

"Nor e'er her former pride relate,
To sad Liguria's bleeding state."

In these lines the poet alludes to those ravages in the state of Genoa, occasioned by the unhappy divisions of the Guelphs and Ghibelines

"— When the favour'd of thy choice,
The daring archer heard thy voice."

For an account of the celebrated event referred to in these verses, see Voltaire's Epistle to the King of Prussia.

"Those whom the rod of Alva bruis'd,
Whose crown a British queen refus'd!

The Flemings were so dreadfully oppressed by this sanguinary general of Philip the Second, that they offered their sovereignty to Elizabeth; but, happily for her subjects, she had policy and magnanimity enough to refuse it. Deformeaux, in his Abrégé Chronologique de l'Histoire d'Espagne, thus describes the sufferings of the Flemings: "Le Duc d'Albe achevoit de réduire les Flamands au désespoir. Après avoir inondé les échafauts du sang le plus noble et le plus précieux, il faisoit construire des citadelles en divers endroits, et vouloit établir l'Alcavala, ce tribut onéreux qui avoit été longtemps en usage parmi les Espagnols." Agreg. Chron. Tom. IV.

"———Mona,
Where thousand elfin shapes abide."

Mona is properly the Roman name of the Isle of Anglesey, anciently so famous for its Druids; but sometimes, as in this place, it is given to the Isle of Man. Both these isles still retain much of the genius of superstition, and are now the only places where there is the least chance of finding a fairy.

ODE TO A LADY,

On the Death of Colonel Charles Ross, in the Action of Fontenoy. Written May, 1745.

THE Iambic kind of numbers in which this ode is conceived, seems as well calculated for tender and plaintive subjects, as for those where strength or rapidity is required.---This, perhaps, is owing to the repetition of the strain in the same stanza; for sorrow rejects variety, and affects an uniformity of complaint. It is needless to observe that this ode is replete with harmony, spirit, and pathos; and there, surely, appears no reason why the seventh and eighth stanzas should be omitted in that copy printed in Doddsley's collection of poems.

ODE TO EVENING.

THE blank ode has for some time solicited admission into the English poetry; but its efforts, hitherto, seem to have been vain, at least its reception has been no more than partial. It remains a question, then, whether there is not something in the nature of blank verse less adapted to the lyric than to the heroic measure, since, though it has been generally received in the latter, it is yet unadopted in the former. In order to discover this, we are to consider the different modes of these different species of poetry. That of the heroic is uniform; that of the lyric is various; and in these circumstances of uniformity and variety, probably, lies the cause why blank verse has been successful in the one, and unacceptable in the other. While it presented itself only in one form, it was familiarized to the ear by custom; but where it was obliged to assume the different shapes of the lyric muse, it seemed still a stranger of uncouth figure, was received rather with curiosity than pleasure, and entertained without that ease, or satisfaction, which acquaintance and familiarity produce.—Moreover, the heroic blank verse obtained a sanction of infinite importance to its general reception, when it was adopted by one of the greatest poets the world ever produced, and was made the vehicle of the noblest poem that ever was written. When this poem at length extorted that applause which ignorance and prejudice had united to withhold, the versification soon found its imitators, and became more generally successful than even in those countries from whence it was imported. But lyric blank verse had met with no such advantages; for Mr. Collins, whose genius and judgment in harmony might have given it so powerful an effect, hath left us but one specimen of it in the Ode to Evening.

In the choice of his measure he seems to have had in his eye Horace's Ode to Pyrrha; for this ode bears the nearest resemblance to that mixt kind of the asclepiad and pherecratic verse; and that resemblance in some degree reconciles us to the want of rhyme, while it reminds us of those great masters of antiquity, whose works had no need of this whimsical jingle of sounds.

From the following passage one might be induced to think that the poet had it in view to render his subject and his versification suitable to each other on this occasion, and that, when he addressed himself to the sober power of Evening, he had thought proper to lay aside the foppery of rhyme;

"Now teach me, maid compos'd,
To breathe some soften'd strain,
Whose numbers stealing through thy darkening
May not unseemly with its stillness suit, [vale,
As, musing slow, I hail
Thy genial lov'd return!"

But whatever were the numbers, or the versification of this ode, the imagery and enthusiasm it contains could not fail of rendering it delightful. No other of Mr. Collins's odes is more generally characteristic of his genius. In one place we discover his passion for visionary beings:

"For when thy folding-star arising shows
His pale circlet at his warning lamp
The fragrant hours and elves
Who slept in buds the day,

And many a nymph who wreaths her brows with
sedge,
And sheds the freshening dew, and lovelier still,
The pensive pleasures sweet
Prepare thy shadowy car."

In another we behold his strong bias to melancholy:

"Then let me rove some wild and heathy scene,
Or find some ruin 'midst its dreary dells,
Whose walls more awful nod
By thy religious gleams."

Then appears his taste for what is wildly grand and magnificent in nature; when, prevented by storms from enjoying his evening walk, he wishes for a situation,

"That from the mountain's fides,
Views wild and swelling floods;

And, through the whole, his invariable attachment to the expression of painting:

"—and marks o'er all
Thy dewy fingers draw
The gradual dusky veil."

It might be a sufficient encomium on this beautiful ode to observe, that it has been particularly admired by a lady to whom nature has given the most perfect principles of taste. She has not even complained of the want of rhyme in it: a circumstance by no means unfavourable to the cause of lyric blank verse; for surely, if a fair reader can endure an ode without bells and chimes, the masculine genius may dispense with them.

THE MANNERS, AN ODE.

From the subject and sentiments of this ode, it seems not improbable that the author wrote it about the time when he left the University; when, weary with the pursuit of academical studies, he no longer confined himself to the search of theoretical knowledge, but commenced the scholar of humanity, to study nature in her works, and man in society.

The following farewell to science exhibits a very just as well as striking picture: for however exalted in theory the Platonic doctrines may appear, it is certain that Platonism and Pyrrhonism are allied:

"Farewell the porch, whose roof is seen,
Arch'd with th' enlivening olive's green:
Where Science; prank'd in tissued vest,
By Reason, Pride, and Fancy drest,
Come like a bride, so trim array'd,
To wed with Doubt in Plato's shade!"

When the mind goes in pursuit of visionary systems, it is not far from the regions of doubt; and the greater its capacity to think abstractedly, to reason and refine, the more it will be exposed to, and bewildered in, uncertainty.—From an enthusiastic warmth of temper, indeed, we may for a while be encouraged to persist in some favourite doctrine, or to adhere to some adopted system; but when that enthusiasm, which is founded on the vivacity of the passions, gradually cools and dies away with them, the opinions it supported drop from us, and we are thrown upon the unpromising shore of doubt.—A striking proof of the necessity of some moral rule of wisdom and virtue, and some system of happiness established by unerring knowledge, and unlimited power.

In the poet's address to humour in this ode, there is one image of singular beauty and propriety. The ornament in the hair of wit are of such a nature, and disposed in such a manner, as to be perfectly symbolical and characteristic:

"Me too amidst thy band admit,
There where the young-ey'd healthful wit,
(Whose jewels in his crisped hair
Are plac'd each other's beams to share,
Whom no delights from thee divide)
In laughter loos'd attends thy side."

Nothing could be more expressive of wit, which consists in a happy collision of comparative and relative images, than this reciprocal reflection of light from the disposition of the jewels.

"O Humour, thou whose name is known
To Briton's favour'd isle alone."

The author could only mean to apply this to the time when he wrote, since other nations had produced works of great humour, as he himself acknowledges afterwards.

"By old Miletus, &c.
By all you taught the Tuscan maids, &c."

The Milesian and Tuscan romances were by no means distinguished for humour; but as they were the models of that species of writing in which humour was afterwards employed, they are, probably for that reason only mentioned here.

THE PASSIONS.

AN ODE FOR MUSIC.

If the music which was composed for this ode, had equal merit with the ode itself, it must have been the most excellent performance of the kind, in which poetry and music have, in modern times, united. Other pieces of the same nature have derived their greatest reputation from the perfection of the music that accompanied them, having in themselves little more merit than that of an ordinary ballad: but in this we have the whole soul and power of poetry—Expression that, even without the aid of music, strikes to the heart; and imagery of power enough to transport the attention, without the forceful alliance of corresponding sounds! what, then, must have been the effects of these united!

It is very observable that though the measure is the same, in which the musical efforts of fear, anger, and despair, are described, yet by the variation of the cadence, the character and operation of each is strongly expressed: thus particularly of Despair:

"With woeful measures wan Despair—
Low sullen sounds his grief beguil'd,
A solemn, strange, and mingled air,
'Twas sad by fits, by starts 'twas wild."

He must be a very unskilful composer who could not catch the power of imitative harmony from these lines!

The picture of hope that follows this is beautiful almost beyond imitation. By the united powers of imagery and harmony, that delightful being is exhibited with all the charms and graces that pleasure and fancy have appropriated to her.

Relegat, qui semel percurrit;
Qui nunquam legit, legat.

" But thou, O Hope, with eyes so fair,
What was thy delighted measure!
Still it whisper'd promis'd pleasure,
And bade the lovely scenes at distance hail!
Still would her touch the strain prolong,
And from the rocks, the woods, the vale,
She call'd on Echo still through all the song;
And where her sweetest theme she chose,
A soft responsive voice was heard at every close, [golden hair."
And Hope enchanted smil'd, and wav'd her

In what an exalted light does the above stanza place this great master of poetical imagery and harmony! what varied sweetness of numbers! what delicacy of judgment and expression! how characteristically does Hope prolong her strain, repeat her soothing closes, call upon her associate Echo for the same purposes, and display every pleasing grace peculiar to her!

" And Hope enchanted smil'd, and wav'd her golden hair."

Legat, qui nunquam legit;
Qui semel percurrit, relegat.

The descriptions of joy, jealousy, and revenge, are excellent; though not equally so. Those of melancholy and cheerfulness are superior to every thing of the kind; and, upon the whole, there may be very little hazard in asserting that this is the finest ode in the English language.

AN EPISTLE

TO SIR THOMAS HANMER, ON HIS EDITION OF SHAKSPEARE'S WORKS.

THIS poem was written by our author at the university, about the time when Sir Thomas

Hanmer's pompous edition of Shakspeare was printed at Oxford. If it has not so much merit as the rest of his poems, it has still more than the subject deserves. The versification is easy and genteel, and the allusions always poetical. The character of the poet Fletcher in particular is very justly drawn in this epistle.

DIRGE IN CYMBELINE.

ODE ON THE DEATH OF MR. THOMSON.

MR. COLLINS had skill to complain. Of that mournful melody, and those tender images, which are the distinguishing excellencies of such pieces as bewail departed friendship, or beauty, he was an almost unequalled master. He knew perfectly to exhibit such circumstances, peculiar to the objects, as awaken the influences of pity; and while, from his own great sensibility, he felt what he wrote, he naturally addressed himself to the feelings of others.

To read such lines as the following, all beautiful and tender as they are, without corresponding emotions of pity, is surely impossible:

" The tender thought on thee shall dwell,
Each lonely scene shall thee restore,
For thee the tear be duly shed;
Belov'd, till life can charm no more;
And mourn'd, 'till Pity's self be dead."

The Ode on the death of Thomson seems to have been written in an excursion to Richmond by water. The rural scenery has a proper effect in an ode to the memory of a poet, much of whose merit lay in descriptions of the same kind; and the appellations of "Druid," and "meek Nature's child," are happily characteristic. For the better understanding of this ode, it is necessary to remember, that Mr. Thomson lies buried in the church of Richmond.

THE LIFE OF DYER.

JOHN DYER was born in 1700, the second son of Robert Dyer, Esq. of Aberglafney in Carmarthen-shire, a solicitor of great capacity and note.

He received his early education in the country, and finished his studies at Westminster School, under the care of Dr. Freind, from whence he was called away to be instructed in his father's profession.

His father died soon after; and taking no delight in the study of the law, but having always amused himself with drawing, he resolved to turn painter, and became pupil to Mr. Richardson of Lincoln's-Inn-Fields, an artist then of high reputation, but better known by his writings than by his pictures.

He afterwards became an itinerant painter, and wandered about South Wales and the parts adjacent; but mingled poetry with painting, and printed Grongar Hill, which was originally written as an Irregular Ode, in a "Miscellany Volume of Poems," collected and published by Savage, in 1726, in which it appears in that form, very incorrect, and with the initial lines as follows;

Fancy, nymph that loves to lie
On the lonely eminence,
Darting notice through the eye,
Forming thought and feasting sense.
Thou that must lend imagination wings,
And stamp distinction on all worldly things;
Come, and with thy various hues,
Paint and adorn thy sister muse.

Like other painters, he afterwards travelled into Italy for improvement; and at Rome, formed the plan of his poem, called The Ruins of Rome, which he finished soon after his return, in 1740.

At his return, ill health, and love of study, solitude, and reflection, determined him to the church. He, therefore, entered into orders; and married, about the same time, Miss Enfor, sister of Mr. Strong Enfor, of Warwickshire.

Of his ecclesiastical provision, and some other particulars of his personal history, he has himself given an account, in a letter to William Duncombe, Esq. dated Coningsby, Nov. 24. 1756, published in the second volume of "Letters by several eminent Persons deceased," by the Rev. John Duncombe. "Lord Chancellor [Hardwick] has been favourable to me. This living [Coningsby, Lincolnshire] is 120 l. per annum. The other, called Kirkby, is 110 l.; but my preferments came in this course: Calthorp in Leicestershire (80 l. a-year), was given me by one Mr. Harper, in 1741. That I quitted in 1751, for a small living of 75 l. called Belchford, ten miles from hence, and given me by Lord Chancellor, through Mr. Wray's [Daniel Wray, Esq. one of the depute tellers of the Exchequer, a friend to virtue and the muses] interest. Sir John Heathcote gave me this, and lately procured me Kirkby of Lord Chancellor, without my solicitation. I was glad of this, on account of its nearness to me; though I think myself a loser by the exchange, through the expences of the seal, dispensations, journeys, &c. and the charge of an old house, half of which I am going to pull down."

"More of myself, which your good natured curiosity draws from me, is this: After having been an itinerant painter in my native country (S. Wales), and in Herefordshire, Worcestershire, &c. &c. I married and settled in Leicestershire. My wife's name was Enfor, whose grandmother was a Shakspeare, descended from a brother of everybody's Shakspeare. We have four children living; three are girls; the youngest a boy, six years old. I had some brothers; have but one left; he is a clergyman, lives at Marybone, and has such a housefull of children as puts me in mind of a noted statue at Rome of the river Nile, on the arms, legs, and body of which are crawling or climbing, ten or a dozen little boys and girls."

About this time, he finished the Fleece, his greatest poetical work, in the composition of which, as he himself informs us, he received some assistance from Akenfide.

"Your humble servant," he writes Mr. Duncombe, "is become a deaf, and dull, and languid creature; who, however, in this poor change of constitution, being a little recompensed with the critic's phlegm, has made shift, by many blottings and corrections, and some helps from his kind friend Dr. Akenfide, to give a sort of finishing to the Fleece, which is just sent up to Mr. Doddsley; but as people are so taken up with politics, and have so little inclination to read any thing but satire and newspapers, I am in doubt whether this is a proper time for publishing it."

He published the Fleece, in 1757, and congratulated himself upon it as his noblest work; but it was coldly received upon its first appearance, and has not hitherto obtained so much notice as it deserves.

Doddsley the bookseller was one day mentioning it to a critical visitor with more expectation of success than the other could easily admit. In the conversation, the author's age was asked; and being represented as advanced in life, "He will," said the critic, "be buried in woollen."

He did not indeed long survive that publication, nor long enjoy the increase of his preferments. He died in 1758, in the 58th year of his age.

His Grongar Hill, and Ruins of Rome, have been frequently reprinted in the poetical miscellanies; and, together with the Fleece, Country Walk, and a few shorter pieces, were collected in the 53d volume of the "Works of the English Poets," 1779. Scott left behind him an essay on Grongar Hill and another on the Ruins of Rome, which were published among his "Critical Essays," by Mr. Hoole, in 1785.

The character of Dyer was very amiable and respectable. He was beloved by his friends, for the gentleness and sweetness of his disposition. He was respected by the world, as a man of superior endowments. With Hill and Savage he lived in habits of familiar intimacy; and joined in the poetical praises of a lady celebrated in their verses by the name of Clio, afterwards Mrs. Sanfom. Savage has an "Epistle to Dyer, occasioned by seeing his picture of the celebrated Clio," and another "in Answer to his from the Country." He was distinguished by the friendship of Akenfide, and carried on a correspondence with Mr. Duncombe, the friend of Hughes, and other men of letters and taste.

As a poet, Dyer ranks with Denham, Garth, Pope, and Thomson, his predecessors in descriptive poetry. He had peculiar and powerful talents for that species of composition, inferior only perhaps to the talents of Thomson. Some of his descriptions, however, sufficiently evince that he had studied manners and passions, as well as the external beauties of nature, and could have excelled in compositions of higher dignity and utility, that lay open the internal constitution of man, and that imitate characters and sentiments. It is no diminution of his genius, that he preferred that species of poetry which has given immortality to Lucretius, Virgil, and Thomson. Of English poets, none have excelled Dyer, in one of the greatest and most pleasing arts of descriptive poetry, the disposition of every object so as it may give occasion for some observation on human life. This oblique instruction is the distinguishing excellence of "Coopers Hill." This is the great charm of the incomparable "Elegy written in a Country Church-Yard."

Of Dyer's compositions, his Grongar Hill has obtained the greatest notice. It is a descriptive poem of very considerable merit, spirited and pleasing. Few poetical pieces have represented an extensive and beautiful prospect in so agreeable a manner. But it is not without its imperfections; there is a redundancy of thought in some instances, and a carelessness of language in others. The versification is an irregular mixture of iambic and trochaic lines; a circumstance rather displeasing to a nice ear. Considered as a landscape, painted with words instead of colours, it is pronounced by Mr. Gilpin, in his "Observations on the River Wye," defective in the execution, as wanting contrast of foreground and distance. It is justly observed, that the objects immediately beneath his eye, and those more remote, are marked with equal strength and distinctness; the trees close at hand are distinguished by their shapes and buds, and the castle afar off, by ivy creeping on its walls. Where the describer is supposed to stand, the former must be visible, the latter could not; and therefore should not have been mentioned. Dyer was a painter, and knew the effect of contrast and the rules of perspective; but his powers cannot be fairly estimated by his performance. His poem seems designedly without plan; it is desultory and diffuse, sketching at random a number of unconnected objects. His hill's extensive view would probably have afforded several complete landscapes; but it is not clear that he aimed at producing any. Grongar Hill, had Dyer written nothing else, would have obtained for him the name of a poet, yet it is the smallest proof of his abilities. The Ruins of Rome, and the Fleece, however neglected by superficial readers, or degraded by injudicious critics, justly entitle him to the highest praise.

The Ruins of Rome has for its subject the remains of the first city in the universe, whose history could not fail to interest, and whose moral must instruct; a subject affording pictures of past and present magnificence, narration of the rise and fall of empire, applause of liberty and virtue, and censure of tyranny and vice. The poem consists principally in description of progress and prospect; and so abounds with pleasing imagery, that the task of selection is perplexing. The view of his prospect is supposed to employ the duration of a natural day. It begins when the rising sun

Flames on the ruins in the purer air,
Towering aloft——

And concludes with the grand natural appearance of the sun setting between two towers:

Cool evening comes; the setting sun displays
His visible great round between two towers,
As through two shady cliffs——

The idea of progression, given by his specification of the places passed through, is very forcible, and the epithets bestowed on those places are strongly discriminative of their peculiarities; the woody bounds of Gallia, the cloud-piercing Alps, the vinny vale of Arno, and the forlorn waste of the Campagna. The introduction of the pilgrim hearing the noise of the falling rivers, is a beautiful circumstance and affects us much more forcibly than a simple assertion that they often fell.

Dr. Johnson, whose parsimony of praise to his contemporaries, especially to Dyer, is but too conspicuous, observes, that "some passages in this poem are conceived with the mind of a poet;" and contents himself with quoting this passage, the merit of which had been previously applauded by Hervey. The passage in which he exults in the recollection of the former respectable state of poets, demands, in every respect, unabated approbation. The modern neglect, of which many poets, and none more than himself, have had occasion to complain, is expressed with feeling and energy:

But now—another age, alas! is ours—
Yet will the muse a little longer soar,
Unless the clouds of care weigh down her wings,
Since nature's stores are shut with cruel hand,
And each aggrieves his brother; since in vain
The thirsty pilgrim at the fountain asks
The overflowing wave.—Enough—the plaint disdain—

The remaining part of the poem is of the same general character; and relates, in a spirited narrative, the rise, meridian, decline, and fall of the Roman empire. The conclusion describes, in the most animated manner, the irruptions of the Goths and Vandals, with their consequences; and reflects, with equal dignity and pathos, on the inestimable advantages of political liberty, and on the fatal effects of national luxury.

No subject can be more interesting to a British reader than

The care of sheep, the labours of the loom;
or of more universal concern, than the ——arts of trade,

which Dyer has made the argument of his Fleece. Accordingly, it is addressed to "the good, of all degrees, of all sects," but especially to the king, whom, in the emphatic language of Homer, he styles the People's Shepherd. The manner in which it is executed discovers no less judgment than fancy; for, though few material rules relating to sheep or the woollen manufactures are omitted, they are all poetically and gracefully delivered. The diction is artfully varied; the two first books have a mixture of the pastoral; the third is rural, but elegant; the last is daring and sublime. He has no interesting narratives, such as the story of "Orpheus and Eurydice" in the fourth Georgic, and those of "Amelia" and "Lavinia" in the "Seasons;" but it abounds in affecting digressions and pathetic strokes, particularly in exhortations to benevolence:

In flowery spring-time, when the new dropt lamb,
'Tott'ring with weakness, by his mother's side,
Feels the fresh world about him, and each thorn,
Hillock, or furrow, trips his feeble feet,
O guard his meek sweet innocence from all
'Th' innumerable ills that rush around his life.—
In this soft office may thy children join,
And charitable habits learn in sport.

In the same benevolent strain are his recommendation of county work-houses (B. III.); his censure of those who refuse an asylum to persecuted foreigners; his wish for a general naturalization act (ib.); his reflections on the slave trade (B. IV.); his censure of the disputes between the English and French East India Companies (ib.); his method for preventing the exportation of combed wool, and his apology for treating that subject (B. II.); and his recommendation of benevolence to the brute creation (ib.). His topographical descriptions deserve particular commendation; and in river-painting, his merit is superlative. His Sheep-shearing, and the Feast on the Banks of the Severn, are pieces of exquisite painting. His truly poetical description of long wool in the fleece, and of the various kinds of looms, shows that genius can almost ennoble any subject, however mean or inconsiderable.

Of his shorter poems, The Country Walk is most conspicuous for picturesque imagery and interesting sentiment. The Epistle to a Friend in Town (probably Savage) is sprightly, familiar, and easy, in an uncommon degree. The Epistle to Savage is vigorously written; and the Epistle to Hill, though much inferior to it, is not deficient in spirit and elegance.

His character, as given by Dr. Johnson, cannot be generally allowed, without adopting his well-known prejudices against blank verse.

"Dyer is not a poet of bulk or dignity sufficient to require an elaborate criticism. Grongar Hill is the happiest of his productions; it is not indeed very accurately written; but the scenes which it displays are so pleasing, the images which they raise so welcome to the mind, and the reflections of the writer so consonant to the general sense or experience of mankind, that when it is once read, it will be read again.

"The idea of the Ruins of Rome strikes more, but pleases less; and the title raises greater expectation than the performance gratifies. Some passages, however, are conceived with the mind of a poet; as, when in the neighbourhood of delapidating edifices, he says:

The pilgrim oft
At dead of night, 'mid his oraison hears
Aghast the voice of time, disparting towers,
'Tumbling all precipitate down-dash'd,
Rattling around, loud thundering to the moon.

"Of the Fleece, which never became popular, and is now universally neglected, I can say little that is likely to recall it to attention. The wool-comber and the poet appear to me such discordant natures, that an attempt to bring them together is to couple the serpent with the fowl. When Dyer, whose mind was not unpoetical, has done his utmost in interesting his readers in our native commodity, by interspersing rural imagery and incidental digressions, by clothing small images in great words, and by all the writer's art of delusion, the meanness naturally adhering, and the irreverence habitually annexed to trade and manufacture, sink him under insuperable oppression; and the disgust which blank verse, encumbering and encumbered, superadds to an unpleasing subject, soon repels the reader, however willing to be pleased.

"Let me, however, honestly report whatever may counterbalance this weight of censure. I have been told, that Akenfide, who, upon a poetical question, has a right to be heard, said, "that he would regulate his opinion of the reigning taste by the rule of Dyer's Fleece; for if that were ill received, he should not think it any longer reasonable to expect fame from excellence."

DYER'S POEMS.

GRONGAR HILL.

SILENT nymph, with curious eye !
 Who, the purple evening, lie
 On the mountain's lonely van,
 Beyond the noise of busy man ;
 Painting fair the form of things,
 While the yellow linnet sings ;
 Or the tuneful nightingale
 Charms the forest with her tale ;
 Come, with all thy various dues,
 Come, and aid thy sister muse ;
 Now, while Phœbus riding high,
 Gives lustre to the land and sky !
 Grongar Hill invites my song,
 Draw the landskip bright and strong ;
 Grongar, in whose mossy cells,
 Sweetly musing, quiet dwells ;
 Grongar, in whose silent shade,
 For the modest muses made,
 So oft I have, the evening still,
 At the fountain of a rill,
 Sat upon a flowery bed,
 With my hand beneath my head ;
 While stray'd my eyes o'er Towy's flood,
 Over mead, and over wood,
 From house to house, from hill to hill,
 Till contemplation had her fill.

About his chequer'd sides I wind,
 And leave his brooks and meads behind,
 And groves, and grottoes where I lay,
 And vistas shooting beams of day :
 Wide and wider spreads the vale ;
 As circles on a smooth canal :
 The mountains round unhappy fate !
 Sooner or later, of all height,
 Withdraw their summits from the skies,
 And lessen as the others rise :
 Still the prospect wider spreads,
 Adds a thousand woods and meads ;
 Still it widens, widens still,
 And sinks the newly-risen hill.

Now, I gain the mountain's brow,
 What a landskip lies below !
 No clouds, no vapours intervene ;
 But the gay, the open scene,
 Does the face of nature show,
 In all the hues of heaven's bow ?
 And, swelling to embrace the light,
 Spreads around beneath the fight,
 Old castles on the cliffs arise,
 Proudly towering in the skies !

Rushing from the woods, the spires
 Seem from hence ascending fires !
 Half his beams Apollo sheds
 On the yellow mountain-heads !
 Gilds the fleeces of the flocks,
 And glitters on the broken rocks !
 Below me trees unnumber'd rise,
 Beautiful in various dyes :
 The gloomy pine, the poplar blue,
 The yellow beech, the sable yew,
 The slender fir, that taper grows,
 The sturdy oak with broad-spread boughs,
 And beyond the purple grove,
 Haunt of Phyllis, queen of love !
 Gaudy as the opening dawn,
 Lies a long and level lawn,
 On which a dark hill, steep and high,
 Holds and charms the wandering eye !
 Deep are his feet in Towy's flood,
 His sides are cloth'd with waving wood,
 And ancient towers crown his brow,
 That cast an awful look below ;
 Whose ragged walls the ivy creeps,
 And with her arms from falling keeps :
 So both a safety from the wind
 On mutual dependence find.
 'Tis now the raven's bleak abode ;
 'Tis now th' apartment of the toad ;
 And there the fox securely feeds ;
 And there the poisonous adder breeds,
 Conceal'd in ruins, moss, and weeds ;
 While, ever and anon, there falls
 Huge heaps of hoary moulder'd walls.
 Yet time has seen, that lifts the low,
 And level lays the lofty brow,
 Has seen this broken pile complete,
 Big with the vanity of state ;
 But transient is the smile of fate !
 A little rule, a little sway,
 A sun-beam in a winter's-day,
 Is all the proud and mighty have
 Between the cradle and the grave.

And see the rivers how they run,
 Through woods and meads, in shade and sun,
 Sometimes swift, sometimes slow,
 Wave succeeding wave, they go
 A various journey to the deep,
 Like human life, to endless sleep !
 Thus is nature's vesture wrought,
 To instruct our wandering thought ;
 Thus she dresses green and gay,
 To disperse our cares away.

M m iij

Ever charming, ever new,
When will the landskip tire the view!
The fountain's fall, the river's flow,
The woody vallies, warm and low;
The windy summit, wild and high,
Roughly rushing on the sky!
The pleasant seat, the ruin'd tower,
The naked rock, the shady bower;
The town and village, dome and farm,
Each give each a double charm,
As pearls upon an Æthiop's arm.

See on the mountain's southern side,
Where the prospect opens wide,
Where the evening gilds the tide;
How close and small the hedges lie!
What streaks of meadows cross the eye!
A step methinks may pass the stream,
So little distant dangers seem;
So we mistake the future's face,
Ey'd through hope's deluding glass;
As yon summits soft and fair,
Clad in colours of the air,
Which, to those who journey near,
Barren, brown, and rough appear;
Still we tread the same coarse way,
The present's still a cloudy day.

O may I with myself agree,
And never covet what I see:
Content me with an humble shade,
My passions tam'd, my wishes laid;
For, while our wishes wildly roll,
We banish quiet from the soul:
'Tis thus the busy beat the air,
And misers gather wealth and care.

Now, ev'n now, my joys run high,
As on the mountain-turf I lie;
While the wanton zephyr sings,
And in the vale perfumes his wings;
While the waters murmur deep;
While the shepherd charms his sheep;
While the birds unbounded fly,
And with music fill the sky,
Now, ev'n now, my joys run high.

Be full, ye courts; be great who will;
Search for peace with all your skill:
Open wide the lofty door,
Seek her on the marble floor.
In vain you search, she is not there;
In vain ye search the domes of care!
Grass and flowers quiet treads,
On the meads and mountain-heads,
Along with pleasure, close ally'd,
Ever by each other's side:
And often, by the murmuring rill,
Hears the thrush, while all is still,
Within the groves of Grongar Hill.

THE RUINS OF ROME.

"Aspice murorum moles, præruptaque saxa,
"Obrutaque horrenti vesta theatra situ:
"Hæc sunt Roma. Viden' velut ipsa cadavera tantæ
"Urbis adhuc spirent imperiosa minas?"

JANUS VITALIS.

ENOUGH of Grongar, and the shady dales
Of winding Towy, Merlin's fabled haunt
I sing inglorious. Now the love of arts,
And what in metal or in stone remains

Of proud antiquity, through various realms
And various languages and ages fam'd,
Bears me remote, o'er Gallia's woody bounds,
O'er the cloud-piercing Alps remote; beyond
The vale of Arno purpled with the vine,
Beyond the Umbrian and Etruscan hills,
To Latium's wide Champain, forlorn and waste,
Where yellow Tiber his neglected wave
Mournfully rolls. Yet once again, my muse,
Yet once again, and soar a loftier flight;
Lo the resistless theme, imperial Rome.

Fall'n, fall'n, a silent heap; her heroes all
Sunk in their urns; behold the pride of pomp,
The throne of nations fall'n; obscur'd in dust;
Ev'n yet majestic: the solemn scene
Elates the soul, while now the rising sun
Flames on the ruins in the purer air
Towering aloft, upon the glittering plain,
Like broken rocks, a vast circumference;
Rent palaces, crush'd columns, rifled moles,
Fanes roll'd on fanes, and tombs on buried tombs.

Deep lies in dust the Theban obelisk
Immense along the waste; minuter art,
Gliconian forms, or Phidian, subtly fair,
O'erwhelming; as the immense Leviathan
The finny brood, when near Ierne's shore
Out-stretch'd, unwieldy, his island length appears
Above the foamy flood. Globose and huge,
Gray-mouldering temples swell, and wide o'ercast
The solitary landscape, hills and woods,
And boundless wilds; while the vine-mantled brows
The pendent goats unveil, regardless they
Of hourly peril, though the clefted domes
Tremble to every wind. The pilgrim oft
At dead of night, 'mid his oraison hears
Aghast the voice of time, disparting towers,
Tumbling all precipitate down-dal'd,
Rattling around, loud thundering to the moon;
While murmurs sooth each awful interval
Of ever-falling waters; shrouded Nile*,
Eridanus, and Tiber with his twins,
And palmy Euphrates; they with drooping locks,
Hang o'er their urns, and mournfully among
The plaintive-echoing ruins pour their streams.

Yet here, adventurous in the sacred search
Of ancient arts, the delicate of mind,
Curious and modest, from all climes resort.
Grateful society! with these I raise
The toilsome step up the proud Palatin,
Through spiry cypress groves, and towering pine,
Waving aloft o'er the big ruins brows,
On numerous arches rear'd; and frequent stopp'd,
The sunk ground startles me with dreadful chasm,
Breathing forth darkness from the vast profound
Of isles and halls, within the mountain's womb.
Nor these the nether works; all these beneath,
And all beneath the vales and hills around,
Extend the cavern'd sewers, massy, firm,
As the Sibylline grot beside the dead
Lake of Avernus; such the sewers huge,
Whither the great Tarquinian genius dooms
Each wave impure; and proud with added rains,
Hark how the mighty billows lash their vaults,
And thunder; how they heave their rocks in vain!
Though now incessant time has roll'd around

* Fountains at Rome adorned with the statues of those rivers.

A thousand winters o'er the changeful world,
And yet a thousand since, th' indignant floods
Roar loud in their firm bounds, and dash and swell,
In vain; convey'd to Tiber's lowest wave.

Hence over airy plains, by crystal founts,
That weave their glittering waves with tuneful
Among the sleeky pebbles, agate clear, [lapse,
Cerulean ophite, and the flowery vein
Of orient jasper, pleas'd I move along,
And vases boss'd, and huge inscriptive stones,
And intermingling vines; and figur'd nymphs,
Flora's and Chloe's of delicious mould,
Cheering the darkness; and deep empty tombs,
And dells, and mouldering shrines, with old decay
Rustic and green, and wide-embowering shades,
Shot from the crooked clefts of nodding towers.
A solemn wilderness! with error sweet,
I wind the lingering step, where-e'er the path
Mazy conducts me, which the vulgar foot
O'er sculptures maim'd has made; Anubis, Sphinx,
Idols of antique guise, and horned Pan,
Terrific, monstrous shapes! preposterous gods,
Of fear and ignorance, by the sculptor's hand
Hewn into form, and worshipp'd; as ev'n now
Blindly they worship at their breathless mouths *
In varied appellations: men to these
(From deep to depth in darkening error fall'n)
At length ascrib'd th' inapplicable name.

How doth it please and fill the memory
With deeds of brave renown, while on each hand
Historic urns and breathing statues rise,
And speaking busts! Sweet Scipio, Marius stern,
Pompey superb, the spirit-stirring form
Of Cæsar raptur'd with the charm of rule
And boundless fame; impatient for exploits,
His eager eyes upcast, he soars in thought
Above all height: and his own Brutus see,
Desponding Brutus, dubious of the right,
In evil days, of faith, of public weal,
Solicitous and sad. Thy next regard
Be Tully's graceful attitude; unprais'd,
His out-stretch'd arm he waves, in act to speak
Before the silent masters of the world,
And eloquence arrays him. There behold
Prepar'd for combat in the front of war
The pious brothers; jealous Alba stands
In fearful expectation of the strife,
And youthful Rome intent: the kindred foes
Fall on each other's neck in silent tears;
In sorrowful benevolence embrace—
Howe'er, they soon unsheath the flashing sword,
Their country calls to arms; now all in vain
The mother clasps the knee, and ev'n the fair
Now weeps in vain; their country calls to arms.
Such virtue Clelia, Cocles, Manlius, rous'd;
Such were the Fabii, Decii; so inspir'd
The Scipios battled, and the Gracchi spoke:
So rose the Roman state. Me now, of these Deep-musing, high ambitious thoughts inflame
Greatly to serve my country, distant land,
And build me virtuous fame; nor shall the dust
Of these fall'n piles with show of sad decay
Avert the good resolve, mean argument,
The fate alone of matter.—Now the brow

* Several statues of the Pagan gods have been converted into images of saints.

We gain enraptur'd; beautifully distinct
The numerous porticos and domes upswell,
With obelisks and columns interpos'd,
And pine, and fir, and oak: so fair a scene
Sees not the dervise from the spiral tomb
Of ancient Chammos, while his eye beholds
Proud Memphis' reliques o'er th' Egyptian plain:
Nor hoary hermit from Hymettus' brow,
Though graceful Athens, in the vale beneath.
Along the windings of the muse's stream,
Lucid Ilyssus weeps her silent schools,
And groves, unvisited by bard or sage.
Amid the towery ruins, huge, supreme,
Th' enormous amphitheatre behold,
Mountainous pile! o'er whose capacious womb
Pours the broad firmament its varied light;
While from the central floor the seats ascend
Round above round, slow-widening to the verge
A circuit vast and high; nor less had held
Imperial Rome, and her attendant realms,
When drunk with rule she will'd the fierce delight,
And op'd the gloomy caverns, whence out-rush'd
Before th' innumerable shouting crowd
The fiery, madd'd, tyrants of the wilds,
Lions and tygers, wolves and elephants,
And desperate men, more fell. Abhor'd intent!
By frequent converse with familiar death,
To kindle brutal daring apt for war;
To lock the breast, and steal th' obdurate heart
Amid the piercing cries of sore distress
Impenetrable.—But away thine eye;
Behold yon steepy cliff; the modern pile
Perchance may now delight, while that rever'd †
In ancient days, the page alone declares,
Or narrow coin through dim cerulean rust.
The fane was Jove's, its spacious golden roof,
O'er thick-surrounding temples beaming wide,
Appear'd, as when above the morning hills
Half the round sun ascends; and tower'd aloft,
Sustain'd by columns huge, innumerable
As cedars proud on Canaan's verdant heights
Darkening their idols, when Astarte lur'd
Too prosp'rous Israel from his living strength.

And next regard yon venerable dome,
Which virtuous Latium, with erroneous aim,
Rais'd to her various deities, and nam'd
Pantheon; plain and round; of this our world
Majestic emblem; with peculiar grace
Before its ample orb, projected stands
The many-pillar'd portal: noblest work
Of human skill: here, curious architect,
If thou essay'st, ambitious, to surpass
Palladians, Angelus, or British Jones,
On these fair walls extend the certain scale,
And turn th' instructive compass: careful mark
How far in hidden art, the noble plain
Extends, and where the lovely forms commence
Of flowing sculpture: nor neglect to note
How range the taper columns, and what weight
Their leafy brows sustain: fair Corinth first
Boasted their order, which Calimachus
(Reclining studious on Asopus' banks
Beneath an urn of some lamented nymph)

* From the Palatine hill one sees most of the remarkable antiquities.

† The Capitol.

Haply compos'd; the urn with foliage curl'd
Thinly conceal'd the chapter inform'd.

See the tall obelisk from Memphis old,
One stone enormous each, or Thebes convey'd;
Like Albion's spires they rush into the skies.
And there the temple, where the summon'd state *
In deep of night conven'd: ev'n yet methinks
The vehement orator in rent attire
Persuasion pours, ambition sinks her crest;
And lo the villain, like a troubled sea,
That tosses up her mire! Ever disguis'd,
Shall treason walk? shall proud oppression yoke
The neck of virtue! Lo the wretch, abash'd,
Self-betray'd Catiline! O liberty,
Parent of happiness, celestial born;
When the first man became a living soul,
His sacred genius thou; be Britain's care;
With her secure, prolong thy lov'd retreat;
Thence bless'd mankind; while yet among her sons,
Ev'n yet there are, to shield thine equal laws,
Whose bosoms kindle at the sacred names
Of Cecil, Raleigh, Walsingham, and Drake.
May others more delight in tuneful airs;
In masque and dance excel; to sculptur'd stone
Give with superior skill the living look;
More pompous piles erect, or pencil soft
With warmer touch the visionary board:
But thou, thy nobler Britons teach to rule;
To check the ravage of tyrannic sway;
To quell the proud; to spread the joys of peace,
And various blessings of ingenious trade.
Be these our arts; and ever may we guard,
Ever defend thee with undaunted heart.
Inestimable good! who giv'st us truth,
Whose hand upleads to light, divinest truth,
Array'd in every charm: whose hand benign
Teaches unwearied toil to clothe the fields,
And on his various fruits inscribes the name
Of property: O nobly hail'd of old
By thy majestic daughters, Judah fair,
And Tyrus and Sidonia, lovely nymphs,
And Libya bright, and all-inchanting Greece,
Whose numerous towns and isles, and peopled seas,
Rejoic'd around her lyre; th' heroic note
(Smit with sublime delight) Ausonia caught,
And plann'd imperial Rome. Thy hand benign
Rear'd up her towery battlements in strength;
Bent her wide bridges o'er the swelling stream
Of Tuscan Tiber; thine those solemn domes
Devoted to the voice of humbler prayer;
And thine those piles † undeck'd, capacious, vast,
In days of dearth where tender charity
Dispens'd her timely succours to the poor.
Thine too those musically-falling founts,
To slake the clammy lip; adown they fall,
Musical ever; while from yon blue hills,
Dim in the clouds, the radiant aqueducts
Turn their innumerable arches o'er
The spacious desert, brightening in the sun,
Proud and more proud in their august approach:
High o'er irriguous vales and woods and towns,
Glide the soft whispering waters in the wind,
And here united pour their silver streams
Among the figur'd rocks, in murmuring falls,

* The Temple of Concord, where the senate met on Catiline's conspiracy.

† The public granaries.

Musical ever. These thy beauteous works:
And what beside felicity could tell
Of human benefit: more late the rest;
At various times their turrets chanc'd to rise,
When impious tyranny vouchsaf'd to smile.

Behold by Tiber's flood, where modern Rome *
Couches beneath the ruins: there of old
With arms and trophies gleam'd the field of Mars:
There to their daily sports the noble youth
Rush'd emulous; to fling the pointed lance;
To vault the steed or with the kindling wheel
In dusty whirlwinds sweep the trembling goal;
Or wrestling cope with adverse swelling breasts,
Strong grappling arms, close heads, and distant feet;

Or clash the lifted gauntlets: there they form'd
Their ardent virtues: in the bossy piles,
The proud triumphal arches; all their wars,
Their conquests, honours, in the sculptures live.
And see from every gate those ancient roads,
With tombs high verg'd, the solemn paths of
fame:

Deserve they not regard? O'er whose broad flints
Such crowds have roll'd, so many storms of war;
So many pomps; so many wondering realms:
Yet still through mountains pierc'd, o'er vallies
In even state, to distant seas around, [rais'd,
They stretch their pavements. Lo, the fane of peace,

Built by that prince, who to the trust of pow'r †
Was honest, the delight of human-kind.
Three nodding isles remain; the rest an heap
Of sand and weeds; her shrines, her radiant roofs,
And columns proud, that from her spacious floor,
As from a shining sea, majestic rose
An hundred foot aloft, like stately beech
Around the brim of Dion's glassy lake,
Charming the mimic painter: on the walls
Hung Salem's sacred spoils; the golden board,
And golden trumpets, now conceal'd entomb'd
By the sunk roof.—O'er which in distant view
The Etruscan mountains swell, with ruins crown'd
Of ancient towns; and blue Sora's spires,
Wrapping his sides in tempests. Eastward hence,
Nigh where the the Cestian pyramid divides ‡
The mouldering wall, beyond yon fabric huge,
Whose dust the solid antiquarian turns,
And thence in broken sculptures cast abroad,
Like Sibyl's leaves, collects the builder's name
Rejoic'd, and the green medals frequent found
Doom Caracalla to perpetual fame:
The stately pines, that spread their branches wide
In the dun ruins of its ample halls §,
Appear but tufts; as may whate'er is high
Sink in comparison, minute and vile.

These and unnumber'd, yet their brows uplift,
Rent of their graces; as Britannia's oaks
On Merlin's mount, or Snowden's rugged sides,
Stand in the clouds, their branches scatter'd round,
After the tempest; Mausoleums, Cirques,
Naumachios, Forums; Trajan's column tall,

* Modern Rome stands chiefly on the old Campus Martius.

† Begun by Vespasian, and finished by Titus.

‡ The tomb of Cestius, partly within and partly without the walls.

§ The baths of Caracalla, a vast ruin.

From whose low base the sculptures wind aloft,
And lead through various toils, up the rough steep,
Its hero to the skies: and his dark tow'r*,
Whose execrable hand the city fir'd,
And while the dreadful conflagration blaz'd,
Play'd to the flames; and Phœbus' letter'd dome†;

And the rough reliques of Carinæ's street,
Where now the shepherd to his nibbling sheep
Sits piping with his oaten reed; as erst
There pip'd the shepherd to his nibbling sheep,
When th' humble roof Anchises son explor'd
Of good Evander, wealth-despising king,
Amid the thickets: so revolves the scene;
So time ordains, who rolls the things of pride
From dust again to dust. Behold that heap
Of mouldering urns (their ashes blown away,
Dust of the mighty) the same story tell;
And as its base, from whence the serpent glides
Down the green desert street, yon hoary monk
Laments the same, the vision as he views,
The solitary, silent, solemn scene,
Where Caesars, heroes, peasants, hermits lie,
Blendid in dust together; where the slave
Rests from his labours; where th' insulting proud
Resigns his power; the miser drops his hoard;
Where human folly sleeps.—There is a mood,
(I sing not to the vacant and the young)
There is a kindly mood of melancholy,
That wings the soul, and points her to the skies;
When tribulation clothes the child of man,
When age descends with sorrow to the grave,
'Tis sweetly-soothing sympathy to pain,
A gently-wakening call to health and ease.
How musical! when all-devouring time,
Here sitting on his throne of ruins hoar,
While winds and tempests sweep the various lyre,
How sweet thy diapason, melancholy!
Cool evening comes; the setting sun displays
His visible great round between yon towers,
As through two shadow cliffs; away, my muse,
Though yet the prospect pleases, ever new
In vast variety, and yet delight
The many-figur'd sculptures of the path
Half beauteous, half effac'd; the traveller
Such antique marbles to his native land
Oft hence conveys; and every realm and state
With Rome's august remains, heroes and gods,
Deck their long galleries and winding groves;
Yet miss we not th' innumerable thefts,
Yet still profuse of graces teems the waste.

Suffice it now th' Esquilian mount to reach
With weary wing, and seek the sacred rests
Of Maro's humble tenement; a low
Plain wall remains; a little sun-gilt heap,
Grotesque and wild; the gourd and olive brown
Weave the light roof: the gourd and olive fan
Their amorous foliage, mingling with the vine,
Who drops her purple clusters through the green.
Here let me lie, with pleasing fancy sooth'd:
Here flow'd his fountain; here his laurels grew;
Here oft the meek good man, the lofty bard
Fram'd the celestial song, or social walk'd
With Horace and the ruler of the world:
Happy Augustus! who so well inspir'd

* Nero's.

† The Palatine library.

Could'st throw thy pomps and royalties aside,
Attentive to the wise, the great of soul,
And dignify thy mind. Thrice glorious days,
Auspicious to the muses! then rever'd,
Then hallow'd was the fount, or secret shade,
Or open mountain, or whatever scene
The poet chose, to tune th' ennobling rhyme
Melodious; ev'n the rugged sons of war,
Ev'n the rude hinds rever'd the poets name:
But now—another age, alas! is ours—

Yet will the muse a little longer soar,
Unless the clouds of care weigh down her wing,
Since nature's stores are shut with cruel hand,
And each aggrieves his brother; since in vain
The thirsty pilgrim at the fountain asks [dain—
Th' o'erflowing wave—Enough—the plaint dis-

See'st thou yon fane? ev'n now incessant time*
Sweeps her low mouldering marbles to the dust;
And Phœbus' temple, nodding with its woods,
Threatens huge ruin o'er the small rotund.

'Twas there beneath a fig-tree's umbrage broad,
Th' astonish'd swains with reverend awe beheld
Thee, O Quirinus, and thy brother-twin,
Pressing the teat within a monster's grasp
Sportive; while oft the gaunt and rugged wolf
Turn'd her stretch'd neck and form'd your tender limbs;

So taught of Jove, ev'n the fell savage fed
Your sacred infancies, your virtues, toils,
The conquests, glories, of th' Ausonian state,
Wrap'd in their secret seeds. Each kindred soul,
Robust and stout, ye grapple to your hearts,
And little Rome appears. Her cots arise,
Green twigs of osier weave the slender walls,
Green rushes spread the roofs; and here and there
Opens beneath the rock the gloomy cave.
Elate with joy Etruscan Tiber views
Her spreading scenes enameling his waves,
Her huts and hollow dells, and flocks and herds,
And gathering swains; and rolls his yellow car
To Neptune's court with more majestic train.

Her speedy growth alarm'd the states around,
Jealous; yet, soon by wondrous virtue won,
They sink into her bosom. From the plough
Rose her dictators; fought, o'ercame, return'd,
Yes, to the plough return'd, and hail'd their peers;

For then no private pomp, no household state,
The public only swell'd the generous breast,
Who has not heard the Fabian heroes sung?
Dentatus' scars, or Mutius' flaming hand?
How Manlius sav'd the capitol? the choice
Of steady Regulus? As yet they stood,
Simple of life; as yet seducing wealth
Was unexplor'd, and shame of poverty
Yet unimagin'd—Shine not all the fields
With various fruitage? murmur not the brooks
Along the flowery vallies? They, content,
Feasted at nature's hand, indelicate,
Blithe, in their easy taste; and only sought
To know their duties; that their only strife,
Their generous strife, and greatly to perform.
They through all shapes of peril and of pain,
Intent on honour, dar'd in thickest death
To snatch the glorious deed. Nor Trebia quell'd,
Nor Thrasymene, nor Cannæ's bloody field,

* The temple of Romulus and Remus under Mount Palatine.

Their dauntless courage; storming Hannibal
In vain the thunder of the battle roll'd,
The thunder of the battle they return'd
Back on his Punic shores; till Carthage fell,
And danger fled afar. The city gleam'd
With precious spoils: alas, prosperity!
Ah, baneful state! yet ebb'd not all their strength
In soft luxurious pleasures; proud desire
Of boundless sway, and feverish thirst of gold,
Rouz'd them again to battle. Beauteous Greece,
Torn from her joys, in vain with languid arm
Half rais'd her rusty shield; nor could avail
The sword of Dacia, nor the Parthian dart;
Nor yet the car of that fam'd British chief,
Which seven brave years beneath the doubtless wing

Of victory, dreadful roll'd its griding wheels
Over the bloody war: the Roman arms
Triumph'd till fame was silent to their foes.

And now the world unrival'd they enjoy'd
In proud security: the crested helm,
The plated greave and corselet hung unbrac'd;
Nor clank'd their arms, the spear and sounding
But on the glittering trophy to the wind. [shield,

Dissolv'd in ease and soft delights they lie,
Till every sun annoys, and every wind
Has chilling force, and every rain offends:
For now the frame no more is girt with strength
Masculine, nor in lustiness of heart

Laughs at the winter storm, and summer-beam,
Superior to their rage: enfeebling vice
Withers each nerve, and opens every pore

To painful feeling: flowery bowers they seek
(As ether prompts, as the sick sense approves)

Or cool Nymphean grots; or tepid baths
(Taught by the soft Ionians) they, along

The lawny vale, of every beauteous stone,
Pile in the roseat air with fond expence:

Through silver channels glide the vagrant waves,
And fall on silver beds crystalline down,
Melodious murmuring; while luxury

Over their naked limbs with wanton hand,
Sheds roses, odours, sheds unheeded bane.

Swift is the flight of wealth; unnumber'd wants,
Brood of voluptuousness, cry out aloud

Necessity, and seek the splendid bribe.
The citron board, the bowl emboss'd with gems,

And tender foliage wildly wreath'd around
Of seeming ivy, by that artful hand,

Corinthian Thericles; whate'er is known
Of rarest acquisition; Tyrian garbs,

Of rarest acquisition; Tyrian garbs,
Neptunian Albion's high testaceous food,

Neptunian Albion's high testaceous food,

And flavour'd Chian wines with incense fum'd
To flake Patrician thirst; for these their rights
In the vile streets they prostitute to sale;
Their ancient rights, their dignities, their laws,
Their native glorious freedom. Is there none,
Is there no villain, that will bind the neck
Stretch'd to the yoke? they come; the market throngs.

But who has most by fraud or force amass'd
Who most can charm corruption with his doles?

He be the monarch of the state; and lo!
Didius, vile usurer, though the crowd he mounts

Beneath his feet the Roman eagle cowers,
And the red arrows fill his grasp uncouth.

O Britons, O my countrymen, beware! [free,
Gird, gird your hearts; the Romans once were

Were brave, were virtuous.—Tyranny howe'er
Deign'd to walk forth a while in pageant state,

And with licentious pleasures fed the rout,
The thoughtless many; to the wanton sound

Of fifes and drums they danc'd, or in the shade
Sung Caesar, great and terrible in war,

Immortal Caesar! Lo, a god, a god!
He cleaves the yielding skies! Caesar meanwhile

Gathers the ocean pebbles; or the gnat
Enrag'd pursues; or at his lonely meal

Starves a wide province; tastes, dislikes, and flings
To dogs and sycophants. A god, a god!

The flowery shades and shrine obscene return.
But see along the north the tempests swell

O'er the rough Alps, and darken all their snows!
Sudden the Goth and Vandal, dreaded names,

Rush as the breach of waters, whelming all
Their domes, their villas; down the festive piles,

Down fall their Parian porches, gilded baths,
And roll before the storm in clouds of dust.

Vain end of human strength, of human skill,
Conquest, and triumph, and domain, and pomp,

And ease, and luxury! O luxury,
Bane of elated life, of affluent states,

What dreary change, what ruin is not thine?
How doth the bowl intoxicate the mind!

To the soft entrance of thy rosy cave
How dost thou lure the fortunate and great!

Dreadful attraction! while beyond thee gapes
Th' unfathomable gulf where Acher lies

O'erwhelm'd, forgotten; and high-boasting Cham;
And Elam's haughty pomp; and beauteous

BOOK I.

ARGUMENT.

THE subject proposed. Dedicatory address. Of pastures in general, fit for sheep: for fine-wool'd sheep: for long-wool'd sheep. Defects of pastures, and their remedies. Of climates. The moisture of the English climate vindicated. Particular beauties of England. Different kinds of English sheep: the two common sorts of rams described. Different kinds of foreign sheep. The several sorts of food. The distempers arising from thence, with their remedies. Sheep led by instinct to their proper food and physic. Of the shepherd's scrip, and its furniture. Care of sheep in tuppings-time. Of the castration of lambs, and the folding of sheep. Various precepts relative to changes of weather and seasons. Particular care of new-fallen lambs. The advantages and security of the English shepherd above those in hotter or colder climates; exemplified with respect to Lapland, Italy, Greece, and Arabia. Of sheep-sheering. Song on that occasion. Custom in Wales of sprinkling the rivers with flowers. Sheep-shearing feast and merriments on the banks of the Severn.

THE care of sheep, the labours of the loom,
And arts of trade, I sing. Ye rural nymphs,
Ye swains, and princely merchants, aid the verse.
And ye, high-trusted guardians of our isle,
Whom public voice approves, or lot of birth
To the great charge assigns: ye good, of all
Degrees, all sects, be present to my song.
So may distress, and wretchedness, and want,
The wide felicities of labour learn:
So may the proud attempts of restless Gaul
From our strong borders, like a broken wave,
In empty foam retire. But chiefly thou,
The people's shepherd, eminently plac'd
Over the numerous swains of every vale,
With well-permitted power, and watchful eye,
On each gay field to shed beneficence,
Celestial office! Thou protect the song.

On spacious airy downs, and gentle hills,
With grass and thyme o'erspread, and clover wild,
Where smiling Phœbus tempers every breeze,
The fairest flocks rejoice! they, nor of halt,
Hydropic tumours, nor of rot, complain;
Evils deform'd and foul: nor with hoarse cough
Disturb the music of the pastoral pipe;
But, crowding to the note, with silence soft
The close-woven carpet graze; where nature blends
Flowrets and herbage of minutest size,
Innoxious luxury. Wide airy downs

Are healths gay walks to shepherd and to sheep.

All arid soils, with sand, or chalky flint,
Or shells deluvian mingled; and the turf,
That mantles over rocks of brittle stone,
Be thy regard: and where low-tufted broom,
Or box, or berry'd juniper arise;
Or the tall growth of glossy-rinded beech;
And where the burrowing rabbit turns the dust;
And where the dappled deer delights to bound.
Such are the downs of Banstead, edg'd with woods,

And towery villas; such Dorcestrian fields,
Whose flocks innumerable whiten all the land:
Such those slow-climbing wilds, that lead the steep
Insensibly to Dover's windy cliff,
Tremendous height! and such the clover'd lawns
And sunny mounts of beauteous Normanton*,
Health's cheerful haunt, and the selected walk
Of Heathcote's leisure: such the spacious plain
Of Sarum, spread like Ocean's boundless round,
Where solitary Stonehenge, gray with moss,
Ruin of ages, nods: such too the leas
And ruddy tilth, which spiry Rofs beholds,
From a green hillock, o'er her lofty elms;
And Lemster's brooky track, and airy Croft†;
And such Herleian Eyewood's‡ swelling turf,
Wav'd as the billows of a rolling sea:
And Shobden§, for its lofty terrace fam'd,
Which from a mountain's ridge, elate o'er woods
And girt with all Siluria§; fees around
Regions on regions blendid in the clouds.
Pleasant Siluria, land of various views,
Hills, rivers, woods, and lawns and purple groves
Pomaceous, mingled with the curling growth
Of tendrils hops, that flaunt upon their poles,
More airy wild than vines along the sides
Of treacherous Falernum¶; or that hill

* A seat of Sir John Heathcote in Rutlandshire.

† A seat of Sir Archer Croft.

‡ Of the Earl of Oxford.

§ A seat of Lord Bateman.

¶ Treacherous Falernum, because part of the hills of Falernum was many years ago overturned by an eruption of fire, and is now an high and barren mount of cinders, called Monte Novo.

Vesuvius, where the bowers of Bacchus rose,
And Herculanean and Pompeian domes.

But if thy prudent care would cultivate
Licestrian fleeces, what the sinewy arm
Combs through the spiky steel in lengthen'd flakes
Rich saponaceous loam, that slowly drinks
The blackening shower, and fattens with the draugh

Or marl with clay deep-mix'd, be then thy choice,
Of one consistence, one complexion, spread
Through all thy glebe; where no deceitful veins
Of envious gravel lurk beneath the turf,
To loose the creeping waters from their springs,
Tainting the pasturage: and let thy fields
In slopes descend and mount, that chilling rains
May trickle off, and hasten to the brooks.

Yet some defect in all on earth appears;
All seek for help, all press for social aid.
Too cold the grassy mantle of the marl;
In stormy winters long and dreary nights,
For cumbent sheep; from broken slumber oft
They rise benumb'd, and vainly shift the couch;
Their wasted sides their evil plight declare.
Hence, tender in his care, the shepherd swain
Seeks each contrivance. Here it would avail,
At a meet distance from the upland ridge,
To sink a trench, and on the hedge-long bank
Sow frequent sand, with lime and dark manure;
Which to the liquid element will yield

A porous way, a passage to the foe.
Plough not such pastures: deep in spongy grass
The oldest carpet is the warmest lair,
And soundest; in new herbage coughs are heard.

Nor love too frequent shelter: such as decks
The vale of Severn, nature's garden wide,
By the blue steep of distant Malvern * wall'd
Solemnly vast. The trees of various shade,
Scene behind scene, with fair delusive pomp
Enrich the prospect, but they rob the lawns.
Nor prickly bramble, white with woolly theft,
Should tuft thy fields. Applaud not the remiss
Dimetians †, who, along their mossy dales,
Consume, like grasshoppers, the summer hour;
While round them stubborn thorns and furze increase,

And creeping briars. I knew a careful swain,
Who gave them to the crackling flames, and spread
Their dust saline upon the deepening grass:
And oft with labour-strengthen'd arm he delv'd
The draining trench across his verdant slopes,
To intercept the small meandering rills
Of upper hamlets: haughty trees, that four
The shaded grass, that weaken thorn-set mounds,
And harbour villain crows, he rare allow'd;
Only a slender tuft of useful ash,
And mingled beech and elm, securely tall,
The little smiling cottage warm embower'd;
The little smiling cottage, where at eve
He meets his rosy children at the door,
Prattling their welcomes, and his honest wife,
With good brown cake and bacon slice, intent
To cheer his hunger after labour hard.

Nor only soil, there also must be found
Felicity of clime, and aspect bland,

Where gentle sheep may nourish locks of price
In vain the filken fleece on windy brows,
And northern slopes of cloud-dividing hills
Is sought, though soft Iberia spreads her lap
Beneath their rugged feet, and names their heights
Biscayan or Segovian. Bothnic realms,
And dark Norwegian, with their choicest fields,
Dingles, and dells, by lofty fir embower'd,
In vain the bleaters court. Alike they shun
Libya's hot plains: what taste have they for groves
Of palm, or yellow dust of gold? no more
Food to the flock, than to the miser wealth,
Who kneels upon the glittering heap, and starves.
Ev'n Gallic Abbeville the shining fleece,
That richly decorates her loom, acquires
Barely from Albion, by th' ensnaring bribe,
The bait of avarice, which, with felon fraud,
For its own wanton mouth, from thousands steals,
How erring oft the judgment in its hate,
Or fond desire! Those flow-descending showers,
Those hovering fogs, that bathe our growing vales

In deep November (loath'd by trifling Gaul, Effeminate), are gifts the Pleiads shed,
Britannia's handmaids. As the beverage falls,
Her hills rejoice, her valleys laugh and sing.

Hail, noble Albion; where no golden mines,
No soft perfumes, nor oils, nor myrtle bowers,
The vigorous frame and lofty heart of man
Enervate: round whose stern Cerulean brows
White-winged snow, and cloud, and pearly rain,
Frequent attend, with solemn majesty:
Rich queen of mists and vapours! These thy sons
With their cool arms compress; and twist their
For deeds of excellence and high renown. [nerves
Thus form'd, our Edwards, Henrys, Churchills,
Blakes,

Our Lockes, our Newtons, and our Miltons, rose.

See the sun gleams; the living pastures rise,
After the nurture of the fallen shower,
How beautiful! how blue th' ethereal vault,
How verdurous the lawns, how clear the brooks!
Such noble warlike steeds, such herds of kine,
So sleek, so vast; such spacious flocks of sheep,
Like flakes of gold illumining the green,
What other paradise adorn but thine,
Britannia? happy, if thy sons would know
Their happiness. To these thy naval streams,
Thy frequent towns superb of busy trade,
And ports magnific add, and stately ships,
Innumerable. But whither strays my muse?
Pleas'd, like a traveller upon the strand
Arriv'd of bright Augusta: wild he roves,
From deck to deck, through groves immense of masts; [Ind;

'Mong crowds, bales, cars, the wealth of either
Through wharfs, and squares, and palaces, and
In sweet surprise; unable yet to fix [domes,
His raptur'd mind, or scan in order'd course
Each object singly; with discoveries new
His native country studious to enrich.

Ye shepherds, if your labours hope success,
Be first your purpose to procure a breed,
To soil and clime adapted. Every soil
And clime, ev'n every tree and herb, receives
Its habitant peculiar: each to each,
The Great Invisible, and each to all,
Through earth, and sea, and air, harmonious suits.

* Malvern, a high ridge of hills near Worcester.

† Dimetia, Caermarthenshire in South Wales.

Tempestuous regions, Darwent's * naked peaks,
 Snowdon † and blue Plynlymmon ‡, and the wide
 Aërial sides of Cader-yddris † huge;
 These are bestow'd on goat-horn'd sheep, of fleece
 Hairy and coarse, of long and nimble shank,
 Who rove o'er bog or heath, and graze or brouze
 Alternate, to collect, with due dispatch,
 O'er the bleak wild, the thinly scatter'd meal.
 But hills of milder air that thinly rise
 O'er dewy dales, a fairer species boast,
 Of shorter limb, and frontlet more ornate;
 Such the Silurian. If thy farm extends
 Near Cotswold downs, or the delicious groves
 Of Symmonds, honour'd through the sandy soil
 Of elmy Rofs †, or Devon's myrtle vales,
 That drink clear rivers near the glassy sea;
 Regard this sort, and hence thy fire of lambs
 Select: his tawny fleece in ringlets curls;
 Long swings his slender tail; his front is fenc'd
 With horns Ammonian, circulating twice
 Around each open ear, like those fair scrolls
 That grac'd the columns of th' Ionic dome.

Yet should thy fertile glebe be marly clay,
 Like Melton pastures, or Tripontian fields §,
 Where ever-gliding Avon's limpid wave
 Thwarts the long course of dusty Watling-street;
 That larger sort, of head defenceless, seek,
 Whose fleece is deep and clammy, close and plain:
 The ram short-limb'd, whose form compact de-
 One level line along his spacious back; [scribes
 Of full and ruddy eye, large ears, stretch'd head,
 Nostrils dilated, breast and shoulders broad,
 And spacious haunches, and a lofty dock.

Thus to their kindred soil and air induc'd,
 Thy thriving herd will bless thy skilful care,
 That copies nature: who, in every change,
 In each variety, with wisdom's works,
 And powers diversify'd of air and soil,
 Her rich materials. Hence Sabæa's rocks,
 Chaldaea's marl, Egyptus water'd loam,
 And dry Cyrene's land, in climes alike,
 With different stores supply the marts of trade.
 Hence Zembla's icy tracts no bleaters hear;
 Small are the Russian herds, and harsh their fleece;
 Of light esteem Germanic, far remote
 From soft-sea-breezes, open winters mild,
 And summers bath'd in dew: on Syrian sheep
 The costly burden only loads their tails:
 No locks Cormandel's, none Malacca's tribe
 Adorn; but fleck of flax, and brown like deer,
 Fearful and shepherdless, they bound along
 The sands. No fleeces wave in torrid climes,
 Which verdure boast of trees and shrubs alone,
 Shrubs aromatic, caffee wild, or thea,
 Nutmeg, or cinnamon, or fiery clove,
 Unapt to feed the fleece. The food of wool
 Is grass or herbage soft, that ever blooms
 In temperate air, in the delicious downs
 Of Albion, on the banks of all her streams.

Of grasses are unnumber'd kinds, and all
 (Save where foul waters linger on the turf)

‡ A town in Herefordshire.

§ Tripontian fields, the country between Rugby, in Warwickshire, and Lutterworth, in Leicestershire.

Salubrious. Early mark, when tepid gleams
 Oft mingle with the pearls of summer showers,
 And swell too hastily the tender plains:
 Then snatch away thy sheep; beware the rot;
 And with deterfive bay-salt rub their mouths;
 Or urge them on a barren bank to feed,
 In hunger's kind distress, on tedded hay;
 Or to the marsh guide their easy steps,
 If near thy tufted crofts the broad sea spreads.
 Sagacious care foreacts: when strong disease
 Breaks in and stains the purple streams of health,
 Hard is the strife of art: the coughing pest
 From their green pasture sweeps whole flocks away.

That dire distemper sometimes may the swain,
 Though late, discern; when on the lifted lid,
 Or visual orb, the turgid veins are pale;
 The swelling liver then her putrid store
 Begins to drink: ev'n yet thy skill exert,
 Nor suffer weak despair to fold thy arms:
 Again deterfive salt apply, or shed
 The hoary medicine o'er their arid food.

In cold stiff soils the bleaters oft complain
 Of gouty ails, by shepherds term'd the halt:
 Those let the neighbouring fold or ready crook
 Detain; and pour into their cloven feet
 Corrosive drugs, deep-searching arsenic,
 Dry allum, verdigrise, or vitriol keen.
 But if the doubtful mischief scarce appears,
 'Twill serve to shift them to a dryer turf,
 And salt again: th' utility of salt
 Teach thy slow swains: redundant humours cold
 Are the diseases of the bleating kind.

Th' infectious scab, arising from extremes
 Of want or surfeit, is by water cur'd
 Of lime, or sodden stave-acre, or oil
 Dispersive of Norwegian tar, renown'd
 By virtuous Berkeley, whose benevolence
 Explor'd its pow'rs, and easy medicine thence Sought for the poor: ye poor, with grateful voice,
 Invoke eternal blessings on his head.

Sheep also pleurifies and dropries know,
 Driv'n oft from nature's path by artful man,
 Who blindly turns aside with haughty hand,
 Whom sacred instinct would securely lead.
 But thou, more humble swain, thy rural gates
 Frequent unbar, and let thy flocks abroad,
 From lea to croft, from mead to arid field;
 Noting the fickle seasons of the sky.
 Rain-fated pastures let them shun and seek
 Changes of herbage and salubrious flowers.
 By their all-perfect Master inly taught,
 They best their food and physic can discern;
 For he, Supreme Existence, ever near,
 Informs them. O'er the vivid green observe
 With what a regular consent they crop,
 At every fourth collection to the mouth,
 Unsavory crow-flower; whether to awake
 Languor of appetite with lively change,
 Or timely to repel approaching ills,
 Hard to determine. Thou, whom nature loves,
 And with her salutary rules intrusts,
 Benevolent Mackenzie *, say the cause.
 This truth howe'er shines bright to human sense;
 Each strong affection of th' unconscious brute,

* Dr. Mackenzie, late of Worcester, now of Drum-seugh, near Edinburgh.

Each bent, each passion of the smallest mite,
Is wisely given; harmonious they perform
The work of perfect reason (blush, vain man!)
And turn the wheels of nature's vast machine.

See that thy scrip have store of healing tar,
And marking pitch and raddle; nor forget
Thy sheers true pointed, nor th' officious dog,
Faithful to teach thy stragglers to return:
So may'st thou aid who lag along, or steal
Aside into the furrows or the shades,
Silent to droop; or, who, at every gate
Or hillock, rub their sores and loosen'd wool.
But rather these, the feeble of thy flock,
Banish before th' autumnal months: ev'n age
Forbear too much to favour; oft renew,
And through thy fold let joyous youth appear.

Beware the season of imperial love,
Who through the world his ardent spirit pours;
Ev'n sheep are then intrepid: the proud ram
With jealous eye surveys the spacious field;
All rivals keep aloof, or desperate war
Suddenly rages; with impetuous force,
And fury irresistible, they dash
Their hardy frontlets; the wide vale resounds;
The flock amaz'd stands safe afar; and oft
Each to the other's might a victim falls:
As fell of old, before that engine's sway,
Which hence ambition imitative wrought,
The beauteous towers of Salem to the dust.

Wife custom, at the fifth or sixth return,
Or ere they 'ave past the twelfth of orient morn,
Castrates the lambkins; necessary rite,
Ere they be number'd of the peaceful herd.
But kindly watch whom thy sharp hand has griev'd,
In those rough months, that list the turning year:
Not tedious is the office; to thy aid
Favonius hastens; soon their wounds he heals,
And leads them skipping to the flowers of May;
May, who allows to fold, if poor the tilth,
Like that of dreary, houseless, common fields,
Worn by the plough: but fold on fallows dry.
Enfeeble not thy flocks to feed thy land:
Nor in too narrow bounds the prisoners crowd:
Nor ope the wattled fence, while balmy morn
Lies on the reeking pasture; wait till all
The crystal dews, impearl'd upon the grass,
Are touch'd by Phœbus' beams, and mount aloft,
With various clouds to paint the azure sky.

In teizing fly-time, dank, or frosty days,
With unctuous liquids, or the lees of oil,
Rub their soft skins, between the parted locks;
Thus the Brigantes*; 'tis not idle pains:
Nor is that skill despis'd, which trims their tails,
Ere summer heats of filth and tagged wool.
Coolness and cleanliness to health conduce.

To mend thy mounds, to trench, to clear, to soil
Thy grateful fields, to medicate thy sheep,
Hurdles to weave, and cheerly shelters raise,
Thy vacant hours require: and ever learn
Quick ether's motion: oft the scene is turn'd;
Now the blue vault, and now the murky cloud,
Hail, rain, or radiance; these the moon will tell,
Each bird and beast, and these thy fleecy tribe:
When high the sapphire cope, supine they couch,
And chew the cud delighted; but, ere rain,
Eager, and at unwonted hour, they feed:

* The inhabitants of Yorkshire.

Slight not the warning; soon the tempest rolls,
Scattering them wide, close rushing at the heels
Of th' hurrying o'ertaken swains: forbear
Such nights to fold; such nights be theirs to shift
On ridge or hillock; or in homesteads soft
Or softer cotes detain them. Is thy lot
A chill penurious turf, to all thy toils
Untractable? Before harsh winter drowns
The noisy dikes, and starves the rushy glebe,
Shift the frail breed to sandy hamlets warm:
There let them sojourn, till gay Progne skims
The thickening verdure, and the rising flowers.
And while departing autumn all embrowns
The frequent-bitten fields; while thy free hand
Divides the tedded hay; then be their feet
Accustom'd to the barriers of the rick,
Or some warm umbrage; lest in erring flight,
When the broad dazzling snows descend, they run
Dispers'd to ditches, where the swelling drift
Wide overwhelms: anxious, the shepherd swains
Issue with axe and spade, and all abroad,
In doubtful aim explore the glaring waste;
And some, perchance, in the deep delve upraise,
Drooping, ev'n at the twelfth cold dreary day,
With still continu'd feeble pulse of life; [gnaw'd.
The glebe, their fleece, their flesh, by hunger

Ah gentle shepherd, thine the lot to tend,
Of all that feel distress, the most assail'd,
Feeble, defenceless: lenient be thy care:
But spread around thy tenderest diligence
In flowery spring-time, when the new-dropt lamb,
Tottering with weakness by his mother's side,
Feels the fresh world about him; and each thorn,
Hillock, or furrow, trips his feeble feet:
O, guard his meek sweet innocence from all
Th' innumerable ills that rush around his life;
Mark the quick kite, with beak and talons prone,
Circling the skies to snatch him from the plain;
Observe the lurking crows; beware the brake,
There the fly fox the careless minute waits;
Nor trust thy neighbour's dog, nor earth, nor sky:
Thy bosom to a thousand cares divide.
Eurus oft flings his hail; the tardy fields
Pay not their promis'd food; and oft the dam
O'er her weak twins with empty udder mourns,
Or fails to guard when the bold bird of prey
Alights, and hops in many turns around,
And tires her also turning: to her aid
Be nimble, and the weakest, in thine arms,
Gently convey to the warm cote, and oft,
Between the lark's note and the nightingale's,
His hungry bleating still with tepid milk:
In this soft office may thy children join,
And charitable habits learn in sport:
Nor yield him to himself ere vernal airs
Sprinkle thy little croft with daisy flowers.
Nor yet forget him: life has rising ills:
Various as ether is the pastoral care;
Through slow experience, by a patient breast,
The whole long lesson gradual is attain'd,
By precept after precept, oft receiv'd
With deep attention: such as Nuceus* sings
To the full vale near Soare's† enamour'd brook,
While all is silence: sweet Hincklean swain!

* Mr. Joseph Nutt, an eminent apothecary at Hinckley.

† Soare a river in Leicestershire.

Whom rude obscurity severely clasps:
The muse, howe'er, will deck thy simple cell
With purple violets and primrose flowers,
Well-pleas'd thy faithful lessons to repay.

Sheep no extremes can bear: both heat and cold
Spread sores cutaneous; but, more frequent, heat:
The fly-blown vermin, from their woolly nest,
Press to the tortur'd skin, and flesh, and bone,
In littleness and number dreadful foes.

Long rains in miry winter cause the halt;
Rainy luxuriant summers rot your flock;
And all excess, ev'n of salubrious food,
As sure destroys, as famine or the wolf.

Inferior theirs to man's world-roving frame,
Which all extremes in every zone endures.

With grateful heart, ye British swains, enjoy
Your gentle seasons and indulgent clime.
Lo, in the sprinkling clouds, your bleating hills
Rejoice with herbage, while the horrid rage
Of winter irresistible o'erwhelms

'Th' Hyperborean tracts: his arrowy frosts,
That pierce through flinty rocks, the Lappian flies;
And burrows deep beneath the snowy world;
A drear abode, from rose-diffusing hours,
That dance before the wheels of radiant day,
Far, far remote; where, by the squalid light
Of fetid oil inflam'd, sea-monster's spume,
Or fir-wood, glaring in the weeping vault,
Twice three slow gloomy months, with various
Sullen he struggles; such the love of life! [ills

His lank and scanty herds around him press,
As, hunger-slung, to gritty meal he grinds
The bones of fish, or inward bark of trees,
Their common sustenance. While ye, O swains,
Ye, happy at your ease, behold your sheep
Feed on the open turf, or crowd the tilth,
Where, thick among the greens, with busy mouths
They scoop white turnips: little care is yours;
Only, at morning hour, to interpose

Dry food of oats, or hay, or brittle straw,
The watery juices of the bossy root
Absorbing: or from noxious air to screen
Your heavy teeming ewes, with wattled fence
Of furze or copse-wood, in the lofty field,
Which bleak ascends among the whistling winds.

Or, if your sheep are of Silurian breed,
Nightly to house them dry on fern or straw,
Silkening their fleeces. Ye, nor rolling hut,
Nor watchful dog, require; where never roar
Of savage tears the air, where careless night
In balmy sleep lies lull'd, and only wakes
To plenteous peace. Alas! o'er warmer zones
Wild terror strides: their stubborn rocks are rent;
Their mountains sink; their yawning caverns
And fiery torrents roll impetuous down, [flame;
Proud cities deluging; Pompeian towers,
And Herculanean, and what riotous flood
In Syrian valley, where now the Dead Sea
'Mong solitary hills infectious lies.

See the swift furies, famine, plague, and war,
In frequent thunders rage o'er neighbouring realms,

And spread their plains with desolation wide:
Yet your mild homesteads ever-blooming smile
Among embracing woods; and waft on high
The breath of plenty, from the ruddy tops
Of chimneys, curling o'er the gloomy trees,
In airy azure ringlets, to the sky.

VOL. IX.

Nor ye by need are urg'd, as Attic swains,
And Tarentine, with skins to clothe your sheep;
Expensive toil; howe'er expedient found
In fervid climates, while from Phœbus' beams
They fled to rugged woods and tangling brakes.
But those expensive toils are now no more,
Proud tyranny devours their flocks and herds:
Nor bleat of sheep may now, nor sound of pipe,
Sooth the sad plains of once sweet Arcady,
The shepherd's kingdom: dreary solitude
Spreads o'er Hymettus, and the shaggy vale
Of Athens, which in solemn silence sheds
Her venerable ruins to the dust.

The weary Arabs roam from plain to plain,
Guiding the languid herd in quest of food;
And shift their little home's uncertain scene
With frequent farewell: strangers, pilgrims all,
As were their fathers. No sweet fall of rain
May there be heard; nor sweeter liquid lapse
Of river, o'er the pebbles gliding by
In murmurs: goaded by the rage of thirst,
Daily they journey to the distant clefts
Of craggy rocks, where gloomy palms o'erhang
The ancient wells, deep sunk by toil immense,
Toil of the patriarchs, with sublime intent
Themselves and long posterity to serve.
There, at the public hour of sultry noon,
They share the beverage, when to watering come;
And grateful umbrage, all the tribes around,
And their lean flocks, whose various bleatings fill
The echoing caverns: then is absent none,
Fair nymph or shepherd, each inspiring each
To wit, and song, and dance, and active feats;
In the same rustic scene, where Jacob won
Fair Rachel's bosom, when a rock's vast weight
From the deep dark-mouth'd well his strength
remov'd,

And to her circling sheep refreshment gave.

Such are the perils, such the toils of life,
In foreign climes. But speed thy flight, my muse;
Swift turns the year; and our unnumber'd flocks
On fleeces overgrown uneasy lie.

Now, jolly swains, the harvest of your cares
Prepare to reap, and seek the sounding caves
Of high Brigantium*, where, by ruddy flames,
Vulcan's strong sons, with nervous arm, around
The steady anvil, and the glaring mass,
Clatter their heavy hammers down by turns,
Flattening the steel; from their rough hands receive

The sharpen'd instrument, that from the flock
Severs the fleece. If verdant elder spreads
Her silver flowers; if humble daisies yield
To yellow crow-foot, and luxuriant grass,
Gay shearing-time approaches. First, howe'er,
Drive to the double fold, upon the brim
Of a clear river, gently drive the flock,
And plunge them one by one into the flood:
Plung'd in the flood, not long the struggler sinks,
With his white flakes, that glisten through the tide;
The sturdy rustic in the middle wave,
Awaits to seize him rising; one arm bears
His lifted head above the limpid stream,

* The caves of Brigantium—the forges of Sheffield, in Yorkshire, where the shepherds shears and all edgetools are made.

While the full clammy fleece the other laves
Around, laborious, with repeated toil;
And then resigns him to the sunny bank,
Where, bleating loud, he shakes his dripping locks.

Shear them the fourth or fifth return of morn,
Lest touch of busy fly-blows wound their skin:
Thy peaceful subjects without murmur yield
Their yearly tribute: 'tis the prudent part
To cherish and be gentle, while ye strip
The downy vesture from their tender sides.

Press not too close; with caution turn the points;
And from the head in regular rounds proceed:
But speedy, when ye chance to wound, with tar
Prevent the wingy swarm and scorching heat;
And careful house them, if the lowering clouds
Mingle their stores tumultuous: through the gloom

Then thunder oft with ponderous wheels rolls
And breaks the crystal urns of heaven: adown Falls streaming rain. Sometimes among the steeps

Of Cambrian glades (pity the Cambrian glades)
Fast tumbling brooks on brooks enormous swell,
And sudden overwhelm their vanish'd fields:
Down with the flood away the naked sheep,
Bleating, in vain, are borne, and straw-built huts,
And rifted trees, and heavy enormous rocks,
Down with the rapid torrent to the deep.

At shearing-time, along the lively vales,
Rural festivities are often heard:
Beneath each blooming arbuor all is joy
And lusty merriment: while on the grass
The mingled youth in gaudy circles sport,
We think the golden age again return'd,
And all the fabled Dryades in dance.
Leering, they bound along with laughing air,
To the shrill pipe, and deep remurmuring cords
Of th' ancient harp, or tabor's hollow sound.

While th' old apart, upon a bank reclin'd,
Attend the tuneful carol, softly mixt
With every murmur of the sliding wave,
And every warble of the feather'd choir;
Music of paradise! which still is heard,
When the heart listens; still the views appear
Of the first happy garden, when content
To nature's flowery scenes directs the sight.
Yet we abandon those Elysian walks,
Then idly for the lost delight repine:
As greedy mariners, whose desperate sails
Skim o'er the billows of the foamy flood,
Fancy they see the lessening shores retire,
And sigh a farewell to the sinking hills.

Could I recal those notes, which once the muse
Heard at a shearing, near the woody sides
Of blue-topp'd Wreakin*! Yet the carols sweet,
Through the deep maze of the memorial cell,
Faintly remurmur. First arose in song
Hoar-headed Damon, venerable swain,
The soothest shepherd of the flowery vale.
"This is no vulgar scene: no palace roof
Was e'er so lofty, nor so nobly rise
Their polish'd pillars, as these aged oaks,
Which o'er our fleecy wealth and harmless
sports

"Thus have expanded wide their sheltering arms,

* A high bill in Shropshire.

"Thrice told an hundred summers. Sweet content,

"Ye gentle shepherds, pillow us at night."

"Yes, tuneful Damon, for our cares are short,
Rising and falling with the cheerful day,"

Colin reply'd; "and pleasing weariness

"Soon our unaching heads to sleep inclines.

"Is it in cities so? where, poets tell,

"The cries of sorrow sadden all the streets,

"And the diseases of intemperate wealth.

"Alas, that any ills from wealth should rise!

"May the sweet nightingale on yonder spray,

"May this clear stream, these lawns, those snow-
white lambs,

"Which, with a pretty innocence of look,

"Skip on the green, and race in little troops;

"May that great lamp, which sinks behind the

"And streams around variety of lights, [hills,

"Recal them erring: this is Damon's wish.

"Huge Breaden's* stony summit once I climb'd

"After a kidling: Damon, what a scene!

"What various views unnumber'd spread beneath! [rent floods;

"Woods, towers, vales, caves, dells, cliffs, and tor-

"And here and there, between the spiry rocks,

"The broad flat sea. Far nobler prospects these,

"Than gardens black with smoke in dusty towns,

"Where stenchy vapours often blot the sun:

"Yet, flying from his quiet, thither crowds

"Each greedy wretch for tardy-rising wealth,

"Which comes too late; that courts the taste in vain,

"Or nauseates with distempers. Yes, ye rich,

"Still, still be rich, if thus ye fashion life;

"And piping, careless, silly shepherds we,

"We silly shepherds, all intent to feed

"Our snowy flocks, and wind the fleecy fleece."

"Deem not, howe'er, our occupation mean,"

Damon reply'd, "while the Supreme accounts

"Well of the faithful shepherd, rank'd alike

"With king and priest: they also shepherds are;

"For so th' All-seeing styles them, to remind

"Elated man, forgetful of his charge."

"But haste, begin the rites: see purple eve

"Stretches her shadows: all ye nymphs and swains

"Hither assemble. Pleas'd with honours due,

"Sabrina, guardian of the crystal flood, [clear

"Shall bless our cares, when she by moonlight

"Skims o'er the dales, and eyes our sleeping
folds;

"Or in hoar caves around Plynlymmon's brow,

"Where precious minerals dart their purple
gleams,

"Among her sisters she reclines; the lov'd

"Vaga†, profuse of graces, Ryddol† rough,

"Blithe Ystwith†, and Clevedoc† swift of foot;

"And mingles various seeds of flowers and herbs,

"In the divided torrent, ere they burst

"Through the dark clouds, and down the mountain roll.

"Nor taint-worm shall infect the yeanning herds,

"Nor penny-grass, nor spearwort's poisonous leaf."

* A bill on the borders of Montgomeryshire.

† Vaga, Ryddol, Ystwith, and Clevedoc, rivers,
the springs of which rise in the sides of Plynlymmon.

He said: with light fantastic toe, the nymphs
Thither assembled, thither every swain;
And o'er the dimpled stream a thousand flowers,
Pale lilies, roses, violets, and pinks,
Mix'd with the greens of burnet, mint, and thyme,
And trefoil, sprinkled with their sportive arms.

Such custom holds along th' irriguous vales,
From Wreakin's brow to rocky Dolvoryn †,
Sabrina's early haunt, ere yet she fled
The search of Guendolen, her stepdame proud,
With envious hate enrag'd. The jolly cheer,
Spread on a mossy bank, untouch'd abides,
Till cease the rites: and now the mossy bank

Is gaily circled, and the jolly cheer
Dispers'd in copious measure; early fruits,
And those of frugal store, in husk or rind;
Steep'd grain, and curdled milk with dulcet cream
Soft temper'd, in full merriment they quaff,
And cast about their gibes; and some apace
Whistle to roundelays: their little-ones
Look on delighted: while the mountain-woods,
And winding vallies, with the various notes
Of pipe, sheep, kine, and birds, and liquid brooks,
Unite their echoes: near at hand the wide
Majestic wave of Severn slowly rolls
Along the deep-divided glebe: the flood
And trading bark with low contracted sail
Linger among the reeds and coppy banks
To listen; and to view the joyous scene.

ARGUMENT.

INTRODUCTION. Recommendation of mercifulness to animals. Of the winding of wool. Diversity of wool in the fleece: skill in the assorting of it; particularly among the Dutch. The uses of each sort. Severe winters pernicious to the fleece. Directions to prevent their effects. Wool lightest in common-fields: inconveniences of common-fields. Vulgar errors concerning the wool of England: its real excellencies; and directions in the choice. No good wool in cold or wet pastures: yet all pastures improveable; exemplified in the drainage of Bedford Level. Britain in ancient times not esteemed for wool. Countries esteemed for wool before the Argonautic expedition. Of that expedition and its consequences. Countries afterwards esteemed for wool. The decay of arts and sciences in the barbarous ages: their revival, first at Venice. Countries noted for wool in the present times. Wool the best of all the various materials for clothing. The wool of our island, peculiarly excellent, is the combing wool. Methods to prevent its exportation. Apology of the author for treating this subject. Bishop Blaize the inventor of wool-combing. Of the dying of wool. Few dyes the natural product of England. Necessity of trade for importing them. The advantages of trade, and its utility in the moral world; exemplified in the prosperity and ruin of the elder Tyre.

Now, of the sever'd lock, begin the song,
With various numbers, through the simple theme
To win attention: this, ye shepherd swains,
This is a labour. Yet, O Wray, if thou
Cease not with skilful hand to point her way,
The lark-wing'd muse, above the grassy vale,
And hills, and wood, shall, singing, soar aloft;
And he, whom learning, wisdom, candor, grace,
Who glows with all the virtues of his fire,
Royston approve, and patronise the strain.

Through all the brute creation, none, as sheep,
To lordly man such ample tribute pay.
For him their udders yield nectareous streams:
For him their downy vestures they resign;
For him they spread the feast: ah! ne'er may he
Glory in wants, which doom to pain and death
His blameless fellow-creatures. Let disease,
Let wasted hunger, by destroying live;
And the permission use with trembling thanks,
Meekly reluctant: 'tis the brute beyond:
And gluttons ever murder when they kill,
Ev'n to the reptile every cruel deed
Is high impiety. Howe'er not all,
Not of the sanguinary tribe are all;
All are not savage. Come, ye gentle swains,

Like Brama's healthy sons on Indus' banks,
Whom the pure stream and garden fruits sustain,
Ye are the sons of nature; your mild hands
Are innocent: ye, when ye shear, relieve.
Come, gentle swains, the bright unfully'd locks
Collect: alternate songs shall sooth your cares,
And warbling music break from every spray.
Be faithful; and the genuine locks alone
Wrap round: nor alien flake nor pitch enfold:
Stain not your stores with base desire to add
Fallacious weight: nor yet, to mimic those
Minute and light, of sandy Urchinfield*,
Lessen, with subtle artifice, the fleece:
Equal the fraud. Nor interpose delay,
Lest busy ether through the open wool
Debilitating pass, and every film
Ruffle and sully with the valley's dust.
Guard too from moisture and the fretting moth
Pernicious: she, in gloomy shade conceal'd,
Her labyrinth cuts, and mocks the comber's care.
But in loose locks of fells she most delights,
And feeble fleeces of distemper'd sheep,
Whither she hastens, by the morbid scent

Attend the tuneful carol, softly mixt
With every murmur of the sliding wave,
And every warble of the feather'd choir;
Music of paradise! which still is heard,
When the heart listens; still the views appear
Of the first happy garden, when content
To nature's flowery scenes directs the sight.
Yet we abandon those Elysian walks,
Then idly for the lost delight repine:
As greedy mariners, whose desperate sails
Skim o'er the billows of the foamy flood,
Fancy they see the lessening shores retire,
And sigh a farewell to the sinking hills.

Could I recal those notes, which once the muse
Heard at a shearing, near the woody sides
Of blue-topp'd Wreakin*! Yet the carols sweet,
Through the deep maze of the memorial cell,
Faintly remurmur. First arose in song
Hoar-headed Damon, venerable swain,
The soothest shepherd of the flowery vale.
"This is no vulgar scene: no palace roof
"Was e'er so lofty, nor so nobly rise
"Their polish'd pillars, as these aged oaks,
"Which o'er our fleecy wealth and harmless
sports

"Thus have expanded wide their sheltering arms,

* A high bill in Shropshire.

"Thrice told an hundred summers. Sweet content,

"Ye gentle shepherds, pillow us at night."

"Yes, tuneful Damon, for our cares are short,

"Rising and falling with the cheerful day,"

Colin reply'd; "and pleasing weariness

"Soon our unaching heads to sleep inclines.

"Is it in cities so? where, poets tell,

"The cries of sorrow sadden all the streets,

"And the diseases of intemperate wealth.

"Alas, that any ills from wealth should rise!

"May the sweet nightingale on yonder spray,

"May this clear stream, these lawns, those snow-
white lambs,

"Which, with a pretty innocence of look,

"Skip on the green, and race in little troops;

"May that great lamp, which sinks behind the

"And streams around variety of lights, [hills,

"Recal them erring: this is Damon's wish.

"Huge Breaden's* stony summit once I climb'd

"After a kidling: Damon, what a scene!

"What various views unnumber'd spread beneath! [rent floods;

"Woods, towers, vales, caves, dells, cliffs, and tor-

"And here and there, between the spiry rocks,

"The broad flat sea. Far nobler prospects these,

"Than gardens black with smoke in dusty towns,

"Where stenchy vapours often blot the sun:

"Yet, flying from his quiet, thither crowds

"Each greedy wretch for tardy-rising wealth,

"Which comes too late; that courts the taste in vain,

"Or nauseates with distempers. Yes, ye rich,

"Still, still be rich, if thus ye fashion life;

"And piping, careless, silly shepherds we,

"We silly shepherds, all intent to feed

"Our snowy flocks, and wind the flecky fleece."

"Deem not, howe'er, our occupation mean,"

Damon reply'd, "while the Supreme accounts

"Well of the faithful shepherd, rank'd alike

"With king and priest: they also shepherds are;

"For so th' All-seeing styles them, to remind

"Elated man, forgetful of his charge."

"But haste, begin the rites: see purple eve

"Stretches her shadows: all ye nymphs and swains

"Hither assemble. Pleas'd with honours due,

"Sabrina, guardian of the crystal flood, [clear

"Shall bless our cares, when she by moonlight

"Skims o'er the dales, and eyes our sleeping
folds;

"Or in hoar caves around Plynlymmon's brow,

"Where precious minerals dart their purple
gleams,

"Among her sisters she reclines; the lov'd

"Vaga†, profuse of graces, Ryddol† rough,

"Blithe Ystwith†, and Clevedoc† swift of foot;

"And mingles various seeds of flowers and herbs,

"In the divided torrent, ere they burst

"Through the dark clouds, and down the mountain roll.

"Nor taint-worm shall infect the yearning herds,

"Nor penny-grass, nor spearwort's poisonous
leaf."

* A bill on the borders of Montgomeryshire.

† Vaga, Ryddol, Ystwith, and Clevedoc, rivers,
the springs of which rise in the sides of Plynlymmon.

He said: with light fantastic toe, the nymphs
Thither assembled, thither every swain;
And o'er the dimpled stream a thousand flowers,
Pale lilies, roses, violets, and pinks,
Mix'd with the greens of burnet, mint, and thyme,
And trefoil, sprinkled with their sportive arms.

Such custom holds along th' irriguous vales,
From Wreakin's brow to rocky Dolvoryn †,
Sabrina's early haunt, ere yet she fled
The search of Guendolen, her stepdame proud,
With envious hate enrag'd. The jolly cheer,
Spread on a mossy bank, untouch'd abides,
Till cease the rites: and now the mossy bank

Is gaily circled, and the jolly cheer
Dispers'd in copious measure; early fruits,
And those of frugal store, in husk or rind;
Steep'd grain, and curdled milk with dulcet cream
Soft temper'd, in full merriment they quaff,
And cast about their gibes; and some apace
Whistle to roundelays: their little-ones
Look on delighted: while the mountain-woods,
And winding vallies, with the various notes
Of pipe, sheep, kine, and birds, and liquid brooks,
Unite their echoes: near at hand the wide
Majestic wave of Severn slowly rolls
Along the deep-divided glebe: the flood
And trading bark with low contracted sail
Linger among the reeds and copsey banks
To listen; and to view the joyous scene.

ARGUMENT.

INTRODUCTION. Recommendation of mercifulness to animals. Of the winding of wool. Diversity of wool in the fleece: skill in the assorting of it; particularly among the Dutch. The uses of each sort. Severe winters pernicious to the fleece. Directions to prevent their effects. Wool lightest in common-fields: inconveniences of common-fields. Vulgar errors concerning the wool of England: its real excellencies; and directions in the choice. No good wool in cold or wet pastures: yet all pastures improveable; exemplified in the drainage of Bedford Level. Britain in ancient times not esteemed for wool. Countries esteemed for wool before the Argonautic expedition. Of that expedition and its consequences. Countries afterwards esteemed for wool. The decay of arts and sciences in the barbarous ages: their revival, first at Venice. Countries noted for wool in the present times. Wool the best of all the various materials for clothing. The wool of our island, peculiarly excellent, is the combing wool. Methods to prevent its exportation. Apology of the author for treating this subject. Bishop Blaize the inventor of wool-combing. Of the dying of wool. Few dyes the natural product of England. Necessity of trade for importing them. The advantages of trade, and its utility in the moral world; exemplified in the prosperity and ruin of the elder Tyre.

Now, of the sever'd lock, begin the song,
With various numbers, through the simple theme
To win attention: this, ye shepherd swains,
This is a labour. Yet, O Wray, if thou
Cease not with skilful hand to point her way,
The lark-wing'd muse, above the grassy vale,
And hills, and wood, shall, singing, soar aloft;
And he, whom learning, wisdom, candor, grace,
Who glows with all the virtues of his fire,
Royston approve, and patronise the strain.

Through all the brute creation, none, as sheep,
To lordly man such ample tribute pay.
For him their udders yield nectareous streams:
For him their downy vestures they resign;
For him they spread the feast: ah! ne'er may he
Glory in wants, which doom to pain and death
His blameless fellow-creatures. Let disease,
Let wasted hunger, by destroying live;
And the permission use with trembling thanks,
Meekly reluctant: 'tis the brute beyond:
And gluttons ever murder when they kill,
Ev'n to the reptile every cruel deed
Is high impiety. Howe'er not all,
Not of the sanguinary tribe are all;
All are not savage. Come, ye gentle swains,

Like Brama's healthy sons on Indus' banks,
Whom the pure stream and garden fruits sustain,
Ye are the sons of nature; your mild hands
Are innocent: ye, when ye shear, relieve.
Come, gentle swains, the bright unfully'd locks
Collect: alternate songs shall sooth your cares,
And warbling music break from every spray.
Be faithful; and the genuine locks alone
Wrap round: nor alien flake nor pitch enfold:
Stain not your stores with base desire to add
Fallacious weight: nor yet, to mimic those
Minute and light, of sandy Urchinfield*,
Lessen, with subtle artifice, the fleece:
Equal the fraud. Nor interpose delay,
Lest busy ether through the open wool
Debilitating pass, and every film
Ruffle and sully with the valley's dust.
Guard too from moisture and the fretting moth
Pernicious: she, in gloomy shade conceal'd,
Her labyrinth cuts, and mocks the comber's care.
But in loose locks of fells she most delights,
And feeble fleeces of distemper'd sheep,
Whither she hastens, by the morbid scent

* The country about Ross in Herefordshire,

Allur'd; as the swift eagle to the fields
Of slaughtering war or carnage: such apart
Keep for their proper use. Our ancestors
Selected such, for hospitable beds
To rest the stranger, or the gory chief,
From battle or the chase of wolves return'd.

When many-colour'd evening sinks behind
The purple woods and hills, and opposite
Rises, full-orb'd, the silver harvest-moon,
To light th' unwearied farmer, late afield
His scatter'd sheaves collecting; then expect
The artists, bent on speed, from populous Leeds,
Norwich, or Froome; they traverse every plain,
And every dale, where farm or cottage smokes:
Reject them not; and let the season's price
Win thy soft treasures: let the bulky wain
Through dusty roads run nodding; or the bark,
That silently adown the cerule stream
Glides with white sails, dispense the downy freight
To copy villages on either side,
And spiry towns, where ready diligence,
The grateful burden to receive, awaits,
Like strong Briareus, with his hundred hands.

In the same fleece diversity of wool
Grows intermingled, and excites the care
Of curious skill to sort the several kinds.
But in this subtle science none exceed
Th' industrious Belgians, to the work who guide
Each feeble hand of want: their spacious domes
With boundless hospitality receive
Each nation's outcasts: there the tender eye
May view the maim'd, the blind, the lame, em-
ploy'd,

And unrejected age; ev'n childhood there
Its little fingers turning to the toil
Delighted: nimbly, with habitual speed,
They sever lock from lock, and long, and short,
And soft, and rigid, pile in several heaps.
This the dusk hatter asks; another shines,
Tempting the clothier; that the hosier seeks;
The long bright lock is apt for airy stuffs;
But often it deceives the artist's care,
Breaking useless in the steely comb:
For this long spungy wool no more increase
Receives, while winter petrifies the fields:
The growth of autumn stops: and what though spring

Succeeds with rosy finger, and spins on
The texture? yet in vain she strives to link
The silver twine to that of autumn's hand.
Be then the swain advis'd to shield his flocks
From winter's deadening frosts and whelming
Let the loud tempest rattle on the roof, [snows:
While they, secure within, warm cribs enjoy,
And swell their fleeces, equal to the worth
Of cloth'd Apulian*, by soft warmth improv'd:
Or let them inward heat and vigour find,
By food of cole or turnip, hardy plants.
Besides, the lock of one continued growth
Imbibes a clearer and more equal dye.

But lightest wool is theirs, who poorly toil,
Through a dull round, in unimproving farms
Of common-fields: enclose, enclose, ye swains;

* The shepherds of Apulia, Tarentum, and Attica, used to clothe their sheep with skins, to preserve and improve their fleeces.

Why will you joy in common-field, where pitch,
Noxious to wool, must stain your motley flock;
To mark your property! The mark dilates,
Enters the flake depreciated, defil'd,
Unfit for beauteous tint; besides, in fields
Promiscuous held, all culture languishes;
The globe, exhausted, thin supply receives;
Dull waters rest upon the rushy flats
And barren furrows: none the rising grove
Their plants for late posterity, nor hedge
To shield the flock, nor copse for cheering fire;
And, in the distant village, every hearth
Devours the grassy sward, the verdant food
Of injur'd herds and flocks, or what the plough
Should turn and moulder for the bearded grain;
Pernicious habit, drawing gradual on Increasing beggary, and nature's frowns.
Add too, the idle pilferer easier there
Eludes detection, when a lamb or ewe
From intermingled flocks he steals; or when,
With loosen'd tether of his horse or cow,
The milky stalk of the tall green ear'd corn,
The year's slow-ripening fruit, the anxious hope
Of his laborious neighbour, he destroys.

There are, who over-rate our spungy stores,
Who deem that nature grants no clime, but ours,
To spread upon its fields the dews of heaven,
And feed the silky fleece; that card, nor comb,
The hairy wool of Gaul can e'er subdue,
To form the thread, and mingle in the loom,
Unless a third from Britain swell the heap.
Illusion all; though of our sun and air
Not trivial is the virtue: nor their fruit,
Upon our snowy flocks, of small esteem:
The grain of brightest tincture none so well
Imbibes: the wealthy Gobelins must to this
Bear witness, and the costliest of their looms.

And though, with hue of crocus or of rose,
No power of subtle food, or air, or soil,
Can dye the living fleece; yet 'twill avail
To note their influence in the tinging vase,
Therefore from herbage of old-pastur'd plains,
Chief from the matted turf of azure marl,
Where grow the whitest locks, collect thy stores.
Those fields regard not, through whose recent turf
The miry soil appears: not ev'n the streams
Of Yare, or silver Stroud, can purify [winds,
Their frequent fully'd fleece; nor what rough
Keen-biting on tempestuous hills, inbrown.

Yet much may be perform'd, to check the force
Of nature's rigour: the high heath, by trees
Warm shelter'd, may despise the rage of storms:
Moors, bogs, and weeping fens, may learn to smile,
And leave in dykes their soon-forgotten tears.
Labour and art will every aim achieve
Of noble bosoms. Bedford Level*, erst
A dreary pathless waste, the coughing flock
Was wont with hairy fleeces to deform;
And, smiling with her lure of summer flowers,
The heavy ox, vain-struggling, to ingulf;
Till one, of that high-honour'd patriot name,
Russel, arose, who drain'd the rushy fen, [bloom,
Confin'd the waves, bade groves and gardens
And through his new creation led the Ouze,
And gentle Camus, silver-winding streams;

* In Cambridgehire.

Godlike beneficence; from chaos drear
To raise the garden and the shady grove!
But see Ierne's moors and hideous bogs,
Immeasurable tract. The traveller
Slow tries his mazy step on th' yielding tuft,
Shuddering with fear: ev'n such perfidious wilds,
By labour won, have yielded to the comb,
The fairest length of wool. See deeping fens,
And the long lawns of Bourn. 'Tis art and toil
Gives nature value, multiplies her stores,
Varies, improves, creates: 'tis art and toil
Teaches her woody hills with fruits to shine,
The pear and tasteful apple; decks with flowers
And foodful pulse the fields, that often rise,
Admiring to behold their furrows wave
With yellow corn. What changes cannot toil
With patient art, effect? There was a time,
When other regions were the swains delight,
And shepherdless Britannia's rushy vales,
Inglorious, neither trade nor labour knew,
But of rude baskets, homely rustic geer,
Woven of the flexile willow; till, at length,
The plains of Sarum open'd to the hand
Of patient culture, and, o'er sinking woods,
High Cotswold show'd her summits. Urchinfield,
And Lemster's crofts, beneath the pheasant's brake,
Long lay unnotted. Toil new pasture gives;
And, in the regions oft of active Gaul,
O'er lessening vineyards spreads the growing turf.
In eldest times, when kings and hardy chiefs
In bleeting sheepfolds met, for purest wool
Phœnicia's hilly tracts were most renown'd;
And fertile Syria's and Judæa's land,
Hermon, and Seir, and Hebron's brooky fides!
Twice with the murex' crimson hue they ting'd
The shining fleeces: hence their gorgeous wealth;
And hence arose the walls of ancient Tyre.
Next busy Colchis, bless'd with frequent rains,
And lively verdure (who the lucid stream
Of Phasis boasted, and a portly race
Of fair inhabitants) improv'd the fleece;
When, o'er the deep by flying Phryxus brought,
The fam'd Thessalian ram enrich'd her plains.
This, rising Greece with indignation view'd,
And youthful Jason an attempt conceiv'd
Lofty and bold: along Peneus' banks,
Around Olympus' brows, the muses' haunts,
He rous'd the brave, to re-demand the fleece.
Attend, ye British swains, the ancient song.
From every region of Ægea's shore
The brave assembled; those illustrious twins,
Castor and Pollux; Orpheus, tuneful bard;
Zetes and Calais, as the wind in speed;
Strong Hercules, and many a chief renown'd.
On deep Iolcos' sandy shore they throng'd,
Gleaming in armour, ardent of exploits;
And soon, the laurel cord, and the huge stone
Up-lifting to the deck unmoor'd the bark;
Whose keel, of wond'rous length, the skilful hand
Of Argus fashion'd for the proud attempt;
And in th' extended keel a lofty mast
Up-rais'd, and sails full-swelling; to the chiefs
Unwonted objects: now first, now they learn'd
Their bolder steerage over ocean wave,
Led by the golden stars, as Chiron's art
Had mark'd the sphere celestial. Wide abroad

Expands the purple deep: the cloudy isles,
Scyros and Scopelos, and Icos, rise,
And Halonesos: soon huge Lemnos heaves
Her azure head above the level brine,
Shakes off her mists, and brightens all her cliffs:
While they, her flattering creeks and opening
Cautious approaching, in Myrina's port [bowers
Cast out the cabled stone upon the strand.
Next to the Mysian shore they shape their course,
But with too eager haste: in the white foam
His oar Alcides breaks; howe'er, not long
The chance detains; he springs upon the shore,
And, rising from the root, a tapering pine,
Renews his stroke. Between the threat'ning
Of Hellepont they ply the rugged surge, [towers
To Hero's and Leander's ardent love
Fatal; then smooth Propontis' widening wave,
That like a glassy lake expands, with hills,
Hills above hills, and gloomy woods, begirt.
And now the Thracian Bosphorus they dare,
Till the Symplegades, tremendous rocks,
Threaten approach; but they, unterrify'd,
Through the sharp-pointed cliffs and thundering floods
Cleave their bold passage: nathless by the craggs
And torrents sorely shatter'd: as the strong
Eagle or vulture, in th' entangling net [behind.
Involv'd, breaks through, yet leaves his plumes
Thus, through the wide waves, their flow way
they force,
To Thynia's hospitable isle. The brave
Pass many perils, and to fame by such Experience rise. Refresh'd, again they speed
From cape to cape, and view unnumber'd streams,
Halys, with hoary Lycus, and the mouths
Of Asparus and Glaucus, rolling swift
To the broad deep their tributary waves;
Till in the long-sought harbour they arrive
Of golden Phasis. Foremost on the strand
Jason advanc'd: the deep capacious bay,
The crumbling terrace of the marble port,
Wondering he view'd, and stately palace-domes,
Pavilions proud of luxury; around,
In every glittering hall, within, without,
O'er all the timbrel-sounding squares and streets,
Nothing appear'd but luxury, and crowds
Sunk deep in riot. To the public weal
Attentive none he found: for he, their chief
Of shepherds, proud Aëtes, by the name
Sometimes of king distinguish'd, 'gan to slight
The shepherd's trade, and turn to song and dance:
Ev'n Hydrus ceas'd to watch; Medea's songs
Of joy, and rosy youth, and beauty's charms,
With magic sweetness lull'd his cares asleep,
Till the bold heroes grasp'd the golden fleece.
Nimbly they wing'd the bark, surrounded soon
By Neptune's friendly waves: secure they speed
O'er the known seas, by every guiding cape,
With prosperous return. The myrtle shores,
And glassy mirror of Iolcos' lake,
With loud acclaim receiv'd them. Every vale,
And every hillock, touch'd the tuneful stops
Of pipes unnumber'd, for the ram regain'd.

Thus Phasis lost his pride: his slighted nymphs
Along the withering dales and pastures mourn'd;
The trade-ship left his streams; the merchant
His desert borders; each ingenious art, [shunn'd.

Trade, liberty, and affluence, all retir'd,
And left to want and servitude their seats:
Vile successors! and gloomy ignorance
Following like dreary night, whose sable hand
Hangs on the purple skirts of flying day.

Sithence the fleeces of Arcadian plains,
And Attic, and Thessalian, bore esteem;
And those in Grecian colonies dispers'd,
Caria and Doris, and Ionia's coast,
And fam'd Tarentum, where Galesus' tide,
Rolling by ruins hoar of ancient towns,
Through solitary vallies seeks the sea.
Or green Altinum, by an hundred Alps [aloft
High-crown'd, whose woods and snowy peaks
Shield her low plains from the rough northern
Those too of Boetica's delicious fields, [blast.
With golden fruitage blest'd of highest taste,
What need I name? The Turdetanian tract,
Or rich Coraxus, whose wide looms unroll'd
The finest webs? where scarce a talent weigh'd
A ram's equivalent. Then only tin
To late improv'd Britannia gave renown.

Low the revolving course of mighty time,
Who loftiness abases, tumbles down
Olympus' brow, and lifts the lowly vale.
Where is the majesty of ancient Rome,
The throng of heroes in her splendid streets,
The snowy vest of peace, or purple robe,
Slow trail'd triumphal? Where the Attic fleece,
And Tarentine, in warmest litter'd cotes,
Or sunny meadows cloth'd with costly care?
All in the solitude of ruin lost,
War's horrid carnage, vain ambition's dust.

Long lay the mournful realms of elder fame
In gloomy desolation, till appear'd
Beauteous Venetia, first of all the nymphs,
Who from the melancholy waste emerg'd:
In Adria's gulf her clotted locks she lav'd,
And rose another Venus: each soft joy,
Each aid of life, her busy wit restor'd;
Science reviv'd, with all the lovely arts,
And all the graces. Restituted trade
To every virtue lent his helping stores,
And cheer'd the vales around; again the pipe,
And bleating flocks, awak'd the cheerful lawn.

The glossy fleeces now of prime esteem
Soft Asia boasts, where lovely Cassimere,
Within a lofty mound of circling hills, [lakes,
Spreads her delicious stores; woods, rocks, caves,
Hills, lawns, and winding streams; a region term'd
The paradise of Indus. Next, the plains
Of Labor, by that arbor stretch'd immense,
Through many a realm, to Agra, the proud throne
Of India's worshipp'd prince, whose lust is law:
Remote dominions; nor to ancient fame,
Nor modern known, till public-hearted Roe,
Faithful, sagacious, active, patient, brave,
Led to their distant climes adventurous trade,

Add too the filky wool of Libyan lands,
Of Caza's bowery dales, and brooky Caus,
Where lofty Atlas spreads his verdant feet,
While in the clouds his hoary shoulders bend.

Next proud Iberia glories in the growth
Of high Castile, and mild Segovian glades.

And beauteous Albion, since great Edgar chas'd
The prowling wolf, with many a lock appears
Of filky lustre; chief, Siluria, thine;

Thine, Vaga, favour'd stream; from sheep minute
On Cambria bred: a pound o'erweighs a fleece.
Gay Epfom's too, and Banstead's, and what gleams
On Vecta's isle, that shelters Albion's fleet,
With all its thunders: or Salopian stores,
Those which are gather'd in the fields of Clun:
High Cotswold also 'mong the shepherd swains
Is oft remember'd, though the greedy plough
Preys on its carpet: He*, whose rustic muse,
O'er heath and craggyholt her wing display'd,
And sung the bosky bourns of Alfred's shires,
Has favour'd Cotswold with luxuriant praise.
Need we the levels green of Lincoln note,
Or rich Leicestra's marly plains, for length
Of whitest locks and magnitude of fleece
Peculiar; envy of the neighbouring realms?
But why recount our grassy lawns alone,
While ev'n the tillage of our cultur'd plains,
With bosy turnip, and luxuriant cole,
Learns thro' the circling year their flocks to feed.

Ingenious trade! to clothe the naked world,
Her soft materials, not from sheeep alone,
From various animals, reeds, trees, and stones,
Collects sagacious: in Eubœa's isle
A wondrous rock† is found, of which are woven
Vests incombustible: Batavia, flax;
Siam's warm marsh yields the fissile cane;
Soft Persia, silk; Balasor's shady hills
Tough bark of trees; Peruvian Pito, grass;
And every sultry clime the snowy down
Of cotton, bursting from its stubborn shell
To gleam amid the verdure of the grove.
With glossy hair of Tibet's shaggy goat
Are light tiaras woven, that wreath the head,
And airy float behind: the beaver's flix
Gives kindest warmth to weak enervate limbs,
When the pale blood flow rises through the veins.
Still shall o'er all prevail the shepherd's stores,
For numerous uses known: none yield such
warmth,

Such beauteous hues receive, so long endure:
So pliant to the loom, so various, none. [bear,
Wild rove the flocks, no burdening fleece they
In fervid climes: nature gives nought in vain.
Carmenian wool on the broad tail alone
Resplendent swells, enormous in its growth:
As the sleek ram from green to green removes,
On aiding wheels his heavy pride he draws,
And glad resigns it for the hatter's use.

Ev'n in the new Columbian world appears
The woolly covering: Apacheria's‡ glades,
And Canfes'‡, echo to the pipes and flocks [sands,
Of foreign swains. While time shakes down his
And works continual change, be none secure:
Quicken your labours, brace your slackening
nerves,

Ye Britons; nor sleep careless on the lap
Of bounteous nature; she is elsewhere kind.
See Mississippi lengthen on her lawns,
Propitious to the shepherds: see the sheep ||
Of fertile Arica §, like camels form'd;

* Drayton. † The Asbestos.

‡ Provinces in Louisiana, on the western side of the Mississippi.

|| These sheep are called Guanapos.

§ A province of Peru.

Which bear huge burdens to the sea-beat shore,
And shine with fleeces soft as feathery down.

Coarse Bothnic locks are not devoid of use;
They clothe the mountain carl, or mariner
Labouring at the wet shrouds, or stubborn helm,
While the loud billows dash the groaning deck.
All may not Stroud's or Taunton's vestures wear;
Nor what, from fleece Rataean*, mimic flowers
Of rich Damascus: many a texture bright
Of that material in prætorium† woven,
Or in Norvicum, cheats the curious eye.

If any wool peculiar to our isle
Is given by nature, 'tis the comber's lock,
The soft, the snow-white, and the long-grown
Hither be turn'd the public's wakeful eye, [flake.
This golden fleece to guard, with strictest watch,
From the dark hand of pilfering avarice,
Who, like a spectre, haunts the midnight hour,
When nature wide around him lies supine
And silent, in the tangles soft involv'd
Of death-like sleep: he then the moment marks,
While the pale moon illumines the trembling tide,
Speedy to lift the canvas, bend the oar,
And waft his thefts to the perfidious foe.

Happy the patriot, who can teach the means
To check his frauds, and yet untroubled leave
Trade's open channels. Would a generous aid
To honest toil, in Cambria's hilly tracts,
Or where the Lune‡ or Coker§ wind their streams,
Be found sufficient? far, their airy fields,
Far from infectious luxury arise.
O might their mazy dales, and mountain fides
With copious fleeces of Ierne shine,
And gulfy Caledonia, wisely bent
On wealthy fisheries and flaxen webs;
Then would the sister realms, amid their seas,
Like the three graces in harmonious fold,
By mutual aid enhance their various charms,
And blest remotest climes---to this lov'd end,
Awake, benevolence; to this lov'd end,
Strain all thy nerves, and every thought explore.
Far, far away, whose passions would immure,
In your own little hearts, the joys of life;
(Ye worms of pride) for your repast alone,
Who claim all nature's stores, woods, waters, meads,
All her profusion; whose vile hands would grasp
The peasant's scantling, the weak widow's mite,
And in the sepulchre of self entomb
Whate'er ye can, whate'er ye cannot use.
Know, for superior ends th' Almighty power
(The power, whose tender arms embrace the worm)
Breathes o'er the foodful earth the breath of life,
And forms us manifold; allots to each
His fair peculiar; wisdom, wit, and strength;
Wisdom, and wit, and strength, in sweet accord,
To aid, to cheer, to counsel, to protect,
And twist the mighty bond. Thus feeble man,
With man united, is a nation strong;
Builds tow'ry cities, satiates every want,
And makes the seas profound, and forests wild,
The gardens of his joys. Man, each man's born

§ A river in Lancashire.

Their occupations with an honest heart,
And cheerful diligence: like the useful bee,
To gather for the hive not sweets alone,
But wax, and each material; pleas'd to find
Whate'er may sooth distress, and raise the fall'n,
In life's rough race: O be it as my wish!
'Tis mine to teach th' inactive hand to reap
Kind nature's bounties, o'er the globe diffus'd.

For this, I wake the weary hours of rest;
With this desire, the merchant I attend;
By this impell'd, the shepherd's hut I seek,
And, as he tends his flock, his lectures hear
Attentive, pleas'd with pure simplicity,
And rules divulg'd beneficent to sheep:
Or turn the compass o'er the painted chart,
To mark the ways of traffic; Volga's stream,
Cold Hudson's cloudy streights, warm Afric's cape,
Latium's firm roads, the Ptolemean fosse,
And China's long canals; those noble works,
Those high effects of civilizing trade,
Employ me, sedulous of public weal:
Yet not unmindful of my sacred charge;
But also mindful, thus devising good,
At vacant seasons, oft; when evening mild
Purples the vallies, and the shepherd counts
His flocks, returning to the quiet fold,
With dumb complacency: for religion, this,
To give our every comfort to distress,
And follow virtue with an humble mind;
This pure religion. Thus, in elder time,
The reverend Blasius wore his leisure hours,
And slumbers, broken oft: till, fill'd at length
With inspiration, after various thought,
And trials manifold, his well-known voice
Gather'd the poor, and o'er Vulcanian stoves,
With tepid lees of oil, and spiky comb,
Show'd how the fleece might stretch to greater length.

And cast a glossier whiteness. Wheels went around;
Matrons and maids with songs reliev'd their toils;
And every loom receiv'd the softer yarn.
What poor, what widow, Blasius, did not bless
Thy teaching hand? Thy bosom, like the morn,
Opening its wealth? What nation did not seek,
Of thy new model'd wool, the curious webs!

Hence the glad cities of the loom his name
Honour with yearly festivals: through their streets
The pomp, with tuneful sounds, and order just,
Denoting labour's happy progress, moves,
Procession slow and solemn: first the rout;
Then servient youth, and magisterial eld;
Each after each, according to his rank,
His sway, and office, in the common weal;
And to the board of smiling plenty's stores
Assemble; where delicious cates and fruits
Of every clime are pil'd; with free hand,
Toil only tastes the feasts, by nerveless ease
Unreliev'd. Various mirth and song resound;
And oft they interpose improving talk,
Divulging each to other knowledge rare,
Sparks, from experience, that sometimes arise;
Till night weighs down the sense, or morning's dawn
Rouses to labour, man to labour born. [hand,
Then the sleek brightening lock, from hand to
Renews its circling course: this feels the card;
That, in the comb, admires its growing length;
This, blanch'd, emerges from the oily wave;

Trade, liberty, and affluence, all retir'd,
And left to want and servitude their seats:
Vile successors! and gloomy ignorance
Following like dreary night, whose sable hand
Hangs on the purple skirts of flying day.

Sithence the fleeces of Arcadian plains,
And Attic, and Thessalian, bore esteem;
And those in Grecian colonies dispers'd,
Caria and Doris, and Ionia's coast,
And fam'd Tarentum, where Galeus' tide,
Rolling by ruins hoar of ancient towns,
Through solitary vallies seeks the sea.

Or green Altinum, by an hundred Alps [aloft
High-crown'd, whose woods and snowy peaks
Shield her low plains from the rough northern
Those too of Bœtica's delicious fields, [blast.
With golden fruitage blest'd of highest taste,
What need I name? The Turdetanian tract,
Or rich Coraxus, whose wide looms unroll'd
The finest webs? where scarce a talent weigh'd
A ram's equivalent. Then only tin
To late improv'd Britannia gave renown.

Low the revolving course of mighty time,
Who loftiness abases, tumbles down
Olympus' brow, and lifts the lowly vale.
Where is the majesty of ancient Rome,
The throng of heroes in her splendid streets,
The snowy vest of peace, or purple robe,
Slow trail'd triumphal? Where the Attic fleece,
And Tarentine, in warmest litter'd cotes,
Or sunny meadows cloth'd with costly care?
All in the solitude of ruin lost,
War's horrid carnage, vain ambition's dust.

Long lay the mournful realms of elder fame
In gloomy desolation, till appear'd
Beauteous Venetia, first of all the nymphs,
Who from the melancholy waste emerg'd:
In Adria's gulf her clotted locks she lav'd,
And rose another Venus: each soft joy,
Each aid of life, her busy wit restor'd;
Science reviv'd, with all the lovely arts,
And all the graces. Restituted trade
To every virtue lent his helping stores,
And cheer'd the vales around; again the pipe,
And bleating flocks, awak'd the cheerful lawn.

The glossy fleeces now of prime esteem
Soft Asia boasts, where lovely Cassimere,
Within a lofty mound of circling hills, [lakes,
Spreads her delicious stores; woods, rocks, caves,
Hills, lawns, and winding streams; a region term'd
The paradise of Indus. Next, the plains
Of Lahor, by that arbor stretch'd immense,
Through many a realm, to Agra, the proud throne
Of India's worshipp'd prince, whose lust is law:
Remote dominions; nor to ancient fame,
Nor modern known, till public-hearted Roe,
Faithful, sagacious, active, patient, brave,
Led to their distant climes adventurous trade,

Add too the silky wool of Libyan lands,
Of Caza's bowery dales, and brooky Caus,
Where lofty Atlas spreads his verdant feet,
While in the clouds his hoary shoulders bend.

Next proud Iberia glories in the growth
Of high Castile, and mild Segovian glades.

And beauteous Albion, since great Edgar chas'd
The prowling wolf, with many a lock appears
Of silky lustre; chief, Siluria, thine;

Thine, Vaga, favour'd stream; from sheep minute
On Cambria bred: a pound o'erweighs a fleece.
Gay Epsom's too, and Banstead's, and what gleams
On Vecta's isle, that shelters Albion's fleet,
With all its thunders: or Salopian stores,
Those which are gather'd in the fields of Clun:
High Cotswold also 'mong the shepherd swains
Is oft remember'd, though the greedy plough
Preys on its carpet: He*, whose rustic muse,
O'er heath and craggyholt her wing display'd,
And sung the bosky bourns of Alfred's shires,
Has favour'd Cotswold with luxuriant praise.
Need we the levels green of Lincoln note,
Or rich Leicestra's marly plains, for length
Of whitest locks and magnitude of fleece
Peculiar; envy of the neighbouring realms?
But why recount our grassy lawns alone,
While ev'n the tillage of our cultur'd plains,
With bosy turnip, and luxuriant cole,
Learns thro' the circling year their flocks to feed.

Ingenious trade! to clothe the naked world,
Her soft materials, not from sheep alone,
From various animals, reeds, trees, and stones,
Collects sagacious: in Eubœa's isle
A wondrous rock† is found, of which are woven
Vests incombustible: Batavia, flax;
Siam's warm marsh yields the fissile cane;
Soft Persia, silk; Balasor's shady hills
Tough bark of trees; Peruvian Pito, grass;
And every sultry clime the snowy down
Of cotton, bursting from its stubborn shell
To gleam amid the verdure of the grove.
With glossy hair of Tibet's shaggy goat
Are light tiaras woven, that wreath the head,
And airy float behind: the beaver's flix
Gives kindest warmth to weak enervate limbs,
When the pale blood slow rises through the veins.
Still shall o'er all prevail the shepherd's stores,
For numerous uses known: none yield such
warmth,

Such beauteous hues receive, so long endure:
So pliant to the loom, so various, none. [bear,
Wild rove the flocks, no burdening fleece they
In fervid climes: nature gives nought in vain.
Carmenian wool on the broad tail alone
Resplendent swells, enormous in its growth:
As the sleek ram from green to green removes,
On aiding wheels his heavy pride he draws,
And glad resigns it for the hatter's use.

Ev'n in the new Columbian world appears
The woolly covering: Apacheria's‡ glades,
And Canes'§, echo to the pipes and flocks [sands,
Of foreign swains. While time shakes down his
And works continual change, be none secure:
Quicken your labours, brace your slackening
nerves,

Ye Britons; nor sleep careless on the lap
Of bounteous nature; she is elsewhere kind.
See Mississippi lengthen on her lawns,
Propitious to the shepherds: see the sheep||
Of fertile Arica§, like camels form'd;

Which bear huge burdens to the sea-beat shore,
And shine with fleeces soft as feathery down.

Coarse Bothnic locks are not devoid of use ;
They clothe the mountain carl, or mariner
Labouring at the wet shrouds, or stubborn helm,
While the loud billows dash the groaning deck.
All may not Stroud's or Taunton's vestures wear ;
Nor what, from fleece Ratæan *, mimic flowers
Of rich Damascus : many a texture bright
Of that material in prætorium † woven,
Or in Norvicum, cheats the curious eye.

If any wool peculiar to our isle
Is given by nature, 'tis the comber's lock,
The soft, the snow-white, and the long-grown
Hither be turn'd the public's wakeful eye, [flake.
This golden fleece to guard, with strictest watch,
From the dark hand of pilfering avarice,
Who, like a spectre, haunts the midnight hour,
When nature wide around him lies supine
And silent, in the tangles soft involv'd
Of death-like sleep : he then the moment marks,
While the pale moon illumines the trembling tide,
Speedy to lift the canvas, bend the oar,
And waft his thefts to the perfidious foe.

Happy the patriot, who can teach the means
To check his frauds, and yet untroubled leave
Trade's open channels. Would a generous aid
To honest toil, in Cambria's hilly tracts,
Or where the Lune ‡ or Coker § wind their streams,
Be found sufficient ? far, their airy fields,
Far from infectious luxury arise.
O might their mazy dales, and mountain sides
With copious fleeces of Ierne shine,
And gulfy Caledonia, wisely bent
On wealthy fisheries and flaxen webs ;
Then would the sister realms, amid their seas,
Like the three graces in harmonious fold,
By mutual aid enhance their various charms,
And bless remotest climes---to this lov'd end,
Awake, benevolence ; to this lov'd end,
Strain all thy nerves, and every thought explore.
Far, far away, whose passions would immure,
In your own little hearts, the joys of life ;
(Ye worms of pride) for your repast alone,
Who claim all nature's stores, woods, waters, meads,
All her profusion ; whose vile hands would grasp
The peasant's scantling, the weak widow's mite,
And in the sepulchre of self entomb
Whate'er ye can, whate'er ye cannot use.
Know, for superior ends th' Almighty power
(The power, whose tender arms embrace the worm)
Breathes o'er the foodful earth the breath of life,
And forms us manifold ; allots to each
His fair peculiar ; wisdom, wit, and strength ;
Wisdom, and wit, and strength, in sweet accord,
To aid, to cheer, to counsel, to protect,
And twist the mighty bond. Thus feeble man,
With man united, is a nation strong ;
Builds tow'ry cities, satiates every want,
And makes the seas profound, and forests wild,
The gardens of his joys. Man, each man's born
For the high business of the public good.

 Where rich Damascus pil'd his fleeces white,
 Prepar'd, and thirsty for the double tint,
 And flowering shuttle. While th' admiring world
 Crowded her streets ; ah ! then the hand of pride
 Sow'd imperceptible his poisonous weed,
 Which crept destructive up her lofty domes,
 As ivy creeps around the graceful trunk
 Of some tall oak. Her lofty domes no more,
 Not ev'n the ruins of her pomp, remain ;
 Not ey'n the dust they sunk in ; by the breath
 Of the Omnipotent offended hurl'd
 Down to the bottom of the stormy deep :
 Only the solitary rock remains,
 Her ancient scite ; a monument to those,
 Who toil and wealth exchange for sloth and pride.

ARGUMENT.

INTRODUCTOIN. Recommendation of labour. The several methods of spinning. Description of the loom, and of weaving. Variety of looms. The fulling-mill described, and the progress of the manufacture. Dying of cloth, and the excellence of the French in that art. Frequent negligence of our artificers. The ill consequences of idleness. Country-workhouses proposed ; with a description of one. Good effects of industry exemplified in the prospect of Burstal and Leeds : and the cloth-market there described. Preference of the labours of the loom to other manufactures, illustrated by some comparisons. History of the art of weaving ; its removal from the Netherlands, and settlement in several parts of England. Censure of those who would reject the persecuted and the stranger. Our trade and prosperity owing to them. Of the manufacture of tapestry, taught us by the Saracens. Tapestries of Bleinheim described. Different arts, procuring wealth to different countries. Numerous inhabitants, and their industry, the surest source of it. Hence a wish, that our country were open to all men. View of the roads and rivers, through which our manufactures are conveyed. Our navigations not far from the seats of our manufactures: other countries less happy. The difficult work of Egypt in joining the Nile to the Red Sea; and of France in attempting, by canals, a communication between the ocean and the Mediterranean. Such junctions may more easily be performed in England, and the Trent and Severn united to the Thames. Description of the Thames, and the port of London.

PROCEED, Arcadian muse; resume the pipe
Of Hermes, long diffus'd, though sweet the tone,
And to the songs of nature's choiristers
Harmonious. Audience pure be thy delight,
Though few: for every note which virtue wounds,
However pleasing to the vulgar herd,
To the purg'd ear is discord. Yet too oft
Has false dissembling vice to amorous airs
The reed apply'd, and heedless youth allur'd:
Too oft, with bolder sound, enflam'd the rage
Of horrid war. Let now the fleecy looms
Direct our rural numbers, as of old,
When plains and sheepfolds were the muses' haunts.

So thou, the friend of every virtuous deed
And aim, though feeble, shalt these rural lays
Approve, O Heathcote, whose benevolence
Visits our vallies; where the pasture spreads,
And where the bramble; and would justly act
True charity, by teaching idle want
And vice the inclination to do good;
Good to themselves, and in themselves to all,
Through grateful toil. Ev'n nature lives by toil:
Beast, bird, air, fire, the heavens, and rolling
All live by action: nothing lies at rest, [worlds,
But death and ruin: man is born to care;
Fashion'd, improv'd, by labour. This of old,
Wise states observing, gave that happy law,
Which doom'd the rich and needy, every rank,
To manual occupation; and oft call'd
Their chestians from the spade, or furrowing plough,
Or bleating sheepfold. Hence utility
Through all conditions; hence the joys of health;
Hence strength of arm, and clear judicious thought;
Hence corn, and wine, and oil, and all in life
Delectable. What simple nature yields
(And nature does her part) are only rude
Materials, cumbrous on the thorny ground;
'Tis toils that make them wealth; that makes the fleece

(Yet useless, rising in unshapen heaps);
Anon, in curious woofs of beauteous hue,
A vesture usefully succinct and warm.
Or trailing in the length of graceful folds,
A royal mantle. Come, ye village nymphs,
The scatter'd mists reveal the dusky hills;
Gray dawn appears; the golden morn ascends,
And paints the glittering rocks, and purple woods,
And flaming spires; arise, begin your toils;
Behold the fleece beneath the spiky comb
Drop its long locks, or, from the mingling card,
Spread in soft flakes, and swell the whiten'd floor.

Come, village nymphs, ye matrons, and ye maids,
Receive the soft material: with light step
Whether ye turn around the spacious wheel,
Or, patient sitting, that revolve, which forms
A narrower circle. On the brittle work

Point your quick eye; and let the hand assist
To guide and stretch the gently lessening thread:
Even, unknotted twine, will praise your skill.
A different spinning every different web
Asks from your glowing fingers: some require
The more compact, and some the looser wreath;
The last for softness, to delight the touch
Of chamber'd delicacy: scarce the cirque
Need turn around, or twine the lengthening flake.

There are, to speed their labour, who prefer
Wheels double-spol'd, which yield to either hand
A several line: and many, yet adhere
To th' ancient distaff, at the bosom fix'd,
Casting the whirling spindle as they walk:
At home, or in the sheepfold, or the mart,
Alike the work proceeds. This method still
Norvicum favours, and th' Icenian* towns:
It yields their airy stuffs an apter thread.
This was of old, in no inglorious days,
The mode of spinning, when th' Egyptian prince
A golden distaff gave that beauteous nymph,
Too-beauteous Helen: no uncourtly gift
Then, when each gay diversion of the fair
Led to ingenious use. But patient art,
That on experience works, from hour to hour,
Sagacious, has a spiral engine† form'd,
Which, on an hundred spoles, an hundred threads,
With one huge wheel, by lapse of water, twines,
Few hands requiring; easy-tended work,
That copiously supplies the greedy loom.

Nor hence, ye nymphs, let anger cloud your
brows:
The more is wrought, the more is still requir'd;
Blithe o'er your toils, with wonted song, proceed:
Fear not surcharge; your hands will ever find
Ample employment. In the strife of trade,
These curious instruments of speed obtain
Various advantage, and the diligent
Supply with exercise, as fountains sure,
Which, ever-gliding, feed the flowery lawn.
Nor, should the careful state, severely kind,
In every province, to the house of toil
Compel the vagrant, and each implement
Of ruder art, the comb, the card, the wheel,
Teach their unwilling hands, nor yet complain.
Yours, with the public good, shall ever rise,
Ever, while o'er the lawns, and airy downs
The bleating sheep and shepherd's pipe are heard;
While in the brook ye blanch the glistening fleece,
And th' amorous youth, delighted with your toils,
Quavers the choicest of his sonnets, warm'd
By growing traffic, friend to wedded love.

Sow'd imperceptible his poisonous weed,
Which crept destructive up her lofty domes,
As ivy creeps around the graceful trunk
Of some tall oak. Her lofty domes no more,
Not ev'n the ruins of her pomp, remain ;
Not ev'n the dust they sunk in ; by the breath
Of the Omnipotent offended hurl'd
Down to the bottom of the stormy deep :
Only the solitary rock remains,
Her ancient scite ; a monument to those,
Who toil and wealth exchange for sloth and pride.

ARGUMENT.

INTRODUCTOIN. Recommendation of labour. The several methods of spinning. Description of the loom, and of weaving. Variety of looms. The fulling-mill described, and the progress of the manufacture. Dying of cloth, and the excellence of the French in that art. Frequent negligence of our artificers. The ill consequences of idleness. Country-workhouses proposed ; with a description of one. Good effects of industry exemplified in the prospect of Burstal and Leeds : and the cloth-market there described. Preference of the labours of the loom to other manufactures, illustrated by some comparisons. History of the art of weaving ; its removal from the Netherlands, and settlement in several parts of England. Censure of those who would reject the persecuted and the stranger. Our trade and prosperity owing to them. Of the manufacture of tapestry, taught us by the Saracens. Tapestries of Bleinheim described. Different arts, procuring wealth to different countries. Numerous inhabitants, and their industry, the surest source of it. Hence a wish, that our country were open to all men. View of the roads and rivers, through which our manufactures are conveyed. Our navigations not far from the seats of our manufactures: other countries less happy. The difficult work of Egypt in joining the Nile to the Red Sea; and of France in attempting, by canals, a communication between the ocean and the Mediterranean. Such junctions may more easily be performed in England, and the Trent and Severn united to the Thames. Description of the Thames, and the port of London.

PROCEED, Arcadian muse; resume the pipe
Of Hermes, long diffus'd, though sweet the tone,
And to the songs of nature's choiristers
Harmonious. Audience pure be thy delight,
Though few: for every note which virtue wounds,
However pleasing to the vulgar herd,
To the purg'd ear is discord. Yet too oft
Has false dissembling vice to amorous airs
The reed apply'd, and heedless youth allur'd:
Too oft, with bolder sound, inflam'd the rage
Of horrid war. Let now the fleecy looms
Direct our rural numbers, as of old,
When plains and sheepfolds were the muses' haunts.

So thou, the friend of every virtuous deed
And aim, though feeble, shalt these rural lays
Approve, O Heathcote, whose benevolence
Visits our vallies; where the pasture spreads,
And where the bramble; and would justly act
True charity, by teaching idle want
And vice the inclination to do good;
Good to themselves, and in themselves to all,
Through grateful toil. Ev'n nature lives by toil:
Beast, bird, air, fire, the heavens, and rolling
All live by action: nothing lies at rest, [worlds,
But death and ruin: man is born to care;
Fashion'd, improv'd, by labour. This of old,
Wise states observing, gave that happy law,
Which doom'd the rich and needy, every rank,
To manual occupation; and oft call'd
Their chestians from the spade, or furrowing plough,
Or bleating sheepfold. Hence utility
Through all conditions; hence the joys of health;
Hence strength of arm, and clear judicious thought;
Hence corn, and wine, and oil, and all in life
Delectable. What simple nature yields
(And nature does her part) are only rude
Materials, cumbrous on the thorny ground;
'Tis toils that make them wealth; that makes
the fleece

(Yet useless, rising in unshapen heaps);
Anon, in curious woofs of beauteous hue,
A vesture usefully succinct and warm,
Or trailing in the length of graceful folds,
A royal mantle. Come, ye village nymphs,
The scatter'd mists reveal the dusky hills;
Gray dawn appears; the golden morn ascends,
And paints the glittering rocks, and purple woods,
And flaming spires; arise, begin your toils;
Behold the fleece beneath the spiky comb
Drop its long locks, or, from the mingling card,
Spread in soft flakes, and swell the whiten'd floor.

Come, village nymphs, ye matrons, and ye maids,
Receive the soft material: with light step
Whether ye turn around the spacious wheel,
Or, patient sitting, that revolve, which forms
A narrower circle. On the brittle work

Point your quick eye; and let the hand assist
To guide and stretch the gently lessening thread:
Even, unknotted twine, will praise your skill.
A different spinning every different web
Asks from your glowing fingers: some require
The more compact, and some the looser wreath;
The last for softness, to delight the touch
Of chamber'd delicacy: scarce the cirque
Need turn around, or twine the lengthening flake.

There are, to speed their labour, who prefer
Wheels double-spol'd, which yield to either hand
A several line: and many, yet adhere
To th' ancient distaff, at the bosom fix'd,
Casting the whirling spindle as they walk:
At home, or in the sheepfold, or the mart,
Alike the work proceeds. This method still
Norvicum favours, and th' Icenian * towns:
It yields their airy stuffs an apter thread.
This was of old, in no inglorious days,
The mode of spinning, when th' Egyptian prince
A golden distaff gave that beauteous nymph,
Too-beauteous Helen: no uncourtly gift
Then, when each gay diversion of the fair
Led to ingenious use. But patient art,
That on experience works, from hour to hour,
Sagacious, has a spiral engine † form'd,
Which, on an hundred spoles, an hundred threads,
With one huge wheel, by lapse of water, twines,
Few hands requiring; easy-tended work,
That copiously supplies the greedy loom.

Nor hence, ye nymphs, let anger cloud your
brows:
The more is wrought, the more is still requir'd;
Blithe o'er your toils, with wonted song, proceed:
Fear not surcharge; your hands will ever find
Ample employment. In the strife of trade,
These curious instruments of speed obtain
Various advantage, and the diligent
Supply with exercise, as fountains sure,
Which, ever-gliding, feed the flowery lawn.
Nor should the careful state, severely kind,
In every province, to the house of toil
Compel the vagrant, and each implement
Of ruder art, the comb, the card, the wheel,
Teach their unwilling hands, nor yet complain.
Yours, with the public good, shall ever rise,
Ever, while o'er the lawns, and airy downs
The bleating sheep and shepherd's pipe are heard;
While in the brook ye blanch the glistening fleece,
And th' amorous youth, delighted with your toils,
Quavers the choicest of his sonnets, warm'd
By growing traffic, friend to wedded love.

The amorous youth, with various hopes inflam'd,

* The Icenii were the inhabitants of Suffolk.

† Paul's engine for cotton and fine wool.

Now on the busy stage see him step forth,
 With beating breast: high-honour'd he beholds
 Rich industry. First, he bespeaks a loom:
 From some thick wood the carpenter selects
 A slender oak, or beech of glossy trunk,
 Or saplin ash: he shapes the sturdy beam,
 The posts, and treadles; and the frame combines.
 The smith, with iron-screws, and plated hoops,
 Confirms the strong machine, and gives the bolt
 That strains the roll. To these the turner's lathe,
 And graver's knife, the hollow shuttle add.
 Various professions in the work unite:
 For each on each depends. Thus he acquires
 The curious engine, work of subtle skill;
 Howe'er, in vulgar use around the globe
 Frequent observ'd, of high antiquity
 No doubtful mark: th' adventurous voyager,
 Toss'd over ocean to remotest shores,
 Hears on remotest shores the murmuring loom;
 Sees the deep-furrowing plough, and harrow'd
 field,

The wheel-mov'd waggon, and the discipline
 Of strong-yok'd steers. What needful art is new?

Next, the industrious youth employs his care
 To store soft yarn; and now he strains the warp
 Along the garden-walk, or highway-side,
 Smoothing each thread; now fits it to the loom,
 And sits before the work: from hand to hand
 The thready shuttles glides along the lines,
 Which open to the woof, and shut altern:
 And ever and anon, to firm the work,
 Against the web is driven the noisy frame,
 That o'er the level rushes, like a surge,
 Which, often dashing on the sandy beach,
 Compacts the traveller's road: from hand to hand
 Again, across the lines oft opening, glides
 The thready shuttle, while the web apace
 Encreases, as the light of eastern skies,
 Spread by the rosy fingers of the morn;
 And all the fair expanse with beauty glows.

Or, if the broader mantle be the task,
 He chooses some companion to his toil.
 From side to side, with amicable aim,
 Each to the other darts the nimble bolt,
 While friendly converse, prompted by the work,
 Kindles improvement in the opening mind.

What need we name the several kinds of looms?
 Those delicate, to whose fair-colour'd threads
 Hang figur'd weights, whose various numbers guide

The artist's hand: he, unseen, flowers, and trees,
 And vales, and azure hills, unerring works.
 Or that, whose numerous needles, glittering bright,
 Weave the warm hose to cover tender limbs:
 Modern invention: modern is the want.

Next, from the slacken'd beam the woof un-
 roll'd,
 Near some clear-sliding river, Aire or Stroud,
 Is by the noisy fulling-mill receiv'd;
 Where tumbling waters turn enormous wheels,
 And hammers, rising and descending, learn
 To imitate the industry of man.

Oft the wet web is steep'd, and often rais'd,
 Fast-dripping, to the river's grassy bank;
 And sinewy arms of men, with full-strain'd strength,
 Wring out the latent water: then, uphung
 On rugged tenters, to the fervid sun

Its level surface, reeking, it expands;
 Still brightening in each rigid discipline,
 And gathering worth; as human life, in pains,
 Conflicts, and troubles. Soon the clothier's shears,
 And burler's thistle, skim the surface sheen.
 The round of work goes on, from day to day,
 Season to season. So the husbandman
 Pursues his cares; his plough divides the glebe;
 The seed is sown; rough rattle o'er the clods
 The harrow's teeth; quick weeds his hoe subdues;
 The sickle labours, and the slow team strains;
 Till grateful harvest-home rewards his toils.

Th' ingenious artist, learn'd in drugs, bestows
 The last improvement; for th' unlabour'd fleece
 Rare is permitted to imbibe the dye.

In penetrating waves of boiling vats
 The snowy web is steep'd, with grain of weld,
 Fustic, or logwood, mix'd, or cochineal,
 Or the dark purple pulp of Pictish woad,
 Of stain tenacious, deep as summer skies,
 Like those that canopy the bowers of Stowe
 After soft rains, when birds their notes attune,
 Ere the melodious nightingale begins.

From yon broad vase behold the saffron woofs
 Beauteous emerge; from these the azure rise;
 This glows with crimson; that the auburn holds;
 These shall the prince with purple robes adorn;
 And those the warrior mark, and those the priest.

Few are the primal colours of the art;
 Five only; black, and yellow, blue, brown, red;
 Yet hence innumerable hues arise.

That stain alone is good, which bears unchang'd
 Dissolving water's, and calcining sun's,
 And thieving air's attacks. How great the need,
 With utmost caution to prepare the woof,
 To seek the best-adapted dyes, and salts,
 And purest gums! since your whole skill consists
 In opening well the fibres of the woof,
 For the reception of the beauteous dye,
 And wedging every grain in every pore,
 Firm as a diamond in rich gold enchas'd.

But what the powers, which lock them in the web;

Whether incrusting salts, or weight of air,
 Or fountain-water's cold contracting wave,
 Or all combin'd, it well befits to know.
 Ah! wherefore have we lost our old repute?
 And who inquires the cause, why Gallia's sons
 In depth and brilliancy of hues excel?

Yet yield not Britons; grasp in every art
 The foremost name. Let others tamely view,
 On crowded Smyrna's and Byzantium's stand,
 The haughty Turk despise their proffer'd bales.

Now see, o'er vales, and peopled mountain-tops,
 The welcome traders, gathering every web;
 Industrious, every web too few. Alas!
 Successful oft their industry, when cease
 The loom and shuttle in the troubled streets;
 Their motion stopt by wild intemperance,
 Toil's scoffing foe, who lures the giddy rout
 To scorn their task-work, and to vagrant life
 Turns their rude steps; while misery, among
 The cries of infants, haunts their mouldering huts.

O when, through every province, shall be rais'd
 Houses of labour, seats of kind constraint,
 For those, who now delight in fruitless sports,
 More than in cheerful works of virtuous trade,

Which honest wealth would yield, and portion due
Of public welfare? Ho, ye poor, who seek,
Among the dwellings of the diligent,
For sustenance unearn'd: who stroll abroad
From house to house, with mischievous intent,
Feigning misfortune: Ho, ye lame, ye blind;
Ye languid limbs, with real want oppress'd,
Who tread the rough highways, and mountains
wild,

Through storms, and rains, and bitterness of heart;
Ye children of affliction, be compell'd
To happiness: the long-wish'd day-light dawns,
When charitable rigour shall detain [trade,
Your step-bruis'd feet. Ev'n now the sons of Where'er their cultivated hamlets smile,
Erect the mansion*: here soft fleeces shine;
The card awaits you, and the comb, and wheel:
Here shroud you from the thunder of the storm;
No rain shall wet your pillow: here abounds
Pure beverage; here your viands are prepar'd;
To heal each sickness the physician waits,
And priest entreats to give your maker praise.

Behold, in Calder's† vale, where wide around
Unnumber'd villas creep the shrubby hills,
A spacious dome for this fair purpose rise.
High o'er the open gates, with gracious air,
Eliza's image stands. By gentle steps
Up-rais'd, from room to room we slowly walk,
And view with wonder, and with silent joy,
The sprightly scene; where many a busy hand,
Where spoles, cards, wheels, and looms with motion quick,

And ever-murmuring sound, th' unwonted sense
Wrap in surprise. To see them all employ'd,
All blithe, it gives the spreading heart delight,
As neither meats, nor drinks, nor aught of joy
Corporeal, can bestow. Nor less they gain
Virtue than wealth, while, on their useful works
From day to day intent, in their full minds
Evil no place can find. With equal scale
Some deal abroad the well-assorted fleece;
These card the short, those comb the longer flake;
Others the harsh and clotted lock receive,
Yet sever and refine with patient toil,
And bring to proper use. Flax too, and hemp,
Excite their diligence. The younger hands
Ply at the easy work of winding yarn
On swiftly-circling engines, and their notes
Warble together, as a choir of larks;
Such joy arises in the mind employ'd.
Another scene displays the more robust,
Rasping or grinding tough Brazilian woods,
And what Campeachy's disputable shore
Copious affords to tinge the thirsty web;
And the Caribbee isles, whose dulcet canes
Equal the honeycomb. We next are shown
A circular machine‡, of new design,
In conic shape: it draws and spins a thread
Without the tedious toil of needful hands.

* This alludes to the workhouses at Bristol, Birmingham, &c.

† A river in Yorkshire, which runs below Halifax, and passes by Wakefield.

‡ A most curious machine, invented by Mr. Paul. It is at present contrived to spin cotton; but it may be made to spin fine carded wool.

A wheel invisible, beneath the floor,
To every member of th' harmonious frame
Gives necessary motion. One, intent,
O'erlooks the work: the carded wool, he says,
Is smoothly lapp'd around those cylinders,
Which, gently turning, yield it to yon cirque
Of upright spindles, which, with rapid whirl,
Spin out, in long extent, an even twine.

From this delightful mansion (if we seek
Still more to view the gifts which honest toil
Distributes) take we now our eastward course,
To the rich fields of Burstal. Wide around
Hillock and valley, farm and village, smile:
And ruddy roofs, and chimney-tops appear,
Of busy Leeds, up-wafting to the clouds
The incense of thanksgiving: all is joy;
And trade and business guide the living scene,
Roll the full cars, adown the winding Aire
Load the slow-sailing barges, pile the pack
On the low tinkling train of slow-pac'd steeds.
As when a sunny day invites abroad
The sedulous ants, they issue from their cells
In bands unnumber'd, eager for their work;
O'er high, o'er low, they lift, they draw, they haste

With warm affection to each other's aid;
Repeat their virtuous efforts, and succeed.
Thus all is here in motion, all is life:
The creaking wain brings copious store of corn:
The grazier's sleeky kine obstruct the roads:
The neat-dress'd housewives, for the festal board
Crown'd with full baskets, in the field-way paths
Come tripping on; the echoing hills repeat
The stroke of ax and hammer; scaffolds rise,
And growing edifices; heaps of stone,
Beneath the chissel, beauteous shapes assume
Of frieze and column. Some, with even line,
New streets are marking in the neighbouring fields,
And sacred domes of worship. Industry,
Which dignifies the artist, lifts the swain,
And the straw cottage to a palace turns,
Over the work presides. Such was the scene
Of hurrying Carthage, when the Trojan chief
First view'd her growing turrets. So appear
Th' increasing walls of busy Manchester,
Sheffield, and Birmingham, whose reddening fields
Rise and enlarge their suburbs. Lo, in throngs,
For every realm, the careful factors meet,
Whispering each other. In long ranks the bales,
Like war's bright files, beyond the sight extend.
Straight, ere the sounding bell the signal strikes,
Which ends the hour of traffic, they conclude
The speedy compact; and, well-pleas'd, transfer,
With mutual benefit, superior wealth
To many a kingdom's rent, or tyrant's hoard.

Whate'er is excellent in art proceeds
From labour and endurance: deep the oak
Must sink in stubborn earth its roots obscure,
That hopes to lift its branches to the skies:
Gold cannot gold appear, until man's toil
Discloses wide the mountain's hidden ribs,
And digs the dusky ore, and breaks and grinds
Its gritty parts, and laves in limpid streams,
With oft-repeated toil, and oft in fire
The metal purifies: with the fatigue,
And tedious process of its painful works,
The lusty sicken, and the feeble die.

Now on the busy stage see him step forth,
 With beating breast: high-honour'd he beholds
 Rich industry. First, he bespeaks a loom:
 From some thick wood the carpenter selects
 A slender oak, or beech of glossy trunk,

That hopes to lift its branches to the skies:
Gold cannot gold appear, until man's toil
Discloses wide the mountain's hidden ribs,
And digs the dusky ore, and breaks and grinds
Its gritty parts, and laves in limpid streams,
With oft-repeated toil, and oft in fire
The metal purifies: with the fatigue,
And tedious process of its painful works,
The lusty sicken, and the feeble die.

But cheerful are the labours of the loom,
By health and ease accompanied: they bring
Superior treasures speedier to the state,
Than those of deep Peruvian mines, where slaves
(Wretched requital) drink, with trembling hand,
Pale palsy's baneful cup. Our happy swains
Behold arising, in their fattening flocks,
A double wealth; more rich than Belgium's boast,
Who tends the culture of the flaxen reed;
Or the Cathayan's, whose ignobler care
Nurses the silk-worm; or of India's sons,
Who plant the cotton-grove by Ganges' stream.
Nor do their toils and products furnish more,
Than gauds and dresses, of fantastic web,
To the luxurious: but our kinder toils
Give clothing to necessity; keep warm
Th' unhappy wanderer, on the mountain wild
Benighted, while the tempest beats around.

No, ye soft sons of Ganges, and of Ind,
Ye feebly delicate, life little needs
Your feminine toys, nor asks your nerveless arm
To cast the strong-flung shuttle, or the spear.
Can ye defend your country from the storm
Of strong invasion? Can ye want endure,
In the besieged fort, with courage firm?
Can ye the weather-beaten vessel steer,
Climb the tall mast, direct the stubborn helm,
Mid wild discordant waves, with steady course?
Can ye lead out, to distant colonies,
Th' o'erflowings of a people, or your wrong'd
Brethren, by impious persecution driven,
And arm their breasts with fortitude to try
New regions; climes, though barren, yet beyond
The baneful power of tyrants? These are deeds
To which their hardy labours well prepare
The sinewy arm of Albion's sons. Pursue,
Ye sons of Albion, with a yielding heart,
Your hardy labours: let the sounding loom
Mix with the melody of every vale;
The loom, that long-renown'd, wide envy'd gift
Of wealthy Flandria, who the boon receiv'd
From fair Venetia; she from Grecian nymphs;
They from Phenice, who obtain'd the dole
From old Ægyptus. Thus around the globe,
The golden-footed sciences their path
Mark, like the sun, enkindling life and joy;
And follow'd close by ignorance and pride,
Lead day and night o'er realms. Our day arose
When Alva's tyranny the weaving arts
Drove from the fertile valleys of the Scheld.
With speedy wing, and scatter'd course, they fled,
Like a community of bees, disturb'd
By some relentless swain's rapacious hand;
While good Eliza, to the fugitives
Gave gracious welcome; as wise Ægypt erst
To troubled Nilus, whose nutritious flood
With annual gratitude enrich'd her meads.
Then, from fair Antwerp, an industrious train
Cross'd the smooth channel of our smiling seas;
And in the vales of Cantium, on the banks
Of Stour alighted, and the naval wave
Of spacious Medway: some on gentle Yare,
And fertile Waveney, pitch'd; and made their seats

Pleasant Norvicum, and Colcestria's towers:
Some to the Darent sped their happy way:
Berghem, and Sluys, and elder Bruges, chose

Antona's chalky plains, and stretch'd their tents
Down to Clausentum, and that bay supine
Beneath the shade of Vecta's clifly isle.
Soon o'er the hospitable realm they spread,
With cheer reviv'd; and in Sabrina's flood,
And the Silurian Tame, their textures blanch'd:
Not undelighted with Vigornia's spires,
Nor those, by Vaga's stream, from ruins rais'd
Of ancient Ariconium; nor less pleas'd
With Salop's various scenes; and that soft tract
Of Cambria, deep-embay'd Dimetian land,
By green hills sene'd, by ocean's murmur lull'd;
Nurse of the rustic bard, who now resounds
The fortunes of the fleece; whose ancestors
Were fugitives from superstition's rage,
And erst, from Devon, thither brought the loom;
Where ivy'd walls of old Kidwelly's towers,
Nodding, still on their gloomy brows project
Lancastria's arms, emboss'd in mouldering stone.

Thus, then, on Albion's coast, the exil'd band,
From rich Menapian towns, and the green banks
Of Scheld, alighted; and, alighting, sang
Grateful thanksgiving. Yet, at times, they shift
Their habitations, when the hand of Pride,
Retraint, or southern Luxury, disturbs
Their industry, and urges them to vales
Of the Brigantes; where, with happier care
Inspired, their art improves the fleece,
Which occupation erst, and wealth immense,
Gave Brabant's swarming habitants, what time
We were their shepherds only; from which state,
With friendly arm, they rais'd us: nathless some
Among our old and stubborn swains misdeem'd,
And envy'd, who enrich'd them; envy'd those,
Whose virtues taught the varlety of towns
To useful toil to turn the pilfering hand.

And still, when bigotry's black clouds arise,
(For oft they sudden rise in papal realms),
They, from their isle, as from some ark secure,
Careless, unpitying, view the fiery bolts
Of superstition, and tyrannic rage,
And all the fury of the rolling storm,
Which fierce pursues the sufferers in their flight.
Shall not our gates, shall not Britannia's arms,
Spread ever open to receive their flight?
A virtuous people, by distresses oft
(Distresses for the sake of truth endur'd)
Corrected, dignify'd; creating good
Where-ever they inhabit: this, our isle
Has oft experienc'd; witness all ye realms
Of either hemisphere, where commerce flows:
Th' important truth is stamp'd on every bale;
Each glossy cloth, and drape of mantle warm,
Receives th' impression; every airy woof,
Cheyney, and bayse, and serge, and alepine,
Tammy, and crape, and the long countless list
Of woollen webs; and every work of steel;
And that crystalline metal, blown or fus'd,
Limpid as water dropping from the clefts
Of mossy marble: not to name the aids
Their wit has given the fleece, now taught to link
With flax, or cotton, or the silk-worm's thread,
And gain the graces of variety:
Whether to form the matron's decent robe,
Or the thin-shading trail for Agra's * nymphs;

* There is woven at Manchester, for the East-

Or solemn curtains, whose long gloomy folds
Surround the soft pavilions of the rich.

They too the many-colour'd arras taught
To mimic nature, and the airy shapes
Of sportive fancy: such as oft appear
In old Mosaic pavements, when the plough
Up-turns the crumbling glebe of Weldon field;
Or that, o'er-shaded erst by Woodstock's bower,
Now grac'd by Blenheim, in whose stately rooms
Rise glowing tapestries, that lure the eye
With Marlborough's wars: here Schellenbergh
exults,

Behind surrounding hills of ramparts steep,
And vales of trenches dark; each hideous pass
Armies defend; yet on the hero leads
His Britons, like a torrent, o'er the mounds.
Another scene is Blenheim's glorious field,
And the red Danube. Here, the rescued states
Crowding beneath his shield: there, Ramillies'
Important battle: next, the tenfold chain
Of Arleux burst, and th' adamantine gates
Of Gaul flung open to the tyrant's throne.
A shade obscures the rest—Ah, then, what power
Invidious from the lifted sickle snatch'd
The harvest of the plain? So lively glows
The fair delusion, that our passions rise
In the beholding, and the glories share
Of visionary battle. This bright art
Did zealous Europe learn of Pagan hands,
While she essay'd, with rage of holy war,
To desolate their fields: but old the skill:
Long were the Phrygians' picturing looms re-
nown'd;

Tyre also, wealthy seat of arts, excell'd,
And elder Sidon, in th' historic web.

Far-distant Tibet in her gloomy woods
Rears the gay tent, of blended wool unwoven,
And glutinous materials: the Chinese
Their porcelain, Japan its varnish boasts.
Some fair peculiar graces every realm,
And each from each a share of wealth acquires.

But chief by numbers of industrious hands
A nation's wealth is counted: numbers raise
Warm emulation: where that virtue dwells,
There will be traffic's seat; there will she build
Her rich emporium. Hence, ye happy swains,
With hospitality inflame your breast,
And emulation: the whole world receive,
And with their arts, their virtues, deck your isle,
Each clime, each sea, the spacious orb of each,
Shall join their various stores, and amply feed
The mighty brotherhood; while ye proceed,
Active and enterprising, or to teach
The stream a naval course, or till the wild,
Or drain the fen, or stretch the long canal,
Or plough the fertile billows of the deep.
Why to the narrow circle of our coast
Should we submit our limits, while each wind
Assists the stream and sail, and the wide main Woos us in every port? See Belgium build,
Upon the foodful brine, her envy'd power;
And, half her people floating on the wave,
Expand her fishy regions. Thus our isle,

*Indies, a very thin fluff, of thread and cotton;
which is cooler than the manufactures of that country where the material is only cotton.*

Thus only may Britannia be enlarg'd.—
But whither, by the visions of the theme
Smit with sublime delight, but whither strays
The raptur'd muse, forgetful of her task?

No common pleasure warms the generous mind,
When it beholds the labours of the loom;
How widely round the globe they are dispers'd,
From little tenements by wood or croft,
Through many a slender path, how sedulous,
As rills to rivers broad, they speed their way
To public roads, to Fosse, or Watling-street,
Or Armine, ancient works: and thence explore,
Through every navigable wave, the sea,
That laps the green earth round: through Tyne,
and Tees; [Hull,

Through Weare, and Lune, and merchandizing
And Swale, and Aire, whose crystal waves reflect
The various colours of the tinctur'd web;
Through Ken, swift rolling down his rocky dale,
Like giddy youth impetuous, then at Wick
Curbing his train, and, with the sober pace
Of cautious Eld, meandering to the deep;
Through Dart, and sullen Exe, whose murmuring wave

Envies the Dune and Rother, who have won
The serge and kerfie to their blanching streams;
Through Towy, winding under Merlin's towers,
And Usk, that frequent, among hoary rocks,
On her deep waters paints th' impending scene,
Wild torrents, craggs, and woods, and mountain snows.

The northern Cambrians, an industrious tribe,
Carry their labours on pigmean steeds,
Of size exceeding not Leicestrian sheep,
Yet strong and sprightly: over hill and dale
They travel unfatigued, and lay their bales
In Salop's streets, beneath whose lofty walls
Pearly Sabrina waits them with her barks,
And spreads the swelling sheet. For no-where far
From some transparent river's naval course
Arise, and fall, our various hills and vales,
No-where far distant from the mast'd wharf,
We need not vex the strong laborious hand
With toil enormous, as th' Egyptian king,
Who join'd the sable waters of the Nile,
From Memphis' towers, to th' Erythrean gulf:
Or as the monarch of enfeebled Gaul,
Whose will imperious forc'd an hundred streams,
Through many a forest, many a spacious wild,
To stretch their scanty trains from sea to sea,
That some unprofitable skiff might float
Across irriguous dales, and hollow'd rocks.

Far easier pains may swell our gentler floods,
And through the centre of the isle conduct
To naval union. Trent and Severn's wave,
By plains alone disparted, woo to join
Majestic Thamis. With their silver urns
The nimble-footed Naiads of the springs
Await, upon the dewy lawn, to speed
And celebrate the union; and the light
Wood-nymphs; and those, who o'er the grotts preside,

Whose stores bituminous, with sparkling fires,
In summer's tedious absence, cheer the swains,
Long sitting at the loom; and those besides,
Who crown, with yellow sheaves, the farmer's hopes,

And all the genii of commercial toil :
 These on the dewy lawns await, to speed
 And celebrate the union, that the fleece,
 And glossy web, to every port around
 May lightly glide along. Ev'n now behold,
 Adown a thousand floods, the burden'd barks,
 With white sails glistening, through the gloomy woods
 Haste to their harbours. See the silver maze
 Of stately Thamisis, ever chequer'd o'er

With deeply-laden barges, gliding smooth
 And constant as his stream : in growing pomp,
 By Neptune still attended, slow he rolls
 To great Augusta's mart, where lofty trade,
 Amid a thousand golden spires enthron'd,
 Gives audience to the world : the strand around
 Close swarms with busy crowds of many a realm.
 What bales, what wealth, what industry, what fleets !
 Lo, from the simple fleece how much proceeds.

B O O K IV.

ARGUMENT.

OUR manufactures exported. Voyage through the Channel, and by the coast of Spain. View of the Mediterranean. Decay of our Turkey-trade. Address to the factors there. Voyage through the Baltic. The mart of Petersburg. The ancient channels of commerce to the Indies. The modern course thither. Shores of Afric. Reflections on the slave trade. The Cape of Good Hope, and the eastern coast of Africa. Trade to Persia and Indostan precarious, through tyranny and frequent insurrections. Disputes between the French and English, on the coast of Coromandel, censured. A prospect of the Spice-islands, and of China. Traffic at Canton. Our woollen manufactures known at Pekin, by the caravans from Russia. Description of that journey. Transition to the western hemisphere. Voyage of Raleigh. The state and advantages of our North American colonies. Severe winters in those climates : hence the passage through Hudson's-Bay impracticable. Inquiries for an easier passage into the Pacific ocean. View of the coasts of South America, and of those tempestuous seas. Lord Anson's expedition, and success against the Spaniards. The naval power of Britain consistent with the welfare of all nations. View of our probable improvements in traffic, and the distribution of our woollen manufactures over the whole globe.

Now, with our woolly treasures amply stor'd,
 Glide the tall fleets into the widening main,
 A floating forest : every sail, unfurl'd,
 Swells to the wind, and gilds the azure sky.
 Meantime, in pleasing care, the pilot steers
 Steady ; with eye intent upon the steel,
 Steady, before the breeze, the pilot steers :
 While gaily o'er the waves the mountain prow
 Dance, like a shoal of dolphins, and begin
 To streak with various paths the hoary deep.
 Batavia's shallow sounds by some are sought,
 Or sandy Elb or Weser, who receive
 The swain's and peasant's toil with grateful hand,
 Which copious gives return ; while some explore
 Deep Finnic gulfs, and a new shore and mart,
 The bold creation of that Kesar's power,
 Illustrious Peter, whose magnific toils
 Repair the distant Caspian, and restore
 To trade its ancient ports. Some Thanet's strand,
 And Dover's chalky cliff, behind them turn.
 Soon sinks away the green and level beach
 Of Rumney marsh and Rye's silent port,
 By angry Neptune clos'd, and Vecta's isle,
 Like the pale moon in vapour, faintly bright.
 An hundred opening marts are seen, are lost ;
 Devon's hills retire, and Edgcomb mount,
 Waving its gloomy groves, delicious scene.
 Yet steady o'er the waves they steer ; and now
 The fluctuating world of waters wide,
 In boundless magnitude, around them swells ;
 O'er whose imaginary brim, nor towns,
 Nor woods, nor mountain tops, nor aught appears,
 But Phœbus' orb, resplendent lamp of light,

Millions of leagues aloft : heaven's azure vault
 Bends over-head, majestic, to its base,
 Uninterrupted clear circumference ;
 Till, rising o'er the flickering waves, the cape
 Of Finisterre, a cloudy spot, appears.
 Again, and oft, th' adventurous sails disperse ;
 These to Iberia ; others to the coast
 Of Lusitania, th' ancient Tharhis deem'd
 Of Solomon ; fair regions, with the webs
 Of Norwich pleas'd, or those of Manchester ;
 Light airy clothing for their vacant swains,
 And visionary monks. We, in return,
 Receive Cantabrian steel, and fleeces soft,
 Segovian or Castilian, far renown'd ;
 And gold's attractive metal, pledge of wealth,
 Spur of activity, to good or ill
 Powerful incentive : or Hesperian fruits,
 Fruits of spontaneous growth, the citron bright,
 The fig, and orange, and heart-cheering wine.

Those ships, from ocean broad, which voyage through
 The gates of Hercules *, find many seas,
 And bays unnumber'd, opening to their keels ;
 But shores inhospitable oft, to fraud
 And rapine turn'd, or dreary tracts become
 Of desolation. The proud Roman coasts,
 Fall'n, like the Punic, to the dashing waves
 Resign their ruins : Tiber's boasted flood,
 Whose pompous moles o'erlook'd the subject deep,
 Now creeps along, through brakes and yellow dust,
 While Neptune scarce perceives its murmuring rill :

* The straits of Gibraltar.

Such are th' effects, when virtue flacks her hand;
Wild nature back returns: along these shores
Neglected trade with difficulty toils,
Collecting slender stores, the sun-dry'd grape,
Or capers from the rock, that prompt the taste
Of luxury. Ev'n Egypt's fertile strand,
Bereft of human discipline, has lost
Its ancient lustre: Alexandria's port,
Once the metropolis of trade, as Tyre,
And elder Sidon, as the Attic town,
Beautiful Athens, as rich Corinth, Rhodes,
Unhonour'd droops. Of all the numerous marts,
That in those glittering seas with splendor rose,
Only Byzantium, of peculiar site,
Remains in prosperous state; and Tripolis,
And Smyrna, sacred ever to the muse.

To these resort the delegates of trade,
Social in life, a virtuous brotherhood;
And bales of softest wool from Bradford looms,
Or Stroud, dispense; yet see, with vain regret,
Their stores, once highly priz'd, no longer now
Or sought, or valued: copious webs arrive,
Smooth-wov'n of other than Britannia's fleece,
On the throng'd strand alluring; the great skill
Of Gaul, and greater industry, prevails;
That proud imperious foe. Yet, ah—'tis not—
Wrong not the Gaul; it is the foe within,
Impairs our ancient marts: it is the bribe;
'Tis he, who pours into the shops of trade
That impious poison: it is he, who gains
The sacred seat of parliament, by means
That vitiate and emasculate the mind;
By sloth, by lewd intemperance, and a scene
Of riot, worse than that which ruin'd Rome.
This, this the Tartar, and remote Chinese,
And all the brotherhood of life, bewail.

Meantime (while those, who dare be just op-
The various powers of many-headed vice) [pose
Ye delegates of trade, by patience rise
O'er difficulties: in this sultry clime
Note what is found of use: the flax of goat,
Red-wool, and balm, and caffee's berry brown,
Or dropping gum, or opium's lenient drug;
Unnumber'd arts await them: trifles oft,
By skilful labour, rise to high esteem.
Nor what the peasant, near some lucid wave,
Pactolus, Simois, or Mæander flow,
Renown'd in story, with his plough up-turns,
Neglect; the hoary medal, and the vase,
Statue, and bust, of old magnificence
Beautiful reliques: oh, could modern time
Restore the mimic art, and the clear mien
Of patriot sages, Walsinghams and Yorkes,
And Cecils, in long-lasting stone preserve!
But mimic art and nature are impair'd—
Impair'd they seem—or in a varied dress
Delude our eyes: the world in change delights;
Change then your searches, with the varied modes
And wants of realms. Sabeian frankincense
Rare is collected now: few altars smoke
Now in the idol fane: Panchaiah views
Trade's busy fleets regardless pass her coast:
Nor frequent are the freights of snow-white woofs,
Since Rome, no more the mistress of the world,
Varies her garb, and treads her darken'd streets
With gloomy coul, majestic no more.

See the dark spirit of tyrannic power.
The Thracian channel, long the road of trade

To the deep Euxine and its naval streams,
And the Mæotis, now is barr'd with chains,
And forts of hostile battlement: in aught
That joys mankind the arbitrary Turk
Delights not: insolent of rule, he spreads
Thralldom and desolation o'er his realms.

Another path to Scythia's wide domains
Commerce discovers: the Livonian gulf
Receives her sails, and leads them to the port
Of rising Petersburg, whose splendid streets
Swell with the webs of Leeds: the Cossac there,
The Calmuc, and Mungalian, round the bales
In crowds resort, and their warm'd limbs enfold,
Delighted; and the hardy Samoid,
Rough with the stings of frost, from his dark caves
Ascends, and thither hastes, ere winter's rage
O'ertake his homeward step; and they that dwell
Along the banks of Don's and Volga's streams;
And borderers of the Caspian, who renew
That ancient path to India's climes, which fill'd
With proudest affluence the Colchian state.

Many have been the ways to those renown'd
Luxuriant climes of Indus, early known
To Memphis; to the port of wealthy Tyre;
To Tadmor, beauty of the wilderness,
Who down the long Euphrates sent her sails;
And sacred Salem, when her numerous fleets,
From Ezion-geber, pass'd th' Arabian gulf.

But later times, more fortunate, have found,
O'er ocean's open wave, a surer course,
Sailing the western coast of Afric's realms,
Of Mauritania, and Nigritian tracts,
And islands of the Gorgades, the bounds,
On the Atlantic brine, of ancient trade;
But not of modern, by the virtue led
Of Gama and Columbus. The whole globe
Is now, of commerce, made the scene immense,
Which daring ships frequent, associated,
Like doves, or swallows, in th' ethereal flood,
Or, like the eagle, solitary seen.

Some, with more open course, to Indus steer;
Some coast from port to port, with various men
And manners conversant; of th' angry surge,
That thunders loud, and spreads the cliffs with
Regardless, or the monsters of the deep, [foam,
Porpoise, or grampus, or the ravenous shark,
That chase their keels; or threatening rock, o'er-

head,
Of Atlas old; beneath the threatening rocks,
Reckless, they furl their sails, and bartering, take
Soft flakes of wool; for in soft flakes of wool,
Like the Silurian, Atlas' dales abound,

The shores of Sus inhospitable rise,
And high Bojador; Zara too displays
Unfruitful deserts; Gambia's wave infiles
An ouzy coast, and pestilential ills
Diffuses wide; behind are burning sands,
Adverse to life, and Nilus' hidden fount.

On Guinea's sultry sand, the drapery light
Of Manchester or Norwich is bestow'd
For clear transparent gums, and ductile wax,
And snow-white ivory; yet the valued trade,
Along this barbarous coast, in telling, wounds
The generous heart, the sale of wretched slaves;
Slaves, by their tribes condemn'd, exchanging
For life-long servitude; severe exchange! [death
These till our fertile colonies, which yield
The sugar-cane, and the tobacco-leaf,

And various new productions, that invite
Increasing navies to their crowded wharfs.

But let the man, whose rough tempestuous
In this adventurous traffic are involv'd, [hours
With just humanity of heart pursue
The gainful commerce: wickedness is blind:
Their sable chieftains may in future times
Burst their frail bonds, and vengeance execute
On cruel unrelenting pride of heart
And avarice. There are ills to come for crimes.

Hot Guinea too gives yellow dust of gold,
Which, with her rivers, rolls adown the sides
Of unknown hills, where fiery-winged winds,
And sandy deserts, rous'd by sudden storms,
All search forbid: howe'er, on either hand,
Vallies and pleasant plains, and many a tract
Deem'd uninhabitable erst, are found
Fertile and populous: their sable tribes,
In shade of verdant groves, and mountains tall,
Frequent enjoy the cool descent of rain,
And soft refreshing breezes: nor are lakes
Here wanting; those a sea-wide surface spread,
Which to the distant Nile and Senegal
Send long meanders: whate'er lies beyond,
Of rich or barren, ignorance o'ercasts
With her dark mantle. Mon'motapa's coast
Is seldom visited; and the rough shore
Of Caffres, land of savage Hottentots,
Whose hands unnatural hasten to the grave
Their aged parents: what barbarity
And brutal ignorance, where social trade
Is held contemptible! Ye gliding sails,
From these inhospitable gloomy shores
Indignant turn, and to the friendly Cape,
Which gives the cheerful mariner good hope
Of prosperous voyage, steer: rejoice to view,
What trade, with Belgian industry, creates,
Prospects of civil life, fair towns, and lawns,
And yellow tilth, and groves of various fruits,
Delectable in husk or glossy rind:
There the capacious vase from crystal springs
Replenish, and convenient store provide,
Like ants, intelligent of future need.

See, through the fragrance of delicious airs,
That breathe the smell of balms, how traffic
shapes

A winding voyage, by the lofty coast
Of Sofala, thought Ophir; in whose hills
Ev'n yet some portion of its ancient wealth
Remains and sparkles in the yellow sand
Of its clear streams, though unregarded now;
Ophirs more rich are found. With easy course
The vessels glide; unless their speed be stop'd
By dead calms, that oft lie on those smooth seas
While every zephyr sleeps: then the shrouds drop;
The downy feather, on the cordage hung,
Moves not; the flat sea shines like yellow gold,
Fus'd in the fire; or like the marble floor
Of some old temple wide. But where so wide,
In old or later time, its marble floor
Did ever temple boast as this, which here
Spreads its bright level many a league around?
At solemn distances its pillars rise,
Sofal's blue rocks, Mozambic's palmy steeps,
And lofty Madagascar's glittering shores,
Where various woods of beauteous vein and hue,
And glossy shells in elegance of form,
For Pond's rich cabinet, or Sloan's, are found.

Such calm oft checks their course, till this bright
Is brush'd away before the rising breeze, [scene
That joys the busy crew, and speeds again
The sail full-swell'ing to Socotra's isle,
For aloes fam'd; or to the wealthy marts
Of Ormus or Gombroon, whose streets are oft
With caravans and tawny merchants throng'd,
From neighbouring provinces and realms afar;
And fill'd with plenty, though dry sandy wastes
Spread naked round; so great the power of trade.

Persia few ports; more happy Indostan
Beholds Surat and Goa on her coasts,
And Bombay's wealthy isle, and harbour fam'd,
Supine beneath the shade of cocoa groves.
But what avails, or many ports or few?
Where wild ambition frequent from his lair
Starts up; while fell revenge and famine lead
To havoc, reckless of the tyrant's whip,
Which clanks along the vallies: oft in vain
The merchant seeks upon the strand, whom erst,
Associated by trade, he deck'd and cloth'd;
In vain, whom rage or famine has devour'd,
He seeks; and with increas'd affection thinks
On Britain. Still howe'er Bombaya's wharfs
Pile up blue indigo, and, of frequent use,
Pungent saltpetre, woods of purple grain,
And many-colour'd saps from leaf and flower,
And various gums; the clothier knows their worth;

And wool resembling cotton, shorn from trees,
Not to the fleece unfriendly; whether mixt
In warp or woof, or with the line of flax,
Or softer silk's material: though its aid
To vulgar eyes appears not; let none deem
The fleece, in any traffic, unconcern'd;
By every traffic aided; while each work
Of art yields wealth to exercise the loom,
And every loom employs each hand of art.
Nor is there wheel in the machine of trade,
Which Leeds, or Cairo, Lima, or Bombay,
Helps not, with harmony, to turn around,
Though all, unconscious of the union, act.

Few the peculiars of Canara's realm,
Or sultry Malabar; where it behoves
The wary pilot, while he coasts the shores,
To mark o'er ocean the thick rising isles;
Woody Chaetta, Birter rough with rocks;
Green-rising Barmur, Mincoy's purple hills;
And the minute Maldivia's, as a swarm
Of bees in summer, on a poplar's trunk,
Clustering innumerable; these behind
His stern receding, o'er the clouds he views
Ceylon's gray peaks, from whose volcanos rise
Dark smoke and ruddy flame, and glaring rocks
Daring in air aloft; around whose feet
Blue cliffs ascend, and aromatic groves,
In various prospect; Ceylon also deem'd
The ancient Ophir. Next Bengala's bay,
On the vast globe the deepest, while the prow
Turns northward to the rich disputed strand
Of Cor'mandel, where traffic grieves to see
Discord and avarice invade her realms,
Portending ruinous war, and cries aloud,
Peace, peace, ye blinded Britons, and ye Gauls;
Nation to nation is a light, a fire,
Enkindling virtue, sciences, and arts:
But cries aloud in vain. Yet wise defence,
Against ambition's wide-destroying pride,

Madrass erected; and Saint David's fort,
 And those which rise on Ganges' twenty streams,
 Guarding the woven fleece, Calcutta's tower,
 And Maldo's and Patana's: from their holds
 The shining bales our factors deal abroad,
 And see the country's products, in exchange,
 Before them heap'd: cotton's transparent webs,
 Aloes, and cassia, salutiferous drugs,
 Alum, and lacque, and clouded tortoiseshell,
 And brilliant diamonds, to decorate
 Britannia's blooming nymphs. For these, o'er all
 The kingdoms round, our draperies are dispers'd,
 O'er Bukor, Cabul, and the Bactrian vales,
 And Cassimere, and Atoc, on the stream
 Of old Hydaspes, Porus' hardy realm;
 And late discover'd Tibet, where the fleece;
 By art peculiar, is compress'd and wrought
 To threadless drapery, which, in conic forms,
 Of various hues, their gaudy roofs adorns.

The keels which voyage through Molucca's
 Amid a cloud of spicy odours sail, [straits,
 From Java and Sumatra breath'd, whose woods
 Yield fiery pepper that destroys the moth
 In woolly vestures: Ternate and Tidore
 Give to the festal board the fragrant clove
 And nutmeg, to those narrow bounds confin'd;
 While gracious nature, with unsparing hand,
 The needs of life o'er every region pours.

Near those delicious isles the beauteous coast
 Of China rears its summits. Know ye not,
 Ye sons of trade, that ever-flowery shore,
 Those azure hills, those woods and nodding rocks?
 Compare them with the pictures of your chart;
 Alike the woods and nodding rocks o'erhang.
 Now the tall glossy towers of porcelane,
 And pillar'd pagods shine; rejoic'd they see
 The port of Canton opening to their prows,
 And in the winding of the river moor.

Upon the strand they heap their glossy bales,
 And works of Birmingham in brass or steel,
 And flint; and ponderous lead from deep cells
 Fit ballast in the fury of the storm, [rais'd,
 That tears the shrouds, and bends the stubborn
 These, for the artists of the fleece, procure [mast:
 Various materials; and, for affluent life,
 The flavour'd thea and glossy painted vase;
 Things elegant, ill-titled luxuries,
 In temperance us'd, delectable and good.
 They too from hence receive the strongest thread
 Of the green silkworm. Various is the wealth
 Of that renown'd and ancient land, secure
 In constant peace and commerce; till'd to th'
 Of rich fertility; where, thick as stars, [height
 Bright habitations glitter on each hill,
 And rock, and shady dale; ev'n on the waves
 Of copious rivers, lakes, and bordering seas,
 Rise floating villages; no wonder; when,
 In every province, firm and level roads,
 And long canals, and navigable streams,
 Ever, with ease, conduct the works of toil
 To sure and speedy markets, through the length
 Of many a crowded region, many a clime,
 To the imperial towers of Cambalu,
 Now Pekin, where the fleece is not unknown;
 Since Calder's woofs, and those of Exe and Frome,
 And Yare, and Avon flow, and rapid Trent,
 Thither by Ruffic caravans are brought, [wild,
 Through Scythia's numerous regions, waste and

Journey immense! which, to th' attentive ear,
 The muse, in faithful notes, shall brief describe.

From the proud mart of Petersburg, ere-while
 The watery seat of desolation wide,
 Issue these trading caravans, and urge, [road;
 Through dazzling snows, their dreary trackless
 By compass steering oft, from week to week,
 From month to month; whole seasons view their
 Neva they pass, and Kefma's gloomy flood, [toils.
 Volga, and Don, and Oka's torrent prone,
 Threatening in vain; and many a cataract,
 In its fall stopt, and bound with bars of ice.

Close on the left unnumber'd tracts they view
 White with continual frost; and on the right
 The Caspian-lake, and ever-flowery realms,
 Though now abhorr'd, behind them turn, the
 Of arbitrary rule, where regions wide [haunt
 Are destin'd to the sword; and on each hand
 Roads hung with carcases, or under foot [vales,
 Thick strown; while, in their rough bewilder'd
 The blooming rose its fragrance breathes in vain,
 And silver fountains fall, and nightingales
 Attune their notes, where none are left to hear.

Sometimes o'er level ways, on easy sleds,
 The generous horse conveys the sons of trade;
 And ever and anon the docile dog;
 And now the light rein-deer, with rapid pace,
 Skims over icy lakes; now slow they climb
 Aloft o'er clouds, and then adown descend
 To hollow vallies, till the eye beholds
 The roofs of Tobol, whose hill-crowning walls
 Shine, like the rising moon, through watery mists;
 Tobol, th' abode of those unfortunate
 Exiles of angry state, and thralls of war;
 Solemn fraternity! where carl, and prince,
 Soldier, and statesman, and uncrested chief,
 On the dark level of adversity,
 Converse familiar; while, amid the cares
 And toils for hunger, thirst, and nakedness,
 Their little public smiles, and the bright sparks
 Of trade are kindled: trade arises oft,
 And virtue, from adversity and want:
 Be witness, Carthage; witness, ancient Tyre;
 And thou, Batavia, daughter of distress. [held,
 This, with his hands, which erst the truncheon
 The hammer lifts; another bends and weaves
 The flexile willow; that the mattoe drives:
 All are employ'd; and by their works acquire
 Our fleecy vestures. From their tenements,
 Pleas'd and refresh'd, proceeds the caravan
 Through lively-spreading cultures, pastures green,
 And yellow tillages in opening woods: [road
 Thence on, through Narim's wilds, a pathless
 They force, with rough entangling thorns perplex;
 Land of the lazy Ostiaks, thin dispers'd,
 Who, by avoiding, meet the toils they loathe,
 Tenfold augmented; miserable tribe,
 Void of commercial comforts: who, nor corn,
 Nor pulse, nor oil, nor heart-enlivening wine,
 Know to procure; nor spade, nor scythe, nor
 Nor social aid: beneath their thorny bed [share,
 The serpent hisses, while in thickets nigh
 Loud howls the hungry wolf. So on they fare,
 And pass by spacious lakes, begirt with rocks
 And azure mountains; and the heights admire
 Of white Imaus, whose snow-nodding craggs
 Frighten the realms beneath, and from their urns
 Pour mighty rivers down, th' impetuous streams.

Of Oby, and Irtis, and Jenisca, swift,
Which rush upon the northern pole, up-heave
Its frozen seas, and lift their hills of ice.

These rugged paths and savage landscapes pass'd,
A new scene strikes their eyes: among the clouds
Aloft they view, what seems a chain of cliffs,
Nature's proud work; that matchless work of art,
The wall of Sina, by Chihoham's power,
In earliest times, erected. Warlike troops
Frequent are seen in haughty march along
Its ridge, a vast extent, beyond the length
Of many a potent empire; towers and ports,
Three times a thousand, lift thereon their brows
At equal spaces, and in prospect 'round
Cities, and plains, and kingdoms, overlook.

At length the gloomy passage they attain
Of its deep-vaulted gates, whose opening folds
Conduct at length to Pekin's glittering spires
The destin'd mart, where joyous they arrive.
Thus are the textures of the fleece convey'd
To Sina's distant realm, the utmost bound
Of the flat floor of steadfast earth; for so
Fabled antiquity, ere peaceful trade
Inform'd the opening mind of curious man.

Now to the other hemisphere, my muse,
A new world found, extend thy daring wing.
Be thou the first of the harmonious nine
From high Parnassus, the unwearied toils
Of industry and valour, in that world
'Triumphant, to reward with tuneful song.

Happy the voyage, o'er th' Atlantic brine,
By active Raleigh made, and great the joy,
When he discern'd, above the foamy surge,
A rising coast for future colonies,
Opening her bays, and figuring her capes,
Ev'n from the northern tropic to the pole.
No land gives more employment to the loom
Or kindlier feeds the indigent; no land
With more variety of wealth rewards
The hand of labour: thither, from the wrongs
Of lawless rule, the free-born spirit flies;
'Thither affliction, thither poverty,
And arts and sciences: thrice happy clime,
Which Britain makes th' asylum of mankind!
But joy superior far his bosom warms,
Who views those shores in every culture dress'd;
With habitations gay, and numerous towns,
On hill and valley; and his countrymen
Form'd into various states, powerful and rich,
In regions far remote: who from our looms
Take largely for themselves, and for those tribes
Of Indians, ancient tenants of the land,
In amity conjoin'd, of civil life
The comforts taught, and various new desires,
Which kindle arts, and occupy the poor,
And spread Britannia's flocks o'er every dale.

Ye, who the shuttle cast along the loom,
The silk-worm's thread inweaving with the fleece,
Pray for the culture of the Georgian tract,
Nor flight the green Savannahs, and the plains
Of Carolina, where thick woods arise
Of mulberries, and in whose water'd fields
Up-springs the verdant blade of thirsty rice.
Where are the happy regions, which afford
More implements of commerce, and of wealth?

Fertile Virginia, like a vigorous bough,
Which overshades some crystal river, spreads
Her wealthy cultivations wide around,

And, more than many a spacious realm, rewards
The fleecy shuttle: to her growing marts,
The Iroquesse, Cheroques, and Oubacks, come,
And quit their feathery ornaments uncouth,
For woolly garments; and the cheers of life,
The cheers, but not the vices, learn to taste.
Blash, Europeans, whom the circling cup
Of luxury intoxicates; ye routs,
Who, for your crimes, have fled your native land;
And ye, voluptuous idle, who, in vain,
Seek easy habitations, void of care:
The sons of nature, with astonishment,
And detestation, mark your evil deeds;
And view, no longer awed, your nerveless arms,
Unfit to cultivate Ohio's banks.

See the bold emigrants of Accadie,
And Massachusset, happy in those arts
That join the politics of trade and war,
Bearing the palm in either: they appear
Better exemplars; and that hardy crew,
Who, on the frozen beach of Newfoundland,
Hang their white fish amid the parching winds:
The kindly fleece, in webs of Duffield woof,
Their limbs, benumb'd, enfolds with cheerly
warmth,

And frieze of Cambria, worn by those who seek,
Through gulfs and dales of Hudson's winding bay,
The beaver's fur, though oft they seek in vain,
While winter's frosty rigor checks approach,
Ev'n in the fiftieth latitude. Say why
(If ye, the travel'd sons of commerce, know),
Wherefore lie bound their rivers, lakes, and dales,
Half the sun's annual course, in chains of ice?
While the Rhine's fertile shore, and Gallic realms,
By the same zone encircled, long enjoy
Warm beams of Phœbus, and, supine, behold
Their plains and hillocks blush with clustering vines.

Must it be ever thus? or may the hand
Of mighty labour drain their gusty lakes,
Enlarge the brightening sky, and, peopling, warm
The opening vallies, and the yellowing plains?
Or rather shall we burst strong Darien's chain,
Steer our bold fleets between the cloven rocks,
And through the great Pacific every joy
Of civil life diffuse? Are not her isles
Numerous and large? Have they not harbours
Inhabitants, and manners? haply, too, [calm,
Peculiar sciences, and other forms
Of trade, and useful products, to exchange
For woolly vestures? 'Tis a tedious course
By the Antarctic circle: nor beyond
Those sea-wrapt gardens of the dulcet reed,
Bahama and Caribbee, may be found
Safe mole or harbour, till on Falkland's isle
The standard of Britannia shall arise.
Proud Buenos-Aires, low-couch'd Paraguay,
And rough Corrientes, mark, with hostile eye,
The labouring vessel; neither may we trust
The dreary naked Patagonian land,
Which darkens in the wind. No traffic there,
No barter for the fleece. There angry storms
Bend their black brows, and, raging, hurl around
Their thunders. Ye adventurous mariners,
Be firm; take courage from the brave. 'Twas
Perils and conflicts inexpressible
Anson, with steady undespairing breast,
Endured, when o'er the various globe he chas'd
His country's foes. Fast-gathering tempests rous'd

Huge ocean, and involved him all around.
Whirlwind, and snow, and hail, and horror: now,
Rapidly, with the world of waters, down
Descending to the channels of the deep,
He view'd th' uncover'd bottom of th' abyfs;
And now the stars, upon the loftiest point
Toss'd of the sky-mix'd surges. Oft the burst
Of loudest thunder, with the dash of seas,
Tore the wild-flying sails and tumbling masts;
While flames, thick-flashing in the gloom, reveal'd

Ruins of decks and shrouds, and sights of death.

Yet on he far'd, with fortitude his cheer,
Gaining, at intervals, slow way beneath
Del Fuego's rugged cliffs, and the white ridge,
Above all height, by opening clouds reveal'd,
Of Montegorda, and inaccessible
Wreck-threatening Staten-landso'erhanging shore,
Enormous rocks on rocks, in ever-wild
Posture of falling; as when Pelion, rear'd,
On Ossa, and on Ossa's tottering head
Woody Olympus, by the angry gods
Precipitate on earth were doom'd to fall.

At length, through every tempest, as some
Which from a poplar falls into a loud [branch,
Impetuous cataract, though deep immers'd,
Yet re-ascends, and glides, on lake or stream.
Smooth through the vallies; so his way he won
To the serene Pacific, flood immense,
And rear'd his lofty masts, and spread his sails.

Then Paita's walls, in wasting flames involv'd,
His vengeance felt, and fair occasion gave
To show humanity and continence,
To Scipio's not inferior. Then was left
No corner of the globe secure to pride
And violence: although the far-stretch'd coast
Of Chili, and Peru, and Mexico,
Arm'd in their evil cause; though fell disease,
Un'bating labor, tedious time, conspir'd,
And heat inclement, to unnerve his force;
Though that wide sea, which spreads o'er half the Deny'd all hospitable land or port; [world,
Where, seasons voyaging, no road he found
To moor, no bottom in th' abyfs, whereon
To drop the fastening anchor; though his brave
Companions ceas'd, subdu'd by toil extreme;
Though solitary left in Tinian's seas,
Where never was before the dreaded sound
Of Britain's thunder heard; his wave-worn bark
Met, fought the proud Iberian, and o'ercame.
So fare it ever with our country's foes!

Rejoice, ye nations, vindicate the sway
Ordain'd for common happiness. Wide, o'er
The globe terraqueous, let Britannia pour
The fruits of plenty from her copious horn.
What can avail to her, whose fertile earth
By ocean's briny waves are circumscrib'd,
The armed host, and murdering sword of war,
And conquest o'er her neighbours? She ne'er
Her solemn compacts, in the lust of rule: [breaks
Studious of arts and trade, she ne'er disturbs
The holy peace of states. 'Tis her delight
To fold the world with harmony, and spread,
Among the habitations of mankind,
The various wealth of toil, and what her fleece,
To clothe the naked, and her skilful looms,
Peculiar give. Ye too rejoice, ye swains;
Increasing commerce shall reward your cares.

A day will come, if not too deep we drink
The cup which luxury on careless wealth,
Pernicious gift, bestows; a day will come,
When through new channels sailing, we shall
The Californian coast, and all the realms [clothe
That stretch from Anian's streights to proud
Japan;

And the green isles, which on the left arise
Upon the glassy brine, whose various capes
Not yet are figur'd on the sailor's chart:
Then every variation shall be told
Of the magnetic steel; and currents mark'd,
Which drive the heedless vessel from her course.

That portion too of land, a tract immense,
Beneath th' Antarctic spread, shall then be known,
And new plantations on its coast arise.
Then rigid winter's ice no more shall wound
The only naked animal; but man
With the soft fleece shall everywhere be cloth'd.
Th' exulting muse shall then in vigour fresh,
Her flight renew. Meanwhile, with weary wing,
O'er ocean's wave returning, she explores
Siluria's flowery vales, her old delight, [arise
The shepherd's haunts, where the first springs
Of Britain's happy trade, now spreading wide,
Wide as th' Atlantic and Pacific seas,
Or as air's vital fluid o'er the globe.

THE COUNTRY WALK.

THE morning's fair, the lusty sun
With ruddy cheek begins to run;
And early birds, that wing the skies,
Sweetly sing to see him rise.

I am resolv'd, this charming day,
In the open field to stray;
And have no roof above my head,
But that whereon the gods do tread.
Before the yellow barn I see
A beautiful variety
Of strutting cocks, advancing stout,
And flirting empty chaff about.
Hens, ducks, and geese, and all their brood,
And turkeys gobbling for their food;
While rustics thrash the wealthy floor,
And tempt all to crowd the door.

What a fair face does nature show?
Augusta, wipe thy dusty brow:
A landkip wide salutes my sight,
Of shady vales, and mountains bright;
And azure heavens I behold,
And clouds of silver and of gold.
And now into the fields I go,
Where thousand flaming flowers glow;
And every neighbouring hedge I greet,
With honey-suckles smelling sweet:
Now o'er the daisy meads I stray,
And meet with, as I pace my way,
Sweetly shining on the eye,
A rivulet gliding smoothly by;
Which flows with what an easy tide
The moments of the happy glide.
Here, finding pleasure after pain,
Sleeping, I see a wearied swain,
While his full scrip lies open by,
That does his healthy food supply:

Happy swain, sure happier far
Than lofty kings and princes are!

Enjoy sweet sleep, which shuns the crown,
With all its easy beds of down.

The sun now shows his noon-tide blaze,
And sheds around me burning rays.

A little onward, and I go
Into the shade that groves bestow;
And on green moss I lay me down,
That o'er the root of oak has grown;
Where all is silent, but some flood
That sweetly murmurs in the wood;
But birds that warble in the sprays,
And charm ev'n silence with her lays.

O powerful Silence, how you reign
In the poet's busy brain!
His numerous thoughts obey the calls
Of the tuneful water-falls,
Like moles, when'er the coast is clear,
They rise before thee without fear,
And range in parties here and there.

Some wildly to Parnassus wing,
And view the fair Castalian spring;
Where they behold a lonely well,
Where now no tuneful muses dwell;
But now and then a slavish hind
Paddling the troubled pool they find.

Some trace the pleasing paths of joy,
Others the blissful scene destroy;
In thorny tracks of sorrow stray,
And pine for Clio far away.
But stay—Methinks her lays I hear,
So smooth! so sweet! so deep! so clear!
No, 'tis not her voice I find,
'Tis but the echo stays behind.

Some meditate ambition's brow,
And the black gulf that gapes below:
Some peep in courts, and there they see
The sneaking tribe of flattery.
But, striking to the ear and eye,
A nimble deer comes bounding by!
When rushing from yon rustling spray,
It made them vanish all away.

I rouse me up, and on I rove,
'Tis more than time to leave the grove.
The sun declines, the evening breeze
Begins to whisper through the trees:
And, as I leave the sylvan gloom,
As to the glare of day I come,
An old man's smoky nest I see,
Leaning on an aged tree:
Whose willow walls, and furzy brow,
A little garden sway below.
Through spreading beds of blooming green,
Matted with herbage sweet, and clean,
A vein of water limps along,
And makes them ever green, and young.
Here he puffs upon his spade,
And digs up cabbage in the shade:
His tatter'd rags are sable brown,
His beard and hair are hoary grown:
The dying sap descends apace,
And leaves a wither'd hand and face.

Up * Gronger hill I labour now,
And catch at last his bushy brow.
Oh, how fresh, how pure the air!
Let me breathe a little here.

* A hill in South Wales.

Where am I, nature? I descry
Thy magazine before me lie!
Temples!—and towns!—and towers!—and woods!
And hills!—and vales!—and fields!—and floods!
Crowding before me, edg'd around
With naked wilds, and barren ground.

See, below, the pleasant dome,
The poet's pride, the poet's home,
Which the sun-beams shine upon,
To the even, from the dawn.
See her woods, where echo talks,
Her gardens trim, her terras walks,
Her wildernesses, fragrant brakes,
Her gloomy bowers, and shining lakes.
Keep, ye gods, this humble seat,
For ever pleasant, private, neat.

See yonder hill, uprising steep,
Above the river slow and deep:
It looks from hence a pyramid,
Beneath a verdant forest hid;
On whose high top there rises great,
The mighty remnant of a seat,
An old green tower, whose batter'd brow
Frowns upon the vale below.

Look upon that flowery plain,
How the sheep surround their swain,
How they crowd to hear his strain!
All careless with his legs across,
Leaning on a bank of moss,
He spends his empty hours at play,
Which fly as light as down away.

And there behold a bloomy mead,
A silver stream, a willow shade,
Beneath the shade of fisher stand,
Who, with the angle in his hand,
Swings the nibbling fry to land.

In blushes the descending sun
Kisses the streams, while slow they run;
And yonder hill remoter grows,
Or dusky clouds to interpose.
The fields are left, the labouring hind
His weary oxen does unbind;
And vocal mountains, as they low,
Re-echo to the vales below;
The jocund shepherds piping come,
And drive the herd before them home;
And now begin to light their fires,
Which send up smoke in curling spires!
While with light hearts all homeward tend,
To † Abergasney I descend.

But, oh! how blest'd would be the day,
Did I with Clio pace my way,
And not alone and solitary stray.

THE INQUIRY.

Ye poor little sheep, ah! well may ye stray,
While sad is your shepherd, and Clio away!
Tell where have you been, have you met with my love,
On the mountain, or valley, or meadow, or grove?
Alas-a-day, No—Ye are stray'd, and half dead;
Ye saw not my love, or ye all had been fed.

* The name of a seat belonging to the Author's brother.

Oh, fun, did you see her?—ah! surely you did?
'Mong what willows, or woodbines, or reeds, is she hid?

Ye tall, whistling pines, that on yonder hill grow,
And o'erlook the beautiful valley below,
Did you see her a-roving in wood or in brake?
Or bathing her fair limbs in some silent lake?

Ye mountains that look on the vigorous east,
And the north, and the south, and the wearisome
west,

Pray tell where she hides her, you surely do know,
And let not her lover pine after her so.

Oh, had I the wings of an eagle, I'd fly
Along with bright Phœbus all over the sky;
Like an eagle, look down, with my wings wide
display'd,

And dart in my eyes at each whispering shade:
I'd search every tuft in my diligent tour,
I'd unravel the woodbines, and look in each bower,
Till I found out my Clio, and ended my pain,
And made myself quiet, and happy again.

AN EPISTLE TO A FAMOUS PAINTER.

DELIGHTFUL partner of my heart,
Master of the loveliest art!
How sweet our senses you deceive,
When we, a gazing throng believe!
Here flows the Po!—The Minis there,
Winding about with sedgy hair!
And there the Tyber's yellow flood,
Beneath a thick and gloomy wood!
And there Darius' broken ranks
Upon the Grannic's bloody banks;
Who bravely die, or basely run
From Philip's all-subduing son!
And there the wounded Porus brought
(The bravest man that ever fought!)
To Alexander's tent, who eyes
His dauntless visage, as he lies
In death's most painful agonies.

To me reveal thy heavenly art,
To me thy mysteries impart.
As yet I but in verse can paint,
And to th' idea colour faint
What to the open eye you show,
Seeming nature's living glow!
The beauteous shapes of objects near!
Or distant ones confus'd in air!
The golden eve, the blushing dawn,
Smiling on the lovely lawn!
And pleasing views of checquer'd glades!
And rivers winding through the shades!
And sunny hills!—and pleasant plains!
And groups of merry nymphs and swains!

Or some old building, hid with grass,
Rearing sad its ruin'd face;
Whose columns, frizes, statues, lie,
The grief and wonder of the eye!
Or swift adown a mountain tall:
A foaming cataract's sounding fall;
Whose loud roaring stuns the ear
Of the wondering traveller!
Or a calm and quiet bay,
And a level shining sea!
Or surges rough, that froth, and roar,
And, angry, dash the sounding shore!

And vessels tost! and billows high!
And lightning flashing from the sky!
Or that which gives me most delight,
The fair idea (seeming fight!)
Of warrior fierce, with shining blade!
Or orator, with arms display'd!
Tully's engaging air and mien,
Declaiming against Catiline.
Or fierce Achilles towering high
Above his foes, who round him die.
Or Hercules, with lion's hide,
And knotty cudgel, thrown aside,
Lifting Antæus high in air!
Who, in his gripe, expires there!
Or Sisyphus, with toil and sweat,
And muscles strain'd, striving to get
Up a steep hill a ponderous stone,
Which near the top recoils, and rolls impetuous
Or beauteous Helen's easy air, [down,
With head reclin'd, and flowing hair;
Or comely Paris, gay and young,
Moving with gallant grace along!
These you can do!—I but advance
In a florid ignorance;
And say to you who better know,
You should design them so and so.

TO AARON HILL, ESQ.

ON HIS POEM CALLED GIDEON.

TELL me, wondrous friend, where were you
When Gideon was your lofty song!
Where did the heavenly spirit bear you,
When your fair soul reflected strong
Gideon's actions, as they shin'd
Bright in the chambers of your mind?
Say, have you trod Arabia's spicy vales,
Or gather'd bays beside Euphrates' stream,
Or lonely sung with Jordan's water-falls,
While heavenly Gideon was your sacred
Or have you many ages given [theme?
To close retirement and to books!
And held a long discourse with Heaven,
And notic'd nature in her various looks!
Full of inspiring wonder and delight,
Slow read I Gideon with a greedy eye!
Like a pleas'd traveller that lingers sweet
On some fair and lofty plain
Where the sun does brightly shine,
And glorious prospects all around him lie!
On Gideon's pages beautifully shine,
Surprising pictures rising to my sight,
With all the life of colours and of line,
And all the force of rounding shade and light,
And all the grace of something more divine!
High on a hill, beneath an oak's broad arm,
I see a youth divinely fair,
"Pensive he leans his head on his left hand;
"His smiling eye sheds sweetness mix'd with awe,
"His right hand, with a milk-white wand, some figure seems to draw!
"A nameless grace is scatter'd through his air,
"And o'er his shoulders loosely flows his amber-
"colour'd hair!"
Above, with burning blush the morning glows,
O iii

The waking world all fair before him lies;
 "Slow from the plain the melting dews,
 "To kiss the sun-beams, climbing, rise," &c.
 Methinks the grove of Baal I see,
 In terras'd stages mount up high,
 And wave its sable beauties in the sky, [stone,
 "From stage to stage, broad steps of half-hid
 "With curling moss and blady grass o'ergrown,
 "Lead awful—

Down in a dungeon deep, [light
 "Where through thick walls, oblique, the broken
 "From narrow loop-holes quivers to the light,
 "With swift and furious stride,
 "Close-folded arms, and short and sudden starts,
 "The fretful prince, in dumb and fullen pride,
 "Revolves escape—

Here in red colours glowing hold
 A warlike figure strikes my eye!
 The dreadful sudden fight his foes behold
 Confounded so, they lose the power to fly;
 "Backening they gaze at distance on his face,
 "Admire his posture, and confess his grace;
 "His right hand grasps his planted spear, &c."
 Alas! my muse, thro' much good-will, you err:
 And we the mighty author greatly wrong;
 To gather beauties here and there,
 As but a scatter'd few there were,
 While every word's a beauty in his song!

[Those lines in this Poem marked thus "are taken out of the Poem called Gideon.]

TO MR. SAVAGE,

SON OF THE LATE EARL RIVERS.

SINK not, my friend, beneath misfortune's weight,
 Pleas'd to be found intrinsically great.
 Shame on the dull, who think the soul looks less,
 Because the body wants a glittering dress.
 It is the mind's for ever bright attire,
 The mind's embroidery, that the wise admire!
 That which looks rich to the gross vulgar eyes,
 Is the fop's tinsel, which the grave despise.
 Wealth dims the eyes of crowds, and while they gaze,

The coxcomb's ne'er discover'd in the blaze!
 As few the vices of the wealthy see,
 So virtues are conceal'd by poverty. [shine?

Earl Rivers!—In that name how would'st thou
 Thy verse, how sweet! thy fancy, how divine!
 Critics, and bards would, by their worth, be aw'd,
 And all would think it merit to applaud.
 But thou has nought to please the vulgar eye,
 No title hast, nor what might titles buy.
 Thou wilt small praise, but much ill-nature find,
 Clear to thy errors, to thy beauties blind;
 And if, though few, they any faults can see,
 How meanly bitter will cold censure be!
 But, since we all, the wisest of us, err,
 Sure, 'tis the greatest fault to be severe.

A few, however, yet expect to find,
 Among the misty millions of mankind,
 Who proudly stoop to aid an injur'd cause,
 And o'er the sneer of coxcombs force applause,
 Who, with felt pleasure, see fair virtue rise,
 And lift her upwards to the beckoning prize!
 Or mark her labouring in the modest breast,
 And honour her the more, the more deprest.

Thee, Savage, these (the justly great) admire,
 Thee, quick'ning judgment's phlegm with fancy's
 Thee, slow to censure, earnest to commend, [fire!
 An able critic, but a willing friend.

AN EPISTLE TO A FRIEND IN TOWN*.

HAVE my friends in the town, in the gay busy town

Forgot such a man as John Dyer?
 Or heedless despise they, or pity the clown,
 Whose bosom no pageantries fire?

No matter, no matter—content in the shades—
 (Contented?—why every thing charms me)
 Fall in tunes all adown the green steep, ye cascades,

Till hence rigid virtue alarms me.

Till outrage arises, or misery needs
 The swift, the intrepid avenger;
 Till sacred religion or liberty bleeds,
 Then mine be the deed, and the danger.

Alas! what a folly, that wealth and domain
 We heap up in sin and in sorrow!
 Immense is the toil, yet the labour how vain!
 Is not life to be over to-morrow?

Then glide on my moments, the few that I have Smooth-shaded, and quiet, and even;
 While gently the body descends to the grave,
 And the spirit arises to heaven.

TO MR. DYER. BY CLIO†.

I've done thy merit and my friendship wrong,
 In holding back my gratitude so long;
 The soul is sure to equal transport rais'd,
 That justly praises, or is justly prais'd:
 The generous only can this pleasure know
 Who taste the godlike virtue—to bestow!
 I ev'n grow rich, methinks, while I commend;
 And feel the very praises which I send.
 Nor jealousy nor female envy find,
 Though all the muses are to Dyer kind.

Sing on, nor let your modest fears retard,
 Whose verse and pencil join, to force reward:
 Your claim demands the bays, in double wreath,
 Your poems lighten, and your pictures breathe.

I wish to praise you, but your beauties wrong:
 No theme looks green, in Clio's artless song:
 But yours will an eternal verdure wear,
 For Dyer's fruitful soul will flourish there.
 My humbler lot was in low distance laid;
 I was, oh, hated thought! a woman made;
 For household cares, and empty trifles meant,
 The name does immortality prevent.
 Yet let me stretch, beyond my sex, my mind,
 And, rising, leave the fluttering train behind;
 Nor art, nor learning, wish'd assistance lends,
 But nature, love, and music, are my friends.

* Among the Poems of Savage, there is one to Dyer, in answer to his from the country.

† Among the Poems of Savage, is an Epistle, occasioned by Mr. Dyer's Picture of this Lady.

THE LIFE OF SHENSTONE.

WILLIAM SHENSTONE was the eldest son of Thomas Shenstone, Esq. of the Leafowes, in the parish of Hales-Owen, Shropshire, where he was born, Nov. 18. 1714. His grandfather lived at Ylley in that parish, and occupied his own farm. He afterwards purchased the Leafowes. His eldest son Joseph had Ylley; and he settled, with his son Thomas, at the Leafowes, which they jointly managed as a grazing farm. Thomas, though uneducated, seems to have been a very sensible man, and of liberal sentiments. He married Ann Penn, eldest of the three daughter of William Penn, Esq. of Harborough, in the neighbouring parish of Hagley, in Worcestershire. By the death of her brother, she became co-heiress of that estate, the moiety of which made Shenstone's fortune about 300 l. a-year.

He learned to read of an old dame, whom he has celebrated in The Schoolmistress; and soon received such delight from books, that he expected, when any person went to market, a new book should be brought him, which, when it came, was carried to bed, and laid by him. It is said, that when his request had been neglected, his mother wrapped up a piece of wood of the same form, and pacified him for the night.

As he grew older, he went for a while to the grammar-school in Hales-Owen; and was placed afterwards with the Rev. Mr. Crumpton, an eminent schoolmaster at Solihull, near Birmingham, where he formed an acquaintance with Jago, "the poet of the birds," with whom he corresponded, on the most friendly terms, during life.

He received a good classical education under Mr. Crumpton, who instructed most of the gentlemen's, and some noblemen's sons in that neighbourhood, in the rudiments of classical learning; and seems to have given his pupils a more early taste for the English classics than was commonly done in grammar-schools at that time.

At ten years old, he was deprived of his father; and, in August 1726, of his grandfather; and was, with his brother Joseph, left to the care of his mother, who managed the estate.

His brother was bred an attorney at Bridgnorth, but never practised; and died, unmarried, at the Leafowes, in 1751.

In 1732, he was entered a Commoner at Pembroke College, Oxford, where he employed himself in the study of the mathematics, logic, natural and moral philosophy, and the other sciences usually taught in the University; and amused himself occasionally with English poetry.

About the time when he went to Oxford, the death of his mother devolved his affairs to the care of the Rev. Thomas Dolman of Brome, in Staffordshire, who married Mary Penn, his mother's sister, whose attention he always mentioned with gratitude.

He made but few acquaintance in the University. A degree of bashfulness, from his confined education, joined with a consciousness of his own real abilities, made him not inclined to make advances to strangers; and the singularity of his appearance rather prejudiced some people against him.

According to the taste which then prevailed, every student, as soon as he was entered at the University, cut off his hair, without any regard to his complexion, and put on a wig of any colour that his fancy suggested. This fashion, no consideration could at that time have induced Shenstone to comply with. He thought, justly enough, that every one should, in some degree, consult his particular shape and complexion in adjusting his dress; and that no fashion ought to sanctify what was ungraceful, absurd, or really deformed. He wore his hair almost in the graceful manner, which has since generally prevailed; but as his person was rather large for so young a man, and his hair coarse, it often exposed him to the ill-natured remarks of people of inferior understanding.

The College of which he was a member has long been eminent for English poetry and elegant literature, and was at that time distinguished by the names of Dr. Adams, Dr. Johnson, Blackstone, Mr. Hawkins, afterwards poetry-professor, Anthony Whistler, Esq. of Whitchurch, Oxfordshire, author of the "Shuttlecock," and several ingenious poems in "Doddsley's Collection," Mr. Robert Binnel, author of some learned notes in "Grainger's Tibullus," and Mr. Richard Graves, the present rector of Claverton in Somersetshire, author of "The Spiritual Quixote," "Euphrosyne," "Columella," "Peter of Pontefract," and other ingenious performances.

Mr. Whistler, Mr. Graves, and Mr. Binnel, were his most intimate friends, together with his schoolfellow Jago, of University College; whom he could only visit in private, as he wore a servitor's gown.

They used to meet almost every evening at each other's chambers, where, according to Mr. Graves, "they read plays and poetry, Spectators or Tatlers, and other works of easy digestion, and sipped Florence wine."

His first poetical production worth mentioning, was a little mock heroic poem, called The Diamond, written when he was about nineteen, in imitation of Pope's "Rape of the Lock," which was followed by another poem, called The Snuffbox, equally liable to the objection of being a servile imitation; and therefore they have not been collected in his works.

As his fortune was a very sufficient foundation for a genteel profession, he intended to have taken his degrees, and to have proceeded on the study of physic; but being now of age, and coming into the possession of his estate at the Leasowes, and also to a moiety of the estate at Harborough, which fell to him by the unexpected death of his uncle; as his house at the Leasowes was inhabited by a tenant, instead of boarding there, or in the neighbourhood, he rather prematurely began to keep house at Harborough, which he found furnished to his hands, and, in its primitive state, having been inhabited by the family of the Penns for many generations.

It was situated, according to his own description, (Elegy XV.) by the side of a large pond, shaded by venerable oaks and elms, and rendered more solemn by a colony of rooks, who seemed to have been co-eval with the worthy family that gave them protection.

In this retirement, which suited the natural melancholy of his temper, being his own master, and feeling himself much at his ease, he prolonged his stay beyond what the business of the College regularly admitted. And having once neglected to return to the University at the proper season, he deferred it from time to time, till at length he felt a reluctance to returning at all; so that although he kept his name in the College books ten years, and changed his Commoner's gown for that of a Civilian, after the fourth year, he had now no thoughts of proceeding to any degree, and seldom resided in College any more.

In 1735, he was introduced to Mr. Graves of Mickleton in Gloucestershire, who had lately come with his sister to reside in the country. In this visit he seems to have felt the first symptoms of the tender passion. The beauty and merit of Miss Graves insensibly captivated his affections, and produced that melancholy langour which took entire possession of his heart for some years, and vented itself in plaintive love-songs and "elegies of woe."

At Mickleton also he seems to have conceived, from the improvements of Mr. Graves, the first idea of laying out in the modern taste, and embellishing his farm of the Leasowes, which made him generally known and admired in the world, though it contributed nothing to the advancement of his fortune.

In 1737, he printed, without his name, a small volume of juvenile verses, with the following title: Poems upon various Occasions, written for the Entertainment of the Author, and printed for the Amusement of a few Friends prejudiced in his favour. Contentus paucis lectoribus. Hor. Oxford, Leonard Litchfield, 1737. 12mo. As he got no money, he got but little fame by this publication, it being only circulated among his friends and acquaintance.

In 1740, he made his first visit to London, where he became acquainted with Doddsley, who printed, the same year, his Judgment of Hercules, which he addressed to his neighbour Mr. Lyttleton, afterwards Lord Lyttleton, with whom he became acquainted in 1736, and whose interest he warmly supported in a contested election for Worcestershire, in 1740. This was next year followed by the Schoolmistress, in the style of Spenser, which was written before the Judgment of Hercules, and is justly esteemed the most pleasing of his performances.

About this time he was engaged in a poetical contest with some writers in the "Gentleman's Magazine," against enigmas, in which he called in the assistance of Mr. Whistler, Mr. Graves, and one or two more of his friends.

From about the year 1740 to 1746, he wandered about to acquaint himself with life, and was sometimes at London, and sometimes at Bath, Cheltenham, or other places of public resort; but, from that period, made few excursions at any distance from home.

His uncle, Dolman, to whose care he was indebted for his ease and leisure, died in 1745; and the care of his own fortune now fell upon him.

He lived for some time at the Leafowes, with his tenant Mr. John Shenstone, who was distantly related; but finding that imperfect possession inconvenient, he took the whole estate into his own hands, more to the improvement of its beauty than the increase of its produce.

He had already, on his first coming to board with his tenant, cut a straight walk through his wood, terminated by a small building of rough stone; and, in the corner of a field, he had scooped out a sort of cave, and called it a hermitage; and, a few years after, had built an elegant little summer-house in the water, under a group of beeches; but hitherto he had no conception of disposing his environs in any consistent plan, and giving it its present beautiful and picturesque appearance.

From this time he began to point his prospects, to diversify his surface, to enlarge his walks, and to wind his waters, which he did with such judgment and such fancy, as made his little domain the envy of the great and the admiration of the skilful; a place to be visited by travellers, and copied by designers.

Dr. Johnson observes, that "to plant a walk in undulating curves, and to place a beech at every turn where there is any object to catch the eye," and the like, "demands no great powers of mind;" and that such performances are rather the sport than the business of human reason." The last observation is just; but the planning of pleasure grounds, in the perfection to which it has lately been brought into England, is entitled to a place of considerable rank among the liberal arts, and seems to require as great powers of mind as those which we admire in the descriptive poems of Thomson, or in the noble landscapes of Salvator Rosa, or the Poussins. Mr. Wheatley's ingenious treatise on "Gardening," and Mason's excellent poem on the subject, have given us higher ideas of this science.

The embellishing his farm, however, was by no means the business, but only the amusement of his leisure hours, in retirement. He may, perhaps, be justly blamed, considering his slender patrimony, for not pursuing, as he at first intended, some lucrative and useful profession; but as he chose to resign their emoluments for the charms of ease and independence, he had a right to employ those in so innocent and so elegant a relaxation.

How little indeed he consulted his real happiness in adopting this inactivity, in preference to a more busy plan of life, is but too evident from some of his letters to his most intimate friends; in one of which he expressly declares his conviction, "that the most busy man in the world is much happier than the most idle one."

His visits to the Lyttleton family, the Earls of Stamford and Plymouth, Lord Foley, and Lord Ward, Lady Luxborough, and his other neighbours and relations, and the little alterations and improvements which he was continually making about his farm, amused him agreeably enough in the summer; but in the winter he was generally left a prey to solitude, indolence, and low spirits. "His whole philosophy," says Gray in his "Letters," "consisted in living against his will, in a retirement which his taste had adorned, but which he only enjoyed when people of note came to see and commend it."

He has partly obviated this severe censure in a letter to Mr. B——. "Though I first embellished my farm with an eye to the satisfaction I should receive from its beauty, I am now greatly dependent on the friends it brings me for the principal enjoyment it affords. I am pleased to find them pleased, and enjoy its beauties by reflection. And thus the durable part of my pleasure appears to be of the social kind."

"After a certain time of life," says his friend Mr. Graves, in the "Recollection of some Particulars in his Life," published 1788, "I do not think any consideration would have bribed him to live away from the Leafowes."

"Lyttleton," says Dr. Johnson, "was his neighbour and his rival, whose empire, spacious and opulent, looked with disdain on the petty state that appeared behind it. For a while the inhabitants of Hagley affected to tell their acquaintance of the little fellow that was trying to make himself admired; but when, by degrees, the Leasowes forced themselves into notice, they took care to defeat the curiosity which they could not suppress, by conducting their visitants perversely to inconvenient points of view, and introducing them at the wrong end of a walk to detect a deception; injuries of which Shenstone would heavily complain."

This charge against the Lyttleton family, has been denied, with some degree of warmth, by Mr. Potter, and since by Mr. Graves. The latter says, "The truth of the case, I believe, was, that the Lyttleton family went so frequently with their company to the Leasowes, that they were unwilling to break in upon Mr. Shenstone's retirement on every occasion, and therefore often went to the principal points of view without waiting for any one to conduct them regularly through the whole walks. Of this, Mr. Shenstone would sometimes peevishly complain; though I am persuaded he never really suspected any ill-natured intention in his worthy and much-valued neighbours."

"The pleasure of Shenstone," says Dr. Johnson, "was all in his eye; he valued what he valued merely for its looks; nothing raised his indignation more than to ask if there was any fishes in his water." It is not surprising that the question should raise his indignation, as it certainly betrayed an inattention to the beauties of his place.

"His house was mean," he adds, "and he did not improve it; his care was of his grounds. When he came home from his walks, he might find his floors flooded by a shower through the broken roof; but could spare no money for its reparation. In time, his expences brought clamours about him, that overpowered the lamb's bleat, and the linnet's song; and his groves were haunted by beings very different from fawns and fairies. He spent his estate in adorning it; and his death was probably heightened by his anxieties."

Mr. Graves, however, asserts, that his house was not so mean, or so much neglected as Dr. Johnson's intelligence seems to imply; and expresses his belief, that the facetious intimation of his groves being haunted by duns, is a groundless surmise.

"The same genius was discovered in improving, that, in some measure, appeared in whatever he undertook. He often made his operators remove partitions, the consequence of which, according to their maxims, would prove the downfall of the whole edifice. He gave his hall some air of magnificence, by sinking the floor, and giving it an altitude of ten feet instead of seven. By his own good taste, and his mechanical skill, he acquired two tolerably elegant rooms, from a mere farm-house of diminutive dimensions.

"Mr. Shenstone," he adds, "was too much respected in the neighbourhood to be treated with rudeness; and though his works (frugally as they were managed) added to his manner of living, must necessarily have made him exceed his income, and of course, he might sometimes be distressed for money, yet he had too much spirit to expose himself to insults for trifling sums, and guarded against any great distress by anticipating a few hundreds, which his estate could very well bear, as appeared by what remained to his executors after the payment of his debts, and his legacies to his friends, and annuities of 30 l. a-year to one servant, and of 6 l. to another; for his will was dictated with equal justice and generosity."

Before he was entirely settled, and had taken the Leasowes into his own hands, he wrote the School-mistress and the Judgment of Hercules, and some pieces of a more trivial kind. "He had always," says Mr. Graves, "admired Rowe's song of the Despairing Shepherd, said to have been written on Mr. Addison and the Countess of Warwick. And I believe, on parting from Miss Graves, on some occasion, he first sketched out his Pastoral Ballad, in that style which I saw two or three years before he went to Cheltenham in the summer of 1743. But meeting there, and becoming very intimate with Miss C——, who is still living, [1788] he became so far enamoured as to feel himself unhappy on leaving Cheltenham and the object of his passion. On this, he enlarged and divided it into the four distinct parts, Absence, Hope, Solicitude, and Disappointment.

"Whether Mr. Shenstone was really so deeply in love as he here describes himself, may perhaps be questioned; for, as Lord Shaftesbury observes, "A small foundation of any passion will serve us, not only to act it well, but even to work ourselves into it beyond our own reach." At least, if it were true, as Dr. Johnson asserts, that "he might have obtained the lady to whom his Pastoral Ballad was addressed," it must have been a mere poetical flight to talk as he does of her cruelty and infidelity;

She finil'd,—and I could not but love;
She was faithless,—and I am undone.

“ I hardly can believe, as her sister was married to a baronet of considerable fortune, that Miss C——, in her bloom, would have condescended to marry a man, however deserving, of so small a fortune as Mr. Shenstone. And though, from his acquired habits and taste of life, he could not have been happy with a woman of inferior education, yet, as he was sensible his income was not sufficient to support a lady of Miss C——’s description, he never aspired to that happiness; as he says, in a letter on this occasion, “ marriage was not once the subject of our conversation, nor even love; as I can add from the best authority :

————— nec conjugis unquam
Prætendi tædas, aut hæc in fœdera veni.” VIRG.

After his settlement at the Leasowes, though the embellishment of his farm engaged his thoughts, he occasionally wrote most of his elegies, “ partly,” says he, “ to divert my present impatience, and partly, as it will be a picture of most that passes in my own mind, a portrait which friends may value.”

His first Elegy (the fourth in the collection), called Opheia's Urn, inscribed to Mr. Graves, alludes to a real urn which he had erected in the church at Mickleton, with this inscription :

Utreciæ Smith;
Puellæ simplici, innocuæ, eleganti;
R. G.
Unâ actæ memor pueritiæ
Mærens posuit.
M.DCC.XLIV.

Utrecia Smith was the daughter of a clergyman, who, from the books with which her father supplied her, had formed to herself a good taste of polite literature, and wrote well in prose, and sometimes in verse. A connection of four or five years with a very ingenious clergyman, which, for prudential reasons, he thought proper to break off, proved in its consequence fatal to this extraordinary young woman; and she died soon after, greatly lamented by Shenstone, and many more ingenious young people who had been acquainted with her at her native place.

The Seventh Elegy was written about the end of 1743, after his return from Cheltenham. In his way thither he had missed his road, and wandered till ten o'clock at night on the Cotswould hills. He lays the scene on Orwell's banks, as Wolfey was born at Ipswich in Suffolk.

The last Elegy on Jessy, which has been supposed to relate to an unfortunate and criminal amour of his own, was known by his friends to have been suggested by the story of Miss Godfrey in Richardson's “ Pamelia.”

One of his latest performances was his Ode on rural Elegance, inscribed to the Duchess of Somerset (Countess of Hertford), a lady distinguished for her exalted piety, as well as every other accomplishment. It was sent to the Duchess at Percy Lodge, by Lady Luxborough; with which, and with her Ladyship's account of the Leasowes, and of Shenstone's character, she professed herself highly pleased.

Lady Luxborough was sister to Bolingbroke, an accomplished lady; wrote elegantly, in French and English, in verse and prose. Living unhappily with her lord, she retired to Barrels, an old seat in Warwickshire, which she had fitted up in an elegant style, and made her environs a perfect Arcadia. Shenstone, Somerville, and the neighbouring clergy, wrote pastoral ballads and sonnets in praise of Lady Luxborough and her Arcadia. She died in 1756. Her “ Letters” to Shenstone, which commenced in 1739, and continued to the year of her death, were published in 1775, by Mr. John Hodgetts of Hagley, his executor.

About the year 1750, he had resolution enough to take a journey of near 70 miles across the country, to visit his friend Mr. Whistler, at Whitchurch in Oxfordshire; which, unfortunately, occasioned a temporary coolness and interruption of intercourse between them.

Mr. Whistler lived in an elegant style, and was visited by all the genteel families in the neighbourhood. With manly sense, and a fine genius, he had a delicacy of taste and softness of manners, bordering on effeminacy. He laid a stress on trivial circumstances in his domestic economy, which Shenstone affected to despise. This disposed him one evening to ridicule Mr. Whistler's great solitude in preparing for an entertainment in his house. Instead of dressing for the company, he continued lolling at his ease, and disputing rather perversely on the folly and absurdity of laying a stress upon such trifles. The dispute ran high; and, although he suppressed his choler that evening, yet he curtailed his visit two or three days, and took a cool leave next morning.

Mr. Whistler died in 1754; and it appears, from a letter on his death, that Shenstone still retained the same warmth of affection for his old friend.

"Poor Mr. Whistler! how do all our little disputes appear to us now! yet we may with comfort reflect that they were not of a kind that affected the vitals of our friendship; we fondly loved and esteemed each other—of necessity, tales animas oportuit esse concordēs, &c. Not a single embellishment have I given to my place since he was last here; but I have had his approbation and amusement in my eye."

He paid so great a deference to the taste of Mr. Whistler, that he seldom wrote a letter to him without the utmost care and attention, which made him so much lament the destroying that correspondence after his death.

From this time, he went but seldom from home, and grew daily more indolent and sedentary; but he was always alert and attentive to the claims of friendship and benevolence.

As far as his influence extended, he patronized Miss Wheatley, Mr. Woodhouse, and Mr. Giles, and corrected and improved their poetical compositions. He promoted the publication of Livie's elegant edition of Horace; assisted Mr. Hull in writing his tragedy of "Henry II. or the Fall of Rosamond;" and suggested to Dr. Percy, the present respectable bishop of Dromore, the scheme of publishing his "Reliques of Ancient Poetry;" and, as he gratefully acknowledges, greatly assisted him in that work.

As the disproportion of his fortune to the exigencies of his station was generally known among his friends, some of them, in the latter part of his life, and he himself believed, among others, the present Lord Loughborough applied to Lord Bute to procure him a pension. Such bounty could not have been ever more properly bestowed; but that it was ever asked of the king is not certain. He was made to believe that the patent was actually made out, when his death rendered unnecessary any farther concern of his friends for his future ease and tranquillity in this world.

He had been on a visit to his friend Lord Stamford at Enville, from whence he did not return till Sunday while the people were at church. It was a very cold day; and he was soon after seized with a fever of the putrid kind, which terminated fatally. He died about five on Friday morning, February 11. 1763; and was buried near his brother, under a plain flat stone in the church-yard of Hales-Owen. Afterwards, his friend Mr. Graves erected a neat urn to his memory, in Hales-Owen church, with an inscription, the last line of which has an immediate reference to the place of his interment. An urn was also erected to his memory at Hagley, by his friend Lyttleton; and seats were inscribed to him by Mr. Knight at Wooverly in Worcestershire, and by the Marquis de Girardin at Ermenonville, "the Leafowes of France."

His Works, in Verse and Prose, most of which were never before printed, were collected and published, in 2 vols. 8vo. 1764, with an "Account of his Life," and a "Description of the Leafowes," by his friend Doddsley. A third volume, containing his Letters, was published in 1769. A poetical description of the Leafowes is printed in "Woodhouse's Poems," and in "Giles's Miscellanies." It has been improved by a plain elegant house, built in 1776, by Edward Horne, Esq. the present possessor, who has inscribed a seat near one of the cascades,

To William Shenstone, Esq.
Whose genius first discovered,
Whose amiable manners recommended,
Whose writings adorned
The beauties of this villa,
(Before neglected and unknown)
This seat, with its concomitant stream,
Is dedicated by
E. H.
1776.

The character of Shenstone has been drawn with sufficient accuracy by Dodsley and Mr. Graves. He seems to have had all the virtues and all the imperfections that attend a generous, easy, indolent disposition. To the essential duties and principles of revealed religion he was sincerely attached. Nothing could be more amiable than his social, or more unexceptionable than his moral character. He was the warmest and most affectionate friend, and never an inveterate enemy. In company with strangers, he felt an awkward restraint; where he was free, his conversation was sensible and sprightly. He sometimes indulged himself in strokes of humour; but the tender and pathetic were more congenial to the natural melancholy of his temper. He was fond of pictures, statues, medals, and every article of vertu, without being a virtuoso, or enthusiastically attached to them. In music and painting he had considerable taste and skill. He was fond of trinkets, such as rings, snuff-boxes, &c; and studied and drew sketches for them, from which the Birmingham people improved their toys. In his person, he was larger than the middle size, but rather of a robust than an elegant form. He had a dull heavy look, unless when his features were animated by any sprightly sentiment, which rendered them extremely pleasing. He was remarkable for wearing his gray hair in a particular manner. His favourite dress was a plain blue coat, and a scarlet waistcoat, with a broad gold lace, which he seldom changed either winter or summer.

As a poet, his merit is sufficiently ascertained; simplicity, delicacy, and tenderness, characterize his compositions more than strength and fire. Many of the feeble pieces, that abate our reverence for his genius, were the ebullitions of an active imagination abounding in leisure, and, for want of some useful employment, amusing itself with trifles. The selection was made by Dodsley, who has printed more than he should have done. Yet, under these disadvantages, his writings in the elegiac and pastoral style, justly entitle him to a high place among our English classics.

His prose essays, though many of them unfinished, discover much justness of thought and expression, and a considerable knowledge of the characters of men. His essays on Publications, and on allowing Merit in others, show his critical knowledge of books, and their authors. The Impromptu, and one or two more humorous essays, are in the style of Addison. His unconnected thoughts on Gardening, and on Men and Manners, discover, in general, his profound penetration and exquisite taste on almost every subject. Many of them have been adopted by men of more learning, but less genius, in finished treatises. Dr. Enfield has made some use of them in his "Speaker," and Mr. Pratt has formed his "Shenstone-Green" upon one of his speculations.

Shenstone is chiefly admired as an elegiac and pastoral writer. In his elegiac capacity, he seems to have formed himself principally on the tender, the easy, and sweetly plaintive Hammond; whom, if he has not equalled in some departments of beauty, he has excelled in others. Hammond is generally more easy in his expression, more natural and passionate; but he is frequently less elegant; and, from too close a classical imitation, infinitely less original than Shenstone; who may, in some measure, claim the merit of originality in extending this species of poetry to so great a variety of subjects. Most of his elegies convey some moral instruction; and the expression and the imagery are generally tender and poetical. The fourth, the seventh, the tenth, eleventh, sixteenth, and twenty-sixth, deserve particular commendation.

In the seventh elegy, the introduction, the awful appearance of the vision, the contrast between the dangerous heights of ambition and the security of an humble station, and above all, the sudden disappearance of Wolsey's shadow (disconcerted by the force of truth) is admirably expressed:

The troubled vision cast a mournful glance;
And, sighing, vanish'd in the shades of night.

In the sixteenth elegy, he exhibits the strongest conflict between love and pride that can possibly be imagined, in the person of a lady whose affections had been fixed on an inferior object, in consequence of which, her reason became the victim of her haughtiness.

The twenty-sixth elegy, which describes the melancholy event of a licentious amour, is, both with regard to the subject and the manner of execution, one of the most affecting poems in our language.

His Pastoral Ballad has been universally admired, as excellent in its kind; a species of poetry, in which, from his real situation in life, a genius like Shenstone's could not but excel. Akenfide preferred it to every thing of the kind, either ancient or modern. And the rank which it still preserves among young people of the best taste, is a sufficient proof of its merit. Dr. Johnson, who had an aversion to pastorals in general, only "regrets that it is pastoral," and "sickens at the mention of the crook, the pipe, the sheep, and the kids." But the ideas of rural innocence and simplicity are so congenial to the human mind, in its uncorrupted state, that, in spite of ridicule, they will always please the generality of mankind.

Of his lyric pieces, the Ode on Rural Elegance, Ode to Memory, Verses written towards the close of the Year 1748, the Princess Elizabeth, the Sky-Lark, Nancy of the Vale, and Jemmy Dawson, deserve the highest praise. The first is an irregular ode; but the subject, which was then new, is treated in an agreeable manner, and illustrated with many pleasing instances, particularly with that of the amiable lady to whom it is inscribed, who had embellished Percy-Lodge with great taste, and had there reconciled Art and Nature, who are represented as having been long at variance. It concludes with an elegant apostrophe to the inhabitants of the groves to amuse, but not disturb the noble recluse in her solitude.

The Schoolmistress, Dr. Johnson pronounces "the most pleasing of his performances." Warburton (who read every thing), was of the same opinion; and with them the critics and the general readers of poetry agree. Though partly a burlesque poem, it abounds with picturesque strokes, and serious instruction. Of his Judgment of Hercules, the general opinion is justly favourable.

From the contempt which Dr. Johnson has thrown on his Moral Pieces in blank verse, he might have excepted the poem on Economy, addressed to young poets. "I would have ventured," says Mr. Graves, "to pronounce it not inferior to Philips's Splendid Shilling," if Mr. Shenstone had lived to correct his own manuscripts, and to prune off some few excrescences and luxuriations of youth when this poem was partly written, though not brought to its present state till he began to experience the futility of that youthful rant, "that economy was beneath the care of a rational creature."

Shenstone enjoyed an intimacy with some of the most eminent of his poetical contemporaries, and carried on an occasional correspondence with persons distinguished for their learning, taste, and good sense. Thomson, Lyttleton, Somerville, Jago, Dodsley, Spence, &c. bear ample testimony to his genius and abilities.

Mr. Wheatley, in his ingenious and elaborate treatise "on Gardening," has paid a just tribute to Shenstone, both as a man of taste and as a poet.

"An allusion to the ideas of pastoral poetry evidently enters into the design of the Leaflowes, where they appear so lovely as to endear the memory of their author, and justify the reputation of Mr. Shenstone, who inhabited, made, and celebrated the place. It is a perfect picture of his mind, simple, elegant, and amiable, and will always suggest a doubt whether the spot inspired his verse, or whether, in the scenes which he formed, he only realised the pastoral images which abound in his songs."

Gray's opinion of Shenstone, is very unfavourable to his character, both as a writer and a man of sense. "There is Mr. Shenstone, who trusts to nature and simple sentiment, why does he do no better? he goes hopping along his own gravel walks, and never deviates from the beaten path for fear of being lost." This remark, which was made on his pieces in the two last volumes of Dodsley's "Collection," implies some opinion of Shenstone's poetical merit, or why should Gray expect him to do better? It is also a compliment to his discretion, in not launching forth beyond his depth, but confining himself to subjects which he found proportioned to his strength. His Ode to Memory, and his Pastoral Ballad, are not, however, such performances in their kind as make Shenstone an object of compassion.

What Gray thought of him from the perusal of his Letters is more severe, as he makes him guilty of a restless ambition and a ridiculous vanity. "I have read an octavo volume of Shenstone's letters. Poor man! he was always wishing for money, for fame, and other distinctions; and his whole philosophy consisted in living against his will in retirement, and in a place which his taste had adorned, but which he only enjoyed when people of note came to see and commend it; his correspondence is about nothing else but this place and his own writings, with two or three neighbouring clergymen who wrote verses too." Some of his letters are, no doubt, very trivial; but his personal character appears in them in the same amiable light as in his poetical compositions; they contain the "history of his mind for the last 24 years of his life."

His letters on the death of his brother are the genuine effusions of a feeling heart, pierced with the most poignant grief and affliction. His account of the people of rank who came to see his place, he wrote only to two of his most intimate friends, Jago and Mr. Graves, among the ordinary occurrences of his life.

His character, as given by Dr. Johnson, cannot be generally allowed, without making considerable exceptions in favour of the comprehensiveness of his mind, the activity of his curiosity, and the variety of his knowledge. The concluding criticism is unreasonably severe. Had his mind been better stored with knowledge, he certainly would have been great; with his present store, he is universally allowed to be agreeable.

"His poems consist of elegies, odes, and ballads, humorous sallies, and moral pieces."

"His conception of an elegy he has in his Preface very judiciously and discriminately explained. It is, according to his account, the effusion of a contemplative mind, sometimes plaintive, and always serious, and therefore superior to the glitter of flight ornaments. His compositions suit not ill to this description. His topics of praise are the domestic virtues, and his thoughts are pure and simple; but, wanting combination, they want variety. The peace of solitude, the innocence of inactivity, and the unenvied security of an humble station can fill but a few pages. That of which the essence is uniformity, will be soon described. His elegies have therefore too much resemblance of each other.

"The lines are sometimes such as elegy requires, smooth and easy; but to this praise his claim is not constant; his diction is often harsh, improper, and affected, his words ill coined or ill chosen, and his phrase unskilfully inverted.

"The Lyric Poems are almost all of the light and airy kind, such as trip lightly and nimbly along, without the load of any weighty meaning. From these, however, Rural Elegance has some right to be excepted. I once heard it praised by a very learned lady; and, though the lines are irregular, and the thoughts diffused with too much verbosity, yet it cannot be denied to contain both philosophical argument and poetical spirit.

"Of the rest, I cannot think any excellent; the Sky-Lark pleases me best, which has, however, more of the epigram than of the ode.

"But the four parts of the Pastoral Ballad demands particular notice. I cannot but regret that it is pastoral; an intelligent critic, acquainted with the scenes of real life, sickens at the mention of the crook, the pipe, the sheep, and the kids, which it is not necessary to bring forward to notice; for the poet's art is selection, and he ought to show the beauties without the grossness of a country life.

"In the first part are two passages, to which, if any mind denies its sympathy, it has no acquaintance with love or nature:

I priz'd every hour that went by,
Beyond all that had pleas'd me before, &c.

"In the second, this passage has its prettiness, though it is not equal to the former:

I have found out a gift for my fair;
I have found where the wood-pigeons breed, &c.

"In the third, he mentions the common places of amorous poetry with some address:

'Tis his with mock passion to glow, &c.

"In the fourth, I find nothing better than this natural strain of Hope:

Alas! from the day that we met,
What hope of an end to my woes? &c.

"His Levities are, by their title, exempted from the severities of criticism; yet it may be remarked, in a few words, that his humour is sometimes gross, and seldom sprightly.

"Of his Moral Poems, the first is the Choice of Hercules, from Xenophon. The numbers are smooth, the diction elegant, and the thoughts just; but something of vigour is still to be wished, which it might have had by brevity and compression. His Fate of Delicacy has an air of gaiety, but not a very pointed or general moral. His blank verses, those that can read them, may probably find to be like the blank verses of his neighbours. Love and Honour is derived from the old ballad, "Did you not hear of a Spanish Lady?" I wish it well enough to wish it were in rhyme.

"The Schoolmistress, of which I know not what claim it has to stand among the moral works, is surely the most pleasing of Shenstone's performances. The adoption of a particular style, in light and short compositions, contribute much to the increase of pleasure; we are entertained at once with two imitations, of nature in the sentiments, of the original author in the style; and between them the mind is kept in perpetual employment.

"The general recommendation of Shenstone, is easiness and simplicity; his general defect, is want of comprehension and variety. Had his mind been better stored with knowledge, whether he could have been great I know not; he could certainly have been agreeable."

A PREFATORY ESSAY ON ELEGY.

It is observable, that discourses prefixed to poetry are contrived very frequently to inculcate such tenets as may exhibit the performance to the greatest advantage. The fabric is very commonly raised in the first place, and the measures, by which we are to judge of its merit, are afterwards adjusted.

There have been few rules given us by the critics concerning the structure of elegiac poetry; and far be it from the author of the following trifles to dignify his own opinions with that denomination. He would only intimate the great variety of subjects, and the different styles in which the writers of elegy have hitherto indulged themselves, and endeavour to shield the following ones by the latitude of their example.

If we consider the etymology * of the word, the epithet which † Horace gives it, or the confession which ‡ Ovid makes concerning it, I think we may conclude thus much, however, that elegy, in its true and genuine acceptation, includes a tender and querulous idea: that it looks upon this as its peculiar characteristic, and so long as this is thoroughly sustained, admits of a variety of subjects; which, by its manner of treating them, it renders them its own. It throws its melancholy stole over pretty different objects; which, like the dresses at a funeral procession, gives them all a kind of solemn and uniform appearance.

It is probable that elegies were written at first upon the death of intimate friends and near rela- tions; celebrated beauties, or favourite mistresses; beneficent governors and illustrious men: one may add perhaps, of all those, who are placed by Virgil in the laurel-grove of his Elysium. (See Hurd's Dissertation on Horace's Epistle.)

"Quique sui memores alios fecere merendo."

After these subjects were sufficiently exhausted, and the severity of fate displayed in the most affecting instances, the poets sought occasion to vary their complaints; and the next tender species of sorrow that presented itself, was the grief of absent or neglected lovers. And this indulgence might be indeed allowed them; but with this they were not contented. They had obtained a small corner in the province of love, and they took advantage, from thence, to over-run the whole territory. They sung its spoils, triumphs, ovations, and rejoicings*, as well as the captivity and exequies that attended it. They gave the name of elegy to their pleasantries as well as lamentations; till at last, through their abundant fondness for the myrtle, they forgot that the cypress was their peculiar garland.

In this it is probable they deviated from the original design of elegy; and it should seem, that any kind of subjects, treated in such a manner as to diffuse a pleasing melancholy, might far better deserve the name, than the facetious mirth and libertine festivity of the successful votaries of love.

But not to dwell too long upon an opinion which may seem perhaps introduced to favour the following performance, it may not be improper

* ε-λεγος, ε particulam dolendi.

to examine into the use and end of elegy. The most important end of all poetry is to encourage virtue. Epic and tragedy chiefly recommend the public virtues; elegy is of a species which illustrates and endears the private. There is a truly virtuous pleasure connected with many pensive contemplations, which it is the province and excellency of elegy to enforce. This, by presenting suitable ideas, has discovered sweets in melancholy which we could not find in mirth; and has led us with success to the dusty urn, when we could draw no pleasure from the sparkling bowl; as pastoral conveys an idea of simplicity and innocence, it is in particular the task and merit of elegy to show the innocence and simplicity of rural life to advantage: and that, in a way distinct from pastoral, as much as the plain but judicious landlord may be imagined to surpass his tenant both in dignity and understanding. It should also tend to elevate the more tranquil virtues of humility, disinterestedness, simplicity, and innocence: but then there is a degree of elegance and refinement, no way inconsistent with these rural virtues; and that raises elegy above that merum rus, that unpolished rusticity, which has given our pastoral writers their highest reputation.

Wealth and splendour will never want their proper weight: the danger is, lest they should too much preponderate. A kind of poetry therefore which throws its chief influence into the other scale, that magnifies the sweets of liberty and independence, that endears the honest delights of love and friendship, that celebrates the glory of a good name after death, that ridicules the futile arrogance of birth, that recommends the innocent amusement of letters, and insensibly prepares the mind for that humanity it inculcates, such a kind of poetry may chance to please; and if it please, should seem to be of service.

As to the style of elegy, it may be well enough determined from what has gone before. It should imitate the voice and language of grief, or if a metaphor of dress be more agreeable, it should be simple and diffuse, and flowing as a mourner's veil. A versification therefore is desirable, which, by indulging a free and unconstrained expression, may admit of that simplicity which elegy requires.

Heroic metre, with alternate rhyme, seems well enough adapted to this species of poetry; and, however exceptionable upon other occasions, its inconveniencies appear to lose their weight in shorter elegies: and its advantages seem to acquire an additional importance. The world has an admirable example of its beauty in a collection of elegies not long since published; the product of a gentleman * of the most exact taste, and whose untimely death merits all the tears that elegy can shed.

It is not impossible that some may think this metre too lax and prosaic: others, that even a more dissolute variety of numbers may have superior advantages. And, in favour of these last, might be produced the example of Milton in his Lycidas, together with one or two recent and beautiful imitations of his versification in that monody. But this kind of argument, I am apt to think, must prove too much; since the writers I have in view seem capable enough of recommending any metre they shall choose; though it must be owned also, that the choice they make of any, is at the same time the strongest presumption in its favour.

Perhaps it may be no great difficulty to compromise the dispute. There is no one kind of metre that is distinguished by rhymes, but is liable to some objection or other. Heroic verse, where every second line is terminated by a rhyme, (with which the judgment requires that the sense should in some measure also terminate) is apt to render the expression either scanty or constrained. And this is sometimes observable in the writings of a poet lately deceased; though I believe no one ever threw so much sense together with so much ease into a couplet as Mr. Pope. But, as an air of constraint too often accompanies this metre, it seems by no means proper for a writer of elegy.

The previous rhyme in Milton's Lycidas is very frequently placed at such a distance from the following, that it is often dropt by the memory (much better employed in attending to the sentiment) before it be brought to join its partner: and this seems to be the greatest objection to that kind of versification. But then the peculiar ease and variety it admits of, are no doubt sufficient to overbalance the objection, and to give it the preference to any other, in an elegy of length.

The chief objection to which stanza of all kinds is liable, is, that it breaks the sense too regularly, when it is continued through a long poem. And this may be perhaps the fault of Mr. Waller's excellent panegyric. But if this fault be less discernible in smaller compositions, as I suppose it is, I flatter myself, that the advantages I have before mentioned resulting from alternate rhyme (with which stanza is, I think, connected) may, at least in shorter elegies, be allowed to outweigh its imperfections.

I shall say but little of the different kinds of elegy. The melancholy of a lover is different, no doubt, from what we feel on other mixed occasions. The mind in which love and grief at once predominate, is softened to an excess. Love-elegy therefore is more negligent of order and design, and being addressed chiefly to the ladies, requires little more than tenderness and perspicuity. Elegies, that are formed upon promiscuous incidents, and addressed to the world in general, inculcate some sort of moral, and admit a different degree of reasoning, thought, and ardour.

The author of the following elegies entered on his subjects occasionally, as particular incidents in life suggested, or dispositions of mind recommended them to his choice. If he describes a rural landscape, or unfolds the train of sentiments it inspired, he fairly drew his picture from the spot; and felt very sensibly the affection he communicates. If he speaks of his humble shed, his flocks and his fleeces, he does not counterfeit the scene; who having (whether through choice or necessity, is not material) retired betimes to country-solitudes, and sought his happiness in rural-employments, has a right to consider himself as a real shepherd. The flocks, the meadows, and the grottos, are his own, and the embellishment of his farm his sole amusement. As the sentiments therefore were inspired by nature, and that in the earlier part of his life, he hopes they will retain a natural appearance: diffusing at least some part of that amusement, which he freely acknowledges he received from the composition of them.

There will appear perhaps a real inconsistency in the moral tenor of the several elegies; and the subsequent ones may sometimes seem a recantation of the preceding. The reader will scarce impute this to oversight; but will allow, that men's opinions as well as tempers vary; that neither public nor private, active nor speculative life, are unexceptionably happy, and consequently that any change of opinion concerning them may afford an additional beauty to poetry, as it gives us a more striking representation of life.

If the author has hazarded, throughout, the use of English or modern allusions, he hopes it will not be imputed to an entire ignorance, or to the least dislike, of the ancient learning. He has kept the ancient plan and method in his eye, though he builds his edifice with the materials of his own nation. In other words, through a fondness for his native country, he has made use of the flowers it produced, though, in order to exhibit them to the greater advantage, he has endeavoured to weave his garland by the best model he could find: with what success, beyond his own amusement, must be left to judges less partial to him than either his acquaintance or his friends.--- If any of those should be so candid, as to approve the variety of subjects he has chosen, and the tenderness of sentiment he has endeavoured to impress, he begs the metre also may not be too suddenly condemned. The public ear, habituated of late to a quicker measure, may perhaps consider this as heavy and languid; but an objection of that kind may gradually lose its force, if this measure should be allowed to suit the nature of elegy.

If it should happen to be considered, as an object with others, that there is too much of a moral cast diffused through the whole; it is replied, that he endeavoured to animate the poetry so far as not to render this objection too obvious; or to risk excluding the fashionable reader: at the same time never deviating from a fixed principle, that poetry without morality is but the blossom of a fruit-tree. Poetry is indeed like that species of plants, which may bear at once both fruits and blossoms; and the tree is by no means in perfection without the former, however it may be embellished by the flowers which surround it.

ELEGY I.

He arrives at his retirement in the country, and takes occasion to expatiate in praise of simplicity.

TO A FRIEND.

FOR rural virtues, and for native skies,
I bade Augusta's venal sons farewell;
Now 'mid the trees I see my smoke arise;
Now hear the fountains bubbling round my cell.
O may that genius, which secures my rest,
Preserve this villa for a friend that's dear!
Ne'er may my vintage glad the sordid breast;
Ne'er tinge the lip that dares be unsincere!
Far from these paths, ye faithless friends, depart!
Fly my plain board, abhor my hostile name!
Hence! the faint verse that flows not from the heart, [fame!
But mourns, in labour'd strains, the price of
O lov'd simplicity, be thine the prize!
Assiduous art correct her page in vain!
His be the palm, who, guiltless of disguise,
Conterms the power, the dull resource to feign!
Still may the mourner, lavish of his tears
For lucre's venal meed, invite my scorn!
Still may the bard dissembling doubts and fears,
For praise, for flattery sighing, sigh forlorn!
Soft as the line of love-sick Hammond flows;
'Twas his fond heart effus'd the melting theme;

Ah! never could Aonia's hill disclose
So fair a fountain, or so lov'd a stream.

Ye loveless bards! intent with artless pains
To form a sigh, or to contrive a tear!
Forego your Pindus, and on ——— plains
Survey Camilla's charms, and grow sincere.

But thou, my friend! while in thy youthful soul
Love's gentle tyrant seats his awful throne,
Write from thy bosom—let not art controul
The ready pen, that makes his edicts known.

Pleasing, when youth is long expir'd, to trace
The forms our pencil, or our pen design'd!
"Such was our youthful air, and shape, and face!"
"Such the soft image of our youthful mind!"

Soft whilst we sleep beneath the rural bowers,
The loves and graces steal unseen away;
And where the turf diffus'd its pomp of flowers,
We wake to wintry scenes of chill decay!

Curse the sad fortune that detains thy fair;
Praise the soft hours that gave thee to her arms;
Paint thy proud scorn of every vulgar care,
When hope exalts thee, or when doubt alarms.

Where with Oenone thou hast worn the day,
Near fount or stream, in meditation, rove;
If in the grove Oenone lov'd to stray,
The faithful muse shall meet thee in the grove.

ELEGY II.

On posthumous reputation.

TO A FRIEND.

O GRIEF of griefs ! that envy's frantic ire
Should rob the living virtue of its praise ;
O foolish muses ! that with zeal inspire
To deck the cold insensate shrine with bays !

When the free spirit quits her humble frame,
To tread the skies with radiant garlands crown'd,
Say, will she hear the distant voice of fame ?
Or, hearing, fancy sweetness in the sound ?

Perhaps ev'n genius pours a slighted lay ;
Perhaps ev'n friendship sheds a fruitless tear ;
Ev'n Lyttleton but vainly trims the bay,
And fondly graces Hammond's mournful bier.

Though weeping virgins haunt his favour'd urn,
Renew their chaplets, and repeat their sighs ;
Though near his tomb, Sabæan odours burn,
The loitering fragrance will it reach the skies ?

No, should his Delia votive wreaths prepare,
Delia might place the votive wreaths in vain :
Yet the dear hope of Delia's future care
Once crown'd his pleasures, and dispell'd his pain.

Yes—the fair prospect of surviving praise
Can every sense of present joys excel :
For this, great Hadrian chose laborious days ;
Through this, expiring, bade a gay farewell.

Shall then our youths, who fame's bright fabric raise,
To life's precarious date confine their care ?

O teach them you, to spread the sacred base,
To plan a work, through latest ages fair !

Is it with small transport, as with curious eye
You trace the story of each Attic sage,
To think your blooming praise shall time defy ?
Shall waft like odours through the pleasing page ?

To mark the day, when through the bulky tome,
Around your name the varying style refines ?
And readers call their lost attention home,
Led by that index where true genius shines ?

Ah let not Britons doubt their social aim,
Whose ardent bosom catch this ancient fire !
Cold interest melts before the vivid flame,
And patriot ardours but with life expire !

ELEGY III.

On the untimely death of a certain learned acquaintance.

If proud Pygmalion quit his cumbrous frame,
Funereal pomp the scanty tear supplies ;
Whilst heralds loud with venal voice proclaim,
Lo ! here the brave and the puissant lies.

When humbler Alcon leaves his drooping friends,
Pageant nor plume distinguish Alcon's bier ;
The faithful muse with votive song attends,
And blots the mournful numbers with a tear.

He little knew the sly penurious art ;
That odious art which fortune's favourites know ;
Form'd to bestow, he felt the warmest heart,
But envious fate forbade him to bestow.

He little knew to ward the secret wound ;
He little knew that mortals could ensnare ;
Virtue he knew ; the noblest joy he found,
To sing her glories, and to paint her fair !

Ill was he skill'd to guide his wandering sheep ;
And unforeseen disaster thinn'd his fold ;
Yet at another's loss the swain would weep ;
And, for his friend, his very crook was fold.

Ye sons of wealth ! protect the muse's train !
From winds protect them, and with food supply ;
Ah ! helpless they, to ward the threaten'd pain !
The meagre famine, and the wintry sky !

He lov'd a nymph : amidst his slender store,
He dar'd to love ; and Cynthia was his theme ;
He breath'd his plaints along the rocky shore,
They only echo'd o'er the winding stream !

His nymph was fair ! the sweetest bud that blows
Revives less lovely from the recent shower ;
So Philomel enamour'd eyes the rose ;
Sweet bird ! enamour'd of the sweetest flower !

He lov'd the muse ; she taught him to complain ;
He saw his timorous loves on her depend ;
He lov'd the muse ; although she taught in vain ;
He lov'd the muse, for she was virtue's friend.

She guides the foot that treads on Parian floors ;
She wins the ear when formal pleas are vain ;
She tempts patricians from the fatal doors
Of vice's brothel, forth to virtue's fane.

He wish'd for wealth, for much he wish'd to give ;
He griev'd that virtue might not wealth obtain ;
Piteous of woes, and hopeless to relieve,
The penfive prospect sadden'd all his strain.

I saw him faint ! I saw him sink to rest !
Like one ordain'd to swell the vulgar throng ;
As though the virtues had not warm'd his breast,
As though the muses not inspir'd his tongue.

I saw his bier ignobly cross the plain ;
Saw peasant hands the pious rite supply ;
The generous rustics mourn'd the friendly swain,
But power and wealth's unvarying cheek was dry !

Such Alcon fell ; in meagre want forlorn !
Where were ye then, ye powerful patrons, where ?

Would ye the purple should your limbs adorn,
Go wash the conscious blemish with a tear.

ELEGY IV.

Ophelia's Urn.

TO MR. GRAVES.

THROUGH the dim veil of evening's dusky shade,
Near some lone fane, or yew's funereal green,
What dreary forms has magic fears survey'd !
What shrouded spectres superstition seen !

But you secure shall pour your sad complaint,
Nor dread the meagre phantom's wan array;
What none but fear's officious hand can paint,
What none, but superstition's eye, survey.

The glimmering twilight and the doubtful dawn
Shall see your step to these sad scenes return:
Constant, as crystal dew's impearl the lawn,
Shall Strephon's tear bedew Ophelia's urn!

Sure nought unhallow'd shall presume to stray
Where sleep the relics of that virtuous maid:
Nor aught unlovely bend its devious way,
Where soft Ophelia's dear remains are laid.

Haply thy muse, as with unceasing sighs
She keeps late vigils on her urn reclin'd,
May see light groups of pleasing visions rise;
And phantoms glide, but of celestial kind.

There fame, her clarion pendant at her side,
Shall seek forgiveness of Ophelia's shade;
"Why has such worth, without distinction, dy'd
"Why, like the desert's lily, bloom'd to fade?"

Then young simplicity, averse to feign,
Shall unmolested breathe her softest sigh:
And candour with unwonted warmth complain,
And innocence indulge a wailful cry.

Then elegance, with coy judicious hand,
Shall cull fresh flowrets for Ophelia's tomb:
And beauty chide the Fates' severe command,
That show'd the frailty of so fair a bloom!

And fancy then, with wild ungovern'd woe,
Shall her lov'd pupil's native taste explain;
For mournful fable all her hues forego,
And ask sweet solace of the muse in vain!

Ah, gentle forms, expect no fond relief;
Too much the sacred Nine their loss deplore:
Well may ye grieve, nor find an end of grief—
Your best, your brightest favourite is no more.

ELEGY V.

He compares the turbulence of love with the tranquillity of friendship.

TO MELISSA HIS FRIEND.

FROM love, from angry love's inclement reign
I pass a while to friendship's equal skies;
Thou, generous maid, reliev'st my partial pain,
And cheer'st the victim of another's eyes.

'Tis thou, Melissa, thou deserv'st my care:
How can my will and reason disagree?
How can my passion live beneath despair!
How can my bosom sigh for aught but thee?

Ah dear Melissa! pleas'd with thee to rove,
My soul has yet surviv'd its dreariest time;
Ill can I bear the various clime of love!
Love is a pleasing, but a various clime!

So smiles immortal Maro's favourite shore,
Parthenope, with every verdure crown'd!
When strait Vesuvio's horrid cauldrons roar,
And the dry vapour blasts the regions round.

Oh blissful regions! oh unrival'd plains!
When Maro to these fragrant haunts retir'd!
Oh fatal realms! and oh accurs'd domains!
When Pliny, 'mid sulphureous clouds, expir'd!

So smiles the surface of the treacherous main,
As o'er its waves the peaceful halcyons play;
When soon rude winds their wonted rule regain,
And sky and ocean mingle in the fray.

But let or air contend, or ocean rave;
Ev'n hope subside amid the billows tost;
Hope, still emergent, still contemns the wave,
And not a feature's wonted smile is lost.

ELEGY VI.

TO A LADY ON THE LANGUAGE OF BIRDS.

COME then, Dione, let us range the grove,
The science of the feather'd choirs explore:
Hear linnets argue, larks descant of love,
And blame the gloom of solitude no more.

My doubt subsides---'tis no Italian song,
Nor senseless ditty, cheers the vernal tree:
Ah! who, that hears Dione's tuneful tongue,
Shall doubt that music may with sense agree?

And come, my muse! that lov'st the sylvan shade;
Evolve the mazes, and the mist dispel:
Translate the song; convince my doubting maid,
No solemn dervise can explain so well----

Pensive beneath the twilight shades I fate,
The slave of hopeless vows, and cold disdain!
When Philomel address'd his mournful mate,
And thus I construed the mellifluous strain.

"Sing on, my bird---the liquid notes prolong,
At every note a lover sheds his tear;
Sing on, my bird---'tis Damon hears thy song;
Nor doubt to gain applause, when lovers hear.

He the sad source of our complaining knows;
A foe to Tereus, and to lawless love!
He mourns the story of our ancient woes;
Ah could our music his complaints remove!

Yon' plains are govern'd by a peerless maid;
And see pale Cynthia mounts the vaulted sky,
A train of lovers court the chequer'd shade;
Sing on, my bird, and hear thy mate's reply:

Erewhile no shepherd to these woods retir'd;
No lover blest the glow-worm's pallid ray:
But ill-star'd birds, that listening not admir'd,
Or listening envy'd our superior lay.

Cheer'd by the sun, the vassals of his power,
Let such by day unite their jarring strains!
But let us choose the calm, the silent hour,
Nor want fit audience while Dione reigns."

ELEGY VII.

He describes his vision to an acquaintance.

"Cætera per terras omnes animalia, &c.

VIRG.

ON distant heaths, beneath autumnal skies,
Pensive I saw the circling shades descend;
P p iij

Weary and faint I heard the storm arise,
 While the sun vanish'd, like a faithless friend.
 No kind companion led my steps aright;
 No friendly planet lent its glimmering ray;
 Ev'n the lone cot refus'd its wonted light,
 Where toil in peaceful slumber clos'd the day.
 Then the dull bell had given a pleasing sound;
 The village cur 'twere transport then to hear;
 In dreadful silence all was hush'd around,
 While the rude storm alone distress'd mine ear.
 As led by Orwell's winding banks I stray'd,
 Where towering Wolfey breath'd his native air;
 A sudden lustre chas'd the flitting shade,
 The sounding winds were hush'd, and all was fair.
 Instant a grateful form appear'd confest;
 White were his locks, with awful scarlet crown'd,
 And livelier far than Tyrian seem'd his vest,
 That with the glowing purple ting'd the ground.
 "Stranger, he said, amid this pealing rain,
 Benighted, lonesome, whither would'st thou stray?
 Does wealth or power thy weary step constrain?
 Reveal thy wish, and let me point the way.
 For know I trod the trophy'd paths of power;
 Felt every joy that fair ambition brings;
 And left the lonely roof of yonder bower,
 To stand beneath the canopies of kings.
 I bade low hinds the towering ardour share;
 Nor meanly rose, to bless myself alone:
 I snatch'd the shepherd from his fleecy care,
 And bade his wholesome dictate guard the throne.
 Low at my feet the suppliant peer I saw;
 I saw proud empires my decision wait;
 My will was duty, and my word was law,
 My smile was transport, and my frown was fate."
 Ah me! said I, nor power I seek, nor gain;
 Nor urg'd by hope of fame these toils endure;
 A simple youth, that feels a lover's pain,
 And, from his friend's condolence, hopes a cure.
 He, the dear youth, to whose abodes I roam,
 Nor can mine honours, nor my fields extend;
 Yet for his sake I leave my distant home,
 Which oaks embosom, and which hills defend.
 Beneath that home I scorn the wintery wind;
 The spring, to shade me, robes her fairest tree;
 And if a friend my grass-grown threshold find,
 O how my lonely cot resounds with glee!
 Yet, though averse to gold in heaps amass'd,
 I wish to bless, I languish to bestow;
 And though no friend to fame's obstreperous blast,
 Still, to her dulcet murmurs not a foe.
 Too proud with servile tone to deign address;
 Too mean to think that honours are my due:
 Yet, should some patron yield my stores to bless,
 I sure should deem my boundless thanks were few.

But tell me, thou! that, like a meteor's fire,
 Shot'st blazing forth; disdaining dull degrees;
 Should I to wealth, to fame, to power aspire,
 Must I not pass more rugged paths than these?
 Must I not groan beneath a guilty load,
 Praise him I scorn, and him I love betray?
 Does not felonious envy bar the road?
 Or falsehood's treacherous foot beset the way?
 Say, should I pass through favour's crowded gate,
 Must not fair truth inglorious wait behind?
 Whilst I approach the glittering scenes of state,
 My best companion no admittance find?
 Nurs'd in the shades by freedom's lenient care,
 Shall I the rigid sway of fortune own?
 Taught by the voice of pious truth, prepare
 To spurn an altar, and adore a throne?
 And when proud fortune's ebbing tide recedes,
 And when it leaves me no unshaken friend,
 Shall I not weep that e'er I left the meads,
 Which oaks embosom, and which hills defend?
 Oh! if these ills the price of power advance,
 Check not my speed where social joys invite!—
 The troubled vision cast a mournful glance,
 And sighing vanish'd in the shades of night.

ELEGY VIII.

He describes his early love of poetry, and its consequences.

TO MR. GRAVES, 1745.

Written after the death of Mr. Pope.

Ah me! what envious magic thins my fold?
 What mutter'd spell retards their late increase?
 Such lessening fleeces must the swain behold,
 That e'er with Doric pipe essays to please?
 I saw my friends in evening circles meet;
 I took my vocal reed, and tun'd my lay;
 I heard them say my vocal reed was sweet:
 Ah fool! to credit what I heard them say!
 Ill fated bard! that seeks his skill to show,
 Then courts the judgment of a friendly ear!
 Not the poor veteran, that permits his foe
 To guide his doubtful step, has more to fear.
 Nor could my Graves mistake the critic's laws,
 Till pious friendship mark'd the pleasing way;
 Welcome such error! ever blest the cause!
 Ev'n though it led me boundless leagues astray!
 Couldst thou reprove me, when I nurs'd the flame
 On listening Cherwell's osier banks reclin'd?
 While, foe to fortune, uneduc'd by fame,
 I sooth'd the bias of a careless mind.
 Youth's gentle kindred, health and love were met?
 What though in Alma's guardian arms I play'd?
 How shall the muse those vacant hours forget?
 Or deem that bliss by solid cares repaid?
 Thou know'st how transport thrills the tender breast,
 Where love and fancy fix their opening reign;
 How nature shines in livelier colours dress'd,
 To bless their union, and to grace their train.

So first when Phœbus met the Cyprian queen,
And favour'd Rhodes beheld their passion crown'd
Unusual flowers enrich'd the painted green;
And swift spontaneous roses blush'd around.

Now sadly lorn, from Twitnam's widow'd bower,
The drooping muses take their casual way;
And where they stop, a flood of tears they pour;
And where they weep, no more the fields are gay.

Where is the dappled pink, the sprightly rose?
The cowslips golden cup no more I see:
Dark and discolour'd every flower that blows,
To form the garland, Elegy! for thee!—

Enough of tears has wept the virtuous dead;
Ah might we now the pious rage control;
Hush'd be my grief ere every smile be fled,
Ere the deep swelling sigh subvert the soul!

If near some trophy spring a stripling bay,
Pleas'd we behold the graceful umbrage rise;
But soon too deep it works its baneful way,
And, low on earth, the prostrate ruin lies.

ELEGY IX.

He describes his disinterestedness to a friend.

NE'ER must tinge my lip with Celtic wines;
The pomp of India must I ne'er display;
Nor boast the produce of Peruvian mines,
Nor, with Italian sounds, deceive the day.

Down yonder brook my crystal beverage flows;
My grateful sheep their annual fleeces bring;
Fair in my garden buds the damask rose,
And, from my grove, I hear the thrush sing.

My fellow swains! avert your dazzled eyes:
In vain allur'd by glittering spoils they rove.
The fates ne'er meant them for the shepherd's prize,
Yet gave them ample recompence in love.

They gave you vigour from your parent's veins;
They gave you toils; but toils your sinews brace;
They gave you nymphs, that own their amorous pains,
And shades, the refuge of the gentle race.

To carve your loves, to paint your mutual flames,
See! polish'd fair, the beech's friendly rind!
To sing soft carols to your lovely dames,
See vocal grots, and echoing vales assign'd!

Would'st thou, my Strephon, love's delighted slave!
Though sure the wreaths of chivalry to share,
Forego the ribbon thy Matilda gave,
And, giving, bade thee in remembrance wear?

All fare my peace, but every idle toy,
If to my mind my Delia's form it brings,
Has truer worth, imparts sincerer joy,
Than all that bears the radiant stamp of kings.

O my soul weeps, my breast with anguish bleeds,
When love deplores the tyrant power of gain!
Disdaining riches as the futile weeds,
I rise superior, and the rich disdain.

Off from the stream, slow wandering down the glade,
Pensive I hear the nuptial peal rebound;

"Some miser weds, I cry, the captive maid,
"And some fond lover sickens at the sound."

Not Somerville, the muse's friend of old,
Though now exalted to yon ambient sky,
So shun'd a soul distain'd with earth and gold,
So lov'd the pure, the generous breast, as I.

Scorn'd be the wretch that quits his genial bowl,
His loves, his friendships, ev'n his self resigns;
Perverts the sacred instinct of his soul,
And to a duceat's dirty sphere confines.

But come, my friend, with taste, with science blest,
Ere age impair me, and ere gold allure;
Restore thy dear idea to my breast,
The rich deposit shall the shrine secure.

Let others toil to gain the sordid ore,
The charms of independence let us sing;
Blest with thy friendship, can I wish for more?
I'll spurn the boasted wealth of Lydia's king.

ELEGY X.

To Fortune; suggesting his motive for repining at her dispensations.

Ask not the cause, why this rebellious tongue
Loads with fresh curses thy detested sway!
Ask not, thus branded in my softest song,
Why stands the flatter'd name, which all obey?

'Tis not, that in my shed I lurk forlorn,
Nor see my roof on Parian columns rise;
That, on this breast, no mimic star is borne,
Rever'd, ah! more than those that light the skies.

'Tis not, that on the turf supinely laid,
I sing or pipe, but to the flocks that graze;
And, all inglorious, in the lonesome shade,
My finger stiffens, and my voice decays.

Not, that my fancy mourns thy stern command,
When many an embryo dome is lost in air;
While guardian prudence checks my eager hand,
And, ere the turf is broken, cries, "Forbear."

"Forbear, vain youth! be cautious, weigh thy
"gold,

"Nor let yon rising column more aspire;

"Ah! better dwell in ruins, than behold

"Thy fortunes mouldering and thy domesentire.

"Honorio built, but dar'd my laws defy;

"He planted, scornful of my sage commands;

"The peach's vernal bud regal'd his eye;

"The fruitage ripen'd for more frugal hands."

See the small stream that pours its murmuring tide
O'er some rough rock that would its wealth display,

Displays it aught but penury and pride?

Ah! construe wisely what such murmurs say.

"How would some flood, with ampler treasures
Disdainful view the scantling drops distil! [blest,
How must * Velino shake his reedy crest!

How every cygnet mock the boastive rill!

* A river in Italy.

Fortune, I yield ! and see, I give the sign ;
At noon the poor mechanic wanders home ;
Collects the square, the level, and the line,
And, with retorted eye, forsakes the dome.

Yes, I can patient view the shadeless plains ;
Can unrepining leave the rising wall :
Check the fond love of art that fir'd my veins,
" And my warm hopes, in full pursuit, recall.

Descend, ye storms ! destroy my rising pile ;
Loos'd be the whirlwind's unremitting sway ;
Contented I, although the gazer smile
To see it scarce survive a winter's day.

Let some dull dotard bask in thy gay shrine,
As in the sun regales his wanton herd ;
Guileless of envy, why should I repine,
That his rude voice, his grating reed's prefer'd ?

Let him exult, with boundless wealth supply'd,
Mine and the swain's reluctant homage share ;
But ah ! his tawdry shepherdess's pride,
Gods ! must my Delia, must my Delia bear ?

Must Delia's softness, elegance, and ease,
Submit to Marian's dress ? to Marian's gold ?
Must Marian's robe from distant India please ?
The simple fleece my Delia's limbs enfold ?

" Yet sure on Delia seems the russet fair ;
" Ye glittering daughters of disguise, adieu !"
So talk the wise, who judge of shape and air,
But will the rural thane decide so true ?

Ah ! what is native worth esteem'd of clowns !
'Tis thy false glare, O fortune ! thine they see :
'Tis for my Delia's sake I dread thy frowns,
And my last gasp shall curses breathe on thee.

ELEGY XI.

He complains how soon the pleasing novelty of life is over.

TO MR. JAGO.

Ah me, my friend ! it will not, will not last !
This fairy-scene, that cheats our youthful eyes !
The charm dissolves ; th' aerial music's past ;
The banquet ceases, and the vision flies.

Where are the splendid forms, the rich perfumes,
Where the gay tapers, where the spacious dome ?
Vanish'd the costly pearls, the crimson plumes,
And we, delightless, left to wander home !

Vain now are books, the sage's wisdom vain !
What has the world to bribe our steps astray ?
Ere reason learns by study'd laws to reign,
The weaken'd passions, self-subdued, obey.

Scarce has the sun seven annual courses roll'd,
Scarce shown the whole that fortune can supply ;
Since, not the miser so careles'd his gold,
As I, for what it gave, was heard to sigh.

On the world's stage I wish'd some sprightly part ;
To deck my native fleece with tawdry lace !
'Twas life, 'twas taste, and—oh my foolish heart,
Substantial joy was fix'd in power and place.

And you, ye works of art ! allur'd mine eye,
The breathing picture, and the living stone :

" Though gold, though splendor, heaven and fate
" deny.

" Yet might I call one Titian stroke my own !"

Smit with the charms of fame, whose lovely spoil,
The wreath, the garland, fire the poet's pride,
I trim'd my lamp, consum'd the midnight oil—
But soon the paths of health and fame divide !

Oft too I pray'd, 'twas nature form'd the prayer,
To grace my native scenes, my rural home ;
To see my trees express my planter's care,
And gay, on Attic models, raise my dome.

But now 'tis o'er, the dear delusion's o'er !
A stagnant breezeless air becalms my soul :
A fond aspiring candidate no more,
I scorn the palm, before I reach the goal.

O youth ! enchanting state, profusely blest !
Bliss ev'n obtrusive courts the frolic mind ;
Of health neglectful, yet by health carest ;
Careless of favour, yet secure to find.

Then glows the breast, as opening roses fair ;
More free, more vivid, than the linnet's wing ;
Honest as light, transparent ev'n as air,
Tender as buds, and lavish as the spring.

Not all the force of manhood's active might,
Not all the craft to subtle age assign'd,
Not science shall extort that dear delight,
Which gay delusion gave the tender mind.

Adieu soft raptures, transports void of care !
Parent of raptures, dear deceit, adieu !
And you, her daughters, pining with despair,
Why, why so soon her fleeting steps pursue !

Tedious again to curse the drizzling day !
Again to trace the wintery tracks of snow !
Or, sooth'd by vernal airs, again survey,
The self-same hawthornsbud, and cowslips blow !

O life ! how soon of every bliss forlorn !
What start false joys, and urge the devious race :
A tender prey ; that cheers your youthful morn,
Then sinks untimely, and defrauds the chase.

ELEGY XII.

His recantation.

No more the muse obtrudes her thin disguise !
No more with awkward fallacy complains,
How every fervour from my bosom flies,
And reason in her lonesome palace reigns.

Ere the chill winter of our days arrive,
No more she paints the breast from passion free ;
I feel, I feel one loitering wish survive—
Ah, need I, Florio, name that wish to thee !

The star of Venus ushers in the day,
The first, the loveliest of the train that shine !
The star of Venus lends her brightest ray,
When other stars their friendly beams resign.

Still in my breast one soft desire remains,
Pure as that star, from guilt, from interest free,
Has gentle Delia trip'd across the plains,
And need I, Florio, name that wish to thee ?

While, cloy'd to find the scenes of life the same,
I tune with careless hand my languid lays;
Some secret impulse wakes my former flame,
And fires my strain with hope of brighter days.

I slept not long beneath yon rural bowers;
And lo! my crook with flowers adorn'd I see:
Has gentle Delia bound my crook with flowers,
And need I, Florio, name my hopes to thee?

ELEGY XIII.

To a friend, on some slight occasion estranged from him.

HEALTH to my friend, and many a cheerful day
Around his seat may peaceful shades abide!
Smooth flow the minutes, fraught with smiles away,
And, till they crown our union, gently glide.

Ah me! too swiftly fleets our vernal bloom!
Lost to our wonted friendship, lost to joy!
Soon may thy breast the cordial with resume,
Ere wintry doubt its tender warmth destroy.

Say, were it ours, by fortune's wild command,
By chance to meet beneath the torrid zone;
Would'st thou reject thy Damon's plighted hand?
Would'st thou with scorn thy once-lov'd friend disown?

Life is that stranger land, that alien clime:
Shall kindred souls forego their social claim?
Launch'd in the vast abyss of space and time,
Shall dark suspicion quench the generous flame?

Myriads of souls, that knew one parent mold,
See sadly sever'd by the laws of chance!
Myriads, in time's perennial list enroll'd,
Forbid by fate to change one transient glance!

But we have met—where ills of every form,
Where passions rage, and hurricanes descend:
Say, shall we nurse the rage, assist the storm?
And guide them to the bosom—of a friend!

Yes, we have met—thro' rapine, fraud, and wrong:
Might our joint aid the paths of peace explore!
Why leave thy friend amid the boisterous throng,
Ere death divide us, and we part no more?

For oh! pale sickness warns thy friend away;
For me no more the vernal roses bloom!
I see stern fate his ebon wand display;
And paint the wither'd regions of the tomb.

Then the keen anguish from thine eye shall start,
Sad as thou follow'st my untimely bier;
"Fool that I was—if friends so soon must part,
"To let suspicion intermix a fear."

ELEGY XIV.

Declining an invitation to visit foreign countries, he takes occasion to intimate the advantages of his own.

TO LORD TEMPLE.

WHILE others, lost to friendship, lost to love,
Waste their best minutes on a foreign strand,
Be mine, with British nymph or swain to rove,
And court the genius of my native land.

Deluded youth! that quits these verdant plains,
To catch the follies of an alien soil!
To win the vice his genuine soul disdains,
Return exultant, and import the spoil!

In vain he boasts of his detested prize;
No more it blooms to British climes convey'd,
Cramp'd by the impulse of ungenial skies,
See its fresh vigour in a moment fade!

Th' exotic folly knows its native clime;
An awkward stranger, if we waft it o'er;
Why then these toils, this costly waste of time,
To spread soft poison on our happy shore?

I covet not the pride of foreign looms;
In search of foreign modes I scorn to rove;
Nor, for the worthless bird of brighter plumes,
Would change the meanest warbler of my grove.

No distant clime shall servile airs impart,
Or form these limbs with pliant ease to play;
Trembling I view the Gaul's illusive art,
That steals my lov'd rusticity away.

'Tis long since freedom fled th' Hesperian clime;
Her citron groves, her flower-embroider'd shore;
She saw the British oak aspire sublime,
And soft Campania's olive charms no more.

Let partial suns mature the western mine,
To shed its lustre o'er th' Iberian maid;
Mien, beauty, shape, O native soil, are thine;
Thy peerless daughters ask no foreign aid.

Let Ceylon's envy'd plant * perfume the seas,
Till torn to season the Batavian bowl;
Ours is the breast whose genuine ardours please,
Nor need a drug to meliorate the soul.

Let the proud Soldan wound th' Arcadian groves,
Or with rude lips th' Aonian fount profane;
The muse no more by flowery Ladon roves,
She seeks her Thomson on the British plain.

Tell not of realms by ruthless war dismay'd;
Ah! hapless realms that war's oppression feel!
In vain may Austria boast her Noric blade,
If Austria bleed beneath her boasted steel.

Beneath her palm Idume vents her moan;
Raptur'd she once beheld its friendly shade!
And hoary Memphis boasts her tombs alone,
The mournful types of mighty power decay'd!

No crescent here displays its baneful horns;
No turban'd host the vice of truth reproves;
Learning's free source the sage's breast adorns,
And poets, not inglorious, chant their loves.

Boast, favour'd Media, boast thy flowery stores;
Thy thousand hues by chemic suns refin'd;
'Tis not the dress or mien thy soul adores,
'Tis the rich beauties of Britannia's mind.

While Grenville's breast † could virtue's stores af-
What envy'd flota bore so fair a freight? [ford,

* The cinnamon.

† Written a few years after the time of Capt Grenville's death, which happened in 1747. The earldom of Temple was not created till 1749.

The mine compar'd in vain its latent hoard,
 The gem its lustre, and the gold its weight.
 Thee, Grenville, thee with calmest courage fraught,
 Thee the lov'd image of thy native shore!
 Thee by the virtues arm'd, the graces taught,
 When shall we cease to boast, or to deplore?
 Presumptuous war, which could thy life destroy,
 What shall it now in recompence decree?
 While friends that merit every earthly joy,
 Feel every anguish; feel the loss of thee!
 Bid me no more a servile realm compare,
 No more the muse of partial praise arraign;
 Britannia sees no foreign breast so fair,
 And, if she glory, glories not in vain.

ELEGY XV.

In the memory of a private family in Worcestershire.*

FROM a lone tower with reverend ivy crown'd,
 The pealing bell awak'd a tender sigh;
 Still, as the village caught the waving sound,
 A swelling tear distream'd from every eye.
 So droop'd, I ween, each Briton's breast of old,
 When the dull curfew spoke their freedom fled;
 For, sighing as the mournful accent roll'd,
 Our hope, they cry'd, our kind support is dead!
 'Twas good Palemon---near a shaded pool,
 A group of ancient elms umbrageous rose;
 The flocking rooks, by instinct's native rule,
 This peaceful scene, for their asylum, chose.
 A few small spires to Gothic fancy fair,
 Amid the shades emerging, struck the view;
 'Twas here his youth respir'd its earliest air:
 'Twas here his age breath'd out its last adieu.
 One favour'd son engag'd his tenderest care;
 One pious youth his whole affection crown'd:
 In his young breast the virtues sprung so fair,
 Such charms display'd, such sweets diffus'd around.
 But whilst gay transport in his face appears,
 A noxious vapour clogs the poison'd sky;
 Blasts the fair crop---the fire is drown'd in tears,
 And, scarce surviving, sees his Cynthio die!
 O'er the pale corse we saw him geetly bend;
 Heart-chill'd with grief---"My thread, he cry'd,
 is spun!
 If heaven had meant I should my life extend,
 Heaven had preserv'd my life's support, my son.
 Snatch'd in thy prime! alas, the stroke were mild,
 Had my frail form obey'd the fate's decree!
 Blest were my lot, O Cynthio! O my child!
 Heaven so pleas'd, and I had dy'd for thee."
 Five sleepless nights he stem'd this tide of woes;
 Five irksome suns he saw, through tears forlorn!
 On his pale corse the sixth sad morning rose;
 From yonder dome the mournful bier was borne.

*The Penns of Harborough.

'Twas on those downs, by Roman hosts annoy'd,
 Fought our bold fathers; rustic, unrefin'd!
 Freedom's plain sons, in martial cares employ'd!
 They ting'd their bodies, but unmask'd their mind.
 'Twas there, in happier times, this virtuous race,
 O milder merit, fix'd their calm retreat;
 War's deadly crimson had forsook the place,
 And freedom fondly lov'd the chosen seat.
 No wild ambition fir'd their tranquil breast,
 To swell with empty sounds a spotless name;
 If fostering skies, the sun, the shower were blest,
 Their bounty spread; their fields extent the same.
 Those fields, profuse of raiment, food and fire,
 They scorn'd to lessen, careless to extend;
 Bade luxury to lavish courts aspire,
 And avarice to city-breasts descend.
 None, to a virgin's mind, prefer'd her dower;
 To fire with vicious hopes a modest heir:
 The fire, in place of titles, wealth or power,
 Assign'd him virtue; and his lot was fair.
 They spoke of fortune, as some doubtful dame,
 That sway'd the natives of a distant sphere;
 From lucre's vagrant sons had learnt her fame,
 But never wish'd to place her banners here.
 Here youth's free spirit, innocently gay,
 Enjoy'd the most that innocence can give,
 Those wholesome sweets that border virtue's way;
 Those cooling fruits that we may taste and live.
 Their board no strange ambiguous viand bore;
 From their own streams their choicer fare they drew,
 To lure the scaly glutton to the shore,
 The sole deceit their artless bosom knew!
 Sincere themselves, ah too secure to find
 The common bosom, like their own, sincere!
 'Tis its own guilt alarms the jealous mind;
 'Tis her own poison bids the viper fear.
 Sketch'd on the lattice of th' adjacent fane, [er:
 Their suppliant busts implore the reader's pray-
 Ah gentle souls! enjoy your blissful reign,
 And let frail mortals claim your guardian care.
 For sure, to blissful realms the souls are flown,
 That never flatter'd, injur'd, censur'd, strove;
 The friends of science! music, all their own;
 Music the voice of virtue and of love!
 The journeying peasant through the secret shade,
 Heard their soft lyres engage his listening ear;
 And haply deem'd some courteous angel play'd;
 No angel play'd---but might with transport
 hear.
 For these the sounds that chase unholy strife!
 Solve envy's charm, ambition's wretch release!
 Raise him to spurn the radiant ills of life:
 To pity pomp, to be content with peace.
 Farewell, pure spirits! vain the praise we give,
 The praise you sought from lips angelic flows;
 Farewell! the virtues which deserve to live,
 Deserve an ampler bliss than life bestows.

Last of his race, Palemon, now no more
The modest merit of his line display'd;
Then pious Hugh, Vigornia's mitre wore---
Soft sleep the dust of each deserving shade!

ELEGY XVI.

He suggests the advantages of birth to a person of merit, and the folly of a superciliousness that is built upon that sole foundation.

WHEN genius grac'd with lineal splendor glows,
When title shines with ambient virtues crown'd,
Like some fair almond's flowery pomp it shows;
The pride, the perfume of the regions round.

Then learn, ye fair! to soften splendor's ray;
Endure the swain, the youth of low degree;
Let meekness join'd its temperate beam display;
'Tis the mild verdure that endears the tree.

Pity the sandal'd swain, the shepherd's boy;
He sighs to brighten a neglected name;
Foe to the dull appulse of vulgar joy,
He mourns his lot; he wishes, merits fame.

In vain to groves and pathless vales we fly;
Ambition there the bowery haunt invades;
Fame's awful rays fatigue the courtier's eye,
But gleam still lovely through the checquer'd shades.

Vainly, to guard from love's unequal chain,
Has fortune rear'd us in the rural grove;
Should *'s eyes illumine the desert plain,
Ev'n I may wonder, and ev'n I must love.

Nor unregarded sighs the lowly hind;
Though you contemn, the gods respect his vow;
Vindictive rage awaits the scornful mind,
And vengeance, too severe! the gods allow.

On Sarum's plain I met a wandering fair;
The look of sorrow, lovely still she bore;
Loose flow'd the soft redundancy of her hair,
And, on her brow, a flowery wreath she wore.

Oft stooping as she stray'd, she cull'd the pride
Of every plain; she pillag'd every grove!
The fading chaplet daily she supply'd,
And still her hand some various garland wove.

Erroneous fancy shap'd her wild attire; [stray'd;
From Bethlem's walls the poor lymphatic
Seem'd with her air her accent to conspire,
When, as wild fancy taught her, thus she said:

"Hear me, dear youth! oh hear an hapless maid,
Sprung from the scepter'd line of ancient kings!
Scorn'd by the world, I ask thy tender aid;
Thy gentle voice shall whisper kinder things.

The world is frantic---fly the race profane---
Nor I, nor you, shall its compassion move;
Come friendly let us wander, and complain,
And tell me, shepherd! hast thou seen my love?

My love is young---but other loves are young;
And other loves are fair, and so is mine;
An air divine discloses whence he sprung;
He is my love, who boasts that air divine.

No vulgar Damon robs me of my rest,
Ianthe listens to no vulgar vow;
A prince, from gods descended, fires her breast;
A brilliant crown distinguishes his brow.

What, shall I stain the glories of my race?
More clear, more lovely bright than Hesper's beam?

The porcelain pure with vulgar dirt debase?
Or mix with puddle the pellucid stream?

See through these veins the Sapphire current shine!

'Twas Jove's own nectar gave th' ethereal hue:
Can base plebeian forms contend with mine?
Display the lovely white, or match the blue?

The painter strove to trace its azure ray;
He chang'd his colours, and in vain he strove;
He frown'd---I smiling view'd the faint essay;
Poor youth! he little knew it flow'd from Jove.

Pitying his toil, the wondrous truth I told;
How amorous Jove trepann'd a mortal fair;
How through the race the generous current roll'd,
And mocks the poet's art, and painter's care.

Yes, from the gods, from earliest Saturn, sprung
Our sacred race; through demigods, convey'd;
And he, ally'd to Phœbus, ever young,
My godlike boy, must wed their duteous maid.

Oft when a mortal vow profanes my ears,
My fire's dread fury murmurs through the sky;
And should I yield---his instant rage appears;
He darts th' uplifted vengeance, and I die.

Have you not heard unwonted thunders roll!
Have you not seen more horrid lightnings glare!
'Twas then a vulgar love ensnar'd my soul:
'Twas then---I hardly scap'd the fatal snare.

'Twas then a peasant pour'd his amorous vow,
All as I listen'd to his vulgar strain;---
Yet such his beauty---would my birth allow,
Dear were the youth, and blissful were the plain.

But oh! I faint! why wastes my vernal bloom,
In fruitless searches ever doom'd to rove?
My nightly dreams the toilsome path resume,
And I shall die---before I find my love.

When last I slept, methought my ravish'd eye,
On distant heaths his radiant form survey'd;
Though night's thick clouds encompass'd all the sky, [shade.
The gems that bound his brow, dispell'd the

O how this bosom kindled at the sight!
Led by their beams I urg'd the pleasing chase!
Till, on a sudden, these with-held their light---
All, all things envy the sublime embrace,

But now no more---behind the distant grove,
Wanders my destin'd youth, and chides my stay:
See, see, he grasps the steel---forbear, my love---
Ianthe comes; thy princess hastes away."

Scornful she spoke, and heedless of reply
The lovely maniac bounded o'er the plain;
The piteous victim of an angry sky!
Ah me! the victim of her proud disdain!

ELEGY XVII.

He indulges the suggestions of spleen.

AN ELEGY TO THE WINDS.

"Æole, namque tibi divum pater atque hominum
 "Et mulcere dedit mentes, & tollere vento." [rex]

STERN monarch of the winds, admit my prayer!
 A while thy fury check, thy storm confine!
 No trivial blast impells the passive air;
 But brews a tempest in a breast like mine.

What bands of black ideas spread their wings!
 The peaceful regions of content invade!
 With deadly poison taint the crystal springs!
 With noisome vapour blast the verdant shade!

I know their leader, spleen; and dread the sway
 Of rigid Eurus, his detested sire;
 Through one my blossoms and my fruits decay;
 Through one my pleasures and my hopes expire.

Like some pale stripling, when his icy way
 Relenting yields beneath the noontide beam,
 I stand aghast; and, chill'd with fear, survey
 How far I've tempted life's deceitful stream!

Where, by remorse impell'd, repuls'd by fears,
 Shall wretched fancy a retreat explore?
 She flies the sad presage of coming years,
 And forrowing dwells on pleasures now no more!

Again with patrons and with friends she roves;
 But friends and patrons never to return!
 She sees the nymphs, the graces, and the loves,
 But sees them, weeping o'er Lucinda's urn.

She visits, Isis! thy forsaken stream,
 Oh ill forsaken for Boeotian air!
 She deems no flood reflect so bright a beam,
 No reed so verdant, and no flowers so fair.

She dreams beneath thy sacred shades were peace,
 Thy bays might ev'n the civil storm repel;
 Reviews thy social bliss, thy learned ease,
 And with no cheerful accent cries, farewell!

Farewell, with whom to these retreats I stray'd!
 By youthful sports, by youthful toils ally'd!
 Joyous we sojourn'd in thy circling shade,
 And wept to find the paths of life divide.

She paints the progress of my rival's vow;
 Sees every muse a partial ear incline;
 Bids with luxuriant bays his favour'd brow,
 Nor yields the refuse of his wreath to mine.

She bids the flattering mirror, form'd to please,
 Now blast my hope, now vindicate despair;
 Bids my fond verse the love-sick parley cease;
 Accuse my rigid fate, acquit my fair.

Where circling rocks defend some pathless vale,
 Superfluous mortal, let me ever rove!
 Alas! there echo will repeat the tale---
 Where shall I find the silent scenes I love?

Fain would I mourn my luckless fate alone;
 Forbid to please, yet fated to admire;

Away my friends! my sorrows are my own!
 Why should I breathe around my sick desire?

Bear me, ye winds, indulgent to my pains,
 Near some sad ruin's ghastly shade to dwell!
 There let me fondly eye the rude remains,
 And from the mouldering refuse, build my cell!

Genius of Rome! thy prostrate pomp display!
 Trace every dismal proof of fortune's power;
 Let me the wreck of theatres survey,
 Or pensive sit beneath some nodding tower.

Or where some duct, by rolling seasons worn,
 Convey'd pure streams to Rome's imperial wall,
 Near the wide breach in silence let me mourn;
 Or tune my dirges to the water's fall.

Genius of Carthage! paint thy ruin'd pride;
 Towers, arches, fanes, in wild confusion strewn;
 Let banish'd Marius, lowering by thy side,
 Compare thy fickle fortunes with his own.

Ah no! thou monarch of the storms! forbear!
 My trembling nerves abhor thy rude controul;
 And scarce a pleasing twilight soothes my care,
 Ere one vast death like darkness shocks my soul!

Forbear thy rage---on no perennial base
 Is built frail fear, or hope's deceitful pile;
 My pains are fled---my joy resumes its place,
 Should the sky brighten, or Melissa smile.

ELEGY XVIII.

He repeats the song of Colin, a discerning shepherd; lamenting the state of the woollen manufactory.

"Ergo omni studio glaciem ventosque nivales,
 "Quo minus est illis curæ mortalis egestas,
 "Avertes: victumque feres." VIRG.

NEAR Avon's bank, on Arden's flowery plain,
 A * tuneful shepherd charm'd the listening
 And sunny Cotswold fondly lov'd the strain; [wave;
 Yet not a garland crowns the shepherd's grave!

Oh! lost Ophelia! smoothly flow'd the day,
 To feel his music with my flames agree!
 To taste the beauties of his melting lay,
 To taste and fancy it was dear to thee.

When, for his tomb, with each revolving year,
 I steal the musk-rose from the scented brake,
 I strew my cowslips, and I pay my tear,
 I'll add the myrtle for Ophelia's sake.

Shivering beneath a leafless thorn he lay,
 When death's chill rigour seiz'd his flowing
 tongue;
 The more I found his faltering notes decay,
 The more prophetic truth sublim'd the song.

"Adieu my flocks, he said! my wonted care,
 By sunny mountain, or by verdant shore!
 May some more happy hand your fold prepare,
 And may you need your Colin's crook no more!

And you, ye shepherds! lead my gentle sheep;
 To breezy hills, or leafy shelters lead;

* Mr. Somerville.

But if the sky with showers incessant weep,
Avoid the putrid moisture of the mead.

Where the wild thyme perfumed the purpled
heath,

Long loitering there your fleecy tribes extend—
But what avail the maxims I bequeath?
The fruitless gift of an officious friend!

Ah! what avails the timorous lambs to guard,
Though nightly cares, with daily labours, join?
If foreign sloth obtain the rich reward,
If Gallia's craft the ponderous fleece purloin.

Was it for this, by constant vigils worn,
I met the terrors of an early grave;
For this I led them from the pointed thorn?
For this I bath'd them in the lucid wave?

Ah heedless Albion! too benignly prone
Thy blood to lavish, and thy wealth resign!
Shall every other virtue grace thy throne,
But quick-ey'd prudence never yet be thine?

From the fair natives of this peerless hill
Thou gav'st the sheep that browse Iberian plains:
Their plaintive cries the faithless region fill,
Their fleece adorns an haughty foe's domains.

Ill-fated flocks! from cliff to cliff they stray;
Far from their dams their native guardians far!
Where the soft shepherd, all the livelong day,
Chaunts his proud mistress to his hoarse guitar.

But Albion's youth her native fleece despise;
Unmov'd they hear the pining shepherd's moan:
In silky folds each nervous limb disguise,
Allur'd by every treasure, but their own.

Oft have I hurry'd down the rocky steep,
Anxious, to see the wintery tempest drive;
Preserve, said I, preserve your fleece, my sheep!
Ere long will Phillis, will my love arrive.

Ere long she came: ah! woe is me, she came!
Rob'd in the Gallic loom's extraneous twine:
For gifts like these they give their spotless fame,
Resign their bloom, their innocence resign.

Will no bright maid, by worth, by titles known,
Give the rich growth of British hills to fame?
And let her charms, and her example, own
That virtue's dress, and beauty's are the same.

Will no fam'd chief support this generous maid?
Once more the patriot's arduous path resume?
And, comely from his native plains array'd,
Speak future glory to the British loom?

What power unseen my ravish'd fancy fires?
I pierce the dreary shade of future days;
Sure 'tis the genius of the land inspires,
To breathe my latest breath in 's praise.

O might my breath for 's praise suffice,
How gently should my dying limbs repose!
O might his future glory bless mine eyes,
My ravish'd eyes! how calmly would they close!

 was born to spread the general joy;
By virtue wrapt, by party uncontroul'd;
Britons for Britain shall the crook employ;
Britons for Britain's glory shear the fold."

ELEGY XIX.

Written in Spring 1743.

AGAIN the labouring hind inverts the soil;
Again the merchant ploughs the tumid wave:
Another spring renews the soldier's toil,
And finds me vacant in the rural cave.

As the soft lyre display'd my wonted loves,
The pensive pleasure and the tender pain,
The sordid Alpheus hurry'd through my groves;
Yet stop'd to vent the dictates of disdain.

He glanc'd contemptuous o'er my ruin'd fold;
He blam'd the graces of my favourite bower;
My breast, unfully'd by the lust of gold;
My time, unlavish'd in pursuit of power.

Yes, Alpheus! fly the purer paths of fate;
Abjure these scenes from venal passions free;
Know, in this grove, I vow'd perpetual hate,
War, endless war, with lucre and with thee.

Here nobly zealous, in my youthful hours,
I dress'd an altar to Thalia's name:
Here, as I crown'd the verdant shrine with flowers,
Soft on my labours stole the smiling dame.

Damon, she cry'd, if pleas'd with honest praise,
Thou court success by virtue or by song,
Fly the false dictates of the venal race;
Fly the gross accents of the venal tongue.

Swear that no lucre shall thy zeal betray;
Swerve not thy foot with fortune's votaries more;
Brand thou their lives, and brand their lifeless day—
The winning phantom urg'd me, and I swore.

Forth from the rustic altar swift I stray'd,
"Aid my firm purpose, ye celestial powers!
Aid me to quell the sordid breast, I said;" [towers*.
And threw my javelin tow'rs their hostile

Think not regretful I survey the deed;
Or added years no more the zeal allow;
Still, still observant, to the grove I speed,
The shrine embellish, and repeat the vow.

Sworn from his cradle Rome's relentless foe,
Such generous hate the Punie champion † bore;
Thy lake, O Thrasimene! beheld it glow,
And Cannæ's walls, and Trebia's crimson shore.

But let grave annals paint the warrior's fame;
Fair shine his arms in history enroll'd;
Whilst humbler lyres his civil worth proclaim,
His nobler hate of avarice and gold.—

Now Punie pride its final eve survey'd;
Its hosts exhausted, and its fleets on fire:
Patient the victor's lurid frown obey'd,
And saw th' unwilling elephants retire.

But when their gold depress'd the yielding scale,
Their gold in pyramidal plenty pil'd,
He saw th' unutterable grief prevail;
He saw their tears, and in his fury smil'd.

Think not, he cry'd, ye view the smiles of ease,
Or this firm breast disclaims a patriot's pain;

* A Roman ceremony in declaring war.

† Hannibal.

I smile, but from a soul estrang'd to peace,
 Frantic with grief, delirious with disdain!
 But were it cordial, this detested smile,
 Seems it less timely than the grief ye show?
 O sons of Carthage! grant me to revile
 The sordid source of your indecent woe!
 Why weep ye now! ye saw with tearless eye
 When your fleet perish'd on the Punic wave;
 Where lurk'd the coward tear, the lazy sigh,
 When Tyre's imperial state commenc'd a slave?
 'Tis past—O Carthage! vanquish'd! honour'd
 shade!
 Go, the mean sorrows of thy sons deplore;
 Has freedom shar'd the vow to fortune paid,
 She ne'er, like fortune, had forsook thy shore!
 He ceas'd—abash'd the conscious audience hear;
 Their pallid cheeks a crimson blush unfold;
 Yet o'er that virtuous blush distreams a tear,
 And falling moistens their abandon'd gold.

ELEGY XX.

He compares his humble fortune with the distress of others; and his subjection to Delia with the miserable servitude of an African slave.

Why droops this heart, with fancy'd woes forlorn,
 Why sinks my soul beneath this wintery sky?
 What pensive crowds, by ceaseless labours worn,
 What myriads, wish to be as blest as I!
 What though my roofs devoid of pomp arise,
 Nor tempt the proud to quit his destin'd way?
 Nor costly art my flowery dales disguise,
 Where only simple friendship deigns to stray?
 See the wild sons of Lapland's chill domain,
 That scoop their couch beneath the drifted snows!
 How void of hope they ken the frozen plain,
 Where the sharp east for ever, ever blows!
 Slave though I be, to Delia's eyes a slave,
 My Delia's eyes endear the bands I wear;
 The sigh she causes well becomes the brave,
 The pang she causes, 'tis ev'n bliss to bear.
 See the poor native quit the Libyan shores,
 Ah! not in love's delightful fetters bound!
 No radiant smile his dying peace restores; [wound.
 Nor love, nor fame, nor friendship, heals his
 Let vacant bards display their boasted woes,
 Shall I the mockery of grief display?
 No let the muse his piercing pangs disclose,
 Who bleeds and weeps his sum of life away.
 On the wild beach in mournful guise he stood,
 Ere the shrill boatswain gave the hated sign;
 He dropt a tear unseen into the flood;
 He stole one secret moment, to repine.
 Yet the muse listen'd to the plaints he made;
 Such moving plaints as nature could inspire:
 To me the muse his tender plea convey'd,
 But smooth'd, and suited to the sounding lyre.
 "Why am I ravish'd from my native strand?
 What savage race protects this impious gain?
 Shall foreign plagues infest this teeming land,
 And more than sea-born monsters plough the main?"

Here the dire locusts horrid swarms prevail;
 Here the blue asps with livid poison swell;
 Here the dry dipsa with his sinuous mail;
 Can we not here secure from envy dwell?
 When the grim lion urg'd his cruel chase,
 When the stern panther sought his midnight prey,
 What fate reserv'd me for this Christian race?
 A race more polish'd, more severe than they!
 Ye prouling wolves, pursue my latest cries!
 Thou hungry tiger, leave thy reeking den!
 Ye sandy wastes, in rapid eddies rise!
 O tear me from the whips and scorns of men!
 Yet in their face superior beauty glows;
 Are smiles the mien of rapine and of wrong?
 Yet from their lip the voice of mercy flows,
 And ev'n religion dwells upon their tongue.
 Of blissful haunts they tell, and brighter climes,
 Where gentle minds convey'd by death repair,
 But stain'd with blood, and crimson'd o'er with crimes,
 Say, shall they merit what they paint so fair?
 No, careless, hopeless of those fertile plains,
 Rich by our toils, and by our sorrows gay,
 They ply our labours, and enhance our pains,
 And feign these distant regions to repay.
 For them our tusked elephant expires;
 For them we drain the mine's embowel'd gold;
 Where rove the brutal nations wild desires?
 Our limbs are purchas'd, and our life is sold!
 Yet shores there are, blest shores for us remain,
 And favour'd isles with golden fruitage crown'd,
 Where tufted flowerets paint the verdant plain,
 Where every breeze shall med'cine every wound.
 There the stern tyrant that embitters life
 Shall, vainly suppliant, spread his asking hand;
 There shall we view the billows raging strife,
 Aid the kind breast, and waft his boat to land."

ELEGY XXI.

Taking a view of the country from his retirement, he is led to meditate on the character of the ancient Britons. Written at the time of a rumoured tax upon luxury, 1746.

Thus Damon sung—What though unknown to praise
 Umbrageous coverts hide my muse and me;
 Or 'mid the rural shepherds, flow my days,
 Amid the rural shepherds, I am free.
 To view sleek vassals crowd a stately hall,
 Say, should I grow myself a solemn slave!
 To find thy tints, O Titian! grace my wall,
 Forego the flowery fields my fortune gave?
 Lord of my time my devious path I bend,
 Through fringy woodland, or smooth-shaven
 Or pensile grove, or airy cliff ascend, [lawn;
 And hail the scene by nature's pencil drawn.
 Thanks be to fate—though nor the racy vine,
 Nor fattening olive clothe the fields I rove,
 Sequester'd shades, and gurgling founts are mine,
 And every silvan grott the muses love.

Here if my vista point the mouldering pile,
 Where hood and cowl devotion's aspect wore,
 I trace the tottering reliques with a smile,
 To think the mental bondage is no more!

Pleas'd if the glowing landscape wave with corn;
 Or the tall oaks, my country's bulwark, rise;
 Pleas'd if mine eye, o'er thousand vallies borne,
 Discern the Cambria hills support the skies.

And see Plinlimmon! ev'n the youthful fight
 Scales the proud hill's ethereal cliffs with pain!
 Such Caer-caradoc! thy stupendous height,
 Whose ample shade obscures th' Iernian main.

Bleak, joyless regions! where, by science tir'd,
 Some prying sage his lonely step may bend;
 There, by the love of novel plaints inspir'd,
 Invidious view the clambering goats ascend.

Yet for those mountains, clad with lasting snow,
 The freeborn Briton left his greenest mead,
 Receding sullen from his mightier foe,
 For here he saw fair liberty recede.

Then if a chief perform'd a patriot's part,
 Sustain'd her drooping sons, repell'd her foes,
 Above all Persian luxe, or Attic art,
 The rude majestic monument arose.

Progressive ages caroll'd forth his fame;
 Sires, to his praise, attun'd their children's
 The hoary druid fed the generous flame, [tongue;
 While in such strains the reverend vizard sung.

"Go forth, my sons!—for what is vital breath,
 Your gods expell'd, your liberty resign'd?
 Go forth, my sons! for what is instant death
 To souls secure perennial joys to find?"

For scenes there are, unknown to war or pain,
 Where drops the balm that heals a tyrant's
 wound;
 Where patriots, blest with boundless freedom, reign,
 With mistletoe's mysterious garlands crown'd.

Such are the names that grace your mystic songs;
 Your solemn woods resound their martial fire;
 To you, my sons, the ritual meed belongs,
 If in the cause you vanquish or expire.

Hark! from the sacred oak that crowns the groves,
 What awful voice my raptur'd bosom warms;
 This is the favour'd moment heaven approves,
 Sound the shrill trump; this instant, sound to arms."

Theirs was the science of a martial race,
 To shape the lance, or decorate the shield;
 Ev'n the fair virgin stain'd her native grace,
 To give new horrors to the tented field.

Now, for some cheek where guilty blushes glow,
 For some false Florimel's impure disguise,
 The lifted youth, nor war's loud signal know,
 Nor virtue's call, nor fame's imperial prize.

Then if soft concord lull'd their fears to sleep,
 Inert and silent slept the manly car;
 But rush'd horrific o'er the fearful sleep,
 If freedom's awful clarion breath'd to war.

Now the sleek courtier, indolent, and vain,
 Thron'd in the splendid carriage glides supine;

To taint his virtue with a foreign stain,
 Or at a favourite's board his faith resign.

Leave them, O luxury! this happy soil!
 Chase her, Britannia, to some hostile shore!
 Or * fleece the baneful pest with annual spoil,
 And let thy virtuous offspring weep no more!

ELEGY XXII.

Written in the year —, when the rights of sepulture were so frequently violated.

SAY, gentle sleep, that lov'st the gloom of night,
 Parent of dreams! thou great magician, say,
 Whence my late vision thus endures the light;
 Thus haunts my fancy through the glare of day?

The silent moon had scal'd the vaulted skies,
 And anxious care resign'd my limbs to rest;
 A sudden lustre struck my wondering eyes,
 And Silvia stood before my couch confest.

Ah! not the nymph so blooming and so gay,
 That led the dance beneath the festive sha
 But she that, in the morning of her day,
 Entomb'd beneath the grass-green sod was laid.

No more her eyes their wonted radiance cast;
 No more her breast inspir'd the lover's flame,
 No more her cheek the Pæstan rose surpass;
 Yet seem'd her lip's ethereal smile the same.

Nor such her hair as deck'd her living face;
 Nor such her voice as charm'd the listening crowd;

Nor such her dress as heighten'd every grace:
 Alas! all vanish'd for the mournful shroud!

Yet seem'd her lip's ethereal charm the same;
 That dear distinction every doubt remov'd;
 Perish the lover, whose imperfect flame
 Forgets one feature of the nymph he lov'd.

"Damon, she said, mine hour allotted flies;
 Oh! do not waste it with a fruitless tear!
 Though griev'd to see thy Silvia's pale disguise,
 Suspend thy sorrow, and attentive hear.

So may thy muse with virtuous fame be blest!
 So be thy love with mutual love repaid!
 So may thy bones in sacred silence rest,
 Fast by the relics of some happier maid!

Thou know'st, how lingering on a distant shore
 Disease invidious nipt my flowery prime;
 And oh! what pangs my tender bosom tore,
 To think I ne'er must view my native clime!

No friend was near to raise my drooping head;
 No dear companion wept to see me die;
 Lodge me within my native soil, I said;
 There my fond parents honour'd reliques lie.

Though now debarr'd of each domestic tear;
 Unknown, forgot, I meet the fatal blow;
 There many a friend shall grace my woful bier,
 And many a sigh shall rise, and tear shall flow.

I spoke, nor fate forbore his trembling spoil;
 Some vernal mourner lent his careless aid;
 And soon they bore me to my native soil,
 Where my fond parents dear remains were laid.

* Alludes to a tax upon luxury.

'Twas then the youths, from every plain and grove,
Adorn'd with mournful verse thy Silvia's bier;
'Twas then the nymphs their votive garlands wove,
And strew'd the fragrance of the youthful year.

But why, alas! the tender scene display?
Could Damon's foot the pious path decline?
Ah no! 'twas Damon first attun'd his lay,
And sure no sonnet was so dear as thine.

Thus was I bosom'd in the peaceful grave;
My placid ghost no longer wept its doom;
When savage robbers every sanction brave,
And with outrageous guilt defraud the tomb!

Shall my poor corse, from hostile realms convey'd,
Lose the cheap portion of my native sands;
Or, in my kindred's dear embraces laid,
Mourn the vile ravage of barbarian hands?

Say, would thy breast no death-like torture feel,
To see my limbs the felon's gripe obey;
To see them gash'd beneath the daring steel?
To crowds a spectre, and to dogs a prey?

If Pæan's sons these horrid rites require,
If health's fair science be by these refin'd,
Let guilty convicts, for their use, expire;
And let their breathless corse avail mankind.

Yet hard it seems, when guilt's last fine is paid,
To see the victim's corse deny'd repose!
Now, more severe! the poor offenceless maid
Dreads the dire courage of inhuman foes.

Where is the faith of ancient pagans fled?
Where the fond care the wandering manes claim?
Nature, instinctive, cries, Protect the dead,
And sacred be their ashes, and their fame:

Arise, dear youth! ev'n now the danger calls;
Ev'n now the villain snuffs his wonted prey;
See! see! I lead thee to yon' sacred walls—
Oh! fly to chase these human wolves away."

ELEGY XXIII.

Reflections suggested by his situation.

BORN near the scene for Kenelm's fate renown'd
I take my plaintive reed, and range the grove,
And raise my lay, and bid the rocks resound
The savage force of empire, and of love.

Fast by the centre of yon' various wild,
Where spreading oaks embower a Gothic fane;
Kendria's arts a brother's youth beguil'd;
There nature urg'd her tenderest pleas in vain.

Soft o'er his birth, and o'er his infant hours,
Th' ambitious maid could every care employ;
Then with assiduous fondness cropt the flowers,
To deck the cradle of the princely boy?

But soon the bosom's pleasing calm is flown;
Love fires her breast; the sultry passions rise;
A favour'd lover seeks the Mercian throne,
And views her Kenelm with a rival's eyes.

How kind were fortune, ah! how just were fate,
Would fate or fortune Mercia's heir remove!
How sweet to revel on the couch of state!
To crown at once her lover and her love!

See, garnish'd for the chase, the fraudulent maid
To these lone hills direct his devious way;

The youth all prone the sister guide obey'd;
Ill-fated youth! himself the destin'd prey.

But now, nor shaggy hill, nor pathless plain,
Forms the lone refuge of the sylvan game;
Since Lyttleton has crown'd the sweet domain
With softer pleasures, and with fairer fame.

Where the rough Bowman urg'd his headlong speed,
Immortal bards, a polish'd race, retire;
And where hoarse scream'd the strepit horn succeed
The melting graces of no vulgar lyre.

See Thomson loitering near some limpid well,
For Britian's friend the verdant wreath prepare,
Or, studious of revolving seasons, tell,
How peerless Lucia made all seasons fair!

See  from civic garlands fly,
And in those groves indulge his tuneful vein!
Or from yon' summit, with a guardian's eye,
Observe how freedom's hand attires the plain!

Here Pope, ah never must that towering mind
To his lov'd haunts, or dearer friend, return?
What art! what friendships! oh! what fame re-
sign'd!

—In yonder glade I trace his mournful urn.

Where is the breast can rage or hate retain,
And these glad streams and smiling lawns behold?
Where is the breast can hear the woodland strain,
And think fair freedom well exchang'd for gold?

Through these soft shades delighted let me stray,
While o'er my head forgotten suns descend!
Through these dear valleys bend my casual way,
Till setting life a total shade extend!

Here far from courts, and void of pompous cares,
I'll muse how much I owe mine humbler fate:
Or shrink to find, how much ambition dares,
To shine in anguish and to grieve in state!

Canst thou, O sun! that spotless throne disclose,
Where her bold arm has left no sanguine stain?
Where, show me where, the lineal sceptre glows,
Pure, as the simple crook that rules the plain?

Tremendous pomp! where hate, distrust, and fear,
In kindred bosoms solve the social tie;
There not the parent smile is half sincere;
Nor void of art the consort's melting eye.

There with the friendly wish, the kindly flame,
No face is brighten'd, and no bosoms beat;
Youth, manhood, age, avow one sordid aim,
And ev'n the beardless lip assays deceit.

There coward rumours walk their murderous
round;

The glance, that more than rural blame instills;
Whispers, thatting'd with friendship doubly wound,
Pity that injures, and concern that kills.

There anger whets, but love can ne'er engage;
Careless brothers part but to revile;
There all men smile, and prudence warns the wife,
To dread the fatal stroke of all that smile.

There all her rivals! sister, son, and fire,
With horrid purpose hug destructive arms;
There soft-ey'd maids in murderous plots conspire,
And scorn the gentler mischief of their charms.

Let servile minds one endless watch endure;
Day, night, nor hour, their anxious guard resign;
But lay me, fate! on flowery banks secure,
Though my whole soul be, like my limbs, supine.

Yes, may my tongue disdain a vassal's care;
My lyre resound no prostituted lay;
More warm to merit, more elate to wear
The cap of freedom, than the crown of bay.

Sooth'd by the murmurs of my pebbled flood,
I wish it not o'er golden sands to flow;
Cheer'd by the verdure of my spiral wood,
I scorn the quarry, where no shrub can grow.

No midnight pangs the shepherd's peace pursue;
His tongue, his hand, attempts no secret wound;
He sings his Delia, and if she be true,
His love at once, and his ambition's crown'd.

ELEGY XXIV.

He takes occasion, from the fate of Eleanor of Bretagne, to suggest the imperfect pleasures of a solitary life.

WHEN beauty mourns, by fate's injurious doom,
Hid from the cheerful glance of human eye;
When nature's pride inglorious waits the tomb,
Hard is that heart which checks the rising sigh.

Fair Eleonora! would no gallant mind,
The cause of love, the cause of justice own?
Matchless thy charms, and was no life resign'd
To see them sparkle from their native throne?

Or had fair freedom's hand unveil'd thy charms,
Well might such brows the regal gem resign;
Thy radiant mien might scorn the guilt of arms,
Yet Albion's awful empire yield to thine.

O shame of Britons! in one sullen tower
She wet with royal tears her daily cell;
She found keen anguish every rose devour; [fell.
They sprung, they shone, they faded, and they

Through one dim lattice fring'd with ivy round,
Successive funs a languid radiance threw;
To paint how fierce her angry guardian frown'd,
To mark how fast her waning beauty flew.

This, age might bear; then fated fancy palls,
Nor warmly hopes what splendour can supply;
Fond youth incessant mourns, if rigid walls
Restrain its listening ear, its curious eye.

Believe me, *, the pretence is vain!
This boasted calm that smooths our early days,
For never yet could youthful mind restrain
Th' alternate pant for pleasure and for praise.

Ev'n me, by shady oak or limpid spring,
Ev'n me, the scenes of polish'd life allure;
Some genius whispers, "Life is on the wing,
And hard his lot that languishes obscure.

What though thy riper mind admire no more—
The shining cincture, and the broider'd fold,
Can pierce like lightning through the figur'd ore,
And melt to dross the radiant forms of gold.

Furs, ermines, rods, may well attract thy scorn;
The futile presents of capricious power!
But wit, but worth, the public sphere adorn,
And who but envies then the social hour?

VOL. XI.

Can virtue, careless of her pupil's need,
Forget how * sustains the shepherd's cause?
Content in shades to tune a lonely reed,
Nor join the sounding paean of applause?

For public haunts, impell'd by Britain's weal,
See Grenville quit the muse's favourite ease;
And shall not swains admire his noble zeal?
Admiring praise, admiring strive to please?

Life, says the sage, affords no bliss sincere;
And courts and cells in vain our hopes renew:
But ah! where Grenville charms the listening ear,
'Tis hard to think the cheerless maxim true.

The groves may smile; the rivers gently glide;
Soft through the vale resound the lonesome lay.
Ev'n thickets yield delight, if taste preside;
But can they please, when Lyttelton's away?

Pure as the swain's the breast of  glows,
Ah! were the shepherd's phrase, like his, re-
fin'd!

But, how improv'd the generous dictate flows
Through the clear medium of a polish'd mind!

Happy the youths who, warm with Britain's love,
Her inmost wish in 's periods hear!
Happy that in the radiant circle move, [sphere!
Attendant orbs, where Lonsdale gilds the

While rural faith, and every polish'd art,
Each friendly charm, in  conspire,
From public scenes all pensive must you part;
All joyless to the greenest fields retire!

Go, plaintive youth! no more by fount or stream,
Like some lone halcyon, social pleasure shun;
Go dare the light, enjoy its cheerful beam,
And hail the bright procession of the sun.

Then cover'd by thy ripen'd shades, resume
The silent walk; no more by passion tost:
Then seek thy rustic haunts; the dreary gloom,
Where every art, that colours life, is lost."

In vain! the listening muse attends in vain!
Restraints in hostile bands her motions wait—
Yet will I grieve; and sadden all my strain,
When injur'd beauty mourns the muse's fate.

ELEGY XXV.

To Delia, with some flowers; complaining how much his benevolence suffers on account of his humble fortune.

WHATE'ER could sculpture's curious art employ
Whate'er the lavish hand of wealth can shower,
These would I give—and every gift enjoy,
That pleas'd my fair—but fate denies the power.

Blest were my lot to feed the social fires!
To learn the latent wishes of a friend!
To give the boon his native taste admires,
And, for my transport, on his smile depend!

Blest too is he, whose evening ramble strays,
Where droop the sons of indigence and care!
His little gifts their gladden'd eyes amaze,
And win, at small expence, their fondest prayer!

And oh the joy! to shun the conscious light,
To spare the modest blush; to give unseen!
Like showers that fall behind the veil of night,
Yet deeply tinge the smiling vales with green.

Qq

But happiest they, who drooping realms relieve!
 Whose virtue in our cultur'd vales appear!
 For whose sad fate a thousand shepherds grieve,
 And fading fields allow the grief sincere.

To call lost worth from its oppressive shade;
 To fix its equal sphere and see it shine;
 To hear it grateful own the generous aid;
 This, this is transport—but must ne'er be mine.

Faint is my bounded bliss; nor I refuse
 To range where daisies open, rivers roll;
 While prose or song the languid hours amuse,
 And sooth the fond impatience of my soul.

A while I'll weave the roofs of jasmine bowers,
 And urge with trivial cares the loitering year;
 A while I'll prune my grove, protect my flowers,
 Then, unlamented, press an early bier!

Of those lov'd flowers the lifeless corse may share;
 Some hireling hand a fading wreath bestow:
 The rest will breath as sweet, will glow as fair,
 As when their master smil'd to see them glow.

The sequent morn shall wake the sylvan quire;
 The kid again shall wanton ere 'tis noon;
 Nature will smile, will wear her best attire;
 O! let not gentle Delia smile so soon!

While the rude hearse conveys me slow away,
 And careless eyes my vulgar fate proclaim,
 Let thy kind tear my utmost worth o'erpay;
 And, softly sighing, vindicate my fame.—

O Delia! cheer'd by thy superior praise,
 I bless the silent path the fates decree;
 Pleas'd, from the list of my inglorious days,
 To raise the moment-crown'd with bliss and thee.

ELEGY XXVI.

Describing the sorrow of an ingenuous mind, on the melancholy event of a licentious amour.

Why mourns my friend! why weeps his downcast eye!
 That eye where mirth, where fancy us'd to
 shine?

Thy cheerful meads reprove that swelling sigh;
 Spring ne'er enamell'd fairer meads than thine.

Art thou not lodg'd in fortune's warm embrace?
 Wert thou not form'd by nature's partial care?
 Blest in thy song, and blest in every grace
 That wins the friend, or that enchants the fair?

Damon, said he, thy partial praise restrain;
 Not Damon's friendship can my peace restore;
 Alas! his very praise awakes my pain,
 And my poor wounded bosom bleeds the more.

For oh! that nature on my birth had frown'd,
 Or fortune fix'd me to some lowly cell;
 Then had my bosom 'scap'd this fatal wound,
 Nor had I bid these vernal sweets, farewell.

But led by fortune's hand, her darling child,
 My youth her vain licentious bliss admir'd;
 In fortune's train the syren flattery smil'd,
 And rashly hallow'd all her queen inspir'd.

Of folly studious, ev'n of vices vain,
 Ah vices! gilded by the rich and gay!
 I chas'd the guileless daughters of the plain,
 Nor dropt the chase till Jessy was my prey.

Poor artless maid! to stain thy spotless name,
 Expence, and art, and toil, united strove;
 To lure a breast that felt the purest flame,
 Sustain'd by virtue, but betray'd by love.

School'd in the science of love's mazy wiles,
 I cloth'd each feature with affected scorn;
 I spoke of jealous doubts, and fickle smiles,
 And, feigning, left her anxious and forlorn.

Then, while the fancy'd rage alarm'd her care,
 Warm to deny, and zealous to disprove;
 I bade my words the wonted softness wear,
 And seiz'd the minute of returning love.

To thee, my Damon, dare I paint the rest?
 Will yet thy love a candid ear incline?
 Assur'd that virtue, by misfortune prest,
 Feels not the sharpness of a pang like mine.

Nine envious moons matur'd her growing shame;
 Ere-while to flaunt it in the face of day;
 When, scorn'd of virtue, stigmatiz'd by fame,
 Low at my feet desponding Jessy lay.

"Henry, she said, by thy dear form subdued,
 See the sad relics of a nymph undone!
 I find, I find this rising sob renew'd:
 I sigh in shades, and sicken at the sun.

Amid the dreary gloom of night, I cry,
 When will the morn's once pleasing scenes return?

Yet what can morn's returning ray supply,
 But foes that triumph, or but friends that mourn!

Alas! no more that joyous morn appears
 That led the tranquil hours of spotless fame;
 For I have steep'd a father's couch in tears,
 And ting'd a mother's glowing cheek with shame.

The vocal birds that raise their matin strain,
 The sportive lamps, increase my pensive moan;
 All seem to chase me from the cheerful plain,
 And talk of truth and innocence alone.

If through the garden's flowery tribes I stray,
 Where bloom the jasmynes that could once allure,
 Hope not to find delight in us, they say,
 For we are spotless, Jessy; we are pure.

Ye flowers that well reproach a nymph so frail;
 Say, could ye with my virgin fame compare?
 The brightest bud that scents the vernal gale
 Was not so fragrant, and was not so fair.

Now the grave old alarm the gentler young;
 And all my fame's abhor'd contagion flee;
 Trembles each lip, and falters every tongue,
 That bids the morn propitious smile on me.

Thus for your sake I shun each human eye;
 I bid the sweets of blooming youth adieu;
 To die I languish, but I dread to die,
 Lest my sad fate should nourish pangs for you.

Raise me from earth; the pains of want remove,
 And let me silent seek some friendly shore;

There only, banish'd from the form I love,
 My weeping virtue shall relapse no more.
 Be but my friend; I ask no dearer name;
 Be such the meed of some more artful fair;
 Nor could it heal my peace, or chase my shame,
 That pity gave, what love refus'd to share.
 Force not my tongue to ask its scanty bread;
 Nor hurl thy Jessy to the vulgar crew;
 Not such the parent's board at which I fed!
 Not such the precepts from his lips I drew!
 Haply, when age has silver'd o'er my hair,
 Malice may learn to scorn so mean a spoil;
 Envy may flight a face no longer fair;
 And pity, welcome, to my native soil."
 She spoke—nor was I born of savage race;
 Nor could these hands a niggard boon assign;

Grateful she clasp'd me in a last embrace,
 And vow'd to waste her life in pray'rs for mine.

I saw her foot the lofty bark ascend;
 I saw her breast with every passion heave;
 I left her—torn from every earthly friend;
 Oh! my hard bosom, which could bear to leave!

Brief let me be; the fatal storm arose;
 The billows rag'd, the pilot's art was vain;
 O'er the tall mast the circling surges close;
 My Jessy—floats upon the watery plain!

And see my youth's impetuous fires decay;
 Seek not to stop reflection's bitter tear;
 But warn the frolic, and instruct the gay,
 From Jessy floating on her watery bier!

RURAL ELEGANCE.

AN ODE TO THE LATE DUCHESS OF SOMERSET.

Written 1750.

WHILE orient skies restore the day,
 And dew-drops catch the lucid ray;
 Amid the sprightly scenes of morn,
 Will aught the muse inspire!
 Oh! Peace to yonder clamorous horn
 That drowns the sacred lyre!
 Ye rural thanes that o'er the mossy down
 Some panting, timorous hare pursue;
 Does nature mean your joys alone to crown?
 Say, does she smooth her lawns for you?
 For you does echo bid the rocks reply, [cry?
 And urg'd by rude constraint resound the jovial
 See from the neighbouring hill, forlorn
 The wretched swain your sport survey;
 He finds his faithful fences torn,
 He finds his labour'd crops a prey;
 He sees his flock—no more in circles feed;
 Haply beneath your ravage bleed,
 And with no random curses loads the deed.
 Nor yet, ye swains, conclude
 That nature smiles for you alone;
 Your bounded souls, and your conceptions crude,
 The proud, the selfish boast disown:
 Yours be the produce of the soil:
 O may it still reward your toil!
 Nor ever the defenceless train
 Of clinging infants ask support in vain?
 But though the various harvest gild your plains,
 Does the mere landscape feast your eye?
 Or the warm hope of distant gains
 Far other cause of glee supply?
 Is not the red-streak's future juice
 The source of your delight profound,
 Where Ariconium pours her gems profuse,
 Purpling a whole horizon round?

Athirst ye praise the limpid stream, 'tis true:
 But though, the pebbled shores among,
 It mimic no unpleasing song,
 The limpid fountain murmurs not for you.

Unpleas'd ye see the thickets bloom,
 Unpleas'd the spring her flowery robe resume;
 Unmov'd the mountain's airy pile,
 The dappled mead without a smile.
 O let a rural conscious muse,
 For well she knows, your froward sense accuse:
 Forth to the solemn oak you bring the square,
 And span the massy trunk, before you cry, 'tis fair.

Nor yet ye learn'd, nor yet ye courtly train,
 If haply from your haunts ye stray
 To waste with us a summer's day.
 Exclude the taste of every swain,
 Nor our untutor'd sense disdain:
 'Tis nature only gives exclusive right
 To relish her supreme delight;
 She, where she pleases kind or coy,
 Who furnishes the scene and forms us to enjoy.

Then hither bring the fair ingenuous mind,
 By her auspicious aid refin'd;
 Lo! not an hedge-row hawthorn blows,
 Or humble hair-bell paints the plain,
 Or valley winds, or fountain flows,
 Or purple heath is ting'd in vain:
 For such the rivers dash the foaming tides,
 The mountain swells the dale subside;
 Ev'n thriftless furze detains their wandering sight, [delight.
 And the rough barren rock grows pregnant with

With what suspicious fearful care
 The sordid wretch secures his claim,
 If haply some luxurious heir
 Should alienate the fields that wear his
 name!

What scruples lest some future birth
 Should litigate a span of earth!

Bonds, contracts, scoffments, names unmeet for prose,
 The towering muse endures not to disclose ;
 Alas ! her unrevers'd decree,
 More comprehensive and more free,
 Her lavish charter, taste, appropriates all we see.

Let gondolas their painted flags unfold,
 And be the solemn day enroll'd,
 When, to confirm his lofty plea,
 In nuptial fort, with bridal gold,
 The grave Venetian weds the sea :
 Each laughing muse derides the vow ;
 Ev'n Adria scorns the mock embrace,
 To some lone hermit on the mountain's brow,
 Allotted from his natal hour,
 With all her myrtle shores in dower.
 His breast to admiration prone
 Enjoys the smile upon her face,
 Enjoys triumphant every grace,
 And finds her more his own.

Fatigu'd with form's oppressive laws,
 When Somerset avoids the great ;
 When, cloy'd with merited applause,
 She seeks the rural calm retreat ;
 Does she not praise each mossy cell,
 And feel the truth my numbers tell ?
 When deafen'd by the loud acclaim,
 Which genius grac'd with rank obtains,
 Could she not more delighted hear
 You throttle chaunt the rising year ?
 Could she not spurn the wreaths of fame,
 To crop the primrose of the plains ?
 Does she not sweets in each fair valley find,
 Lost to the sons of power, unknown to half mankind ?

Ah, can she covet there to see
 The splendid slaves, the reptile race,
 That oil the tongue, and bow the knee,
 That slight her merit, but adore her place ?
 Far happier, if aright I deem,
 When from gay throngs, and gilded spires,
 To where the lonely halcyons play,
 Her philosophic step retires :
 While studious of the moral theme,
 She, to some smooth sequester'd stream
 Likens the swain's inglorious day ;
 Pleas'd from the flowery margin to survey,
 How cool, serene, and clear, the current glides
 away.

O blind to truth, to virtue blind,
 Who slight the sweetly pensive mind !
 On whose fair birth the graces mild,
 And every muse prophetic smil'd,
 Not that the poet's boasted fire
 Should fame's wide-echoing trumpet swell ;
 Or, on the music of his lyre
 Each future age with rapture dwell ;
 The vaunted sweets of praise remove,
 Yet shall such bosoms claim a part
 In all that glads the human heart ; [prove Yet these the spirits, form'd to judge and
 All nature's charms immense, and heavens unbounded love.

And oh ! the transport, most ally'd to song,
 In some fair villa's peaceful bound,

To catch soft hints from nature's tongue,
 And bid Arcadia bloom around :
 Whether we fringe the sloping hill,
 Or smooth below the verdant mead ;
 Whether we break the falling rill,
 Or through meandering mazes lead ;
 Or in the horrid bramble's room
 Bid careless groups of roses bloom ;
 Or let some shelter'd lake serene
 Reflect flowers, woods and spires, and brighten all the scene.

O sweet disposal of the rural hour !
 O beauties never known to cloy ! [bower,
 While worth and genius haunt the favour'd
 And every gentle breast partakes the joy !
 While charity at eve surveys the swain,
 Enabled by these toils to cheer
 A train of helpless infants dear,
 Speed whistling home across the plain ;
 See vagrant luxury, her hand-maid grown,
 For half her graceless deeds atone,
 And hails the bounteous work, and ranks it with her own.

Why brand these pleasures with the name
 Of soft, unsocial toils, of indolence and shame ?
 Search but the garden, or the wood,
 Let yon admir'd carnation own,
 Not all was meant for raiment, or for food,
 Not all for needful use alone ; [dwell,
 There while the seeds of future blossoms
 'Tis colour'd for the sight, perfum'd to please the smell.

Why knows the nightingale to sing ?
 Why flows the pine's nectareous juice ?
 Why shines with paint the linnet's wing ?
 For sustenance alone ? For use ?
 For preservation ? Every sphere
 Shall bid fair pleasure's rightful claim appear.
 And sure there seem, of human kind,
 Some born to shun the solemn strife ;
 Some for amusive tasks design'd,
 To sooth the certain ills of life ;
 Grace its lone vales with many a budding rose,
 New fountains of bliss disclose,
 Call forth refreshing shades, and decorate repose.

From plains and woodlands ; from the view
 Of rural nature's blooming face,
 Smit by the glare of rank and place,
 To courts the sons of fancy flew ;
 There long had art ordain'd a rival seat ;
 There had she lavish'd all her care
 To form a scene more dazzling fair,
 And call'd them from their green retreat
 To share her proud controul ;
 Had given the robe with grace to flow,
 Had taught exotic gems to glow ;
 And, emulous of nature's power,
 Mimic'd the plume, the leaf, the flower ;
 Chang'd the complexion's native hue,
 Moulded each rustic limb anew,
 And warp'd the very soul.
 A while her magic strikes the novel eye,
 A while the fairy forms delight ;
 And now aloof we seem to fly
 On purple pinions through a purer sky,

Where all is wondrous, all is bright:
 Now landed on some spangled shore
 A while each dazzled maniac roves
 By sapphire lakes, through emerald groves.
 Paternal acres please no more;
 Adieu the simple, the sincere delight—
 Th' habitual scene of hill and dale,
 The rural herds, the vernal gale,
 The tangled vetch's purple bloom,
 The fragrance of the bean's perfume,
 Be theirs alone who cultivate the soil,
 And drink the cup of thirst, and eat the bread of toil.

But soon the pageant fades away!
 'Tis nature only bears perpetual sway.
 We pierce the counterfeit delight,
 Fatigu'd with splendour's irksome beams.
 Fancy again demands the sight
 Of native groves and wonted streams,
 Pants for the scenes that charm'd her youthful eyes, [guise.

Where truth maintains her court, and banishes dis-

Then hither oft, ye senators, retire,
 With nature here high converse hold;
 For who like Stamford her delights admire,
 Like Stamford shall with scorn behold
 Th' unequal bribes of pageantry and gold;
 Beneath the British oak's majestic shade,
 Shall see fair truth, immortal maid,
 Friendship in artless guise array'd,
 Honour and moral beauty shine [divine.
 With more attractive charms, with radiance more

Yes, here alone did highest heaven ordain
 The lasting magazine of charms,
 Whatever wins, whatever warms,
 Whatever fancy seeks to share
 The great, the various, and the fair,
 For ever should remain!

Her impulse nothing may restrain—
 Or whence the joy 'mid columns, towers,
 'Midst all the city's artful trim,
 To rear some breathless vapid flowers
 Or shrubs fuliginously grim:
 From rooms of silken foliage vain,
 To trace the dun far distant grove,
 Where, smit with undissembled pain,
 The wood-lark mourns her absent love,
 Borne to the dusty town from native air,
 To mimic rural life, and sooth some vapour'd fair.

But how must faithless art prevail,
 Should all who taste our joy sincere,
 To virtue, truth, or science dear,
 Forego a court's alluring pale,
 For dimpled brook and leafy grove,
 For that rich luxury of thought they love!
 Ah no, from these the public sphere requires
 Examples for its giddy bands:
 From these impartial heaven demands
 To spread the flame itself inspires;
 To sift opinion's mingled mass,
 Impress a nation's taste, and bid the sterling pass.

Happy, thrice happy they,
 Whose graceful deeds have exemplary shone
 Round the gay precincts of a throne,

With mild effective beams!
 Who bands of fair ideas bring,
 By solemn grot, or shady spring,
 To join their pleasing dreams!
 Theirs is the rural bliss without alloy,
 They only that deserve, enjoy.
 What tho' not fabled Dryad haunt their grove,
 Nor Naiad near their fountain rove,
 Yet all embody'd to the mental sight,
 A train of smiling virtues bright
 Shall there the wise retreat allow,
 Shall twine triumphant palms to deck the wan-
 derer's brow.

And though by faithless friends alarm'd,
 Art have with nature wag'd presumptuous war;
 By Seymour's winning influence charm'd,
 In whom their gifts united shine,
 No longer shall their counsels jar.
 'Tis her to mediate the peace;
 Near Percy-lodge, with awe-struck mien,
 The rebel seeks her awful queen,
 And havoc and contention cease.
 I see the rival powers combine,
 And aid each other's fair design;
 Nature exalt the mound where art shall build;
 Art shape the gay alcove, while nature paints the field.

Begin, ye songsters of the grove!
 O warble forth your noblest lay;
 Where Somerset vouchsafe to rove,
 Ye leverets, freely sport and play,
 —Peace to the strept horn!
 Let no harsh dissonance disturb the morn,
 No sounds inelegant and rude
 Her sacred solitudes profane!
 Unless her candour not exclude
 The lowly shepherd's votive strain,
 Who tunes his reed amidst his rural cheer,
 Fearful, yet not averie, that Somerset should hear.

ODE TO MEMORY. 1748.

O MEMORY! celestial maid!
 Who glean'st the flowerets cropt by time;
 And, suffering not a leaf to fade,
 Preserv'st the blossoms of our prime;
 Bring, bring those moments to my mind
 When life was new, and Lesbia kind.
 And bring that garland to my sight,
 With which my favour'd crook the bound;
 And bring that wreath of roses bright
 Which then my festive temples crown'd;
 And to my raptur'd ear convey
 The gentle things she deign'd to say.
 And sketch with care the muse's bower,
 Where Isis rolls her silver tide;
 Nor yet omit one reed or flower
 That shines on Cherwell's verdant side;
 If so thou may'st those hours prolong,
 When polish'd Lycon join'd my song.

The song it 'vails not to recite—
 But sure, to sooth our youthful dreams,
 Those banks and streams appear'd more bright
 Than other banks, than other streams!

Or, by thy softening pencil shown,
Assume thy beauties not their own?
And paint that sweetly vacant scene,
When, all beneath the poplar bough,
My spirits light, my soul serene,
I breath'd in verse one cordial vow:
That nothing should my soul inspire,
But friendship warm, and love entire.

Dull to the sense of new delight,
On thee the drooping muse attends;
As some fond lover, robb'd of sight,
On thy expressive power depends;
Nor would exchange thy glowing lines,
To live the lord of all that shines.

But let me chafe those vows away
Which at ambition's shrine I made;
Nor ever let thy skill display
Those anxious moments, ill repaid:
Oh! from my breast that season raze,
And bring my childhood in its place.

Bring me the bells, the rattle bring,
And bring the hobby I bestrode;
When, pleas'd in many a sportive ring,
Around the room I jovial rode:
Ev'n let me bid my lyre adieu,
And bring the whistle that I blew.

Then will I muse, and pensive say,
Why did not these enjoyments last;
How sweetly wasted I the day,
While innocence allow'd to waste!
Ambition's toils alike are vain,
But ah! for pleasure yield us pain.

THE PRINCESS ELIZABETH:

A ballad alluding to a story recorded of her, when she was prisoner at Woodstock, 1554.

Will you hear how once repining
Great Eliza captive lay?
Each ambitious thought resigning,
Foe to riches, pomp, and sway.

While the nymphs and swains delighted
Tript around in all their pride;
Envyng joys by others slighted,
Thus the royal maiden cry'd.

"Bred on plains, or born in vallies,
Who would bid those scenes adieu?
Stranger to the art of malice,
Who would ever courts pursue?"

Malice never taught to treasure,
Censure never taught to bear:
Love is all the shepherd's pleasure;
Love is all the damsel's care.

How can they of humble station
Vainly blame the powers above?
Or accuse the dispensation
Which allows them all to love?

Love like air is widely given;
Power nor chance can these restrain:
Truest, noblest gifts of heaven!
Only purest on the plain:

Peers can no such charms discover,
All in stars and garters drest,
As, on Sundays, does the lover
With his nosegay on his breast.

Pinks and roses in profusion,
Said to fade when Chloe's near;
Fops may use the same allusion;
But the shepherd is sincere.

Hark to yonder milk-maid singing
Cheerly o'er the brimming pail
Cowslips all around her springing
Sweetly paint the golden vale.

Never yet did courtly maiden
Move so sprightly, look so fair;
Never breast with jewels laden
Pour a song so void of care.

Would indulgent heaven had granted
Me some rural damsel's part!
All the empire I had wanted
Then had been my shepherd's heart.

Then, with him, o'er hills and mountains,
Free from fetters, might I rove:
Fearless taste the crystal fountains;
Peaceful sleep beneath the grove.

Rustics had been more forgiving;
Partial to my virgin bloom:
None had envy'd me when living;
None had triumph'd o'er my tomb."

ODE TO A YOUNG LADY.

Somewhat too solicitous about her manner of expression.

SURVEY, my fair! that lucid stream,
Adown the smiling valley stray;
Would art attempt, or fancy dream,
To regulate its winding way?

So pleas'd I view thy shining hair
In loose dishevell'd ringlets flow:
Not all thy art, not all thy care,
Can there one single grace bestow.

Survey again that verdant hill,
With native plants enamell'd o'er;
Say, can the painter's utmost skill
Instruct one flower to please us more?

As vain it were, with artful dye,
To change the bloom thy cheeks disclose;
And oh may Laura, ere she try,
With fresh vermilion paint the rose.

Hark how the wood-lark's tuneful throat
Can every study'd grace excel;
Let art constrain the rambling note,
And will she, Laura, please so well?

Oh ever keep thy native ease,
By no pedantic law confin'd!
For Laura's voice is form'd to please,
So Laura's words be not unkind.

NANCY OF THE VALE. A BALLAD.

"Nerine Gallatea! thymo mihi dulcior Hyblæ!
 "Candidior cygnis! hederâ formosior albâ!"

THE western sky was purpled o'er
 With every pleasing ray:
 And flocks reviving felt no more
 The sultry heats of day:

When from an hazle's artless bower
 Soft warbled Strephon's tongue;
 He blest the scene, he blest the hour,
 While Nancy's praise he sung.

"Let fops with fickle falsehood range
 The paths of wanton love,
 While weeping maids lament their change,
 And sadden every grove;

But endless blessings crown the day
 I saw fair Esham's dale!
 And every blessing find its way
 To Nancy of the Vale.

'Twas from Avona's banks the maid
 Diffus'd her lovely beams
 And every shining glance display'd
 The Naiad of the streams.

Soft as the wild-duck's tender young,
 That floats on Avon's tide;
 Bright as the water-lily, sprung,
 And glittering near its side.

Fresh as the bordering flowers, her bloom;
 Her eye, all mild to view;
 The little halcyon's azure plume
 Was never half so blue.

Her shape was like the reed so sleek,
 So taper, strait, and fair;
 Her dimpled smile, her blushing cheek,
 How charming sweet they were!

Far in the winding vale retir'd,
 This peerless bud I found;
 And shadowing rock and woods conspir'd
 To fence her beauties round.

That nature in so lone a dell
 Should form a nymph so sweet;
 Or fortune to her secret cell
 Conduct my wandering feet!

Gay lordlings sought her for their bride,
 But she would ne'er incline:
 "Prove to your equals true, she cry'd,
 As I will prove to mine.

'Tis Strephon, on the mountain's brow,
 Has won my right good will;
 To him I gave my plighted vow,
 With him I'll climb the hill."

Struck with her charms and gentle truth,
 I clasp'd the constant fair;
 To her alone I gave my youth,
 And vow my future care.

And when this vow shall faithless prove,
 Or I those charms forego;

The stream that saw our tender love,
 That stream shall cease to flow.

ODE TO INDOLENCE. 1750.

Ah! why for ever on the wing
 Persists my wearied soul to roam?
 Why, ever cheated, strives to bring
 Or pleasure or contentment home?

Thus the poor bird, that draws his name
 From paradise's honour'd groves,
 Careless fatigues his little frame;
 Nor finds the resting-place he loves.

Lo! on the rural mossy bed
 My limbs with careless ease reclin'd;
 Ah, gentle sloth! indulgent spread
 The same soft bandage o'er my mind.

For why should lingering thought invade,
 Yet every worldly prospect cloy?
 Lend me, soft sloth, thy friendly aid,
 And give me peace, debarr'd of joy.

Lov'st thou yon calm and silent flood,
 That never ebbs, that never flows;
 Protected by the circling wood
 From each tempestuous wind that blows?

An altar on its bank shall rise,
 Where oft thy votary shall be found;
 What time pale autumn lulls the skies,
 And sickening verdure fades around.

Ye busy race, ye factious train,
 That haunt ambition's guilty shrine;
 No more perplex the world in vain,
 But offer here your vows with mine.

And thou, puissant queen! be kind:
 If e'er I shar'd thy balmy power;
 If e'er I sway'd my active mind
 To weave for thee the rural bower;

Dissolve in sleep each anxious care;
 Each unavailing sigh remove;
 And only let me wake to share,
 The sweets of friendship and of love.

ODE TO HEALTH. 1730.

O HEALTH, capricious maid!
 Why dost thou shun my peaceful bower,
 Where I had hope to share thy power,
 And bless thy lasting aid?

Since thou, alas! art flown,
 It 'vails not whether muse or grace,
 With tempting smile, frequent the place:
 I sigh for thee alone.

Age not forbids thy stay;
 Thou yet might'st act the friendly part;
 Thou yet might'st raise this languid heart;
 Why speed so swift away?

Thou scorn'st the city-air;
 I breathe fresh gales o'er furrow'd ground,
 Yet hast not thou my wishes crown'd,
 O false! O partial fair!

I plunge into the wave;
And though with purest hand I raise
A rural altar to thy praise,
Thou wilt not deign to save.

Amid my well-known grove,
Where mineral fountains vainly bear
Thy boasted name, and titles fair,
Why scorns thy foot to rove?

Thou hear'st the sportsman's claim;
Enabling him, with idle noise,
To drown the muse's melting voice,
And fright the timorous game.

Is thought thy foe? adieu,
Ye midnight lamps! ye curious tomes,
Mine eye o'er hills and valleys roams,
And deals no more with you.

Is it the clime you flee?
Yet, midst his unremitting snows,
The poor Laponian's bosom glows;
And shares bright rays from thee.

There was, there was a time,
When, though I scorn'd thy guardian care,
Nor made a vow, nor said a prayer,
I did not rue the crime.

Who then more blest than I?
When the glad school-boy's task was done,
And forth, with jocund sprite, I run
To freedom and to joy?

How jovial then the day!
What since have all my labours found,
Thus climbing life, to gaze around,
That can thy loss repay?

Wert thou, alas! but kind,
Methinks no frown that fortune wears,
Nor lessen'd hopes, nor growing cares,
Could sink my cheerful mind.

Whate'er my stars include;
What other breasts convert to pain,
My towering mind shall soon disdain,
Should scorn---Ingratitude!

Repair this mouldering cell,
And blest with objects found at home,
And envying none their fairer dome,
How pleas'd my soul should dwell;

Temperance should guard the doors;
From room to room should memory stray,
And ranging all in neat array,
Enjoy her pleasing stores---

These let them rest unknown,
The types of many a pleasing scene:
But to preserve them bright or clean,
Is thine fair queen's alone.

TO A LADY OF QUALITY *.

FITTING UP HER LIBRARY. 1738.

Ah! what is science, what is art,
Or what the pleasure these impart?

* Lady Luxborough.

Ye trophies, which the learn'd pursue
Through endless fruitless toils adieu!

What can the tedious tomes bestow,
To sooth the miseries they show?
What, like the bliss for him decreed,
Who tends his flock, and tunes his reed!

Say, wretched fancy! thus refin'd
From all that glads the simplest hind,
How rare that object which supplies
A charm for too discerning eyes!

The polish'd bard, of genius vain,
Endures a deeper sense of pain:
As each invading blast devours
The richest fruits, the fairest flowers.

Sages, with irksome waste of time,
The steep ascent of knowledge climb;
Then from the towering heights they scale,
Behold contentment range---the vale.

Yet why, Asteria, tell us why
We scorn the crowd, when you are nigh;
Why then does reason seem so fair,
Why learning, then, deserve our care?

Who can unpleas'd your shelves behold,
While you so fair a proof unfold
What force the brightest genius draws
From polish'd wisdom's written laws?

Where are our humbler tenets flown?
What strange perfection bids us own
That bliss with toilsome science dwells,
And happiest he, who most excels?

UPON A VISIT TO THE SAME, IN WINTER. 1743.

On fair Asteria's blissful plains,
Where ever-blooming fancy reigns,
How pleas'd we pass the winter's day;
And charm the dull-ey'd spleen away!

No linnet, from the leafless bough,
Pours forth her note melodious now;
But all admire Asteria's tongue,
Nor wish the linnet's vernal song.

No flowers emit their transient rays:
Yet sure Asteria's wit displays
More various tints, more glowing lines,
And with perennial beauty shines.

Though rifled groves and fetter'd streams
But ill befriend a poet's dreams:
Asteria's presence wakes the lyre:
And well supplies poetic fire.

The fields have lost their lovely dye;
No cheerful azure decks the sky;
Yet still we bless the low'ring day;
Asteria smiles---and all is gay.

Hence let the muse no more presume,
To blame the winter's dreary gloom;
Accuse his loitering hours no more;
But ah! their envious haste deplore!

For soon, from wit and friendship's reign,
The social hearth, the sprightly vein,

I go---to meet the coming year,
On savage plains, and deserts drear !

I go---to feed on pleasures flown,
Nor find the spring my loss atone !
But 'mid the flowery sweets of May
With pride recall this winter's day.

AN IRREGULAR ODE AFTER SICKNESS.

1749.

"---Melius, cum venerit ipsa, canemus."

Too long a stranger to repose,
At length from pain's abhorred couch I rose,
And wander'd forth alone ;
To court once more the balmy breeze,
And catch the verdure of the trees,
Ere yet their charms were flown.

'Twas from a bank with pansies gay
I hail'd once more the cheerful day,
The sun's forgotten beams :
O sun ! how pleasing were thy rays,
Reflected from the polish'd face
Of yon refulgent streams !

Rais'd by the scene, my feeble tongue
Essay'd again the sweets of song :
And thus, in feeble strains and flow,
The loitering numbers 'gan to flow.

"Come, gentle air ! my languid limbs restore,
And bid me welcome from the Stygian shore :
For sure, I heard the tender sighs,
I seem'd to join the plaintive cries
Of hapless youths, who through the myrtle grove
Bewail for ever their unfinish'd love :

To that unjoyous clime,
Torn from the sight of these ethereal skies ;
Debarr'd the lustre of their Delia's eyes ;
And banish'd in their prime.

Come, gentle air ! and, while the thickets bloom,
Convey the jas'mine's breath divine ;
Convey the woodbine's rich perfume,
Nor spare the sweet-leaft eglantine.
And may't thou shun the rugged storm
Till health her wonted charms explain,
With rural pleasure in her train,
To greet me in her fairest form.

While from this lofty mount I view
The sons of earth, the vulgar crew,
Anxious for futile gains beneath me stray,
And seek with erring step contentment's obvious
way.

Come, gentle air ! and thou, celestial muse,
Thy genial flame infuse ;
Enough to lend a pensive bosom aid,
And gild retirement's gloomy shade ;
Enough to rear such rustic lays
As foes may flight, but partial friends will praise."

The gentle air allow'd my claim ;
And, more to cheer my drooping frame,
She mix'd the balm of opening flowers ;
Such as the bee, with chemic powers,
From Hybla's fragrant hills inhales,
Or scents Sabea's blooming vales.

But ah ! the nymphs that heal the pensive mind,
By precepts more refin'd,
Neglect their votary's anxious moan
Oh, how should they relieve ?---the muses all were flown.

By flowery plain, or woodland shades,
I fondly sought the charming maids ;
By woodland shades, or flowery plain,
I sought them, faithless maids ! in vain !
When lo ! in happier hour,
I leave behind my native mead,
To range where zeal and friendship lead,
To visit Luxborough's honour'd bower.

Ah foolish man ! to seek the tuneful maids
On other plains, or near less verdant shades ;
Scarce have my footsteps press'd the favour'd
ground,

When sounds ethereal strike my ear ;
At once celestial forms appear ;
My fugitives are found !

The muses here attune their lyres,
Ah partial ! with unwonted fires ;
Here, hand in hand, with careless mien,
The sportive graces trip the green.

But whilst I wander'd e'er a scene so fair,
Too well at one survey I trace,
How every muse, and every grace,
Had long employ'd their care.
Lurks not a stone enrich'd with lively stain,
Blossoms not a flower amid the vernal store,
Falls not a plume on India's distant plain,
Glow's not a shell on Adria's rocky shore,
But, torn methought from native lands or seas,
From their arrangement, gain fresh power to please.

And some had bent the wildering maze,
Bedeck'd with every shrub that blows ;
And some entwin'd the willing sprays,
To shield th' illustrious dame's repose :
Others had grac'd the sprightly dome,
And taught the portrait where to glow ;
Others arrang'd the curious tome ;
Or, 'mid the decorated space,
Assign'd the laurell'd bust a place,
And given to learning all the pomp of show,
And now from every task withdrawn,
They met and frisk'd it o'er the lawn.

Ah ! woe is me, said I ;
And * * * 's hilly circuit heard my cry,
Have I for this, with labour strove,
And lavish'd all my little store
To fence for you my shady grove,
And scollop every winding shore ;
And fringe with every purple rose,
The sapphire stream that down my valley flows ?

Ah ! lovely treacherous maids !
To quit unseen my votive shades,
When pale disease, and torturing pain,
Had torn me from the breezy plain,
And to a restless couch confin'd,
Who ne'er your wonted tasks declin'd.
She needs not your officious aid
To swell the song, or plan the shade ;

By genuine fancy fir'd,
Her native genius guides her hand,
And while she marks the sage command,
More lovely scenes her skill shall raise,
Her lyre resound with nobler lays
Than ever you inspir'd.
Thus I may rage and grief display;
But vainly blame, and vainly mourn,
Nor will a grace or muse return
Till Luxborough lead the way.

TO A LADY,

WITH SOME COLOURED PATTERNS OF FLOWERS.
October 7, 1736.

MADAM,

THOUGH rude the draughts, though artless seem the lines,

From one unkill'd in verse, or in designs;
Oft has good-nature been the fool's defence,
And honest meaning gilded want of sense.

Fear not, though flowers and beauty grace my lay,

To praise one fair, another shall decay.
No lily, bright with painted foliage, here,
Shall only languish, when Selinda's near:
A fate revers'd no smiling rose shall know,
Nor with reflected lustre doubly glow.
Praises which languish when apply'd to you,
Where flattering schemes seem obviously true.

Yet sure your sex is near to flowers ally'd,
Alike in softness, and alike in pride:
Foes to retreat, and ever fond to shine,
Both rush to danger, and the shades decline;
Expos'd, the short-liv'd pageants of a day,
To painted flies or glittering fops a prey:
Chang'd with each wind, nor one short day the same,

Each clouded sky affects their tender frame.
In glaring Chloe's man-like taste and mien,
Are the gross splendours of the tulip seen:
Distant they strike, inelegantly gay,
To the near view no pleasing charms display.
To form the nymph, a vulgar wit must join,
As coarser foils will moist the flower refine.
Ophelia's beauties let the jas'mine paint,
Too faintly soft, too nicely elegant.
Around with seeming sanctity endued,
The passion-flower may best express the prude.
Like the gay rose, too rigid Silvia shines,
While, like its guardian thorn, her virtue joins—
Happy the nymph! from all their failures free,
Happy the nymph! in whom their charms agree.

Faint these productions, till you bid disclose,
The pink new splendours, and fresh tints the rose:
And yet condemn not trivial draughts like these,
Form'd to improve, and make ev'n trifles please.
A power like yours minuter beauties warms,
And yet can blast the most aspiring charms:
Thus, at the rays whence other objects shine,
The taper sickens, and its flames decline.
When by your art the purple violet lives,
And the pale lily sprightlier charms receives:
Garters to me shall glow inferior far,
And with less pleasing lustre shine the star.

Let serious triflers, fond of wealth or fame,
On toils like these bestow too soft a name;

Each gentler art with wise indifference view,
And scorn one trifle, millions to pursue:
More artful I, their specious schemes deride:
Fond to please you, by you in these employ'd;
A nobler task, or more sublime desire,
Ambition ne'er could form, nor pride inspire:
The sweets of tranquil life and rural ease
Amuse securely, nor less justly please.
Where gentle pleasure shows her milder power,
Or blooms in fruit, or sparkles in the flower;
Smiles in the groves, the raptur'd poet's theme;
Flows in the brook, his Naiad of the stream;
Dawns, with each happier stroke the pencil gives,
And, in each livelier image, smiling lives;
Is heard, when Silvia strikes the warbling strings,
Selinda speaks, or Philomela sings:
Breathes with the morn; attends, propitious maid,
The evening ramble, and the noon-day glade:
Some visionary fair she cheats our view,
Then only vigorous, when she seems like you.
Yet nature some for sprightlier joys design'd,
For brighter scenes, with nicer care, refin'd.
When the gay jewel radiant streams supplies,
And vivid brilliants meet your brighter eyes;
When dress and pomp around the fancy play,
By fortune's dazzling beauties borne away;
When theatres for you the scenes forego,
And the box bows, obsequiously low:
How dull the plan which indolence has drawn,
The mossy grotto, or the flowery lawn!
Though roseate scents in every wind exhale,
And sylvan warblers charm in every pale.

Of these be hers the choice whom all approve;
And whom but those who envy, all must love:
By nature modell'd, by experience taught,
To know and pity every female fault:
Pleas'd ev'n to hear her sex's virtues shown,
And blind to none's perfections but her own:
Whilst, humble fair! of these too few she knows,
Yet owns too many for the world's repose:
From wit's wild petulance serenely free,
Yet blest in all that nature can decree.
Not like a fire, which, whilst it burns, alarms;
A modest flame, that gently shines and warms:
Whose mind, in every light, can charms display,
With wisdom serious, and with humour gay;
Just as her eyes in each bright posture warm,
And fiercely strike, or languishingly charm:
Such are your honours—mention'd to your coast,
Those least can hear them, who deserve them most:
Yet ah! forgive—the less inventive muse,
If e'er she sing, a copious theme must choose.

Written in a Flower Book of my own colouring, designed for Lady Plymouth. 1755-4.

“Debitæ nymphis opifex coronæ.” HOR.

BRING, Flora, bring thy treasures here,
The pride of all the blooming year;
And let me, thence, a garland frame,
To crown this fair, this peerless dame!
But ah! since envious winter lowers,
And Hewell meads resign their flowers,
Let art and friendship joint essay
Diffuse their flowerets in her way.

Not nature can herself prepare
A worthy wreath for Lesbia's hair,
Whose temper, like her forehead, smooth,
Whose thoughts and accents form'd to sooth,
Whose pleasing mien, and make refin'd,
Whose artless breast, and polish'd mind,
From all the nymphs of plain or grove,
Deserv'd and won my Plymouth's love.

ANACREONTIC. 1738.

'Twas in a cool Aonian glade,
The wanton Cupid, spent with toil,
Had sought refreshment from the shade;
And stretch'd him on the mossy soil.

A vagrant muse drew nigh, and found
The subtle traitor fast asleep;
And is it thine to snore profound,
She said, yet leave the world to weep?

But hush—from this auspicious hour,
The world, I ween, may rest in peace;
And, robb'd of darts, and stript of power,
Thy peevish petulance decrease.

Sleep on, poor child! whilst I withdraw,
And this thy vile artillery hide—
When the Castalion fount she saw,
And plung'd his arrows in the tide.

That magic fount—ill judging maid!
Shall cause you soon to curse the day
You dar'd the shafts of love invade;
And gave his arms redoubled sway.

For in a stream so wondrous clear,
When angry Cupid searches round,
Will not the radiant points appear?
Will not the furtive spoils be found?

Too soon they were; and every dart,
Dipt in the muse's mystic spring,
Acquir'd new force to wound the heart;
And taught at once to love and sing.

Then farewell, ye Pierian quire;
For who will now your altars throng?
From love we learn to swell the lyre;
And echo asks no sweeter song.

O D E. WRITTEN 1739.

"Urit spes animi credula mutui." HOR.

'Twas not by beauty's aid alone,
That love usurp'd his airy throne,
His boasted power display'd;
'Tis kindness that secures his aim,
'Tis hope that feeds the kindling flame,
Which beauty first convey'd.

In Clara's eyes, the lightnings view;
Her lips with all the rose's hue
Have all its sweets combin'd;
Yet vain the blush, and faint the fire,
Till lips at once, and eyes conspire
To prove the charmer kind---

Though wit might gild the tempting snare,
With softest accent, sweetest air,
By envy's self admir'd;

If Lesbia's wit betray'd her scorn,
In vain might every grace adorn
What every muse inspir'd.

Thus airy Strephon tun'd his lyre---
He scorn'd the pangs of wild desire,
Which love-sick swains endure:
Resolv'd to brave the keenest dart;
Since frowns could never wound his heart;
And smiles---must ever cure.

But ah! how false these maxims prove,
How frail security from love,
Experience hourly shows!
Love can imagin'd smiles supply,
On every charming lip and eye
Eternal sweets bestows.

In vain we trust the fair-one's eyes;
In vain the sage explores the skies,
To learn from stars his fate:
Till, led by fancy wide astray,
He finds no planet mark his way;
Convinc'd and wise---too late.

As partial to their words we prove;
Then boldly join the lists of love,
With towering hopes supply'd:
See heroes, taught by doubtful shrines,
Mistook their deity's designs;
Then took the field---and dy'd.

THE DYING KID.

"Optima quæque dies miseris mortalibus ævi
Prima fugit---" VIRG.

A TEAR bedews my Delia's eye,
To think yon playful kid must die;
From crystal spring, and flowery mead,
Must, in his prime of life, recede!

Erewhile, in sportive circles round
She saw him wheel, and frisk, and bound;
From rock to rock pursue his way,
And on the fearful margin play.

Pleas'd on his various freaks to dwell,
She saw him climb my rustic cell:
Thence eye my lawns with verdure bright,
And seem all ravish'd at the sight.

She tells, with what delight he stood,
To trace his features in the flood:
Then skipp'd aloof with quaint amaze;
And then drew near again to gaze.

She tells me how with eager speed
He flew, to hear my vocal reed;
And how with critic face profound,
And steadfast ear, devour'd the sound.

His every frolic, light as air,
Deserves the gentle Delia's care;
And tears bedew her tender eye,
To think the playful kid must die---

But knows my Delia, timely wife,
How soon this blameless era flies?
While violence and craft succeed;
Unfair design, and ruthless deed!

Soon would the vine his wounds deplore,
And yield her purple gifts no more ;
Ah soon, eras'd from every grove
Were Delia's name, and Strephon's love.

No more those bowers might Strephon see,
Where first he fondly gaz'd on thee ;
No more those beds of flowerets find,
Which for thy charming brows he twin'd.

Each wayward passion soon would tear
His bosom, now so void of care ;
And, when they left his ebbing vein,
What, but insipid age, remain ?

Then mourn not the decrees of fate,
That gave his life so short a date ;
And I will join thy tenderest sighs,
To think that youth so swiftly flies !

S O N G S,

WRITTEN CHIEFLY BETWEEN THE YEARS 1737
AND 1742.

S O N G I.

I TOLD my nymph, I told her true,
My fields were small, my flocks were few ;
While faltering accents spoke my fear,
That Flavia might not prove sincere.

Of crops destroy'd by vernal cold,
And vagrant sheep that left my fold :
Of these she heard, yet bore to hear ;
And is not Flavia then sincere ?

How chang'd by fortune's fickle wind,
The friends I lov'd became unkind,
She heard, and shed a generous tear ;
And is not Flavia then sincere ?

How, if she deign my love to bless,
My Flavia must not hope for dress ;
This too she heard, and smil'd to hear ;
And Flavia sure must be sincere.

Go shear your flocks, ye jovial swains,
Go reap the plenty of your plains ;
Despoil'd of all which you revere,
I know my Flavia's love's sincere.

S O N G II.

THE LANDSCAPE.

How pleas'd within my native bowers
Erewhile I pass'd the day !
Was ever scene so deck'd with flowers ?
Were ever flowers so gay ?

How sweetly smil'd the hill, the vale,
And all the landscape round !
The river gliding down the dale !
The hill with beeches crown'd !

But now, when urg'd by tender woes
I speed to meet my dear,
That hill and stream my zeal oppose,
And check my fond career.

No more, since Daphne was my theme,
Their wonted charms I see :
That verdant hill, and silver stream,
Divide my love and me.

S O N G III.

YE gentle nymphs and generous dames,
That rule o'er every British mind ;
Be sure ye sooth their amorous flames,
Be sure your laws are not unkind.

For hard it is to wear their bloom
In unremitting sighs away :
To mourn the night's oppressive gloom
And faintly bless the rising day.

And cruel 'twere, a free-born swain,
A British youth, should vainly moan ;
Who, scornful of a tyrant's chain,
Submits to yours, and yours alone.

Nor pointed spear, nor links of steel,
Could e'er those gallant minds subdue,
Who beauty's wounds with pleasure feel,
And boast the fetters wrought by you.

S O N G IV.

THE SKY-LARK.

Go, tuneful bird, that glad'st the skies,
To Daphne's window speed thy way ;
And there on quivering pinions rise,
And there thy vocal art display.

And if she deign thy notes to hear,
And if she praise thy matin song,
Tell her the sounds that sooth her ear,
To Damon's native plains belong.

Tell her, in livelier plumes array'd,
The bird from Indian groves may shine ;
But ask the lovely partial maid,
What are his notes compar'd to thine ?

Then bid her treat yon witless beau
And all his flaunting race with scorn ;
And lend an ear to Damon's woe,
Who sings her praise, and sings forlorn.

S O N G V.

" Ah ! ego non aliter tristes evincere morbos
" Optarem, quam te sic quoque velle putem."

ON every tree, in every plain,
I trace the jovial spring in vain !
A sickly languor veils mine eyes,
And fast my waning vigour flies.

Nor flowery plain, nor budding tree,
That smile on others, smile on me ;
Mine eyes from death shall court repose,
Nor shed a tear before they close.

What blest to me can seasons bring ?
Or what the needless pride of spring ?
The cypress bough, that suits the bier,
Retains its verdure all the year.

'Tis true, my vine so fresh and fair
Might claim a while my wonted care;
My rural store some pleasure yield;
So white a flock, so green a field!

My friends, that each in kindness vie,
Might well expect one parting sigh;
Might well demand one tender tear;
For when was Damon insincere?

But ere I ask once more to view
Yon setting sun his race renew,
Inform me, swains; my friends, declare,
Will pitying Delia join the prayer?

SONG VI.

THE ATTRIBUTE OF VENUS.

YES; Fulvia is like Venus fair;
Has all her bloom, and shape and air;
But still, to perfect every grace,
She wants---the smile upon her face.

The crown majestic Juno wore;
And Cynthia's brow the crescent bore,
An helmet mark'd Minerva's mien,
But smile's distinguish'd beauty's queen.

Her train was form'd of smiles and loves,
Her chariot drawn by gentlest doves!
And from her zone, the nymph may find,
'Tis beauty's province to be kind.

Then smile, my fair; and all whose aim
Aspires to paint the Cyprian dame,
Or bid her breathe in living stone,
Shall take their forms from you alone.

SONG VII. 1744.

THE lovely Delia smiles again;
That killing frown has left her brow:
Can she forgive my jealous pain,
And give me back my angry vow?

Love is an April's doubtful day:
A while we see the tempest lower;
Anon the radiant heaven survey,
And quite forget the flitting shower.

The flowers, that hung their languid head,
Are burnish'd by the transient rains;
The vines their wonted tendrils spread,
And double verdure gilds the plains.

The sprightly birds, that droop'd no less
Beneath the power of rain and wind,
In every raptur'd note express
The joy I feel---when thou art kind.

SONG VIII. 1742.

WHEN bright Roxana treads the green,
In all the pride of dress and mien;
Averse to freedom, love, and play,
The dazzling rival of the day:
None other beauty strikes mine eye,
The lilies droop, the roses die.

But when, disclaiming art, the fair
Assumes a soft engaging air;

Mild as the opening morn of May,
Familiar, friendly, free, and gay;
The scene improves, where'er she goes,
More sweetly smile the pink and rose.

O lovely maid! propitious hear,
Nor deem thy shepherd insincere;
Pity a wild illusive flame,
That varies objects still the same:
And let their very changes prove
The never-vary'd force of love.

SONG IX. 1743.

VALENTINE'S DAY.

'Tis said that under distant skies,
Nor you the fact deny;
What first attracts an Indian's eyes
Becomes his deity.

Perhaps a lily, or a rose,
That shares the morning's ray,
May to the waking swain disclose
The regent of the day.

Perhaps a plant in yonder grove,
Enrich'd with fragrant power,
May tempt his vagrant eyes to rove,
Where blooms the sovereign flower.

Perch'd on the cedar's topmost bough,
And gay with gilded wings,
Perchance, the patron of his vow,
Some artless linnet sings.

The swain surveys her pleas'd, afraid,
Then low to earth he bends;
And owns, upon her friendly aid,
His health, his life, depends.

Vain futile idols, bird or flower,
To tempt a votary's prayer!
How would his humble homage tower
Should he behold my fair!

Yes---might the pagan's waking eyes,
O'er Flavia's beauty range,
He there would fix his lasting choice,
Nor dare, nor wish to change.

SONG X. 1743.

THE fatal hours are wondrous near,
That from these fountains bear my dear;
A little space is given; in vain:
She robs my sight, and shuns the plain.

A little space, for me to prove
My boundless flame, my endless love;
And, like the train of vulgar hours,
Invidious time that space devours.

Near yonder beech is Delia's way
On that I gaze the livelong day;
No eastern monarch's dazzling pride
Shall draw my longing eyes aside.

The chief that knows of succours nigh,
And sees his mangled legions die,
Casts not a more impatient glance,
To see the loitering aids advance.

Not more, the school-boy that expires
Far from his native home, requires
To see some friend's familiar face,
Or meet a parent's last embrace—

She comes---but ah! what crowds of beaux
In radiant bands my fair enclose!
Oh! better hadst thou shunn'd the green,
Oh, Delia! better far unseen.

Methinks, by all my tender fears,
By all my sighs, by all my tears,
I might from torture now be free—
'Tis more than death to part from thee!

SONG XI. 1744.

PERHAPS it is not love, said I,
That melts my soul when Flavia's nigh;
Where wit and sense like her's agree,
One may be pleas'd, and yet be free.

The beauties of her polish'd mind,
It needs no lover's eye to find;
The hermit freezing in his cell,
Might wish the gentle Flavia well.

It is not love---averse to bear
The servile chain that lovers wear;
Let, let me all my fears remove,
My doubts dispel---it is not love---

Oh! when did wit so brightly shine
In any form less fair than thine?
It is---it is love's subtle fire,
And under friendship lurks desire.

SONG XII. 1744.

O'ER desert plains, and rushy meers,
And wither'd heaths, I rove;
Where tree, nor spire, nor cot appears,
I pass to meet my love.

But though my path were damask'd o'er
With beauties e'er so fine;
My busy thoughts would fly before
To fix alone---on thine.

No fir-crown'd hills could give delight,
No palace please mine eye:
No pyramid's aerial height,
Where mouldering monarchs lie.

Unmov'd, should eastern kings advance;
Could I the pageant see:
Splendour might catch one scornful glance,
Nor steal one thought from thee.

SONG XIII.

THE SCHOLAR'S RELAPSE.

By the side of a grove, at the foot of a hill,
Where whisper'd the beech, and where murmur'd
the rill;

I vow'd to the muses my time and my care,
Since neither could win me the smiles of my fair.

Free I rang'd like the birds, like the birds free I
fung, [tongue;
And Delia's lov'd name scarce escap'd from my

But if once a smooth accent delighted my ear,
I should wish, unawares, that my Delia might hear.

With fairest ideas my bosom I stor'd,
Allusive to none but the nymph I ador'd!
And the more I with study my fancy refin'd,
The deeper impression she made on my mind.

So long as of nature the charms I pursue,
I still must my Delia's dear image renew:
The graces have yielded with Delia to rove,
And the muses are all in alliance with love!

SONG XIV.

THE ROSE-BUD.

SEE, Daphne, see, Florelia cry'd,
And learn the sad effects of pride;
Yon shelter'd rose, how safe conceal'd!
How quickly blasted, when reveal'd!

The sun with warm attractive rays
Tempted it to wanton in the blaze:
A gale succeeds from eastern skies,
And all its blushing radiance dies.

So you, my fair, of charms divine,
Will quit the plains, too fond to shine
Where fame's transporting rays allure,
Though here more happy, more secure.

The breath of some neglected maid
Shall make you sigh you left the shade;
A breath to beauty's bloom unkind,
As, to the rose, an eastern wind.

The nymph reply'd---You first, my swain,
Confin'd your sonnets to the plain;
One envious tongue alike disarms,
You, of your wit, me, of my charms.

What is, unknown, the poet's skill?
Or what, unheard, the tuneful thrill?
What, unadmir'd, a charming mien,
Or what the rose's blush, unseen?

SONG XV.

WINTER. 1746.

No more, ye warbling birds, rejoice:
Of all that cheer'd the plain,
Echo alone preserves her voice,
And she---repeats my pain.

Where'er my love-sick limbs I lay,
To shun the rushing wind,
Its busy murmurs seem to say,
"She never will be kind!"

The Naiads, o'er their frozen urns,
In icy chains repine;
And each in sullen silence mourns
Her freedom lost, like mine!

Soon will the sun's returning rays
The cheerless frost controul;
When will relenting Delia chase
The winter of my soul?

SONG XVI.

DAPHNE'S VISIT.

YE birds! for whom I rear'd the grove,
With melting lay salute my love:
My Daphne with your notes detain:
Or I have rear'd my grove in vain.

Ye flowers! before her footsteps rise :
Display at once your brightest dyes ;
That she your opening charms may see :
Or what were all your charms to me ?

Kind Zephyr ! brush each fragrant flower,
And shed its odours round my bower :
Or never more, O gentle wind,
Shall I, from thee, refreshment find.

Ye streams! if e'er your banks I lov'd,
If e'er your native sounds improv'd,
May each soft murmur sooth my fair!
Or, oh! 'twill deepen my despair.

And thou, my grot ! whose lonely bounds
The melancholy pine surrounds,
May Daphne praise thy peaceful gloom !
Or thou shalt prove her Damon's tomb.

SONG XVII.

WRITTEN IN A COLLECTION OF BACCHANALIAN
SONGS.

ADIEU, ye jovial youths, who join
To plunge old care in floods of wine;
And, as your dazzled eye-balls roll,
Discern him struggling in the bowl.

Not yet is hope so wholly flown,
Not yet is thought so tedious grown,
But limpid stream and shady tree
Retain, as yet, some sweets for me.

And see through yonder silent grove,
See yonder does my Daphne rove ;
With pride her footsteps I pursue,
And bid your frantic joys adieu.

The sole confusion I admire,
Is that my Daphne's eyes inspire :
I scorn the madness you approve,
And value reason next to love.

SONG XVIII.

WHEN bright Ophelia treads the green,
In all the pride of dress and mien :
Averse to freedom, mirth, and play,
The lofty rival of the day ;
Methinks to my enchanted eye,
The lilies droop, the roses die.

But when, disdaining art, the fair
Assumes a soft, engaging air :
Mild as the opening morn of May,
And as the feather'd warblers gay :
The scene improves where'er she goes,
More sweetly smiles the pink and rose.

O lovely maid ! propitious hear,
Nor think thy Damon insincere.

Pity my wild delusive flame :
For though the flowers are still the same,
To me they languish, or improve,
And plainly tell me that I love.

SONG XIX.

IMITATED FROM THE FRENCH.

YES, these are the scenes where with Iris I stray'd,
But short was her sway for so lovely a maid !
In the bloom of her youth to a cloyster she run ;
In the bloom of her graces too fair for a nun !
Ill-grounded, no doubt, a devotion must prove
So fatal to beauty, so killing to love !

Yes, these are the meadows, the shrubs, and the plains; [pains;
Once the scene of my pleasures, the scene of my
How many soft moments I spent in this grove!
How fair was my nymph! and how fervent my love! [o'er;
Be still though, my heart! thine emotion give
Remember, the season of love is no more.

With her how I stray'd amid fountains and bowers,
Or loiter'd behind and collected the flowers !
Then breathless with ardour my fair one pursued,
And to think with what kindness my garland she view'd ! fo'er

But be still, my fond heart! this emotion give Fain wouldst thou forget thou must love her no more.

A PARODY.

WHEN first, Philander, first I came
Where Avon rolls his winding stream,
The nymphs---how brisk! the swains---how gay!
To see Asteria, queen of May!
The parsons round, her praises sung!
The steeples, with her praises rung!---
I thought---no sight, that e'er was seen,
Could match the sight of Barel's-green!---

But now, since old Eugenio dy'd---
The chief of poets, and the pride---
Now, meaner bards in vain aspire
To raise their voice, to tune their lyre !
Their lovely season, now, is o'er !
Thy notes, Florelia, please no more !
No more Asteria's smiles are seen !---
Adieu !---the sweets of Barel's-green !

THE HALCYON.

WHY o'er the verdant banks of Ooze
Does yonder halcyon speed so fast?
'Tis all because she would not lose
Her favourite calm that will not last.

The sun with azure paints the skies,
The stream reflects each flowery spray :
And frugal of her time she flies
To take her fill of love and play.

See her, when rugged Boreas blows,
Warm in some rocky cell remain;
To seek for pleasure, well she knows,
Would only then enhance the pain.

Descend, she cries, thou hated shower,
Deform my limpid waves to-day,

For I have chose a fairer hour
To take my fill of love and play.
You too, my Silvia, sure will own
Life's azure seasons swiftly roll:
And when our youth or health is flown,
To think of love but shocks the soul.
Could Damon but deserve thy charms,
And thou art Damon's only theme;
He'd fly as quick to Delia's arms,
As yonder halcyon skims the stream.

O D E.

So, dear my Lucio is to me,
So well our minds and tempers blend;
That seasons may for ever flee,
And ne'er divide me from my friend;
But let the favour'd boy forbear
To tempt with love my only fair.

O Lycon, born when every muse,
When every grace benignant smil'd,
With all a parent's breast could choose
To bless her lov'd, her only child:
'Tis thine, so richly grac'd to prove
More noble cares, than cares of love.

Together we from early youth
Have trod the flowery tracks of time.
Together mus'd in search of truth,
O'er learned sage, or bard sublime;
And well thy cultur'd breast I know,
What wondrous treasure it can show.

Come then, resume thy charming lyre,
And sing some patriot's worth sublime;
Whilst I in fields of soft desire
Consume my fair and fruitless prime;
Whose reed aspires but to display
The flame that burns me night and day.

O come! the dryads of the woods
Shall daily sooth thy studious mind,
The blue-ey'd nymphs of yonder floods
Shall meet and court thee to be kind;
And fame sits listening for thy lays
To swell her trump with Lucio's praise.

Like me, the plover fondly tries
To lure the sportsman from her nest,
And fluttering on with anxious cries,
Too plainly shows her tortur'd breast:
O let him, conscious of her care,
Pity her pains, and learn to spare.

A PASTORAL ODE,

TO THE HON. SIR RICHARD LYTTLETON.

THE morn dispens'd a dubious light
A fullen mist had stol'n from sight
Each pleasing vale and hill;
When Damon left his humble bowers,
To guard his flocks, to fence his flowers,
Or check his wandering rill.
Though school'd from fortune's paths to fly,
The swain beneath each lowering sky,
Would oft his fate bemoan;

That he in sylvan shades, forlorn!
Must waste his cheerless ev'n and morn.
Nor prais'd, nor lov'd, nor known.

No friend to fame's obstreperous noise,
Yet to the whispers of her voice,
Soft murmuring, not a foe:
The pleasures he through choice declin'd,
When gloomy fogs depress'd his mind,
It griev'd him to forego.

Griev'd him to lurk the lakes beside,
Where coots in rushy dingles hide,
And moorcocks shun the day:
While caitiff bitterns, undismay'd,
Remarks the swain's familiar shade,
And scorn to quit their prey.

But see the radiant sun once more
The brightening face of heaven restore
And raise the doubtful dawn;
And, more to gild his rural sphere,
At once the brightest train appear,
That ever trod the lawn.

Amazement chill'd the shepherd's frame,
To think * Bridgewater's honour'd name
Should grace his rustic cell;
That she, on all whose motions wait
Distinction, titles, rank, and state,
Should rove where shepherds dwell.

But true it is, the generous mind,
By candour sway'd, by taste refin'd,
Will nought but vice disdain;
Nor will the breast where fancy glows
Deem every flower a weed that blows
Amid the desert plain.

Beseems it such, with honour crown'd,
To deal its lucid beams around,
Nor equal meed receive:
At most such garlands from the field,
As cowslips, pinks, and pansies yield,
And rural hands can weave.

Yet strive, ye shepherds, strive to find,
And weave the fairest of the kind,
The prime of all the spring;
If haply thus yon lovely fair
May round their temples deign to wear
The trivial wreaths you bring,

O how the peaceful halcyons play'd,
Where'er the conscious lake betray'd
Athenia's placid mien;
How did the sprightlier linnets throng,
Where Paphia's charms requir'd the song,
'Mid hazel copses green;

Lo, Dartmouth on those banks reclin'd,
While busy fancy calls to mind
The glories of his line;
Methinks my cottage rears its head,
The ruin'd walls of yonder shed,
As through enchantment, shine.

But who the nymph that guides their way?
Could every nymph descend to stray
From Hagley's fam'd retreat?

* The Duchess, married to Sir R. Lyttleton.

Else, by the blooming features fair
The faultless make, the matchless air,
'Twere Cynthia's form complete.

So would some tuberose delight,
That struck the pilgrim's wondering sight
'Mid lonely deserts drear;
All as at eve, the sovereign flower
Dispenses round its balmy power,
And crowns the fragrant year.

Ah, now no more, the shepherd cry'd,
Must I ambition's charms deride,
Her subtle force disown;
No more of fawns or fairies dream,
While fancy, near each crystal stream,
Shall paint these forms alone.

By low-brow'd rock, or pathless mead,
I deem'd that splendour ne'er should lead
My dazzled eyes astray;
But who, alas! will dare contend,
If beauty aid, or merit blend
Its more illustrious ray?

Nor is it long—O plaintive swain!
Since Guernsey saw without disdain,
Where, hid in woodlands green,
The * partner of his early days,
And once the rival of his praise,
Had stol'n through life unseen.

Scarce faded is the vernal flower,
Since Stamford left his honour'd bower
To smile familiar here:
O form'd by nature to disclose
How fair that courtesey which flows
From social warmth sincere.

Nor yet have many moons decay'd,
Since Pollio sought this lonely shade,
Admir'd this rural maze:
The noblest breast that virtue fires,
The graces love, the muse inspires,
Might pant for Pollio's praise.

Say, Thomson, here was known to rest,
For him yon vernal seat I drest,
Ah, never to return!
In place of wit and melting strains,
And social mirth, it now remains
To weep beside his urn.

Come then, my Lælius, come once more,
And fringe the melancholy shore
With roses and with bays,
While I each wayward fate accuse,
That envy'd his impartial muse
To sing your early praise.

While Philo, to whose favour'd sight,
Antiquity with full delight,
Her inmost wealth displays;
Beneath yon ruins moulder'd wall
Shall muse, and with his friend recal!
The pomp of ancient days.

Here too shall Conway's name appear,
He prais'd the stream so lovely clear,
That shone the reeds among;

Yet clearness could it not disclose,
To match the rhetoric that flows
From Conway's polish'd tongue.

Ev'n Pitt, whose fervent periods roll
Resistless! through the kindling soul
Of senates, councils, kings!
Though form'd for courts, vouchsaf'd to rove
Inglorious, through the shepherd's grove,
And ope his bathful springs.

But what can courts discover more,
Than these rude haunts have seen before,
Each fount and shady tree?
Have not these trees and fountains seen
The pride of courts, the winning mien
Of peerless Aylesbury?

And Grenville, she whose radiant eyes
Have mark'd by slow gradation rise
The princely piles of Stow;
Yet prais'd these unembellish'd woods,
And smil'd to see the babbling floods
Through self-worn mazes flow.

Say, Dartmouth, who your banks admir'd,
Again beneath your caves retir'd,
Shall grace the pensive shade;
With all the bloom, with all the truth,
With all the sprightliness of youth,
By cool reflection sway'd?

Brave, yet humane, shall Smith appear,
Ye sailors, though his name be dear,
Think him not yours alone:
Grant him in other spheres to charm,
The shepherds' breasts though mild are warm,
And ours are all his own.

O Lyttleton! my honour'd guest,
Could I describe thy generous breast,
Thy firm, yet polish'd mind;
How public love adorns thy name,
How fortune too conspires with fame;
The song should please mankind.

VERSES

Written towards the close of the year 1748.

TO WILLIAM LYTTLETON, ESQ.

How blithly pass'd the summer's day!
How bright was every flower!
While friends arriv'd, in circles gay,
To visit Damon's bower!

But now, with silent step, I range
Along some lonely shore;
And Damon's bower, alas the change!
Is gay with friends no more.

Away to crowds and cities borne
In quest of joy they steer;
Whilst I, alas! am left forlorn,
To weep the parting year!

O pensive autumn! how I grieve
Thy sorrowing face to see!
When languid suns are taking leave
Of every drooping tree.

Ah let me not, with heavy eye,
This dying scene survey!
Haste, winter, haste; usurp the sky;
Complete my bower's decay.

R 5

* They were schoolfellows.

Ill can I bear the motely cast
 Yon sickening leaves retain;
 That speak at once of pleasure past,
 And bode approaching pain.
 At home unblest, I gaze around,
 My distant scenes require;
 Where all in murky vapours drown'd
 Are hamlet, hill, and spire.
 Though Thomson, sweet descriptive bard!
 Inspiring autumn sung;
 Yet how should we the months regard,
 That stopt his flowing tongue?
 Ah luckless months, of all the rest,
 To whose hard share it fell!
 For sure he was the gentlest breast
 That ever sung so well.
 And see, the swallows now disown
 The roofs they lov'd before;
 Each, like his tuneful genius, flown
 To glad some happier shore.
 The wood-nymph eyes, with pale affright,
 The sportman's frantic deed;
 While hounds and horns and yells unite
 To drown the muse's reed.
 Ye fields with blighted herbage brown,
 Ye skies no longer blue!
 Too much we feel from fortune's frown,
 To bear these frowns from you.
 Where is the mead's unfullied green?
 The zephyr's balmy gale?
 And where sweet friendship's cordial mien,
 That brighten'd every vale?
 What though the vine disclose her dyes,
 And boast her purple store;
 Not all the vineyard's rich supplies
 Can sooth our sorrows more.
 He! he is gone, whose moral strain
 Could wit and mirth refine;
 He! he is gone, whose social vein
 Surpass'd the pow'r of wine.
 Fast by the streams he deign'd to praise
 In yon sequester'd grove,
 To him a votive urn I raise;
 To him, and friendly love.
 Yes, there, my friend! forlorn and sad,
 I grave your Thomson's name;
 And there, his lyre; which fate forbade
 To sound your growing fame.
 There shall my plaintive song recount
 Dark themes of hopeless woe;
 And faster than the dropping fount,
 I'll teach mine eyes to flow.
 There leaves, in spite of autumn green,
 Shall shade the hallow'd ground;
 And spring will there again be seen,
 To call forth flowers around.
 But no kind fons will bid me share,
 Once more, his social hour;
 Ah spring! thou never canst repair
 This loss, to Damon's bower.

LOVE AND MUSIC.

WRITTEN AT OXFORD, WHEN YOUNG.

SHALL love alone for ever claim
 An universal right to fame,
 An undisputed sway?
 Or has not music equal charms,
 To fill the breast with strange alarms,
 And make the world obey?
 The Thracian bard, as poets tell,
 Could mitigate the powers of hell;
 Ev'n Pluto's nicer ear:
 His arts, no more than love's, we find
 To deities or men confin'd,
 Drew brutes in crowds to hear.
 Whatever favourite passion reign'd,
 The poet still his right maintain'd
 O'er all that rang'd the plain:
 The fiercer tyrants could assuage,
 Or fire the timorous into rage,
 Whene'er he chang'd the strain.
 In milder lays the bard began;
 Soft notes through every finger ran,
 And echoing charm'd the place:
 See! fawning lions gaze around,
 And, taught to quit their savage sound,
 Assume a gentler grace.
 When Cymon view'd the fair one's charms,
 Her ruby lips, and snowy arms,
 And told her beauties o'er:
 When love reform'd his awkward tone,
 And made each clownish gesture known,
 It show'd but equal power.
 The bard now tries a sprightlier sound,
 When all the feather'd race around
 Perceiv'd the varied strains;
 The soaring lark the note pursues;
 The timorous dove around him coos,
 And Philomel complains.
 An equal power of love I've seen,
 Incite the deer to scour the green,
 And chase his barking foe.
 Sometimes has love, with greater might,
 To challenge—nay—sometimes—to fight
 Provok'd th' enamour'd beau.
 When Silvia treads the smiling plain,
 How glows the heart of every swain,
 By pleasing tumults tost!
 When Handel's solemn accents roll,
 Each breast is fir'd, each raptur'd soul
 In sweet confusion lost.
 If she her melting glances dart,
 Or he his dying airs impart,
 Our spirits sink away.
 Enough, enough! dear nymph, give o'er;
 And thou, great artist! urge no more
 Thy unresisted sway.
 Thus love or sound affects the mind:
 But when their various powers are join'd,
 Fly, daring mortal, fly!
 For when Selinda's charms appear,
 And I her tuneful accents hear—
 I burn, I faint, I die!

COMPARISON.

'Tis by comparison we know
On every object to bestow
Its proper share of praise:
Did each alike perfection bear,
What beauty, though divinely fair,
Could admiration raise?

Amidst the lucid bands of night,
See! Hesperus, serenely bright,
Adorns the distant skies:
But languishes amidst the blaze
Of sprightly Sol's meridian rays,—
Or Silvia's brighter eyes.

Whene'er the nightingale complains,
I like the melancholy strains,
And praise the tuneful bird:
But vainly might she strain her throat,
Vainly exalt each swelling note,
Should Silvia's voice be heard.

When, on the violet's purple bed,
Supine I rest my weary head,
The fragrant pillow charms:
Yet soon such languid bliss I'd fly,
Would Silvia but the loss supply,
And take me to her arms.

The alabaster's wondrous white,
The marble's polish strikes my sight,
When Silvia is not seen:
But ah! how faint that white is grown,
How rough appears the polish'd stone,
Compar'd with Silvia's mien!

The rose, that o'er the Cyprian plains,
With flowers enamell'd, blooming reigns,
With undisputed power,
Plac'd near her cheek's celestial red,
(Its purple lost, its lustre fled,)—
Delights the sense no more.

ODE TO CYNTHIA,

ON THE APPROACH OF SPRING.

Now in the cowslip's dewy cell
The fairies make their bed,
They hover round the crystal well,
The turf in circles tread.

The lovely linnet now her song
Tunes sweetest in the wood;
The twittering swallow skims along
The azure liquid flood.

The morning breeze wafts Flora's kiss
In fragrance to the sense;
The happy shepherd feels the bliss,
And she takes no offence.

But not the linnet's sweetest song
That ever fill'd the wood;
Or twittering swallow that along
The azure liquid flood

Skims swiftly, harbinger of spring,
Or morning's sweetest breath,
Or Flora's kiss, to me can bring
A remedy for death.

For death—what do I say? Yes, death
Must surely end my days,
If cruel Cynthia flights my faith,
And will not hear my lays.

No more with festive garlands bound,
I at the wake shall be;
No more my feet shall press the ground
In dance with wonted glee;

No more my little flock I'll keep,
To some dark cave I'll fly;
I've nothing now to do but weep,
To mourn my fate, and sigh.

Ah! Cynthia, thy Damon's cries
Are heard at dead of night;
But they, alas! are doom'd to rise
Like smoke upon the sight.

They rise in vain, ah me! in vain
Are scatter'd in the wind;
Cynthia does not know the pain
That rankles in my mind

If sleep perhaps my eye-lids close,
'Tis but to dream of you;
A while I cease to feel my woes,
Nay, think I'm happy too.

I think I press with kisses pure,
Your lovely rosy lips;
And you're my bride, I think I'm sure,
Till gold the mountain tips.

When wak'd, aghast I look around,
And find my charmer flown;
Then bleeds afresh my galling wound,
While I am left alone.

Take pity then, O gentlest maid!
On thy poor Damon's heart:
Remember what I've often said,
'Tis you can cure my smart.

JEMMY DAWSON. A BALLAD.

Written about the time of his execution, in the year 1745.

COME listen to my mournful tale,
Ye tender hearts and lovers dear;
Nor will you scorn to heave a sigh,
Nor need you blush to shed a tear.

And thou, dear Kitty, peerless maid,
Do thou a pensive ear incline;
For thou canst weep at every woe;
And pity every plaint—but mine.

Young Dawson was a gallant boy,
A brighter never trod the plain;
And well he lov'd one charming maid,
And dearly was he lov'd again.

One tender maid, she lov'd him dear,
Of gentle blood the damsel came;
And faultless was her beauteous form,
And spotless was her virgin fame.

But curse on party's hateful strife,
That led the favour'd youth astray;
The day the rebel clans appear'd,
O had he never seen that day!

R r ij

Their colours and their fash he wore,
And in the fatal drefs was found;
And now he must that death endure,
Which gives the brave the keenest wound.

How pale was then his true-love's cheek,
When Jemmy's sentence reach'd her ear!
For never yet did Alpine snows
So pale, or yet so chill appear.

With faltering voice, she weeping said,
Oh Dawson, monarch of my heart;
Think not thy death shall end our loves,
For thou and I will never part.

Yet might sweet mercy find a place,
And bring relief to Jemmy's woes;
O George, without a pray'r for thee,
My orizons should never close.

The gracious prince that gave him life,
Would crown a never-dying flame;
And every tender babe I bore
Should learn to list the giver's name.

But though he should be dragg'd in scorn
To yonder ignominious tree;
He shall not want one constant friend
To share the cruel fates' decree.

O then her mourning-coach was call'd,
The sledge mov'd slowly on before;
Though borne in a triumphal car,
She had not lov'd her favourite more.

She follow'd him prepar'd to view
The terrible behests of law;
And the last scene of Jemmy's woes,
With calm and stedfast eye she saw.

Distorted was that blooming face,
Which she had fondly lov'd so long;
And stifled was that tuneful breath,
Which in her praise had sweetly sung.

And sever'd was that beauteous neck,
Round which her arms had fondly clos'd;
And mangled was that beauteous breast,
On which her love-sick head repos'd:

And ravish'd was that constant heart,
She did to every heart prefer;
For though it could its king forget,
'Twas true and loyal still to her.

Amid those unrelenting flames,
She bore this constant heart to see;
But when 'twas moulder'd into dust,
Yet, yet, she cry'd, I follow thee.

My death, my death alone can show
The pure and lasting love I bore;
Accept, O heav'n! of woes like ours,
And let us, let us weep no more.

The dismal scene was o'er and past,
The lover's mournful hearse retir'd;
The maid drew back her languid head,
And, sighing forth his name, expir'd.

Though justice ever must prevail,
The tear my Kitty sheds is due:
For seldom shall she hear a tale
So sad, so tender, yet so true.

A PASTORAL BALLAD,

IN FOUR PARTS. 1743.

"Arbusta humilesque myricæ." VIRG.

I. ABSENCE.

YE shepherds so cheerful and gay,
Whose flocks never carelessly roam;
Should Corydon's happen to stray,
Oh! call the poor wanderers home.
Allow me to muse and to sigh,
Nor talk of the change that ye find;
None once was so watchful as I;
I have left my dear Phillis behind.

Now I know what it is, to have strove
With the torture of doubt and desire;
What it is to admire and to love,
And to leave her we love and admire.
Ah, lead forth my flock in the morn,
And the damps of each evening repel;
Alas! I am faint and forlorn:
—I have bade my dear Phillis farewell.

Since Phillis vouchsaf'd me a look,
I never once dreamt of my vine:
May I lose both my pipe and my crook,
If I knew of a kid that was mine.
I priz'd every hour that went by,
Beyond all that had pleas'd me before;
But now they are past, and I sigh;
And I grieve that I priz'd them no more.

But why do I languish in vain;
Why wander thus pensively here?
Oh! why did I come from the plain,
Where I fed on the smiles of my dear?
They tell me, my favourite maid,
The pride of that valley, is flown.
Alas! where with her I have stray'd,
I could wander with pleasure, alone.

When forc'd the fair nymph to forego,
What anguish I felt at my heart:
Yet I thought—but it might not be so—
'Twas with pain that she saw me depart.
She gaz'd, as I slowly withdrew;
My path I could hardly discern;
So sweetly she bade me adieu,
I thought that she bade me return.

The pilgrim that journeys all day
To visit some far-distant shrine,
If he bear but a relique away,
Is happy, nor heard to repine.
Thus widely remov'd from the fair,
Where my vows, my devotion, I owe
Soft hope is the relique I bear,
And my solace, wherever I go.

II. HOPE.

My banks they are furnish'd with bees,
Whose murmur invites one to sleep;
My grottos are shaded with trees,
And my hills are white over with sheep.
I seldom have met with a loss,
Such health do my fountains bestow;
My fountains all border'd with moss,
Where the hare-bells and violets grow.
Not a pine in my grove is there seen,
But with tendrils of woodbine is bound:

Not a beech's more beautiful green,
But a sweet-briar entwines it around.
Not my fields in the prime of the year,
More charms than my cattle unfold;
Not a brook that is limpid and clear,
But it glitters with fishes of gold.

One would think she might like to retire
To the bower I have labour'd to rear;
Not a shrub that I heard her admire,
But I hasted and planted it there.
O how sudden the jessamine strove
With the lilac to render it gay!
Already it calls for my love,
To prune the wild branches away.

From the plains, from the woodlands and groves,
What strains of wild melody flow!
How the nightingales warble their loves
From thickets of roses that blow!
And when her bright form shall appear,
Each bird shall harmoniously join
In a concert so soft and so clear,
As—she may not be fond to resign.

I have found out a gift for my fair;
I have found where the wood-pigeons breed:
But let me that plunder forbear,
She will say 'twas a barbarous deed.
For he ne'er could be true, she aver'd,
Who could rob a poor bird of its young:
And I lov'd her the more when I heard
Such tendernefs fall from her tongue.

I have heard her with sweetness unfold
How that pity was due to—a dove:
That it ever attended the bold;
And she call'd it the sister of love.
But her words such a pleasure convey,
So much I her accents adore,
Let her speak, and whatever she say,
Methinks I should love her the more.

Can a bosom so gentle remain
Unmov'd, when her Corydon sighs!
Will a nymph that is fond of the plain,
These plains and this valley despise?
Dear regions of silence and shade!
Soft scenes of contentment and ease!
Where I could have pleasingly stray'd,
If aught in her absence could please.

But where does my Phyllida stray?
And where are her grots and her bowers?
Are the groves and the vallies as gay,
And the shepherds as gentle as ours?
The groves may perhaps be as fair,
And the face of the vallies as fine;
The swains may in manners compare,
But their love is not equal to mine.

III. SOLICITUDE.

Why will you my passion reprove?
Why term it a folly to grieve?
Ere I show you the charms of my love,
She is fairer than you can believe.
With her mien she enamours the brave;
With her wit she engages the free;
With her modesty pleases the grave;
She is every way pleasing to me.

O you that have been of her train,
Come and join in my amorous lays;
I could lay down my life for the swain,
That will sing but a song in her praise.
When he sings, may the nymphs of the town
Come trooping, and listen the while;
Nay, on him let not Phyllida frown;
—But I cannot allow her to smile.

For when Paridel tries in the dance
Any favour with Phyllis to find,
O how, with one trivial glance,
Might she ruin the peace of my mind!
In ringlets he dresses his hair,
And his crook is bestudded around;
And his pipe—oh my Phyllis beware
Of a magic there is in the sound.

'Tis his with mock passion to glow
'Tis his in smooth tales to unfold,
“How her face is as bright as the snow,
And her bosom, be sure, is as cold.
How the nightingales labour the strain,
With the notes of his charmer to vie;
How they vary their accents in vain,
Repine at her triumphs, and die.”

To the grove or the garden he strays,
And pillages every sweet;
Then suiting the wreath to his lays,
He throws it at Phyllis's feet.
“O Phyllis, he whispers, more fair,
More sweet than the jessamine's flower!
What are pinks in a morn, to compare?
What is eglantine after a shower?”

Then the lily no longer is white;
Then the rose is depriv'd of its bloom;
Then the violets die with despight,
And the woodbines give up their perfume:
Thus glide the soft numbers along,
And he fancies no shepherd his peer;
—Yet I never should envy the song,
Were not Phyllis to lend it an ear.

Let his crook be with hyacinths bound,
So Phyllis the trophy despise:
Let his forehead with laurels be crown'd,
So they shine not in Phyllis's eyes.
The language that flows from the heart,
Is a stranger to Paridel's tongue;
—Yet may she beware of his art,
Or sure I must envy the song.

IV. DISAPPOINTMENT.

Ye shepherds, give ear to my lay,
And take no more heed of my sheep:
They have nothing to do but to stray;
I have nothing to do but to weep.
Yet do not my folly reprove;
She was fair—and my passion begun;
She smil'd—and I could not but love;
She is faithless—and I am undone.

Perhaps I was void of all thought:
Perhaps it was plain to foresee,
That a nymph so complete would be fought
By a swain more engaging than me.
Ah! love every hope can inspire;
It banishes wisdom the while;
And the lip of the nymph we admire
Seems for ever adorn'd with a smile.

R r iij

She is faithless, and I am undone ;
 Yet that witness the woes I endure ;
 Let reason instruct you to shun
 What it cannot instruct you to cure.
 Beware how you loiter in vain
 Amid nymphs of an higher degree :
 It is not for me to explain
 How fair, and how fickle, they be.
 Alas ! from the day that we met,
 What hope of an end to my woes ?
 When I cannot endure to forget
 The glance that undid my repose.
 Yet time may diminish the pain :
 The flower, and the shrub, and the tree,
 Which I rear'd for her pleasure in vain,
 In time may have comfort for me.

The sweets of a dew-sprinkled rose,
 The sound of a murmuring stream,
 The peace which from solitude flows,
 Henceforth shall be Corydon's theme.
 High transports are shown to the sight,
 But we are not to find them our own ;
 Fate never bestow'd such delight,
 As I with my Phyllis had known.
 O ye woods, spread your branches apace ;
 To your deepest recesses I fly ;
 I would hide with the beasts of the chase ;
 I would vanish from every eye.
 Yet my reed shall resound through the grove
 With the same sad complaint it begun ;
 How she smil'd, and I could not but love ;
 Was faithless, and I am undone !

LEVITIES; OR PIECES OF HUMOUR.

* ON MISS M——S'S DANCING, 1743.

Of all that gives politeness birth,
 Of all that claims to please,
 In motion, manners, or in mirth,
 The surest source is ease.

With silent step, and graceful air,
 See gentle Sylvia move ;
 Whilst heedless gazers, unaware,
 Relinquish their soul to love.

Accomplish'd maid ! my trivial rhyme
 Must do thy graces wrong ;
 Who dost not only dance in time,
 But steal, like time, along.

* IMPROMPTU TO MISS UTRECIA SMITH, ON HER NOT DANCING, 1743.

Whilst round in wild rotations hurl'd,
 These glittering forms I view,
 Methinks the busy restless world
 Is pictur'd in a few.

So may the busy world advance,
 Since thus the fates decree :
 It still may have its busy dance,
 Whilst I retire with thee.

FLIRT AND PHILL ;

A DECISION FOR THE LADIES.

A WIT, by learning well refin'd,
 A beau, but of the rural kind,
 To Sylvia made pretences ;
 They both profess'd an equal love ;
 Yet hop'd by different means to move
 Her judgment or her senses.

Young sprightly Flirt, of blooming mien,
 Watch'd the best minutes to be seen ;
 Went—when his glass advis'd him :
 While meagre Phill of books inquir'd ;
 A wight, for wit and parts admir'd ;
 And witty ladies priz'd him.

* Not printed in any former edition of his works.

Sylvia had wit, had spirits too ;
 To hear the one, the other view,
 Suspended held the scales :
 Her wit, her youth too, claim'd its share,
 Let none the preference declare,
 But turn up—heads or tails.

STANZAS TO THE MEMORY OF AN AGREEABLE LADY,

BURIED IN MARRIAGE TO A PERSON UNDESERVING HER.

'Twas always held, and ever will,
 By sage mankind, discreeter,
 T' anticipate a lesser ill,
 Than undergo a greater.

When mortals dread diseases, pain,
 And languishing conditions ;
 Who don't the lesser ills sustain
 Of physic and—physicians ?

Rather than lose his whole estate,
 He that but little wife is,
 Full gladly pays four parts in eight
 To taxes and excises.

Our merchants Spain has near undone
 For lost ships not requitting :
 This bears our noble king, to shun
 The loss of blood—in fighting !

With numerous ills, in single life,
 The bachelor's attended :
 Such to avoid, he takes a wife—
 And much the case is mended !

Poor Gratia in her twentieth year,
 Foreseeing future woe,
 Chose to attend a monkey here,
 Before an ape below.

COLEMIRA ; A CULINARY ECLOGUE.

" Nec tantum Veneris, quantum studiosa culinæ."

NIGHT's sable clouds had half the globe o'erspread,
 And silence reign'd, and folks were gone to bed :
 When love, which gentle sleep can ne'er inspire,
 Had seated Damon by the kitchen fire.

Pensive he lay, extended on the ground;
The little lares kept their vigils round;
The fawning cats compassionate his case,
And pur around, and gently lick his face:

To all his complaints the sleeping curs reply,
And with hoarse snorings imitate a sigh.
Such gloomy scenes with lovers' minds agree,
And solitude to them is best society.

Could I (he cry'd) express, how bright a grace
Adorns thy morning hands, and well-wash'd face;
Thou wouldst, Colemira, grant what I implore,
And yield me love, or wash thy face no more.

Ah! who can see, and seeing not admire,
When'er she sets the pot upon the fire!
Her hands outshine the fire, and redder things;
Her eyes are blacker than the pots she brings.

But sure no chamber-damsel can compare,
When in meridian lustre shines my fair,
When warm'd with dinner's toil in pearly rills,
Adown her goodly cheek the sweat distills.

Oh! how I long, how ardently desire,
To view those rosy fingers strike the lyre!
For late, when bees to change their climes began,
How did I see them thrum the frying-pan!

With her! I should not envy George his queen,
Though she in royal grandeur deck'd be seen:
Whilst rags, just sever'd from my fair one's gown,
In russet pomp and greasy pride hang down.

Ah! now it does my drooping heart rejoice,
When in the hall I hear thy mellow voice!
How would that voice exceed the village bell;
Would that but sing, "I like thee passing well!"

When from the hearth she bade the pointers go,
How soft! how easy did her accents flow!
"Get out, she cry'd, when strangers come to sup,
"One ne'er can raise those snoring devils up."

Then, full of wrath, she kick'd each lazy brute,
Alas! I envy'd even that salute;
'Twas sure misplac'd—Shock said, or seem'd to say,
He had as lief, I had the kick, as they.

If she the mystic bellows take in hand,
Who like the fair can that machine command?
O may'st thou ne'er by Eolus be seen,
For he would sure demand thee for his queen.

But should the flame this rougher aid refuse,
And only gentler med'cines be of use; [strife,
With full-blown cheeks she ends the doubtful
Foments the infant flame, and puffs it into life.

Such arts as these exalt the drooping fire,
But in my breast a fiercer flame inspire:
I burn! I burn! O! give thy puffing o'er;
And swell thy cheeks, and pout thy lips, no more!

With all her haughty looks the time I've seen,
When this proud damsel has more humble been,
When with nice airs she hoist the pan-cake round,
And dropp'd it, hapless fair! upon the ground.

Look, with what charming grace! what winning tricks!
The artful charmer rubs the candlesticks!
So bright she makes the candlesticks she handles,
Oft I have said—there were no need of candles.

But thou my fair! who never wouldst approve,
Or hear the tender story of my love;
Or mind, how burns my raging breast—a button—
Perhaps art dreaming of—a breast of mutton.

Thus said, and wept the sad desponding swain,
Revealing to the fable walls his pain:
But nymphs are free with those they should deny;
To those, they love, more exquisitely coy!

Now chirping crickets raise their tinkling
voice,
The lambent flames in languid streams arise,
And smoke in azure folds evaporate and dies.

THE RAPE OF THE TRAP.

A BALLAD, 1737.

'Twas in a land of learning,
The muses favourite city,
Such pranks of late
Were play'd by a rat,
As—tempt one to be witty.

All in a college study,
Where books were in great plenty;
This rat would devour
More sense in an hour,
Than I cou'd write—in twenty.

Corporeal food, 'tis granted,
Serves vermin less refin'd, Sir;
But this, a rat of taste,
All other rats surpass'd;
And he prey'd on the food of the mind, Sir

His breakfast, half the morning,
He constantly attended;
And when the bell rung
For evening song,
His dinner scarce was ended!

He spar'd not ev'n heroics,
On which we poets pride us;
And would make no more
Of king Arthur's *, by the score
Than all the world beside does.

In books of geo-graphy,
He made the maps to flutter:
A river or a sea
Was to him a dish of tea:
And a kingdom, bread and butter.

But if some mawkish potion
Might chance to over-dose him,
To check its rage,
He took a page
Of logic—to compose him—

A trap in haste and anger,
Was bought, you need not doubt on't;
And, such was the gin,
Where a lion once got in,
He could not, I think, get out on't.

With cheese, not books, 'twas baited,
The fact I'll not belye it—
Since none—I'll tell you that—
Whether scholar or rat
Mind books, when he has other diet:

* By Blackmore.

But more of trap and bait, Sir,
 Why should I sing, or either?
 Since the rat, who knew the flight,
 Came in the dead of night,
 And dragg'd them away together:
 Both trap and bait were vanish'd,
 Through a fracture in the flooring;
 Which, though so trim
 It now may seem,
 Had then—a dozen or more in.

Then answer this, ye sages!
 Nor deem a man to wrong ye,
 Had the rat which thus did seize on
 The trap, less claim to reason,
 Than many a skull among ye?

Dan Prior's mice, I own it,
 Were vermin of condition;
 But this rat who merely learn'd
 What rats alone concern'd,
 Was the greater politician.

That England's topsy-turvy,
 Is clear from these mishaps, Sir;
 Since traps we may determine,
 Will no longer take our vermin,
 But vermin * take our traps, Sir.

Let fops, by rats infested,
 Then trust in cats to catch 'em;
 Lest they grow as learn'd as we,
 In our studies; where, d' ye see,
 No mortal sits to watch 'em.

Good luck betide our captains;
 Good luck betide our cats, Sir;
 And grant that the one
 May quell the Spanish Don,
 And the other destroy our rats, Sir.

ON CERTAIN PASTORALS.

So rude and tuneless are thy lays,
 The weary audience vow,
 'Tis not th' Arcadian swain that sings,
 But 'tis his herds that low.

ON MR. C——. OF KIDDERMINSTER'S POETRY.

Thy verses, friend, are Kidderminster † stuff,
 And I must own you've measur'd out enough.

TO THE VIRTUOSOS.

HAIL, curious wights! to whom so fair
 The form of mortal flies is!
 Who deem those grubs beyond compare,
 Which common sense despises.

Whether o'er hill, morass, or mound,
 You make your sportsman fallies;
 Or that your prey in gardens found
 Is urg'd through walks and alleys.

Yet, in the fury of the chase,
 No slope could e'er retard you;

* Written at the time of the Spanish depredations.

† Famous for a coarse woollen manufacture.

Blest if one fly repay the race,
 Or painted wings reward you.

Fierce as Camilla o'er the plain
 Pursued the glittering stranger;
 Still ey'd the purple's pleasing stain,
 And knew not fear nor danger.

'Tis you dispense the favourite meat
 To nature's filmy people;
 Know what conserves they choose to eat,
 And what liqueurs to tipple.

And if her brood of insects dies,
 You sage assistance lend her;
 Can sloop to pimp for amorous flies,
 And help them to engender.

'Tis you protect their pregnant hour;
 And when the birth's at hand,
 Exerting your obstetric power,
 Prevent a mothless land.

Yet oh! howe'er your towering view
 Above gross objects rises,
 Whate'er refinements you pursue,
 Hear, what a friend advises:

A friend, who, weigh'd with yours, must prize
 Domitian's idle passion;
 That wrought the death of teasing flies,
 But ne'er their propagation.

Let Flavia's eyes more deeply warm,
 Nor thus your hearts determine,
 To slight dame nature's fairest form
 And sigh for nature's vermin.

And speak with some respect of beaux,
 Nor more as triflers treat 'em:
 'Tis better learn to save one's clothes,
 Than cherish moths, that eat 'em.

THE EXTENT OF COOKERY.

“ Aliusque et idem.”

WHEN Tom to Cambridge first was sent,
 A plain brown bob he wore;
 Read much, and look'd as though he meant
 To be a fop no more.

See him to Lincoln's Inn repair,
 His resolution flag;
 He cherishes a length of hair,
 And tucks it in a bag.

Nor Coke nor Salkeld he regards,
 But gets into the house,
 And soon a judge's rank rewards
 His pliant votes and bows.

Adieu, ye bobs! ye bags, give place!
 Full bottoms come instead!
 Good Lord! to see the various ways
 Of dressing—a calf's head?

THE PROGRESS OF ADVICE.

A COMMON CASE.

“ Suade, nam certum est.”

SAYS Richard to Thomas (and seem'd half afraid)
 “ I am thinking to marry thy mistress's maid;

Now, because Mrs. Lucy to thee is well known,
I will do't if thou bidst me, or let it alone.

Nay don't make a jest on't; 'tis no jest to me;
For 'faith I'm in earnest, so pr'ythee be free,
I have no fault to find with the girl since I knew her,

But I'd have thy advice, ere I tie myself to her."

Said Thomas to Richard, "To speak my opinion,
There is not such a bitch in King George's dominion,

And I firmly believe, if thou knew'st her as I do,
Thou would choose out a whipping-post, first to be ty'd to.

She's peevish, she's thievish, she's ugly, she's old,
And a liar, and a fool, and a slut, and a scold."

Next day Richard hasten'd to church and was wed,
And ere night had inform'd her what Thomas had said.

A BALLAD.

"Trahit sua quemque voluptas."

FROM Lincoln to London rode forth our young squire, [admire;
To bring down a wife whom the swains might
But, in spite of whatever the mortal could say,
The goddesses objected the length of the way!

To give up the opera, the park, and the ball,
For to view the stag's horns in an old country-
hall;

To have neither China nor India to see!
Nor a laceman to plague in a morning—not she!

To forsake the dear play-house, Quin, Garrick,
and Clive,

Who by dint of mere humour had kept her alive;
To forego the full box for his lonesome abode,
O heavens! she should faint she would die on the road;

To forego the gay fashions and gestures of France,
And leave dear Auguste in the midst of the dance,
And Harlequin too!—'twas in vain to require it;
And she wonder'd how folks had the face to defire it.

She might yield to resign the sweet fingers of Ruckholt,

Where the citizen-matron seduces her cuckold;
But Ranelagh soon would her footsteps recal,
And the music, the lamps, and the glare of Vaux-
hall.

To be sure she could breathe no where else but in town, [clown;

Thus she talk'd like a wit, and he look'd like a
But the while honest Harry despair'd to succeed,
A coach with a coronet trail'd her to Tweed

SLENDER'S GHOST. Vide Shakspeare.

BENEATH a church-yard yew,
Decay'd and worn with age,
At dusk of eve me thought I spy'd
Poor Slender's ghost that whimpering cried,
O sweet, O sweet Anne Page!

Ye gentle bards! give ear!

Who talk of amorous rage,
Who spoil the lily, rob the rose,
Come learn of me to weep your woes:
O sweet, O sweet Anne Page!

Why should such labour'd strains
Your formal muse engage?
I never dream'd of flame or dart,
That fir'd my breast or pierc'd my heart,
But sigh'd, O sweet Anne Page!

And you! whose love-sick minds
No med'cine can assuage!
Accuse the leech's art no more,
But learn of Slender to deplore;
O sweet, O sweet Anne Page!

And ye whose souls are held,
Like linnets in a cage!
Who talk of fetters, links, and chains,
Attend and imitate my strains?
O sweet, O sweet Anne Page!

And you who boast or grieve,
What horrid wars we wage!
Of wounds receiv'd from many an eye;
Yet mean as I do, when I sigh,
O sweet, O sweet Anne Page!

Hence every fond conceit
Of shepherd or of sage;
'Tis Slender's voice, 'tis Slender's way
Expresses all you have to say,
O sweet, O sweet Anne Page!

THE INVIDIOUS.

MART.

O FORTUNE! if my prayer of old
Was ne'er solicitous for gold,
With better grace thou may'st allow
My suppliant wish, that asks it now.
Yet think not, goddesses! I require it
For the same end your clowns desire it.
In a well-made effectual string,
Fain would I see Lividio swing!
Hear him, from Tyburn's height haranguing,
But such a cur's not worth one's hanging.
Give me, O goddesses! store of pelf,
And he will tie the knot himself.

THE PRICE OF AN EQUIPAGE.

"Servum si potes, Ole, non habere,
"Et regem potes, Ole, non habere." MART.

I ASK'D a friend amidst the throng,
Whose coach it was that trail'd along:
"The gilded coach there—dost ye mind?
That with the footmen stuck behind?"
O Sir! says he, what! han't you seen it?
'Tis Damon's coach, and Damon in it.
'Tis odd, methinks, you have forgot
Your friend, your neighbour, and—what not!
Your old acquaintance Damon!—"True;
But faith his equipage is new."

"Bless me, said I, where can it end;
What madness has possess'd my friend?
Four powder'd slaves, and those the tallest,
Their stomachs doubtless not the smallest!

Can Damon's revenue maintain
In lace and food, so large a train?
I know his land—each inch of ground—
'Tis not a mile to walk it round—
If Damon's whole estate can bear
To keep his lad and one-horse chair,
I own 'tis past my comprehension."
Yes, Sir, but Damon has a pension—
Thus does false ambition rule us,
Thus pomp delude and folly fool us;
To keep a race of flickering knaves,
He grows himself the worst of slaves.

HINT FROM VOITURE.

LET Sol his annual journeys run,
And when the radiant task is done,
Confess, through all the globe, 'twould pose him,
To match the charms that Celia shows him.

And should he boast he once had seen
As just a form, as bright a mien,
Yet must it still for ever pose him,
To match—what Celia never shows him.

INSCRIPTION,

TO THE MEMORY OF A. L. ESQUIRE,

To the memory
Of A. L. Esquire,
Justice of the peace for this county;
Who in the whole course of his pilgrimage
Through a trifling ridiculous world,
Maintaining his proper dignity,
Notwithstanding the scoffs of ill-disposed persons,
And wits of the age,
That ridiculed his behaviour;
Or censured his breeding;
Following the dictates of nature,
Desiring to ease the afflicted,
Eager to set the prisoners at liberty,
Without having for his end
The noise, or report such things generally cause in the world,
(As he was seen to perform them of none)
But the sole relief and happiness
Of the party in distress;
Himself resting easy,
When he could render that so;
Not griping or pinching himself,
To hoard up superfluities;
Not coveting to keep in his possession
What gives more disquietude, than pleasure;
But charitably diffusing it
To all round about him:
Making the most sorrowful countenance
To smile
In his presence;
Always bestowing more than he was asked,
Always imparting before he was desired;
Not proceeding in this manner
Upon every trivial suggestion,
But the most mature and solemn deliberation;
With an incredible presence and undauntedness
of mind;
With an inimitable gravity and economy
of face;
Bidding loud defiance
To politeness and the fashion,
Dared let a f—t.

TO A FRIEND.

HAVE you ne'er seen, my gentle squire,
The humours of your kitchen fire?

Says Ned to Sal, "I lead a spade,
Why don't ye play?—the girls afraid—
Play something—any thing—but play—
'Tis but to pass the time away—
Phoo—how she stands—biting her nails—
As though she play'd for half her vails—
Sorting her cards, hagling and picking—
We play for nothing, do us, chicken?—
That card will do—blood never doubt it,
It's not worth while to think about it."

Sal thought, and thought, and miss'd her aim,
And Ned ne'er studying, won the game.

Methinks, old friend, 'tis wondrous true,
That verse is but a game at loo.
While many a bard, that shows so clearly
He writes for his amusement merely,
Is known to study, fret, and toil;
And play for nothing all the while:
Or praise at most; for wreaths of yore
Ne'er signify'd a farthing more:
Till having vainly toil'd to gain it,
He sees your flying pen obtain it.

Through fragrant scenes the trifter roves,
And hallow'd haunts that Phœbus loves:
Where with strange heats his bosom glows,
And mystic flames the God bestows.
You now none other flame require,
Than a good blazing parlour fire;
Write verses—to defy the scorers,
In shit-houses and chimney-corners.

Sal found her deep-laid schemes were vain—
The cards are cut—come deal again—
No good comes on it when one lingers—
I'll play the cards come next my fingers—
Fortune could never let Ned loo her,
When she had left it wholly to her.

Well now, who wins? why still the same—
For Sal has lost another game.

"I've done; (she mutter'd) I was saying,
It did not arguify my playing.
Some folks will win, they cannot choose,
But think or not think—some must lose.
I may have won a game or so—
But then it was an age ago—
It ne'er will be my lot again—
I won it of a babby then—
Give me an ace of trumps and see,
Our Ned will beat me with a three.
'Tis all by luck that things are carry'd—
He'll suffer for it, when he's marry'd."

Thus Sal with tears in either eye;
While victor Ned sat tittering by.

Thus I, long envying your success,
And bent to write and study less,
Sate down, and scribbled in a trice,
Just what you see—and you despise.

You, who can frame a tuneful song,
And hum it as you ride along;

And trotting on the king's high-way,
Snatch from the hedge a sprig of bay;
Accept this verse howe'er it flows,
From one that is your friend in prose.

What is this wreath, so green! so fair!
Which many wish, and few must wear?
Which some men's indolence can gain,
And some men's vigils ne'er obtain?
For what must Sal or poet sue,
Ere they engage with Ned or you?
For luck in verse, for luck at loo?

Ah no! 'tis genius gives you fame,
And Ned, through skill, secures the game.

THE POET AND THE DUN. 1741.

"These are messengers

"That feelingly persuade me what I am." Shakesf.

Come, a dun in the morning and raps at my door— [more—

"I made bold to call—'tis a twelvemonth and I'm sorry, believe me, to trouble you thus, Sir,—But Job would be paid, Sir, had Job been a mercer."

[ways." My friend have but patience—"Ay these are your I have got but one shilling to serve me two days—But Sir—pr'ythee take it, and tell your attorney, If I han't paid your bill, I have paid for your journey.

Well, now thou art gone, let me govern my passion,

And calmly consider,—consider, vexation!

What whore that must paint, and must put on false locks,

And counterfeit joy in the pangs of the pox!

What beggar's wife's nephew, now starv'd, and now beaten,

Who, wanting to eat, fears himself shall be eaten! What porter, what turnspite, can deem his case hard! [bard!

Or what dun boast of patience that thinks of a Well, I'll leave this poor trade, for no trade can be poorer,

Turn shoe-boy, or courtier, or pimp, or procurer; Get love, and respect, and good living, and pelf, And dun some poor dog of a poet myself.

One's credit, however, of course will grow better; Here enters the footman, and brings me a letter.

"Dear Sir! I received your obliging epistle, Your fame is secur'd—bid the critics go whistle. I read over with wonder the poem you sent me; And I must speak your praises, no soul shall prevent me.

The audience, believe me, cry'd out every line Was strong, was affecting, was just, was divine; All pregnant, as gold is, with worth, weight, and beauty,

And to hide such a genius was—far from your duty. I foresee that the court will be hugely delighted: Sir Richard, for much a less genius, was knighted. Adieu, my good friend, and for high life prepare ye; [ye."

I could say much more, but you're modest, I spare Quite fir'd with the flattery, I call for my paper, And waste that, and health, and my time, and my tap er:

I scribble till morn, when, with wrath no small store,
Comes my old friend the mercer, and raps at my door.

"Ah! friend, 'tis but idle to make such a pother, Fate, fate has ordain'd us to plague one another."

WRITTEN AT AN INN AT HENLEY.

To thee, fair freedom! I retire
From flattery, cards, and dice, and din;
Nor art thou found in mansions higher
Than the low cott, or humble inn.

'Tis here with boundless power I reign;
And every health which I begin,
Converts dull port to bright champaigne;
Such freedom crowns it, at an inn.

I fly from pomp, I fly from plate!
I fly from falsehood's specious grin;
Freedom I love, and form I hate,
And choose my lodgings at an inn.

Here, waiter! take my fordid ore,
Which lacqueys else might hope to win;
It buys, what courts have not in store;
It buys me freedom at an inn.

Whoe'er has travell'd life'd dull round,
Where'er his stages may have been,
May sigh to think he still has found
The warmest welcome at an inn.

A SIMILE.

WHAT village has but sometime seen,
The clumsy shape, the frightful mien,
Tremendous claws, and shagged hair,
Of that grim brute yclept a bear?
He from his dam, the learn'd agree,
Receiv'd the curious form you see;
Who, with her plastic tongue alone,
Produc'd a visage—like her own—
And thus they hint, in mystic fashion,
The powerful force of education*—
Perhaps yon crowd of swains is viewing
E'en now, the strange exploits of Bruin;
Who plays his antics, roars aloud;
The wonder of a gaping crowd!

So have I known an awkward lad,
Whose birth has made a parish glad,
Forbid, for fear of sense, to roam,
And taught by kind mamma at home;
Who gives him many a well-try'd rule,
With ways and means—to play the fool.
In sense the same, in stature higher,
He shines, ere long, a rural squire,
Pours forth unwitty jokes, and swears,
And bawls, and drinks, but chiefly stares:
His tenants of superior sense
Carouze, and laugh, at his expence;
And deem the pastime I'm relating,
To be as pleasant, as bear-baiting.

THE CHARMS OF PRECEDENCE.

A TALE.

"Sir, will you please to walk before?"
—No, pray Sir—you are next the door.

* Of a fond matron's education.

—“ Upon mine honour, I'll not stir—”
 Sir, I'm at home, consider, Sir,—
 “ Excuse me, Sir, I'll not go first.”
 Well, if I must be rude, I must—
 But yet I wish I could evade it—
 'Tis strangely clownish, be persuaded—
 Go forward, cits! go forward, squires!
 Nor scruple each, what each admires.
 Life squares not, friends, with your proceeding;
 It flies, while you display your breeding;
 Such breeding as one's granam preaches,
 Or some old dancing-master teaches.
 O for some rude tumultuous fellow,
 Half crazy, or, at least, half mellow,
 To come behind you unawares,
 And fairly push you both down stairs!
 But death's at hand—let me advise ye,
 Go forward, friends! or he'll surprise ye.

Besides, how insincere you are!
 Do ye not flatter, lie, forswear,
 And daily cheat, and weekly pray,
 And all for this—to lead the way?

Such is my theme, which means to prove,
 That though we drink, or game, or love,
 As that or this is most in fashion,
 Precedence is our ruling passion.

When college-students take degrees,
 And pay the beadle's endless fees,
 What moves that scientific body,
 But the first cutting at a gawdy?
 And whence such shoals, in bare conditions,
 That starve and languish as physicians,
 Content to trudge the streets, and stare at
 The fat apothecary's chariot?
 But that, in Charlot's chamber (see Moliere's “ Medecin malgre lui ”)
 The leach, howe'er his fortunes vary,
 Still walks before th' apothecary.

Flavia in vain has wit and charms,
 And all that shines, and all that warms;
 In vain all human race adore her,
 For—Lady Mary ranks before her.

O Celia, gentle Celia! tell us,
 You who are neither vain nor jealous!
 The softest breast, the mildest mien!
 Would you not feel some little spleen,
 Nor bite your lip nor furl your brow,
 If Florimel, your equal now,
 Should, one day, gain precedence of ye?
 First serv'd—though in a dish of coffee?
 Plac'd first, although, when you are found,
 You gain the eyes of all around?
 Nam'd first, though not with half the fame,
 That waits my charming Celia's name?

Hard fortune! barely to inspire
 Our fix'd esteem, and fond desire!
 Barely, where'er you go, to prove
 The source of universal love!
 Yet be content, observing this,
 Honour's the offspring of caprice:
 And worth, howe'er you have pursued it,
 Has now no power—but to exclude it.
 You'll find your general reputation
 A kind of supplemental station.

Poor Swift, with all his worth, could ne'er,
 He tells us, hope to rise a peer;
 So, to supply it, wrote for fame:
 And well the wit secur'd his aim.

A common patriot has a drift,
 Not quite so innocent as Swift:
 In Britain's cause he rants, he labours;
 “ He's honest, faith”—have patience, neighbours,

 For patriots may sometimes deceive,
 May beg their friends' reluctant leave,
 To serve them in a higher sphere;
 And drop their virtue, to get there.—

As Lucian tells us, in his fashion
 How souls put off each earthly passion,
 Ere on Elysiu's flowery strand
 Old Charon suffer'd them to land;
 So ere we meet a court's caresses,
 No doubt our souls must change their dresses:
 And souls there be, who, bound that way,
 Attire themselves ten times a day.

If then 'tis rank which all men covet,
 And saints alike and sinners love it;
 If place, for which our courtiers throng
 So thick, that few can get along;
 For which such servile toils are seen,
 Who's happier than a king!—a queen.

Howe'er men aim at elevation,
 'Tis properly a female passion:
 Women, and beaux, beyond all measure
 Are charm'd with rank's ecstatic pleasure.

Sir, if your drift I rightly scan,
 You'd hint a beau was not a man:
 Say, women then are fond of places;
 I wave all disputable cases.
 A man perhaps would something linger,
 Were his lov'd rank to cost—a finger;
 Or were an ear or toe the price on't,
 He might deliberate once or twice on't;
 Perhaps ask Gataker's advice on't,
 And many, as their frame grows old,
 Would hardly purchase it with gold.

But women wish precedence ever;
 'Tis their whole life's supreme endeavour;
 It fires their youth with jealous rage,
 And strongly animates their age.
 Perhaps they would not sell out-right,
 Or main a limb—that was in fight;
 Yet on worse terms they sometimes choose it;
 Nor ev'n in punishments refuse it.

Pre-eminence in pain, you cry!
 All fierce and pregnant with reply.
 But lend your patience, and your ear,
 An argument shall make it clear.
 But hold, an argument may fail,
 Beside my title says, a tale.
 Where Avon rolls her winding stream,
 Avon, the muses' favourite theme!
 Avon, that fills the farmers' purses,
 And decks with flowers both farms and verses,
 She visits many a fertile vale—
 Such was the scene of this my tale.
 For 'tis in Evesham's vale, or near it,
 That folks with laughter tell and hear it.
 The soil with annual plenty blest
 Was by young Corydon possess'd.
 His youth alone I lay before ye,
 As most material to my story:
 For strength and vigour too, he had them,
 And 'twere not much amiss, to add them.

Thrice happy lot! whose wide domain
 Now green with grass, now gilt with grain,

In russet robes of clover deep,
Or thinly veil'd, and white with sheep;
Now fragrant with the bean's perfume,
Now purpled with the pulse's bloom,
Might well with bright allusion store me;
—But happier bards have been before me!
Amongst the various year's increase,
The stripping own'd a field of pease;
Which, when at night he ceas'd his labours,
Were haunted by some female neighbours.
Each morn discover'd to his sight,
The shameful havock of the night:
Traces of this they left behind them,
But no instructions where to find them.
The devil's works are plain and evil,
But few or none have seen the devil.
Old Noll, indeed, if we may credit
The words of Echard, who has said it,
Contriv'd with Satan how to fool us;
And bargain'd face to face to rule us;
But then old Noll was one in ten,
And fought him more than other men.
Our shepherd too, with like attention,
May meet the female fiends we mention.
He rose one morn at break of day,
And near the field in ambush lay:
When lo, a brace of girls appears,
The third, a matron much in years.
Smiling, amidst the pease, the sinners
Sate down to cull their future dinners;
And, caring little who might own them,
Made free as though themselves had sown them.

'Tis worth a sage's observation
How love can make a jest of passion.
Anger had forc'd the swain from bed,
His early dues to love unpaid!
And love, a god that keeps a pother,
And will be paid one time or other,
Now banish'd anger out of door;
And claim'd the debt withheld before.
If anger bid our youth revile,
Love form'd his features to a smile:
And knowing well 'twas all grimace.
To threaten with a smiling face,
He in few words express'd his mind—
And none would deem them much unkind.

The amorous youth, for their offence,
Demanded instant recompence:
That recompence from each, which shame
Forbids a bashful muse to name.
Yet, more this sentence to discover,
'Twas what Bet  grants her lover,
When he, to make the strumpet willing,
Has spent his fortune—to a shilling.
Each stood a while, as 'twere suspended,
And loth to do, what—each intended.

At length, with soft pathetic sighs,
The matron, bent with age, replies
'Tis vain to strive—justice, I know,
And our ill stars, will have it so—
But let my tears your wrath assuage,
And show some deference for age!
I from a distant village came,
Am old, God knows, and something lame;
And if we yield, as yield we must,
Dispatch my crazy body first.

Our shepherd, like the Phrygian swain,
When circled round on Ida's plain

With goddesses he stood suspended,
And Pallas's grave speech was ended,
Own'd what she ask'd might be his duty;
But paid the compliment to beauty.

O D E

To be performed by Dr. Brettie, and a Chorus of Hales-Owen Citizens.

The Instrumental Part, a Viol d' Amour.

AIR BY THE DOCTOR.

AWAKE! I say, awake good people!
And be for once alive and gay;
Come let's be merry; stir the tippie;
How can you sleep,
Whilst I do play? how can you sleep, &c.

CHORUS OF CITIZENS.

Pardon, O! pardon, great musician!
On drowsy souls some pity take!
For wondrous hard is our condition,
To drink thy beer,
Thy strains to hear;
To drink,
To hear,
And keep awake!

SOLO BY THE DOCTOR.

Hear but this strain—'twas made by Handel,
A wight of skill, and judgment deep!
Zoonsters they're gone—Sal, bring a candle—
No, here is one, and he's asleep.

DUETTE.

Dr.—How could they go Soft music.
Whilst I do play?
Sal.—How could they go! Warlike music.
How should they stay?

CUPID AND PLUTUS.

WHEN Celia, love's eternal foe,
To rich old Gomez first was marry'd;
And angry Cupid came to know,
His shafts had err'd, his bow miscarry'd;
He sigh'd, he wept, he hung his head,
On the cold ground, full sad, he laid him;
When Plutus, there by fortune led,
In this desponding plight survey'd him.

And sure, he cry'd, you'll own at last
Your boasted power by mine exceeded:
Say, wretched boy, now all is past,
How little she your efforts heeded.

If with success you would assail,
Gild, youngster, doubly gild your arrows:
Little the feather'd shafts avail, [sparrows,
Though wing'd from Mamma's doves and

What though each reed, each arrow grew,
Where Venus bath'd herself; depend on't,
'Twere more for use, for beauty too,
A diamond sparkled at the end on't.

Peace, Plutus, peace!—the boy reply'd;
Were not my arts by your's infested,
I could each other power deride,
And rule this circle, unmolested.

See yonder pair! no worldly views
 In Chloe's generous breast resided:
 Love bade her the spruce valet choose,
 And she by potent love was guided.
 For this! she quits her golden dreams,
 In her gilt coach no more she ranges:
 And her rich crimson, bright with gems,
 For cheeks impearl'd with tears, she changes.
 Though fordid Celia own'd your power,
 Think not so monstrous my disgrace is:
 You gain'd this nymph—that very hour
 I gain'd a score in different places.

EPILOGUE TO THE TRAGEDY OF CLEONE.

WELL, Ladies—so much for the tragic style—
 And now the custom is to make you smile.
 To make us smile!—methinks I hear you say—
 Why, who can help it, at so strange a play?
 The captain gone three years!—and then to blame
 The faultless conduct of his virtuous dame!
 My stars!—what gentle belle would think it treason,
 When thus provok'd, to give the brute some reason?
 Out of my house!—this night, forsooth depart?
 A modern wife had said—"With all my heart—
 But think not, haughty Sir, I'll go alone!
 Order your coach—conduct me safe to town—

Give me my jewels, wardrobe, and my maid—
 And pray take care my pin-money be paid."
 Such is the language of each modish fair;
 Yet memoirs, not of modern growth, declare
 The time has been when modesty and truth
 Were deem'd additions to the charms of youth:
 When women hid their necks, and veil'd their faces, [places,
 Nor romp'd, nor rak'd, nor star'd at public
 Nor took the airs of Amazons for graces:
 Then plain domestic virtues were the mode,
 And wives ne'er dreamt of happiness abroad;
 They lov'd their children, learnt no flaunting airs,
 But with the joys of wedlock mix'd the cares.
 Those times are past—yet sure they merit praise,
 For marriage triumph'd in those golden days:
 By chaste decorum they affection gain'd;
 By faith and fondness what they won, maintain'd.
 'Tis yours, ye fair, to bring those days again,
 And form anew the hearts of thoughtless men;
 Make beauty's lustre amiable as bright,
 And give the soul, as well as sense, delight;
 Reclaim from folly a fantastic age,
 That scorns the press, the pulpit, and the stage.
 Let truth and tenderness your breasts adorn,
 The marriage chain with transport shall be worn;
 Each blooming virgin rais'd into a bride
 Shall double all their joys, their cares divide;
 Alleviate grief, compose the jars of strife,
 And pour the balm that sweetens human life.

M O R A L P I E C E S.

THE JUDGMENT OF HERCULES.

WHILE blooming spring descends from genial
 skies,
 By whose mild influence instant wonders rise;
 From whose soft breath Elysian beauties flow;
 The sweets of Hagley, or the pride of Stowe;
 Will Lyttleton the rural landscape range,
 Leave noisy fame, and not regret the change?
 Pleas'd will he tread the garden's early scenes,
 And learn a moral from the rising greens?
 There, warm'd alike by Sol's enlivening power,
 The weed, aspiring, emulates the flower:
 The drooping flower, its fairer charms display'd,
 Invites, from grateful hands, their generous aid:
 Soon, if none check th' invasive foe's designs,
 The lively lustre of these scenes declines!
 'Tis thus the spring of youth, the morn of life,
 Rears in our minds the rival seeds of strife.
 Then passion riots, reason then contends;
 And, on the conquest, every bliss depends:
 Life from the nice decision takes its hue:
 And blest those judges who decide like you!
 On worth like theirs shall every bliss attend:
 The world their favourite, and the world their friend. [ray,
 There are, who, blind to thought's fatiguing
 As fortune gives examples, urge their way:

Nor virtues foes, though they her paths decline,
 And scarce her friends, though with her friends
 In her's or vice's casual road advance [they join,
 Thoughtless, the sinners or the saints of chance!
 Yet some more nobly scorn the vulgar voice;
 With judgment fix, with zeal pursue their choice,
 When ripen'd thought, when reason born to reign,
 Checks the wild tumults of the youthful vein;
 While passions lawless tides, at their command,
 Glide through more useful tracts, and bless the land.

Happiest of these is he whose matchless mind,
 By learning strengthen'd, and by taste refin'd,
 In virtue's cause essay'd its earliest powers;
 Chose virtue's paths, and strew'd her paths with flowers.

The first alarm'd, if freedom waves her wings:
 The fittest to adorn each art she brings:
 Lov'd, by that prince whom every virtue fires:
 Prais'd by that bard whom every muse inspires:
 Blest in the tuneful art, the social flame;
 In all that wins, in all that merits fame:

'Twas youth's perplexing stage his doubts in-spir'd,

When great Alcides to a grove retir'd.
 Through the lone windings of a devious glade,
 Resign'd to thought, with lingering steps he
 Blest with a mind to taste sincerer joys: [stray'd;
 Arm'd with a heart each false one to despise.

Dubious he stray'd, with wavering thoughts possest,
 Alternate passions struggling shar'd his breast;
 The various arts which human cares divide,
 In deep attention all his mind employ'd:
 Anxious, if fame an equal bliss secur'd;
 Or silent ease with softer charms allur'd.
 The sylvan choir, whose numbers sweetly flow'd,
 The fount that murmur'd, and the flowers that blow'd;

The silver flood that in meanders led
 His glittering streams along th' enliven'd mead;
 The soothing breeze, and all those beauties join'd,
 Which, whilst they please, effeminate the mind,
 In vain! while distant on a summit rais'd,
 Th' imperial towers of fame attractive blaz'd.

While thus he trac'd through fancy's puzzling
 maze

The separate sweets of pleasure and of praise;
 Sudden the wind a fragrant gale convey'd,
 And a new lustre gain'd upon the shade.
 At once, before his wondering eyes were seen
 Two female forms, of more than mortal mien.
 Various their charms; and in their dress and face,
 Each seem'd to vie with some peculiar grace.
 This, whose attire less clogg'd with art appear'd,
 The simple sweets of innocence endear'd.
 Her sprightly bloom, her quick sagacious eye,
 Show'd native merit, mix'd with modesty.
 Her air diffus'd a mild yet awful ray,
 Severely sweet and innocently gay.
 Such the chaste image of the martial maid,
 In artless folds of virgin white array'd!
 She let no borrow'd rose her cheeks adorn,
 Her blushing cheeks, that sham'd the purple morn.
 Her charms nor had, nor wanted artful foils,
 Or study'd gestures, or well-practis'd smiles.
 She scorn'd the toys which render beauty less;
 She prov'd th' engaging chastity of dress;
 And while she chose in native charms to shine,
 Ev'n thus she seem'd, nay more than seem'd, divine.

One modest emerald clasp'd the robe she wore,
 And, in her hand, th' imperial sword she bore.
 Sublime her height, majestic was her pace,
 And match'd the awful honours of her face.
 The shrubs, the flowers, that deck'd the verdant
 ground,
 Seem'd, where she trod, with rising lustre crown'd.
 Still her approach with stronger influence warm'd;
 She pleas'd, while distant; but, when near, she charm'd.

So strikes the gazer's eye, the silver gleam
 That glittering quivers o'er a distant stream:
 But from its banks we see new beauties rise,
 And, in its crystal bosom, trace the skies.

With other charms the rival vision glow'd;
 And from her dress her tinsel beauties flow'd.
 A flattering robe her pamper'd shape conceal'd,
 And seem'd to shade the charms it best reveal'd.
 Its form contriv'd her faulty size to grace;
 Its hue, to give fresh lustre to her face.
 Her plaited hair disguis'd with brilliants glar'd;
 Her cheeks the ruby's neighbouring lustre shar'd;
 The gaudy topaz lent its gay supplies,
 And every gem that strikes less curious eyes;
 Expos'd her breast with foreign sweets perfum'd;
 And, round her brow, a roseate garland bloom'd.

Soft smiling, blushing lips conceal'd her wiles;
 Yet, ah! the blushes artful as the smiles.
 Oft-gazing on her shade, th' enraptur'd fair
 Decreed the substance well deserv'd her care:
 Her thoughts, to other charms malignly blind,
 Center'd in that, and were to that confin'd:
 And if on others eyes a glance were thrown,
 'Twas but to watch the influence of her own.
 Much like her guardian, fair Cythera's queen,
 When for her warrior she refines her mien;
 Or when, to bless her Delian favourite's arms,
 The radiant fair invigorates her charms.
 Much like her pupil, Egypt's sportive dame,
 Her dress expressive, and her air the same,
 When her gay bark o'er silver Cydnos roll'd,
 And all th' emblazon'd streamers wav'd in gold,
 Such shone the vision; nor forbore to move
 The fond contagious airs of lawless love.

Each wanton eye deluding glances fir'd,
 And amorous dimples on each cheek conspir'd.
 Lifeless her gait, and slow, with seeming pain,
 She dragg'd her loitering limbs along the plain;
 Yet made some faint efforts, and first approach'd
 the swain.

So glaring draughts, with taudry lustre bright,
 Spring to the view, and rush upon the sight:
 More slowly charms a Raphael's chaster air,
 Waits the calm search, and pays the searcher's care.

Wrapp'd in a pleas'd suspense, the youth sur-
 vey'd

The various charms of each attractive maid:
 Alternate each he view'd, and each admir'd,
 And found, alternate, varying flames inspir'd.
 Quick o'er their forms his eyes with pleasure ran,
 When she, who first approach'd him, first began.

"Hither, dear boy, direct thy wandering eyes:
 'Tis here the lovely vale of pleasure lies.

Debate no more, to me thy life resign;
 Each sweet which nature can diffuse is mine;
 For me the nymph diversifies her power,
 Springs in a tree, or blossoms in a flower;
 To please my ear, she tunes the linnet's strains;
 To please my eye, with lilies paints the plains;
 To form my couch, in mossy beds she grows;
 To gratify my smell, perfumes the rose;
 Reveals the fair, the fertile scene you see,
 And swells the vegetable world, for me.

Let the gull'd fool the toils of war pursue,
 Where bleed the many to enrich the few:
 Where chance from courage claims the boasted prize:

Where, though she give, your country oft denies.
 Industrious thou shalt Cupid's wars maintain,
 And ever gently fight his soft campaign.

His darts alone shalt wield, his wounds endure,
 Yet only suffer, to enjoy the cure.

Yield but to me---a choir of nymphs shall rise,
 And fire thy breast, and bless thy ravish'd eyes.
 Their beauteous cheeks a fairer rose shall wear,
 A brighter lily on their necks appear;
 Where fondly thou thy favour'd head shalt rest,
 Soft as the down that swells the cygnet's nest!
 While Philomel in each soft voice complains,
 And gently lulls thee with mellifluous strains:
 Whilst, with each accent, sweetest odours flow;
 And spicy gums round every bosom glow.

Not the fam'd bird Arabian climes admire,
 Shall in such luxury of sweets expire.
 At sloth let war's victorious sons exclaim;
 In vain! for pleasure is my real name;
 Nor envy thou the head with bays o'ergrown;
 No, seek thou roses to adorn thy own:
 For well each opening scene, that claims my care,
 Suits and deserves the beauteous crown I wear.

Let others prune the vine; the genial bowl
 Shall crown thy table, and enlarge thy soul.
 Let vulgar hands explore the brilliant mine,
 So the gay produce glitter still on thine.
 Indulgent Bacchus loads his labouring tree,
 And, guarding, gives its clustering sweets to me.
 For my lov'd train, Apollo's piercing beam
 Darts through the passive glebe, and frames the gem.

See in my cause consenting gods employ'd,
 Nor slight those gods, their blessings unenjoy'd!
 For thee the poplar shall its amber drain;
 For thee, in clouded beauty, spring the cane;
 Some costly tribute every clime shall pay;
 Some charming treasure every wind convey;
 Each object round some pleasing scene shall yield;
 Art built thy dome, while nature decks thy field;
 Of Corinth's order shall the structure rise;
 The spiring turrets glitter through the skies;
 Thy costly robe shall glow with Tyrian rays;
 Thy vase shall sparkle, and thy car shall blaze;
 Yet thou, whatever pomp the sun display,
 Shalt own the amorous night exceeds the day.

When melting flutes, and sweetly-sounding lyres
 Wake the gay loves, and cite the young desires;
 Or, in th' Ionian dance, some favourite maid
 Improves the flame her sparkling eyes convey'd;
 Think, canst thou quit a glowing Delia's arms,
 To feed on virtue's visionary charms;
 Or slight the joys which wit and youth engage,
 For the faint honour of a frozen sage?
 To find dull envy ev'n that hope deface,
 And, where you toil'd for glory, reap disgrace?

O! think that beauty waits on thy decree,
 And thy lov'd loveliest charmer pleads with me.
 She, whose soft smile, or gentler glance to move,
 You vow'd the wild extremities of love;
 In whose endearments years, like moments, flew:
 For whose endearments millions seem'd too few;
 She, she implores; she bids thee seize the prime,
 And tread with her the flowery tract of time;
 Nor thus her lovely bloom of life bestow
 On some cold lover, or insulting foe.
 Think, if against that tongue thou canst rebel,
 Where love yet dwelt, and reason seem'd to dwell;
 What strong persuasion arms her softer sighs!
 What full conviction sparkles in her eyes!

See nature smiles, and birds salute the shade,
 Where breathing jasminese screens the sleeping maid:
 And such her charms, as to the vain may prove,
 Ambition seeks more humble joys than love!
 There busy toil shall ne'er invade thy reign,
 Nor sciences perplex thy labouring brain:
 Or none, but what with equal sweets invite;
 Nor other arts, but to prolong delight:
 Sometimes thy fancy prune her tender wing,
 To praise a pendant, or to grace a ring;
 To fix the dress that suits each varying mien;
 To show where best the clustering gems are seen;

To sigh soft strains along the vocal grove,
 And tell the charms, the sweet effects of love!
 Nor fear to find a coy disdainful muse;
 Nor think the sisters will their aid refuse.
 Cool grots, and tinkling rills, or silent shades,
 Soft scenes of leisure! suit th' harmonious maids;
 And all the wise, and all the grave decree
 Some of that sacred train ally'd to me.

But if more specious ease thy wishes claim,
 And thy breast glow with faint desire of fame,
 Some softer science shall thy thoughts amuse,
 And learning's name a solemn sound diffuse:
 To thee all nature's curious stores I'll bring,
 Explain the beauties of an insect's wing;
 The plant, which nature, less diffusely kind,
 Has to few climes with partial care confin'd:
 The shell she scatters with more careless air,
 And, in her frolics, seems supremely fair;
 The worth that dazzles in the tulip's stains,
 Or lurks beneath a pebble's various veins.

Sleep's downy god, averse to war's alarms,
 Shall o'er thy head diffuse his softest charms;
 Ere anxious thought thy dear repose assail,
 Or care, my most destructive foe, prevail.
 The watery nymphs shall tune the vocal vales,
 And gentle zephyrs harmonise their gales,
 For thy repose, inform, with rival joy,
 Their streams to murmur, and their winds to sigh.
 Thus shalt thou spend the sweetly-flowing day,
 Till lost in bliss thou breath'st thy soul away:
 Till she t' Elysian bowers of joy repair,
 Nor find my charming scenes exceeded there."

She ceas'd; and on a lily'd bank reclin'd,
 Her flowing robe wav'd wanton with the wind:
 One tender hand her drooping head sustains;
 One points, expressive, to the flowery plains.
 Soon the fond youth perceiv'd her influence roll,
 Deep in his breast, to melt his manly soul:
 As when Favonius joins the solar blaze,
 And each fair fabric of the frost decays.
 Soon, to his breast, the soft harangue convey'd
 Resolves too partial to the specious maid.
 He sigh'd, he gaz'd, so sweetly smil'd the dame;
 Yet, sighing, gazing, seem'd to scorn his flame,
 And, oft as virtue caught his wandering eye,
 A crimson blush condemn'd the rising sigh.
 'Twas such the lingering Trojan's shame betray'd,
 When Maia's son the frown of Jove display'd:
 When wealth, fame, empire, could no balance prove,

For the soft reign of Dido, and of love.
 Thus ill with arduous glory love conspires;
 Soft tender flames with bold impetuous fires!

Some hovering doubts his anxious bosom mov'd,
 And virtue, zealous fair! those doubts improv'd.

"Fly, fly, fond youth, the too indulgent maid,
 Nor err, by such fantastic scenes betray'd.
 Though in my path the rugged thorn be seen,
 And the dry turf disclose a fainter green;
 Though no gay rose or flowery product shine,
 The barren surface still conceals the mine.
 Each thorn that threatens, ev'n the weed that grows

In virtue's path, superior sweets bestows—
 Yet should those boasted specious toys allure,
 Whence could fond sloth the flattering gifts procure?

The various wealth that tempts thy fond desire,
'Tis I alone, her greatest foe, acquire.
I from old ocean rob the treasur'd store;
I through each region, latent gems explore;
'Twas I the rugged brilliant first reveal'd,
By numerous strata deep in earth conceal'd,
'Tis I the surface yet refine, and show
The modest gem's intrinsic charms to glow.
Nor swells the grape, nor spires its feeble tree
Without the firm supports of industry.

But grant we sloth the scene herself has drawn,
The mossy grotto, and the flowery lawn;
Let Philomela tune th' harmonious gale,
And with each breeze eternal sweets exhale;
Let gay Pomona slight the plains around,
And choose, for fairest fruits, the favour'd ground;
To bless the fertile vale should virtue cease,
Nor mossy grotts, nor flowery lawns could please;
Nor gay Pomona's luscious gifts avail,
The sound harmonious, or the spicy gale.

Seest thou yon rocks in dreadful pomp arise,
Whose rugged cliffs deform th' encircling skies?
Those fields, whence Phœbus all their moisture
drains,

And, too profusely fond, disrobes the plains?
When I vouchsafe to tread the barren soil,
Those rocks seem lovely, and those deserts smile.
The form thou view'st, to every scene with ease
Transfers its charms, and every scene can please.
When I have on those pathless wilds appear'd;
And the lone wanderer with my presence cheer'd;
Those cliffs the exile has with pleasure view'd,
And call'd that desert blissful solitude!

Nor I alone to such extend my care:
Fair-blooming health surveys her altars there.
Brown exercise will lead thee where she reigns,
And with reflected lustre gild the plains.
With her, in flower of youth, and beauty's pride,
Her offspring, calm content and peace, reside.
One ready offering suits each neighbouring shrine;
And all obey their laws, who practise mine.

But health averse from sloth's smooth region
flies;

And, in her absence, pleasure droops and dies.
Her bright companions, mirth, delight, repose,
Smile where she smiles, and sicken when she goes.
A galaxy of powers! whose forms appear
For ever beauteous, and for ever near.

Nor will soft sleep to sloth's request incline,
He from her couches flies unbid to mine.

Vain is the sparkling bowl, the warbling strain,
Th' incentive song, the labour'd viand vain!
Where she relentless reigns without controul,
And checks each gay excursion of the soul:
Unmov'd, though beauty, deck'd in all its
charms,

Grace the rich couch, and spread the softest arms:
'Till joyless indolence suggests desires;
Or drugs are sought to furnish languid fires:
Such languid fires as on the vitals prey,
Barren of bliss, but fertile of decay.

As artful heats apply'd to thirsty lands,
Produce no flowers, and but debase the sands.

But let fair health her cheering smiles impart,
How sweet is nature, how superfluous art!

'Tis she the fountain's ready draught commends,
And smooths the flinty couch which fortune lends.

VOL. IX.

And when my hero from his toils retires,
Fills his gay bosom with unusual fires,
And, while no check th' unbounded joy reprove,
Aids and refines the genuine sweets of love.
His fairest prospect rising trophies frame;
His sweetest music is the voice of fame;
Pleasures to sloth unknown! she never found
How fair the prospect, or how sweet the sound.

See fame's gay structure from yon summit
charms,

And fires the manly breast to arts or arms;
Nor dread the steep ascent, by which you rise
From grovelling vales to towers which reach the skies.

Love, fame, esteem, 'tis labour must acquire;
The smiling offspring of a rigid fire!
To fix the friend, your service must be shown;
All, ere they lov'd your merit, lov'd their own.
That wondering Greece your portrait may admire,
That tuneful bards may string for you their lyre,
That books may praise, or coins record your
name,

Such, such rewards 'tis toil alone can claim!
And the same column which displays to view
The conqueror's name, displays the conquest too.

'Twas slow experience, tedious mistress! taught
All that e'er nobly spoke, or bravely fought.
'Twas she the patriot, she the bard refin'd,
In arts that serve, protect, or please mankind.
Not the vain visions of inactive schools;
Not fancy's maxims, not opinion's rules,
E'er form'd the man whose generous warmth extends

T' enrich his country, or to serve his friends.

On active worth the laurel war bestows:
Peace rears her olive for industrious brows:
Nor earth, uncultur'd, yields its kind supplies:
Nor heaven, its showers without a sacrifice.

See far below such grovelling scenes of shame,
As lull to rest Ignavia's slumbering dame.
Her friends, from all the toils of fame secure,
Alas! inglorious, greater toils endure.

Doom'd all to mourn, who in her cause engage
A youth enervate, and a painful age;
A sickly sapless mass, if reason flies;
And, if she linger, impotently wise!

A thoughtless train, who, pamper'd, sleek, and gay,
Invite old age, and revel youth away;

From life's fresh vigour move the load of care,
And idly place it where they least can bear.
When to the mind, diseas'd, for aid they fly,
What kind reflection shall the mind supply?

When, with lost health, what should the loss allay,
Peace, peace is lost: a comfortless decay! [flies,
But to my friends, when youth, when pleasure
And earth's dim beauties fade before their eyes,

Through death's dark vista flowery tracts are seen,
Elysian plants, and groves for ever green.

If o'er their lives a reluctant glance they cast,
Theirs is the present who can praise the past.
Life has its bliss for these, when past its bloom,
As wither'd roses yield a late perfume.

Serene, and safe from passion's stormy rage,
How calm they glide into the port of age!
Of the rude voyage less depriv'd than eas'd;
More tir'd than pain'd, and weaken'd than diseas'd.

3 f

For health on age, 'tis temperance must bestow;
And peace from piety alone can flow;
And all the incense bounteous Jove requires,
Has sweets for him who feeds the sacred fires.—

Sloth views the towers of fame with envious eyes;
Desirous still, still impotent to rise.

Oft, when resolv'd to gain those blissful towers,
The pensive queen the dire ascent explores,
Gomes onward, wafted by the balmy trees,
Some sylvan music, or some scented breeze:
She turns her head, her own gay realm she spies,
And all the short-liv'd resolution dies.

Thus some fond insect's faltering pinions wave,
Clasp'd in its favourite sweets a lasting slave:
And thus in vain these charming visions please
The wretch of glory, and the slave of ease:

Doom'd ever in ignoble state to pine,
Boast her own scenes, and languish after mine.

But shun her snares: nor let the world exclaim,

'Thy birth, which was thy glory, prov'd thy shame.
With early hope thine infant actions fir'd;

Let manhood crown what infancy inspir'd.

Let generous toils with health reward thy days,
Prolong thy prime, and eternise thy praise.

The bold exploits that charms th' attesting age,
To latest times shall generous hearts engage;

And with that myrtle shall thy shrine be crown'd,
With which, alive, thy graceful brows were bound:

Till time shall bid thy virtues freely bloom,
And raise a temple where it found a tomb.

Then in their feasts thy name shall Grecians join;

Shall pour the sparkling juice to Jove's and thine.
Thine, us'd in war, shall raise their native fire;

Thine, us'd in peace, their mutual faith inspire.

Dulness perhaps, through want of sight, may blame,
And spleen, with odious industry, defame;

And that, the honours given, with wonder view,
And this, in secret sadness, own them due:

Contempt and envy were by fate design'd
The rival tyrants which divide mankind;

Contempt, which none, but who deserve, can bear;
While envy's wounds the smiles of fame repair.

For know, the generous thine exploits shall fire,
Thine every friend it suits thee to require,

Lov'd by the gods, and, till their seats I show,
Lov'd by the good their images below."

Cease, lovely maid, fair daughter of the skies!
My guide! my queen! th' ecstatic youth replies.

In thee I trace a form design'd for sway;
Which chiefs may court, and kings with pride obey.

And, by thy bright immortal friends I swear,
Thy fair idea shall no toils impair.

Lead me! O lead me where whole hosts of foes
Thy form depreciate, and thy friends oppose!

Welcome all toils th' unequal fates decree,
While toils endear thy faithful charge to thee.

Such be my cares, to bind th' oppressive hand,
And crush the fetters of an injur'd land:

To see the monster's noxious life resign'd,
And tyrants quell'd, the monsters of mankind!

Nature shall smile to view the vanquish'd brood,
And none, but envy, riot unsubdu'd,

In cloister'd state let selfish fages dwell,
Proud that their heart is narrow as their cell!

And boast their mazy labyrinth of rules,
Far less the friends of virtue, than the fools:

Yet such in vain thy favouring smiles pretend;
For he is thine, who proves his country's friend.

Thus when my life well-spent the good enjoy,
And the mean envious labour to destroy;

When, strongly lur'd by fame's contiguous shrine,
I yet devote my choicer vows to thine;

If all my toils thy promis'd favour claim,
O lead thy favourite through the gates of fame!

He ceas'd his vows, and, with disdainful air,
He turn'd to blast the late exulting fair.

But vanish'd, fled to some more friendly shore,
The conscious phantom's beauty pleas'd no more:

Convinc'd, her spurious-charms of dress and face
Claim'd a quick conquest, or a sure disgrace.

Fantastic power! whose transient charms allur'd,
While error's mist the reasoning mind obscur'd:

Not such the victress, virtue's constant queen,
Endur'd the test of truth, and dar'd be seen.

Her brightening form and features seem'd to own,
'Twas all her wish, her interest, to be known:

And when his longing view the fair declin'd,
Left a full image of her charms behind.

Thus reigns the moon, with furtive splendour
crown'd,

While glooms oppress us, and thick shades surround.

But let the source of light its beams display,
Languid and faint the mimic flames decay,

And all the sickening splendour fades away.

THE PROGRESS OF TASTE:

OR,

THE FATE OF DELICACY.

*A poem on the temper and studies of the Author;
and how great a misfortune it is, for a man of small estate to have much taste.*

PART I.

PERHAPS some cloud eclips'd the day,
When thus I tun'd my pensive lay:
"The ship is launch'd---we catch the gale---
On life's extended ocean sail:

For happiness our course we bend,
Our ardent cry, our general end!

Yet, ah! the scenes which tempt our care
Are like the forms dispers'd in air,

Still dancing near disorder'd eyes;
And weakest his, who best describes!

Yet let me not my birth-right barter,
(For wishing is the poet's charter;

All bards have leave to wish what's wanted,
Though few e'er found their wishes granted;

Extensive field; where poets pride them
In singing all that is deny'd them.)

For humble ease, ye powers! I pray;
That plain warm suit for ev'ry day!

And pleasure, and brocade, bestow;
To flaunt it---once a month, or so.

The first for constant wear we want;
The first, ye powers! for ever grant;

But constant wear the last bespatters,
And turns the tissue into tatters.

Where'er my vagrant course I bend,
Let me secure one faithful friend.

Let me, in public scenes, request
A friend of wit and taste, well dress'd:
And, if I must not hope such favour,
A friend of wit and taste, however.

Alas! that wisdom ever shuns
To congregate her scatter'd sons;
Whose nervous forces well combin'd
Would win the field, and sway mankind.

The fool will squeeze, from morn to night,
To fix his follies full in sight;

The note he strikes, the plume he shows,
Attract whole flights of fops and beaux;
And kindred-fools, who ne'er had known him,
Flock at the sight; caress, and own him;

But ill-starr'd sense, nor gay nor loud,
Steals soft on tip-toe, through the crowd:

Conveys his meagre form between;
And slides, like pensive air, unseen:

Contracts his known tenuity,
As though 'twere ev'n a crime to be:

Nor ev'n permits his eyes to stray,
And win acquaintance in their way.

In company, so mean his air,

You scarce are conscious he is there:

Till from some nook, like sharpen'd steel,
Occurs his face's thin profile.

Still seeming, from the gazer's eye,
Like Venus, newly bath'd, to fly.

Yet, while reluctant, he displays
His real gems before the blaze,

The fool hath, in its centre, plac'd
His tawdry stock of painted paste.

Disus'd to speak, he tries his skill;
Speaks coldly, and succeeds but ill;

His pensive manner, dulness deem'd
His modesty, reserve esteem'd;

His wit unknown, his learning vain,
He wins not one of all the train.

And those who, mutually known,
In friendship's fairest list had shone,

Less prone, than pebbles, to unite,
Retire to shades from public sight;

Grow savage, quit their social nature;
And starve, to study mutual satire.

But friends, and favourites, to chagrin them,
Find counties, countries, seas between them:

Meet once a year, then part, and then
Retiring, wish to meet again.

Sick of the thought, let me provide,
Some human form to grace my side;

At hand, where'er I shape my course;
An useful, pliant, stalking horse!

No gesture free from some grimace;
No seam, without its share of lace;

But, mark'd with gold or silver either,
Hint where his coat was piec'd together.

His legs be lengthen'd, I advise,
And stockings roll'd abridge his thighs.

What though Vandyck had other rules,
What had Vandyck to do with fools?

Be nothing wanting, but his mind:
Before, a solitaire; behind,

A twisted ribbon, like the track
Which nature gives an ass's back.

Silent as midnight! pity 'twere
His wisdom's slender wealth to share!

And, whilst in flocks our fancies stray,
To wish the poor man's lamb away.

This form attracting every eye,
I stroll all unregarded by:

This wards the jokes of every kind,
As an umbrella sun or wind;

Or, like a sponge, absorbs the sallies,
And pestilential fumes of malice;

Or, like a splendid shield, is fit
To screen the templar's random wit;

Or what some gentler cit lets fall,
As wool-packs quash the leaden ball.

Allusions these of weaker force,
And apter still the stalking horse!

O let me wander all unseen,
Beneath the sanction of his mien!

As lilies soft, as roses fair!
Empty as air-pumps drain'd of air!

With steady eye and pace remark
The speckled flock that haunts the park*;

Level my pen with wondrous heed
At follies flocking there to feed:

And, as my satire bursts amain,
See, feather'd foppery strew the plain.

But when I seek my rural grove,
And share the peaceful haunts I love,

Let none of this unhallow'd train
My sweet sequester'd paths profane.

Oft may some polish'd virtuous friend,
To the soft-winding vales descend;

And love with me inglorious things,
And scorn with me the pomp of kings.

And check me, when my bosom burns
For statues, paintings, coins, and urns.

For I in Damon's prayer could join,
And Damon's wish might now be mine---

But all dispers'd! the wish, the prayer,
Are driven to mix with common air.

PART II.

How happy once was Damon's lot,
While yet romantic schemes were not!

Ere yet he lent his weakly eyes,
To plan frail castles in the skies;

Forfeiting pleasures cheap and common,
To court a blaze, still flitting from one.

Ah happy Damon! thrice and more,
Had taste ne'er touch'd thy tranquil shore!

Oh days! when to a girdle ty'd
The couples jingled at his side;

And Damon swore he would not barter
The sportsman's girdle for a garter!

Whoever came to kill an hour,
Found easy Damon in their power;

Pure social nature all his guide,
"Damon had not a grain of pride."

He wish'd not to elude the snares
Which knavery plans, and craft prepares;

But rather wealth to crown their wiles;
And win their universal smiles:

For who are cheerful, who at ease,
But they who cheat us as they please?

He wink'd at many a gross design,
The new-fallen calf might countermine :
'Thus every fool allow'd his merit ;
" Yes ! Damon had a generous spirit !"

A coxcomb's jest, however vile,
Was sure, at least, of Damon's smile :
That coxcomb ne'er denied him sense ;
For why ? it prov'd his own pretence :
All own'd, were modestly away,
Damon could shine as much as they.

When wine and folly came in season,
Damon ne'er strove to save his reason ;
Obnoxious to the mad uproar :
A spy upon a hostile shore !
'Twas this his company endear'd :
Mirth never came till he appear'd :
His lodgings---every drawer could show them ;
The slave was kick'd, who did not know them.

Thus Damon, studious of his ease,
And pleasing all, whom mirth could please ;
Defy'd the world, like idle Colley,
To show a softer word than folly.
Since wisdom's gorgon-shield was known
To stare the gazer into stone ;
He chose to trust in folly's charm,
To keep his breast alive and warm.

At length grave learning's sober train
Remark'd the trifler with disdain ;
The sons of taste contemn'd his ways,
And rank'd him with the brutes that graze ;
While they to nobler heights aspir'd,
And grew belov'd, esteem'd, admir'd.

Hence with our youth, not void of spirit,
His old companions lost their merit :
And every kind well-natur'd sot
Seem'd a dull play, without a plot ;
Where every yawning guest agrees,
The willing creature strives to please :
But temper never could amuse ;
It barely led us to excuse ;
'Twas true, conversing they averr'd,
All they had seen, or felt or heard :
'Talents of weight ! for wights like these,
The law might choose for witnesses :
But sure th' attesting dry narration
Ill suits a judge of conversation.

* What were their freedoms ? mere excuses
To vent ill-manners, blows, and bruises.
Yet freedom, gallant freedom ! hailing,
At form, at form, incessant railing,
Would they examine each offence,
Its latent cause, its known pretence,
Punctilio ne'er was known to breed them,
So sure as fond prolific freedom.
Their courage ! but a loaded gun ;
Machine the wise would wish to shun ;
Its guard unsafe, its lock an ill one,
Where accident might fire and kill one.

In short, disgusted out of measure,
Through much contempt, and slender pleasure,
His sense of dignity returns ;
His native pride his bosom burns ;
He seeks respect---but how to gain it ?
Wit, social mirth, could ne'er obtain it :

* Boisterous mirth.

And laughter, where it reigns uncheck'd,
Discards and dissipates respect.

The man who bravely bows, enjoys it ;
But shaking hands, at once, destroys it.
Precarious plant, which, fresh and gay,
Shrinks at the touch, and fades away !

Come then, reserve ! yet from thy train
Banish contempt, and curst disdain.
Teach me, he cry'd, thy magic art,
To act the decent distant part :
To husband well my complaisance,
Nor let ev'n wit too far advance ;
But choose calm reason for my theme,
In these her royal realms supreme ;
And o'er her charms, with caution shown,
Be still a graceful umbrage thrown ;
And each abrupt period crown'd,
With nods, and winks, and smiles profound,
Till, rescued from the crowd beneath,
No more with pain to move or breathe,
I rise with head elate, to share
Salubrious draughts of purer air.
Respect is won by grave pretence
And silence, surer ev'n than sense---

'Tis hence the sacred grandeur springs
Of Eastern---and of other kings,
Or whence this awe to virtue due,
While virtue's distant as Peru ?
The sheathless sword the guard displays,
Which round emits its dazzling rays :
The stately fort, the turrets tall,
Portcullis'd gate, and battled wall,
Less screens the body, than controuls,
And wards contempt from royal souls.

The crowns they wear but check the eye,
Before it fondly pierce too high ;
That dazzled crowds may be employ'd
Around the surface of---the void.
O ! 'tis the statesman's craft profound
To scatter his amusements round !
To tempt us from the conscious-breast,
Where full-fledg'd crimes enjoy their nest.
Nor awes us every worth reveal'd
So deeply, as each vice conceal'd.

The lordly log, dispatch'd of yore,
That the frog people might adore,
With guards to keep them at a distance,
Had reign'd, nor wanted wit's assistance :
Nay---had addressees from his nation,
In praise of log-administration.

PART III.

THE buoyant fires of youth were o'er,
And fame and finery pleas'd no more ;
Productive of that general stare,
Which cool reflection ill can bear !
And, crowds commencing mere vexation,
Retirement sent its invitation.

Romantic scenes of pendent hills,
And verdant vales, and falling rills,
And mossy banks, the fields adorn,
Where Damon, simple swain, was born.

The Dryads rear'd a shady grove ;
Where such as think, and such as love,
May safely sigh their summer's day :
Or muse their silent hours away.

The Oreads lik'd the climate well;
And taught the level plain to swell
In verdant mounds, from whence the eye
Might all their larger works descry.

The Naiads pour'd their urns around,
From nodding rocks o'er vales profound.
They form'd their streams to please the view,
And bade them wind, as serpents do:
And having shown them where to stray,
Threw little pebbles in their way.

These Fancy, all-sagacious maid,
Had at their several tasks survey'd:
She saw and smil'd; and oft would lead
Our Damon's foot o'er hill and mead;
There, with descriptive finger, trace
The genuine beauties of the place;
And when she all its charms had shown,
Prescribe improvements of her own.

" See yonder hill, so green, so round,
Its brow with ambient beeches crown'd:
'Twould well become thy gentle care
To raise a dome to Venus there:
Pleas'd would the nymphs thy zeal survey;
And Venus, in their arms, repay.

'Twas such a shade, and such a nook,
In such a vale, near such a brook;
From such a rocky fragment springing;
That fam'd Apollo chose, to sing in.
There let an altar wrought with art
Engage thy tuneful patron's heart.
How charming there to muse and warble
Beneath his bust of breathing marble!
With laurel wreath and mimic lyre,
That crown a poet's vast desire.
Then, near it, scoop the vaulted cell
Where music's * charming maids may dwell;
Prone to indulge thy tender passion,
And make thee many an assignation.
Deep in the grove's obscure retreat
Be plac'd Minerva's sacred seat;
There let her awful turrets rise,
(For wisdom flies from vulgar eyes:)
There her calm dictates shalt thou hear
Distinctly strike thy listening ear:
And who would shun the pleasing labour,
To have Minerva for his neighbour?"

In short, so charm'd each wild suggestion,
Its truth was little call'd in question:
And Damon dreamt he saw the fawns,
And nymphs, distinctly, skim the lawns;
Now trac'd amid the trees, and then
Lost in the circling shades again.
With leer oblique their lover viewing---
And Cupid---panting---and pursuing---
Fancy, enchanting fair, he cry'd,
Be thou my goddess! thou my guide!
For thy bright visions I despise
What foes may think, or friends advise.
The feign'd concern, when folks survey
Expence, time, study, cast away;
The real spleen, with which they see:
I please myself, and follow thee.

Thus glow'd his breast by fancy warm'd:
And thus the fairy landscape charm'd.

* The Muses.

But most he hop'd his constant care;
Might win the favour of the fair;
And, wandering late through yonder glade,
He thus the soft design betray'd.

" Ye doves! for whom I rear'd the grove,
With melting lays salute my love!
My Delia with your notes detain,
Or I have rear'd the grove in vain!
Ye flowers! which early spring supplies,
Display at once your brightest dyes!
That she your opening charms may see;
Or what were else your charms to me?
Kind zephyr! brush each fragrant flower,
And shed its odours round my bower;
Or ne'er again, O gentle wind!
Shall I, in thee, refreshment find.
Ye streams, if e'er your banks I lov'd,
If e'er your native sounds improv'd,
May each soft murmur sooth my fair;
Or, oh, 'twill deepen my despair!
Be sure, ye willows! you be seen
Array'd in liveliest robes of green;
Or I will tear your slighted boughs,
And let them fade around my brows.
And thou my grot! whose lonely bounds
The melancholy pine surrounds!
May she admire thy peaceful gloom,
Or thou shalt prove her lover's tomb."

And now the lofty domes were rear'd;
Loud laugh'd the 'squares, the rabble star'd.
" See, neighbours, what our Damon's doing!
I think some folks are fond of ruin!
I saw his sheep at random stray---
But he has thrown his crook away---
And builds such huts, as in foul weather,
Are fit for sheep nor shepherd neither."

Whence came the sober swain mislead?
Why, Phœbus put it in his head.
Phœbus befriends him, we are told;
And Phœbus coins bright tons of gold.
'Twere prudent not to be so vain on't,
I think he'll never touch a grain on't.
And if, from Phœbus, and his muse,
Mere earthly laziness ensues;
'Tis plain, for aught that I can say,
The devil inspires, as well as they.
So they---while fools of grosser kind,
Lest weeting what our bard design'd,
Impute his schemes to real evil;
That in these haunts he met the devil.

He own'd, though their advice was vain,
It suited wights who trod the plain:
For dulness---though he might abhor it---
In them he made allowance for it.
Nor wonder'd, if, beholding mottoes,
And urns, and domes, and cells, and grottos,
Folks, little dreaming of the muses,
Were plagu'd to guess their proper uses.

But did the muses haunt his cell?
Or in his dome did Venus dwell?
Did Pallas in his counsels share?
The Delian god reward his prayer?
Or did his zeal engage the fair?
When all the structures shone complete;
Not much convenient, wondrous neat;
Adorn'd with gilding, painting, planting,
And the fair guests alone were wanting;

S f ij

Ah, me ! ('twas Damon's own confession)
Came poverty and took possession.

PART IV.

WHY droops my Damon, whilst he roves
Through ornamented meads and groves !
Near columns, obelisks, and spires,
Which every critic eye admires ?
'Tis poverty, detested maid,
Sole tenant of their ample shade !
'Tis she, that robs him of his ease ;
And bids their very charms displease.
But now, by fancy long controll'd,
And with the fons of taste enroll'd,
He deem'd it shameful to commence
First minister to common sense :
Far more elated, to pursue
The lowest task of dear vertu.

And now behold his lofty soul,
That whilom flew from pole to pole,
Settle on some elaborate flower ;
And, like a bee, the sweets devour !
Now, of a rose enamour'd, prove
The wild solitudes of love !
Now, in a lilly's cup enshrin'd,
Forego the commerce of mankind !

As in these toils he wore away
The calm remainder of his day ;
Conducting sun, and shade, and shower,
As most might glad the new-born flower,
So fate ordain'd before his eye---
Starts up the long-sought butterfly !
While, fluttering round, her plumes unfold
Celestial crimson, dropt with gold.

Adieu, ye bands of flowrets fair !
The living beauty claims his care,
For this he strips---nor bolt, nor chain,
Could Damon's warm pursuit restrain.
See him o'er hill, morass, or mound,
Where'er the speckled game is found,
Though bent with age, with zeal pursue ;
And totter towards the prey in view.

Nor rock, nor stream, his steps retard,
Intent upon the blest reward !
One vassal fly repays the chase !
A wing, a film, reward the race !
Rewards him, though disease attend,
And in a fatal surfeit end.

So fierce Camilla skim'd the plain,
Smit with the purple's pleasing stain,
She ey'd intent the glittering stranger,
And knew, alas ! nor fear, nor danger ;
Till deep within her panting heart,
Malicious fate impell'd the dart !

How studious he what favourite food
Regales dame nature's tiny brood ?
What junkets sat the filmy people !
And what liqueurs they choose to tipple !

Behold him, at some crise, prescribe,
And raise with drugs the sickening tribe !
Or haply, when their spirits fau'ter,
Sprinkling my Lord of Cloyne's tar-water.

When nature's brood of insects dies,
See how he pimps for amorous flies !
See him the timely succour lend her,
And help the wantons to engender !

Or see him guard their pregnant hour ;
Exert his soft obstetric power :
And, lending each his lenient hand,
With new-born grubs enrich the land !

* O Wilks ! what poet's loftiest lays
Can match thy labours, and thy praise ?
Immortal sage ! by fate decreed
To guard the moth's illustrious breed ;
Till fluttering swarms on swarms arise,
And all our wardrobes teem with flies !

And must we praise this taste for toys ?
Admire it then in girls and boys.

Ye youths of fifteen years, or more,
Resign your moths---the season's o'er.

'Tis time more social joys to prove ;
- 'Twere now your nobler task---to love.

Let * * * * 's eyes more deeply warm ;
Nor, flighting nature's fairest form,
The bias of your souls determine
Towards the mean love of nature's vermin.

But, ah ! how wondrous few have known,
To give each stage of life its own !

'Tis the pretexta's utmost bound,
With radiant purple edg'd around,
To please the child ; whose glowing dyes
Too long delight maturer eyes :
And few, but with regret, assume
The plain-wrought labours of the loom.

Ah ! let not me my fancy steer,
When life's autumnal clouds appear ;
Not ev'n in learning's long delays
Consume my fairest, fruitless days :
Like him, who should in armour spend
The sums that armour should defend.

A while, in pleasure's myrtle bower,
We share her smiles, and bless her power :
But find at last, we vainly strive
To fix the worst conquette alive.

O you ! that with assiduous flame
Have long pursued the faithless dame ;
Forake her soft abodes a while,
And dare her frown, and slight her smile.
Nor scorn, whatever wits may say,
The foot-path road, the king's high-way.
No more the scrupulous charmer tease,
But seek the roofs of honest ease ;
The rival fair, no more pursued,
Shall there with forward pace intrude ;
Shall there her every art essay,
To win you to her slighted sway ;
And grant your scorn a glance more fair
Than e'er she gave your fondest prayer.

But would you happiness pursue ?
Partake both ease, and pleasure too ?
Would you, through all your days, dispense
The joys of reason, and of sense ?
Or give to life the most you can,
Let social virtue shape the plan.
For does not to the virtuous deed
A train of pleasing sweets succeed ?
Or, like the sweets of wild desire,
Did social pleasures ever tire ?

* Alluding to moths and butterflies delineated by Benjamin Wilks. See his very expensive proposals.

Yet 'midst the group be some preferr'd,
 Be some abhorr'd---for Damon err'd:
 And such there are---of fair address---
 As 'twere unfocial to carefs.
 O learn by reason's equal rule
 To shun the praise of knave, or fool!
 Then, though you deem it better still
 To gain some rustic 'square's good will;
 And souls, however mean or vile,
 Like features, brighten by a smile;
 Yet reason holds it for a crime,
 The trivial breast should share thy time:
 And virtue, with reluctant eyes,
 Beholds this human sacrifice!

Through deep reserve, and air erect,
 Mistaken Damon won respect;
 But could the special homage pass,
 With any creature, but an ass?
 If conscious, they who fear'd the skin,
 Would scorn the sluggish brute within.
 What awe-struck slaves the towers enclose,
 Where Persian monarchs eat and doze!
 What prostrate reverence all agree,
 To pay a prince they never see!
 Mere vassals of a royal throne!
 The sophi's virtues must be shown,
 To make the reverence his own.

As for Thalia---wouldst thou make her
 Thy bride without a portion?---take her,
 She will with duteous care attend,
 And all thy duteous hours befriend;
 Will swell thy joys, will share thy pain;
 With thee rejoice, with thee complain;
 Will smooth thy pillow, pleat thy bowers;
 And bind thy aching head with flowers.
 But be this previous maxim known,
 If thou canst feed on love alone:
 If, blest with her thou canst sustain
 Contempt, and poverty, and pain:
 If so---then rifle all her graces---
 And fruitful be your fond embraces.

Too soon, by caitiff-spleen inspir'd,
 Sage Damon to his groves retir'd:
 The path disclaim'd by sober reason;
 Retirement claims a later season;
 Ere active youth and warm desires
 Have quite withdrawn their lingering fires.
 With the warm bosom, ill agree,
 Or limpid stream, or shady tree.
 Love lurks within the rosy bower,
 And claims the speculative hour;
 Ambition finds his calm retreat,
 And bids his pulse too fiercely beat!
 Ev'n social friendship duns his ear,
 And cites him to the public sphere,
 Does he resist their genuine force?
 His temper takes some froward course;
 Till passion, misdirected sighs
 For weeds, or shells, or grubs, or flies!

Far happiest he, whose early days
 Spent in the social paths of praise,
 Leave, fairly printed on his mind,
 A train of virtuous deeds behind:
 From this rich fund, the memory draws
 The lasting meed of self-applause.

Such fair ideas lend their aid
 To people their sequester'd shade.

Such are the naiads, nymphs, and fauns,
 That haunt his floods, or cheer his lawns.
 If, where his devious ramble strays,
 He virtue's radiant form surveys;
 She seems no longer now to wear
 The rigid mien, the frown severe*;
 To show him her remote abode;
 To point the rocky arduous road:
 But from each flower, his fields allow,
 She twines a garland for his brow.

ECONOMY,

A RHAPSODY, ADDRESSED TO YOUNG POETS.

"Infans; omnes gelidis quæcunque lacernis
 "Sunt tibi, Nasones Virgilioſque vides." MART.

PART I.

To you, ye bards! whose lavish breasts requires
 This monitory lay, the strains belong;
 Nor think some miser vents his sapient saw,
 Or some dull cit, unfeeling of the charms
 That tempt profusion, sings; while friendly zeal,
 To guard from fatal ills the tribe he loves,
 Inspires the meanest of the muses' train!
 Like you I loath the grovelling progeny,
 Whose wily arts, by creeping time matur'd,
 Advance them high on power's tyrannic throne:
 To lord it there in gorgeous uselessness,
 And spurn successful worth that pines below!

See the rich churl, amid the social sons
 Of wine and wit, regaling! hark he joins
 In the free jest delighted! seems to show
 A meliorat ed heart! he laughs! he sings!
 Songs of gay import, madrigals of glee,
 And drunken anthems set a gape the board,
 Like Demæa, in the play, benign and mild,
 And pouring forth benevolence of soul,
 Till Micio wonders: or, in Shakspeare's line,
 Obstreperous silence; drowning Shallow's voice,
 And startling Falstaff, and his mad compeers.

He owns 'tis prudence, ever and anon,
 To smooth his careful brow! to let his purse
 Ope to a sixpence diameter!
 He likes our ways; he owns the ways of wit
 Are ways of pleasure, and deserve regard.
 True, we are dainty good society,
 But what art thou? alas! consider well,
 Thou bane of social pleasure, know thyself.
 Thy fell approach, like some invasive damp
 Breath'd through the pores of earth from Stygian caves,

Destroy the lamp of mirth; the lamp which we
 Its flamens boast to guard: we know not how,
 But at thy sight the fading flame assumes
 A ghastly blue, and in a stench expires. [sky'd
 True, thou seem'st chang'd; all fainter, all en-
 The trembling tears that charge thy melting eyes
 Say thou art honest, and of gentle kind,
 But all is false! an intermitting sigh
 Condemns each hour, each moment given to smiles,
 And deems those only lost, thou dost not lose.
 Ev'n for a demi groat, this open'd soul,

* Alluding to---the allegory in Cebes's tablet.

This boon companion, this elastic breast
 Revibrates quick; and sends the tuneful tongue
 To lavish music on the rugged walls
 Of some dark dungeon. Hence, thou caitiff, fly!
 Touch not my glass, nor drain my sacred bowl,
 Monster, ingrate! beneath one common sky
 Why shouldst thou breathe? beneath one common roof

Thou ne'er shalt harbour; nor my little boat
 Receive a soul with crimes to press it down.
 Go to thy bags, thou recreant! hourly go,
 And, gazing there, bid them be wit, be mirth,
 Be conversation. Not a face that smiles
 Admit thy presence! not a soul that glows
 With social purport, bid or ev'n or morn
 Invest thee happy! but when life declines,
 May thy sure heirs stand tittering round thy bed,
 And, ushering in their favourites, burst thy locks,
 And fill their lamps with gold; till want and care
 With joy depart, and cry, "We ask no more."

Ah never never may th' harmonious mind
 Endure the worldly! poets, ever void
 Of guile, distrustless, scorn the treasure'd gold,
 And spurn the miser, spurn his deity.
 Balanc'd with friendship, in the poet's eye
 The rival scale of interest kicks the beam,
 Than lightning swifter. From his cavern'd store
 The sordid soul, with self-applause, remarks
 The kind propensity; remarks and smiles,
 And hies with impious haste to spread the snare.
 Him we deride, and in our comic scenes
 Contemn the niggard form Moliere has drawn.
 We loath with justice; but alas the pain
 To bow the knee before this calf of gold;
 Implore his envious aid, and meet his frown!

But 'tis not Gomez, 'tis not he whose heart
 Is crusted o'er with dross, whose callous mind
 Is senseless as his gold, the slighted muse
 Intensely loaths. 'Tis sure no equal task
 To pardon him, who lavishes his wealth
 On racer, fox-hound, hawk, or spaniel, all
 But human merit; who with gold essays
 All, but the noblest pleasure, to remove
 The want of genius, and its smiles enjoy.

But you, ye titled youths! whose nobler zeal
 Would burnish o'er your coronets with fame;
 Who listen pleas'd when poet tunes his lay;
 Permit him not, in distant solitudes,
 To pine, to languish out the fleeting hours
 Of active youth! then virtue pants for praise
 That season unadorn'd, the careless bard
 Quits your worn threshold, and like honest Gay
 Contemns the niggard boon ye time so ill.
 Your favours then, like trophies given the tomb,
 Th' infranchis'd spirit soaring not perceives,
 Or scorns perceiv'd; and execrates the smile
 Which bade his vigorous bloom, to treacherous hopes

And servile cares a prey, expire in vain!—

Two lawless powers, engag'd by mutual hate
 In endless war, beneath their flags enroll
 The vassal world. This avarice is nam'd,
 That luxury; 'tis true their partial friends
 Assign them softer names; usurpers both;
 That share by dint of arms the legal throne
 Of just economy; yet both betray'd
 By fraudulent ministers. The niggard chief,

Listening to want, all faithless, and prepar'd
 To join each moment in his rival's train,
 His conduct models by the needless fears
 The slave inspires; while luxury, a chief
 Of amplest faith, to plenty's rule resigns [sounds,
 His whole campaign. 'Tis plenty's flattering
 Engrosses his ear; 'tis plenty's smiling form
 Moves still before his eyes. Discretion strives,
 But strives in vain, to banish from the throne
 The perjur'd minion. He, secure of trust,
 With latent malice to the hostile camp [veys
 Day, night, and hour, his monarch's wealth con-

Ye towering minds! ye sublimated souls!
 Who, careless of your fortunes, seal and sign,
 Set, let, contract, acquit, with easier mien
 Than fops take snuff! whose economic care
 Your green-silk purse engrosses! easy, pleas'd,
 To see gold sparkle through the subtle folds;
 Lovely, as when th' Hesperian fruitage smil'd
 Amid the verdurous grove! who fondly hope
 Spontaneous harvests! harvests all the year!
 Who scatter wealth, as though the radiant crop
 Glitter'd on every bough; and every bough
 Like that the Trojan gather'd, once avais'd
 Were by a splendid successor supply'd
 Instant, spontaneous! listen to my lays.

For 'tis not fools, whate'er proverbial phrase
 Have long decreed, that quit with greatest ease
 The treasure'd gold. Of words indeed profuse,
 Of gold tenacious, their torpescent soul
 Clenches their coin, and what electal fire
 Shall solve the frosty gripe, and bid it flow?
 'Tis genius, fancy, that to wild expence
 Of health! of treasure! stimulates the soul:
 These, with officious care, and fatal art,
 Improve the vinous flavour; these the smile
 Of Cloe soften; these the glare of dress
 Illume; the glittering chariot gild anew,
 And add strange wisdom to the furs of power.

Alas! that he, amid the race of men,
 That he, who thinks of purest gold with scorn,
 Should with unsated appetite demand,
 And vainly court the pleasure it procures!
 When fancy's vivid spark impels the soul
 To scorn quotidian scenes, to spurn the bliss
 Of vulgar minds, what nostrum shall compose
 Its fatal tension? in what lonely vale
 Of balmy medicine's various field, aspires
 The blest refrigerant? Vain, ah vain the hope
 Of future peace, this orgasm uncontroll'd!
 Impatient, hence, of all the frugal mind
 Requires; to eat, to drink, to sleep, to fill
 A chest with gold, the sprightly breast demands
 Incessant rapture; life, a tedious load
 Deny'd its continuity of joy.

But whence obtain? philosophy requires
 No lavish cost; to crown its utmost prayer
 Suffice the root-built cell, the simple fleece,
 The juicy viand, and the crystal stream.
 Ev'n mild stupidity rewards her train
 With cheap contentment, Taste alone requires
 Entire profusion! Days, and nights, and hours,
 Thy voice, hydropic fancy! calls aloud
 For costly draughts, inundant bowls of joy,
 Rivers of rich regalement! seas of bliss!
 Seas without shore! infinity of sweets!

And yet, unless sage reason join her hand

In pleasure's purchase, pleasure is unsure :
 And yet, unless economy's consent
 Legitimate expence, some graceless mark,
 Some symptom ill-conceal'd, shall, soon or late,
 Burst like a pimple from the vicious tide
 Of acid blood, proclaiming want's disease,
 Amidst the bloom of show. The scanty stream
 Slow-loitering in its channel, seems to vie
 With Vaga's depth ; but should the sedge power
 Vain-glorious empty his penurious urn
 O'er the rough rock, how must his fellow streams
 Deride the tinklings of the boastive rill !

I not aspire to mark the dubious path
 That leads to wealth, to poets mark'd in vain !
 But, ere self-flattery sooth the vivid breast
 With dreams of fortune near ally'd to fame,
 Reflect how few, who charm'd the listening ear
 Of satrap or of king, her smiles enjoy'd !
 Consider well, what meagre alms repay'd
 The great Mæonian, fire of tuneful song,
 And prototype of all that soar'd sublime,
 And left dull cares below ; what griefs impell'd
 The modest bard of learn'd Eliza's reign
 To swell with tears his Mulla's parent stream,
 And mourn aloud the pang " to ride, to run,
 " To spend, to give, to want, to be undone."
 Why should I tell of Cowley's pensive muse
 Belov'd in vain ? too copious is my theme !
 Which of your boasted race might hope reward
 Like loyal Butler, when the liberal Charles,
 The judge of wit, perus'd the sprightly page,
 Triumphant o'er his foes ? Believe not hope,
 The poet's parasite ; but learn alone
 To spare the scanty boon the fates decree.
 Poet and rich ! tis solecism extreme !
 'Tis heighten'd contradiction ! in his frame,
 In every nerve and fibre of his soul,
 The latent seeds and principles of want
 Has nature wove ; and fate confirm'd the clue.

Nor yet despair to shun the ruder gripe
 Of penury ; with nice precision learn
 A dollar's value. Foremost in the page
 That marks th' expence of each revolving year,
 Place inattention. When the lust of praise,
 Or honour's false idea, tempts thy soul
 To slight frugality, assure thine heart
 That danger's near. This perishable coin
 Is no vain ore. It is thy liberty,
 It fetters misers, but it must alone
 Enfranchise thee. The world, the cit-like world,
 Bids thee beware ; thy little craft essay ;
 Nor, piddling with a tea-spoon's slender form,
 See with soup-ladles devils gormandize.

Economy ! thou good old aunt ! whose mien
 Furrow'd with age and care the wise adore,
 The wits contemn ! reserving still thy stores
 To cheer thy friends at last ! why with the cit,
 Or bookless churl, with each ignoble name,
 Each earthly nature, deign'st thou to reside ?
 And, shunning all who by thy favours crown'd
 Might glad the world, to seek some vulgar mind
 Inspiring pride, and selfish shapes of ill ?

Why with the old, infirm, and impotent,
 And childless, love to dwell ; yet leave the breast
 Of youth, unwarn'd, unguided, uninform'd ?
 Of youth, to whom thy monitory voice
 Where doubly kind ? for sure to youthful eyes

(How short soe'er it prove) the road of life
 Appears protracted ; fair on either side
 The loves, the graces play, on fortune's child
 Profusely smiling ; well might you essay
 The frugal plan, the lucrative employ,
 Source of their favour all the live-long day,
 But fate assents not. Age alone contracts
 His meagre palm, to clench the tempting bane
 Of all his peace, the glittering seeds of care !

O that the muse's voice might pierce the ear
 Of generous youth ! for youth deserves her song,
 Youth is fair virtue's season, virtue then
 Requires the pruner's hand ; the sequent stage,
 It barely vegetates : nor long the space
 Ere robb'd of warmth its arid trunk display
 Fell winter's total reign. O lovely source
 Of generous foibles, youth ! when opening minds
 Are honest as the light, lucid as air,
 As fostering breezes kind, as linnets gay,
 Tender as buds, and lavish as the spring !
 Yet, hapless state of man ! his earliest youth
 Cozens itself ; his age defrauds mankind.

Nor deem it strange that rolling years abrade
 The social bias. Life's extensive page
 What does it but unfold repeated proofs
 Of gold's omnipotence ? With patriots friends,
 Sickening beneath its ray, enervate some,
 And others dead, whose putrid name exhales
 A noisome scent, the bulky volume teems.
 With kinsmen, brothers, sons, moistening the shroud,

Or honouring the grave, with specious grief
 Of short duration ; soon in fortune's beams
 Alert, and wondering at the tears they shed.

But who shall save by tame prosaic strain
 That glowing breast, where wit with youth con-
 To sweeten luxury ? The fearful muse [spires
 Shall yet proceed, though by the faintest gleam
 Of hope inspir'd, to warn the train she loves.

PART II.

In some dark season, when the misty shower
 Obscures the sun, and saddens all the sky ;
 When linnets drop the wing, nor grove nor stream
 Invites thee forth, to sport thy drooping muse ;
 Seize the dull hour, nor with regret assign
 To worldly prudence. She nor nice nor coy
 Accepts the tribute of a joyless day ; [cede,
 She smiles well-pleas'd, when wit and mirth re-
 And not a grace, and not a muse will hear.
 Then, from majestic Maro's awful strain,
 Or towering Homer, let thine eye descend
 To trace, with patient industry, the page
 Of income and expence. And oh ! beware
 Thy breast, self-flattering, place no courtly smile,
 No golden promise of your faithless muse,
 Nor latent mine which fortune's hand may show,
 Amid thy solid store. The syren's song
 Wrecks not the listening sailor, half so sure.
 See by what avenues, what devious paths,
 The foot of want detested, steals along,
 And bars each fatal pass. Some few short hours
 Of punctual care, the refuse of thy year
 On frugal schemes employ'd, shall give the muse
 To sing intrepid many a cheerful day.

But if too soon before the tepid gales

Thy resolution melt; and ardent vows,
In wary hours prefer'd, or die forgot,
Or seem'd the forc'd effect of hazy skies;
Then, ere surprise, by whose impetuous rage
The massy fort, with which thy gentler breast
I not compare, is won, the song proceeds.

Know too by nature's undiminish'd law,
Throughout her realms obey'd, the various parts
Of deep creation, atoms, systems, all!
Attract and are attracted; nor prevails the law
Alone in matter; soul alike with soul
Aspires to join; nor yet in souls alone,
In each idea it imbibes, is found
The kind propensity. And when they meet,
And grow familiar, various though their tribe,
Their tempers various, vow perpetual faith:
That, should the world's disjointed frame once
To chaos yield the sway, amid the wreck [more
Their union should survive; with Roman warmth,
By sacred hospitable laws endear'd,
Should each idea recollect its friend.

Here then we fix; on this perennial base
Erect thy safety, and defy the storm.
Let soft profusion's fair idea join
Her hand with poverty; nor here desist,
Till, o'er the group that forms their various train
Thou sing loud hymeneals. Let the pride
Of outward show in lasting leagues combine
With shame thread-bare; the gay vermilion face
Of rash intemperance, be discreetly pair'd
With fallow hunger: the licentious joy,
With mean dependance; ev'n the dear delight
Of sculpture, paint, intaglios, books and coins,
Thy breast, sagacious prudence! shall connect
With filth and beggary; nor disdain to link
With black insolvency. Thy soul alarm'd
Shall shun the syren's voice; nor boldly dare
To bid the soft enchantress share thy breast,
With such a train of horrid fiends conjoin'd.

Nor think, ye sordid race! ye grovelling minds!
I frame the song for you! for you, the muse
Could other rules impart; the friendly strain,
For gentler blossoms plann'd, to yours would prove
The juice of lurid aconite, exceed
Whatever Colchos bore; and in your breast
Compassion, love, and friendship, all destroy!

It greatly shall avail, if e'er thy stores
Increase apace, by periodic days
Of annual payment, or thy patron's boon,
The lean reward of gross unbounded praise!
It much avails, to seize the present hour,
And, undeliberating, call around
Thy hungry creditors; their horrid rage
When once appeas'd, the small remaining store
Shall rise in weight tenfold, in lustre rise,
As gold improv'd by many a fierce assay.
'Tis thus the frugal husbandman directs
His narrow stream, if, o'er its wonted banks
By sudden rains impell'd, it proudly swell;
His timely hand through better tracts conveys
The quick decreasing tide; ere borne along
Or through the wild morais, or cultur'd fields,
Or bladed grafs mature, or barren sands,
It flow destructive, or it flow in vain!
But happiest he who sanctifies expence
By present pay! who subjects not his fame
To tradesmens varlets, nor bequeaths his name,

His honour'd name, to deck the vulgar page
Of base mechanic, sordid, unsincere!
There haply, while thy muse sublimely soars
Beyond this earthly sphere, in heaven's abodes,
And dreams of nectar and ambrosial sweets,
Thy growing debt steals unregarded o'er
The punctual record; till nor Phœbus self,
Nor sage Minerva's art can aught avail
To sooth the ruthless dun's detested rage.
Frantic and fell, with many a curse profane
He loads the gentle muse; then hurls thee down
To want, remorse, captivity, and shame.

Each public place, the glittering haunts of men,
With horror fly. Why loiter near thy bane?—
Why fondly linger on a hostile shore,
Disarm'd, defenceless? why require to tread
The precipice? or why alas to breathe
A moment's space, where every breeze is death,
Death to thy future peace! Away, collect
Thy dissipated mind; contract thy train
Of wild ideas o'er the flowery fields
Of show diffus'd, and speed to safer climes.
Economy presents her glass, accept
The faithful mirror: powerful to disclose
A thousand forms, unseen by careless eyes,
That plot thy fate. Temptation, in a robe
Of Tyrian dye, with every sweet perfum'd,
Besets thy sense; extortion follows close
Her wanton step, and ruin brings the rear.
These and the rest shall her mysterious glass
Embody to thy view; like Venus kind,
When to her labouring son, the vengeful powers
That urg'd the fall of Ilium, she display'd,
He, not imprudent, at the sight declin'd
The unequal conflict, and decreed to raise
The Trojan welfare on some happier shore.
For here to drain thy swelling purse await
A thousand arts, a thousand frauds attend,
"The cloud-wrought canes, the gorgeous snuff-

boxes

"The twinkling jewels, and the gold etwee,
"With all its bright inhabitants, shall waste
"Its melting stores, and in the dreary void
"Leave not a doit behind." Ere yet exhaust
Its flimsy folds offend thy pensive eye,
Away! embosom'd deep in distant shades,
Nor seen nor seeing, thou mayst vent thy scorn
Of lace, embroidery, purple, gems, and gold!
There of the farded fop, and essenc'd beau,
Ferocious with a stoic's frown disclose
Thy manly scorn, averse to tinsel pomp;
And fluent thine harangue. But can thy soul
Deny thy limbs the radiant grace of dress,
Where dress is merit! where thy graver friend
Shall wish thee burnish'd! where the sprightly
Demand embellishment! ev'n Delia's eye, [fair
As in a garden, roves, of hues alone
Inquirent, curious? Fly the curst domain;
These are the realms of luxury and show;
No classic soil: away! the bloomy spring
Attracts thee hence; the waning autumn warns;
Fly to thy native shades, and dread ev'n there,
Lest busy fancy tempt thy narrow state
Beyond its bounds. Observe Florelia's mien.
Why treads my friend with melancholy step
That beauteous lawn? why pensive strays his eye
O'er statues, grottoes, urns, by critic art

Proportion'd fair? or from his lofty dome,
Bright glittering through the grove, returns his Unpleas'd, disconsolate? And is it love, [eye
Disastrous love, that robs the finish'd scenes
Of all their beauty? centering all in her
His soul adores? or from a blacker cause
Springs this remorseful gloom? is conscious guilt
The latent source of more than love's despair?
It cannot be within that polish'd breast
Where science dwells, that guilt should harbour
No! 'tis the sad survey of present want, [there;
And past profusion! lost to him the sweets
Of yon pavilion, fraught with every charm
For other eyes; or, if remaining, proofs
Of criminal expence! Sweet interchange
Of river, valley, mountain, woods, and plains!
How glad some once he rang'd your native turf,
Your simple scenes, how raptur'd! ere expence
Had lavish'd thousand ornaments, and taught
Convenience to perplex him, art to pall,
Pomp to deject, and beauty to displease.

Oh! for a soul to all the glare of wealth,
To fortune's wide exhaustleis treasury,
Nobly superior! but let caution guide
The coy disposal of the wealth we scorn,
And prudence be our saviour! Alas!
The pilgrim wandering o'er some distant clime,
Sworn foe of avarice! nor disdains to learn
Its coin's imputed worth; the destin'd means
To smooth his passage to the favour'd shrine.
Ah let not us, who tread this stranger-world,
Let none who sojourn on the realms of life,
Forget the land is mercenary; nor waste
His fare, ere landed on no venal shore.

Let never bard consult Palladio's rules;
Let never bard, O Burlington! survey
Thy learned art, in Chiswick's dome display'd;
Dangerous incentive! nor with lingering eye
Survey the window Venice calls her own.
Better for him, with no ingrateful muse,
To sing a requiem to that gentle soul
Who plann'd the sky-light; which to lavish bards
Conveys alone the pure ethereal ray.
For garrets him, and squalid walls await,
Unless, presageful, from this friendly strain,
He glean advice, and shun the scribbler's doom.

PART III.

YET once again, and to thy doubtful fate
The trembling muse consigns thee. Ere contempt,
Or want's empoison'd arrow, ridicule,
Transfix thy weak unguarded breast, behold!
The poet's roofs, the careless poet's, his
Who scorns advice, shall close my serious lay.

When Gulliver, now great, now little deem'd,
The play-thing of comparison, arriv'd
Where learned bosoms their aerial schemes
Projected, studious of the public weal;
'Mid these, one subtler artist he descri'd,
Who cherish'd in his dusty tenement
The spider's web, injurious, to supplant
Fair Albion's fleeces! Never, never may
Our monarchs on such fatal purpose smile
And irritate Minerva's beggar'd sons
The Melksham weavers! Here in every nook
Their webs they spun; here revel'd uncontroul'd,

And, like the flags from Westminster's high roof
Dependent, here their fluttering textures wav'd.
Such, so adorn'd, the cell I mean to sing!
Cell ever squalid! where the sneerful maid
Will not fatigue her hand! broom never comes,
That comes to all! o'er whose quiescent walls
Arachne's unmolested care has drawn
Curtains subfusc, and save th' expence of art.

Survey those walls, in sady texture clad,
Where wandering snails in many a slimy path,
Free, unrestrain'd, their various journeys crawl;
Peregrinations, strange, and labyrinths
Confus'd, inextricable! such the clue
Of Cretan Ariadne ne'er explain'd!
Hooks! angles! crooks! and involutions wild!
Meantime, thus silver'd with meanders gay,
In mimic pride the snail-wrought tissue shines,
Perchance of tabby, or of harateen,
Not ill expressive! such the power of snails.

Behold the chair, whose fractur'd seat infirm
An aged cushion hides! replete with dust
The foliage'd velvet; pleasing to the eye
Of great Eliza's reign, but now the snare
Of weary guest that on the specious bed
Sits down confiding. Ah! disastrous wight!
In evil hour and rashly dost thou trust
The fraudulent couch! for, though in velvet cas'd,
Thy fated thigh shall kiss the dusty floor.
The traveller thus, that o'er Hibernian plains
Hath shap'd his way; on beds profuse of flowers,
Cowslip, or primrose, or the circular eye
Of daisie fair, decrees to bask supine
And see! delighted, down he drops, secure
Of sweet refreshment, ease without annoy,
Or luscious noon-day nap. Ah much deceiv'd,
Much suffering pilgrim! thou nor noon-day nap,
Nor sweet repose shalt find; the false morals
In quivering undulations yields beneath
Thy burden, in the miry gulf enclos'd!
And who would trust appearance? cast thine eye
Where 'mid machines of heterogeneous form
His coat depends; alas! his only coat,
Eldest of things! and nameless, as an heath
Of small extent by fleecy myriads graz'd.
Not different have I seen in dreary vault
Display'd, a coffin; on each sable side
The texture unmolested seems entire.

Fraudful, when touch'd it glides to dust away!
And leaves the wondering swain to gape, or stare,
And with expressive shrug, and piteous sigh,
Declare the fatal force of rolling years,
Or dire extent of frail mortality.

This aged vesture, scorn of gazing beaux,
And formal cits, (themselves too haply scorn'd)
Both on its sleeve and on its skirt, retains
Full many a pin wide-sparkling; for, if e'er
Their well-known crest met his delighted eye,
Though wrapt in thought, commercing with the
He, gently stooping, scorn'd not to upraise, [sky,
And on each sleeve, as conscious of their use,
Indenting fix them; nor, when arm'd with these,
The cure of rents and separations dire,
And chasms enormous, did he view dismay'd
Hedge, bramble, thicket, bush, portending fate
To breeches, coat and hose! had any wight
Of vulgar skill, the tender texture own'd;
But gave his mind to form a sonnet quaint

Of Silvia's shoe-string, or of Cloc's fan,
 Or sweetly-fashion'd tip of Celia's ear.
 Alas! by frequent use decays the force
 Of mortal art! the refractory robe
 Eludes the taylor's art, eludes his own;
 How potent once, in union quaint conjoin'd!
 See near his bed (his bed too falsely call'd
 The place of rest, while it a bard sustains;
 Pale, meagre, muse-rid wight! who reads in vain
 Narcotic volumes o'er) his candlestick,
 Radiant machine, when from the plastic hand
 Of Mulciber, the mayor of Brimingham,
 The engine issued; now alas disguis'd
 By many an unctuous tide, that wandering down
 Its sides congeal; what he perhaps, essays
 With humour forc'd, and ill-dissembled smile,
 Idly to liken to the poplar's trunk
 When o'er its bark the lucid amber, wound
 In many a pleasing fold, incrusts the tree.
 Or suits him more the winter's candy'd thorn,
 When from each branch, anneal'd, the works of Pervasive, radiant icicles depend? [frost]

How shall I sing the various ill that waits
 The careful sonneteer? or who can paint
 The shifts enormous, that in vain he forms
 To patch his paneless window; to cement
 His batter'd tea-pot, ill-retentive vase?
 To war with ruin? anxious to conceal
 Want's fell appearance, of the real ill
 Nor foe, nor fearful. Ruin unforeseen
 Invades his chattels; ruin will invade;
 Will claim his whole invention to repair,
 Nor, of the gift, for tuneful ends design'd,
 Allow one part to decorate his song.
 While ridicule, with ever-pointing hand
 Conscious of every shift, of every shift
 Indicative, his inmost plot betrays,
 Points to the nook, which he his study calls
 Pompous and vain! for thus he might esteem
 His chest, a wardrobe; purse, a treasury;
 And shows, to crown her full display, himself.
 One whom the powers above, in place of health,
 And wonted vigour; of paternal cot,
 Or little farm; of bag, or scrip, or staff,
 Cup, dish, spoon, plate, or worldly utensil,
 A poet fram'd; yet fram'd not to repine,
 And with the cobbler's loftiest site his own;
 Nor, partial as they seem, upbraid the fates,
 Who to the humbler mechanism, join'd
 Goods so superior, such exalted bliss!

See with what seeming ease, what labour'd peace,
 He, hapless hypocrite! refines his nail,
 His chief amusement! then how feign'd, how forc'd,
 That care-defying sonnet, which implies
 His debts discharg'd, and he of half a crown
 In full possession, uncontested right
 And property! Yet ah! whoe'er this wight
 Admiring view, if such there be, distrust
 The vain pretence; the smiles that harbour grief
 As lurks the serpent deep in flowers unwreath'd.
 Forewarn'd, be frugal; or with prudent rage
 Thy pen demolish; choose the trustier flail,
 And bless those labours which the choice inspir'd.
 But if thou view'st a vulgar mind, a wight
 Of common sense, who seeks no brighter name,
 Him envy, him admire, him, from thy breast,
 Prescient of future dignities, salute

Sheriff, or mayor, in comfortable furs
 Enwrapt, secure: nor yet the laureat's crown
 In thought exclude him! He perchance shall rise
 To nobler heights than foresight can decree.

When, fir'd with wrath, for his intrigues dis-
 In many an idle song, Saturnian Jove [play'd
 Vow'd sure destruction to the tuneful race;
 Appeas'd by suppliant Phœbus, "Bards, he said,
 Henceforth of plenty, wealth, and pomp debarr'd,
 But fed by frugal cares, might wear the bay
 Secure of thunder."—Low the Delian bow'd,
 Nor at th' invidious favour dar'd repine.

THE RUIN'D ABBEY;

OR,

THE EFFECTS OF SUPERSTITION.

At length fair peace with olive crown'd regains
 Her lawful throne, and to the sacred haunts
 Of wood or fount the frighted muse returns.

Happy the bard, who, from his native hills,
 Soft musing on a summer's eve, surveys
 His azure stream, with pensile woods enclos'd!
 Or o'er the glassy surface, with his friend,
 Or faithful fair, through bordering willows green
 Wafts his small frigate. Fearless he of shouts,
 Or taunts, the rhetoric of the watery crew
 That ape confusion from the realms they rule!
 Fearless of these; who shares the gentler voice
 Of peace and music; birds of sweetest song
 Attune from native boughs their various lay,
 And cheer the forest; birds of brighter plume
 With busy pinion skim the glittering wave,
 And tempt the sun; ambitious to display
 Their several merit, while the vocal flute,
 Or number'd verse, by female voice endear'd,
 Crowns his delight, and mollifies the scene.

If solitude his wandering steps invite
 To some more deep recess (for hours there are,
 When gay, when social minds to friendship's voice,
 Or beauty's charm, her wild abodes prefer);
 How pleas'd he treads her venerable shades,
 Her solemn courts! the centre of the grove!
 The root-built cave, by far-extended rocks
 Around embosom'd, how it soothes the soul!
 If scoop'd at first by superstitious hands
 The rugged cell receiv'd alone the shoals
 Of bigot minds, religion dwells not here,
 Yet virtue pleas'd, at intervals, retires:

Yet here may wisdom, as she walks the maze,
 Some serious truths collect, the rules of life;
 And serious truths of mightier weight than gold!

I ask not wealth; but let me hoard with care,
 With frugal cunning, with a niggard's art,
 A few fix'd principles; in early life,
 Ere indolence impede the search, explor'd.
 Then, like old Latimer, when age impairs
 My judgment's eye, when quibbling school attack
 My grounded hope, or subtler wits deride,
 Will I not blush to shun the vain debate,
 And this mine answer: "Thus, 'twas thus I
 "thought;

"My mind yet vigorous, and my soul entire;
 "Thus will I think, averse to I then more
 "To intricate discussion, prone to stray.
 "Perhaps my reason may but ill defend

" My settled faith; my mind, with age impair'd,
 " Too sure its own infirmities declare.
 " But I am arm'd by caution, studious youth,
 " And early foresight; now the winds may rise,
 " The tempest whistle, and the billows roar;
 " My pinnace rides in port, despoil'd and worn,
 " Shatter'd by time and storms, but while it shuns
 " Th' unequal conflict, and declines the deep,
 " Sees the strong vessel fluctuate less secure."

Thus while he strays, a thousand rural scenes
 Suggest instruction, and instructing please.
 And see betwixt the grove's extended arms
 An abbey's rude remains attract thy view,
 Gilt by the mid-day sun: with lingering step
 Produce thine axe (for, aiming to destroy
 Tree, branch, or shade, for never shall thy breast
 Too long deliberate), with timorous hand
 Remove th' obstructive bough; nor yet refuse
 Though sighing, to destroy that favourite pine,
 Rais'd by thine hand, in its luxuriant prime
 Of beauty fair, that screens the vast remains.
 Aggriev'd, but constant as the Roman fire,
 The rigid Manlius, when his conquering son
 Bled by a parent's voice; the cruel meed
 Of virtuous ardour, timelessly display'd;
 Nor cease till, through the gloomy road, the pile
 Gleam unobstructed; thither oft thine eye
 Shall sweetly wander; thence returning, sooth
 With pensive scenes thy philosophic mind.

These were thy haunts, thy opulent abodes,
 O superstition! hence the dire disease,
 (Balanc'd with which the fam'd Athenian pest
 Were a short head-ach, were the trivial pain
 Of transient indigestion) seiz'd mankind.

Long time she rag'd, and scarce a southern gale
 Warm'd our chill air, unloaded with the threats
 Of tyrant Rome; but futile all, till she,
 Rome's abler legate, magnify'd their power,
 And in a thousand horrid forms attir'd.

Where then was truth to sanctify the page
 Of British annals? if a foe expir'd,
 The perjur'd monk suborn'd infernal shrieks,
 And fiends to snatch at the departing soul
 With hellish emulation. If a friend,
 High o'er his roof exultant angels tune
 Their golden lyres, and waft him to the skies.

What then were vows, were oaths, were plight-
 ed faith?

The sovereign's just, the subject's loyal pact,
 To cherish mutual good, annull'd and vain,
 By Roman magic, grew an idle scroll
 Ere the frail sanction of the wax was cold.
 With thee, * Plantagenet, from civil broils
 The land a while respir'd, and all was peace.
 Then Becket rose, and, impotent of mind,
 From regal courts with lawless fury march'd
 The church's blood-stain'd convicts, and forgave;
 Bid murderous priests the sovereign frown con-
 temn,

And with unhallow'd crozier bruise'd the crown.

Yet yielded not supinely tame a prince
 Of Henry's virtues; learn'd, courageous, wise;
 Of fair ambition. Long his regal soul
 Firm and erect the peevish priest exil'd,
 And brav'd the fury of revengeful Rome.

* Henry II.

In vain! let one faint malady diffuse
 The pensive gloom which superstition loves,
 And see him, dwindled to a recreant groom,
 Rein the proud palfrey whilst the priest ascends!
 Was * Cœur-de-lion blest with whiter days?
 Here the cowl'd zealots with united cries
 Urg'd the crusade; and see, of half his stores
 Despoil'd the wretch, whose wiser bosom chose
 To bless his friends, his race, his native land.

Of ten fair sons that roll'd their annual race,
 Not one beheld him on his vacant throne;
 While haughty † Longchamp, 'mid his livery'd files

Of wanton vassals, spoil'd his faithful realm,
 Battling in foreign fields; collecting wide
 A laurel harvest for a pillag'd land.

Oh dear-bought trophies! when a prince deserts
 His drooping realm, to pluck the barren sprays!

When faithless John usurp'd the fully'd crown,
 What ample tyranny! the groaning land
 Deem'd earth, deem'd heaven its foe! six tedious years

Our helpless fathers in despair obey'd
 The papal interdict; and who obey'd,
 The sovereign plunder'd. O inglorious days!
 When the French tyrant, by the futile grant
 Of papal rescript, claim'd Britannia's throne,
 And durst invade; be such inglorious days
 Or hence forgot, or not recall'd in vain!

Scarce had the tortur'd ear dejected heard
 Rome's loud anathema, but heartless, dead
 To every purpose, men nor wish'd to live,
 Nor dar'd to die. The poor laborious hind
 Heard the dire curse, and from his trembling hand
 Fell the neglected crook that rul'd the plain.
 Thence journeying home, in every cloud he sees
 A vengeful angel, in whose waving scroll
 He reads damnation; sees its sable train
 Of grim attendants, pencil'd by despair!

The weary pilgrim from remoter climes
 By painful steps arriv'd; his home, his friends,
 His offspring left, to lavish on the shrine
 Of some far-honour'd saint his costly stores,
 Inverts his footstep; sickens at the sight
 Of the barr'd fane, and silent sheds his tear.

The wretch whose hope by stern oppression chas'd
 From every earthly bliss, still as it saw
 Triumphant wrong, took wing, and flew to heaven,
 And rested there, now mourn'd his refuge lost.
 And wonted peace. The sacred fane was barr'd,
 And the lone altar, where the mourners throng'd
 To supplicate remission, smok'd no more;
 While the green weed luxuriant round uprose.
 Some from the death-bed, whose delirious faith
 Through every stage of life to Rome's decrees
 Obsequious, humbly hop'd to die in peace,
 Now saw the ghastly king approach, begirt
 In tenfold terrors; now expiring heard
 The last loud clarion sound, and heaven's decree
 With unremitting vengeance bar the skies.
 Nor light the grief, by superstition weigh'd,
 That their dishonour'd corse, shut from the verge
 Of hallow'd earth, or tutelary fane,
 Must sleep with brutes their vassals; on the field;

* Richard I.

† Bishop of Ely, Lord Chancellor.

Unneath some path, in marl unexercis'd!
 No solemn bell extort a neighbour's tear!
 No tongue of priest pronounce their soul secure!
 Nor fondest friend assure their peace obtain'd!
 'The priest! alas, so boundless was the ill!
 He, like the flock he pillag'd, pin'd forlorn;
 'The vivid vermeil fled his fady cheek,
 And his big paunch, distended with the spoils
 Of half his flock: emaciate, groan'd beneath
 Superior pride, and mightier lust of power!
 'Twas now Rome's fondest friend, whose meagre
 hand

Told to the midnight lamp his holy beads
 With nice precision, felt the deeper wound.
 As his gull'd soul rever'd the conclave more.
 Whom did the ruin spare? for wealth, for
 power,

Birth, honour, virtue, enemy, and friend,
 Sunk helpless in the dreary gulf involv'd;
 And one capricious curse envelop'd all!

Were kings secure? in towering stations born,
 In flattery nurs'd, inur'd to scorn mankind,
 Or view diminish'd from their site sublime;
 As when a shepherd, from the lofty brow
 Of some proud cliff, surveys his lessening flock
 In snowy groups diffusive, scud the vale.

A while the furious menace John return'd,
 And breath'd defiance loud. Alas! too soon
 Allegiance sickening saw its sovereign yield,
 An angry prey to scruples not his own.
 'The loyal soldier, girt around with strength,
 Who stole from mirth and wine his blooming years,
 And seiz'd the faulchion, resolute to guard
 His sovereign's right, impalsy'd at the news,
 Finds the firm bias of his soul revers'd
 For foul desertion; drops the lifted steel,
 And quits fame's noble harvest, to expire
 The death of monks, of surfeit, and of sloth!

At length fatigued with wrongs, the servile king

Drain'd from his land its small remaining stores
 To buy remission. But could these obtain!
 No! resolute in wrongs the priests obdur'd;
 Till crawling base, to Rome's deputed slave,
 His fame, his people, and his crown, he gave.
 Mean monarch! slighted, brav'd, abhorr'd, before!

And now, appeas'd by delegated sway,
 The wily pontiff scorns not to recall
 His interdictions. Now the sacred doors
 Admit repentant multitudes, prepar'd
 To buy deceit; admit obsequious tribes
 Of satraps! princes! crawling to the shrine
 Of fainted villany! the pompous tomb
 Dazzling with gems and gold, or in a cloud
 Of incense wreath'd, amidst a drooping land
 'That sigh'd for bread! 'Tis thus the Indian clove
 Displays its verdant leaf, its crimson flower,
 And sheds its odours; while the flocks around
 Hungry and faint the barren sands explore
 In vain! nor plant nor herb endears the soil;
 Drain'd and exhaust to swell its thirsty pores,
 And furnish luxury.—Yet in vain
 Britannia strove; and whether artful Rome
 Cares'd or curs'd her, superstition rag'd
 And blinded, fetter'd, and despoil'd the land.

At length some murderous monk, with poisonous art
 Expell'd the life his brethren robb'd of peace.

Nor yet furceas'd with John's disastrous fate
 Pontific fury! English wealth exhaust,
 The sequent reign* beheld the beggar'd shore
 Grim with Italian usurers; prepar'd
 To lend, for griping unexampled hire,
 To lend—what Rome might pillage uncontroll'd.

For now with more extensive havoc rag'd
 Relentless Gregory, with a thousand arts,
 And each rapacious, born to drain the world!
 Nor shall the muse repeat how oft he blew
 The croise's trumpet; then for sums of gold
 Annull'd the vow, and bade the false alarm
 Swell the gross hoards of Henry, or his own.
 Nor shall she tell how pontiffs dar'd repeal
 The best of charters! dar'd absolve the tie
 Of British kings by legal oath restrain'd.
 Nor can she dwell on argosies of gold
 From Albion's realm to servile shores convey'd,
 Wrung from her sons, and speeded by her kings!
 Oh irksome day! when wicked thrones combine
 With papal craft, to gull their native land!

Such was our fate, while Rome's director taught
 Of subjects, born to be their monarch's prey,
 To toil for monks, for gluttony to toil,
 For vacant gluttony; extortion, fraud,
 For avarice, envy, pride, revenge, and shame!
 O doctrine breath'd from Stygian caves! exhal'd
 From inmost Erebus!—Such Henry's reign!
 Urging his loyal realm's reluctant hand
 To wield the peaceful sword, by John ere while Forc'd from his scabbard; and with burnish'd lance
 Essay the savage cure, domestic war!

And now some nobler spirits chas'd the mist
 Of general darkness. Grosted† now adorn'd
 The mitred wreath he wore, with reason's sword
 Staggering delusion's frauds; at length beneath
 Rome's interdict expiring calm, resign'd
 No vulgar soul that dar'd to heaven appeal!
 But ah this fertile glebe, this fair domain,
 Had well nigh ceded to the slothful hands
 Of monks libidinous; ere Edward's care
 The lavish hand of death-bed fear restrain'd.
 Yet was he clear of superstition's taint?
 He too, misdeemful of his wholesome law,
 Ev'n he, expiring, gave his treasur'd gold
 To fatten monks on Salem's distant soil!

Yes, the third Edward's breast, to papal sway
 So little prone, and fierce in honour's cause,
 Could superstition quell! before the towers
 Of haggard Paris, at the thunder's voice
 He drops the sword, and signs ignoble peace!

But still the night by Romish art diffus'd
 Collects her clouds, and with slow pace recedes,
 When, by soft Bourdeau's braver queen approv'd,
 Bold Wickliff rose: and while the bigot power
 Amidst her native darkness skulk'd secure,
 The demon vanish'd as he spread the day.
 So from his bosom Cacus breath'd of old
 The pitchy cloud, and in a night of smoke
 Secure a while his recreant life sustain'd;
 Till fam'd Alcides, o'er his subtlest wiles
 Victorious, cheer'd the ravag'd nations round.

Hail, honour'd Wickliff! enterprising sage!
 An Epicurus in the cause of truth!
 For 'tis not radiant suns, the jovial hours

* Henry III. who cancell'd the Magna Charta.

† Bishop of Lincoln, called Malleus Romanorum.

Of youthful spring, an ether all serene,
Nor all the verdure of Campania's vales,
Can chase religious gloom! 'Tis reason, thought,
The light, the radiance that pervades the soul,
And sheds its beams on heav'n's mysterious sway!
As yet this light but glimmer'd, and again
Error prevail'd; while kings by force uprais'd
Let loose the rage of bigots on their foes,
And seek affection by the dreadful boon
Of licens'd murder. Ev'n the kindest prince,
The most extended breast, the royal Hal!
All unrelenting heard the Lollards cry
Burst from the centre of remorseless flames;
Their shrieks endur'd! Oh stain to martial praise!
When Cobham, generous as the noble peer
That wears his honours, pay'd the fatal price
Of virtue blooming ere the storms were laid!

'Twas thus, alternate, truth's precarious flame
Decay'd or flourish'd. With malignant eye
The pontiff saw Britannia's golden fleece,
Once all his own, invest her worthier sons!
Her verdant valleys, and her fertile plains,
Yellow with grain, abjure his hateful sway!
Essay'd his utmost art, and inly own'd
No labours bore proportion to the prize.

So when the tempter view'd, with envious eye,
The first fair pattern of the female frame,
All nature's beauties in one form display'd,
And centering there, in wild amaze he stood;
Then only envying heaven's creative hand:
Wish'd to his gloomy reign his envious arts
Might win this prize, and doubled every snare.

And vain were reason, courage, learning, all,
Till power accede: till Tudor's wild caprice
Smile on their cause; Tudor, whose tyrant reign
With mental freedom crown'd, the best of kings
Might envious view, and ill prefer their own!
Then Wolfey rose, by nature form'd to seek
Ambition's trophies, by address to win,
By temper to enjoy—whose humbler birth
Taught the gay scenes of pomp to dazzle more.

Then from its towering height with horrid
found

Rush'd the proud abbey. Then the vaulted roofs,
Torn from their walls disclos'd the wanton scene
Of monkish chastity! Each angry friar
Crawl'd from his bedded strumpet, muttering low
An ineffectual curse. The pervious nooks
That, ages past, convey'd the guileful priest
To play some image on the gaping crowd,
Imbibe the novel day-light; and expose
Obvious the fraudulent enginery of Rome.
As though this opening earth to nether realms
Should flash meridian day, the hooded race
Shudder abash'd to find their cheats display'd:
And, conscious of their guilt, and pleas'd to wave
Its fearful meed, resign'd their fair domain.

Nor yet supine, nor void of rage, retir'd
The pest gigantic; whose revengeful stroke
Ting'd the red annals of Maria's reign. [priest
When from the tenderest breast each wayward
Could banish mercy and implant a fiend!
When cruelty the funeral pyre uprear'd,
And bound religion there, and fir'd the base!
When the same blaze, which on each tortur'd
Fed with luxuriant rage, in every face [limb
Triumphant faith appear'd, and smiling hope.
O blest Eliza! from thy piercing beam

Forth flew this hated fiend, the child of Rome;
Driven to the verge of Albion, linger'd there,
Then with her James receding, cast behind
One angry frown, and sought more servile climes.
Henceforth they ply'd the long-continued task
Of righteous havoc, covering distant fields
With the wrought remnants of the shatter'd pile.
While through the land the musing pilgrim sees
A tract of brighter green, and in the midst
Appears a mouldering wall, with ivy crown'd;
Or Gothic turret, pride of ancient days!
Now but of use to grace a rural scene;
To bound our vistas, and to glad the sons
Of George's reign, reserv'd for fairer times!

LOVE AND HONOUR.

"Sed neque Medorum sylvæ, ditissima terra
"Nec pulcher Ganges, atque auro turbidus Hæmus,
"Laudibus Angligenum certent: non Bactra, nec Indi,
"Totaque thuriferis Panchaia pinguis arenis."

LET the green olive glad Hesperian shores;
Her tawny citron, and her orange-groves,
These let Iberia boast; but if in vain,
To win the stranger plant's diffusive smile,
The Briton labours, yet our native minds,
Our constant bosoms, these, the dazzled world
May view with envy; these, Iberian dames
Survey with fixt esteem and fond desire.

Hapless Elvira! thy disastrous fate
May well this truth explain; nor ill adorn
The British lyre; then chiefly, if the muse,
Nor vain, nor partial, from the simple guise
Of ancient record catch the pensive lay;
And in less grovelling accents give to fame.
Elvira! loveliest maid! th' Iberian realm
Could boast no purer breast, no sprightlier mind,
No race more splendid, and no form so fair.
Such was the chance of war, this peerless maid
In life's luxuriant bloom, enrich'd the spoil
Of British victors, victory's noblest pride!
She, she alone, amid the wailful train
Of captive maids assign'd to Henry's care;
Lord of her life, her fortune, and her fame!

He, generous youth, with no penurious hand,
The tedious moments that unjoyous roll
Where freedom's cheerful radiance shines no more,
Essay'd to soften; conscious of the pang
That beauty feels, to waste its fleeting hours
In some dim fort, by foreign rule restrain'd,
Far from the haunts of men, or eye of day!

Sometimes, to cheat her bosom of its cares,
Her kind protector number'd o'er the toils
Himself had worn: the frowns of angry seas,
Or hostile rage, or faithless friend, more fell
Than storm or foe: if haply she might find
Her cares diminish'd; fruitless fond essay!
Now to her lovely hand, with modest awe
The tender lute he gave: she not averse
Nor destitute of skill, with willing hand
Call'd forth angelic strains; the sacred debt
Of gratitude, she said; whose just commands
Still might her hand with equal pride obey!

Nor to the melting sounds the nymph refus'd
Her vocal art; harmonious, as the strain
Of some imprison'd lark, who, daily cheer'd

By guardian cares, repays them with a song:
Nor droops, nor deems sweet liberty resign'd.

The song, not artless, had she fram'd to paint
Disastrous passion; how, by tyrant laws
Of idiot custom sway'd, some soft-ey'd fair
Lov'd only one: nor dar'd that love reveal!
How the soft anguish banish'd from her cheek
The damask rose full-blown; a fever came;
And from her bosom forc'd the plaintive tale.
Then, swift as light, he sought the love-lorn maid,
But vainly sought her; torn by swifter fate
To join the tenants of the myrtle shade,
Love's mournful victims on the plains below.

Sometimes, as fancy spoke the pleasing task,
She taught her artful needle to display
The various pride of spring: then swift up-sprung
Thickets of myrtle, eglantine, and rose:
There might you see, on gentle toils intent,
A train of busy loves: some pluck the flower,
Some twine the garland, some with grave grimace
Around a vacant warrior cast the wreath.
'Twas paint, 'twas life, and sure to piercing eyes
The warrior's face depictur'd Henry's mien.

Now had the generous chief with joy perus'd
The royal scroll, which to their native home
Their ancient rights, uninjur'd, unredeem'd,
Restor'd the captives. Forth with rapid haste
To glad his fair Elvira's ear, he sprung;
Fir'd by the bliss he panted to convey;
But fir'd in vain! Ah! what was his amaze,
His fond distress, when o'er her pallid face
Dejection reign'd, and from her lifeless hand
Down dropt the myrtle's fair unfinish'd flower!
Speechless she stood; at length with accents faint,
"Well may my native shore, she said, resound
"Thy monarch's praise; and ere Elvira prove
"Of thine forgetful, flowers shall cease to feel
"The fostering breeze, and nature change her laws."

And now the grateful edict wide alarm'd
The British host. Around the smiling youths
Call'd to their native scenes, with willing haste
Their fleet unmoor; impatient of the love
That weds each bosom to its native soil.
The patriot passion strong in every clime,
How justly theirs, who find no foreign sweets
To dissipate their loves, or match their own.

Not so Elvira! she, disastrous maid,
Was doubly captive! power nor chance could loose
The subtle bands; she lov'd her generous foe.
She, where her Henry dwelt, her Henry smil'd,
Could term her native shore; her native shore
By him deserted, some unfriendly strand,
Strange, bleak, forlorn! a desert waste and wild.

The fleet careen'd, the wind propitious fill'd
The swelling sails, the glittering transports wav'd
Their pennants gay, and halcyon's azure wing
With flight auspicious skim'd the placid main.

On her lone couch in tears Elvira lay,
And chid th' officious wind, the tempting sea,
And wish'd a storm as merciless, as tore
Her labouring bosom. Fondly now she strove
To banish passion; now the vassal days,
The captive moments that so smoothly past,
By many an art recall'd; now from her lute
With trembling fingers call'd the favourite sounds
Which Henry deign'd to praise; and now essay'd
With mimic chains of filken fillets wove

To paint her captive state; if any fraud
Might to her love the pleasing scenes prolong,
And with the dear idea feast the soul.

But now the chief return'd; prepar'd to launch
On ocean's willing breast, and bid adieu
To his fair prisoner. She, soon as she heard
His hated errand, now no more conceal'd
The raging flame; but with a spreading blush
And rising sigh, the latent pang disclos'd.

"Yes, generous youth! I see thy bosom glow
With virtuous transport, that the task is thine
To solve my chains; and to my weeping friends,
And every longing relative, restore
A soft-ey'd maid, a mild offenceless prey!
But know, my soldier, never youthful mind,
Torn from the lavish joys of wild expence
By him he loath'd, and in a dungeon bound
To languish out his bloom, could catch the pains
This ill-starr'd freedom gives my tortur'd mind.

What call I freedom? is it that these limbs,
From rigid bolts secure, may wander far,
From him I love? Alas! ere I may boast
That sacred blessing, some superior power
To mortal kings, to sublunary thrones,
Must loose my passion, must unchain my soul.
Ev'n that I loath; all liberty I loath!
But most the joyless privilege to gaze
With cold indifference, where desert is love.

True, I was born an alien to those eyes
I ask alone to please; my fortune's crime!
And ah! this flatter'd form by dress endear'd
To Spanish eyes, by dress may thine offend,
Whilst I, ill-fated maid! ordain'd to strive
With custom's load, beneath its weight expire.

Yet Henry's beauties knew in foreign garb
To vanquish me; his form, howe'er disguis'd,
To me were fatal! no fantastic robe
That e'er caprice invented, custom wore,
Or folly smil'd on, could eclipse thy charms.
Perhaps by birth decreed, by fortune plac'd
Thy country's foe, Elvira's warmest plea
Seems but the subtler accent fraud inspires;
My tenderest glances, but the specious flowers
That shade the viper while she plots her wound.
And can the trembling candidate of love
Awake thy fears? and can a female breast,
By ties of grateful duty bound, ensnare?
Is there no brighter mien, no softer smile
For love to wear, to dark deceit unknown?
Heav'n search my soul, and if through all its cells

Lurk the pernicious drop of poisonous guile;
Full on my fenceless head its phial'd wrath
May fate exhaust; and for my happiest hour
Exalt the vengeance I prepare for thee!

Ah me! nor Henry's, nor his country's foe,
On thee I gaz'd, and reason soon dispell'd
Dim error's gloom, and to thy favour'd isle
Assign'd its total merit, unrestrain'd.
Oh! lovely region to the candid eye!
'Twas there my fancy saw the virtues dwell,
The loves, the graces play; and bless'd the soil
That nurtur'd thee! for sure the virtues form'd
Thy generous breast; the loves, the graces plann'd
Thy shapely limbs. Relation, birth essay'd
Their partial power in vain: again I gaz'd,
And Albion's isle appear'd, amidst a tract
Of savage wastes, the darling of the skies!

And thou by nature form'd, by fate assign'd,
To paint the genius of thy native shore.

'Tis true, with flowers, with many a dazzling
Of burnish'd plants to lure a female eye, [scene
Iberia glows: but ah! the genial sun,
That gilds the lemon's fruit, or scents the flower,
On Spanish minds, a nation's nobler boast!
Beams forth ungentle influences. There
Sits jealousy enthron'd, and at each ray
Exultant lights his slow consuming fires.
Not such thy charming region; long before
My sweet experience taught me to decide
Of English worth, the sound had pleas'd mine ear.
Is there that savage coast, that rude sojourn,
Stranger to British worth? the worth which forms

The kindest friends; the most tremendous foes;
First, best supports of liberty and love!
No, let subjected India, while she throws
O'er Spanish deeds the veil, your praise resound.
Long as I heard, or ere in story read
Of English fame, my bias'd partial breast
Wish'd them success, and, happiest she, I cry'd,
Of woman happiest she, who shares the love,
The fame, the virtues, of an English lord!
And now what shall I say? blest be the hour
Your fair-built vessels touch'd th' Iberian shore;
Blest did I say the time? if I may bless
That lov'd event, let Henry's smiles declare.
Our hearts and cities won, will Henry's youth
Forego its nobler conquest? will he slight
The soft endearments of the lovelier spoil?
And yet Iberia's sons, with every vow
Of lasting faith, have sworn these humble charms
Were not excell'd; the source of all their pains,
And love her just desert, who sues for love;
But sues to thee, while natives sigh in vain.

Perhaps in Henry's eye (for vulgar minds
Dissent from his) it spreads an hateful stain
On honest fame, amid his train to bear
A female friend. Then learn, my gentle youth!
Not love himself, with all the pointed pains
That store his quiver, shall seduce my soul
From honour's laws. Elvira once deny'd
A consort's name, more swift than lightning flies,
When elements discordant vex the sky,
Shall blushing from the form she loves retire.

Yet if the specious wish, the vulgar voice
Has titled prudence, sways a soul like thine,
In gems or gold what proud Iberian dame
Eclipses me? Nor paint the dreary storms [deep,
Or hair-breadth 'scapes that haunt the boundless
And force from tender eyes the silent tear;
When memory to the pensive maid suggests,
In full contrast, the safe domestic scene
For these resign'd. Beyond the frantic rage
Of conquering heroes brave, the female mind,
When steel'd by love, in love's most horrid way
Beholds not danger, or beholding scorns,
Heaven take my life, but let it crown my love."

She ceas'd, and ere his words her fate decreed,
Impatient watch'd the language of his eye:
'There pity dwelt, and from its tender sphere
Sent looks of love, and faithless hopes inspir'd.

"Forgive me, generous maid, the youth re-
turn'd,
If, by thy accents charm'd, thus long I bore
To let such sweetness plead, alas! in vain!

VOL. IX.

Thy virtue merits more than crowns can yield
Of solid bliss, or happiest love bestow.
But e'er from native shores I plough'd the main,
To one dear maid, by virtue and by charms
Alone endear'd, my plighted vows I gave;
To guard my faith, whatever chance should wait,
My warring sword: if conquest fame, and spoil,
Grac'd my return, before her feet to pour
The glittering treasure, and the laurel wreath;
Enjoying conquest then, and fame, and spoil,
If fortune frown'd adverse, and death forbade
The blissful union, with my latest breath
To dwell on Medway's and Maria's name.
This ardent vow deep-rooted, from my soul
No dangers tore; this vow my bosom fir'd
To conquer danger, and the spoil enjoy.
Her shall I leave, with fair events elate,
Who crown'd mine humblest fortune with her love?

Her shall I leave, who now perchance alone
Climbs the proud cliff, and chides my slow return?
And shall that vessel, whose approaching sails
Shall swell her breast with ecstasies, convey
Death to her hopes, and anguish to her soul?
No! may the deep my villain-corse devour,
If all the wealth Iberian mines conceal,
If all the charms Iberian maids disclose,
If thine, Elvira, thine, uniting all!
Thus far prevail—nor can thy virtuous breast
Demand, what honour, faith, and love denies."

Oh! happy she, rejoin'd the pensive maid,
Who shares thy fame, thy virtue, and thy love!
And be she happy! thy distinguish'd choice
Declares her worth, and vindicates her claim.
Farewell my luckless hopes, my flattering dreams
Of rapturous days! my guilty suit, farewell!
Yet, fond howe'er my plea, or deep the wound
That waits my fame, let not the random shaft
Of censure pierce with me th' Iberian dames!
They love with caution, and with happier stars.
And oh! by pity mov'd, restrain the taunts
Of levity, nor brand Elvira's flame;
By merit rais'd; by gratitude approv'd;
By hope confirm'd; with artless truth reveal'd;
Let, let me say, but for one matchless maid
Of happier birth, with mutual ardor crown'd.

These radiant gems, which burnish happiness,
But mock misfortune, to thy favourite's hand
With care convey. And well may such adorn
Her cheerful front, who finds in thee alone
The source of every transport; but disgrace
My pensive breast, which doom'd to lasting woe,
In thee the source of every bliss resigns.

And now farewell, thou darling youth! the gem
Of English merit! peace, content, and joy,
And tender hopes, and young desires, farewell!
Attend, ye smiling train, this gallant mind
Back to his native shores; there sweetly smooth
His evening pillow; dance around his groves;
And, where he treads, with violets paint his way.
But leave Elvira! leave her, now no more
Your frail companion! in the sacred cells
Of some lone cloister let me shroud my shame:
There, to the matin bell, obsequious, pour
My constant orisons. The wanton loves,
And gay desires, shall spy the glimmering towers,
And wing their flight aloof: but rest confirm'd,
That never shall Elvira's tongue conclude

T t

Her shortest prayer, ere Henry's dear success
The warmest accent of her zeal employ."

Thus spoke the weeping fair, whose artless
Impartial scorn'd to model her esteem [mind
By native customs; dress, and face, and air,
And manners, less; nor yet resolv'd in vain.
He, bound by prior love, the solemn vow
Given and receiv'd, to soft compassion gave
A tender tear; then with that kind adieu
Esteem could warrant, weary'd heaven with prayers

To shield that tender breast he left forlorn.

He ceas'd, and to the cloister's pensive scene
Elvira shap'd her solitary way.

THE SCHOOL-MISTRESS.

IN IMITATION OF SPENSER.

What particulars in Spenser were imagined most proper for the author's imitation on this occasion, are his language, his simplicity, his manner of description, and a peculiar tenderness of sentiment remarkable throughout his works.

Ah me! full sorely is my heart forlorn,
To think how modest worth neglected lies;
While partial fame doth with her blasts adorn
Such deeds alone, as pride and pomp disguise;
Deeds of ill sort, and mischievous emprise:
Lend me thy clarion, goddess! let me try
To sound the praise of merit, ere it dies;
Such as I oft have chaunced to espy,
Lost in the dreary shades of dull obscurity.

In every village mark'd with little spire,
Embower'd in trees, and hardly known to fame,
There dwells, in lowly shed, and mean attire,
A matron old, whom we school-mistress name;
Who boasts unruly brats with birch to tame;
They griev'd sore, in piteous durance pent,
Aw'd by the power of this relentless dame;
And oft-times, on vagaries idly bent, [shent.
For unkempt hair, on task unconn'd, are sorely

And all in sight doth rise a birchin tree,
Which learning near her little dome did stowe;
Whilom a twig of small regard to see,
Though now so wide its waving branches flow;
And work the simple vassals mickle woe;
For not a wind might curl the leaves that blew,
But their limbs shudder'd, and their pulse beat
low;

And as they look'd they found their horror grew,
And shap'd it into rods, and tingled at the view.

So have I seen (who has not, may conceive),
A lifeless phantom near a garden plac'd;
So doth it wanton birds of peace bereave,
Of sport, of song, of pleasure, of repast;
They start, they stare, they wheel they look aghast;

Sad servitude! such comfortless annoy
May no bold Briton's riper age e'er taste!
No superstition clog his dance of joy,
No vision empty, vain, his native bliss destroy.

Near to this dome is found a patch so green,
On which the tribe their gambles do display;
And at the door imprisoning board is seen,
Lest weakly wights of smaller size should stray;
Eager, perdie, to bask in sunny day!
The noises intermix'd, which thence resound,
Do learning's little tenement betray:
Where sits the dame, disguis'd in look profound,
And eyes her fairy throng, and turns her wheel around.

Her cap, far whiter than the driven snow,
Emblem right meet of decency does yield:
Her apron dy'd in grain, as blue, I trowe,
As is the hare-bell that adorns the field:
And in her hand, for sceptre, she does wield
Tway birchen sprays; with anxious fear en-
twin'd,
With dark distrust, and sad repentance fill'd;
And stedfast hate, and sharp affliction join'd,
And fury uncontroll'd, and chastisement unkind.

Few but have ken'd, in semblance meet pour-
The childish faces of old Eol's train; [tray'd,
Libs, Notus, Auster: these in frowns array'd,
How then would fare or earth, or sky, or main,
Were the stern god to give his slaves the rein?
And were not she rebellious breasts to quell,
And were not she her statutes to maintain,
The cot no more, I ween, were deem'd the cell,
Where comely peace of mind, and decent order dwell.

A russet stole was o'er her shoulders thrown:
A russet kirtle fenc'd the nipping air;
'Twas simple russet, but it was her own;
'Twas her own country bred the flock so fair!
'Twas her own labour did the fleece prepare;
And, sooth to say, her pupils, rang'd around,
Through pious awe, did term it passing rare;
For they in gaping wonderment abound,
And think, no doubt, she been the greatest wight on ground.

Albeit ne flattery did corrupt her truth,
Ne pompous title did debauch her ear;
Goody, good-woman, gossip, n'aunt, forsooth,
Or dame, the sole additions she did hear;
Yet these she challeng'd, these she held right
dear:

Ne would esteem him act as mought behove,
Who should not honour'd eld with these revere:
For never title yet so mean could prove,
But there was eke a mind which did that title love.

One ancient hen she took delight to feed,
The plodding pattern of the busy dame;
Which, ever and anon, impell'd by need,
Into her school, begirt with chickens, came;
Such favour did her past deportment claim;
And, if neglect had lavish'd on the ground
Fragment of bread, she would collect the same;
For well she knew, and quaintly could expound,
What sin it were to waste the smallest crumb she found.

Herbs too she knew, and well of each could speak
That in her garden sip'd the silvery dew;
Where no vain flower disclos'd a gawdy streak;
But herbs for use, and physic, not a few,

Of grey renown, within those borders grew;
The tufted basil, pun-provoking thyme,
Fresh baum, and marygold of cheerful hue:
The lowly gill, that never dares to climb;
And more I fain would sing, disdaining here to rhyme.

Yet euphrasy may not be left unsung,
That gives dim eyes to wander leagues around;
And pungent radish, biting infants tongue;
And plantain ribb'd, that heals the reaper's wound;
And marjoram sweet, in shepherd's posie found;
And lavender, whose spikes of azure bloom
Shall be, ere-while, in arid bundles bound,
To lurk amidst the labours of her loom,
And crown her kerchiefs clean, with mickle rare perfume,

And here trim rosemarine, that whilom crown'd
The daintiest garden of the proudest peer;
Ere, driven from its envy'd site, it found
A sacred shelter for its branches here; [pear.
Where edg'd with gold its glittering skirts ap-
Oh wassel days! O customs meet and well!
Ere this was banish'd from its lofty sphere:
Simplicity then sought this humble cell, [dwell.
Nor ever would she more with thane and lordling

Here oft the dame, on Sabbath's decent eve,
Hymned such psalms as Sternhold forth did mete,
If winter 'twere, she to her hearth did cleave,
But in her garden found a summer-seat:
Sweet melody! to hear her then repeat
How Israel's sons, beneath a foreign king,
While taunting foe-men did a song entreat,
All, for the nonce, untuning every string,
Uphung their useless lyres—small heart had they to sing.

For she was just, and friend to virtuous lore,
And pass'd much time in truly virtuous deed;
And, in those elfins' ears, would oft deplore
The times, when truth by popish rage did bleed;
And tortious death was true devotion's meed;
And simple faith in iron chains did mourn,
That nould on wooden image place her creed;
And lawny faints in smouldering flames did burn:

Ah! dearest lord, forefend, think days should e'er

In elbow-chair, like that of Scottish stem
By the sharp tooth of cankering eld defac'd,
In which, when he receives his diadem,
Our sovereign prince and liefeft liege is plac'd,
The matron fate; and some with rank she grac'd,
(The source of children's and of courtier's pride!)

Redress'd affronts, for vile affronts there pass'd;
And warn'd them not the fretful to deride,
But love each other dear, whatever them betide,

Right well she knew each temper to descry;
To thwart the proud, and the submits to raise;
Some with vile copper-prize exalt on high,
And some entice with pittance small of praise;
And other some with baleful sprig she 'frays:
Ev'n absent, she the reins of power doth hold,
While with quaint arts the giddy crowd she sways;

Forewarn'd, if little bird their pranks behold,
'Twill whisper in her ear, and all the scene unfold.

Lo now with state she utters the command!
Eftsoons the urchins to their tasks repair;
Their books of stature small they take in hand,
Which with pellucid horn secured are;
To save from finger wet the letters fair:
The work so gay, that on their back is seen,
St. George's high achievements does declare;
On which thilk wight that has y-gazing been,
Kens the forthcoming rod, unpleasing sight, I ween!

Ah luckless he, and born beneath the beam
Of evil star! it irks me whilst I write!
As erst the * bard by Mulla's silver stream,
Oft, as he told of deadly dolorous plight,
Sigh'd as he sung, and did in tears indite.
For brandishing the rod, she doth begin
To loose the brogues, the stripling's late delight!
And down they drop; appears his dainty skin,
Fair as the furry-coat of whitest ermin.

O ruthless scene! when from a mock obscure,
His little sister doth his peril see:
All playful as she fate, she grows demure;
She finds full soon her wonted spirits flee;
She meditates a prayer to set him free:
Nor gentle pardon could this dame deny,
(If gentle pardon could with dames agree)
To her sad grief that swells in either eye,
And wings her so that all for pity she could die.

No longer can she now her shrieks command;
And hardly she forbears, through awful fear,
To rushen forth, and, with presumptuous hand,
To stay harsh justice in its mid career.
On thee she calls, on thee her parent dear!
(Ah! too remote to ward the shameful blow!)
She sees no kind domestic visage near,
And soon a flood of tears begins to flow;
And gives a loose at last to unavailing woe.

But ah! what pen his piteous plight may trace?
Or what device his loud laments explain?
The form uncouth of his disguised face?
The pallid hue that dyes his locks amain?
The plenteous shower that does his cheek distain?
When he, in abject wise, implores the dame,
Ne hopeth aught of sweet reprieve to gain;
Or when from high she levels well her aim,
And, through the thatch, his cries each falling stroke proclaim.

The other tribe, aghast, with fore dismay,
Attend, and conn their tasks with mickle care:
By turns, astony'd, every twig survey, [ware;
And, from their fellows' hateful wounds, be-
Knowing, I twist, how each the same may share;
Till fear has taught them a performance meet,
And to the well-known chest the dame repair;
Whence oft with sugar'd cates she doth them greet, [sweet.
And ginger-bread y-rare; now certes, doubly

See to their seats they hye with merry glee,
And in befeemly order sitten there;
All but the wight of bum y-galled, he, [chair;
Abhorreth bench and stool, and fourm, and

(This hand in mouth y-fix'd, that rends his hair;) [breast,
And eke with snubs profound, and heaving
Convulsions intermitting, does declare
His grievous wrong; his dame's unjust behest;
And scorns her offer'd love, and shuns to be caress'd.

His face besprent with liquid crystal shines,
His blooming face that seems a purple flower,
Which low to earth its dropping head declines,
All smear'd and fully'd by a vernal shower.
O the hard bosoms of despotic power!
All, all, but she, the author of his shame,
All, all, but she, regret this mournful hour:
Yet hence the youth, and hence the flower,
shall claim,
If so I deem aright, transcending worth and fame.

Behind some door, in melancholy thought,
Mindless of food, he, dreary caitiff! pines;
Ne for his fellows joyance careth aught,
But to the wind all merriment resigns;
And deems its shame if he to peace inclines;
And many a fullen look asfance is sent,
Which for his dames annoyance he designs;
And still the more to pleasure him she's bent,
The more doth he, perverse, her haviour past resent.

Ah me! how much I fear lest pride it be!
But if that pride it be, which thus inspires,
Beware, ye dames, with nice discernment see,
Ye quench not too the sparks of nobler fires:
Ah! better far than all the muses' lyres,
All coward arts, is valour's generous heat;
The firm fixt breast which fit and right requires,
Like Vernon's patriot soul; more justly great
Than craft that pimps for ill, or flowery false deceit;

Yet, nurs'd with skill, what dazzling fruits appear!
Ev'n now sagacious foresight points to show
A little bench of heedless bishops here;
And there a chancellor in embryo,
Or bard sublime, if bard may e'er be so, [die!
As Milton, Shakspeare, names that ne'er shall
Though now he crawl along the ground so low,
Nor weeting how the muse should soar on high,
Wisheth, poor starveling elf! his paper kite may fly.

And this perhaps, who, censuring the design,
Low lays the house which that of cards doth
Shall Dennis be! if rigid fate incline, [build,
And many an epic to his rage shall yield;
And many a poet quit th' Aonian field;
And, sour'd by age, profound he shall appear,
As he who now with 'Ydainsul fury thrill'd
Surveys mine work; and levels many a sneer,
And furls his wrinkly front, and cries, "What
" fluff is here?"

But now Dan Phœbus gains the middle skie,
And liberty unbars her prison-door;
And like a rushing torrent out they fly,
And now the grassy cirque had cover'd o'er
With boisterous revel-rout and wild uproar;
A thousand ways in wanton rings they run,
Heaven shield their short-liv'd pastimes, I im-
plore!

For well may freedom erst so dearly won,
Appear to British elf more gladsome than the fun.

Enjoy, poor imps! enjoy your sportive trade,
And chase gay flies, and cull the fairest flowers;
For when my bones in grass-green sods are laid;
For never may ye taste more careless hours
In knightly castles or in ladies' bowers.
O vain to seek delight in earthly thing! [ers;
But most in courts where proud ambition tow-
Deluded wight! who weens fair peace can spring

Beneath the pompous dome of kefar or of king.

See in each sprite some various bent appear!
These rudely carol most incondite lay; [leer
Those sauntering on the green, with jocund
Salute the stranger passing on his way;
Some builden fragile tenements of clay;
Some to the standing lake their courses bend,
With pebbles smooth at duck and drake to play;
Thilk to the huxter's savory cottage tend,
In pastry kings and queens th' allotted mite to spend.

Here, as each season yields a different store,
Each season's stores in order ranged been;
Apples with cabbage-net y-cover'd o'er,
Galling full sore th' unmoney'd wight, are seen;
And goose-brie clad in rivery red or green;
And here of lovely dye, the catharine pear,
Fine pear! as lovely for thy juice, I ween:
O may no wight e'er pennyless come there,
Lest smit with ardent love he pine with hopeless
care!

See! cherries here, ere cherries yet around,
With thread so white in tempting posies ty'd,
Scattering like blooming maid their glances
round,
With pamper'd look draw little eyes aside;
And must be bought, though penury betide.
The plumb all azure and the nut all brown,
And here each season do those cakes abide,
Whose honour'd names * th' inventive city own,
Rendering through Britain's isle Salopia's praises
known.

Admir'd Salopia! that with venial pride
Eyes her bright form in Severn's ambient wave,
Fam'd for her loyal cares in perils try'd,
Her daughters lovely, and her striplings brave:
Ah! midst the rest, may flowers adorn his grave,
Whose art did first these dulcet cates display!
A motive fair to learning's imps he gave,
Who cheerless o'er her darkling region stray;
Till reason's morn arise, and light them on their way.

E P I T A P H †.

HERE, here she lies a budding rose,
Blasted before its bloom,
Whose innocence did sweets disclose
Beyond that flower's perfume.
To those who for her death are griev'd,
This consolation's given;
She's from the storms of life reliev'd
To them more bright in heaven.

INSCRIPTIONS.

I. ON A TABLET AGAINST A ROOT-HOUSE.

HERE, in cool grot and mossy cell,
We rural fays and fairies dwell;
Though rarely seen by mortal eye,
When the pale moon, ascending high,
Darts through yon lines her quivering beams,
We frisk it near these crystal streams.

Her beams, reflected from the wave,
Afford the light our revels crave;
The turf, with daisies broider'd o'er
Exceeds, we wot, the Parian floor;
Nor yet for artful strains we call,
But listen to the water's fall.

Would you then taste our tranquil scene,
Be sure your bosoms be serene;
Devoid of hate, devoid of strife,
Devoid of all that poisons life:
And much it 'vails you in their place,
To graft the love of human race.

And tread with awe these favour'd bowers,
Nor wound the shrubs, nor bruise the flowers;
So may your path with sweets abound;
So may your couch with rest be crown'd!
But harm betide the wayward swain,
Who dares our hallow'd haunts profane!

COME then, my friend, thy Sylvan shade display,
Come hear thy Faunus tune his rustic lay;
Ah, rather come, and in these dells disown
The care of other strains, and tune thine own.

IV. ON THE BACK OF A GOTHIC SEAT.

SHEPHERD, would'st thou hear obtain
Pleasure unalloy'd with pain?
Joy that suits the rural sphere?
Gentle shepherd lend an ear.

Learn to relish calm delight,
Verdant vales and fountains bright;
Trees that nod on sloping hills,
Caves that echo tinkling rills.

If thou canst no charm disclose
In the simplest bud that blows;

Go, forsake thy plain and fold,
Join the crowd, and toil for gold.

Tranquil pleasures never cloy;
Banish each tumultuous joy:
All but love—for love inspires
Fonder wishes, warmer fires.

Love and all its joys be thine—
Yet, ere thou the reigns resign,
Hear what reason seems to say,
Hear attentive, and obey.

"Crimson leaves the rose adorn,
"But beneath them lurks a thorn;
"Fair and flowery is the brake
"Yet it hides the vengeful snake

"Think not she, whose empty pride
"Dares the fleecy garb deride,
"Think not she, who, light and vain,
"Scorns the sheep can love the swain.

"Artless deed and simple dress
"Mark the chosen shepherdess;
"Thoughts by decency control'd,
"Well conceiv'd and freely told.

"Sense that shuns each conscious air,
"Wit, that falls ere well aware;
"Generous pity, prone to sigh
"If her kid or lambkin die.

"Let not lucre, let not pride,
"Draw thee from such charms aside;
"Have not those their proper sphere?
"Gentler passions triumph here.

"See to sweeten thy repose;
"The blossom buds, the fountain flows;
"Lo! to crown thy healthful board,
"All that milk and fruits afford.

"Seek no more—the rest is vain;
"Pleasure ending soon in pain:
"Anguish lightly gilded o'er:
"Close thy wish, and seek no more."

From social meads and open skies;
Pleas'd by this rill her course to steer,
And hide her sapphire plumage here.

The trout, bedropt with crimson stains,
Forfakes the river's proud domains;
Forfakes the sun's unwelcome gleam,
To lurk within this humble stream.

And sure I hear the Naiad say,
Flow, flow, my stream, this devious way,
Though lovely soft thy murmurs are,
Thy waters lovely cool and fair.

Flow, gentle stream, nor let the vain
Thy small unsully'd stores disdain:
Nor let the pensive sage repine,
Whose latent course resembles thine.

XIX. ON AN URN IN HALES-OWEN CHURCH,

In Memory of Shenstone.

BY MR. GRAVES.

WHOE'ER thou art, with reverence tread

These sacred mansions of the dead!

Not that the monumental bust

Or sumptuous tomb, here guards the dust

Of rich or great:—let wealth, rank, birth

Sleep undistinguish'd in the earth.

This simple urn records a name

Which shines with more exalted fame.

Reader! if genius, taste refin'd

A native elegance of mind.

If virtue, science, manly sense,

If wit that never gave offence,

The clearest head, the tenderest heart

In thy esteem e'er claim'd a part,

Ah! smite thy breast, and drop a tear,

For know thy Shenstone's dust lies here.

R. G.

That she triumphant claims the total plan,
 And, with fresh pride, adopts the work of man.

TO WILLIAM SHENSTONE, ESQ.

At the Leafowes.

BY MR. GRAVES.

" Vellem in amicitia sic erraremus!" HOR.

SEE! the tall youth, by partial fate's decree,
 To affluence born, and from restraint set free.

Eager he seeks the scenes of gay resort,

The mall, the rout, the play-house, and the court;

T t iij

Soon for some varnish'd nymph of dubious fame,
Or powder'd peerefs, counterfeits a flame.
Behold him now, enraptur'd, swear and sigh,
Dress, dance, drink, revel, all he knows not why;
Till, by kind fate restor'd to country air,
He marks the roses of some rural fair:
Smit with her unaffected native charms,
A real passion soon his bosom warms:
And, wak'd from idle dreams, he takes a wife,
And tastes the genuine happiness of life.

Thus, in the vacant season of the year,
Some Templar gay begins his wild career.
From seat to seat o'er pompous scenes he flies,
Views all with equal wonder and surprise;
Till, sick of domes, arcades, and temples grown,
He hies fatigued, not satisfied, to town
Yet if some kinder genius point his way
To where the muses o'er thy Leasowes stray,
Charm'd with the sylvan beauties of the place,
Where art assumes the sweets of nature's face,
Each hill, each dale, each consecrated grove,
Each lake, and falling stream, his rapture move.
Like the sage captive in Calypso's grott,
The cares, the pleasures, of the world forgot,
Of calm content he hails the genuine sphere,
And longs to dwell a blissful hermit here.

VERSES RECEIVED BY THE POST,

FROM A LADY UNKNOWN, 1761.

HEALTH to the bard in Leasowes' happy groves;
Health, and sweet converse with the muse he loves!

The humblest votary of the tuneful Nine,
With trembling hand, attempts her artless line,
In numbers such as untaught nature brings;
As slow, spontaneous, like thy native springs.

But ah! what airy forms around me rise?
The russet mountain glows with richer dyes;
In circling dance a pigmy crowd appear,
And hark! an infant voice salutes my ear:
'Mortal, thy aim we know, thy task approve;
'His merit honour, and his genius love;
'For us what verdant carpets has he spread,
'Where nightly we our mystic mazes tread!
'For us, each shady grove and rural seat,
'His falling streams and flowing numbers sweet!
'Didst thou not mark, amid the winding dell,
'What tuneful verse adorns the mossy cell?
'There every fairy of our sprightly train
'Resort, to bless the woodland and the plain.
'There, as we move, unbidden beauties glow,
'The green turf brightens, and the violets blow;
'And there with thoughts sublime we bless the swain,

'Nor we inspire, nor he attends, in vain.
'Go, simple rhymers! bear this message true;
'The truths that fairies dictate none shall rue.
'Say to the Bard in Leasowes' happy grove,
'Whom Dryads honour, and whom Fairies love---
'Content thyself no longer that thy lays,
'By others foster'd, lend to others praise;
'No longer to the favouring world refuse
'The welcome treasures of thy polish'd muse;
'The scatter'd blooms, that boast thy valued
name,
'Collect, unite, and give the wreath to fame:

'Ne'er can thy virtues, or thy verse, engage
'More solid praise than in this happiest age,
'When sense and merit's cherish'd by the throne,
'And each illustrious privilege their own.
'Though modest be thy gentle muse, I ween,
'Oh, lead her blushing from the daisy'd green,
'A fit attendant on Britannia's Queen."

Ye sportive elves, as faithful I relate
Th' intrusted mandates of your fairy state,
Visit these wilds again with nightly care;
So shall my kine, of all the herd, repair
In healthful plight to fill the copious pail!
My sheep lie pent with safety in the dale:
My poultry fear no robber in the roost,
My linen more than common whiteness boast:
Let order, peace, and housewifery be mine;
Shenston, be fancy, fame, and fortune thine.

COTSWOLDIA.

ON THE DISCOVERY OF AN ECHO AT EDGBASTON.

BY ———.

HA! what art thou, whose voice unknown
Pours on these plains its tender moan?
Art thou the nymph in Shenstone's dale,
Who dost with plaintive note bewail
That he forsakes th' Aonian maids,
To court inconstant rills and shades?
Mourn not, sweet nymphs—alas, in vain
Do they invite, and thou complain—

Yet, while he woo'd the gentle throng,
With liquid lay and melting song,
The listening herd around him stray'd,
In wanton frisk the lambkins play'd,
And every Naiad ceas'd to lave
Her azure limbs amid the wave.
The graces danc'd; the rosy band
Of smiles and loves went hand in hand;
And purple pleasures strew'd the way
With sweetest flowers: and every ray
Of each fond muse, with rapture fir'd,
To glowing thought his breast inspir'd.
The hills rejoic'd, the valleys rung,
All nature smil'd, while Shenstone sung.

So charm'd his lay; but now no more---
Ah! why dost thou repeat---"no more?"
Ev'n now he hies to deck the grove,
To deck the scene the muses love;
And soon again will own their sway,
And thou resound the peerless lay,
And with immortal numbers fill
Each rocky cave and vocal hill.

TO MR. R. D.

ON THE DEATH OF MR. SHENSTONE.

"Thee, shepherd, thee, the woods and desert
"caves, [grown,
"With wild thyme and the gladdening vine o'er-
"And all their echoes mourn." MILT.

'Tis past! my friend; the transient scene is clos'd!
The fairy pile, th' enchanted vision rais'd
By Damon's magic skill, is lost in air!
What though the lawns and pendant woods remain,

Each tinkling stream, each rushing cataract,
With lapse incessant echoes through the dale?
Yet what avails the lifeless landscape now?
The charm's dissolv'd; the genius of the wood,
Alas! is flown---for Damon is no more.

As when from fair Lyceum crown'd with pines,
Or Mænalus with leaves autumnal strew'd,
The tuneful Pan retires; the vocal hills
Resound no more, and all Arcadia mourns.

Yet here we fondly dreamt of lasting joys:
Here we had hop'd, from noisy throngs retir'd,
To drink large draughts of friendship's cordial stream;

In sweet oblivion wrapt, by Damon's verse,
And social converse, many a summer's day.

Romantic wish! In vain frail mortals trace
Th' imperfect sketch of human bliss---whilst yet
Th' enraptur'd fire his well-plann'd structure
Majestic rising 'midst his infant groves: [views,
Sees the dark laurel spread its glossy shade,
Its languid bloom the purple lilach blend,
Or pale laburnum drop its pensile chain:
Death spreads the fatal shaft, and bids his heir
Transplant the cypress round his father's tomb.

Oh! teach me then, like you, my friend, to raise

To moral truths my groveling song; for, ah!
Too long, by lawless fancy led astray,
Of nymphs and groves I've dreamt, and dancing fawns,

Or Naiad leaning o'er her tinkling urn.
Oh! could I learn to sanctify my strains
With hymns, like those by tuneful Meyrick sung--
Or rather catch the melancholy sounds
From Warton's reed, or Mason's lyre---to paint
The sudden gloom that damps my soul---But see!
Melpomene herself has snatch'd the pipe,
With which sad Lyttelton his Lucia mourn'd;
And plaintive cries, My Shenstone is no more!

R. GRAVES.

VERSES

*Written at the gardens of William Shenstone,
Esq. near Birmingham, 1756.*

"Ille terrarum mihi præter omnes
"Angulus ridet." HOR.

WOULD you these lov'd recesses trace,
And view fair nature's modest face?
See her in every field-flower bloom?
O'er every thicket shed perfume?
By verdant groves, and vocal hills,
By mossy grotts, near purling rills,
Where'er you turn your wondering eyes,
Behold her win without disguise.

What though no pageant trifles here,
As in the glare of courts appear;
Though rarely here be heard the name
Of rank, or title, power, or fame;
Yet, if ingenuous be your mind,
A bliss more pure and unconfin'd
Your step attends---Draw freely nigh,
And meet the bard's benignant eye:
On him no pendant forms await,
No proud reserve shuts up his gate;

No spleen, no party views controul
That warm benevolence of soul,
Which prompts the friendly generous part,
Regardless of each venal art;
Regardless of the word's acclaim;
And courteous with no selfish aim.
Draw freely nigh, and welcome find,
If not the costly, yet the kind.
Oh, he will lead you to the cells
Where every muse and virtue dwells,
Where the green Dryads guard his woods,
Where the blue Naiads guide his floods;
Where all the sister-graces gay,
That shap'd his walk's meandering way,
Stark-naked, or but wreath'd with flowers,
Lie slumbering soft beneath his bowers.

Wak'd by the stock-dove's melting strain,
Behold them rise! and, with the train
Of nymphs that haunt the stream or grove,
Or o'er the flowery champain rove,
Join hand in hand---attentive gaze---
And mark the dance's mystic maze.

"Such is the waving line," they cry,
"For ever dear to fancy's eye!"
"Yon stream that wanders down the dale,
"The spiral wood, the winding vale,
"The path which, wrought with hidden skill
"Slow twining scales yon distant hill
"With fir invested---all combine
"To recommend the waving line.
"The wreathed rod of Bacchus fair,
"The ringlets of Apollo's hair,
"The wand by Maia's offspring borne,
"The smooth volutes of Ammon's horn,
"The structure of the Cyprian dame,
"And each fair female's beauteous frame,
"Show, to the pupils of design,
"The triumphs of the waving line."

Then gaze, and mark that union sweet
Where fair convex and concave meet;
And while, quick shifting as you stray,
The vivid scenes on fancy play;
The lawn, of aspect smooth and mild;
The forest-ground grotesque and wild;
The shrub that scents the mounting gale;
The stream rough dashing down the dale,
From rock to rock, in eddies tost;
The distant lake in which 'tis lost;
Blue hills gay beaming through the glade;
Lone urns that solemnize the shade;
Sweet interchange of all that charms
In groves, meads, dingles, rivulets, farms!
If aught the fair confusion please,
With lasting health, and lasting ease,
To him who form'd the blissful bower,
And gave thy life one tranquil hour;
With peace and freedom---these possess,
His temperate mind secures the rest.

But if thy soul such bliss despise,
Avert thy dull incurious eyes;
Go fix them there, where gems and gold,
Improv'd by art, their power unfold;
Go try in courtly scenes to trace
A fairer form of nature's face:
Go scorn simplicity---but know,
That all our heart-felt joys below,

That all which virtue loves to name,
Which art consigns to lasting fame,
Which fixes wit or beauty's throne,
Derives its source from her alone.

ARCADIO.

TO WILLIAM SHENSTONE, ESQ.

IN HIS SICKNESS.

By Mr. Woodhouse.

YE flowery plains, ye breezy woods,
Ye bowers and gay alcoves,
Ye falling streams, ye silver floods,
Ye grottos, and ye groves!

Alas! my heart feels no delight,
Though I your charms survey;
While he consumes in pain the night,
In languid sighs the day.

The flowers disclose a thousand blooms,
A thousand scents diffuse;
Yet all in vain they shed perfumes,
In vain display their hues.

Restrain, ye flowers, your thoughtless pride,
Recline your gaudy heads;
And sadly drooping, side by side,
Embrace your humid beds.

Tall oaks, that o'er the woodland shade,
Your lofty summits rear!
Ah, why, in wonted charms array'd,
Expand your leaves so fair!

For lo, the flowers as gaily smile,
As wanton waves the tree;
And though I sadly 'plain the while,
Yet they regard not me.

Ah, should the fates an arrow send,
And strike the fatal wound,
Who, who shall then your sweets defend,
Or fence your beauties round?

But hark, perhaps, the plummy throng
Have learnt my plaintive tale,
And some sad dirge, or mournful song,
Comes floating in the gale.

Ah, no! they chaunt a sprightly strain
To sooth an amorous mate;
Unmindful of my anxious pain
And his uncertain fate.

But see, these little murmuring rills
With fond repinings rove;
And trickle wailing down the hills,
Or weep along the grove.

Oh, mock not, if beside your stream,
Ye hear me too repine;
Or aid with sighs your mournful theme,
And fondly call him mine.

Ye envious winds, the cause display,
In whispers as ye blow,
Why did your treacherous gales convey
The poison'd shafts of woe?

Did he not plant the shady bower,
Where you so blithely meet?
The scented shrub, and fragrant flower,
To make your breezes sweet?

And must he leave the wood, the field,
The dear Arcadian reign?
Can neither verse nor virtue shield
The guardian of the plain?

Must he his tuneful breath resign,
Whom all the muses love?
That round his brow their laurels twine,
And all his songs approve.

Preserve him, mild Omnipotence!
Our Father, King, and God,
Who clear'st the paths of life and sense,
Or stopp'st them at thy nod.

Blest power, who calm'st the raging deep,
His valued health restore,
Nor let the sons of genius weep,
Nor let the good deplore.

But if thy boundless wisdom knows
His longer date an ill,
Let not my soul a wish disclose
To contradict thy will.

For happy, happy were the change,
For such a godlike mind,
To go where kindred spirits range,
Nor leave a wish behind.

And though, to share his pleasures here,
Kings might their state forego:
Yet must he feel such raptures there,
As none can taste below.

THE HAND UNKNOWN.

O EARTH! to his remains indulgent be,
Who so much care and cost bestow'd on thee!
Who crown'd thy barren hills with useful shade,
And cheer'd with tinkling rills each silent glade;
Here taught the day to wear a thoughtful gloom,
And there enliven'd nature's vernal bloom.
Propitious earth! lie lightly on his head,
And ever on his tomb thy vernal glories spread!

THE LIFE OF MALLET.

THE life of MALLET has been written by Dr. Johnson, with little activity of research or accuracy of intelligence. Having no written memorial, he contented himself with giving such an account "as is supplied by the unauthorised loquacity of common fame, and a very slight personal knowledge."

The additional information which has been obtained concerning the early part of his life, is authenticated by his MS. correspondence with Mr. John Ker, Professor of Greek in King's College, Aberdeen, and afterwards Professor of Humanity in the University of Edinburgh, communicated to the present writer by the favour of James Drummond, Esq. Advocate, and inserted, by his recommendation, in the "Edinburgh Magazine" for 1793.

The series of Mallet's correspondence with Mr. Ker, in the possession of Mr. Drummond, commenced in October 1720, and ended in July 1727. The remaining part of the correspondence was in the possession of Mr. Ker's brother, who went to the West Indies, and is supposed to be lost.

According to Dr. Johnson, he was, by his original, one of the Macgregors, a clan that became, about 70 years ago, under the conduct of Robert Roy, so formidable and so infamous for violence and robbery, that the name was annulled by a legal abolition; and, when they were all to denominate themselves anew, his father, he supposes, called himself Malloch.

It is certain that his original name was Malloch, which was that of his family, and is not uncommon in North Britain; but there is not sufficient evidence of his father having assumed that name in consequence of his being one of the Macgregors, whose enemies procured the enactment of an invidious statute for abolishing their name; which has been lately repealed by the liberality of a British Parliament.

David Mallet was born about the beginning of the present century. Of his birth-place, or the condition of his parents, nothing is certainly known. It is probable he was a native of Perthshire, and that his family was of the lowest rank; but, if families are to be estimated by the distinguished men they have produced, that family is eminent which produced Mallet.

At what school he was instructed in the rudiments of grammatical learning, cannot now be ascertained; but he seems to have received some part of his early education under Mr. Ker at Aberdeen, as he himself gratefully acknowledges.

"You are one to whom I stand indebted for all the advances I shall make in the world, as having laid the foundation by your instructions, and raised the superstructure by your love and favour."

It is probable he was indebted to the recommendation of Mr. Ker for his introduction to the family of Mr. Home of Dreghorn, near Edinburgh, where he resided in 1720, as tutor to his children, and prosecuted his studies at the University of Edinburgh.

The terms on which he informs Mr. Ker he lived with Mr. Home, sufficiently indicate the penury of his parents. "He allows me my learning, clothes, and diet, but no fixed salary. I am concerned in no business but revising my pupil's lessons, so that I have enough of time for reading and writing."

According to Dr. Johnson, "he was, by the penury of his parents, compelled to be Janitor of the High School at Edinburgh, a mean office, of which he did not afterwards delight to hear." This account is not sufficiently probable. Tradition is silent concerning it, and immemorial usage is against the supposition of his eligibility for such an office. The porter of the High School is always a person advanced in years, commonly a married man, has a house at the gate, and is required to ring the bell at the meeting of the classes, to sweep the rooms, and to perform other necessary services. It is probable, if his pupils attended the High School, that he might be permitted, by the liberality of the master, to be present at the examination of the class; but his performing the office of porter is incompatible with his youth and his profession of literature.

He appears to have discovered an early propensity to poetry, which was probably cherished and encouraged by the commendation and example of his friend and patron Mr. Ker, whose "Canticum Solomonis," and other performances in the "Poetarum Scotorum Musæ Sacræ," 2 vols. 1759, are well known to the readers of Latin poetry.

What he then thought of poetry was this: "I own 'tis my opinion that poesy gives one a sprightly turn of thinking, and stocks the imagination with beautiful images that capacitate one for writing and talking agreeably; yet I am in too bad a condition already to entail poverty on myself by a blinded passion for rhyme."

One of his first compositions was a Pastoral published in the "Edinburgh Miscellany," of which publication he gives this account: "The Edinburgh Miscellany" was undertaken by an "Athenian Society" here, who received the poems, and published all they thought worthy of seeing the light. The gentleman to whom I inscribed my Pastoral is one of their number. His name is Mr. Joseph Mitchell, author of the "Lugubres Cantus," a poem to the memory of Mr. Ford. Mr. Callender, who is written C——r, is an ingenious young gentleman, and is author of the second part of the "Lugubres Cantus;" who the ladies are, scarce any one knows. The gentleman in the University whose productions are marked with an S. is one Mr. Symmers, a boy of fifteen, and very sprightly."

In 1721, he appears to have had a sufficient knowledge of the Latin language to give a poetical version of a "Congratulatory poem," written by Mr. Ker; and the year before he writes him, "he was wholly engaged in acquiring the French and Greek languages."

The next year, he wrote a poem on The Transfiguration, in imitation of Milton's style, which has been preserved with his MS. correspondence, and is now printed from the original, in the possession of Mr. Drummond.

He was now rising into reputation, and easily obtained the acquaintance of Thomson his fellow-collegian, with whom he was destined to be more intimately connected, and of Mr. Paterson, the translator of "Paterculus," "Mr. Malcolm, author of the "Treatise on Music," Mr. (afterwards Dr.), Patrick Murdoch, and seems to have been particularly noticed by Ramsay and Captain Hamilton.

His opinion of the two Scottish poets, though rather unfavourable, is sufficiently curious to deserve transcription:

"Allan Ramsay has published his poems in 4to, by subscription, having got to the number of 400 guineas from his subscribers. He has indeed wrote himself into some kind of fame, and a great deal of money, but his personal character makes me entertain but a small value for his writings. I saw Captain Hamilton some time ago in Edinburgh. He has made public his "Life of Wallace," and, at the same time, so sunk his character with people of taste, that he is thought to have treated his hero as unmercifully as did Edward of old. 'Tis the fate of Wallace to be always murdered. Mr. Ramsay, again, aspires no higher than humble sonnets at present: he has published several collections of Scottish songs, and considerably obliged the young creatures of both sexes. His miscellany songs are wrote by various hands. These are the present entertainments in town."

The vacation of this year he prudently dedicated to logic and mathematics. "I have shaken hands," he writes Mr. Ker, "with versifying for a season. I would fain wed some one of the sciences that ordinarily brings a better portion with it than poetry does. When my inclinations take the bent towards rhyming, this melancholy reflection comes across and damps all my fire; the grasshopper that sung all summer saw herself obliged to starve all winter. Although I have no reason to complain of fortune hitherto, yet that thought of dependency quite palls all my enjoyment, particularly when 'tis edged with this reflection, that my circumstances are but precarious at best. If I were to leave Mr. Home just now, what account could a little knowledge of language, a moderate share of common sense, and a knack of versifying turn to? I see every day people of learning and merit exposed to poverty and contempt."

His reflections on Mr. Ker's writing to Mr. Scott in his favour, soon after, show that spirit of independence and respect for character, without which man is poor indeed.

"Your letter had so good an effect, that Mr. Scott has made me a proposal of changing my condition. I cannot but inform you that I heartily wish I were fairly rid of my present charge. You know there are a great many evils in life that vanish into nothing at the recital, and yet are more galling, and cut deeper than afflictions of a more considerable name. Nothing is so insupportable to an ingenuous spirit, as those insults and repulses one meets with from those on whom one is obliged to depend. I was asking one day for something I wanted, and because I did it not with the air and looks of one that asks charity in the streets, I was, upon leaving the room, called insolent dog and scoundrel.

——— Tell me why, good heaven,
Thou mad'st me what I am, with all the spirit,
Aspiring thoughts, and elegant desires
That fill the happiest man? Ah! rather why
Didst thou not form me sordid as my fate,
Base minded, dull, and fit to carry burdens?

"I frequently wish it had pleased heaven to have turned my inclinations for some honest mechanic business, rather than have exposed me to the injuries of fortune in hunting after knowledge. And yet how unaccountable is this treatment from one man to another! How fleeting, how unsubstantial are those enjoyments by which they distinguish themselves from the honest man of small fortune. Strip this of a title, that of his robes, and a third of his power, and we find only the naked man tortured with restless ungoverned passions, and in subjection to those appetites that level him with the beasts of the field."

He was now, by the kindness of Mr. Scott and Dr. Drummond, to exchange his humble dependence on Mr. Home, for a situation that enabled him to surmount the disadvantages of his birth and fortune.

"Graham of Gorthy," he writes Mr. Ker, July 28. 1723, "had a commission from the Duke of Montrose, whose factor he is, to look out a tutor for his two younger sons, and was desired particularly to apply to Mr. Scott. He accordingly mentioned the affair to Dr. Drummond, who, after a little thought, proposed me; and having met a little after with Mr. Scott, told him the story. He seconded the Doctor, and I was sent for into town, and was happy enough to see the affair concluded before I left it. My encouragement is 30 l.; and, as the Duke's family is in England, I am, about the middle of August to depart for London, and from thence to Winchester. If it is impossible for me to see you, I shall write to you at large before I leave the country, and take your advice about some things in my management. There is one favour I must yet beg of you, and that is, that you would formally thank both these gentlemen, both in your own name and mine, particularly Mr. Scott. I am under the greatest obligations to his kindness. He transacted the whole affair; wrote for me to town; met Gorthy several times at the coffee-house, and in the midst of a most violent rain too. He came to our house and procured Mr. Home's consent—but such favours are not to be disguised in such a homely recital."

On his arrival at Shawford, near Winchester, where the Duke of Montrose then resided, he writes his benefactor and friend: "Both my Lord and Lady received me very kindly; and as for my Lord William and my Lord George, I never saw more sprightly or more hopeful boys."

On his coming to town in the winter, he writes Mr. Ker: "I am beginning a regular course of classic authors in both languages. I intend not to forget any thing I have learned in mathematics and philosophy. My Lord continues to use me very kindly. He has no design to send his sons any more abroad to school; and at the same time, he confines their reading with me entirely to two hours in the morning and two in the forenoon; and thus the afternoon is entirely mine own. He sends us abroad once a-week to all the public diversions, the play-house, &c.—I know not how to go through with what I have got to say. I have lost my father; he died last month, and you know my fortune hitherto well enough; his death has embarrassed me in all respects. It was necessary that I should make some sort of appearance in this family. I found credit for what I wanted to furnish me out with when I came to London; the merchant is not impatient, but I know not how to be in debt, especially at my first appearance; and I cannot with a good grace ask any money from my Lord. I am ashamed to apply to my ordinary acquaintances (for there are several Edinburgh gentlemen here). It is the first time ever I asked any thing, and I am ashamed to trouble even you. The sum I want is 10 l. for some months, till I receive money of my Lord. I shall use no intreaties; my want is real; I am neither to squander it away, nor out of a condition to repay it in some time."

It appears from a note in the hand-writing of Mr. Ker, on the back of Mallet's letter, that the money was lent; and the payment is noticed in a subsequent part of the correspondence.

On his return to the country, in summer, he translated "Bossuet's Discours sur L'Histoire Universelle," for the use of Lord William; and, resuming his poetical studies, which he had discontinued for some time, he planned the tragedy of Eurydice, which he finished in 1731, and wrote his inimitable ballad of William and Margaret, which was printed in Hill's "Plain Dealer," No. 36, July 24. 1724. "The letter to the 'Plain Dealer,'" he writes Mr. Ker, "is in the paper enclosed, but it was printed without my privacy, and is altered in some places for the worse." In its original state, it was very different from what it is in the last edition of his works. The hint was taken from the first stanza of a ballad written before 1662, quoted in Fletcher's play of the "Knight of the Burning Pestle," under the title of "Fair Margaret and Sweet William;" which might also be taken from one published in Ramsay's "Collection," called "Sweet William's Ghost." Of this ballad, Mallet has been envied the reputation; and attempts have been made to rob him of his justly acquired fame. Its authenticity is doubted in "The Friends," 2 vols. 12mo, 1773; and plagiarism has been boldly charged, but not proved, by Captain Thompson, in his preface to "Marvell's Works," 3 vols. 4to. 1776. The internal testimony is totally against him, and amply sufficient to overthrow all his presumptive evidence of its being the production of that powerful, masculine, and witty writer.

The same year he wrote a copy of Verses occasioned by Dr. Frazer's rebuilding part of the University of Aberdeen, probably at the instigation of Mr. Ker, who suggested many hints for its improvement. The verses in the last edition of his works, are very different from the original copy, which is now printed from the MS. in the possession of Mr. Drummond. "I find by experience," he writes his friend, "that it is very difficult to write an historical or narrative poem of this kind. The severity of the subject hinders one from making many embellishments that are admitted into other writings. And yet I have some imagery purely poetical, such as that of Time shaking your arches, and mouldering your piles; as also Ruin, with his imaginary companion, Silence. I have made Charity address a consolatory speech to Learning, in which, by way of prophecy, I have made her relate Mr. Frazer's bounty to your University. The meaning and beauty of these short allegories will be obvious to every reader of tolerable taste. I have taken notice of the books that Mr. Frazer has gifted to your library; and, if I have guessed right, the lines are perhaps the best in the whole poem."

It is probable he received some academical distinction for this panegyric poem; for, in a subsequent letter, he writes Mr. Ker: "I never took any degree at Edinburgh, nor ever asked for any; when your society bestows that honour upon me, I will return them my thanks in a letter addressed to the whole body."

"Since I came to town," he writes Mr. Ker, "I was made acquainted with Dr. Young, and Barnham Goode, to whom Dr. Sewell dedicated his translations of "Ovid's Metamorphoses." The tragedy which I am writing is built on a story in the ninth book of Herodotus, concerning Xerxes and his brother Masistes. I had a message from Mr. Hill to meet him; the occasion of writing to him was the ancient tragedy, which, from a passage in "Aristotle's Politics," I guess to have been set to music, and repeated like the recitative part of an opera. Mira, you think, takes up my thoughts: were it not vain and light, I would send you some of her letters, and leave you to judge whether she does not deserve them all. The poem on her that you liked, was got out of her hands, and published here in a new "Miscellany," without my knowledge, at which I am heartily vexed; as also, another of a different kind, which makes a perfect contrast to it."

Mira, to whom he addressed an amorous poem from the Country, was probably the fictitious name of a lady "once," says Dr. Johnson, "too well known;" who afterwards joined with Hill and Mallet in poetical praises of Thomson's "Winter."

The same year, at the request of Mr. Ker, he translated his Latin verses, on the death of Sir William Scott, and his "Donnaides." These versions, with which he appears to have been highly pleased, are probably lost.

"I am glad to hear," he writes Mr. Ker, "that your brother is provided for; it is difficult to find a right settlement here; for the number of expectants is incredible. Our country pours forth her annual swarms, unceasing, inexhaustible. Good Lord! what strange unseemly creatures they are too! I have seen three and twenty of my own acquaintances, who, I believe, will not be provided for these three and twenty years. But all the poor service that I can do shall never be wanting. I cannot show myself thankful to Heaven a better way."

In 1727, he writes Mr. Ker: "I agreed with a lady in London to send my brother an apprentice to her's, who is a rich merchant in Jamaica; and wrote to my brother to come up hither, in order to be sent some months to an academy, where he might learn writing and accounts. But just as he was preparing to set out, we had a letter from Madeira that this merchant would not need an apprentice for a year or so, which broke all my measures. But as I incline to do my brother all the service in my power, I wrote to his friends to send him to Perth, and ordered what money I could spare to be paid him at Edinburgh; for I hope, by Mr. Paton's assistance, to settle him advantageously, notwithstanding this disappointment."

Of his brother, whom he exerted himself so kindly, though ineffectually, to serve, no farther account is given; but it is known that he afterwards procured him an advantageous office at Greenock, where he was called Malloch. Of Mr. Paton, on whose assistance he depended, he writes Mr. Ker: "You have undoubtedly heard of Mr. Paton my cousin, that went to sea when I was born; he has made a considerable fortune, lives in Bristol, and has wrote to me several times."

Mr. Ker having sent him a copy of his "Canticum Solomonis," published this year, he writes him: "I have read over your poem with a great deal of pleasure, and think your style is accurate and elegant. Your prose I prefer even before Burman's, because it is more perspicuous, and not encumbered with those parentheses and laboured inversions of construction which obscure and stiffen his. Your poetical paraphrase is true to the meaning of the original, if I may be judge of it by our literal translation in prose, and preserves every where those beauties that distinguish this divine song. I have neither Beza's nor Johnston's version of this poem, but I prefer your's before that of Bormley's, which is loose and rambling, in which he has very often explained away Solomon's meaning, and given us his own fancies instead of it."

"I have now finished," he adds, "and am preparing for the press against winter, a poem, in two books, which I began last year in the country. The first book has been perused by Mr. Molineux, the Prince's Secretary, by Mr. Hill, Dr. Young, and Sir John Clerk, whose acquaintance I had the good fortune to obtain while he was in London. It is in the hands of Mr. Dennis; and, as soon as that dread critic has condemned or approved it, it shall wait on you by the way of Edinburgh."

On his leaving town, soon after, he writes Mr. Ker: "I sold the copy of my poem to a bookseller for 25 guineas. Mr. Dennis, the severest of all our English critics, has read and approved of it, as you will find by his letter which I send you, and desire you will return it in your first answer to this."

It was published in 1728, under the title of the Excursion, a desultory and capricious view of such scenes of nature as his fancy led him, or his knowledge enabled him to describe. It has the beauties and faults of the "Seasons" of his friend Thomson, which were then in their full blossom of reputation.

Alluding probably to his poem called A Winter's Day, which Mr. Ker had supposed to be Thomson's, he writes him: "Mr. Thomson's "Winter" is a very different poem, of considerable length, and agreeing with mine in nothing but the name. It has met with a great deal of deserved applause, and was written by that dull fellow whom Malcolm calls the jest of our club. The injustice I did him then, in joining with my companions to ridicule the first imperfect essays of an excellent genius, was a strong motive to make me active in endeavouring to encourage him; and I believe I shall never repent it. He is now settled in a very good place, and will be able to requite all the services his friends have done him, in time. The second edition of his poem is now in the press, and shall be sent you as soon as it is published. I am sure you will like it; for it is filled with me out with when I came to London; the merchant is not impatient, but I know not how to be in debt, especially at my first appearance; and I cannot with a good grace ask any money from my Lord. The second edition of his poem is now in the press, and shall be sent you as soon as it is published. I am sure you will like it; for it is filled with a great many moral reflections, as well as with a fine spirit of poetry. You will find before it three copies of commendatory verses, one written by Mr. Hill, the second by a very fine woman, at my request, and the third by myself."

In 1731, he brought on the stage, at Drury-Lane, his Eurydice, a tragedy, which was favourably received. The prologue and epilogue were furnished by his friend Hill. It was revived at Drury-Lane, with alterations, 1760, and republished the same year. Its success was not great, though the principal parts were performed by Garrick and Mrs. Cibber. Dr. Johnson observes, that he had "heard it mentioned as a mean performance."

About this time, or before, he conducted his pupils round the common circle of modish travels; and, on his return, the influence of the family in which he resided, and his poetical reputation, naturally procured him admission to many persons of the highest rank, and the highest character, to wits, nobles, and statesmen, the Prince of Wales, Lyttleton, Chesterfield, Bolingbroke, Pope, Young, &c.

In 1733, he published his poem on Verbal Criticism, designed to pay court to Pope, by ridiculing Theobald, Bentley, Dennis, Cooke, and other editors, collators, commentators, and verbal critics. It is little more than an improvement, or rather expansion of a fragment which Pope printed in a Miscellany long before he ingrafted it into a regular poem. The cast of diction, and construction of the verse, seem to be copied from Pope. The execution is better than the design, which cannot be commended.

Dr. Johnson sarcastically observes, that having cleared his tongue from his native pronunciation so as to be no longer distinguished as a Scot, he seemed inclined to disencumber himself from all adherences of his original, and took upon him to change his name from Scotch Malloch to English Mallet, without any imaginable reason of preference which the eye or the ear can discover. "What other proofs he gave of disrespect to his native country," he says, "I know not; but it was remarked of him, that he was the only Scot whom Scotchmen did not commend."

In justice to Mallet, it ought to be mentioned, that this alteration did not originate in any disrespect to his native country, but was suggested to him by his cousin Paton, in 1724, as appears from the following postscript to his letter to Mr. Ker of that date: "My cousin Mr. Paton would have me write my name Mallet; for there is not one Englishman that can pronounce it." He continued, however, to write his name Malloch down to the year 1728, and probably some time longer. An Englishman accustomed to pronounce Malloch, as if it were written Mallock, cannot easily discover any imaginable reason of preference in changing it to Mallet, unless he had an opportunity of hearing the last syllable pronounced by a Scotchman. The last observation is sufficiently disproved by the tenor of his correspondence with Mr. Ker, his readiness to do good offices to his countrymen, and his friendship with Thomson, which was never once disturbed by any casual mistake, envy, or jealousy on either side.

The following anecdote is related by Dr. Johnson, whose intelligence on some few occasions may be questioned, and whose opinion of Mallet is rather unfavourable.

"About this time, Pope, whom he visited familiarly, published his "Essay on Man," but concealed the author; and when Mallet entered one day, Pope asked him slightly what there was new? Mallet told him the newest piece was something called an "Essay on Man," which he had inspected idly; and seeing the utter inability of the author, who had neither skill in writing nor knowledge of his subject, had tossed it away. Pope, to punish his self-conceit, told him the secret."

When the Prince of Wales set himself at the head of the opposition, and kept a separate court, he endeavoured to increase his popularity by the patronage of literature, and made Mallet his under Secretary, with a salary of 200 l. a-year. Thomson likewise had a pension.

In 1734, he attended the Prince of Orange on his visit to Oxford, and wrote the congratulatory verses presented to him by the University, which breathe the noblest sentiments of liberty. On this occasion, he was admitted to the degree of Master of Arts at St. Mary-Hall.

In 1739, he brought on the stage, at Drury-Lane, his Muſſapba, a tragedy, which was honoured by the recommendation of the Prince of Wales, and performed with success, but was never revived. It was dedicated to the Prince. The prologue was written by Thomson.

In 1740, he was employed by Millar, the bookseller, to prefix a Life of Bacon to a new edition of his works, in 4 vols. folio.; which he has written with great elegance and judgment; though perhaps with more knowledge of history than of science. It ranks with the best pieces of biography in our language.

The same year, he was associated with Thomson in the composition of the Masque of Alfred, which was performed on the 1st of August in the gardens of Cliefden, in commemoration of the accession of George I.; and in honour of the birth-day of the Princess of Brunswick. It was afterwards almost wholly changed by Mallet, and brought on the stage, at Drury-Lane, in 1751, but with no great success.

In 1741, he married Miss Elstob, a lady of great merit and beauty; upon which occasion Hill writes him: "You have fired my curiosity to see and hear this lady, who has had so strong and swift an influence upon an heart so firm and so impressed as yours was by the memory of a former sweetness. The lustre must be amiably severe and sparkling, that had the power to attract unto itself a flame so generous as your first, and which your pen delighted to describe with such a manly and unmodified tenderness."

Hill afterwards sent him the following verses on his marriage. The thought is borrowed from Bouhours, "a little poetical stream drawn from a French fountain."

Taste, said I, and deep discerning,
Grace and virtue too thrown in,
Air-like ease, and sun-like learning,
All are claims not worth a pin.
No, said Truth, and frown'd her nod to't,
Fortune lives with none of these;
Fools—and there she swore by G—d to't,
Fools are those she works to please.
How, cry'd Wit! behold a Mallet
In our Elstob's bosom blest'd:
Once, said Truth, I'm out—recal it,
Miracles must stand confess'd.

From this time he resided at Strand-Green, and afterwards at Putney; and lived in the style of a gentleman.

In 1747, after a long interval, he published his Amyntor and Theodora; his greatest work, addressed to Lord Chesterfield, and prefaced with a beautiful copy of Verses to Mrs. Mallet. He sold this poem to Vaillant the bookseller for 120 l.

After the death of Pope, when it was found that he had clandestinely printed an unauthorized number of Bolingbroke's "Idea of a Patriot, King," &c. his "guide, philosopher, and friend," in a fit of useless fury, resolved to blast his memory, and employed Mallet as the executioner of his vengeance.

Mallet, from his dependence on the Prince, was content to court Bolingbroke, then high in his confidence, by prefixing an Advertisement to the "Idea of a Patriot, King," and other tracts published in 1749; in which he charged Pope with "having been guilty of a breach of trust, and of having taken upon him further to divide the subject, and to alter and omit passages according to the suggestions of his own fancy."

The charge was enforced with so unfriendly, and so vindictive a severity, that Warburton thought it proper for him to interpose, not indeed to vindicate the action, for breach of trust has always something criminal, but to extenuate it by an apologetical "Letter to the Editor," &c. in which he supposes, with great appearance of reason, that the irregularity of Pope's conduct proceeded wholly from his zeal for Bolingbroke, who might perhaps have destroyed the pamphlet, which he thought it his duty to preserve, even without its author's approbation. To this apology an answer was written by Mallet, in a Letter to the most impudent Man living.

For this act, which, it is hoped, Mallet unwillingly performed, he was rewarded, not long after, with the legacy of Bolingbroke's works.

In 1754, by the help of Millar the bookseller, and, in opposition to the remonstrance of Lord Hyde, he published the "Works" of Bolingbroke, in 5 vols. 4to.; in which, it seems, he consulted his own profit, which was very much below his expectation, more than his benefactor's fame, as appears from a presentment of the Grand Jury of Westminster, Oct. 16. 1754, of these five volumes, "as tending, in the general scope of several pieces therein contained, as well as many particular expressions which had been laid before them, to the subversion of religion, government, and morality; and being also against his Majesty's peace."

Many of the political pieces had been written during the opposition to Walpole, and given to Franklin the printer, as he supposed in perpetuity. These, among the rest, were claimed by the will. The question was referred to the arbitration of Mr. Draper and Mr. Wotton; but, soon after the arbitrators had declared their award, Mallet sent them notice that he retracted and revoked his submission, and that he discharged them from proceeding to make any award. Franklin submitted "A State of the Case," &c. to the public, in 1754.

The life of the Duke of Marlborough having been left unwritten by Lord Moleworth, who had been his favourite in Flanders, and Steele, to whom the papers supposed to contain the necessary information, had been successively delivered, the old Duchess, in her will, assigned the task to Glover and Mallet, with a reward of 1000 l. and a prohibition to insert any verses. Glover rejected the legacy, and devolved the whole work upon Mallet, who had a pension from the late Duke, to promote his industry, and who talked much of the discoveries which he made in Holland, and of the diligence he was exerting upon this work; but left not, when he died, the smallest vestige of any historical labour behind him.

In 1755, his Masque of Britannia was acted at Drury-Lane, with success. The prologue, in the character of a drunken sailor reading a play-bill, was written in conjunction with Garrick, and spoken by the latter, with so much applause, that it was called for, and insisted on by the audience many nights in the season, when the piece itself was not performed.

In 1756, when the nation was exasperated by the ill success of the war against France, he was employed to turn the public vengeance upon Byng, and wrote a letter of accusation, under the character of a Plain Man. The paper was circulated and dispersed with great industry; and he, for his seasonable intervention, had a considerable pension bestowed upon him, which he retained to his death.

In 1759, he published a collection of his Works, in Prose and Verse, in 3 vols. 12mo. with a dedication to Lord Mansfield.

The same year, he published a poem, called Tyburn, to the Marine Society, a supposed remonstrance of the gallows at Tyburn, to that patriotic institution, on account of the service which it had rendered the nation since the commencement of the French war.

In 1760, he published his beautiful ballad of Edwin and Emma, which was elegantly printed at Birmingham, by Baskerville, in 4to. The profits arising from the sale were intended for a charitable use.

In 1762, he published a small collection of Poems on Several Occasions, with a dedication to the Duke of Marlborough, in which he "hopes soon to present his Grace with something more solid, more deserving his attention, in the "Life of the first Duke of Marlborough;" which has not yet appeared.

In the political disputes which commenced at the beginning of the present reign, he took part with his countryman Lord Bute, to serve whom, he published Truth in Rhyme, in 1762; and wrote his tragedy of Elvira, in imitation of De la Motte's tragedy, founded on a Portuguese story, taken from the "Lusiad" of Camoens, which was acted at Drury-Lane, in 1763, with little success, as it was brought on at a critical time, and looked upon by many as a ministerial play. He was rewarded with the office of Keeper of the Book of Entries for Ships in the Port of London, to which he was appointed in 1763.

Towards the latter end of his life, he went with his wife to France; but after a while, finding his health declining, he returned alone to England, and died in April 1765.

He was twice married; and, by his first wife, had several children. One daughter, who married a Genoese gentleman named Celestia, who formerly resided in London in a public character; wrote a tragedy called "Almida," acted at Drury-Lane, 1771; and "Indolence," a poem, 4to. 1772. His second wife was the daughter of a nobleman's steward, who had a considerable fortune, which she took care to retain in her own hands.

His Plays and Poems have been frequently reprinted; and his poems were collected in the fifty third volume of the "Works of the English Poets," 1779.

The character of Mallet has been variously represented by his friends, and by his enemies. According to Hill, who knew him well, his manners were as amiable as his abilities were respectable. With Young, Pope, Thomson, and Lyttleton, he lived in habits of familiar intimacy; and, it is but justice to add, that no man maintained his share in conversation more happily than Mallet. His behaviour to Pope after his death has drawn upon him the universal accusation of ingratitude; but if he had not virtue, or had not spirit to refuse the office assigned him by Bolingbroke, it ought to be remembered that Pope was not innocent, and that he had some dependence on the favour of Bolingbroke, a man whose pride and petulance made his kindness difficult to gain, or keep. He is said to have adopted the peculiar sentiments of his patron with regard to religion; but of this there is no better evidence than the publication of his posthumous works, in which he seems to have acted from considerations of gain rather than zeal for the propagation of his opinions. His integrity in business and in life is unimpeached. Vanity, the most innocent species of pride, seems to have been his predominant passion. Pathos was a quality which he conceived to be so much the characteristic of his own poetry, that he once quarrelled with Jones, author of the "Earl of Essex," for pretending to it. The dispute ended by his turning the poor bricklayer out of the room where they were spending the evening together. As a political writer, he seems to have been of that numerous class of men of letters, who think it no dishonour to be ministerial hirelings.

"His stature," says Dr. Johnson, "was diminutive; but he was regularly formed; his appearance, till he grew corpulent, was agreeable, and he suffered it to want no recommendation that dress could give it. His conversation was elegant and easy. The rest of his character may, without injury to his memory, sink into silence." This last observation cannot be generally allowed; his gratitude to Mr. Ker, his kindness to his brother, his services to Hill and Thomson, his beneficence to Derrick (Letters, 2 vols. 1767), and his exemplary tenderness in the discharge of the relative duties of husband and parent, command our esteem for his character, and confer a lasting honour on his memory.

As a poet, though he may not be altogether secure from the objections of the critic, he has very little to fear from the strictest moral or religious censure; his works are not only the productions of a genius truly poetical; but they are friendly to the best interests of morality and liberty; they inspire virtue, truth, and patriotism; and inculcate the necessity of goodness to the present and future happiness of mankind. His compositions are characterized by elegance of diction, and correctness of judgment, rather than vigour of expression or sublimity of sentiment, neither of which are wanting. His powers have had every aid that laborious cultivation, that useful and polite learning could give; he possesses a judgment critically exact, but has not an highly creative imagination. He is an elegant and pleasing writer, a smooth and correct versifier, but not a first-rate poet.

His Excursion is not devoid of poetical spirit and picturesque description. Many of the images are striking, and many of the passages are elegant. He observes clearly, and describes forcibly; but he errs by endeavouring to impress his subject on the mind with a pomp and reduplication of expression. In his Verbal Criticism, there is more pertness than wit, and more confidence than knowledge. Horace and Shakspeare are skilfully delineated. The three concluding couplets are excellent. The versification is tolerable, nor can criticism allow it a higher praise. Amyntor and Theodora, his most elaborate performance, though somewhat tedious and diffuse, abounds in striking images, pathetic incidents, and moral reflections. "The nauseous affectation of expressing every thing pompously," says Dr. Warton, "is no where more visible than in a poem lately published, intitled Amyntor and Theodora. The following instance may be alleged, among many others. Amyntor having a pathetic tale to discover, being choked with sorrow, and at a loss for utterance, uses these ornamental unnatural images:

O could I steal
From harmony her softest warbled strain
Of melting air! or Zephyr's vernal voice,
Or Philomela's song, when love dissolves
To liquid blandishment his evening lay,
All nature smiling round——"

There is in this passage, it must be acknowledged, an attempt at dignity above the occasion. Pathos seems to have been intended, but affectation only is produced. It cannot, however, be denied, that there is in this poem copiousness and elegance of language, vigour of sentiment, and imagery well adapted to take possession of the fancy. His poem on the Death of Lady Anson, addressed to her father, Lord Harwicke, deserves great praise. It is serious, pathetic, and poetical in the highest degree. The distress of Cicero for the death of Tullia, is happily introduced, and rendered very applicable by a similitude of some circumstances. None of his poems do him greater honour, or give us a higher idea of his poetical powers.

His Truth in Rhyme is a pretty court compliment, in which his patron, Lord Bute, makes almost as good a figure as his Majesty. It is chiefly remarkable for the extraordinary instance of vanity in the imprimatur prefixed to it.

It has no faults, or I no faults can spy;
It is all beauty, or all blindness I.

Imprimatur, meo periculo, CHESTERFIELD.

If Chesterfield, so justly celebrated for the elegance of his taste and wit, still retained so much of the courtier as to give such a testimony to this poem, as no poem ever deserved, Mallet ought not to have been so far transported by it as publicly to triumph in so extravagant a compliment, even admitting that it was sincere, which may be reasonably doubted. Zephyr, or the Stratagem, is a tale in the manner of Prior, told with ease and humour. There is some wit and spirit in it; but it is unfit for a modest ear. Cupid and Hymen, the Discovery, the Reward, are written with ease and sprightliness, and may be read with pleasure. His Prologue to Thomson's "Agamemnon" is superior to that which he received from Thomson for Musapha. His Funeral Hymn opens with a becoming solemnity and grandeur of expression; but is totally spoiled by a number of short rhymes, which are so far from conveying any idea suitable to the solemn dignity of a funeral hymn, that they turn the whole into a burlesque. The Fragment, beginning, Fair morn ascends, &c. is remarkably fine. It is of a strain more exalted than any of his other pieces. He has nowhere discovered more poetical enthusiasm. His Epitaphs deserve particular commendation. His ballads of William and Margaret, Edwin and Emma, and The Birks of Endermay, rank with the best compositions of that kind in our language. William and Margaret is fully entitled to the favourable reception it met with. It is the most pleasing of all his poetical compositions. It is plaintive, pathetic, and simple; both the sentiment and the expression are equally captivating. Dr. Johnson is almost singular in thinking that "it contains nothing very striking or difficult." Edwin and Emma is an imitation of William and Margaret; though certainly not altogether equal to it. An unfortunate amour is the subject of both. The story of the hapless pair is added in prose, and averred to be matter of fact. The father of Edwin is described in the following passage, by a simile immediately arising from the subject itself, which conveys a direct and unequivocal illustration, with a conciseness and expression truly admirable:

The father too, a fordid man,
Who love nor pity knew,
Was all unfeeling as the clod
From whence his riches grew.

His character, as given by Dr. Johnson, cannot be generally allowed, without doing great injustice to his literary and poetical merit.

"As a writer, he cannot be placed in any high class. There is no species of composition in which he was eminent. His dramas had their day, a short day, and are forgotten; his blank verse seems to my ear the echo of Thomson. His Life of Bacon is known, as it is appended to Bacon's volumes, but it is no longer mentioned. His works are such as a writer bustling in the world, showing himself in public, and emerging occasionally from time to time into notice, might keep alive by his personal influence; but which conveying little information, and giving no great pleasure, must soon give way, as the succession of things produces new topics of conversation, and other modes of amusement."

THE WORKS OF MALLET.

TO THE RIGHT HONOURABLE

WILLIAM, LORD MANSFIELD,

LORD CHIEF JUSTICE OF ENGLAND.

JANUARY 1, 1759.

No man, in ancient Rome, my Lord, would have been surpris'd, I believe, to see a poet inscribe his works, either to Cicero, or the younger Pliny; not to mention any more amongst her most celebrated names. They were both, it is true, public magistrates of the first distinction, and had applied themselves severely to the study of the laws; in which both eminently excelled. They were, at the same time, illustrious orators, and employed their eloquence in the service of their clients and their country. But, as they had both embellish'd their other talents by early cultivating the finer arts, and which has spread, we see, a peculiar light and grace over all their productions; no species of polite literature could be foreign to their taste or patronage. And, in effect, we find they were the friends and protectors of the best poets their respective ages produced.

It is from a parity of character, my Lord, and which will occur obviously to every eye, that I am induced to place your name at the head of this collection, such as it is, of the different things I have written,

“Nec Phœbo gratior ulla

And were I as sure, my Lord, that it is deserving of your regard, as I am that these verses were not applied with more propriety at first than they are now; the public would universally justify my ambition in presenting it to you. But, of that, the public only must and will judge, in the last appeal. There is but one thing, to bespeak their favour and your friendship, that I dare be positive in: without which, you are the last person in Britain to whom I should have thought of addressing it. And this any man may affirm of himself, without vanity; because it is equally in every man's power. Of all that I have written, on any occasion, there is not a line, which I am afraid to own, either as an honest man, a good subject, or a true lover of my country.

I have thus, my Lord, dedicated some few moments, the first day of this new year, to send you, according to good old custom, a present. An humble one, I confess it is; and that can have little other value but what arises from the disposition of the sender. On that account, perhaps, it may not be altogether unacceptable; for it is indeed an offering rather of the heart than the head; an effusion of those sentiments, which great merit, employed to the best purposes, naturally creates,

May you enjoy, my Lord, through the whole course of this and many more years, that sound health of mind and body, which your important labours for the public so much want, and so justly merit! And may you soon have the satisfaction to see, what I know you so ardently wish, this destructive war, however necessary on our part, concluded by a safe and lasting peace! Then, and not till then, all the noble arts, no less useful than ornamental to human life, and that now languish, may again flourish, under the eye and encouragement of those few, who think and feel as you do, for the advantage and honour of Great Britain, I am, with the sincerest attachment,

My Lord,

Your most faithful

humble servant,

U u iij

OF VERBAL CRITICISM.

ADVERTISEMENT TO THE FIRST AND SECOND EDITIONS.

As the design of the following poem is to rally the abuse of Verbal Criticism, the author could not, without manifest partiality, overlook the editor of Milton, and the restorer of Shakspeare. With regard to the later, he has read over the many and ample specimens with which that scholiast has already obliged the public: and of these, and these only, he pretends to give his opinion. But, whatever he may think of the critic, not bearing the least ill-will to the man, he deferred printing these verses, though written several months ago, till he heard that the subscription for a new edition of Shakspeare was closed.

He begs leave to add likewise, that this poem was undertaken and written entirely without the knowledge of the gentleman to whom it is addressed. Only as it is a public testimony of his inviolable esteem for Mr. Pope, on that account, particularly, he wishes, it may not be judged to increase the number of mean performances, with which the town is almost daily pestered.

AMONG the numerous fools, by fate design'd
Oft to disturb, and oft divert, mankind,
The reading coxcomb is of special note,
By rule a poet, and a judge by rote:
Grave son of idle industry and pride,
Whom learning but perverts, and books misguide.

O fam'd for judging, as for writing well,
That rarest science, where so few excel;
Whose life, severely scann'd, transcends thy lays,
For wit supreme is but thy second praise:
'Tis thine, O Pope, who choose the better part,
To tell how false, how vain, the Scholiast's art,
Which nor to taste, nor genius has pretence,
And, if 'tis learning, is not common sense.

In error obstinate, in wrangling loud,
For trifles eager, positive, and proud;
Deep in the darkness of dull authors bred,
With all their refuse lumber'd in his head,
What every dunce from every dunghill drew
Of literary offals, old or new,
Forth steps at last the self-applauding wight,
Of points and letters, chaff and straws, to write:
Sagely resolv'd to swell each bulky piece
With venerable toys, from Rome and Greece;
How oft, in Homer, Paris curl'd his hair;
If Aristotle's cap were round or square;
If in the cave, where Dido first was sped,
To Tyre she turn'd her heels, to Troy her head.

Such the choice anecdotes, profound and vain,
That store a Bentley's and a Burman's brain:
Hence, Plato quoted, or the Stagyrte,
To prove that flame ascends, and snow is white:
Hence, much hard study, without sense or breeding,
And all the grave impertinence of reading.
If Shakspeare says, the noon-day sun is bright,
His scholiast will remark, it then was light;
Turn Caxton, Winkin, each old Goth and Hun,
To rectify the reading of a pun.

Thus, nicely trifling, accurately dull,
How one may toil, and toil—to be a fool!

But is there then no honour due to age?
No reverence to great Shakspeare's noble page?
And he, who half a life has read him o'er,
His mangled points and commas to restore,
Meets he such slight regard in nameless lays,
Whom Bufu treats, and Lady Would-be pays

Pride of his own, and wonder of this age,
Who first created, and yet rules, the stage,
Bold to design, all-powerful to express,
Shakspeare each passion drew in every dress:
Great above rule, and imitating none;
Rich without borrowing, nature was his own:
Yet is his sense debas'd by gross allay:
As gold in mines lies mix'd with dirt and clay.
Now, eagle-wing'd, his heavenward flight he takes;
The big stage thunders, and the soul awakes:
Now, low on earth, a kindred reptile creeps;
Sad Hamlet quibbles, and the hearer sleeps.

Such was the poet: next the Scholiast view;
Faint through the colouring, yet the features true.

Condemn'd to dig and dung a barren soil,
Where hardly tares will grow with care and toil,
He, with low industry, goes gleanings on
From good, from bad, from mean, neglecting none:
His brother book-worm so, in shelf or stall,
Will feed alike on Woolston and on Paul.

By living clients hopeless now of bread,
He pettyfogs a scrap from authors dead:
See him on Shakspeare pore, intent to steal
Poor farce, by fragments, for a third-day meal.
Such that grave bird in northern seas is found.
Whose name a Dutchman only knows to sound.
Where'er the king of fish moves on before,
This humble friend attends from shore to shore;
With eye still earnest, and with bill inclin'd,
He picks up what his patron drops behind;
With those choice eates his palate to regale,
And is the careful Tibbald* of a whale.

Blest genius! who bestows his oil and pains
On each dull passage, each dull book contains;
The toil more grateful, as the task more low:
So carrion is the quarry of a crow.

* This remarkable bird is called the Strundt-jager. Here you see how he purchases his food: and the same author, from whom this account is taken, tells us farther how he comes by his drink. You may see him, adds the Dutchman, frequently pursuing a sort of sea-mew, called Kulge-Gebes, whom he torments incessantly to make him void an excrement; which being liquid, serves him, I imagine, for drink. See a collection of Voyages to the North.

Where his fam'd author's page is flat and poor,
 There, most exact the reading to restore ;
 By dint of plodding, and by sweat of face,
 A bull to change, a blunder to replace :
 Whate'er is refuse critically gleaning,
 And mending nonsense into doubtful meaning.
 For this, dread Dennis* (and who can forbear, Dunce or not Dunce, relating it, to stare ?)
 His head though jealous, and his years fourscore,
 Ev'n Dennis † praises, who ne'er prais'd before !
 For this, the Scholiast claims his share of fame,
 And, modest, prints his own with Shakspeare's
 name :

How justly, Pope, in this short story view ;
 Which may be dull, and therefore should be true.

A prelate, fam'd for clearing each dark text,
 Who sense with sound, and truth with rhetoric
 mixt,

Once, as his moving theme to rapture warm'd,
 Inspir'd himself, his happy hearers charm'd.
 The sermon o'er, the crowd remain'd behind,
 And freely, man or woman, spoke their mind :
 All said they lik'd the lecture from their soul,
 And each, remembering something, prais'd the whole.

At last an honest sexton join'd the throng
 (For as the theme was large, their talk was long) ;
 Neighbours, he cry'd, my conscience bids me tell,
 Though 'twasthe Doctor preach'd—I toll'd the bell.

In this the critic's folly most is shown :
 Is there a genius all-unlike his own,
 With learning elegant, with wit well bred,
 And, as in books, in men and manners read ;
 Himself with poring erudition blind,
 Unknowing, as unknown of human kind ;
 That writer he selects, with awkward aim
 His sense, at once, to mimic and to maim.
 So Florio is a fop, with half a nose :
 So fat West Indian planters dress at beaux.
 Thus, gay Petronius was a Dutchman's choice,
 And Horace, strange to say, tun'd Bentley's voice.

Horace, whom all the graces taught to please,
 Mix'd mirth with morals, eloquence with ease ;
 His genius social, as his judgment clear :
 When frolic, prudent ; smiling when severe ;
 Secure, each temper, and each taste to hit,
 His was the curious happiness of wit.
 Skill'd in that noblest science, how to live ;
 Which learning may direct, but heaven must give ;
 Grave with Agrippa, with Mæcenat gay ;
 Among the fair, but just as wise as they :
 First in the friendships of the great enroll'd,
 The St. Johns, Boyles, and Lyttletons, of old.

While Bentley, long to wrangling schools con-
 fin'd,

And, but by books, acquainted with mankind,
 Dares, in the fullness of the pedant's pride,
 Rhyme, tho' no genius ; though no judge, decide.]
 Yet he, prime pattern of the captious art,
 Out-tibbalding poor Tibbald, tops his part :
 Holds high the scourge o'er each fam'd author's
 Nor are their graves a refuge for the dead. [head ;

† See the Dedication of his Remarks on the Dunciad to Mr. Lewis Theobald.

To Milton lending sense, to Horace wit,
 He makes them write what never poet writ :
 The Roman muse arraigns his mangling pen ;
 And Paradise*, by him, is lost again.
 Such was his doom impos'd by Heaven's decree,
 With ears that hear not, eyes that shall not see,
 The low to swell, to level the sublime,
 To blast all beauty, and beprose all rhyme.
 Great eldest born of dullness, blind and bold !
 Tyrant ! more cruel than Procrustes old ;
 Who, to his iron-bed, by torture, fits,
 Their nobler part, the souls of suffering wits.

Such is this man, who heaps his head with bays,
 And calls on human kind to sound his praise,
 For points transplac'd with curious want of skill,
 For flattened sounds, and sense amended ill.
 So wise Caligula, in days of yore,
 His helmet fill'd with pebbles on the shore,
 Swore he had rifled ocean's richest spoils,
 And claim'd a trophy for his martial toils.

Yet be his merits, with his faults, confess'd :
 Fair-dealing, as the plainest, is the best.
 Long lay the critic's work, with trifles stor'd,
 Admir'd in Latin, but in Greek ador'd.
 Men so well read, who confidently wrote,
 Their readers could have sworn, were men of note :
 To pass upon the crowd for great or rare,
 Aim not to make them knowing, make them stare.
 For these blind votaries good Bentley griev'd,
 Writ English notes—and mankind undeceiv'd :
 In such clear light the serious folly plac'd,
 Ev'n thou, Brown Willis, thou may'st see the jest.

But what can cure our vanity of mind,
 Deaf to reproof, and to discovery blind ?
 Let Crooke, a brother-scholiast Shakspeare call,
 Tibbald, to Hesiod-Cooke returns the ball.
 So runs the circle still : in this, we see
 The lackies of the great and learn'd agree.
 If Britain's nobles mix in high debate,
 Whence Europe, in suspense, attends her fate ;
 In mimic session their grave footmen meet,
 Reduce an army, or equip a fleet :
 And, rivalling the critic's lofty style,
 Mere Tom and Dick are Stanhope and Argyll.

Yet those, whom pride and dullness join to blind,
 To narrow cares in narrow space confin'd,
 Though with big titles each his fellow greets,
 Are but to wits, as scavenger's to streets :
 The humble blackguards of a Pope or Gay,
 To brush off dust, and wipe their spots away.

Or, if not trivial, harmful is their art ;
 Fume to the head, or poison to the heart.
 Where ancient authors hint at things obscene,
 The Scholiast speaks out broadly what they mean.

* This sagacious Scholiast is pleased to create an imaginary editor of Milton ; who, he says, by his blunders, interpolations, and vile alterations, lost Paradise a second time. This is a postulatam which surely none of his readers can have the heart to deny him ; because otherwise he would have wanted a fair opportunity of calling Milton himself, in the person of this phantom, fool, ignorant, idiot, and the like critical compellations, which he plentifully bestows on him. But, though he had no taste in poetry, he was otherwise a man of very considerable abilities, and of great erudition.

Disclosing each dark vice, well lost to fame,
 And adding fuel to redundant flame,
 He, sober pimp to lechery, explains
 What Caprea's isle, or V—'s alcove contains:
 Why Paulus, for his sordid temper known,
 Was lavish, to his father's wife alone:
 Why those fond female visits duly paid
 To tuneful Incuba; and what her trade:
 How modern love has made so many martyrs,
 And which keeps ofteneft, Lady C—, or Chartres.

But who their various follies can explain?
 The tale is infinite, the talk were vain.
 'Twere to read new-year odes in search of thought;
 To sum the libels Pryn or Withers wrote;
 To guess, ere one epistle * saw the light,
 How many dunces met, and clubb'd their mite;
 To vouch for truth what Welsted prints of Pope,
 Or from the brother-boobies steal a trope.
 That be the part of persevering Wasse †,
 With pen of lead; or, Arnall, thine of brags;
 A text for Henley, or a gloss for Hearne,
 Who loves to teach, what no man cares to learn.

How little knowledge reaps from toils like these!
 Too doubtful to direct, too poor to please.
 Yet, critics, would your tribe deserve a name,
 And, fairly useful, rise to honest fame;
 First, from the head, a load of lumber move.
 And, from the volume, all yourselves approve:
 For patch'd and pilfer'd fragments, give us sense,
 Or learning, clear from learn'd impertinence,
 Where moral meaning, or where taste presides,
 And wit enlivens but what reason guides:
 Great without swelling, without meanness praise,
 Serious, not silly; sportive, but not vain;
 On trifles slight, on things of use profound,
 In quoting sober, and in judging sound.

V E R S E S

Presented to the Prince of Orange, on his visiting Oxford,

IN THE YEAR M,DCC,XXXIV.

RECEIVE, lov'd prince, the tribute of our praise,
 This hasty welcome, in unfinish'd lays.
 At best, the pomp of song, the paint of art,
 Display the genius, but not speak the heart;
 And oft, as ornament must truth supply,
 Are but the splendid colouring of a lie.
 These need not here; for to a soul like thine,
 Truth, plain and simple, will more lovely shine.
 The truly good but wish the verse sincere:
 They court no flattery, who no censure fear.

Such Nassau is, the fairest, gentlest mind,
 In blooming youth the Titus of mankind,
 Crowds, who to hail thy wish'd appearance ran,
 Forgot the prince, to praise and love the man.
 Such sense with sweetness, grandeur mix'd with ease!
 Our nobler youth will learn of thee to please:

* See a poem published some time ago under that title, said to be the production of several ingenious and prolific heads; one contributing a simile, another a character, and a certain gentleman four shrewd lines wholly made up of asterisks.

† See the preface to his edition of Sallust; and read, if you are able, the Scholia of sixteen annotators by him collected, besides his own.

Thy bright example shall our world adorn,
 And charm, in gracious princes, yet unborn.
 Nor deem this verse from venal art proceeds,
 That vice of courts, the soil for baneful weeds.
 Here candour dwells; here honest truths are taught,
 To guide and govern, not disguise, the thought.
 See these enlighten'd sages, who preside
 O'er learning's empire; see the youth they guide:
 Behold, all faces are in transport dress!
 But those most wonder, who discern thee best.
 At sight of thee, each free-born heart receives
 A joy, the sight of princes rarely gives;
 From tyrants sprung, and oft themselves design'd,
 By fate, the future Neroes of their kind:
 But tho' thy blood, we know, transmitted springs
 From laurell'd heroes, and from warrior kings,
 Through that high series, we, delighted, trace
 The friends of liberty, and human race!

Oh, born to glad and animate our isle!
 For thee, our heavens look pleas'd, our seasons
 For thee, late object of our tender fears, [smile:
 When thy life droop'd, and Britain was in tears,
 All-cheering health, the goddess rosy-fair,
 Attended by soft suns, and vernal air, [hour,
 Sought those * fam'd springs, where, each afflictive
 Disease, and age, and pain, invoke her power:
 She came; and, while to thee the current flows,
 Pour'd all herself, and in thy cup arose.
 Hence, to thy cheek, that instant bloom deriv'd:
 Hence, with thy health, the weeping world re-
 Proceed to emulate thy race divine: [viv'd!
 A life of action, and of praise be thine.
 Assert the titles genuine to thy blood,
 By nature, daring; but by reason, good.
 So great, so glorious thy forefathers shone,
 No son of theirs must hope to live unknown:
 Their deeds will place thy virtue full in sight;
 Thy vice, if vice thou hast, in stronger light.
 If to thy fair beginnings nobly true, [do:
 Think what the world may claim, and thou must
 The honours, that already grace thy name,
 Have fixt thy choice, and force thee into fame.
 Ev'n she, bright Anna, whom thy worth has won,
 Inspires thee what to seek and what to shun:
 Rich in all outward grace, th' exalted fair
 Makes the soul's beauty her peculiar care.
 O, be your nuptials crown'd with glad increase
 Of son's in war renown'd, and great in peace;
 Of daughters, fair and faithful, to supply
 The patriot-race, till nature's self shall die!

Of the verses occasioned by Dr. Frazer's rebuilding part of the University of Aberdeen.

IN ancient times, ere wealth was learning's foe,
 And dar'd despise the worth, he would not know;
 Ere ignorance look'd lofty in a peer,
 And smil'd at wit, cast back in fortune's rear,
 The pious prelate †, truly good, and great,
 Courted the muses to this happy seat,
 Friend to instructive arts, he knew to prize,
 His bounty bade the mighty pile arise.
 Splendour adorn'd what knowing skill design'd,
 And the fair structure spoke his noble mind.

† Bishop Elphinstone.

The fabric finish'd, to secure the fame,
He styl'd it Royal, from the sov'reign's name *.

Here by successive worthies, well was taught
All that enlightens, and exalts the thought.
With labour planted, and improv'd with care,
Long, every cherish'd science flourish'd fair.
Thus, without cloud, serene the seasons roll'd:
Thus, learning saw renew'd the age of gold.

But now the years revolving backward ran,
And a dark series of worse time began.
Vile avarice, in Gordon's † form, arose;
Arts, unesteem'd, were govern'd by their foes;
Zeal, pious to a crime, reform'd the age,
And Gothic purity, and priestly rage.
Then fell, to low contempt, th' instructing trade,
And every muse's portion was unpaid!

Now, a lone waste the muse's seat appears,
By social foes defac'd, and length of years.
O'er her declining roofs, with moss o'erspread,
See! Time slow-creeping, walks with hostile
Silent, and sure, with unremitting toil, [tread:
He shakes each wall, and moulders every pile.
Ruin hangs hov'ring o'er the destin'd place;
And solitary silence comes apace!

Learning beheld with all a father's fear,
And mourn'd the total desolation near;
He saw the muses stretch the wing to fly,
And spoke his silent sorrow in a sigh!
From heav'n, in that sad hour, commission'd came
Fair Charity, in heaven the foremost name.
Compassion flew before her, sweetly bright;
And her meek eyes effulg'd unclouded light.

"Hear, and rejoice, the smiling power begun,
"Full of my deity, thy best lov'd son ‡;
"Thy injur'd rights, regardful, shall assert,
"and nobly take his suffering parent's part.
"He, thy first favourite, and thy dearest friend,
"Shall bid thy walls arise, thy roofs ascend.
"I see, all charm'd, I see the future frame,
"Arising, emulate its ancient name!
"I see thy long lost pomp shine out again,
"And every muse, returning, claim her reign!
"Nor ends the bounty here; by him bestow'd,
"Learning's rich stores shall thy museum load
"Whate'er, deep-hid philosophy has found;
"Or the muse sung, with living laurel crown'd;
"Or history descry'd, far-looking sage!
"In the dark doubtfulness of distant age: [bin'd,
"These, thy well chosen treasures, there com-
"Unwasting, shall enrich the youthful mind:
"But teach thy sons the gentle arts of peace;
"Let faction lose his rule, and discord cease.
"Rivals, alone, in love, and doing well,
"Be their fair emulation to excell.
"Then shall encourag'd arts successful thrive,
"And all the glory of thy name revive!"

PROLOGUE

TO THE SIEGE OF DAMASCUS,

Spoken by Lord Sandwich.

WHEN arts and arms, beneath Eliza's smile,
Spread wide their influence o'er this happy isle;
A golden reign, uncurst with party rage,
That foe to taste, and tyrant of our age;

* James IV. † Bishop William Gordon.
‡ James Frazer, Doctor of Laws.

Ere all our learning in a libel lay,
And all our talk, in politics or play!
The statesman oft would sooth his toils with wit,
What Spenser sung, and nature's Shakspeare writ;
Or to the laurell'd grove, at times, retire,
There, woo the muse, and wake the moving lyre.

As fair examples, like ascending morn,
The world at once enlighten and adorns;
From them diffus'd, the gentle arts of peace
Shot brightening o'er the land, with swift increase:
Rough nature soften'd in grace and ease;
Sense grew polite, and science sought to please.

Recliev'd from yon rude scene of party din,
Where open baseness vies with secret sin,
And safe embower'd in * Woburn's airy groves,
Let us recall the times our taste approves;
Awaken to our aid the mourning muse;
Through every bosom tender thought infuse;
Melt angry faction into moral sense,
And to his guests a Bedford's soul dispense.

And now, while spring extends her smiling reign,
Green on the mountain, flowery in the plain;
While genial nature breathes, from hill and dale,
Health, fragrance, gladness, in the living gale;
The various softness, stealing through the heart,
Impressions sweetly social, will impart.
When sad Eudocia pours her hopeless woe,
The tear of pity will unbidden flow!
When erring Phocyas, whom wild passions blind,
Holds up himself, a mirror for mankind;
An equal eye on our own hearts we turn,
Where frailties lurk, where fond affections burn:
And, conscious, nature is in all the same,
We mourn the guilty, while the guilt we blame!

EPILOGUE TO THE BROTHERS,

A TRAGEDY, BY DR. YOUNG.

To woman, sure, the most severe affliction
Is, from these fellows, point-blank contradiction.
Our bard, without—I wish he would appear---
Ud! I would give it him---but you shall hear---

Good Sir! quoth I---and curtle'd as I spoke---
Our pit, you know, expects and loves a joke---
'Twere fit to humour them: for, right or wrong,
True Britons never like the same thing long.
To-day is fair---they strut, huff, swear, harangue:---
To-morrow's foul---they sneak aside, and hang,
Is there a war---peace! peace! is all their cry:
The peace is made---then, blood! they'll fight and die.

Gallants, in talking thus, I meant no treason:
I would have brought, you see, the man to reason.
But with some folks, 'tis labour lost to strive:
A reasoning mule will neither lead nor drive,
He hum'd, and haw'd; then, waking from his dream
Cry'd, I must preach to you his moral scheme.
A scheme, forsooth! to benefit the nation?
Some queer, odd whim of pious propagation! †

* The siege of Damascus was acted at Woburn, by the Duke of Bedford, the Earl of Sandwich, and some other persons of distinction, in the month of May, 1743.

† The profits arising from this play were intended to be given, by the Author, to the Society for propagating Christian Knowledge.

Lord! talk so, here---the man must be a widgeon:---
Drury may propagate---but not religion.

Yet, after all, to give the devil his due,
Our author's scheme, though strange, is wholly new:

Well, shall the novelty then recommend it;
If not from liking, from caprice befriend it.
For drums and routs, make him a while your pas-
A little while let virtue be the fashion: [sion:
And, spite of real or imagin'd blunders,
Ev'n let him live, nine days, like other wonders.

PROLOGUE

TO MR. THOMSON'S AGAMEMNON.

WHEN this decisive night, at length, appears,
The night of every author's hopes and fears,
What shifts to bribe applause, poor poets try!
In all the forms of wit they court and lie:
These meanly beg it, as an alms; and those,
By boastful bluster dazzle and impose.

Nor poorly fearful, nor securely vain,
Ours would, by honest ways, that grace obtain;
Would, as a free-born wit, be fairly try'd:
And then---let candour, fairly too, decide.
He courts no friend, who blindly comes to praise;
He dreads no foe---but whom his faults may raise.

Indulge a generous pride, that bids him own,
He aims to please, by noble means alone;
By what may win the judgment, wake the heart,
Inspiring nature, and directing art;
By scenes, so wrought, as may applause command
More from the judging head, than thundering
hand.

Important is the moral we would teach---
Oh may this island practise what we preach---
Vice in its first approach with care to shun;
The wretch, who once engages, is undone.
Crimes lead to greater crimes, and link so straight,
What first was accident, at last is fate:

Guilt's hapless servant sinks into a slave;
And virtue's last sad strugglings cannot save.

"As such our fair attempt, we hope to see
"Our judges,---here at least---from influence free:
"One place,---unbias'd yet by party-rage,---
"Where only honour votes---the British stage.
"We ask for justice, for indulgence sue:
"Our last best licence must proceed from you."

IMPROMPTU,

On a Lady, who had passed some time in playing with a very young Child.

WHY, on this least of little misses,
Did Celia waste so many kisses?
Quoth Love, who stood behind and smil'd,
She kiss'd the father in the child.

EPIGRAM,

On seeing two persons pass by in very different equipages.

IN modern, as in ancient days,
See what the mules have to brag on:
The player in his own post-chaise;
The poet in a carrier's waggon!

EPIGRAM,

On a certain Lord's passion for a singer.

NERINA's angel-voice delights;
Nerina's devil-face affrights:
How whimsical her Strephon's fate,
Condemn'd at once to like and hate!
But be she cruel, be she kind,
Love! strike her dumb, or make him blind.

A SIMILE IN PRIOR,

APPLIED TO THE SAME PERSON

DEAR Thomas didst thou never pop
Thy head into a tin-man's shop?
There, Thomas, didst thou never see---
'Tis but by way of simile---
A squirrel spend its little rage,
In jumping round a rolling cage?
Mov'd in the orb, pleas'd with the chimes,
The foolish creature thinks it climbs;
But here or there, turn wood or wire,
It never gets two inches higher.
So fares it with this little peer,
So busy and so bustling here;
For ever flirting up and down,
And frisking round his cage, the town.
A world of nothing in his chat,
Of who said this, and who did that:
With similes, that never hit;
Vivacity, that has no wit;
Schemes laid this hour, the next forsaken;
Advice oft ask'd, but never taken:
Still whirl'd, by every rising whim,
From that to this, from her to him;
And when he hath his circle run,
He ends---just where he first begun.

ON AN AMOROUS OLD MAN.

STILL hovering round the fair at sixty-four,
Unfit to love, unable to give o'er;
A flesh-fly, that just flutters on the wing,
Awake to buzz, but not alive to sting;
Brisk where he cannot, backward where he can;
The teasing ghost of the departed man.

ON I. H. ESQ.

THE youth had wit himself, and could afford
A witty neighbour his good word.
Though scandal was his joy, he would not swear:
An oath had made the ladies stare,
At them he duly dress'd, but without passion:
His only mistress was the fashion.
Her verse with fancy glitter'd, cold and faint;
His prose, with sense, correctly quaint.
Trifles he lov'd; he tasted arts:
At once a fribble, and a man of parts.

A FRAGMENT.

FAIR morn ascends: soft zephyr's wing
O'er hill and vale renews the spring:
Where, sown profusely, herb and flower,
Of balmy swell, of healing power,

Their souls in fragrant dews exhale,
And breathe fresh life in every gale.
Here, spreads a green expanse of plains,
Where, sweetly pensive, silence reigns;
And there, at utmost stretch of eye,
A mountain fades into the sky;
While winding round, diffus'd and deep,
A river rolls with sounding sweep.
Of human art no traces near,
I seem alone with nature here!

Here are thy walks, O sacred Health!
The monarch's bliss, the beggar's wealth;
The seasoning of all good below!
The sovereign friend in joy or woe!
O thou, most courted, most despis'd,
And but in absence duly priz'd!
Power of the soft and rosy face!
The vivid pulse, the vermil grace,
The spirits when they gayest shine,
Youth, beauty, pleasure, all are thine!
Of sun of life! whose heavenly ray
Lights up and cheers our various day,
The turbulence of hopes and fears,
The storm of fate, the cloud of years,
Till nature, with thy parting light,
Reposes late in death's calm night:
Fled from the trophy'd roofs of state,
Abodes of splendid pain and hate;
Fled from the couch, where, in sweet sleep,
Hot riot would his anguish steep,
But tosses through the midnight-shade,
Of death, of life, alike afraid;
For ever fled to shady cell,
Where temperance, where the muses dwell;
Thou oft art seen, at early dawn,
Slow-pacing o'er the breezy lawn:
Or on the brow of mountain high,
In silence feasting ear and eye,
With song and prospect, which abound
From birds, and woods, and waters round.

But when the sun, with noon-tide ray,
Flames forth intolerable day;
While heat sits fervent on the plain,
With thirst and languor in his train:
All nature sickening in the blaze:
Thou, in the wild and woody maze,
That clouds the vale with umbrage deep,
Impendent from the neighbouring steep,
Wilt find betimes a calm retreat,
Where breathing coolness has her seat.

There, plung'd amid the shadows brown,
Imagination lays him down;
Attentive, in his airy mood,
To every murmur of the wood:
The bee in yonder flowery nook;
The chidings of the headlong brook;
The green leaf shivering in the gale;
The warbling hill, the lowing vale;
The distant woodman's echoing stroke;
The thunder of the falling oak.
From thought to thought in vision led,
He holds high converse with the dead;
Sages, or poets. See they rise!
And shadowy skim before his eyes.
Hark! Orpheus strikes the lyre again,
That softens savages to men:

Lo! Socrates, the sent of heaven,
To whom its moral will was given.
Fathers and friends of human kind,
They form'd the nations, or refin'd;
With all that mends the head and heart,
Enlightening truth, adorning art.

While thus I mus'd beneath the shade,
At once the sounding breeze was laid:
And nature, by the unknown law,
Shook deep with reverential awe.
Dumb silence grew upon the hour;
A browner night involv'd the bower:
When issuing from the inmost wood,
Appear'd fair freedom's genius good.
O Freedom! sovereign boon of heaven;
Great charter, with our being given;
For which the patriot, and the sage,
Have plann'd, have bled through every age!
High privilege of human race,
Beyond a mortal monarch's grace:
Who could not give, nor can reclaim,
What but from God immediate came?

CUPID AND HYMEN:

OR THE WEDDING-DAY.

THE rising morn, serenely still,
Had brightening spread o'er vale and hill.
Not those loose beams that wanton play,
To light the mirth of giddy May;
Nor such red heats as burn the plain,
In ardent Summer's feverish reign:
But rays, all equal, soft and sober,
To suit the second of October;
To suit the pair, whose wedding-day
This sun now gilds with annual ray.

Just then, where our good-natur'd Thames is
Some four short miles above St James's,
And deigns, with silver-streaming wave,
Th' abodes of earth-born pride to lave,
Aloft in air two gods were soaring;
While Putney-cits beneath lay snoring,
Plung'd deep in dreams of ten per cent,
On sums to their dear country lent:
Two gods of no inferior fame,
Whom ancient wits with reverence name;
Though wiser moderns much disparage—
I mean the gods of love and marriage.

But Cupid first, his wit to show,
Assuming a mere modern beau,
Whose utmost aim is idle mirth,
Look'd—just as coxcombs look on earth:
Then rais'd his chin, then cock'd his hat,
To grace this common-place chit-chat;
How! on the wing, by break of dawn!
Dear brother—there he forc'd a yawn—
To tell men, sunk in sleep profound,
They must, ere night, be gag'd and bound!
Who, having once put on thy chain,
'Tis odds, may ne'er sleep sound again.
So say the wits: but wiser folks
Still marry, and condemn their jokes:
They know, each better bliss is thine,
Pure nectar, genuine from the vine!
And Love's own hand that nectar pours,
Which never fails, nor ever sours;

Well, be it so: yet there are fools,
 Who dare demur to former rules;
 Who laugh profanely at their betters,
 And find no freedom plac'd in fetters;
 But, well or ill, jog on through life
 Without that sov'reign bliss, a wife.
 Leave these at least, these sad dogs free,
 To stroll with Bacchus and with me;
 And sup, in Middlesex, or Surrey,
 On coarse cold beef, and Fanny Murray.

Thus Cupid---and with such a leer,
 You would have sworn 'twas Ligonier,
 While Hymen soberly reply'd,
 Yet with an air of conscious pride:

Just come from yonder wretched scene,
 Where all is venal, false, and mean,
 (Looking on London as he spoke).
 I marvel not at thy dull joke;
 Nor, in such cant, to hear thee vapour,
 Thy quiver lin'd with South-sea paper;
 Thine arrows feather'd, at the tail,
 With India-bonds, for hearts on sale;
 Their other ends too, as is meet,
 Tipp'd with gold points from Lombard-street,
 But could'st thou for a moment quit
 These airs of fashionable wit,
 And re-assume thy nobler name---
 Look that way, where I turn my flame---
 He said, and held his torch inclin'd,
 Which, pointed so, still brighter shin'd---
 Behold yon couple, arm in arm,
 Whom I, eight years, have known to charm;
 And, while they wear my willing chains,
 A god dares swear that neither feigns.
 This morn that bound their mutual vow,
 That blest them first, and blesses now,
 They grateful hail! and, from the soul,
 With thousands o'er both heads may roll;
 Till, from life's banquet, either guest,
 Embracing, may retire to rest.
 Come then, all raillery laid aside,
 Let this their day serenely glide:
 With mine thy serious aim unite,
 And both some proper guests invite;
 That not one minute's running sand
 May find their pleasures at a stand.

At this severe and sad rebuke,
 Enough to make a coxcomb puke;
 Poor Cupid, blushing, shrugg'd and winc'd,
 Not yet consenting, though convinc'd:
 For 'tis your witling's greatest terror,
 Ev'n when he feels to own his error.
 Yet, with a look of arch grimace,
 He took his penitential face:
 Said, 'twas perhaps, the surer play,
 To give your grave good souls their way:
 That, as true humour was grown scarce,
 He chose to see a sober farce;
 For, of all cattle and all fowl,
 Your solemn-looking ass and owl
 Rais'd much more mirth, he durst aver it,
 Than those jack-puddings, pug and parrot.

He said, and eastward spread his wing,
 From London some few friends to bring.
 His brother too, with sober cheer,
 For the same end did westward steer:

But first, a pensive love forlorn,
 Who three long weeping years has borne
 His torch revers'd, and all around,
 Where once it flam'd, with cypress bound,
 Sent off, to call a neighbouring friend,
 On whom the mournful train attend:
 And bid him, this one day, at least,
 For such a pair, at such a feast,
 Strip off the sable veil, and wear
 His once-gay look and happier air.

But Hymen, speeding forward still,
 Observ'd * a man on Richmond-hill,
 Who now first tries a country life;
 Perhaps, to fit him for a wife.
 But, though not much on this he reckon'd,
 The passing god look'd in and beckon'd:
 He knows him rich in social merit,
 With independent taste and spirit;
 Though he will laugh with men of whim,
 For fear such men should laugh at him.

But lo, already on his way,
 In due observance of the day,
 A friend and favourite of the nine,
 Who can, but seldom cares to shine,
 And one sole virtue would arrive at---
 To keep his many virtues private.
 Who tends, well pleas'd, yet as by stealth,
 His lov'd companions ease and health:
 Or in his garden, barring out
 The noise of every neighbouring rout,
 At pensive hour of eve and prime,
 Marks how the various hand of time
 Now feeds and rears, now starves and slaughters,
 His vegetable sons and daughters.

While these are on their way, behold!
 Dan Cupid, from his London-fold,
 First seeks and sends his new Lord Warden †
 Of all the nymphs in Covent-Garden:
 Brave as the sword he wears in fight;
 Sincere, and briefly in the right;
 Whom never minister or king
 Saw meanly cringing in their ring.

A second see! of special note,
 Plump Comus ‡ in a colonel's coat;
 Whom we, this day, expect from far,
 A jolly first-rate man of war;
 On whom we boldly dare repose,
 To meet our friends, or meet our foes.

Or comes a brother in his stead?
 Strong-body'd too, and strong of head:
 Who, in whatever path he goes,
 Still looks right on before his nose;
 And holds it little less than treason,
 To baulk his stomach or his reason.

* A. Mitchell, Esq. Minister at the Court of Prussia.

† The late General Skelton. He had just then purchased a House in Henrietta-street.

‡ The late Col. Caroline Scott; who though extremely corpulent, was uncommonly active; and who, to much skill, spirit, and bravery, as an officer, joined the greatest gentleness of manners as a companion and friend. He died a sacrifice to the public, in the service of the East-India Company, at Bengal, in the year 1755.

True to his mistress and his meat,
He eats to love, and loves to eat.

Last comes a virgin—pray admire her !
Cupid himself attends, to squire her :
A welcome guests'd ! we much had mist her ;
For 'tis our Kitty, or his sister.
But, Cupid, let no knave or fool
Snap up this lamb, to shear her wool ;
No teague of that unblushing band,
Just landed, or about to land ;
Thieves from the womb, and train'd at nurse,
To steal an heiress or a purse.
No scraping, saving, saucy cit,
Sworn foe of breeding, worth, and wit ;
No half-form'd insect of a peer,
With neither land nor conscience clear ;
Who if he can, 'tis all he can do,
Just spell the motto on his landau.
From all, from each of these defend her ;
But thou and Hymen both befriend her,
With truth, taste, honour, in a mate,
And much good sense, and some estate.

But now, suppose th' assembly met,
And round the table cordial set ;
While in fair order, to their wish,
Plain neatness sends up every dish,
And Pleasure at the side-board stands,
A nectar'd goblet in his hands,
To pour libations, in due measure,
As reason wills when join'd with pleasure—
Let these white moments all be gay,
Without one cloud of dim allay :
In every face let joy be seen,
As truth sincere, as hope serene :
Let friendship, love, and wit combine,
To flavour both the meat and wine,
With that rich relish to each sense,
Which they, and they alone, dispense ;
Let music too their mirth prolong,
With warbled air and festive song :
Then, when at eve, the star of love
Glow with soft radiance from above,

And each companionable guest
Withdraws, replenish'd, not oppress'd,
Let each, well-pleas'd, at parting say—
My life be such a wedding-day !

EPIGRAM :

WRITTEN AT TUNBRIDGE WELLS, M,DCC,LX.

WHEN Churchill led his legions on,
Success still follow'd where he shone.
And are those triumphs, with the dead,
All from his house, for ever fled ?
Not so: by softer surer arms,
They yet survive in beauty's charms ;
For, look on blooming Pembroke's face,
Even now he triumphs in his race.

AN ODE IN THE MASQUE OF ALFRED :

Sung by a Shepherdess who has lost her lover in the wars.

A YOUTH, adorn'd with every art,
To warm and win the coldest heart,
In secret mine possessest.
The morning bud that fairest blows,
The vernal oak that straightest grows,
His face and shape exprest.

In moving sounds he told his tale,
Soft as the sighings of the gale,
That wakes the flowery year.
What wonder he could charm with ease,
Whom happy nature taught to please,
Whom honour made sincere.

At morn he left me—fought—and fell !
The fatal evening heard his knell,
And saw the tears I shed :
Tears that must ever, ever fall ;
For ah ! no sighs the past recall,
No cries awake the dead !

THE EXCURSION; A POEM.

IN TWO CANTOS.

CONTENTS.

CANTO I.

INVOCATION, addressed to Fancy. Subject proposed; a short excursive survey of the Earth and Heavens. The poem opens with a description of the face of Nature in the different scenes of morning, sun-rise, noon, with a thunder-storm, evening, night, and a particular night-piece, with the character of a friend deceased.

With the return of morning Fancy continues her excursion, first northward—A view of the arctic continent and the deserts of Tartary—From thence southward: a general prospect of the globe, followed by another of the mid-land part of Europe, suppose Italy. A city there upon the point of being swallowed up by an earthquake: signs that usher it in: described in its causes and effects at length—Eruption of a burning mountain, happening at the same time and from the same causes, likewise described.

CANTO II.

CONTAINS, on the same plan, a survey of the solar system, and of the fixed stars.

This poem is among the author's earliest performances. Whether the writing may, in some degree, atone for the irregularity of the composition, which he confesses, and does not even attempt to excuse, is submitted entirely to the candour of the reader.

CANTO I.

COMPANION of the muse, creative power,
Imagination! at whose great command
Arise unnumber'd images of things,
Thy hourly offspring: thou, who canst at will
People with air-born shapes the silent wood,
And solitary vale, thy own domain,
Where contemplation haunts; oh come, invok'd,
To waft me on thy many-tinctur'd wing,
O'er earth's extended space: and thence, on high,
Spread to superior worlds thy bolder flight,
Excursive, unconfin'd. Hence from the haunts
Of vice and folly, vanity and man—

To yon expanse of plains, where truth delights,
Simple of heart; and hand in hand with her,
Where blameless virtue walks. Now parting
Parent of beauty and of song, has left [spring,
His mantle, flower-embroider'd on the ground.
While summer laughing comes, and bids the months

Crown his prime season with their choicest stores;
Fresh roses opening to the solar ray,
And fruits slow-swelling on the loaded bough.

Here let me frequent roam, preventing morn,
Attentive to the cock, whose early throat,
Heard from the distant village in the vale,
Crows cheerly out, far sounding through the gloom.

Night hears from where, wide-hovering in mid-
She rules the fable hour: and calls her train
Of visionary fears; the shrouded ghost,
The dream distressful, and th' encumbent hag,
That rise to fancy's eye in horrid forms,
While reason slumbering lies. At once they fly,
As shadows pass, nor is their path beheld.

And now, pale-glimmering on the verge of heaven,

From east to north in double twilight seen,
A whitening lustre shoots its tender beam;
While shade and silence yet involve the ball.
Now sacred morn, ascending, smiles serene
A dewy radiance, brightening o'er the world.
Gay daughter of the air, for ever young,
For ever pleasing! lo, she onward comes,
In fluid gold and azure loose-array'd,
Sun-tinctur'd, changeful hues. At her approach,
The western gray of yonder breaking clouds
Slow-reddens into flame: the rising mists,
From off the mountain's brow, roll blue away
In curling spires; and open all his woods,
High waving in the sky: th' unconfined stream,
Beneath her glowing ray translucent shines.
Glad nature feels her through her boundless realms
Of life and sense: and calls forth all her sweets,
Fragrance and song. From each unfolding flower
Transpires the balm of life, that zephyr wafts,
Delicious, on his rosy wing: each bird,
Or high in air, or secret in the shade,
Rejoicing warbles wild his matin hymn.
While beasts of chase, by secret instinct mov'd,

Scud o'er the lawns, and plunging into night,
In brake, or cavern, slumber out the day.

Invited by the cheerful morn abroad,
See, from his humble roof, the good man comes
To taste her freshness, and improve her rise
In holy musing. Rapture in his eye,
And kneeling wonder speak his silent soul,
With gratitude o'erflowing, and with praise!

Now industry is up. The village pours
Her useful sons abroad to various toil:
The labourer here, with every instrument
Of future plenty arm'd; and there the swain,
A rural king amid his subject-flocks,
Whose bleatings wake the vocal hills afar.
The traveller too, pursues his early road,
Among the dews of morn. Aurora calls:
And all the living landscape moves around.

But see, the flush'd horizon flames intense
With vivid red, in rich profusion stream'd O'er heaven's pure arch. At once the clouds assume

Their gayest liveries; these with silvery beams
Fring'd lovely, splendid those in liquid gold:
And speak their sovereign's state. He comes, behold!

Fountain of light and colour, warmth and life!
The king of glory! round his head divine,
Diffusive showers of radiance circling flow,
As o'er the Indian wave up-rising fair
He looks abroad on nature, and invests,
Where-e'er his universal eye surveys,
Her ample bosom, earth, air, sea, and sky,
In one bright robe, with heavenly tinctures gay.

From this hoare hill, that climbs above the plain, [woods
Half-way up heaven ambitious, brown with
Of broadest shade, and terraced round with walks,
Winding and wild, that deep embowering rise,
Maze above maze, through all its shelter'd height;
From hence, th' æreal concave without cloud,
Translucent, and in purest azure drest;
The boundless scene beneath, hill, dale, and plain
The precipice abrupt; the distant deep,
Whose shores remurmur to the sounding surge;
The nearest forest in wide circuit spread,
Solemn recess, whose solitary walks,
Fair truth and wisdom love; the bordering lawn
With flocks and herds enrich'd; the daisy'd vale
The river's crystal, and the meadows green—
Grateful diversity! allure the eye
Abroad, to rove amid ten thousand charms.

These scenes, where every virtue, every muse
Delighted range, serene the soul, and lift,
Borne on devotion's wing, beyond the pole,
To highest heaven her thought; to nature's God,
First source of all things lovely, all things good,
Eternal, infinite! before whose throne
Sits sovereign bounty, and through heaven and Careless diffuses plenitude of bliss [earth
Him all things own: he speaks, and it is day,

Obedient to his nod, alternate night
Obscures the world. The seasons at his call
Succeed in train, and lead the year around.

While reason thus and rapture fill the heart;
Friends of mankind, good angels, hovering near,
Their holy influence, deep-infusing, lend;
And in still whispers, soft as zephyr's breath
When scarce the green leaf trembles, through her powers

Inspire new vigour, purer light supply,
And kindle every virtue into flame.
Celestial intercourse! superior bliss, [soul,
Which vice ne'er knew! health of th' enliven'd
And heaven on earth begun! Thus ever fix'd
In solitude, may I, obscurely safe,
Deceive mankind, and steal through life along,
As slides the foot of time, unmark'd, unknown!

Exalted to his noon the fervent sun,
Full-blazing o'er the blue immense, burns out
With fierce effulgence. Now th' embowering
maze

Of vale sequester'd, or the fir-crown'd side
Of airy mountain, whence with lucid lapse
Falls many a dew-fed stream, invites the step
Of musing poet, and secures repose
To weary pilgrim. In the flood of day,
Oppressive brightness deluging the world,
Sick nature pants: and from the cleaving earth
Light vapours, undulating through the air,
Contagious fly, engendering dire disease,
Red plague, and fever; or, in fogs aloft
Condensing, show a rustling tempest nigh.

And see, exhaling from th' Atlantic surge,
Wild world of waters, distant clouds ascend
In vapoury confluence, deepening cloud on cloud:
Then rolling dusk along to east and north,
As the blast bears them on his humid wing,
Draw total night and tempest o'er the noon!
Lo, bird and beast, impress'd by nature's hand
In homeward warnings through each feeling nerve,

Haste from the hour of terror and of storm.
The thunder now, from forth his cloudy shrine,
Amid conflicting elements, where dread
And death attend, the servants of his nod,
First, in deaf murmurs, sounds the deep alarm,
Heard from afar, awakening awful thought.
Dumb sadness fills this nether world: the gloom
With double blackness lours; the tempest swells,
And expectation shakes the heart of man.

When yonder clouds in dusky depth extend
Broad o'er the south; fermenting in their womb,
Pregnant with fate, the fiery tempest swells,
Sulphureous steam and nitrous, late exhal'd
From mine or unctuous soil: and lo, at once,
Forth darted in slant stream, the ruddy flash,
Quick-glancing, spreads a moment's horrid day.
Again it flames expansive; sheets the sky,
Wide and more wide, with mournful light around,
On all sides burning; now the face of things
Disclosing; swallowed now in tenfold night.
Again the thunder's voice, with pealing roar,
From cloud to cloud continuous roll'd along,
Amazing bursts! Air, sea, and shore resound.
Horror sits shuddering in the felon-breast,
And feels the deathful flash before it flies:
Each sleeping sin, excited, starts to view;
And all is storm within. The murderer, pale

VOL. IX.

With conscious guilt, though hid in deepest shade,
Hears and flies wild, pursued by all his fears:
And sees the bleeding shadow of the slain
Rise hideous, glaring on him through the gloom!
Hark! through th' aerial vault, the storm in-flam'd

Comes nearer, hoarsely loud, abrupt and fierce,
Peal hurl'd on peal incessant, burst on burst:
Torn from its base, as if the general frame
Were tumbling into chaos—There it fell,
With whirlwind-wing, in red diffusion flash'd.
Destruction marks its path, yon riven oak
Is hid in smouldering fires: surpris'd beneath,
The traveller ill-omen'd prostrate falls,
A livid corse. Yon cottage flames to heaven:
And in its farthest cell, to which the hour,
All-horrible, had sped their steps, behold!
The parent breathless lies; her orphan-babes
Shuddering and speechless round—O Power divine!

Whose will, unerring, points the bolt of fate!
Thy hand, though terrible, shall man decide
If punishment, or mercy, dealt the blow?

Appeas'd at last, the tumult of the skies
Subsides, the thunder's falling roar is hush'd:
At once the clouds fly scattering, and the sun
Breaks out with boundless splendour o'er the world,

Parent of light and joy! to all things he
New life restores, and from each drooping field
Draws the redundant rain, in climbing mists
Fast-rising to his ray; till every flower
Lift up its head, and nature smiles reviv'd.

At first 'tis awful silence over all,
From sense of late-felt danger; till confirm'd,
In grateful chorus mixing, beast and bird
Rejoice aloud to heaven: on either hand,
The woodlands warble, and the valleys low.
So pass the songful hours: and now the sun,
Declin'd, hangs verging on the western main,
Whose fluctuating bosom, blushing red,
The space of many seas beneath his eye,
Heaves in soft swellings murmuring to the shore,
A circling glory glows around his disk
Of milder beams: part, streaming o'er the sky,
Inflame the distant azure: part below
In level lines shoot through the waving wood,
Clad half in light, and half in pleasing shade,
That lengthens o'er the lawn. Yon evening
Lucid or dusk, with flamy purple edg'd, [clouds,
Float in gay pomp the blue horizon round,
Amusive, changeful, shifting into shapes
Of visionary beauty, antique towers
With shadowy domes and pinnacles adorn'd;
Or hills of white extent, that rise and sink
As sportful fancy lifts: till late, the sun
From human eye, behind earth's shading orb
Total withdrawn, th' aerial landscape fades.

Distinction fails: and in the darkening west,
The last light quivering, dimly dies away.
And now th' illusive flame, oft seen at eve,
Up-borne and blazing on the light-wing'd gale,
Glides o'er the lawn betokening night's approach
Arising awful o'er the eastern sky,
Onward she comes with silent step and flow,
In her brown mantle wrapt, and brings along
The still, the mild, the melancholy hour,
And meditation, with his eye on heaven.

X x

Musing, in sober mood, of time and life,
That fly with unreturning wing away
To that dark world, untravell'd and unknown,
Eternity! through desert ways I walk;
Or to the cypress-grove, at twilight shun'd
By passing swains. The chill breeze murmurs low,
And the boughs rustle round me where I stand,
With fancy all-arous'd.—Far on the left,
Shoots up a shapeless rock of dusky height,
The raven's haunt: and down its woody steep
A dashing flood in headlong torrent hurls
His sounding waters; white on every cliff
Hangs the light foam, and sparkles through the

Behind me rises huge a reverend pile [gloom.
Sole on his blasted heath, a place of tombs,
Waste, desolate, where ruin dreary dwells.
Brooding o'er sightless skulls, and crumbling bones,

Ghastful he sits, and eyes with stedfast glare.
(Sad trophies of his power, where ivy twines
Its fatal green around) the falling roof,
The time-shook arch, the column gray with moss,
The leaning wall, the sculptur'd stone defac'd,
Whole monumental flattery, mix'd with dust,
Now hides the name it vainly meant to raise.

All is dread silence here, and undisturb'd.
Save what the wind sighs, and the wailing owl
Screams solitary to the mournful moon,
Glimmering her western ray through yonder isle,
Where the sad spirit walks with shadowy foot
His wonted round, or lingers o'er his grave.

Hail, midnight-shades! hail, venerable dome!
By age more venerable; sacred shore,
Beyond time's troubled sea, where never wave,
Where never wind of passion, or of guilt,
Of suffering or of sorrow, shall invade
The calm sound night of those who rest below.
The weary are at peace: the small and great,
Life's voyage ended, meet and mingle here.
Here sleeps the prisoner safe, nor feels his chain,
Nor hears th' oppressor's voice. The poor and old,
With all the sons of mourning, fearless now
Of want or woe, find unalarm'd repose.

Proud greatness, too, the tyranny of power,
The grace of beauty, and the force of youth,
And name and place, are here—for ever lost!

But, at near distance, on the mouldering wall
Behold a monument, with emblem grac'd,
And fair inscription: where with head declin'd,
And folded arms, the virtues weeping round
Lean o'er a beauteous youth who dies below.

Thyrsis—'tis he! the wisest and the best!
Lamented shade! whom every gift of heaven
Profusely blest: all learning was his own.
Pleasing his speech, by nature taught to flow,
Persuasive sense and strong, sincere and clear.
His manners greatly plain; a noble grace,
Self-taught, beyond the reach of mimic art,
Adorn'd him: his calm temper winning mild;
Nor pity softer, nor was truth more bright.
Constant in doing well, he neither sought
Nor shunn'd applause. No bashful merit sigh'd Near him neglected: sympathizing he
Wip'd off the tear from sorrow's clouded eye
With kindly hand, and taught her heart to smile.

'Tis morning: and the sun, his welcome light,
Swift, from beyond dark ocean's orient stream,
Casts through the air, renewing nature's face

With heaven-born beauty. O'er her ample breast,
O'er sea and shore, light fancy speeds along,
Quick as the darted beam, from pole to pole,
Excursive traveller. Now beneath the north,
Alone with winter in his inmost realm,
Region of horrors! Here, amid the roar
Of winds and waves, the drifted turbulence
Of hail-mix'd snows, resides th' ungenial power,
For ever silent, shivering, and forlorn!
From Zembla's cliffs on to the straits surmis'd
Of Anian eastward, where both worlds oppose
Their shores contiguous, lies the polar sea,
One glittering waste of ice, and on the morn
Casts cold a cheerless light. Lo, hills of snow,
Hill behind hill, and Alp on Alp ascend,
Pil'd up from eldest age, and to the sun
Impenetrable; rising from afar
In misty prospect dim, as if on air
Each floating hill, an azure range of clouds.
Yet here, ev'n here, in this disastrous clime,
Horrid and harbourless, where all life dies,
Adventurous mortals, urg'd by thirst of gain,
Through floating isles of ice, and fighting storms,
Roam the wild waves, in search of doubtful shores,
By west or east; a path yet unexplor'd.

Hence eastward to the Tartar's cruel coast,
By utmost ocean wash'd, on whose last wave
The blue sky leans her breast, diffus'd immense
In solitary length the desert lies,
Where desolation keeps his empty court.
No bloom of spring, o'er all the thirsty vast,
Nor spiry grafs is found; but sands instead
In sterile hills, and rough rocks rising gray.

A land of fears! where visionary forms,
Of griesly spectres, from air, flood, and fire,
Swarm: and before them speechless horror stalks!
Here, night by night, beneath the starless dusk,
The secret hag and forcerer unblest
Their Sabbath hold, and potent spells compose,
Spoils of the violated grave: and now,
Late, at the hour that severs night from morn,
When sleep has silenc'd every thought of man,
They to their revels fall, infernal throng!
And as they mix in circling dance, or turn
To the four winds of heavens with haggard gaze;
Shot streaming from the bosom of the north,
Opening the hollow gloom, red meteors blaze,
To lend them light, and distant thunders roll,
Heard in low murmurs through the lowering sky.

From these sad scenes, the waste abodes of death,
With devious wing, to fairer climes remote
Southward I stray; where Caucasus in view,
Bulwark of nations, in broad eminence
Upheaves from realm to realm a hundred hills,
On from the Caspian to the Euxine stretch'd,
Pale-glittering with eternal snows to heaven.
From this chill steep, which midnight's highest shades [woods,

Scarce climb to darken, rough with murmuring
Imagination travels with quick eye
Unbounded o'er the globe, and wondering views
Her rolling seas and intermingled isles;
Her mighty continents out-stretch'd immense,
Where Europe, Asia, Africa, of old fame,
Their regions numberless extend: and where
To farthest point of west, Columbus late,
Through untry'd oceans borne to shores unknown,
Moor'd his first keel adventurous, and beheld

A new, a fair, a fertile world arise!
 But nearer scenes of happy rural view,
 Green dale, and level down, and bloomy hill,
 The Muse's walk, on which the sun's bright eye
 Propitious looks, invite her willing step.
 Here see, around me smiling, myrtle groves,
 And mountains crown'd with aromatic woods
 Of vegetable gold, with vales amidst,
 Lavish of flowers and fragrance; where soft
 Lord of the year, indulges to each field [spring,
 The fanning breeze, live spring, and sheltering
 grove.

In these blest plains, a spacious city spreads
 Its round extent magnificent, and seems
 'The seat of empire. Dazzling in the sky,
 With far-seen blaze her towery structures shine,
 Elaborate works of art! each opening gate
 Sends forth its thousands: peace and plenty
 Environ her. In each frequented school [round
 Learning exalts his head: and commerce pours
 Into her arms a thousand foreign realms.
 How fair and fortunate! how worthy all
 Of lasting bliss secure! Yet all must fail, [found.
 O'erturn'd and lost—nor shall their place be

A fullen calm unusual, dark and dead,
 Arises inauspicious o'er the heavens.
 The beamless sun looks wan; a sighing cold
 Winters the shadowed air; the birds on high,
 Shrieking, give sign of fearful change at hand:
 And now, within the bosom of the globe,
 Where sulphur stor'd, and nitre peaceful slept,
 For ages, in their subterranean bed, [streams,
 Ferments th' approaching tempest. Vapoury
 Inflammable, perhaps by winds sublim'd,
 Their deadly breath apply. Th' enkindled mafs,
 Mine fir'd by mine in train, with boundless rage,
 With horror unconceiv'd, dislodged bursts
 Its central prison—Shook from shore to shore,
 Reels the broad continent with all its load,
 Hills, forests, cities. The lone desert quakes:
 Her savage sons howl to the thunder's groan,
 And lightning's ruddy glare: while from beneath,
 Deaf distant roarings, through the wide profound,
 Rueful are heard, as when despair complains.

Gather'd in air, o'er that proud capital,
 Frowns an involving cloud of gloomy depth,
 Casting dun night and terror o'er the heads
 Of her inhabitants. Aghast they stand,
 Sad-gazing on the mournful skies around;
 A moment's dreadful silence! Then loud screams
 And eager supplications rend the skies.
 Lo, crowds on crowds, in hurry'd stream along,
 From street to street, from gate to gate roll'd on,
 'This, that way burst in waves, by horror wing'd
 To distant hill or cave: while half the globe,
 Her frame convulsive rocking to and fro,
 'Trembles with second agony. Upheav'd
 In surges, her vext surface rolls a sea.
 Ruin ensues: towers, temples, palaces,
 Flung from their deep foundations, roof on roof
 Crush'd horrible, and pile on pile o'erturn'd,
 Fall total—In that universal groan,
 Sounding to heaven, expir'd a thousand lives,
 O'erwhelm'd at once, one undistinguish'd wreck!

Sight full of fate! up from the centre torn,
 The ground yawns horrible a hundred mouths,
 Flashing pale flames—down through the gulfs profound,

Screaming, whole crowds of every age and rank,
 With hands to heaven rais'd high imploring aid,
 Prone to th' abyss descend; and o'er their heads
 Earth shuts her ponderous jaws. Part lost in night
 Return no more: part on the wafting wave,
 Borne through the darkness of th' infernal world,
 Far distant rise, emerging with the flood;
 Pale as ascending ghosts cast back to day,
 A shuddering band! Distraction in each eye
 Stares wildly motionless: they pant, they catch
 A gulp of air, and grasp with dying aim
 The wreck that drives along, to gain from fate,
 Short interval! a moment's doubtful life.
 For now earth's solid sphere asunder rent
 With final dissolution, the huge mass
 Fails undermin'd—down, down th' extensive seat
 Of this fair city, down her buildings sink!
 Sinks the full pride her ample walls enclos'd,
 In one wild havoc crash'd, with burst beyond
 Heaven's loudest thunder! Uproar unconceiv'd!
 Image of nature's general frame destroy'd!

How greatly terrible, how dark and deep
 The purposes of Heaven! At once o'erthrown,
 White age and youth, the guilty and the just,
 O, seemingly severe! promiscuous fall.
 Reason, whose daring eye in vain explores
 The fearful providence, confus'd, subdu'd
 To silence and amazement, with due praise
 Acknowledges th' Almighty, and adores
 His will unerring, wisest, justest, best!

The country mourns around with alter'd look.
 Fields, where but late the many-colour'd spring
 Sat gaily drest, amid the vernal breath
 Of roses, and the song of nightingales,
 Soft-warbled, silent languish now and die.
 Rivers ingulf'd their ample channels leave
 A sandy tract; and goodly mountains, hurl'd
 In whirlwind from their seat, obstruct the plain
 With rough encumbrance; or through depths of earth

Fall ruinous, with all their woods immers'd.

Sulphureous damps of dark and deadly power,
 Steam'd from th' abyss, fly secret over-head,
 Wounding the healthful air; whence foul disease,
 Murrain and rot, in tainted herds and flocks:
 In man fore sickness, and the lamp of life
 Dimm'd and diminish'd; or more fatal ill
 Of mind, unsettling reason overturn'd.
 Here into madness work'd, and boiling o'er
 Outrageous fancies, like the troubled sea
 Foaming out mud and filth: here downward sunk
 To folly, and in idly musing wrapt;
 Now chasing with fond aim the flying cloud:
 Now numbering up the drops of falling rain.

A while the fiery spirit in its cell
 Insidious slumbers, till some chance unknown,
 Perhaps some rocky fragment from the roof
 Detach'd, and roll'd with rough collusion down
 Its echoing vault, strikes out the fatal spark
 That blows it into rage. Shakes earth again,
 Wide through her entrails torn. To all sides
 flash'd,

The flames bear downward on the central deep,
 Immeasurable source, whence ocean fills [globe,
 His numerous seas, and pours them round the
 The liquid orb, through all its dark expanse,
 In dire commotion boils; and bursting way
 Up through th' unfounded bottoms of the main.

Where never tempest ruffled, lifts the deeps,
At once, in billowy mountains to the sky,
With raving violence. And now their shores,
Rebellowing to the surge, they swallow fierce,
O'er swelling mound and cliff: now swift and strange,

With reflux wave retreating, leave the beach
A naked waste of sands—Meantime, behold!

Yon neighbouring mountain rising bleak and
Its double top in sterile ashes hid, [bare,
But green around its base with oil and wine,
Gives sign of storm and desolation near:
Storehouse of fate! from whose infernal womb,
With fiery minerals and metallic ore
Pernicious freight, ascends eternal smoke:
Now wavering loose in air; now borne on high,
A dusky column heightening to the sun!
Imagination's eye looks down dismay'd
The steepy gulf, pale-flaming and profound,
With hourly tumult vex'd, but now incens'd
To sevenfold fury. First, discordant sounds,
As of a clamouring multitude enrag'd,
The dash of floods and hollow howl of winds
Through wintry woods or cavern'd ruins heard,
Rise from the distant depth where uproar reigns.
Anon, with black eruption, from its jaws,
A night of smoke, thick-driving, wave on wave,
In stormy flow, and cloud involving cloud,
Rolls surging forth, extinguishing the day;
With vollied sparkles mix'd, and whirling drifts
Of stones and cinders rattling up the air.
Instant, in one broad burst, a stream of fire,
Red-issuing, floods the hemisphere around.
Nor pause, nor rest; again the mountain groans.
Amazing, from its inmost cavern shook:
Again, with loudening rage, intensely fierce,
Disgorges pyramids of quivering flame,
Spire after spire enormous, and torn rocks,
Flung out in thundering ruins to the sky.

But see, in second pangs, the roaring hill
From forth its depth a cloudy pillar shoots,
Gradual and vast, in one ascending trunk
Of length immense, heav'd by the force of fire,
On its own base direct, aloft in air,
Beyond the soaring eagle's sunward flight.
Still as it swells, through all the dark extent,
With wonder seen! ten thousand lightnings play
In flash'd vibrations; and from height to height
Incessant thunders roar. No longer now
Protruded by the explosive breath below,
At once the shadow summit breaks away
To all sides round, in billows broad and black,
As of a turbid ocean stirr'd by winds,
A vapory deluge hiding earth and heaven.
Thus all day long: and now the beamless sun
Sets as in blood. A dreadful pause ensues;
Deceitful calm, portending fiercer storm.
Sad-night at once, with all her deep-dy'd shades,
Falls back and boundless o'er the scene. Suspense
And terror rule the hour. Behold, from far,
Imploring heaven with supplicating hands
And streaming eyes, in mute amazement fix'd,
Yon peopled city stands; each sadden'd face
Turn'd toward the hill of fears: and hark! once
more

The rising tempest shakes its sounding vaults,
Now faint in distant murmurs, now more near Rebounding horrible, with all the roar

Of winds and seas; or engines big with death,
That, planted by the wondrous hand of war
To shake the round of some proud capital,
At once dislodged, in one bursting peal
Their mortal thunders mix. Along the sky,
From east to south, a ruddy hill of smoke
Extends its ridge, with dismal light inflam'd.
Meanwhile, the fluid lake that works below,
Bitumen, sulphur, salt, and iron-scum,
Heaves up its boiling tide. The labouring mount
Is torn with agonizing throes—at once,
Forth from its side disparted, blazing pours
A mighty river, burping in prone waves,
That glimmer through the night, to yonder plain.
Divided there, a hundred torrent-streams,
Each ploughing up its bed, roll dreadful on,
Resistless. Villages, and woods, and rocks,
Fall flat before their sweep. The region round,
Where myrtle walks and groves of golden fruit
Rose fair, where harvest wav'd in all its pride,
And where the vineyard spread her purple store,
Maturing into Nectar, now despoil'd
Of herb, leaf, fruit, and flower, from end to end
Lies buried under fire, a glowing sea!

Thus roaming with adventurous wing the globe,
From scene to scene excursive, I behold
In all her workings, beauteous, great, or new,
Fair nature, and in all with wonder trace
The sovereign Maker, first, supreme, and best,
Who actuates the whole: at whose command,
Obedient fire a flood tremendous rise,
His ministers of vengeance, to reprove,
And scourge the nations. Holy are his ways,
His works unnumber'd, and to all proclaim
Unfathom'd wisdom, goodness unconfin'd.

CANTO II.

ENDLESS the wonders of creating power,
On earth, but chief on high through heaven dis-
play'd.

There shines the full magnificence unveil'd
Of majesty divine: refulgent there
Ten thousand suns blaze forth, with each his train

Of worlds dependent, all beneath the eye
And equal rule of one eternal Lord.
To those bright climes, awakening all her powers,
And spreading her unbounded wing, the muse
Ascending soars on, through the fluid space,
The buoyant atmosphere; whose vivid breath,
Soul of all sublunary life, pervades
The realms of nature, to her inmost depths
Diffus'd with quickening energy. Now still,
From pole to pole th' aerial ocean sleeps,
One limpid vacancy: now rous'd to rage
By blustering meteors, wind, hail, rain, or cloud
With thunderous fury charg'd, its billows rise,
And shake the nether orb. Still as I mount,
A path the vulture's eye hath not observ'd,
Nor foot of eagle trod, th' ethereal sphere
Receding flies approach; its circling arch
Alike remote, translucent, and serene.
Glorious expansion! by th' Almighty spread,
Whose limits who hath seen! or who with him
Hath walk'd the sun-pav'd circuit from old time,
And visited the host of heaven around!

Gleaming a borrow'd light, whence how small
The speck of earth, and dim air circumfus'd!
Mutable region, vex'd with hourly change.
But here, unruffled calm her even reign
Maintains external: here the lord of day,
The neighbouring sun, shines out in all its strength,
Noon without night. Attracted by his beam,
I thither bend my flight, tracing the source
Where morning springs; whence her innume-rous streams

Flow lucid forth, and roll through trackless ways
Their white waves o'er the sky. The fountain-orb,
Dilating as I rise, beyond the ken
Of mortal eye, to which earth, ocean, air,
Are but a central point, expands immense,
A shoreless sea of fluctuating fire,
That deluges all ether with its tide.
What power is that, which to its circle bounds
The violence of flame! in rapid whirls
Conflicting, floods with floods, as if to leave
Their place, and, bursting, overwhelm the world!
Motion incredible! to which the rage
Of oceans, when whole winter blows at once
In hurricane, is peace. But who shall tell
That radiance beyond measure, on the sun
Pour'd out transcendent! those keen-flashing rays
Thrown round his state, and to yon worlds afar
Supplying days, and seasons, life and joy!
Such virtue he, the majesty of heaven,
Brightness original, all-bounteous king,
Hath to his creature lent, and crown'd his sphere
With matchless glory. Yet not all alike
Resplendent: in these liquid regions pure,
Thick mists, condensing, darken into spots,
And dim the day. Whence that malignant light,
When Cæsar bled, which sadden'd all the year
With long eclipse. Some at the centre rise
In shady circles, like the moon beheld
From earth, when she her unenlighten'd face
Turns thitherward opaque: a space they brood
In congregated clouds; then breaking float
To all sides round. Dilated some and dense,
Broad as earth's surface each, by slow degrees
Spread from the confines of the light along,
Usurping half the sphere, and swim obscure
On to its adverse coast; till there they set,
Or vanish scatter'd: measuring thus the time,
That round its axle whirls the radiant orb.

Fairest of beings! first-created light!
Prime cause of beauty! for from thee alone,
The sparkling gem, the vegetable race, [charms,
The nobler worlds that live and breathe, their
The lovely hues peculiar to each tribe,
From thy unfailing source of splendour draw!
In thy pure shine, with transport I survey
This firmament, and these her rolling worlds,
Their magnitudes, and motions: those how vast!
How rapid these! with swiftness unconceiv'd,
From west to east in solemn pomp revolv'd,
Unerring, undisturb'd; the sun's bright train,
Progressive through the sky's light fluent borne
Around their centre. Mercury the first,
Near bordering on the day, with speedy wheel
Flies swiftest on, inflaming where he comes,
With sevenfold splendour, all his azure road.

Next Venus to the westward of the sun,
Full orb'd her face, a golden plain of light,
Circles her larger round. Fair morning-star!

That leads on dawning day to yonder world,
The seat of man hung in the heavens remote,
Whose northern hemisphere, descending, sees
The sun arise; as through the zodiac roll'd,
Full in the middle path oblique she winds
Her annual orb: and by her side the moon,
Companion of her flight, whose solemn beams,
Nocturnal, to her darken'd globe supply
A softer day-light; whose attractive power
Swells all her seas and oceans into tides,
From the mid-deeps o'erflowing to their shores.

Beyond the sphere of Mars, in distant skies,
Revolves the mighty magnitude of Jove,
With kingly state, the rival of the sun.
About him round, four planetary moons,
On earth with wonder all night long beheld,
Moon above moon, his fair attendants, dance,
These, in th' horizon, slow-ascending climb
The steep of heaven, and mingling in soft flow
Their silver radiance, brighten as they rise.
Those opposite roll downward from their noon
To where the shade of Jove, outstretch'd in length
A dusky cone immense, darkens the sky
Through many a region. To these bounds arriv'd,
A gradual pale creeps dim o'er each sad orb,
Fading their lustre; till they sink involv'd
In total night, and disappear eclips'd.
By this, the sage, who, studious of the skies,
Heedful explores these late-discover'd worlds,
By this observ'd the rapid progress finds
Of light itself: how swift the headlong ray
Shoots from the sun's height through unbounded space,

At once enlightening air, and earth, and heaven.
Last, outmost Saturn walks his frontier-round,
The boundary of worlds; with his pale moons,
Faint-glimmering through the darkness night has thrown,

Deep-dy'd and dead, o'er this chill globe forlorn:
An endless desert, where extreme of cold
Eternal sits, as in his native seat,
On wintry hills of never-thawing ice!
Such Saturn's earth; and yet ev'n here the light,
Amid these doleful scenes, new matter finds
Of wonder and delight! a mighty ring,
On each side rising from th' horizon's verge
Self-pois'd in air, with its bright circle round
Encompasseth his orb. As night comes on,
Saturn's broad shade, cast on its eastern arch,
Climbs slowly to its height: and at th' approach
Of morn returning, with like stealthy pace
Draws westward off; till through the lucid round,
In distant view th' illumin'd skies are seen.

Beauteous appearance! by th' Almighty's hand
Peculiar fashion'd.—Thine these noble works,
Great, universal ruler! earth and heaven
Are thine, spontaneous offspring of thy will,
Seen with transcendent ravishment sublime,
That lifts the soul to thee! a holy joy,
By reason prompted and by reason swell'd
Beyond all height—for thou art infinite!
Thy virtual energy the frame of things
Pervading actuates: as at first thy hand
Diffus'd through endless space this limpid sky,
Vast ocean without storm, where these huge globes

Sail undisturb'd, a rounding voyage each;
Observant all of one unchanging law.

Simplicity divine ! by this sole rule,
The Maker's great establishment, these worlds
Revolve harmonious, world attracting world
With mutual love, and to their central sun
All gravitating : now with quicken'd pace
Descending tow'rd the primal orb, and now
Receding flow, excursive from his bounds.
This spring of motion, this hid power infus'd
Through universal nature, first was known
To thee, great Newton ! Britain's justest pride,
The boast of human race ; whose towering
thought,

In her amazing progress unconfin'd,
From truth to truth ascending, gain'd the height
Of science, whither mankind from afar
Gaze up astonish'd. Now beyond that height,
By death from frail mortality set free,
A pure intelligence, he wings his way
Through wondrous scenes, new-open'd in the world
Invisible, amid the general quire
Of saints and angels, rapt with joy divine,
Which fills, o'erflows, and ravishes the soul !
His mind's clear vision from all darkness purg'd,
For God himself shines forth immediate there,
Through those eternal climes, the frame of things,
In its ideal harmony, to him
Stands all reveal'd.---

But how shall mortal wing
Attempt this blue profundity of heaven,
Unfathomable, endless of extent !
Where unknown suns to unknown systems rise,
Whose numbers who shall tell ? stupendous host !
In flaming millions through the vacant hung,
Sun beyond sun, and world to world unseen,
Measureless distance, unconceiv'd by thought !
Awful their order ; each the central fire
Of his surrounding stars, whose whirling speed,
Solemn and silent, through the pathless void,
Nor change, nor error knows. But, their ways,
By reason, bold adventurer, unexplor'd,
Instructed can declare ! What search shall find
Their times and seasons ! their appointed laws,
Peculiar ! their inhabitants of life,
And of intelligence, from scale to scale
Harmonious rising and in fix'd degree ;
Numberless orders, each resembling each,
Yet all diverse !---Tremendous depth and height
Of wisdom and of power, that this great whole
Fram'd inexpressible, and still preserves,
An infinite of wonders !---Thou, supreme,
First, Independent Cause, whose presence fills
Nature's vast circle, and whose pleasure moves,
Father of human kind ! the Muse's wing
Sustaining guide, while to the heights of heaven,
Roaming th' interminable vast of space,
She rises, tracing thy almighty hand
In its dread operations. Where is now
The seat of mankind, earth ? where her great scenes
Of wars and triumphs ? empires fam'd of old,
Assyrian, Roman ? or of later name,
Peruvian, Mexican, in that new world,
Beyond the wide Atlantic, late disclos'd ?
Where is their place ?---Let proud Ambition pause,
And sicken at the vanity that prompts
His little deeds---With earth, those nearer orbs,
Surrounding planets, late so glorious seen,
And each a world, are now for sight too small ;

Are almost lost to thought. The sun himself,
Ocean of flame, but twinkles from afar,
A glimmering star amid the train of night !
While in these deep abysses of the sky,
Spaces incomprehensible, new suns,
Crown'd with unborrow'd beams, illustrious shine ;
Arcturus here, and here the Pleiades,
Amid the northern host : nor with less state,
At sumless distance, huge Orion's orbs,
Each in his sphere refulgent, and the noon
Of Sirius, burning through the south of heaven.

Myriads beyond, with blended rays, inflame
The milky way, whose stream of vivid light,
Pour'd from innumerable fountains round,
Flows trembling, wave on wave, from sun to sun,
And whitens the long path to heaven's extreme :
Distinguish'd tract ! But as with upward flight,
Soaring, I gain th' immensurable steep,
Contiguous stars, in bright profusion sown
Through these wide fields, all broaden into suns,
Amazing, sever'd each by gulfs of air,
In circuit ample as the solar heavens.

From this dread eminence, where endless day,
Day without cloud abides, alone and fill'd
With holy horror, trembling I survey
Now downward through the universal sphere
Already past ; now up to the heights untry'd,
And of th' enlarging prospect find no bound !
About me on each hand new wonders rise
In long succession ; here pure scenes of light,
Dazzling the view ; here nameless worlds afar,
Yet undiscover'd : there a dying sun,
Grown dim with age, whose orb of flame extinct,
Incredible to tell ! thick, vapoury mists,
From every shore exhaling, mix obscure
Innumerable clouds, disspreading slow,
And deepening shade on shade ; till the faint
globe,

Mournful of aspect, calls in all his beams.
Millions of lives, that live but in his light,
With horror see, from distant spheres around,
The source of day expire, and all his worlds
At once involv'd in everlasting night !

Such this dread revolution : heaven itself,
Subject to change, so feels the waste of years.
So this cerulian round, the work divine
Of God's own hand, shall fade ; and empty night
Reign solitary, where these stars now roll
From west to east their periods : where the train
Of comets wander their eccentric ways,
With infinite excursion, through th' immense
Of ether, traversing from sky to sky
Ten thousand regions in their winding road,
Whose length to trace imagination fails !
Various their paths ; without resistance all
Through these free spaces borne : of various face ;
Enkindled this with beams of angry light,
Shot circling from its orb in sanguine showers :
That, through the shade of night, projecting huge,
In horrid trail, a spire of dusky flame,
Embody'd mists and vapours, whose fir'd mass
Keen vibrates, streaming a red length of air.
While distant orbs with wonder and amaze,
Mark its approach, and night by night alarm'd
Its dreaded progress watch, as of a foe
Whose march is ever fatal ; in whose train
Famine, and war, and desolating plague,

Each on his pale horse rides; the ministers
Of angry heaven, to scourge offending worlds!

But lo! where one, from some far world re-
turn'd,

Shines out with sudden glare through yonder sky,
Region of darkness, where a sun's lost globe,
Deep overwhelm'd with night, extinguish'd lies.
By some hid power attracted from his path,
Fearful commotion! into that dusk tract,
The devious comet, steep descending, falls
With all his flames, rekindling into life
Th' exhausted orb: and swift a flood of light Breaks forth diffusive through the gloom, and spreads

In orient streams to his fair train afar
Of moving fires, from night's dominion won,
And wondering at the morn's unhop'd return:

In still amazement lost, th' awaken'd mind
Contemplates this great view, a sun restor'd
With all his worlds! while thus at large her flight
Ranges these untrac'd scenes, progressive borne
Far through ethereal ground, the boundless walk
Of spirits, daily travellers from heaven;
Who pass the mystic gulf to journey here,
Searching th' Almighty maker in his works
From worlds to worlds, and, in triumphant quire
Of voice and harp, extolling his high praise.

Immortal natures! cloth'd with brightness
round,

Empyreal, from the source of light effus'd,
More orient than the noon-day's stainless beam.
Their will unerring; their affections pure,
And glowing fervent warmth of love divine,
Whose object God alone: for all things else,
Created beauty, and created good,
Illusive all, can charm the soul no more.
Sublime their intellect, and without spot,
Enlarg'd to draw truth's endless prospect in,
Ineffable, eternity and time;
The train of beings, all by gradual scale
Descending, sumless orders and degrees;
Th' unfounded depth, which mortals dare not try,

Of God's perfections; how these heavens first sprung

From unprolific night; how mov'd and rul'd
In number, weight and measure; what hid laws
Inexplicable, guide the moral world.

Active as flame, with prompt obedience all
The will of heaven fulfil: some his fierce wrath
Bear through the nations, pestilence, and war;
His copious goodness some, life, light, and bliss,
To thousands. Some the fate of empires rule,
Commission'd, sheltering with their guardian wings
The pious monarch, and the legal throne.

Nor is the sovereign nor th' illustrious great,
Alone their care. To every lessening rank
Of worth propitious, these blest minds embrace
With universal love, the just and good,
Wherever found; unpriz'd, perhaps unknown,
Deprest by fortune, and with hate pursued,
Or insult from the proud oppressor's brow.

Yet dear to heaven, and meriting the watch
Of angels o'er his unambitious walk,

At morn or eve, when nature's fairest face,
Calmly magnificent, inspires the soul

With virtuous raptures, prompting to forsake
The sin-born vanities, and low pursuits,

That busy human kind; to view their ways
With pity; to repay, for numerous wrongs,
Meekness and charity. Or, rais'd aloft,

Fir'd with ethereal ardour, to survey
The circuit of creation, all these suns

With all their worlds: and still from height to height,

By things created rising, last ascend
To that first cause, who made, who governs all,

Fountain of being, self-existent power,
All-wise, all-good, who from eternal age

Endures, and fills th' immensity of space;
That infinite diffusion, where the mind

Conceives no limits; undistinguish'd void,
Invariable, where no land-marks are,
No paths to guide imagination's flight.

AMYNTOR AND THEODORA:

OR,

THE HERMIT.

ADDRESSED TO THE EARL OF CHESTERFIELD.

P R E F A C E.

THE following poem was originally intended for the stage, and planned out, several years ago, into a regular tragedy. But the author found it necessary to change his first design, and to give his work the form it now appears in; for reasons with which it might be impertinent to trouble the public: though, to a man who thinks and feels in a certain manner, those reasons were invincibly strong.

As the scene of the piece is laid in the most remote and unfrequented of all the Hebrides, or western isles that surround one part of Great Britain; it may not be improper to inform the reader, that he will find a particular account of it, in a little treatise published near half a century ago, under the title of a voyage to St. Kilda. The author, who had himself been upon the spot, describes at length the situation, extent, and produce of that solitary island; sketches out the natural history of the birds of season that transigrate thither annually, and relates the singular customs that still prevailed among the inhabitants: a race of people then the most uncorrupted in their manners, and therefore the least unhappy in their lives, of any, perhaps, on the face of the whole earth. To whom might have been applied what an ancient historian says of certain barbarous nations, when he compares them with their more civilized neighbours: "plus valuit apud hos ignorantia vitiorum, quam apud Græcos omnia philosophorum præcepta."

They live together, as in the greatest simplicity of heart, so in the most inviolable harmony and union of sentiments. They have neither silver nor gold; but barter among themselves for the few necessaries they may reciprocally want. To strangers they are extremely hospitable, and no less charitable to their own poor; for whose relief each family in the island contributes its share monthly, and at every festival sends them besides a portion of mutton or beef. Both sexes have a genius to poetry; and compose not only songs, but pieces of a more elevated turn, in their own language, which is very emphatical. One of those islanders, having been prevailed with to visit the greatest trading town in North-Britain, was infinitely astonished at the length of the voyage, and at the mighty kingdoms, for such he reckoned the larger isles, by which they sailed. He would not venture himself into the streets of that city without being led by the hand. At sight of the great church, he owned that it was indeed a lofty rock; but insisted, that in his native country of St. Kilda, there were others still higher. However, the caverns formed in it, so he named the pillars and arches on which it is raised, were hollowed, he said, more commodiously than any he had ever seen there. At the shake occasioned in the people, and the horrible din that sounded in his ears upon tolling out the great bells, he appeared under the utmost consternation, believing the frame of nature was falling to pieces about him. He thought the persons who wore masks, not distinguishing whether they were men or women, had been guilty of some ill thing, for which they did not dare to show their faces. The beauty and stateliness of the trees which he saw then for the first time, as in his own island there grows not a shrub, equally surprised and delighted him: but he observed, with a kind of terror, that as he passed among their branches, they pulled him back again. He had been persuaded to drink a pretty large dose of strong waters; and upon finding himself drowsy after it, and ready to fall into a slumber, which he fancied was to be his last, he expressed to his companions the great satisfaction he felt in so easy a passage out of this world: for, said he, it is attended with no kind of pain.

Among such sort of men it was that Aurelius sought refuge from the violence and cruelty of his enemies.

The time appears to have been towards the latter part of the reign of King Charles the second: when those who governed Scotland under him, with no less cruelty than impolicy, made the people of that country desperate; and then plundered, imprisoned, or butchered them, for the natural effects of such despair. The best and worthiest men were oft the objects of their most unrelenting fury. Under the title of fanatics, or seditious, they affected to herd, and of course persecuted, whoever wished well to his country, or ventured to stand up in defence of the laws and a legal government. I have now in my hands the copy of a warrant, signed by King Charles himself, for military execution upon them without process or conviction: and I know that the original is still kept in the secretary's office for that part of the united kingdom. Thus much I thought it necessary to say, that the reader may not be misled to look upon the relation given by Aurelius in the second canto, as drawn from the wantonness of imagination, when it hardly arises to strict historical truth.

What reception this poem may meet with, the author cannot foresee: and, in his humble, but happy retirement, he needs not be over anxious to know. He has endeavoured to make it one regular and consistent whole; to be true to nature in his thoughts, and to the genius of the language in his manner of expressing them. If he has succeeded in these points, but above all in effectually touching the passions, which, as it is the genuine province, so it is the great triumph, of poetry; the candour of his more discerning readers will readily overlook mistakes or failures in things of less importance.

TO MRS. MALLET.

THOU faithful partner of a heart thy own,
Whose pain, or pleasure, springs from thine alone;
Thou, true as honour, as compassion kind,
That, in sweet union, harmonise thy mind:
Here, while thy eyes, for sad Amyntor's woe,
And Theodora's wreck, with tears o'erflow,
O may thy friend's warm wish to heaven prefer'd
For thee, for him, by gracious heaven be heard!
So her fair hour of fortune shall be thine,
Unmix'd; and all Amyntor's fondness mine.
So, through long vernal life, with blended ray,
Shall love light up, and friendship close our day:
Till, summon'd late this lower heaven to leave,
One sigh shall end us, and one earth receive.

CANTO I.

FAR in the watery waste, where his broad wave
From world to world the vast Atlantic rolls,
On from the piny shores of Labrador
To frozen Thulé east, her airy height
Aloft to heaven remotest Kilda lifts;
Last of the sea-girt Hebrides, that guard,
In filial train, Britannia's parent-coast.
Thrice happy land! though freezing on the verge
Of arctic skies; yet, blameless still of arts
That polish to deprave, each softer clime,
With simple nature, simple virtue blest!
Beyond Ambition's walk: where never War
Uprear'd his sanguine standard; nor unsheath'd,
For wealth or power, the desolating sword.
Where luxury, soft syren, who around
To thousand nations deals her nectar'd cup
Of pleasing bane, that soothes at once and kills,
Is yet a name unknown. But calm content
That lives to reason; ancient faith that binds
The plain community of guileless hearts
In love and union; innocence of ill
Their guardian genius: these, the powers that rule
This little world, to all its sons secure
Man's happiest life; the soul serene and sound
From passion's rage, the body from disease.
Red on each cheek behold the rose of health;
Firm in each sinew vigour's pliant spring,
By temperance brac'd to peril and to pain,
Amid the floods they stem, or on the steep
Of upright rocks their straining steps surmount,
For food or pastime. These light up their morn,
And close their eve in slumbers sweetly deep,
Beneath the north, within the circling swell
Of ocean's raging sound. But last and best,
What avarice, what ambition shall not know,
True liberty is theirs, the heaven-sent guest,
Who in the cave, or on th' uncultur'd wild,
With independence dwells; and peace of mind,
In youth, in age, their sun that never sets.

Daughter of heaven and nature, deign thy aid,
Spontaneous muse! O whether from the depth
Of evening forest, brown with broadest shade;
Or from the brow sublime of vernal Alp
As morning dawns; or from the vale at noon,
By some soft stream that slides with liquid foot;
Through bowery groves, where inspiration sits
And listens to thy lore, auspicious come!
O'er these wild waves, o'er this unharbour'd shore,
Thy wing high-hovering spread; and to the gale,
The boreal spirit breathing liberal round
From echoing hill to hill, the lyre attune
With answering cadence free, as best beseems
The tragic theme my plaintive verse unfolds.

Here, good Aurelius---and a scene more wild
The world around, or deeper solitude,
Affliction could not find---Aurelius here,
By fate unequal and the crime of war
Expell'd his native home, the sacred vale
That saw him blest, now wretched and unknown,
Wore out the slow remains of setting life
In bitterness of thought: and with the surge,
And with the sounding storm, his murmur'd moan,
Would often mix---Oft as remembrance sad
Th' unhappy past recall'd; a faithful wife,

Whom love first chose, whom reason long endear'd,
His soul's companion and his softer friend;
With one fair daughter, in her rosy prime,
Her dawn of opening charms, defenceless left
Within a tyrant's grasp! his foe profess'd,
By civil madness, by intemperate zeal
For differing rites, embitter'd into hate,
And cruelty remorseless!---Thus he liv'd:
If this was life, to load the blast with sighs;
Hung o'er its edge, to swell the flood with tears!
At midnight hour; for midnight frequent heard
The lonely mourner, desolate of heart,
Pour all the husband, all the father forth
In unavailing anguish; stretch'd along
The naked beach; or shivering on the cliff,
Smote with the wintry pole in bitter storm,
Hail, snow, and shower, dark-drifting round his head.

Such were his hours; till time, the wretch's
Life's great physician, skill'd alone to close,
Where sorrow long has wak'd, the weeping eye,
And from the brain, with baleful vapours black,
Each sullen spectre chase, his balm at length,
Lenient of pain, through every fever'd pulse
With gentlest hand infus'd. A pensive calm
Arose, but unassur'd: as, after winds
Of rustling wing, the sea subsiding flow
Still trembles from the storm. Now Reason first,
Her throne resuming, bid Devotion raise
To heaven his eye; and through the turbid mist,
By sense dark-drawn between, adoring own,
Sole arbiter of fate, one cause supreme,
All-just, all-wise, who bids what still is best,
In cloud or sunshine; whose severest hand
Wounds but to heal, and chastens to amend.

Thus, in his bosom, every weak excess,
The rage of grief, the fellness of revenge,
To healthful measure temper'd and reduc'd
By Virtue's hand; and in her brightening beam
Each error clear'd away, as sen-born fogs
Before th' ascending sun; through faith he lives
Beyond Time's bounded continent, the walks
Of Sin and Death. Anticipating heaven
In pious hope, he seems already there,
Safe on her sacred shore; and sees beyond,
In radiant view, the world of light and love,
Where Peace delights to dwell; where one fair morn

Still orient smiles, and one diffusive spring,
That fears no storm and shall no winter know,
Th' immortal year empurples. If a sigh
Yet murmurs from his breast; 'tis for the pangs
Those dearest names, a wife, a child must feel,
Still suffering in his fate: 'tis for a foe,
Who, deaf himself to mercy, may of heaven
That mercy, when most wanted, ask in vain.

The sun, now station'd with the lucid Twins,
O'er every southern clime had pour'd profuse
The rosy year; and in each pleasing hue,
That greens the leaf, or through the blossom glows
With florid light, his fairest month array'd:
While Zephyre, while the silver-footed dews,
Her soft attendants, wide o'er field and grove
Fresh spirit breathe, and shed perfuming balm.
Nor here, in this chill region, on the brow
Of winter's waste dominion, is unfelt
The ray ethereal, or unhail'd the rise

Of her mild reign. From warbling vale and hill,
With wild-thyme flowering, betony, and balm,
Blue lavender * and carmel's spicy root,
Song, fragrance, health, ambrosiate every breeze.

But, high above, the season full exerts
Its vernal force in yonder peopled rocks,
To whose wild solitude, from worlds unknown,
The birds of passage transmigrating come,
Unnumber'd colonies of foreign wing,
At Nature's summons their æreal state
Annual to found; and in bold voyage steer,
O'er this wide ocean, through yon pathless sky,
One certain flight to one appointed shore:
By heaven's directive spirit, here to raise
Their temporary realm; and form secure,
Where food awaits them copious from the wave,
And shelter from the rock, their nuptial leagues:
Each tribe apart, and all on talks of love,
To hatch the pregnant egg, to rear and guard
Their helpless infants, piously intent.

Led by the day abroad, with lonely step,
And ruminating sweet and bitter thought,
Aurelius, from the western bay, his eye
Now rais'd to this amusive scene in air,
With wonder mark'd; now cast with level ray
Wide o'er the moving wilderness of waves,
From pole to pole through boundless space diffus'd,
Magnificently dreadful! where, at large,
Leviathan, with each inferior name
Of sea-born kinds, ten thousand thousand tribes,
Finds endless range for pasture and for sport,
Amaz'd he gazes, and adoring owns
The hand Almighty, who its channell'd bed
Immeasurable sunk, and pour'd abroad,
Fenc'd with eternal mounds, the fluid sphere;
With every wind to waft large commerce on,
Join pole to pole, consociate sever'd worlds,
And link in bonds of intercourse and love
Earth's universal family. Now rose
Sweet evening's solemn hour. The sun declin'd
Hung golden o'er this nether firmament:
Whose broad cerulean mirror, calmly bright,
Gave back his beamy visage to the sky
With splendour undiminish'd; and each cloud,
White, azure, purple, glowing round his throne
In fair aerial landscape. Here, alone
On earth's remotest verge, Aurelius breath'd
The healthful gale, and felt the smiling scene
With awe-mix'd pleasure, musing as he hung
In silence o'er the billows hush'd beneath.
Wheu lo! a sound, amid the wave-worn rocks,
Deaf-murmuring rose, and plaintive roll'd along
From cliff to cavern: as the breath of winds,
At twilight hour, remote and hollow heard
Through wintry pines, high-waving o'er the steep
Of sky-crown'd Apenine. The sea-pye ceas'd
At once to warble. Screaming from his nest
The fulmar soar'd, and shot a westward flight
From shore to sea. On came, before her hour,
Invading night, and hung the troubled sky
With fearful blackness round †. Sad ocean's face

A curling undulation shivery swept
From wave to wave: and now impetuous rose,
Thick cloud and storm and ruin on his wing,
The raging south, and headlong o'er the deep
Fell horrible, with broad-descending blast.
Aloft, and safe beneath a sheltering cliff,
Whose moss-grown summit on the distant flood
Projected frowns, Aurelius stood appall'd:
His stunn'd ear smote with all the thundering main!
His eye with mountains surging to the stars!
Commotion infinite. Where yon last wave
Blends with the sky its foam, a ship in view
Shoots sudden forth, steep-falling from the clouds:
Yet distant seen and dim, till onward borne
Before the blast, each growing sail expands,
Each mast aspires, and all th' advancing frame
Bounds on his eye distinct. With sharpen'd ken
Its course he watches, and in awful thought
That power invokes, whose voice the wild winds
hear,

Whose nod the furge reveres, to look from heaven,
And save, who else must perish, wretched men,
In this dark hour, amid the dread abyss,
With fears amaz'd, by horrors compass'd round.
But O, ill-omen'd, death-devoted heads!
For death bestrides the billow, nor your own,
Nor others' offer'd vows can stay the flight
Of instant fate. And, lo! his secret seat,
Where never sun-beam glimmer'd, deep amidst
A cavern's jaws voraginous and vast,
The stormy genius of the deep forsakes:
And o'er the waves, that roar beneath his frown,
Ascending baleful, bids the tempest spread,
Turbid and terrible with hail and rain,
Its blackest pinion, pour its loudening blasts
In whirlwind forth, and from their lowest depth
Upturn the world of waters. Round and round
The tortur'd ship, at his imperious call,
Is wheel'd in dizzy whirl: her guiding helm
Breaks short; her masts in crashing ruin fall;
And each rent sail flies loose in distant air.
Now, fearful moment! o'er the foundering hull,
Half ocean heav'd, in one broad billowy curve,
Steep from the clouds with horrid shade impends---
Ah! save them, heaven! it bursts in deluge down
With boundless undulation. Shore and sky
Rebellow to the roar. At once engulf'd,
Vessel and crew beneath its torrent sweep
Are sunk, to rise no more. Aurelius wept:
The tear unbidden dew'd his hoary cheek.
He turn'd his step; he fled the fatal scene,
And brooding, in sad silence, o'er the sight
To him alone disclos'd, his wounded heart
Pour'd out to heaven in sighs: Thy will be done,
Not mine, supreme disposer of events!

But death demands a tear, and man must feel
For human woes: the rest submission checks.
Not distant far, where this receding bay *
Looks northward on the pole, a rocky arch
Expands its self-pois'd concave; as the gate,
Ample, and broad, and pillar'd massy-proof,
Of some unfolding temple. On its height
Is heard the tread of daily-climbing flocks, [food
That, o'er the green roof spread, their fragrant
Untended crop. As through this cavern'd path,

Involv'd in pensive thought Aurelius past,
Struck with sad echoes from the sounding vault
Remurmur'd shrill, he stopt, he rais'd his head;
And saw th' assembled natives in a ring,
With wonder and with pity bending o'er
A shipwreck'd man. All motionless on earth
He lay. The living lustre from his eye,
The vernal hue extinguish'd from his cheek:
And in their place, on each chill feature spread,
The shadowy cloud and ghastliness of death
With pale suffusion sat. So looks the moon,
So faintly wan, through hovering mists at eve,
Grey autumn's train. Fast from his hairs distill'd
The briny wave: and close within his grasp
Was clench'd a broken oar, as one who long
Had stemm'd the flood with agonizing breath,
And struggled strong for life. Of youthful prime
He seem'd, and built by nature's noblest hand;
Where bold proportion, and where softening grace,
Mix'd in each limb, and harmonis'd his frame.

Aurelius, from the breathless clay, his eye
To heaven imploring rais'd: then, for he knew
That life, within her central cell retir'd,
May lurk unseen, diminish'd but not quench'd,
He bid transport it speedy through the vale,
To his poor cell that lonely stood and low,
Safe from the north beneath a sloping hill;
An antique frame, orbicular, and rais'd
On columns rude; its roof with reverend moss
Light-shaded o'er; its front in ivy hid,
That mantling crept aloft. With pious hand
They turn'd, they chaf'd his frozen limbs, and
The vapoury air with aromatic smells: [sum'd
Then, drops of sovereign efficacy, drawn
From mountain plants, within his lips infus'd.
Slow, from the mortal trance, as men from dreams
Of dreful vision, shuddering he awakes:
While life, to scarce-felt motion, faintly lifts
His fluttering pulse, and gradual o'er his cheek
The rosy current wins its reflux way.
Recovering to new pain, his eyes he turn'd
Severe on heaven, on the surrounding hills
With twilight dim, and on the crowd unknown
Dissolv'd in tears around: then clos'd again,
As loathing light and life. At length in sounds
Broken and eager, from his heaving breast
Distraction spoke—down, down, with every fail.
Mercy, sweet heaven!—Ha! now while ocean sweeps

In tempest o'er our heads—My soul's last hope!
We will not part—help, help! yon wave, behold!
That swells betwixt, has borne her from my sight.
O, for a sun to light this black abyss!
Gone—lost—for ever lost! He ceas'd. Amaze
And trembling on the pale assistants fell:
Whom now, with greeting and the words of peace,
Aurelius bid depart. A pause ensued,
Mute, mournful, solemn. On the stranger's face
Observant, anxious, hung his fix'd regard:
Watchful his ear, each murmur, every breath,
Attentive seiz'd; now eager to begin
Consoling speech; now doubtful to invade
The sacred silence due to grief supreme.
Then thus at last: O from devouring seas,
By miracle escap'd! if, with thy life,
Thy sense return'd, can yet discern the hand
All-wonderful, that through yon raging sea,

Yon whirling west of tempest, led thee safe;
That hand divine with grateful awe confess,
With prostrate thanks adore. When thou, alas!
Wast number'd with the dead, and clos'd within Th' unfathom'd gulf; when human hope was fled,
And human help in vain—th' Almighty voice,
Then bade destruction spare, and bade the deep
Yield up its prey: that, by his mercy sav'd,
That mercy, thy fair life's remaining race,
A monument of wonder as of love,
May justify; to all the sons of men,
Thy brethren, ever present in their need.
Such praise delights him most—

He hears me not.
Some secret anguish, some transcendent woe,
Sits heavy on his heart, and from his eyes,
Through the clos'd lids, now rolls in better stream!
Yet, speak thy soul, afflicted as thou art!
For know, by mournful privilege 'tis mine,
Myself most wretched and in sorrow's ways
Severely train'd, to share in every pang
The wretched feel; to sooth the sad of heart;
To number tear for tear, and groan for groan,
With every son and daughter of distress.
Speak then, and give thy labouring bosom vent:
My pity is, my friendship shall be thine;
To calm thy pain, and guide thy virtue back,
Through reason's paths, to happiness and heaven.

The hermit thus: and, after some sad pause
Of musing wonder, thus the man unknown.
What have I heard?—On this untravell'd shore,
Nature's last limit, hemm'd with oceans round
Howling and harbourless, beyond all faith
A comforter to find! whose language wears
The garb of civil life; a friend, whose breast
The gracious meltings of sweet pity move!
Amazement all! my grief to silence charm'd
Is lost in wonder—but, thou good unknown,
If woes, for ever wedded to despair,
That wish no cure, are thine, behold in me
A meet companion; one whom earth and heaven
Combine to curse; whom never future morn
Shall light to joy, nor evening with repose
Descending shade—O, son of this wild world!
From social converse though for ever barr'd,
Though chill'd with endless winter from the pole,
Yet warm'd by goodness, form'd to tender sense
Of human woes, beyond what milder climes,
By fairer suns attemper'd, courtly boast;
O say, did e'er thy breast, in youthful life,
Touch'd by a beam from beauty all-divine,
Did e'er thy bosom her sweet influence own,
In pleasing tumult pour'd through every vein,
And panting at the heart, when first our eye
Receives impression! Then, as passion grew,
Did heaven consenting to thy wish indulge
That bliss no wealth can bribe, no power bestow,
That bliss of angels, love by love repaid?
Heart streaming full to heart and mutual flow
Of faith and friendship, tenderness and truth—
If these thy fate distinguish'd, thou wilt then,
My joys conceiving, image my despair,
How total! how extreme! For this, all this,
Late my fair fortune, wreck'd on yonder flood,
Lies lost and bury'd there—O, awful heaven!
Who to the wind and to the whelming wave

Her blameless head devoted, thou alone
 Can'st tell what I have lost—O, ill-starr'd maid!
 O most undone Amyntor!—Sighs and tears,
 And heart-heav'd groans, at this, his voice sup-
 The rest was agony and dumb despair. [press'd:
 Now o'er their heads damp night her stormy
 gloom

Spread, ere the glimmering twilight was expir'd,
 With huge and heavy horror closing round
 In doubling clouds on clouds. The mournful scene,
 The moving tale, Aurelius deeply felt:
 And thus reply'd, as one in nature skill'd,
 With soft assenting sorrow in his look,
 And words to sooth, not combat hopeless love.

Amyntor, by that heaven who sees thy tears!
 By faith and friendship's sympathy divine!
 Could I the sorrows heal I more than share,
 This bosom, trust me, should from thine transfer
 Its sharpest grief. Such grief, alas! how just?
 How long in silent anguish to descend,
 When reason and when fondness o'er the tomb
 Are fellow-mourners? He, who can resign,
 Has never lov'd: and wert thou to the sense,
 The sacred feeling of a loss like thine,
 Cold and insensible, thy breast were then
 No mansion for humanity, or thought
 Of noble aim. Their dwelling is with love,
 And tender pity; whose kind tear adorns
 The clouded cheek, and sanctifies the soul
 They soften, not subdue. We both will mix,
 For her thy virtue lov'd, thy truth laments,
 Our social sighs: and still, as morn unveils
 The brightening hill, or evening's misty shade
 Its brow obscures, her gracefulness of form,
 Her mind all-lovely, each ennobling each,
 Shall be our frequent theme. Then shalt thou
 From me, in sad return, a tale of woes, [hear
 So terrible—Amyntor, thy pain'd heart
 Amid its own, will shudder at the ills
 That mine has bled with—but behold! the dark
 And drowsy hour steals fast upon our talk.
 Here break we off: and thou, sad mourner, try
 Thy weary limbs, thy wounded mind, to balm
 With timely sleep. Each gracious wing from heaven
 Of those that minister to erring man,
 Near-hovering, hush thy passion into calm;
 Serene thy slumbers with presented scenes
 Of brightest visions; whisper to thy heart
 That holy peace which goodness ever shares:
 And to us both be friendly as we need.

CANTO II.

Now midnight rose, and o'er the general scene,
 Air, ocean, earth, drew broad her blackest veil,
 Vapour and cloud. Around th' unsleeping isle
 Yet howl'd the whirlwind, yet the billow groan'd;
 And, in mix'd horror, to Amyntor's ear
 Borne through the gloom, his shrieking sense
 appall'd.

Shook by each blast, and swept by every wave,
 Again pale memory labours in the storm:
 Again from her is torn, whom more than life
 His fondness lov'd. And now another shower
 Of sorrow, o'er the dear unhappy maid,
 Effusive stream'd; till late, through every power
 The soul subdued sunk sad to flow repose:

And all her darkening scenes, by dim degrees,
 Were quench'd in total night. A pause from pain
 Not long to last: for fancy, oft awake
 While reason sleeps, from her illusive cell
 Call'd up wild shades of visionary fear,
 Of visionary bliss, the hour of rest
 To mock with mimic shows. And lo! the deeps
 In airy tumult swell. Beneath a hill
 Amyntor heaves of overwhelming seas;
 Or rides, with dizzy dread, from cloud to cloud,
 The billows back. Anon, the shadowy world
 Shifts to some boundless continent unknown,
 Where solitary, o'er the starless void, [length,
 Dumb silence broods. Through heaths of dreary
 Slow on he drags his staggering step infirm
 With breathless toil; hears torrent floods afar
 Roar through the wild; and, plung'd in central
 Falls headlong many a fathom into night. [caves,
 Yet there, at once, in all her living charms,
 And brightening with their glow the brown abyss,
 Rose Theodora. Smiling, in her eye
 Sat, without cloud, the soft-consenting soul,
 That, guilt unknowing, had no wish to hide.
 A spring of sudden myrtles flowering round
 Their walk embower'd; while nightingales beneath

Sung spousals, as along th' enamell'd turf
 They seem'd to fly, and interchang'd their souls,
 Melting in mutual softness. Thrice his arms
 The fair encircled: thrice she fled his grasp,
 And fading into darkness mix'd with air---
 O turn! O, stay thy flight!--so loud he cry'd,
 Sleep and its train of humid vapours fled.
 He groan'd, he gaz'd around: his inward sense
 Yet glowing with the vision's vivid beam,
 Still, on his eye, the hovering shadow blaz'd;
 Her voice still murmur'd in his tinkling ear;
 Grateful deception! till returning thought
 Left broad awake, amid th' incumbent lour
 Of mute and mournful night, again he felt
 His grief inflam'd throb fresh in every vein.
 To frenzy stung, upstarting from his couch,
 The vale, the shore, with darkling step he roam'd,
 Like some drear spectre from the grave unbound:
 Then, scaling yonder cliff, prone o'er its brow
 He hung, in act to plunge amid the flood [voice
 Scarce from that height discern'd. Nor reason's
 Nor aw'd submission to the will of heaven,
 Restrains him; but, as passion whirls his thought,
 Fond expectation, that perchance escap'd,
 Though passing all belief, the frailer skiff,
 To which himself had borne th' unhappy fair,
 May yet be seen. Around, o'er sea and shore,
 He roll'd his ardent eye; but nought around
 On land or wave within his ken appears,
 Nor skiff, nor floating corse, on which to shed
 The last sad tear, and lay the covering mold!

And now, wide open'd by the wakeful hours
 Heaven's orient gate, forth on her progress comes
 Aurora smiling, and her purple lamp
 Lifts high o'er earth and sea: while, all-unveil'd,
 The vast horizon on Amyntor's eye
 Pours full its scenes of wonder, wildly great,
 Magnificently various. From this steep,
 Diffus'd immense in rolling prospect lay
 The northern deep. Amidst, from space to space
 Her numerous isles, rich gems of Albion's crown,

As flow th' ascending mists disperse in air,
Shoot gradual from her bosom: and beyond,
Like distant clouds blue-floating on the verge
Of evening skies, break forth the dawning hills.
A thousand landscapes! barren some and bare,
Rock pil'd on rock, amazing, up to heaven,
Of horrid grandeur: some with sounding ash,
Or oak broad-shadowing, or the spiry growth
Of waving pine high-plum'd, and all beheld
More lovely in the sun's adorning beam;
Who now, fair-rising o'er yon eastern cliff,
The vernal verdure tinctures gay with gold.

Meanwhile Aurelius, wak'd from sweet repose,
Repose that temperance sheds in timely dews
On all who live to her, his mournful guest
Came forth to hail, as hospitable rites
And virtue's rule enjoin: but first to him,
Spring of all charity, who gave the heart
With kindly sense to glow, his matin-song,
Superior duty, thus the sage address:

Fountain of light! from whom yon orient sun
First drew his splendour; source of life and love!
Whose smile now wakes o'er earth's rekindling face
The boundless blush of spring; O, first and best!
Thy essence, though from human sight and search,
Though from the climb of all created thought,
Ineffably remov'd; yet man himself,
Thy lowest child of reason, man may read
Unbounded power, intelligence supreme,
The Maker's hand, on all his works imprest,
In characters coeval with the sun,
And with the sun at last; from world to world,
From age to age, in every clime, disclos'd,
Sole revelation through all time the same.
Hail, universal Goodness! with full stream
For ever flowing from beneath the throne
Through earth, air, sea, to all things that have life:
From all that live on earth, in air and sea,
The great community of nature's sons,
To thee, first Father, ceaseless praise ascend!
And in the reverent hymn my grateful voice
Be duly heard, among thy works not least,
Nor lowest; with intelligence inform'd,
To know thee, and adore; with free-will crown'd,
Where virtue leads, to follow and be blest.
O, whether by thy prime decree ordain'd
To days of future life; or whether now
The mortal hour is instant, still vouchsafe,
Parent and friend, to guide me blameless on
Through this dark scene of error and of ill,
Thy truth to light me, and thy peace to cheer.
All else, of me unask'd, thy will supreme
Withhold or grant: and let that will be done.

This from the soul in silence breath'd sincere,
The hills steep side with firm elastic step
He lightly scal'd: such health the frugal board,
The morn's fresh breath that exercise respire
In mountain-walks, and conscience free from blame,
Our life's best cordial, can through age prolong.
There, lost in thought, and self-abandon'd, lay
The man unknown; nor heard approach his host,
Nor rais'd his drooping head. Aurelius mov'd
By soft compassion, which the savage scene,
Shut up and barr'd amid surrounding seas
From human commerce, quicken'd into sense
Of sharper sorrow, thus apart began:

O sight, that from the eye of wealth or pride,

Ev'n in their hour of vainest thought, might draw
A feeling tear; whom yesterday beheld
By love and fortune crown'd, of all possess
That fancy, trac'd in fairest vision, dreams;
Now lost to all, each hope that softens life,
Each bliss that cheers; there, on the damp earth
spread,

Beneath a heaven unknown, behold him now!
And let the gay, the fortunate, the great,
The proud, be taught, what now the wretched feel,
The happy have to fear. O man forlorn,
Too plain I read thy heart, by fondness drawn
To this sad scene, to sights that but inflame
Its tender anguish—

Hear me, heaven! exclaim'd
The frantic mourner, could that anguish rise
To madness and to mortal agony,
I yet would bliss my fate; by one kind pang,
From what I feel, the keener pangs of thought
For ever freed. To me the sun is lost:
To me the future flight of days and years
Is darkness, is despair—But who complains
Forgets that he can die. O, fainted maid!
For such in heaven thou art, if from thy seat
Of holy rest, beyond these changeful skies,
If names on earth most sacred once and dear,
A lover and a friend, if yet these names
Can wake thy pity, dart one guiding ray
To light me where, in cave or creek, are thrown
Thy lifeless limbs: that I—O grief supreme!
O fate remorseless! was thy lover sav'd
For such a task?—that I those dear remains,
With maiden-rites adorn'd, at last may lodge
Beneath the hallow'd vault; and, weeping there
O'er thy cold urn, await the hour to close
These eyes in peace, and mix this dust with thine
Such, and so dire, reply'd the cordial friend
In pity's look and language, such, alas!
Were late my thoughts. Whate'er the human heart
Can most afflict, grief, agony, despair,
Have all been mine, and with alternate war
This bosom ravag'd. Harken then, good youth;
My story mark, and from another's fate,
Pre-eminently wretched, learn thy own,
Sad as it seems, to balance and to bear.

In me, a man behold, whose morn serene,
Whose noon of better life, with honour spent,
In virtuous purpose, or in honest act,
Drew fair distinction on my public name,
From those among mankind, the nobler few,
Whose praise is fame: but there, in that true source
Whence happiness with purest stream descends,
In home found peace and love, supremely blest!
Union of hearts, consent of wedded wills,
By friendship knit, by mutual faith secur'd
Our hopes and fears, our earth and heaven the
At last, Amyntor, in my failing age, [same!
Fallen from such height, and with the felon-herd,
Robbers and outlaws, number'd—thought that still [shame!
Stings deep the heart, and clothes the cheek with
Then doom'd to feel what guilt alone should fear,
The hand of public vengeance: arm'd by rage,
Not justice; rais'd to injure, not redress;
To rob, not guard; to ruin, not defend:
And all, O sovereign reason! all deriv'd
From power that claims thy warrant to do wrong!

Her blameless head devoted, thou alone
 Can'st tell what I have lost—O, ill-starr'd maid!
 O most undone Amyntor!—Sighs and tears,
 And heart-heav'd groans, at this, his voice sup-

Be duly heard, among thy works not least,
Nor lowest; with intelligence inform'd,
To know thee, and adore; with free-will crown'd,
Where virtue leads, to follow and be blest.
O, whether by thy prime decree ordain'd
To days of future life; or whether now
The mortal hour is instant, still vouchsafe,
Parent and friend, to guide me blameless on
Through this dark scene of error and of ill,
Thy truth to light me, and thy peace to cheer.
All else, of me unask'd, thy will supreme
Withhold or grant: and let that will be done.

This from the soul in silence breath'd sincere,
The hills steep side with firm elastic step
He lightly scal'd: such health the frugal board,
The morn's fresh breath that exercise respires
In mountain-walks, and conscience free from blame,
Our life's best cordial, can through age prolong.
There, lost in thought, and self-abandon'd, lay
The man unknown; nor heard approach his host,
Nor rais'd his drooping head. Aurelius mov'd
By soft compassion, which the savage scene,
Shut up and barr'd amid surrounding seas
From human commerce, quicken'd into sense
Of sharper sorrow, thus apart began:

O sight, that from the eye of wealth or pride,

Ev'n in their hour of vainest thought, might draw
A feeling tear; whom yesterday beheld
By love and fortune crown'd, of all possess
That fancy, trac'd in fairest vision, dreams;
Now lost to all, each hope that softens life,
Each bliss that cheers; there, on the damp earth
spread,

Beneath a heaven unknown, behold him now!
And let the gay, the fortunate, the great,
The proud, be taught, what now the wretched feel,
The happy have to fear. O man forlorn,
Too plain I read thy heart, by fondness drawn
To this sad scene, to sights that but inflame
Its tender anguish—

Hear me, heaven! exclaim'd
The frantic mourner, could that anguish rise
To madness and to mortal agony,
I yet would bliss my fate; by one kind pang,
From what I feel, the keener pangs of thought
For ever freed. To me the sun is lost:
To me the future flight of days and years
Is darkness, is despair—But who complains
Forgets that he can die. O, fainted maid!
For such in heaven thou art, if from thy seat
Of holy rest, beyond these changeful skies,
If names on earth most sacred once and dear,
A lover and a friend, if yet these names
Can wake thy pity, dart one guiding ray
To light me where, in cave or creek, are thrown
Thy lifeless limbs: that I—O grief supreme!
O fate remorseless! was thy lover sav'd
For such a task?—that I those dear remains,
With maiden-rites adorn'd, at last may lodge
Beneath the hallow'd vault; and, weeping there
O'er thy cold urn, await the hour to close
These eyes in peace, and mix this dust with thine
Such, and so dire, reply'd the cordial friend
In pity's look and language, such, alas!
Were late my thoughts. Whate'er the human heart
Can most afflict, grief, agony, despair,
Have all been mine, and with alternate war
This bosom ravag'd. Harken then, good youth;
My story mark, and from another's fate,
Pre-eminently wretched, learn thy own,
Sad as it seems, to balance and to bear.

In me, a man behold, whose morn serene,
Whose noon of better life, with honour spent,
In virtuous purpose, or in honest act,
Drew fair distinction on my public name,
From those among mankind, the nobler few,
Whose praise is fame: but there, in that true source
Whence happiness with purest stream descends,
In home found peace and love, supremely blest!
Union of hearts, consent of wedded wills,
By friendship knit, by mutual faith secur'd
Our hopes and fears, our earth and heaven the
At last, Amyntor, in my failing age, [same!
Fallen from such height, and with the felon-herd,
Robbers and outlaws, number'd—thought that
still [shame!
Stings deep the heart, and clothes the cheek with
Then doom'd to feel what guilt alone should fear,
The hand of public vengeance: arm'd by rage,
Not justice; rais'd to injure, not redress;
To rob, not guard; to ruin, not defend:
And all, O sovereign reason! all deriv'd
From power that claims thy warrant to do wrong!

Her blameless head devoted, thou alone
 Can'st tell what I have lost—O, ill-starr'd maid!
 O most undone Amyntor!—Sighs and tears,
 And heart-heav'd groans, at this, his voice sup-
 The rest was agony and dumb despair. [press'd:
 Now o'er their heads damp night her stormy
 gloom

Spread, ere the glimmering twilight was expir'd,
 With huge and heavy horror closing round
 In doubling clouds on clouds. The mournful scene,
 The moving tale, Aurelius deeply felt:
 And thus reply'd, as one in nature skill'd,
 With soft assenting sorrow in his look,
 And words to sooth, not combat hopeless love.

Amyntor, by that heaven who sees thy tears!
 By faith and friendship's sympathy divine!
 Could I the sorrows heal I more than share,
 This bosom, trust me, should from thine transfer
 Its sharpest grief. Such grief, alas! how just?
 How long in silent anguish to descend,
 When reason and when fondness o'er the tomb
 Are fellow-mourners? He, who can resign,
 Has never lov'd: and wert thou to the sense,
 The sacred feeling of a loss like thine,
 Cold and insensible, thy breast were then
 No mansion for humanity, or thought
 Of noble aim. Their dwelling is with love,
 And tender pity; whose kind tear adorns
 The clouded cheek, and sanctifies the soul
 They soften, not subdue. We both will mix,
 For her thy virtue lov'd, thy truth laments,
 Our social sighs: and still, as morn unveils
 The brightening hill, or evening's misty shade
 Its brow obscures, her gracefulness of form,
 Her mind all-lovely, each ennobling each,
 Shall be our frequent theme. Then shalt thou
 From me, in sad return, a tale of woes, [hear
 So terrible—Amyntor, thy pain'd heart
 Amid its own, will shudder at the ills
 That mine has bled with—but behold! the dark
 And drowsy hour steals fast upon our talk.
 Here break we off: and thou, sad mourner, try
 Thy weary limbs, thy wounded mind, to balm
 With timely sleep. Each gracious wing from heaven
 Of those that minister to erring man,
 Near-hovering, hush thy passion into calm;
 Serene thy slumbers with presented scenes
 Of brightest visions; whisper to thy heart
 That holy peace which goodness ever shares:
 And to us both be friendly as we need.

CANTO II.

Now midnight rose, and o'er the general scene,
 Air, ocean, earth, drew broad her blackest veil,
 Vapour and cloud. Around th' unsleeping isle
 Yet howl'd the whirlwind, yet the billow groan'd;
 And, in mix'd horror, to Amyntor's ear
 Borne through the gloom, his shrieking sense
 appall'd.

Shook by each blast, and swept by every wave,
 Again pale memory labours in the storm:
 Again from her is torn, whom more than life
 His fondness lov'd. And now another shower
 Of sorrow, o'er the dear unhappy maid,
 Effusive stream'd; till late, through every power
 The soul subdued sunk sad to flow repose:

And all her darkening scenes, by dim degrees,
 Were quench'd in total night. A pause from pain
 Not long to last: for fancy, oft awake
 While reason sleeps, from her illusive cell
 Call'd up wild shades of visionary fear,
 Of visionary bliss, the hour of rest
 To mock with mimic shows. And lo! the deeps
 In airy tumult swell. Beneath a hill
 Amyntor heaves of overwhelming seas;
 Or rides, with dizzy dread, from cloud to cloud,
 The billows back. Anon, the shadowy world
 Shifts to some boundless continent unknown,
 Where solitary, o'er the starless void, [length,
 Dumb silence broods. Through heaths of dreary
 Slow on he drags his staggering step infirm
 With breathless toil; hears torrent floods afar
 Roar through the wild; and, plung'd in central
 Falls-headlong many a fathom into night. [caves,
 Yet there, at once, in all her living charms,
 And brightening with their glow the brown abyfs,
 Rose Theodora. Smiling, in her eye
 Sat, without cloud, the soft-consenting soul,
 That, guilt unknowing, had no wish to hide.
 A spring of sudden myrtles flowering round
 Their walk embower'd; while nightingales beneath

Sung spousals, as along th' enamell'd turf
 They seem'd to fly, and interchang'd their souls,
 Melting in mutual softness. Thrice his arms
 The fair encircled: thrice she fled his grasp,
 And fading into darkness mix'd with air---
 O turn! O, stay thy flight!---so loud he cry'd,
 Sleep and its train of humid vapours fled.
 He groan'd, he gaz'd around: his inward sense
 Yet glowing with the vision's vivid beam,
 Still, on his eye, the hovering shadow blaz'd;
 Her voice still murmur'd in his tinkling ear;
 Grateful deception! till returning thought
 Left broad awake, amid th' incumbent lour
 Of mute and mournful night, again he felt
 His grief inflam'd throb fresh in every vein.
 To frenzy stung, upstarting from his couch,
 The vale, the shore, with darkling step he roam'd,
 Like some drear spectre from the grave unbound:
 Then, scaling yonder cliff, prone o'er its brow
 He hung, in act to plunge amid the flood [voice
 Scarce from that height discern'd. Nor reason's
 Nor aw'd submission to the will of heaven,
 Restrains him; but, as passion whirls his thought,
 Fond expectation, that perchance escap'd,
 Though passing all belief, the frailer skiff,
 To which himself had borne th' unhappy fair,
 May yet be seen. Around, o'er sea and shore,
 He roll'd his ardent eye; but nought around
 On land or wave within his ken appears,
 Nor skiff, nor floating corse, on which to shed
 The last sad tear, and lay the covering mold!

And now, wide open'd by the wakeful hours
 Heaven's orient gate, forth on her progress comes
 Aurora smiling, and her purple lamp
 Lifts high o'er earth and sea: while, all-unveil'd,
 The vast horizon on Amyntor's eye
 Pours full its scenes of wonder, wildly great,
 Magnificently various. From this steep,
 Diffus'd immense in rolling prospect lay
 The northern deep. Amidst, from space to space
 Her numerous isles, rich gems of Albion's crown,

As flow th' ascending mists disperse in air,
Shoot gradual from her bosom: and beyond,
Like distant clouds blue-floating on the verge
Of evening skies, break forth the dawning hills.
A thousand landscapes! barren some and bare,
Rock pil'd on rock, amazing, up to heaven,
Of horrid grandeur: some with sounding ash,
Or oak broad-shadowing, or the spiry growth
Of waving pine high-plum'd, and all beheld
More lovely in the sun's adorning beam;
Who now, fair-rising o'er yon eastern cliff,
The vernal verdure tinctures gay with gold.

Meanwhile Aurelius, wak'd from sweet repose,
Repose that temperance sheds in timely dews
On all who live to her, his mournful guest
Came forth to hail, as hospitable rites
And virtue's rule enjoin: but first to him,
Spring of all charity, who gave the heart
With kindly sense to glow, his matin-song,
Superior duty, thus the sage address:

Fountain of light! from whom yon orient sun
First drew his splendour; source of life and love!
Whose smile now wakes o'er earth's rekindling face
The boundless blush of spring; O, first and best!
Thy essence, though from human sight and search,
Though from the climb of all created thought,
Ineffably remov'd; yet man himself,
Thy lowest child of reason, man may read
Unbounded power, intelligence supreme,
The Maker's hand, on all his works imprest,
In characters coëval with the sun,
And with the sun at last; from world to world,
From age to age, in every clime, disclos'd,
Sole revelation through all time the same.
Hail, universal Goodness! with full stream
For ever flowing from beneath the throne
Through earth, air, sea, to all things that have life:
From all that live on earth, in air and sea,
The great community of nature's sons,
To thee, first Father, ceaseless praise ascend!
And in the reverent hymn my grateful voice
Be duly heard, among thy works not least,
Nor lowest; with intelligence inform'd,
To know thee, and adore; with free-will crown'd,
Where virtue leads, to follow and be blest.

To rob, not guard; to ruin, not defend:
And all, O sovereign reason! all deriv'd
From power that claims thy warrant to do wrong!

A right divine to violate unblam'd
Each law, each rule, that, by himself observ'd,
The God prescribes whose sanction kings pretend.

O Charles! O monarch! in long exile train'd, Whole hopeless years, th' oppressor's hand to know

How hateful and how hard; thyself reliev'd,
Now hear thy people, groaning under wrongs
Of equal load, adjure thee by those days
Of want and woe, of danger and despair,
As heaven has thine, to pity their distress!

Yet, from the plain good meaning of my heart,
Be far the unhallow'd licence of abuse;
Be far th' bitterness of faintly zeal,
That impious hid behind the patriot's name
Masks hate and malice to the legal throne,
In justice founded, circumscrib'd by laws,
The prince to guard—but guard the people too:
Chief, one prime good to guard inviolate,
Soul of all worth, and sum of human bliss,
Fair freedom, birthright of all thinking kinds,
Reason's great charter, from no king deriv'd,
By none to be reclaim'd, man's right divine,
Which God, who gave, indelible pronounc'd.

But if, disclaiming this his heaven-own'd right,
This first best tenure by which monarchs rule;
If, meant the blessing, he becomes the bane,
The wolf, not shepherd, of his subject-flock,
To grind and tear, not shelter and protect,
Wide-wasting where he reigns—to such a prince,
Allegiance kept were treason to mankind;
And loyalty, revolt from virtue's law.

For say, Amyntor, does just heaven enjoin
That we should homage hell? or bend the knee
To earthquake, or volcano, when they rage,
Rend earth's firm frame, and in one boundless grave

Ingulf their thousands! Yet, O grief to tell!
Yet such, of late, o'er this devoted land,
Was public rule. Our servile stripes and chains,
Our sighs and groans resounding from the steep
Of wintry hill, or waste untravell'd heath,
Last refuge of our wretchedness, not guilt,
Proclaim'd it loud to heaven: the arm of power
Extended fatal, but to crush the head
It ought to screen, or with a parent's love
Reclaim from error; not with deadly hate,
The tyrant's law, exterminate who err.

In this wide ruin were my fortune sunk:
Myself, as one contagious to his kind,
Whom nature, whom the social life renounc'd,
Unsummon'd, unimpleaded was to death,
To shameful death adjudg'd; against my head
The price of blood proclaim'd, and at my heels
Let loose the murderous cry of human hounds.
And this blind fury of commission'd rage,
Of party-vengeance, to a fatal foe,
Known and abhorr'd for deeds of direst name,
Was given in charge: a foe, whom blood-stain'd zeal

For what—O hear it not, all-righteous heaven!
Lest thy rous'd thunder burst—for what was Religion's cause, had savag'd to a brute, [deem'd
More deadly fell than hunger ever stung
To prowl in wood or wild. His band he arm'd,
Sons of perdition, miscreants with all guilt
Familiar, and in each dire art of death

Train'd ruthless up. As tigers on their prey,
On my defenceless lands those fiercer beasts
Devouring fell: nor that sequester'd shade,
That sweet recess, where love and virtue long
In happy league had dwelt, which war itself
Beheld with reverence, could their fury 'scape;
Despoil'd, defac'd, and wrapt in wasteful flame:
For flame and rapine their consuming march,
From hill to vale, by daily ruin mark'd.
So, borne by winds along, in baneful cloud,
Embody'd locusts from the wind descend
On herb, fruit, flower, and kill the ripening year:
While, waste behind, destruction on their track
And ghastly famine wait. My wife and child
He dragg'd, the ruffian dragg'd—O heaven! do I,
A man, survive to tell it? At the hour
Sacred to rest, amid the sighs and tears
Of all who saw and curs'd his coward-rage,
He forc'd, unpitying, from their midnight-bed,
By menace, or by torture, from their fears
My last retreat to learn; and still detains
Beneath his roof accurst, that best of wives!
Emelia, and our only pledge of love,
My blooming Theodora!—Manhood there,
And nature bleed—Ah! let not busy thought
Search thither, but avoid the fatal coast:
Discovery, there, once more my peace of mind
Might wreck; once more to desperation sink
My hopes in heaven. He said: but O sad muse!
Can all thy moving energy, of power
To shake the heart, to freeze th' arrested blood,
With words that weep, and strains that agonize;
Can all this mournful magic of thy voice
Tell what Amyntor feels? O heaven! art thou—
What have I heard?—Aurelius! art thou he?—
Confusion! horror!—that most wrong'd of men!
And, O most wretched too! alas! no more,
No more a father—On that fatal flood,
Thy Theodora—At these words he fell.
A deadly cold ran freezing through his veins:
And life was on the wing her loath'd abode
For ever to forsake. As on his way
The traveller, from heaven by lightning struck,
Is fix'd at once immovable; his eye
With terror glaring wild; his stiffening limbs
In sudden marble bound! so stood, so look'd
The heart-smote parent at this tale of death.
Half-utter'd, yet too plain. No sign to rise,
No tear had force to flow; his senses all,
Through all their powers, suspended, and subdued
To chill amazement. Silence for a space—
Such dismal silence saddens earth and sky
Ere first the thunder breaks—on either side
Fill'd up this interval severe. At last,
As from some vision that to frenzy fires
The sleeper's brain, Amyntor waking wild,
A poinard, hid beneath his various robe,
Drew furious forth—Me, me, he cry'd, on me
Let all thy wrongs be visited; and thus
My horrors end—then madly would have plung'd
The weapon's hostile point—His lifted arm,
Aurelius, though with deep dismay and dread
And anguish shook, yet his superior soul
Collecting, and resuming all himself,
Seiz'd sudden: then perusing with strict eye,
And beating heart, Amyntor's blooming form;
Nor from his air or feature gathering aught

To wake remembrance, thus at length bespoke:
 O dire attempt! Whoe'er thou art, yet stay
 Thy hand self-violent; nor thus to guilt,
 If guilt is thine, accumulating add
 A crime that nature shrinks from, and to which Heaven has indulg'd no mercy. Sovereign Judge!
 Shall man first violate the law divine,
 That plac'd him here dependent on thy nod,
 Resign'd, unmurmuring, to await his hour
 Of fair dismissal hence; shall man do this,
 Then dare thy presence, rush into thy sight,
 Red with the sin, and recent from the stain,
 Of unrepented blood? Call home thy sense;
 Know what thou art, and own his hand most just,
 Rewarding or afflicting---But say on.
 My soul, yet trembling at thy frantic deed,
 Recalls thy words, recalls their dire import:
 They urge me on; they bid me ask no more---
 What would I ask? My Theodora's fate,
 Ah me! is known too plain. Have I then sinn'd,
 Good heaven! beyond all grace---But shall I blame
 His rage of grief, and in myself admit
 Its wild excess? Heaven gave her to my wish;
 That gift Heaven has resum'd: righteous in both,
 For both his providence be ever blest!

By shame repress'd, with rising wonder fill'd,
 Amyntor, slow recovering into thought,
 Submissive on his knee, the good man's hand
 Grasp'd close, and bore with ardour to his lips.
 His eye, where fear, confusion, reverence spoke,
 Thro' swelling tears, what language cannot tell,
 Now rose to meet, now shunn'd the hermit's glance,
 Shot awful at him: till, the various swell
 Of passion ebbing, thus he faltering spoke:
 What hast thou done? why sav'd a wretch unknown?

Whom knowing ev'n thy goodness must abhor.
 Mistaken man! the honour of thy name,
 Thy love, truth, duty, all must be my foes.
 I am---Aurelius! turn that look aside,
 That brow of terror, while this wretch can say,
 Abhorrent say, he is---forgive me, heaven!
 Forgive me, virtue! if I would renounce
 Whom nature bids me reverence---by her bond,
 Rolando's son: by your more sacred ties,
 As to his crimes, an alien to his blood;
 For crimes like his---

Rolando's son? Just heaven!
 Ha! here? and in my power? A war of thoughts,
 All terrible arising, shakes my frame
 With doubtful conflict. By one stroke to reach
 The father's heart, though seas are spread between, [whom?
 Were great revenge!--Away: revenge? on
 Alas! on my own soul; by rage betray'd
 Ev'n to the crime my reason most condemns
 In him who ruin'd me. Deep-mov'd he spoke;
 And his own poniard o'er the prostrate youth
 Suspended held. But, as the welcome blow,
 With arms display'd, Amyntor seem'd to court,
 Behold, in sudden confluence gathering round
 The natives stood; whom kindness hither drew,
 The man unknown, with each relieving aid
 Of love and care, as ancient rites ordain,
 To succour and to serve. Before them came
 Montano, venerable sage, whose head

The hand of time with twenty winters' snow
 Had shower'd; and to whose intellectual eye
 Futurity, behind her cloudy veil,
 Stands in fair light disclos'd. Him, after pause,
 Aurelius drew apart, and in his care
 Amyntor plac'd; to lodge him and secure;
 To save him from himself, as one, with grief
 Tempestuous, and with rage, distemper'd deep.
 This done, nor waiting for reply, alone
 He sought the vale, and his calm cottage gain'd.

CANTO III.

WHERE Kilda's southern hills their summit lift
 With triple fork to heaven, the mounted sun
 Full from the midmost shot in dazzling stream
 His noon-tide ray. And now, in lowing train,
 Were seen slow-pacing westward o'er the vale
 The milky mothers, foot pursuing foot,
 And nodding as they move; their oozy meal,
 The bitter healthful herbage of the shore,
 Around its rocks to graze: * for, strange to tell!
 The hour of ebb, though ever varying found,
 As yon pale planet wheels from day to day
 Her course inconstant, their sure instinct feels,
 Intelligent of times; by heaven's own hand,
 To all its creatures equal in its care,
 Unerring mov'd. These signs observ'd, that guide
 To labour and repose a simple race,
 These native signs to due repast at noon,
 Frugal and plain, had warn'd the temperate isle:
 All but Aurelius. He, unhappy man,
 By nature's voice solicited in vain,
 Nor hour observ'd, nor due repast partook.
 The child no more! the mother's fate untold!
 Both in black prospect rising to his eye---
 'Twas anguish there; 'twas here distracting doubt!

Yet, after long and painful conflict borne,
 Where nature, reason, oft the doubtful scale
 Inclind alternate, summoning each aid
 That virtue lends, and o'er each thought infirm
 Superior rising, in the might of Him, [light,
 Who strength from weakness, as from darkness
 Omnipotent can draw; again resign'd,
 Again he sacrific'd, to heaven's high will,
 Each soothing weakness of a parent's breast;
 The sigh soft memory prompts; the tender tear,
 That, streaming o'er an object lov'd and lost,
 With mournful tragic tortures and delights,
 Relieves us, while its sweet oppression loads,
 And, by admitting, blunts the sting of woe.

As reason thus the mental storm seren'd,
 And through the darkness shot her sun-bright ray
 That strengthens while it cheers; behold from Amyntor slow-approaching! on his front, [far
 O'er each sunk feature sorrow had diffus'd

* The cows often feed on the alga marina: and they can distinguish exactly the tide of ebb from the tide of flood; though, at the same time, they are not within view of the shore. When the tide has ebb'd about two hours, then they steer their course directly to the nearest shore, in their usual order, one after another. I had occasion to make this observation thirteen times in one week. Martin's Western Isles of Scotland, p. 156.

Attraction, sweetly sad. His noble port,
Majestic in distress, Aurelius mark'd;
And, unresisting, felt his bosom flow
With social softness. Strait before the door
Of his moss-silver'd cell they sat them down
In counterview: and thus the youth began.

With patient ear, with calm attention, mark
Amyntor's story: then, as justice sees,
On either hand, her equal balance weigh,
Absolve him, or condemn---But oh, may I,
A father's name when truth forbids to praise,
Unblam'd pronounce? that name to every son
By heaven made sacred; and by nature's hand,
With Honour, Duty, Love, her triple pale,
Fenc'd strongly round, to bar the rude approach
Of each irreverent thought.---These eyes, alas!
The curs'd effects of sanguinary zeal
Too near beheld: its madness how extreme;
How blind its fury, by the prompting priest,
Each tyrant's ready instrument of ill,
Train'd on to holy mischief. Scene abhorr'd!
Fell Cruelty let loose in Mercy's name:
Intolerance, while o'er the free-born mind
Her heaviest chains were cast, her iron scourge
Severest hung, yet daring to appeal
That Power whose law is meekness; and, for deeds
That outrage heaven, belying heaven's command.

Flexile of will, misjudging, though sincere,
Rolando caught the spread infection, plung'd
Implicit into guilt, and headlong urg'd
His course unjust to violence and rage.
Unmanly rage! when nor the charm divine
Of Beauty, nor the Matron's sacred age,
Secure from wrongs, could innocence secure,
Found reverence or distinction. Yet sustain'd
By conscious worth within, the matchless pair
Their threatening fate, imprisonment and scorn
And death denounc'd, unshrinking, unsubdued
To murmur or complaint, superior bore,
With patient hope, with fortitude resign'd,
Nor built on pride, nor counting vain applause;
But calmly constant, without effort great,
What reason dictates, and what heaven approves.

But how proceed, Aurelius? in what sounds
Of gracious cadence, of assuasive power,
My further story clothe? O could I steal
From Harmony her softest-warbled strain
Of melting air! or Zephyr's vernal voice!
Or Philomela's song, when love dissolves
To liquid banishment his evening-lay,
All nature smiling round! then might I speak;
Then might Amyntor, unoffending, tell,
How unperceiv'd and secret through his breast,
As morning rises o'er the midnight-shade,
What first was ow'd humanity to both,
Assisting piety and tender thought,
Grew swift and silent into love for one:
My sole offence---if love can then offend,
When virtue lights and reverence guards its flame.

O Theodora! who thy world of charms,
That soul of sweetness, that soft glow of youth,
Warm on thy cheek, and beaming from thine eye,
Unmov'd could see? that dignity of ease,
That grace of air, by happy nature thine!
For all in thee was native; from within
Spontaneous flowing, as some equal stream
From its unfailing source! and then too seen

In milder lights; by sorrow's shading hand
Touch'd into power more exquisitely soft,
By tears adorn'd, intender'd by distress.
O sweetness without name! when love looks on
With pity's melting eye, that to the soul
Endears, ennobles her, whom fate afflicts,
Or fortune leaves unhappy! Passion then
Refines to virtue: then a purer train
Of heaven-inspir'd emotions, undebas'd
By self-regard, or thought of due return,
The breast expanding, all its powers exalt
To emulate what reason best conceives
Of love celestial; whose prevenient aid
Forbids approaching ill; or gracious draws,
When the lone heart with anguish inly bleeds,
From pain its sting, its bitterness from woe!

By this plain courtship of the honest heart
To pity mov'd, at length my pleaded vows
The gentle maid with unreluctant ear
Would oft admit; would oft endearing crown
With smiles of kind assent, with looks that spoke,
In blushing softness, her chaste bosom touch'd
To mutual love. O fortune's fairest hour!
O seen, but not enjoy'd, just hail'd and lost
Is flattering brightness! Theodora's form,
Event unfear'd! had caught Rolando's eye:
And Love, if wild Desire, of Fancy born,
By furious passions nurs'd, that sacred name
Profanes not, Love his stubborn breast dissolv'd
To transient goodness. But my thought shrinks
Reluctant to proceed: and filial awe, [back,
With pious hand, would o'er a parent's crime
The veil of silence and oblivious night
Permitted throw. His impious suit repell'd,
Aw'd from her eye, and from her lip severe
Dash'd with indignant scorn; each harbour'd
Of soft emotion or of social sense, [thought
Love, pity, kindness, alien to a soul
That Bigot-rage embosoms, fled at once:
And all the savage reassum'd his breast.
'Tis just, he cry'd: who thus invites disdain,
Deserves repulse; he who, by slave-like arts,
Would meanly steal what force may nobler take,
And, greatly daring, dignify the deed.
When next we meet, our mutual blush to spare,
Thine from dissembling, from base flattery mine,
Shall be my care. This threat, by brutal scorn
Keen'd and embitter'd, terrible to both,
To one prov'd fatal. Silent-wasting grief,
The mortal worm that on Emilia's frame
Had prey'd unseen, now deep through all her powers
Its poison spread, and kill'd their vital growth.
Sickening, she sunk beneath this double weight
Of shame and horror.---Dare I yet proceed?
Aurelius, O most injur'd of mankind!
Shall yet my tale, exasperating, add
To woe, new anguish? and to grief, despair---
She is no more---

O Providence severe!
Aurelius smote his breast, and groaning cry'd;
But curb'd a second groan, repell'd the voice
Of froward grief: and to the Will supreme,
In justice awful, lowly bending his,
Nor sigh nor murmur, nor repining plaint,
By all the war of nature though assail'd, [grace
Escap'd his lips. What! shall we from heaven's

With life receiving happiness, our share
Of ill refuse? And are afflictions aught
But mercies in disguise? th' alternate cup,
Medicinal though bitter, and prepar'd
By love's own hand for salutary ends.
But were they ills indeed? Can fond complaint
Arrest the wing of time? Can grief command
This noon-day sun to roll his flaming orb
Back to yon eastern coast, and bring again
The hours of yesterday? or from the womb
Of that unfounded deep the bury'd corse
To light and life restore? Blest pair, farewell!
Yet, yet a few short days of erring grief,
Of human fondness sighing in the breast,
And sorrow is no more. Now, gentle youth,
And let me call thee son (for O that name
Thy faith, thy friendship, thy true portion borne
Of pains for me, too sadly have deserved)
On with thy tale. 'Tis mine, when heaven afflicts,
To hearken and adore. The patient man
Thus spoke: Amyntor thus his story clos'd.

As dumb with anguish round the bed of death
Weeping we knelt, to mine she faintly rais'd
Her closing eyes; then fixing, in cold gaze,
On Theodora's face—O save my child!
She said; and, shrinking from her pillow, slept
Without a groan, a pang. In hallow'd earth
I saw her shrouded; bade eternal peace
Her shade receive, and, with the truest tears,
Affection ever wept, her dust bedew'd.

What then remain'd for honour or for love?
What, but that scene of violence to fly,
With guilt profan'd, and terrible with death,
Rolando's fatal roof. Late at the hour,
When shade and silence o'er this nether orb
With drowsiest influence reign, the waning moon
Ascending mournful in the midnight sphere;
On that drear spot, within whose cavern'd womb
Emilia sleeps, and by the turf that veils
Her honour'd clay, alone and kneeling there
I found my Theodora! thrill'd with awe,
With sacred terror, which the time, the place,
Pour'd on us, sadly-solemn, I too bent
My trembling knee; and lock'd in her's my hand
Across her parent's grave. By this dread scene!
By night's pale regent! By yon glorious train
Of ever-moving fires that round her burn!
By death's dark empire! by the sheeted dust
That once was man, now mouldering here below:
But chief by her's, at whose nocturnal tomb,
Reverent we kneel! and by her nobler part,
Th' unbody'd spirit hovering near, perhaps,
As witness to our vows! nor time, nor chance,
Nor aught but death's inevitable hand,
Shall e'er divide our loves.—I led her thence:
To where, safe-station'd in a secret bay,
Rough of descent, and brown with pendent pines
That murmur'd to the gale, our bark was moor'd.
We sail'd—But, O my father! can I speak
What yet remains? yon ocean black with storm!
Its useless sails rent from the groaning pine!
The speechless crew aghast! and that lost fair!
Still, still I see her! feel her heart pant thick!
And hear her voice, in ardent vows to heaven
For me alone prefer'd, as on my arm,
Expiring, sinking with her fears, she hung!
I kiss'd her pale cold cheek! with tears adur'd,
And won at last, with sums of proffer'd gold,

The boldest mariners, this precious charge
Instant to save; and, in the skiff secur'd,
Their oars across the foamy flood to ply
With unremitting arm. I then prepar'd
To follow her—That moment, from the deck,
A sea swell'd o'er, and plung'd me in the gulf.
Nor me alone: its broad and billowing sweep
Must have involv'd her too. Mysterious heaven!
My fatal love on her devoted head
Drew down—it must be so! the judgment due
To me and mine: or was Amyntor sav'd
For its whole quiver of remaining wrath?
For storms more fierce? for pains of sharper sting?
And years of death to come?—Nor further voice,
Nor flowing tear his high-wrought grief supply'd:
With arms outspread, with eyes in hopeless gaze
To heaven unlifted, motionless and mute
He stood, the mournful semblance of despair.

The lamp of day, though from mid-noon de-
Still flaming with full ardor, shot on earth [clin'd,
Oppressive brightness round; till in soft stream,
From ocean's bosom his light vapours drawn,
With grateful intervention o'er the sky
Their vale diffusive spread; the scene abroad
Soft-shadowing, vale and plain, and dazzling hill.
Aurelius, with his guest, the western cliff
Ascending slow, beneath its marble roof,
From whence in double stream a lucid source
Roll'd sounding forth, and, where with dewy wing
Fresh breezes play'd, sought refuge and repose,
Till cooler hours arise. The subject isle
Her village capital, where health and peace
Are tutelary gods; her small domain
Of arable and pasture, vein'd with streams
That branching bear refreshful moisture on
To field and mead; her straw-roof'd temple rude,
Where piety, not pride, adoring kneels,
Lay full in view. From scene to scene around
Aurelius gaz'd; and, sighing, thus began:

Not we alone; alas! in every clime,
The human race are sons of sorrow born.
Heirs of transmitted labour and disease,
Of pain and grief, from sire to son deriv'd,
All have their mournful portion; all must bear
Th' impos'd condition of their mortal state,
Vicissitude of suffering. Cast thine eye
Where yonder vale, Amyntor, sloping spreads
Full to the noon-tide beam its primrose-lap,
From hence due east. Amyntor look'd, and saw,
Not without wonder at a sight so strange, [arm'd
Where thrice three females, earnest each and
With rural instruments, the soil prepar'd
For future harvest. These the trenchant spade,
To turn the mold and break th' adhesive clods,
Employ'd assiduous. Those, with equal pace,
And arm alternate, strew'd its fresh lap white
With fruit fruitful Ceres: while, in train behind,
Three more th' incumbent harrow heavy on
O'er labour'd drew, and clos'd the toilsome task.

Behold! Aurelius thus his speech renew'd,
From that soft sex, too delicately fram'd
For toils like these, the task of rougher man,
What yet necessity demands severe?
Twelve suns have purpled these encircling hills
With orient beams, as many nights along
Their dewy summits drawn th' alternate veil
Of darkness, since, in unpropitious hour,
The husbands or those widow'd mates, who now

For both must labour, launch'd, in quest of food,
 Their island-skiff advent'rous on the deep.
 Them, while the sweeping net secure they plung'd
 The finny race to snare, whose foodful shoals
 Each creek and bay innumerable crowd,
 As annual on from shore to shore they move
 In watery caravan; them, thus intent,
 Dark from the south a gust of furious wing,
 Up-springing, drove to sea: and left in tears,
 This little world of brothers and of friends!
 But when, at evening hour, disjointed planks,
 Borne on the surging-tide, and broken oars,
 To fight, with fatal certainty, reveal'd
 The wreck before surmis'd; one general groan,
 To heaven ascending, spoke the general breast
 With sharpest anguish pierc'd. Their ceaseless [shore,]
 Through these hoarse rocks, on this resounding
 At morn was heard: at midnight too were seen,
 Disconsolate on each chill mountain's height,
 The mourners spread, exploring land and sea
 With eager gaze—till from yon lesser isle,
 Yon round of moss-clad hills, Boreas nam'd—
 Full north, behold! above the soaring lark,
 Its dizzy cliffs aspire, hung round and white
 With curling mists—at last from yon hoar hills,
 Inflaming the brown air with sudden blaze,
 And ruddy undulation, thrice three fires,
 Like meteors waving in a moonless sky,
 Our eyes, yet unbelieving, saw distinct,
 Successive kindled, and from night to night
 Renew'd continuous. Joy, with wild excess,
 Took her gay turn to reign; and nature now
 From rapture wept: yet ever and anon
 By sad conjecture damp'd, and anxious thought
 How from yon rocky prison to release
 Whom the deep sea immures (their only boat Destroy'd) and whom th' inevitable siege
 Of hunger must assault. But hope sustains
 The human heart: and now their faithful wives,
 With love-taught skill and vigour not their own,
 On yonder field th' autumnal year prepare*.
 Amyntor, who the tale distressful heard
 With sympathising sorrow, on himself,
 On his severer fate, now pondering deep
 Wrapt by sad thought the hill unheeding left;
 And reach'd, with swerving step, the distant strand.
 Above, around, in cloudy circles wheel'd,
 Or sailing level on the polar gale
 That cool with evening rose, a thousand wings,
 The summer-nations of these pregnant cliffs,
 Play'd sportive round, and to the sun outspread
 Their various plumage; or in wild notes hail'd
 His parent-beam that animates and cheers
 All living kinds. He, glorious from amidst
 A pomp of golden clouds, th' Atlantic flood
 Beheld oblique, and o'er its azure breast
 Wav'd one unbounded blush: a scene to strike
 Both ear and eye with wonder and delight!
 But, lost to outward sense, Amyntor pass'd
 Regardless on, through other walks convey'd
 Of baleful prospect; which pale fancy rais'd
 Incessant to herself, and fabled o'er

* The author who relates this story adds, that the produce of grain that season was the most plentiful they had seen for many years before. Vide Martin's Description of the Western Isles of Scotland, p. 286.

With darkest night, meet region for despair!
 Till northward, where the rock its sea-wash'd base
 Projects athwart and shuts the bounded scene,
 Rounding its point, he rais'd his eyes and saw,
 At distance saw, descending on the shore,
 Forth from their anchor'd boat, of men unknown
 A double band, who by their gestures strange
 There fix'd with wondering: for at once they knelt
 With hands upheld; at once, to heaven, as seem'd,
 One general hymn pour'd forth of vocal praise.
 Then, slowly rising, forward mov'd their steps:
 Slow as they mov'd, behold! amid the train,
 On either side supported, onward came
 Pale and of piteous look, a pensive maid;
 As one by wasting sickness fore assail'd,
 Or plung'd in grief profound—O, all ye powers!
 Amyntor starting, cry'd, and shot his soul
 In rapid glance before him on her face.
 Illusion! no—it cannot be. My blood
 Runs chill: my feet are rooted here—and see!
 To mock my hopes, it wears her gracious form.
 The spirits who this ocean waste and wild
 Still hover round, or walk these isles unseen,
 Presenting oft in pictur'd vision strange
 The dead or absent, have on yon shape adorn'd,
 So like my love, of unsubstantial air,
 Embodiy'd featur'd it with all her charms—
 And lo! behold! its eyes are fix'd on mine
 With gaze transported—Ha! she faints, she falls!
 He ran, he flew: his clasping arms receiv'd
 Her sinking weight—O earth, and air, and sea!
 'Tis she! 'tis Theodora! Power divine,
 Whose goodness knows no bounds, thy hand is here,
 Omnipotent in mercy! As he spoke,
 Adown his cheek, through shivering joy and doubt,
 The tear fast-falling stream'd. My love! my life!
 Soul of my wishes! sav'd beyond all faith!
 Return to life and me. O fly, my friends,
 Fly, and from yon translucent fountain bring
 The living stream. Thou dearer to my soul
 Than all the sumless wealth this sea entombs,
 My Theodora, yet awake: 'tis I,
 'Tis poor Amyntor calls thee! At that name,
 That potent name, her spirit from the verge
 Of death recall'd, she trembling rais'd her eyes;
 Trembling, his neck with eager grasp entwin'd,
 And murmur'd out his name: then sunk again;
 Then swoon'd upon his bosom, through excess
 Of bliss unhop'd, too mighty for her frame.
 The rose-bud thus, that to the beam serene
 Of morning glad unfolds her tender charms,
 Shrinks and expires beneath the noon-day blaze.
 Moments of dread suspense—but soon to cease!
 For now, while on her face these men unknown
 The stream, with cool asperision, busy cast,
 His eyes beheld, with wonder and amaze,
 Beheld in them—his friends! th' advent'rous few,
 Who bore her to the skiff! whose daring skill
 Had sav'd her from the deep! As, o'er her cheek
 Rekindling life, like morn, its light diffus'd
 In dawning purple; from their lips he learn'd,
 How to yon isle, yon round of moss-clad hills,
 Boreas nam'd, before the tempest borne,
 These islanders, thrice three, then prison'd there,
 (So heaven ordain'd) with utmost peril run,
 With toil invincible, from shelve and rock
 Their boat preserv'd, and to this happy coast
 Its prow directed safe—He heard no more:
 The rest already known, his every sense,

His full collected soul, on her alone
Was fix'd, was hung enraptur'd, while these sounds,
This voice, as of an angel, pierc'd his ear.

Amyntor! O my life's recover'd hope!
My soul's despair and rapture!—can this be?
Am I on earth? and do these arms indeed
Thy real form enfold? Thou dreadful deep!
Ye shores unknown! ye wild impending hills!
Dare I yet trust my sense?—O yes, 'tis he!
'Tis he himself! My eyes, my bounding heart,
Confess their living lord! What shall I say?
How vent the boundless transport that expands
My labouring thought? th' unutterable bliss,
Joy, wonder, gratitude, that pain to death
The breast they charm?—Amyntor, O support
This swimming brain: I would not now be torn
Again from life and thee; nor cause thy heart
A second pang. At this, dilated high
The swell of joy, most fatal where its force
Is felt most exquisite, a timely vent
Now found, and broke in tender dews away
Of heart-relieving tears. As o'er its charge,
With sheltering wing, solicitously good,
The guardian genius hovers, so the youth,
On her lov'd face, assiduous and alarm'd,
In silent fondness dwelt: while all his soul,
With trembling tenderness of hope and fear,
Pleasingly pain'd, was all employ'd for her;
The rous'd emotions warring in her breast,
Attempering, to compose, and gradual fit
For further joy her soft impressible frame.

O happy! though as yet thou know'st not half
The bliss that waits thee! but, thou gentle mind,
Whose sigh is pity, and whose smile is love,
For all who joy or sorrow, arm thy breast
With that best temperance, which from fond excess,
When rapture lifts to dangerous height its powers,
Reflective guards. Know then—and let calm
thought

On wonder wait—safe refug'd in this isle,
Thy godlike father lives! and lo—but curb,
Repress the transport that o'erheaves thy heart;
'Tis he—look yonder—he, whose reverend steps
The mountain's side descend!—Abrupt from his
Her hand she drew; and, as on wings upborne,
Shot o'er the space between. He saw, he knew,
Alonish'd knew, before him, on her knee,
His Theodora! To his arms he rais'd
The lost lov'd fair, and in his bosom press'd.
My father!—O my child! at once they cry'd:
Nor more. The rest ecstatic silence spoke,
And nature from her inmost seat of sense
Beyond all utterance mov'd. On this blest scene,
Where emulous in either bosom strove
Adoring gratitude, earth, ocean, air,
Around with softening aspect seem'd to smile;
And heaven, approving, look'd delighted down.

Nor theirs alone this blissful year: the joy,
With instant flow, from shore to shore along
Diffusive ran; and all the exulting isle
About the new-arriv'd was pour'd abroad,
To hope long lost, by miracle regain'd!
In each plain bosom love and nature wept:
While each a fire, a husband, or a friend,
Embracing held and kiss'd.

Now, while the song,
The choral hymn, in wildly-warbled notes,
What nature dictates when the full heart prompts,

Best harmony, they grateful souls effus'd
Aloud to heaven; Montano, reverend seer,
(Whose eye prophetic far through time's abyss
Could shoot its beam, and there the births of fate,
Yet immature and in their causes hid,
Illumin'd see) a space abstracted stood:
His frame with shivery horror stirr'd, his eyes
From outward vision held, and all the man
Entranc'd in wonder at th' unfolding scene,
On fluid air, as in a mirror seen,
And glowing radiant, to his mental sight.

They fly! he cry'd, they melt in air away,
The clouds that long fair Albion's heaven o'ercastr!
With tempest delug'd, or with flame devour'd
Her drooping plains: while dawning rosy round
A purer morning lights up all her skies!
He comes, behold! the great deliverer comes!
Immortal William, borne triumphant on,
From yonder orient, o'er propitious seas,
White with the sails of his unnumber'd fleet,
A floating forest, stretch'd from shore to shore!
See! with spread wings Britannia's genius flies,
Before his prow; commands the speeding gales
To waft him on; and, o'er the hero's head,
Inwreath'd with olive bears the laurel-crown,
Blest emblem, peace with liberty restor'd!
And hark! from either strand, which nations hide,
To welcome-in true freedom's day renew'd
What thunders of acclaim! Aurelius, man
By heaven belov'd, thou too that sacred sun
Shalt live to hail; shalt warm thee in his shine!
I see thee on the flowery lap diffus'd
Of thy lov'd vale, amid a smiling race
From this blest pair to spring: whom equal faith,
And equal fondness, in soft league shall hold
From youth to reverend age; the calmer hours
Of thy last day, to sweeten and adorn;
Through life thy comfort, and in death thy crown.

TRUTH IN RYME.

TO THE DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH*.

YOUR Grace has given leave, that these few poems should appear in the world under the patronage of your name. But this leave would have been refused, I know, had your expected to find your own praises, however just, in any part of the present address. I do not say it, my Lord, in the style of compliment. Genuine modesty, the companion and the grace of true merit, may be surely distinguished from the affectation of it: as surely as the native glowing of a fine complexion from that artificial colouring, which is used, in vain, to supply what nature had denied, or has resumed.

Yet, permit me just to hint, my Lord, while I restrain my pen from all enlargement, that if the fairest public character must be raised upon private virtue, as surely it must, your Grace has laid already the securest foundation of the former in the latter. The eyes of mankind are therefore turned upon you: and, from what you are known to have done, in one way, they reasonably look for whatever can be expected from a great and good man, in the other.

The author of these lighter amusements hopes small collection of his poems, published in 1762.

soon to present your Grace with something more solid, more deserving your attention, in the life of the first Duke of Marlborough.

You will then see, that superior talents for war have been, though they rarely are, accompanied with equal abilities for negotiation: and that the same extensive capacity, which could guide all the tumultuous scenes of the camp, knew how to direct, with equal skill, the calmer but more perplexing operations of the cabinet.

In the mean while, that you may live to adorn the celebrated and difficult title you wear; that you may be, like him, the defender of your country in days of public danger; and in times of peace, what is perhaps less frequently found, the friend and patron of those useful and ornamental arts, by which human nature is exalted, and human society rendered more happy: this, my Lord, is respectfully the wish of

most obedient humble servant.

THE following extract from his majesty's speech to both houses of parliament, which, by every man in his dominions, would be thought the noblest introduction to a poem of the first merit, is peculiarly suitable to introduce this. However unequal these verses may be to the subject they attempt to adorn, this singular advantage will be readily allowed them. It will, at the same time, be the fullest and best explanation of the author's meaning, on a theme so interesting and uncommon. The words are these:

MARCH 3, 1761.

 In consequence of the act passed in the reign of my late glorious predecessor, King William the Third, for settling the succession to the crown in my family, the commissions of the judges have been made during their good behaviour. But notwithstanding that wise provision, their offices have determined upon the demise of the crown, or at the expiration of six months afterwards, in every instance of that nature which has happened.

I look upon the independency and uprightness of the judges of the land as essential to the impartial administration of justice; as one of the best securities of the rights and liberties of my loving subjects; and as most conducive to the honour of the crown. And I come now to recommend this interesting object to the consideration of parliament, in order that such farther provision, as shall be most expedient, may be made, for securing the judges in the enjoyment of their offices, during their good behaviour, notwithstanding any such demise.

ASTREA, eldest born of Jove,
Whom all the gods revere and love,
Was sent, while man deserv'd their care,
On earth to dwell, and govern there:
Till finding earth by heaven unaw'd,
Till sick of violence and fraud,
Abandoning the guilty crew,
Back to her native sky she flew.
There, station'd in the Virgin-sign,
She long has ceas'd on earth to shine;
Or if, at times she deigns a smile,
'Tis chief o'er Britain's favour'd isle.

For there—her eye with wonder fix'd!
That wonder too with pleasure mix'd!
She now beheld, in blooming youth,
The patron of all worth and truth;
Not where the virtues most resort,
On peaceful plains, but in a court!
Not in a cottage, all unknown;
She found him seated on a throne!
What fables paint, what poets sing,
She found in fact—a patriot-king!
But as a sight, so nobly new,
Deserv'd, she thought, a nearer view;
To where, by silver-streaming Thames,
Ascends the palace of St. James,
Swift through surrounding shades of night
The goddess shot her beamy flight.
She stopp'd; and the revealing ray
Blaz'd round her favourite, where he lay,
In sweet repose: o'er all his face,
Repose shed softer bloom and grace!
But fearful lest her sun-bright glare
Too soon might wake him into care,
(For splendid toils and weary state
Are every monarch's envy'd fate)
The stream of circling rays to shroud,
She drew an interposing cloud.

In all the silence of surprise,
She gaz'd him o'er. She saw arise,
For gods can read the human breast,
Her own ideas there impress!
And that his plan, to bless mankind,
The plan now brightening in his mind,
May story's whitest page adorn,
May shine through nations yet unborn,
She calls Urbania to her aid.

At once the fair ethereal maid,
Daughter of Memory and Jove,
Descending quits her laurel'd grove:
Loose to the gale her azure robe;
Borne in her left, a starry globe,
Where each superior son of fame
Will find inscribed his deathless name,
Her right sustains th' immortal lyre,
To praise due merit, or inspire.

Behold—Astrea thus began—
The friend of virtue and of man!
Calm reason see, in early youth!
See, in a prince, the soul of truth!

With love of justice, tender sense
 For suffering worth and innocence!
 Who means to build his happy reign!
 On this blest maxim, wise and plain—
 Though plain, how seldom understood!
 That, to be great, he must be good.
 His breast is open to your eye;
 Approach, Urania, mark, and try.
 This bosom needs no thought to hide:
 This virtue dares our search abide.

The sacred fountains to secure
 Of justice, undisturb'd and pure
 From hopes or fears, from fraud or force,
 To ruffle, or to stain their course;
 That these may flow serene and free,
 The law must independent be:
 Her ministers, as in my sight,
 And mine alone, dispensing right;
 Of piercing eye, of judgment clear,
 As honour, just, as truth, sincere.
 With temper, firm, with spirit, sage,
 The Mansfields of each future age.

And this prime blessing is to spring
 From youth in purple! from a king!
 Who, true to his imperial trust,
 His greatness sounds in being just;
 Prepares, like yon ascending sun,
 His glorious race with joy to run,
 And, where his gracious eye appears,
 To bless the world he lights and cheers!

Such worth with equal voice to sing,
 Urania, strike thy boldest string;
 And truth, whose voice alone is praise
 That here inspires, shall guide the lays.
 Begin! awake his gentler ear
 With sounds that monarchs rarely hear.
 He merits, let him know our love,
 And you record, what I approve.

She ended: and the heaven-born maid,
 With soft surprise, his form survey'd.
 She saw what chastity of thought.
 Within his stainless bosom wrought;
 Then fix'd on earth her sober eye,
 And, pausing, offer'd this reply.
 Nor pomp of song, nor paint of art,
 Such truths should to the world impart.
 My task is but in simple verse,
 These promis'd wonders to rehearse:
 And when on these our verse we raise,
 The plainest is the noblest praise.

Yet more; a virtuous doubt remains:
 Would such a prince permit my strains?
 Deserving, but still shunning fame,
 The homage due he might disclaim.
 A prince who rules to save mankind,
 His praise would in their virtue find;
 Would deem their strict regard to laws,
 Their faith and worth, his best applause.
 Then, Britons, your just tribute bring,
 In deeds, to emulate your king;
 In virtues, to redeem your age
 From venal views and party-rage.
 On his example safely rest;
 He calls, he courts you, to be blest;
 As friends, as brethren to unite
 In one firm league of just and right.

My part is last; if Britain yet
 A lover boasts of truth and wit,

To him these grateful lays to send,
 The monarch's and the muse's friend;
 And whose fair name, in sacred rhymes,
 My voice may give to latest times.

She said; and, after thinking o'er
 The men in place near half a score,
 To strike at once all scandal mute,
 The goddesses found, and fix'd on Bute.

TO THE AUTHOR OF THE PRECEDING POEM.

BY S. J. ESQUIRE.

WELL—now, I think, we shall be wiser,
 Cries Grub, who reads the Advertiser,
 Here's Truth in Rhyme—a glorious treat!
 It surely must abuse the great;
 Perhaps the king;—without dispute
 'Twill fall most devilish hard on Bute.

This he reviews his parting shilling,
 At last resolves, though much unwilling,
 To break all rules imbib'd in youth,
 And give it up for Rhyme and Truth:
 He reads—he frowns—Why, what's the matter?
 Damn it—here's neither sense nor satire—
 Here, take it, boy, there's nothing in't:
 Such fellows!—to pretend to print!

Blame not, good cit, the poet's rhymes,
 The fault's not his, but in the times:
 The times, in which a monarch reigns,
 Form'd to make happy Britain's plains;
 To stop in their destructive course,
 Domestic frenzy foreign force,
 To bid war, faction, party cease,
 And bless the weary'd world with peace.
 The times in which is seen, strange sight!
 A court both virtuous and polite,
 Where merit best can recommend
 And science finds a constant friend.

How then should satire dare to sport,
 With such a king and such a court,
 While truth looks on with rigid eye,
 And tells her every line's a lie?

THE DISCOVERY.

UPON READING SOME VERSES, WRITTEN BY A
 YOUNG LADY AT A BOARDING SCHOOL.

September 1760.

APOLLO lately sent to know,
 If he had any sons below:
 For, by the trash he long had seen
 In male and female magazine,
 A hundred quires, not worth a groat,
 The race must be extinct, he thought,
 His messenger to court repairs;
 Walks softly with the crowd up stairs:
 But when he had his errand told,
 The courtiers sneer'd, both young and old,
 Augustus knit his royal brow,
 And bade him let Apollo know it,
 That from his infancy till now,

Y y iij

He lov'd nor poetry nor poet.
 His next adventure was the Park,
 When it grew fashionably dark:
 There beauties, boobbies, strumpets, rakes,
 Talk much of commerce, whist, and stakes;
 Who tips the wink, who drops the card:
 But not one word of verse or bard.
 The stage, Apollo's old domain,
 Where his true sons were wont to reign,
 His courier now past frowning by:
 Ye modern Durseys tell us why.
 Slow, to the city last he went:
 There, all was prose, of cent. per cent.
 There, alley-omnium, script, and bonus,
 (Latin, for which a muse would stone us,
 Yet honest Gideon's classic style)
 Made our poor Nuncio stare and smile.
 And now the clock had struck eleven:
 The messenger must back to heaven;
 But just as he his wings had try'd,
 Look'd up Queen-square, the north-east side.
 A blooming creature there he found,
 With pen and ink, and books around,
 Alone, and writing by a taper:
 He read unseen, then stole her paper.
 It much amus'd him on his way;
 And reaching heaven by break of day,
 He show'd Apollo what he stole.
 The god perus'd, and lik'd the whole:
 Then, calling for his pocket-book,
 Some right celestial vellum took;
 And what he with a sun-beam there
 Writ down, the muse thus copies fair:
 " If I no men my sons must call,
 " Here's one fair daughter worth them all:
 " Mark then the sacred words that follow,
 " Sophia's mine's—so sign'd

THE TRANSFIGURATION.

CELESTIAL DOVE! the muse heaven-born inspire
 Through all her pow'rs, while with extended
 wing
 She seeks the mystic hill, and wond'ring views
 Her Lord transfigur'd. He on earth below
 Obscurely liv'd, eclips'd in human form,
 And hid the Deity: with ills conversant,
 The rage of fate in ev'ry threat'ning shape
 Awful he combated, and victor still,
 To hell and earth, his restless foes, oppos'd
 Meekness, and patient innocence, and pray'r
 That best defence! that golden chain, whose pow'r
 Magnetic links the distant heaven and earth
 With occult charm! as the remotest parts
 Of nature, each to other gravitate
 In bonds of strictest love. The fervent pray'r Resistless climbs heav'n's awful height, and stands
 Before th' eternal throne, with silent tears
 And soul-breath'd sighs attended: Mercy smiles,
 While the victorious suppliant sweetly o'er-comes
 God inaccessible to other violence.

And thus th' ethereal Lamb, Redeemer meek,
 Convers'd with the great Father, where he sits
 Enthron'd in glory. He the Son beheld
 High on a mountain, from the world sequester'd,
 In holy rapture wing to heaven his soul.
 His pray'r is heard—And, lo! Celestial light,
 Sun-bright meridian glory, beamful breaks
 From forth his sacred looks. All heav'n unveil'd

Is open'd in his face, and Godhead blazes
 Effulgent round: while ting'd with orient light
 His garments shine, pure as the new fallen snow

That clothes the Alpine ridge or Appenine.
 Soft gales of fragrance breath'd around the place
 Ambrosial, and, to grace the wond'rous change,
 Moses and Elias, the realms of light
 Forsaking, dart precipitant from high,
 Invested with pure ether, all refin'd
 Their liquid texture, or compacted light
 Empyrean cov'ring! Thus from heaven equipt,
 All pure as innocence, celestial bloom
 Smil'd glowing in their looks, and every limb
 Adorn'd with heavenly beauty, dazzling shot
 Fair glories, only to their Lord inferior.
 Their garments splendid, as the solar ray
 Of noontide shines, blaz'd bright with orient
 gold,

Such as impurples heaven, when rising morn
 Walks o'er the skies with all her rosy train
 Of smiles and blushes. Humbly the blest pair,
 In deep prostration, stretch'd before their Lord,
 Recount his sufferings, and adore his passion.

How unappall'd this meek and patient Lamb,
 Encounters all the rage of earth and hell!
 His armour, innocence and white-eye'd faith.
 How, bleeding with rich life, his sacred wounds
 Run purple, and expand their ruddy mouths,
 Dropping with cordial balm to heal a world!
 How the triumphant victim yields his breath
 Cheerful amidst the sharpest pangs of torture!
 While trembling nature own'd her dying Lord,
 And shook th' eternal centre: the pale sun,
 As conscious of the guilt, obscur'd his head,
 And left the world in universal mourning.
 How in the grave's encircling gloom he's laid
 Environ'd with cold night; th' insatiate grave,
 Unable to detain his heavenly guest,
 Reluctant opes his pond'rous jaws, and yields
 The sacred pledge of peace to man restor'd.
 His fetters broke, fresh as the face of morn
 That now had thrice renew'd her smiling tour
 Through heaven, he spurns the banded pow'rs of hell,

And rising, Phoenix-like, shakes off the gloom
 Contracted from the grave. Now in his throne
 Seated, on the right hand of glory shines
 With Godhead blazing awful Deity.
 Amazing colloquy! where heaven and earth,
 Sweetly united, hold the conference
 Sublime! a world restor'd and man redeem'd.
 But while the wond'rous interview prolong'd
 Detains the gazing, sun from heaven appears
 An orient cloud, that seems another sun
 Resplendent through the skies, from whence was heard,

As thunder terrible, the Father's voice,
 Awful proclaiming from the fulgent shade,

LO! MY BELOVED SON, IN WHOM I AM WELL PLEAS'D!

V E R S E S.

WRITTEN FOR, AND GIVEN IN PRINT TO A BEGGAR.

O MERCY, heaven's first attribute,
Whose care embraces man and brute!
Behold me where I shivering stand;
Bid gentle pity stretch her hand
To want and age, disease and pain,
That all in one sad object reign.
Still feeling bad, still fearing worse,
Existence is to me a curse:
Yet, how to close this weary eye?
By my own hand I dare not die:
And death, the friend of human woes,
Who brings the last and sound repose;
Death does at dreadful distance keep,
And leaves one wretch to wake and weep!

THE REWARD:

OR, APOLLO'S ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS TO CHARLES STANHOPE.

Written in 1757.

APOLLO, from the southern sky,
O'er London lately glanc'd his eye,
Just such a glance our courtiers throw
At suitors whom they shun to know:
Or have you mark'd the averted mien,
The chest erect, the freezing look,
Of Bumbo, when a bard is seen
Charg'd with his dedication-book?
But gods are never in the wrong:
What then displeas'd the power of song?
The case was this: where noble arts
Once flourish'd, as our fathers tell us,
He now can find, for men of parts,
None but rich blockheads and mere fellows;
Since drums and dice and dissipation
Have chac'd all taste from all the nation.
For is there, now, one table spread,
Where sense and science may be fed?
Where, with a smile on every face,
Invited merit takes his place?
These thoughts put Phœbus in the spleen,
(For gods, like men, can feel chagrin)
And left him on the point to shroud
His head in one eternal cloud:
When, lo! his all-discerning eye
Chanc'd one remaining friend to spy,
Just crept abroad, as is his way,
To bask him in the noon-tide ray.
This Phœbus noting, call'd aloud
To every interposing cloud;
And bade their gather'd mists ascend,
That he might warm his good old friend:
Then, as his chariot roll'd along,
Tun'd to his lyre this grateful song.
"With talents, such as God has given
To common mortals, fix in seven;
Who yet have titles, ribbons, pay,
And govern whom they should obey;

With no more frailties than are found
In thousand others, count them round;
With much good-will, instead of parts,
Express'd for artists and for arts;
Who smiles, if you have smartly spoke;
Or nods applause to his own joke;
This bearded child, this grey-hair'd boy,
Still plays with life, as with a toy;
Still keeps amusement full in view:
Wife? Now and then—but oftener new;
His coach, this hour, at Watson's door;
The next, in waiting on a whore.

Whene'er the welcome tidings ran
Of monster strange, or stranger man,
A Selkirke from his desert isle
Or Alligator from the Nile;
He saw the monster in its shrine,
And had the man, next day, to dine,
Or was it an hermaphrodite?
You found him in a twofold hurry;
Neglecting for this he-she fight,
The single charms of Fanny Murray.
Gathering, from suburb and from city,
Who were, who would be, wise or witty;
The full-wigg'd sons of pills and potions;
The bags, of maggot and new motions;
The sage, of microscopic eye,
Who reads him lectures on a fly;
Grave antiquaries, with their flams;
And poets, squirting epigrams:
With some few lords—of those that think,
And dip, at times, their pen in ink:
Nay, ladies too, of diverse fame,
Who are, and are not, of the game.
For he has look'd the world around,
And pleasure, in each quarter, found.
Now young, now old, now grave, now gay,
He sinks from life by soft decay;
And sees at hand, without affright,
Th' inevitable hour of night."

But here, some pillar of the state,
Whose life is one long dull debate;
Some pedant of the fable gown,
Who spares no failings but his own,
Set up at once their deep-mouth'd hollow:
Is this a subject for Apollo!

What! can the god of wit and verse
Such trifles in our ears rehearse?

"Know, puppies, this man's easy life,
Serene from cares, unvex'd with strife,
Was oft employ'd in doing good;
A science you ne'er understood:
And charity, ye sons of pride,
A multitude of faults will hide.
I, at his board, more sense have found,
Than at a hundred dinners round.
Taste, learning, mirth, my western eye
Could often, there, collected spy:
And I have gone well-pleas'd to bed,
Revolving what was sung or said.

"And he, who entertain'd them all
With much good liquor strong and small;
With food in plenty, and a welcome,
Which would become my Lord of Melcombe *,"

the reader has only to remember, that Apollo is the god

Whose soups and sauces duly season'd,
 Whose wit well tim'd, and sense well reason'd,
 Give Burgundy a brighter stain,
 And add new flavour to Champagne—
 Shall this man to the grave descend,
 Unown'd, unhonour'd as my friend?
 No; by my deity I swear,
 Nor shall the vow be lost in air;
 While you, and millions such as you,
 Are sunk for ever from my view,
 And lost in kindred-darkness lye,
 This good old man shall never die:
 No matter where I place his name,
 His love of learning shall be fame.

TYBURN: TO THE MARINE SOCIETY.

ADVERTISEMENT.

THE design of the Marine Society is in itself so laudable, and has been pursued so successfully for the public good, that I thought it merited a public acknowledgment. But to take off from the flatness of a direct compliment, I have through the whole poem loaded their institution with such reproaches as will show, I hope, in the most striking manner, its real utility. By authentic accounts, it appears, that from the first rise of this society, to the present year 1762, they have collected, clothed, and fitted out for the sea-service, 5452 grown men, 4511 boys: in all 9963 persons: whom they have thus not only saved, in all probability, from perdition and infamy, but rendered them useful members of the community; at that time too when their country stood most in need of their assistance.

It has been, all examples show it,
 'The privilege of every poet,
 From ancient down to modern time,
 To bid dead matter live in rhyme;
 With wit enliven senseless rocks;
 Draw repartee from wooden blocks;
 Make buzzards senators of note,
 And rooks harangue, that geese may vote.
 These moral fictions, first design'd
 To mend and mortify mankind,
 Old Æsop, as our children know,
 'Taught twice ten hundred years ago.
 His fly, upon the chariot-wheel,
 Could all a statesman's merit feel;
 And, to its own importance just,
 Exclaim, with Bufo, What a dust!
 His horse-dung, when the flood ran high,
 In Colon's air and accent cry,
 'While tumbling down the turbid stream,
 Lord love us, how we apples swim!
 But farther instances to cite,
 Would tire the hearers patience quite.
 No: what their numbers and their worth,
 How these admire, while those hold forth,
 From Hyde-Park on to Clerkenwell,
 Let clubs, let coffee-houses tell;
 'Where England, through the world renown'd,
 In all its wisdom may be found:
 While I, for ornament and use,
 An orator of wood produce.

Why should the gentle reader stare?
 Are wooden orators so rare?
 Saint Stephen's Chapel, Rufus' Hall,
 That hears them in the pleader bawl,
 That hears them in the patriot thunder,
 Can tell if such things are a wonder.
 So can Saint Dunstan's in the west,
 When good Romaine harangues his best,
 And tells his staring congregation,
 That sober sense is sure damnation;
 That Newton's guilt was worse than treason,
 For using, what God gave him, reason.
 A pox of all this prefacing!
 Smart Balbus cries: come, name the thing:
 That such there are we all agree:
 What is this wood? Why—Tyburn-tree.
 Hear then this reverend oak harangue;
 Who makes them do so, ere they hang.
 Patibulum loquitur.

"Each thing whatever, when aggriev'd,
 Of right complains, to be reliev'd.
 When rogues so rais'd the price of wheat,
 That few folks could afford to eat,
 (Just as, when doctor's fees run high,
 Few patients can afford to die)
 The poor durst into murmurs break;
 For losers must have leave to speak:
 Then, from reproaching, fell to mawling
 Each neighbour-rogue they found forestalling.
 As these again, their knaves and fetters,
 Durst vent complaints against their betters;
 Whose only crime was in defeating
 Their scheme of growing rich by cheating:
 So, shall not I my wrongs relate,
 An injur'd minister of state?
 The finisher of care and pain
 May, sure, with better grace complain,
 For reasons no less strong and true,
 Marine Society, of you!
 Of you, as every carman knows,
 My latest and most fatal foes.
 My property you basely steal,
 Which ev'n a British oak can feel;
 Feel and resent! what wonder then
 It should be felt by British men,
 When France, insulting, durst invade
 Their clearest property of trade?
 For which both nations, at the bar
 Of that supreme tribunal, war,
 To show their reasons have agreed,
 And lawyers, by ten thousands, feed;
 Who now, for legal quirks and puns,
 Plead with the rhetoric of great guns;
 And each his clients cause maintains,
 By knocking out th' opponents brains:
 While Europe all—but we adjourn
 This wise digression, and return.
 Your rules and statutes have undone me;
 My surest cards begin to shun me.
 My native subjects dare rebel,
 Those who were born for me and hell:
 And, but for you, the scoundrel-line
 Had, every mother's son, died mine.
 A race unnumber'd as unknown,
 Whom town or suburb calls her own;
 Of vagrant love the various spawn,
 From rags and filth, from lace and lawn,

Sons of Fleet-ditch, of bulks, of benches,
Where peer and porter meet their wenches,
For neither health nor shame can wean us,
From mixing with the midnight Venus.

Nor let my cits be here forgot:
They know to sin as well as sot.
When night demure walks forth array'd
In her thin negligee of shade.
Late risen from their long regale
Of beef and beer, and bawdy tale,
Abroad the common-council sally,
To poach for game in lane or alley;
This gets a son, whose first essay
Will filch his father's till away;
A daughter that, who may retire,
Some few years hence, with her own fire:
And while his hand is in her placket,
The filial virtue picks his pocket.
Change-alley, too, is grown so nice,
A broker dares refine on vice:
With lord-like scorn of marriage-vows,
In her own arms he cuckolds spouse;
For young and fresh while he would wish her
His loose thought glows with Kitty Fisher;
Or, after nobler quarry running,
Profanely paints her out a Gunning.
Now these, of each degree and sort,
At Wapping dropp'd, perhaps at Court,
Bred up for me, to swear and lie,
To laugh at hell, and heaven defy;
These, Tyburn's regimental train,
Who risk their necks to spread my reign,
From age to age, by right divine,
Hereditary rogues, were mine:
And each, by discipline severe,
Improv'd beyond all shame and fear,
From guilt to guilt advancing daily,
My constant friend the good Old-Bailey
To me made over, late or soon;
I think, at latest, once a noon:
But by your interloping care,
Not one in ten shall be my share.

Ere 'tis too late your error see,
You foes to Britain, and to me.
To me: agreed—But to the nation;
I prove it thus by demonstration.

First, that there is much good in ill,
My great apostle Mandevile
Has made most clear. Read, if you please,
His moral fable of the bees.

Our reverend clergy next will own,
Were all men good, their trade were gone;
That were it not for useful vice,
Their learned pains would bear no price:
Nay, we should quickly bid defiance
To their demonstrated alliance.

Next, kindoms are compos'd, we know,
Of individuals, Jack and Joe.
Now these, our sovereign lords the rable,
For ever prone to growl and squabble,
The monstrous many-headed beast,
Whom we must not offend, but feast
Like Cerberus, should have their sop:
And what is that, but trussing up?
How happy were their hearts, and gay,
At each return of hanging-day?

To see * Page swinging they admire,
Beyond ev'n * Madox on his wire!
No baiting of a bull or bear,
To * Perry dangling in the air!
And then, the being drunk a week,
For joy, some * Sheppard would not squeak;
But now that those good times are o'er,
How will they mutiny and roar!
Your scheme absurd of sober rules
Will sink the race of men to mules:
For ever drudging, sweating, broiling,
For ever for the public toiling:
Hard masters! who, just when they need 'em,
With a few thistles deign to feed 'em.

Yet more—for it is seldom known
That fault or folly stands alone—
You next debauch their infant-mind
With fumes of honourable wind;
Which must beget, in heads untry'd,
That worst of human vices, pride.
All who my humble paths forsake,
Will reckon, each, to be a Blake;
There, on the deck, with arms a-kimbo,
Already struts the future Bembow;
By you bred up to take delight in
No earthly thing but oaths and fighting,
These sturdy sons of blood and blows,
By pulling Monsieur by the nose,
By making kicks and cuffs the fashion,
Will put all Europe in a passion.
The grand alliance, now quadruple,
Will pay us home, "jusqu' au centuple:"
So the French king was heard to cry—
And can a king of Frenchmen lie?

These, and more mischiefs I foresee
From fondling brats of base degree.
As mushrooms that on dunghills rise,
The kindred-weeds beneath despise;
So these their fellows will contemn,
Who, in revenge, will rage at them:
For, through each rank, what more offends,
Than to behold the rise of friends?
Still when our equals grow too great,
We may applaud, but we must hate.
Then, will it be endur'd, when John
Has put my hempen ribbon on,
To see his ancient mess-mate Cloud,
By you made turbulent and proud,
And early taught my tree to bilk,
Pass in another all of silk?

Yet, one more mournful case to put:
A hundred mouths at once you shut!
Half Grub-street, silenc'd in an hour,
Must curse your interposing power!
If my lost sons no longer steal,
What son of hers can earn a meal?
You ruin many a gentle bard,
Who liv'd by heroes that die hard!
Their brother-hawkers too! that sung
How great from world to world they swung;
And by sad sonnets, quaver'd loud,
Drew tears and half-pence from the crowd

* As these are all persons of note, and well known to our readers, we think any more particular mention of them unnecessary. MALLETT.

Blind Fielding too---a mischief on him!
I wish my sons would meet and stone him!

Sends his black squadrons up and down,
Who drive my best boys back to town.
They find that travelling now abroad,
To ease rich rascals on the road,
Is grown a calling much unsafe;
That there are surer ways by half,
To which they have their equal claim,
Of earning daily food and fame:
So down, at home, they sit, and think
How best to rob, with pen and ink.

Hence, red-hot letters and essays,
By the John Lilburn of these days;
Who guards his want of shame and sense,
With shield of seven-fold impudence.
Hence cards on Pelham, cards on Pitt,
With much abuse and little wit.
Hence libels against Hardwike penn'd,
That only hurt when they commend:
Hence oft ascrib'd to Fox, at least
All that defames his name-sake beast.
Hence Cloacina hourly views
Unnumber'd labours of the muse,
That sink, where myriads went before,
And sleep within the chaos hoar:
While her brown daughters, under ground,
Are fed with politics profound.
Each eager hand a fragment snaps,
More excrement than what it wraps.

These, singly, contributions raise,
Of casual pudding and of praise.
Others again, who form a gang,
Yet take due measures not to hang,
In magazines their forces join,
By legal methods to purloin:
Whose weekly, or whose monthly, feat is
First to decry, then steal, your treatise.
So rogues in France perform their job;
Assassinating, ere they rob.

But, this long narrative to close:
They who would grievances expose,
In all good policy, no less,
Should show the methods to redress,
If commerce, sinking in one scale,
By fraud or hazard comes to fail;
The task is next, all statesmen know it,
To find another where to throw it,
That, rising there in due degree,
The public may no loser be.

Thus having heard how you invade,
And, in one way, destroy my trade;
That we at last may part good friends,
Hear how you still may make amends.

O search this sinful town with care:
What numbers, duly mine, are there!
The full-fed herd of money-jobbers,
Jews, Christians, rogues, alike and robbers!
Who riot on the poor man's toils,
And fatten by a nation's spoils!
The crowd of little knaves in place,
Our age's envy and disgrace.
Secret and snug, by daily stealth,
The busy vermin pick up wealth;
Then, without birth, controul the great!
Then, without talents, rule the state!

Some ladies too---for some there are,
With shame and decency at war;
Who, on a ground of pale threescore,
Still spread the rose of twenty-four,
And bid a nut-brown bosom glow
With purer white than lilies know:
Who into vice intrepid rush;
Put modest whoring to the blush;
And with more front engage a trooper
Than Jenny Jones, or Lucy Cooper.
Send me each mischief-making nibbler;
'Tis equal, senator or scribbler:
Who, on the self-same spot of ground,
The self-same hearers staring round,
Abjure and join with praise and blame,
Both men and measures, still the same;
Or serve our foes with all their might,
By proving Britons dare not fight:
Slim, flimsy, fiddling, futile elves,
They paint the nation from themselves;
Less aiming to be wise than witty,
And mighty pert, and mighty pretty.
Send me each string---save green and blue---
These, brother Tower-hill, wait for you.
But, Lollius, be not in the spleen;
'Tis only Arthur's knights I mean---
Not those of old renown'd in fable,
Nor of the round, but gaming table;
Who, every night, the waiters say,
Break every law they make by day;
Plunge deep our youth in all the vice
Attendant upon drink and dice,
And, mixing in nocturnal battles,
Devour each other's goods and chattles;
While from the mouth of magic box,
With curses dire and dreadful knocks,
They fling whole tenements away,
Fling time, health, fame---yet call it play!
Till, by advice of special friends,
The titled dupe a sharper ends:
Or, if some drop of noble blood
Remains, not quite defil'd to mud,
The wretch, unpity'd and alone,
Leaps headlong to the world unknown!

ZEPHYR, OR THE STRATAGEM.

ARGUMENT.

A certain young lady was surpris'd, on horseback, by a violent storm of wind and rain from the South-west, which made her dismount somewhat precipitately.

THE god, in whose gay train appear
Those gales that wake the purple year;
Who lights up health and bloom and grace
In Nature's, and in Mira's face;
To speak more plain, the western wind,
Had seen this brightest of her kind:
Had seen her oft with fresh surprise!
And ever with desiring eyes!
Much, by her shape, her look, her air,
Distinguish'd from the vulgar fair;
More, by the meaning soul that shines

Through all her charms, and all refines,
Born to command, yet turn'd to please,
Her form is dignity, with ease:
Then---such a hand, and such an arm,
As age or impotence might warm!
Just such a leg too, Zephyr knows,
The Medicæan Venus shows!

So far he sees; so far admires.
Each charm is fuel to his fires:
But other charms, and those of price,
That form the bounds of Paradise,
Can those an equal praise command;
All turn'd by nature's finest hand?
Is all the consecrated ground
With plumpness, firm, with smoothness, round?

The world, but once, one Zeuxis saw,
A faultless form who dar'd to draw:
And then, that all might perfect be,
All rounded off in due degree,
To furnish out the matchless piece,
Were rifled half the toasts of Greece.
'Twas Pitt's white neck, 'twas Delia's thigh;
'Twas Waldegrave's sweetly-brilliant eye;
'Twas gentle Pembroke's ease and grace,
And Hervey lent her maiden-face.
But dares he hope, on British ground,
That these may all, in one, be found?
These chiefly that still shun his eye?
He knows not; but he means to try.

Aurora, rising, fresh and gay,
Gave promise of a golden day.
Up, with her sister, Mira rose,
Four hours before our London beaux;
For these are still asleep and dead,
Save Arthur's sons---not yet in bed.
A rose, impearl'd with orient dew,
Had caught the passing fair-one's view;
To pluck the bud he saw her stoop,
And try'd, behind, to heave her hoop:
Then, while across the daisy'd lawn
She turn'd, to feed her milk-white fawn,
Due westward as her steps she bore,
Would swell her petticoat, before;
Would subtly steal his face between,
To see---what never yet was seen!
"And sure, to fan it with his wing,
"No nine-month symptom e'er can bring;
"His aim is but the nymph to please,
"Who daily courts his cooling breeze."

But listen, fond believing maid!
When love, soft traitor, would persuade,
With all the moving skill and grace
Of practis'd passion in his face,
Dread his approach, distrust your power---
For oh! there is one shepherd's hour:
And though he long, his aim to cover,
May, with the friend, disguise the lover,
The sense, or nonsense, of his wooing
Will but adore you into ruin.
But, for those butterflies, the beaux,
Who buz around in tinsel-rows,
Shake, shake them off, with quick disdain:
Where insects settle, they will stain.

Thus, Zephyr oft the nymph assail'd,
As oft his little arts had fail'd:

The folds of silk, the ribs of whale,
Resisted still his feeble gale.
With these repulses vex'd at heart,
Poor Zephyr has recourse to art:
And his own weakness to supply,
Calls in a brother of the sky,
The rude south-west; whose mildest play
Is war, mere war, the Russian way:
A tempest-maker by his trade,
Who knows to ravish, not persuade.

The terms of their aerial league,
How first to harass and fatigue,
Then, sound on some remoter plain,
To ply her close with wind and rain;
These terms, writ fair and seal'd and sign'd,
Should Webb or Stukely wish to find,
Wise antiquaries, who explore
All that has ever pass'd---and more;
Though here too tedious to be told,
Are yonder in some cloud enroll'd,
Those floating registers in air:
So let them mount, and lead them there.

The grand alliance thus agreed,
To instant action they proceed;
For 'tis in war a maxim known,
As Prussia's monarch well has shown,
To break, at once, upon your foe,
And strike the first preventive blow.
With Toro's lungs, in Toro's form,
Whose very how d'ye is a storm,
The dread south-west his part begun,
Thick clouds, extinguishing the sun,
At his command, from pole to pole
Dark spreading, o'er the fair-one roll;
Who, pressing now her favourite steed,
Adorn'd the pomp she deigns to lead.

O Mira! to the future blind,
Th' insidious foe is close behind,
Guard, guard your treasure, while you can;
Unless this god should be the man.
For lo! the clouds, and his known call,
Are closing round---they burst! they fall!
While at the charmer all-aghast,
He pours whole winter in a blast:
Nor cares, in his impetuous mood,
If natives founder on the flood;
If Britain's coast be left as bare*
As he resolves to leave the fair.
Here, gods resemble human breed;
The world be damn'd---so they succeed.

Pale, trembling, from her steed she fled,
With silk, lawn, linen, round her head;
And, to the fawns who fed above,
Unveil'd the last recess of love.
Each wondering fawn was seen to bound†,
Each branchy deer o'erleap'd his mound,
A flight of that sequester'd glade,
In all its light, in all its shade,
Which rises there for wisest ends,
To deck the temple it defends.

Lo ! gentle tenants of the grove,
 For what a thousand heroes strove,
 When Europe, Asia, both in arms,
 Disputed one fair lady's charms.
 The war pretended Helen's eyes * ;
 But this, believe it, was the prize.
 This rous'd Achilles' mortal ire,
 This strung his Homer's epic lyre ;
 Gave to the world La Mancha's knight,
 And still makes bulls and heroes fight.

Yet, though the distant conscious muse
 This airy rape delighted views ;
 Yet she, for honour guides her lays,
 Enjoying yet, disdains to praise.
 If Frenchmen always fight with odds,
 Are they a pattern for the gods ?
 Can Russia, can th' Hungarian vampire †,
 With whom cast in the Swedes and empire,
 Can four such powers, who one assail,
 Deserve our praise, should they prevail ?
 O mighty triumph ! high renown !
 Two gods have brought one mortal down ;
 Have club'd their forces in a storm,
 To strip one helpless female form !
 Strip her stark naked ; yet confess,
 Such charms are beauty's fairest dress !

But, all-insensible to blame,
 The sky-born ravishers on flame
 Enchanted at the prospect stood,
 And kiss'd with rapture what they view'd.
 Sleek S * * r too had done no less ;
 Would parson's here the truth confess :
 Nay, one brisk peer, yet all-alive,
 Would do the same, at eighty-five ‡.

But how, in colours softly bright,
 Where strength and harmony unite,
 To paint the limbs, that fairer show
 Than Massalina's borrow'd snow ;
 To paint the rose, that, through its shade,
 With theirs, one human eye survey'd ;
 Would gracious Phœbus tell me how,
 Would he the genuine draught avow,
 The muse, a second Titian then,
 To fame might consecrate her pen !

That Titian, nature gave of old
 The queen of beauty to behold,
 Like Mira unadorn'd by dress,
 But all complete in nakedness :
 Then bade his emulating art
 Those wonders to the world impart.
 Around the ready graces stand,
 Each heightening stroke, each happy line,
 Awakes to life the form divine ;
 Till, rais'd and rounded every charm,
 And all with youth immortal warm,
 He sees, scarce crediting his eyes,
 He sees a brighter Venus rise !
 But, to the gentle reader's cost,
 His pencil, with his life, was lost :

EDWIN AND EMMA.

" Mark it, Cesario, it is true and plain.
 " The spinsters and the knitters in the sun,
 " And the free maids that weave their thread with
 " Do use to chant it. It is silly sooth, [bones,
 " And dallies with the innocence of love,
 " Like the old age."

SHAKESP. TWELFTH NIGHT.

FAR in the windings of a vale,
 Fast by a sheltering wood,
 The safe retreat of health and peace,
 An humble cottage stood,

There beauteous Emma flourish'd fair,
 Beneath a mother's eye ;
 Whose only wish on earth was now
 To see her blest, and die.

The softest blush that nature spreads
 Gave colour to her cheek :
 Such orient colour smiles through heaven,
 When vernal mornings break.

Nor let the pride of great-ones scorn
 This charmer of the plains :
 That sun, who bids their diamonds blaze,
 To paint our lily deigns.

Long had she fill'd each youth with love,
 Each maiden with despair ;
 And though by all a wonder own'd,
 Yet knew not she was fair.

Till Edwin came, the pride of swains,
 A soul devoid of art ;
 And from whose eye, serenely mild,
 Shone forth the feeling heart.

A mutual flame was quickly caught :
 Was quickly too reveal'd :
 For neither bosom lodg'd a wish,
 That virtue keeps conceal'd.

What happy hours of home-felt bliss
 Did love on both bestow !
 But bliss too mighty long to last,
 Where fortune proves a foe.

His sister, who, like envy form'd,
 Like her in mischief joy'd,
 To work them harm, with wicked skill,
 Each darker art employ'd.

The father too, a sordid man,
 Who love nor pity knew,
 Was all-unfeeling as the clod,
 From whence his riches grew.

Long had he seen their secret flame,
 And seen it long unmov'd :
 Then with a father's frown at last
 Had sternly disapprov'd.

In Edwin's gentle heart, a war
 Of differing passions strove ;

His heart, that durst not disobey,
Yet could not cease to love.

Deny'd her sight, he oft behind
The spreading hawthorn crept,
To snatch a glance, to mark the spot
Where Emma walk'd and wept.

Oft too on Stanmore's wintery waste,
Beneath the moonlight shade,
In sighs to pour his soften'd soul,
The midnight mourner stray'd.

His cheek, where health with beauty glow'd,
A deadly pale o'ercast:
So fades the fresh rose in its prime,
Before the northern blast.

The parents now, with late remorse,
Hung o'er his dying bed;
And weary'd Heaven with fruitless vows,
And fruitless sorrows shed.

'Tis past! he cry'd—but if your souls
Sweet mercy yet can move,
Let these dim eyes once more behold,
What they must ever love!

She came; his cold hand softly touch'd,
And bath'd with many a tear:
Fast-falling o'er the primrose pale,
So morning dew appears.

But oh! his sister's jealous care,
A cruel sister she!
Forbade what Emma came to say;
"My Edwin, live for me!"

Now homeward as she hopeless wept
The church-yard path along,
The blast blew cold, the dark owl scream'd
Her lover's funeral song.

Amid the falling gloom of night,
Her startling fancy found
In every bush his hovering shade,
His groan in every sound.

Alone, apall'd, thus had she pass'd
The visionary vale—
When lo! the death-bell smote her ear.
Sad founding in the gale!

Just then she reach'd, with trembling step,
Her aged mother's door—
He's gone! she cry'd; and I shall see
That angel-face no more.

I feel, I feel this breaking heart
Beat high against my side—
From her white arm down sunk her head;
She shivering sigh'd, and dy'd.

EXTRACT OF A LETTER FROM THE CURATE OF BOWES, IN YORKSHIRE,

On the subject of the preceding poem.

TO MR. COPPERTHWAIT, AT MARRICK.

Worthy Sir,

 As to the affair mentioned in yours, it happened long before my time. I have therefore been obliged to consult my clerk, and another person in the neighbourhood, for the truth of that melancholy event. The history of it is as follows:

THE family-name of the young man was Wrightson; of the young maiden Railton. They were both much of the same age; that is, growing up to twenty. In their birth was no disparity: but in fortune, alas! she was his inferior. His father, a hard old man, who had by his toil acquired a handsome competency, expected and required that his son should marry suitably. But as "amor vincit omnia," his heart was unalterably fixed on the pretty young creature already named. Their courtship, which was all by stealth, unknown to the family, continued about a year. When it was found out, old Wrightson, his wife, and particularly their crooked daughter Hannah, flouted at the maiden, and treated her with notable contempt. For they held it as a maxim, and a rustic one it is, "that blood was nothing without groats."

The young lover sickened, and took to his bed about Shrove-Tuesday, and died the Sunday sevennight after.

On the last day of his illness, he desired to see his mistress. She was civilly received by the mother, who bid her welcome—when it was too late. But her daughter Hanna lay at his back; to cut them off from all opportunity of exchanging their thoughts.

At her return home, on hearing the bell toll out for his departure, she scream'd aloud that her heart was burst, and expired some moments after.

The then curate of Bowes* inserted it in his register, that they both died of love, and were buried in the same grave, March 15, 1714. I am,

Dear Sir,

Yours, &c.

ON THE DEATH OF LADY ANSON.

ADDRESSED TO HER FATHER, 1761.

O CROWN'D with honour, blest with length of days,

Thou whom the wise revere, the worthy praise;
Just guardian of those laws thy voice explain'd,
And meriting all titles thou hast gain'd—
Though still the fairest from heaven's bounty flow;
For good and great no monarch can bestow:
Yet thus, of health, of fame, of friends possess,
No fortune, Hardwicke, is sincerely blest.
All human-kind are sons of sorrow born:
The great must suffer, and the good must mourn.
For say, can Wisdom's self, what late was thine,
Can fortitude, without a sigh, resign?
Ah, no! when Love, when Reason hand in hand,
O'er the cold urn consenting mourners stand,

* Bowes is a small village in Yorkshire, where, in former times, the Earls of Richmond had a castle. It stands on the edge of that vast and mountainous tract, named by the neighbouring people, Stanemore; which is always exposed to wind and weather, desolate and solitary throughout.

The firmest heart dissolves to soften here :
 And Piety applauds the falling tear.
 Those sacred drops, by virtuous weakness shed,
 Adorn the living, while they grace the dead :
 From tender thought their source unblam'd they draw,

By Heaven approv'd, and true to Nature's law.

When his lov'd child the Roman could not save,
 Immortal Tully, from an early grave †,
 No common forms his home-felt passion kept :
 The sage, the patriot, in the parent, wept.
 And O ! by grief ally'd, as join'd in fame,
 The same thy loss, thy sorrows are the same.
 She whom the Muses, whom the Loves deplore,
 Ev'n she, thy pride and pleasure, is no more :
 In bloom of years, in all her virtue's bloom,
 Lost to thy hopes, and silent in the tomb.

O ! season mark'd by mourning and despair,
 Thy blasts, how fatal to the young and fair ?
 For vernal freshness, for the balmy breeze,
 Thy tainted winds came pregnant with disease :
 Sick Nature sunk before the mortal breath,
 That scatter'd fever, agony, and death !
 What funerals has thy cruel ravage spread !
 What eyes have flow'd ! what noble bosoms bled.

Here let Reflection fix her sober view :
 O think, who suffer, and who sigh with you,
 See, rudely snatch'd, in all her pride of charms,
 Bright Granby from a youthful husband's arms !
 In climes far distant, see that husband mourn ;
 His arms revers'd, his recent laurel torn !
 Behold again, at Fate's imperious call,
 In one dread instant blooming Lincoln fall !
 See her lov'd lord with speechless anguish bend !
 And, mixing tears with his, thy noblest friend,
 Thy Pelham turn on heaven his streaming eye :
 Again in her, he sees a brother die !

And he, who long, unshaken and serene,
 Had death, in each dire form of terror seen,
 Through worlds unknown o'er unknown oceans
 By love subdued, now weeps a consort lost : [toft,
 Now, sunk to fondness, all the man appears,
 His front dejected, and his soul in tears !

Yet more : nor thou the muse's voice disdain,
 Who fondly tries to sooth a father's pain---
 Let thy calm eye survey the suffering ball :
 See kingdoms round thee verging to their fall !
 What spring had promis'd and what autumn yields,
 The bread of thousands, ravish'd from their fields !
 See youth and age, th' ignoble and the great,
 Swept to one grave, in one promiscuous fate !
 Hear Europe groan ! hear all her nations mourn !
 And be a private wound with patience borne.

Think too : and reason will confirm the thought :
 Thy cares, for her, are to their period brought.
 Yes, she, fair pattern to a failing age,
 With wit, chastis'd, with sprightly temper, sage :
 Whom each endearing name could recommend,
 Whom all became, wife, sister, daughter, friend,
 Unwarp'd by folly, and by vice untain'd,
 The prize of virtue has, for ever, gain'd !

† Tullia died about the age of two and thirty.
 She is celebrated for her filial piety ; and for having added, to the usual graces of her sex, the more solid accomplishments of knowledge and polite letters. MALLET.

From life escap'd, and safe on that calm shore
 Where sin and pain and error are no more,
 She now no change, nor you no fear can feel :
 Death, to her fame, has fix'd th' eternal seal !

A FUNERAL HYMN.

YE midnight shades, o'er Nature spread !
 Dumb silence of the dreary hour !
 In honour of th' approaching dead,
 Around your awful terrors pour.

Yes, pour around,
 On this pale ground,
 Through all this deep surrounding gloom,
 The sober thought,
 The tear untaught,

Those meetest mourners at a tomb.

Lo ! as the surplis'd train draw near
 To this last mansion of mankind,
 The slow sad bell, the sable bier,
 In holy musings wrap the mind !

And while their beam,
 With trembling stream,
 Attending tapers faintly dart ;
 Each mouldering bone,
 Each sculptur'd stone,
 Strike mute instruction to the heart !

Now, let the sacred organ blow,
 With solemn pause, and sounding flow :
 Now, let the voice due measure keep,
 In strains that sigh, and words that weep ;
 Till all the vocal current blended roll,
 Not to depress, but lift the soaring soul.
 To lift it in the Maker's praise,
 Who first inform'd our frame with breath :
 And, after some few stormy days,
 Now, gracious, gives us o'er to death.

No king of fears,
 In him appears,
 Who shuts the scene of human woes :
 Beneath his shade
 Securely laid,
 The dead alone find true repose.

Then, while we mingle dust with dust,
 To One, supremely good and wise,
 Raise hallelujahs ! God is just,
 And man most happy, when he dies !

His winter past,
 Fair spring at last
 Receives him on her flowery shore ;
 Where Pleasure's rose
 Immortal blows,
 And sin and sorrow are no more !

TO MIRA,

FROM THE COUNTRY.

AT this late hour, the world lies hush'd below,
 Nor is one breath of air awake to blow.
 Now walks mute Midnight, darkling o'er the plain,

Rest, and soft-footed Silence, in his train,
 To bless the cottage, and renew the swain.
 These all-asleep, me all-awake they find ;
 Nor rest, nor silence, charm the lover's mind.

Already, I a thousand torments prove,
The thousand torments of divided love ;
The rolling thought, impatient in the breast ;
The fluttering wish on wing, that will not rest ;
Desire, whose kindled flames, undying, glow ;
Knowledge of distant bliss, and present woe ;
Unhush'd, unsleeping all, with me they dwell,
Children of absence, and of loving well !
These pale the cheek, and cloud the cheerful eye,
Swell the swift tear, and heave the frequent sigh :
These reach the heart, and bid the health decline ;
And these, O Mira ! these are truly mine.

She, whose sweet smile would gladden all the grove,
Whose mind is music, and whose looks are love ;
She, gentle power ! victorious softness !---She,
Mira, is far from hence, from love, and me ;
Yet, in my every thought, her form I find,
Her looks, her words---her world of charms combin'd !

Sweetness is her's, and unaffected ease ;
The native wit, that was not taught to please.
Whatever softly animates the face,
The eye's attemper'd fire, the winning grace
Th' unstudy'd smile, the blush that nature warms,
And all the graceful negligence of charms !
Ha ! while I gaze, a thousand ardours rise ;
And my fir'd bosom flashes from my eyes,
Oh ! melting mildness ! miracle of charms !
Receive my soul within those folding arms !
On that dear bosom let my wishes rest---
Oh ! softer than the turtle's downy breast !
And see ! where Love himself is waiting near !
Here let me ever dwell---for heaven is here !

A WINTER'S DAY.

WRITTEN IN A STATE OF MELANCHOLY.

Now, gloomy soul ! look out---now comes thy turn ;
With thee, behold all ravag'd nature mourn.
Hail the dim empire of thy darling night, [light.
That spreads, slow-shadowing, o'er the vanquish'd
Look out, with joy ; the ruler of the day,
Faint, as thy hopes, emits a glimmering ray :
Already exil'd to the utmost sky,
Hither, oblique, he turn'd his clouded eye.
Lo ! from the limits of the wintry pole,
Mountainous clouds, in rude confusion, roll :
In dismal pomp, now, hovering on their way,
To a sick twilight, they reduce the day.
And hark ! imprison'd winds, broke loose, arise,
And roar their haughty triumph through the skies.
While the driven clouds, o'ercharg'd with floods
of rain,
And mingled lightning, burst upon the plain,
Now see sad earth---like thine, her alter'd state,
Like thee, she mourns her sad reverse of fate !
Her smile, her wanton looks---where are they now ?
Faded her face, and wrapt in clouds her brow !
No more, th' ungrateful verdure of the plain ;
No more, the wealth-crown'd labours of the swain ;
These scenes of bliss, no more upbraid my fate,
Torture my pining thought, and rouse my hate.

The leaf-clad forest, and the tufted grove,
Erewhile the safe retreats of happy love,
Stript of their honours, naked, now appear ;
This is---my soul ! the winter of their year !
The little, noisy songsters of the wing,
All, shivering on the bough, forget to sing.
Hail ! reverend Silence ! with thy awful brow !
Be Music's voice, for ever mute---as now :
Let no intrusive joy my dead repose
Disturb :---no pleasure disconcert my woes.

In this moss-cover'd cavern, hopeless laid,
On the cold cliff, I'll lean my aching head ;
And, pleas'd with Winter's waste, unpitying, see
All nature in an agony with me !
Rough, rugged rocks, wet marshes, ruin'd towers,
Bare trees, brown brakes, bleak heaths, and rushy moors,
Dead floods, huge cataracts, to my pleas'd eyes---
(Now I can smile !)---in wild disorder rise :
And now, the various dreadfuls combin'd,
Black melancholy comes, to doze my mind.

See ! Night's wish'd shades rise, spreading through the air,
And the lone, hollow gloom, for me prepare !
Hail ! solitary ruler of the grave !
Parent of terrors ! from thy dreary cave !
Let thy dumb silence midnight all the ground,
And spread a welcome horror wide around.---
But hark ! a sudden howl invades my ear !
The phantoms of the dreadful hour are near.
Shadows from each dark cavern, now combine,
And stalk around, and mix their yells with mine.
Stop, flying Time ! repose thy restless wing ;
Fix here---nor hasten to restore the spring :
Fix'd my ill fate, so fix'd let winter be---
Let never wanton season laugh at me !

I'm glad 'tis Sarah—Then our Sall may see
Her namesake's Tragedy: and as for me,
I'll sleep as sound as if I were at sea.

To which will be added—a new Masque.

Zounds! why a Masque? We sailors hate grimaces:

Above-board all, we scorn to hide our faces.
But what is here, so very large and plain!
Bri-ta-nia—oh Britania!—good again—
Huzza, boys! by the Royal George I swear,
Tom Coxen, and the crew, shall strait be there.
All free-born souls must take Bri-ta-nia's part,
And give her three round cheers, with hand and heart!

Going off, he stops.

I wish you landmen, though, would leave your tricks,
Your factions, parties, and damn'd politics:
And, like us, honest tars, drink, fight, and sing!
True to yourselves, your country, and your king!

WITH no one talent that deserves applause;
With no one awkwardness that laughter draws;
Who thinks not, but just echoes what we say;
At clock, at morn, wound up, to run a day:
His larum goes in one smooth, simple strain;
He stops: and then, we wind him up again.

TO A SCOTCH TUNE, MARY SCOT.

WHERE Thames, along the daisy'd meads,
His wave, in lucid mazes, leads,
Silent, slow, serenely flowing,
Wealth on either shore bestowing;
There, in a safe, though small retreat,
Content and Love have fix'd their seat:
Love, that counts his duty, pleasure;
Content that knows and hugs his treasure.

From art, from jealousy secure;
As faith unblam'd, as friendship pure;
Vain opinion nobly scorning,
Virtue aiding, life adorning.
Fair Thames, along thy flowery side,
May those whom truth and reason guide,

All their tender hours improving,
Live like us, belov'd and loving!

TO MR. THOMSON.

ON HIS PUBLISHING THE SECOND EDITION OF HIS POEM, CALLED WINTER.

CHARM'D, and instructed by thy powerful song,
I have, unjust, withheld my thanks too long:
This debt of gratitude at length receive,
Warmly sincere, 'tis all thy friend can give.
Thy worth new lights the poet's darken'd name,
And shows it, blazing, in the brightest fame.
Through all thy various Winter, full are found
Magnificence of thought, and pomp of sound,
Clear depth of sense, expression's heightening
grace,

And goodness, eminent in power and place!
For this, the wise, the knowing few, commend
With zealous joy—for thou art virtue's friend:
Ev'n age, and truth severe, in reading thee,
That heaven inspires the muse, convinc'd agree.

Thus I dare sing of merit, faintly known,
Friendless—supported by itself alone:
For those, whose aided will could lift thee high,
In fortune, see not with discernment's eye.
Nor place, nor power, bestows the sight refin'd;
And wealth enlarges not the narrow mind.

How could'st thou think of such, and write so
Or hope reward, by daring to excel? [well?
Unskilful of the age! untaught to gain
Those favours, which the fawning base obtain!
A thousand shameful arts, to thee unknown,
Falsehood, and flattery, must be first thy own.
If thy lov'd country lingers in thy breast,
Thou must drive out th' unprofitable guest:
Extinguish each bright aim, that kindles there,
And centre in thyself thy every care.

But hence that vileness—pleas'd to charm man-
kind,

Cast each low thought of interest far behind:
Neglected into noble scorn—away
From that worn path, where vulgar poets stray:
Inglorious herd! profuse of venal lays!
And by the pride despis'd, they stoop to praise!
Thou, careless of the statesman's smile or frown,
Tread that strait way, that leads to fair renown.
By virtue guided, and by glory fir'd,
And, by reluctant envy, slow admir'd,
Dare to do well, and in thy boundless mind,
Embrace the general welfare of thy kind:
Enrich them with the treasures of thy thought,
What heaven approves, and what the muse has taught.

Where thy power fails, unable to go on,
Ambitious, greatly will the good undone.
So shall thy name through ages brightening
shine,

And distant praise, from worth unborn, be thine;
So shalt thou, happy! merit heaven's regard,
And find a glorious, though a late reward.

WILLIAM AND MARGARET.

'Twas at the silent, solemn hour,
When night and morning meet;
In glided Margaret's grimly ghost,
And stood at William's feet.

Her face was like an April-morn,
Clad in a wintery cloud;
And clay-cold was her lily hand,
That held her sable shroud.

So shall the fairest face appear,
When youth and years are flown;
Such is the robe that kings must wear,
When death has reft their crown.

Her bloom was like the springing flower,
That tips the silver dew;
The rose was budded in her cheek,
Just opening to the view.

But love had, like the canker-worm,
Consum'd her early prime;
The rose grew pale, and left her cheek;
She dy'd before her time.

Awake! she cry'd, thy true-love calls,
Come from her midnight-grave;
Now let thy pity hear the maid,
Thy love refus'd to save.

This is the dumb and dreary hour,
When injur'd ghosts complain;
When yawning graves give up their dead,
To haunt the faithless swain.

Bethink thee, William, of thy fault,
Thy pledge and broken oath!
And give me back my maiden-vow,
And give me back my troth.

Why did you promise love to me,
And not that promise keep?
Why did you swear my eyes were bright,
Yet leave those eyes to weep?

How could you say my face was fair,
And yet that face forsake?
How could you win my virgin-heart,
Yet leave that heart to break?

Why did you say my lip was sweet,
And made the scarlet pale?
And why did I, young witlefs maid!
Believe the flattering tale?

That face, alas! no more is fair,
Those lips no longer red:
Dark are my eyes, now clos'd in death,
And every charm is fled.

The hungry worm my sister is;
This winding sheet I wear:
And cold and weary lasts our night,
Till that last morn appear.

But, hark! the cock has warn'd me hence;
A long and late adieu!
Come, see, false man, how low she lies,
Who dy'd for love of you.

VOL. IX.

The lark sung loud; the morning smil'd,
With beams of rosy red:
Pale William quak'd in every limb,
And raving left his bed.

He hy'd him to the fatal place
Where Margaret's body lay;
And stretch'd him on the green-grass turf,
That wrapp'd her breathless clay.

And thrice he call'd on Margaret's name,
And thrice he wept full sore;
Then laid his cheek to her cold grave,
And word spoke never more!

N. B. In a comedy of Fletcher, called "The Knight of the Burning Pestle," old Merry-Thought enters repeating the following verses:

*When it was grown to dark midnight,
And all were fast asleep,
In came Margaret's grimly ghost,
And stood at William's feet.*

This was probably the beginning of some ballad, commonly known, at the time when that author wrote; and is all of it, I believe, that is any where to be met with. These lines, naked of ornament, and simple as they are, struck my fancy: and, bringing fresh into my mind an unhappy adventure, much talked of formerly, gave birth to the foregoing poem; which was written many years ago.

MALLET.

EPI T A P H,

ON MR. AIKMAN, AND HIS ONLY SON; WHO WERE BOTH INTERRED IN THE SAME GRAVE.

DEAR to the wise and good, disprais'd by none,
Here sleep in peace the father and the son:
By virtue, as by nature, close ally'd,
The painter's genius, but without the pride;
Worth unambitious, wit afraid to shine,
Honour's clear light, and friendship's warmth divine.

The son, fair rising, knew too short a date;
But oh, how more severe the parent's fate!
He saw him torn, untimely, from his side,
Felt all a father's anguish, wept and dy'd!

EPI T A P H,

ON A YOUNG LADY.

THIS humble grave, though no proud structures
grace,
Yet truth and goodness sanctify the place:
Yet blameless virtue that adorn'd thy bloom,
Lamented maid! now weeps upon thy tomb.
O 'scap'd from life! O safe on that calm shore,
Where sin, and pain, and passion are no more!
What never wealth could buy, nor power decree,
Regard and pity wait sincere on thee:
Lo! soft remembrance drops a pious tear;
And holy friendship stands a mourner here.

S O N G.

TO A SCOTCH TUNE.

The Birks of Endermay.

THE smiling morn, the breathing spring,
 Invite the tuneful birds to sing:
 And while they warble from each spray,
 Love melts the universal lay.
 Let us, Amanda, timely wife,
 Like them improve the hour that flies;
 And, in soft raptures, waste the day,
 Among the shades of Endermay.

For soon the winter of the year,
 And age, life's winter will appear:
 At this, thy living bloom must fade;
 As that will strip the verdant shade.
 Our taste of pleasure then is o'er;
 The feather'd songsters love no more:
 And when they droop, and we decay,
 Adieu the shades of Endermay!

THOMSON'S VERSES

TO MISS YOUNG †, WITH A PRESENT OF HIS SEASONS.

Omitted in his works.

ACCEPT, loved nymph! this tribute due
 To tender friendship, love, and you;
 But with it take what breath'd the whole,
 O! take to thine the poet's soul.
 If fancy here her pow'r displays,
 And if a heart exalts these lays—
 You fairest in that fancy shine,
 And all that heart is fondly thine.

THE LIFE OF AKENSIDE.

MARK AKENSIDE, "the British Lucretius," was born at Newcastle-upon-Tyne, Nov. 9. 1721. His father, Mark Akenfide, was a substantial butcher in that town. His mother, Mary Lumfden, was probably of Scottish extraction. Both parents were dissenters.

Mr. Brand, the present vicar of Newcastle, in his "Observations on popular Antiquities," alleges, that a halt which he had in his gait was occasioned by the falling of a cleaver from his father's stall upon him, when he was a boy. "This," says he, "must have been a perpetual remembrance of his humble origin;" of which, it is alleged, he was ashamed; but without any foundation.

He received the first part of his education at the free school of Newcastle, and was afterwards placed under the care of Mr. Wilson, a dissenting minister, who kept an academy in that town, where he had for his school-fellow, the late Gabriel Selby, Esq. of Paston, in Northumberland.

At the age of eighteen, he was sent to the University of Edinburgh, that he might qualify himself for the office of a dissenting minister, and received some assistance from the fund which the dissenters employ in educating young men of scanty fortune. He prosecuted his studies for one winter, upon this plan: but a wider view of the world, prompting other hopes, he determined to study physic; and repaid, afterwards, that contribution which, being received for a different purpose, he justly thought it dishonourable to retain.

When he resolved not to be a dissenting minister, he probably did not cease to be a dissenter. He certainly retained an ardent zeal for civil and religious liberty; without seeking to strengthen the faction of parties; without forfeiting his reputation as a good citizen. Dr. Johnson, whose unfavourable opinion of the dissenters is well known, calls his zeal for liberty "unnecessary and outrageous," because it "sometimes disguises from the world, and not rarely from the mind which it possesses, an envious desire of plundering wealth, or degrading greatness, of which the immediate tendency is innovation and anarchy, an impetuous eagerness to subvert and confound, with very little care what shall be established." The observation, though inapplicable to Akenfide, is just, and may be deemed prophetic by the best friends of rational and regulated freedom, who lament the excesses of what is called and thought liberty in the present day.

Akenfide seems to have felt very early the motions of genius, and to have very early stored his memory with sentiments and images. He began to write verses when he was at the grammar school, and many of his poetical performances were produced during his continuance at Mr. Wilson's academy. It is said that his greatest work, The Pleasures of Imagination, was written at Morpeth, on the banks of the Wensbeck, which he has celebrated in his verses, while he was on a visit to his relations, before he went to the University of Edinburgh.

At Edinburgh, he distinguished himself likewise by his poetical compositions. His Ode on the Winter Solstice, which is dated 1740, was certainly composed at that place.

His taste for poetry facilitated his introduction to the most respectable literary associations among his fellow students, by whom his genius and learning were highly respected; and his philosophical knowledge easily procured him admission into the "Medical Society," an institution coeval with the establishment of a regular school of physic in the University, of which he was elected a member, December 30. 1740.

In 1741, after staying three years at Edinburgh, he removed to Leyden, in pursuit of medical knowledge, where he contracted an intimate friendship with Jeremiah Dyson, Esq. who was prosecuting the study of the civil law, in that University. After residing three years at Leyden, he took his degree of Doctor in Physic, May 16, 1744, and published an inaugural dissertation, according to the custom of the Dutch Universities, De ortu et incremento fatus humani, in which he displayed his medical sagacity, by attacking some opinions of Leuwenhoek, and other writers, at that time very generally received, and by proposing an hypothesis, which has been considered as founded on truth, by the best physicians and philosophers.

He now returned to England, with his friend Mr. Dyson, and the same year published The Pleasures of Imagination, which was, in general, received with great applause.

When the copy was offered to Doddsley, by whom it was published, the price demanded for it, which was 120 l. being such as he was not inclined to give precipitately, he carried the work to Pope, who, having looked into it, advised him not to make a niggardly offer, for "this was no every-day poet."

Warburton being dissatisfied with a note in the third book, in which he adopts Shaftesbury's assertion of the efficacy of ridicule for the discovery of truth, thought proper, in a preface to one of his publications, to make some severe strictures upon him; in which, however, he was attacked as a philosopher, not as a poet.

He was defended by his friend Mr. Dyson, in an anonymous "Epistle to Mr. Warburton, occasioned by his treatment of the Author of the Pleasures of Imagination," in which there are several sensible observations; but the style is uncouth and unpleasant.

Warburton's strictures on Akenfide, were afterwards reprinted in the postscript to the dedication to the "Free-thinker," prefixed to the first volume of the "Divine Legation," without, however, any notice being taken of what had been written in his defence.

The poem on the Pleasures of Imagination was quickly followed by a very acrimonious Epistle to Pulteney, whom he stigmatizes under the name of Curio, as the betrayer of his country. He afterwards shortened this Epistle, and transformed it into an Ode.

Being now to live by his profession, he first commenced Physician at Northampton, where Dr. Stonehouse then practised, with such reputation and success, that a stranger was not likely to gain ground upon him.

"Akenfide tried the contest a while," says Dr. Johnson, "and having deafened the place with clamours for liberty, removed to Hampstead, where he resided more than two years, and then fixed himself in London, the proper place for a man of accomplishments like his."

Dr. Kippis, who then resided at Northampton for education, relates, that Dr. Doddridge and Akenfide carried on an amicable debate concerning the opinions of the ancients, with regard to a future state of rewards and punishments, in which Akenfide supported the firm belief of Cicero in particular, in this great article of natural religion.

On his quitting Northampton, he would perhaps have been reduced to great exigencies in making his way as a physician; but that Mr. Dyson, with an ardour of friendship that has no examples, supported him while he was endeavouring to make himself known.

Mr. Dyson had studied the law, and been called to the bar; but in a short time, having purchased of Mr. Hardinge his place of clerk of the House of Commons, he quitted Westminster Hall, and for the purpose of introducing Akenfide to acquaintance in an opulent neighbourhood near the town, bought a house at North-End, Hampstead, where they dwelt together during the summer season; frequenting the long-room, and all clubs and assemblies of the inhabitants.

At these meetings, Sir John Hawkins relates, that Akenfide was for displaying those talents which had acquired him the reputation he enjoyed in other companies; "but here," he observes, "they were of little use to him; on the contrary, they tended to engage him in disputes that betrayed him into a contempt of those that differed in opinion from him."

It was found out that he was a man of low birth, and a dependent on Mr. Dyson; circumstances that furnished those whom he offended with a ground of reproach that reduced him to the necessity of asserting that he was a gentleman.

Little could be done at Hampstead after matters had proceeded to this extremity. Mr. Dyson parted with his villa at North-End, and settled his friend in a small house in Bloomsbury Square, assigning him, with unexampled liberality, 300 l. a-year, which enabled him to keep a chariot, and make a proper appearance in the world.

"If our princes and nobles," says Mr. Hayley, "have not equalled those of other kingdoms in liberality to the great poets of their country, England may yet boast the name of a private gentleman, who discovered, in this respect, a most princely spirit. No nation, either ancient or modern, can produce an example of munificence more truly noble than the annual gratuity which Akenfide received from Mr. Dyson; a tribute of generous and affectionate admiration, endeared to its worthy possessor by every consideration which could make it honourable both to himself and to his patron."

At London, he was known as a poet by the Pleasures of Imagination, and the Epistle to Curio, which were followed in 1745, by Odes on several Subjects, written, as he tells us, "at very different intervals, and with a view to very different manners of expression and versification."

These performances appeared before he was 24 years of age; but he was afterwards more slow in his publications. His Ode to the Earl of Huntingdon came out in 1748, and in 1758 he attempted to rouse the national spirit by an Ode to the Country Gentlemen of England.

Few of his remaining poetical pieces were published separately, excepting an Ode to Thomas Edwards, Esq. on the late Edition of Pope's Works, which had been written in 1751, but was not printed till 1766, with a view, it should seem, of showing his dislike to Warburton, by exposing his early correspondence with Concanen and Theobald. The rest of his poems which appeared in his lifetime were given, at least for the most part, in Doddsley's "Collection."

His poetical reputation was now completely established. He advanced gradually in medical reputation, but never attained any great extent of practice or eminence of popularity.

A physician, Dr. Johnson observes, in a great city, seems to be the mere plaything of fortune: his degree of reputation is, for the most part, totally casual; they that employ him know not his excellence; they that reject him know not his deficiency. By any acute observer, who had looked on the transactions of the medical world for half a century, a very curious book might be written on the fortune of physicians.

Akenside appears to have used every endeavour to become popular; "but defeated them all," says Sir John Hawkins, "by the high opinion he every where manifested of himself, and the little condescension he showed to men of inferior endowments."

In the winter evenings, he frequented Tom's coffee-house, in Devereux-Court, then the resort of some of the most eminent men for learning and ingenuity of the time, with some of whom he became entangled in disputes and altercations, chiefly on subjects of literature and politics, that fixed on his character the stamp of haughtiness and self-conceit, and drew him into disagreeable situations.

One evening, a dispute between him and Counsellor Ballow, a man of learning, but of vulgar manners, and of spleenetic temper, rose so high, that for some expression uttered by Ballow, Akenside thought himself obliged to demand an apology; which being refused, he sent his adversary a challenge.

Ballow, though he hated Akenside for his republican principles, and envied him for that eloquence which he displayed in conversation, had no inclination for fighting, and declined an answer. The demand of satisfaction was followed by several attempts on the part of Akenside, to see Ballow at his lodgings; but he kept close, till, by the interposition of friends, the difference could be adjusted.

According to Sir John Hawkins, the accommodation was not brought about by any concessions of his adversary, but by a resolution from which neither of them would depart; for one would not fight in the morning, nor the other in the evening.

By this business, the biographer of Dr. Johnson observes, that he acquired the character of an irascible man; and many who admired his genius and parts, were shy of becoming his intimates: yet he acknowledges, that "where there was no competition for applause or literary reputation, he was an easy companion, and would bear with such rudeness as would have angered almost any one."

He seems, however, to have possessed more discretion than Sir John Hawkins allows him; for, besides his eagerness in forcing himself into notice, by an ambitious ostentation of elegance and literature, he placed himself in view by all the common methods; and arrived at most of the honours incident to his profession. He became a Fellow of the Royal Society, was admitted by mandamus to the degree of Doctor in Physic in the University of Cambridge, became Physician to St. Thomas's Hospital, was elected Fellow of the College of Physicians, chosen Reader of the Gualstonian and Cronian Lectures, and, on the establishment of the Queen's household, appointed one of the Physicians to her Majesty.

If there be any truth in the supposition that Akenside entertained republican ideas in his youth, it is probable that he might afterwards soften the rigour of his sentiments.

In 1761, the celebrated Thomas Hollis, Esq. purchased a bed which once belonged to Milton, and in which he died. This bed he sent as a present to Akenfide, with the following card:—"An English gentleman is desirous of having the honour to present a bed, which once belonged to John Milton, and on which he died; and if the Doctor's genius, believing himself obliged, and having slept on that bed, should prompt him to write an ode to the memory of John Milton, and the assertor of British liberty, that gentleman would think himself abundantly recompensed."—Akenfide, it is said, seemed wonderfully delighted with this bed, and had it put up in his house; but it does not appear that he took any other notice of Mr. Hollis's benefaction and request.

After he came into considerable reputation and practice, he wrote little poetry, but published, from time to time, medical essays and observations, in the "Transactions" of the Royal Society, and of the College of Physicians.

In 1764, he published his Dissertatio de Dysenteria, which was considered as a very conspicuous specimen of Latinity, that entitled him to the same height of place among the scholars as he possessed before among the wits; and he might have risen to a greater elevation of character, but that his studies were ended with his life, by a putrid fever, June 23, 1770, in the 49th year of his age. He was buried in the parish church of St. James's, Westminster. His effects, and particularly his books and prints, which last he was fond of collecting, became the property of his great and intimate friend, Mr. Dyson.

Besides his Dissertatio de Dysenteria, which has been twice translated into English, he contributed to the "Philosophical Transactions," 1757, Observations on the Origin and Use of the Lymphatic Vessels in Animals, being an extract from the Gullstonian Lectures, read in the theatre of the College of Physicians, in June 1755. Dr. Monro at Edinburgh having taken notice of some inaccuracies in this paper, in his "Observations, Anatomical and Physiological," &c. he published a small pamphlet in his vindication, 1758. To the "Philosophical Transactions," 1763, he contributed An Account of a blow on the Heart, and its effects. Oratio Anniversaria ex Instituto Harveii, &c. Anno 1759, 4to. 1760. To the first volume of the "Medical Transactions," he contributed Observations on Cancers; of the use of Ipecacuanha in Asthmas, and a Method of treating White Swellings of the Joints. He read at the College, some observations made in St. Thomas's Hospital, on the putrid Erysipelas, which he intended for the second volume of the "Medical Transactions," but it was not returned at the time of his death. He began to give for the Cronian Lecture, A History of the Revival of Learning, from which he soon desisted, as it was supposed, in disgust, some one of the College having objected that he had chosen a subject foreign to the institution.

A complete edition of his Poems, with his last corrections and improvements, was published by Mr. Dyson, in 4to. 1772, to which he prefixed an account of his life, which is so poor and cold, that it is deserving of censure. Akenfide merited a better memorial from the hand of his friend. A regular piece of biography, drawn out at length, was not perhaps requisite; but the slightest sketch might have contained some traits of character, some indications of affection, some marks of regret that such a genius should be suddenly carried off without executing his laudable intentions. His poem on The Pleasures of Imagination, as it originally appeared, has been frequently reprinted. He is believed to have written, in Dodsley's "Museum," the Table of Modern Fame, "at which," says Dr. Warton, "the guests are introduced and ranged with that taste and judgment peculiar to the author." In the appendix to the "Memoirs of Mr. Hollis," are two letters extracted from the "Public Advertiser," relative to his Ode to Thomas Edwards, Esq., and to his supposed Reflections on the Clergy, in a passage in the Pleasures of Imagination. Among Dr. Birch's papers in the British Museum, are several letters written to him by Akenfide.

Sir John Hawkins, in his "Life of Dr. Johnson," has drawn Akenfide's character somewhat at large; and it is, with a few exceptions, highly to his advantage.

"The value of that precept which exhorts us to live peaceably with all men, or, in other words, to avoid creating enemies, can only be estimated by the reflection on those many amiable qualities against which the neglect of it will preponderate. Akenfide was a man of religion and strict virtue, a philosopher, a scholar, and a fine poet. His conversation was of the most delightful kind, learned, instructive, and without any affectation of wit, cheerful, and entertaining. One of the pleasantest days of my life, I passed with him, Mr. Dyson, and another friend at Putney bowling."

green-house, where a neat and elegant dinner, the enlivening sunshine of a summer day, and the view of an unclouded sky, were the least of our gratifications. In perfect good humour with himself and all around him, he seemed to feel a joy that he lived and poured out his gratulations to the great Disposer of all felicity, in expressions that Plato himself might have uttered on such an occasion. In conversation with select friends, and those whose course of study had been nearly the same with his own, it was an usual thing with him, in libations to the memory of eminent men among the ancients, to bring their characters into view, and thereby give occasion to expatiate on those particulars of their lives that had rendered them famous. His method was to arrange them in three classes, philosophers, poets, and legislators.

“That a character thus formed should fail of recommending itself to general esteem, and procure to the possessor of it those benefits which it is in the power of mankind to bestow, may seem a wonder; but it is often seen, that negative qualities are more conducive to this end than positive, and that, with no higher, a character than is attainable by any one who, with a studious taciturnity, will keep his opinions to himself, conform to the practice of others, and entertain neither friendship for, nor enmity against any one, a competition for the good opinion of the world, may, for emoluments, and even dignities, stand a better chance of success than one of the most established reputation for learning and ingenuity. The truth of this observation, Akenfide himself lived to experience; who, in a competition for the place of Physician to the Charterhouse, was unable to prevail against an obscure man, devoid of every quality that might serve to recommend him, and whose sole merit was that of being distantly related to the late Lord Holland.”

Akenfide was very much devoted to the study of ancient literature, and was a great admirer of the best philosophers of antiquity, particularly of Plato and Cicero. His philosophical knowledge and classical taste are conspicuous in his poems, and in the notes and illustrations which he has annexed to them. Of the modern philosophers, Shaftesbury and Hutcheson were his greatest favourites. His high veneration for the Supreme Being, his noble sentiments of the wisdom and benevolence of the Divine Providence, and his zeal for the cause of virtue, are apparent in all his poems. His Ode to William Hall, Esq. with the works of Chalcieu, condemns the licentiousness of that poet. His regard to the Christian revelation, and his solicitude to have it preserved in its native purity, are displayed in the Ode to the Bishop of Winchester. The Ode to the Author of the Memoirs of the House of Brandenburg, seems to have been written on purpose to expose the irreligious tenets of the royal historian. He was warmly attached to the cause of civil and religious liberty. His zeal for freedom is a distinguished feature, and peculiar excellence in the character of his poetry. His productions uniformly glow with the sacred fire of liberty, inasmuch that he well deserves to be styled, “the Poet of the Community.” Two of his principal odes are directly consecrated to it, the Ode to the Earl of Huntingdon, and that to the Bishop of Winchester. In early life, he was understood to be such a strenuous advocate for liberty, in its most extensive sense, as to have some tincture of republicanism in his notions. But no sufficient proof of this is deducible from his poems. When, with a reference to our own country, he celebrates the cause of freedom, he does it in no other light than that of a zealous Whig, who was warmly attached to the revolution, and to the memory of the great men by whom it was effected. He omits no opportunity, in particular, of testifying his veneration for King William. Whatever may be thought of his softening the rigour of some expressions in the last editions of the Ode on leaving Holland, and the Ode to the Earl of Huntingdon, it is certain that a most ardent spirit of liberty breathes through his works.

Akenfide, considered as a didactic and lyric poet, ranks with the most eminent writers of didactic and lyric poetry, in ancient or modern times. In his Pleasures of Imagination, he has attempted the most rich and poetical form of didactic writing; and though, in the execution of the whole, he is not equal, he has, in several parts, succeeded happily, and displayed much genius. “For my own part, I am of opinion,” says Cooper, in his “Letters on Taste,” “that there is now living, a poet of as genuine a genius as this kingdom ever produced, Shakspeare alone excepted. The gentleman I mean is Dr. Akenfide, the worthy author of the Pleasures of Imagination, the most beautiful didactic poem that ever adorned the English language.” On the other hand, Gray, writing to Dr. Wharton, says: “I will tell you, though I have rather turned over than read the poem of your young friend (Dr. Akenfide), that it seems to me above the middling, and now and then, for a little while, rises even to the best, particularly in description. It is often obscure, and often unintelligible, and too much infected with the Hutcheson jargon. In short, its great fault is, that it was published at least nine years too early." This opinion, hastily delivered in a private letter, before the poem had been maturely examined, must be considered as too severe. The obscurity of the Pleasures of Imagination, when read with attention, will chiefly be found in the allegory of the second book. It might likewise have been better if the peculiar language of Hutcheson, or rather of Shaftesbury had sometimes been omitted. But though it is perhaps defective in some respects, and redundant in others, yet it is a noble and beautiful poem, exhibiting many bright displays of genius and fancy, and holding out sublime views of nature, providence, and morality. Akenfide himself was convinced that it was published too early. "That it wanted revision and correction," says his friend and editor, Mr. Dyson, "he was sufficiently sensible; but so quick was the demand for several successive republications, that, in any of the intervals, to have completed the whole of his corrections was utterly impossible. He chose therefore to continue for some time reprinting it without any alteration, and to forbear publishing any alterations or improvements, till he should be able at once to give the whole to the public complete. And, with this view, he went on for several years to review and correct his poem at his leisure, till at length he found the task grow so much upon his hands, that, despairing of ever being able to execute it sufficiently to his own satisfaction, he abandoned the purpose of correcting, and resolved to write the poem over anew, upon somewhat a different and enlarged plan."

He designed at first to comprise the whole of his subject, according to the new plan, in four books. But he afterwards changed his purpose, and determined to distribute the Pleasures of the Imagination into a greater number of books. How far his scheme would have carried him, if he had lived to complete it, is uncertain; for, at his death, he had only finished the first and second books, a considerable part of the third, and the introduction to the last. The first book of the improved work bears a nearer resemblance to the first book of the former editions, than any of the rest do to each other. There are, however, in this book, a great number of corrections and alterations, and several considerable additions. He has introduced a tribute of respect and affection to his friend Mr. Dyson. He has referred the Pleasures of Imagination to two sources only, greatness and beauty, and not to three, as he had formerly done. His delineation of beautiful objects is much enlarged; and, upon the whole, the first book seems to have received a considerable degree of improvement. The second book is very different from the second book of the preceding editions. The difference indeed is so great, that they cannot be compared together. He enters into a display of truth, and its three classes, matter of fact, experimental or scientific truth, and universal truth. He treats likewise of virtue as existing in the Divine mind, of human virtue, of vice and its origin, of ridicule, and of the passions. The enumeration of the different sources of ridicule is left out, and consequently the passage which had given offence to Warburton. The allegorical vision, which formerly constituted a principal part of the second book, is likewise omitted. The second book, as it now stands, is correct, severe, moral, and noble; but it appears less touching, less striking, less enchanting than it was before. The third book is an episode in which Solon, the Athenian lawgiver, is his chief character; and the design of it seems to be to show the great influence of poetry in enforcing the cause of liberty. This part is entirely new, and, if it had been finished, would have proved a beautiful addition to the poem. It is greatly to be regretted that he did not live to complete his design; yet the lovers of poetry would have been sorry to have had the original poem entirely superseded. Whatever may be its faults, there are to be found in it a certain brightness and brilliancy of imagination, and a certain degree of enthusiasm, which Akenfide did not seem to have possessed in equal vigour in the latter part of his life. Years, and an application to scientific studies, appear, in some measure, to have turned his mind from sound to things, from fancy to the understanding. If he had indeed imbibed the notion ascribed to him by Mason, that "poetry was only true eloquence in metre," so false an idea could not fail to have a bad effect on his later compositions. Every reader of taste would have regretted the loss of the fine description, in the third book, of the operations of the mind, in producing works of imagination, and have felt the being deprived of the beautiful passage in the allegoric vision of the second book, beginning,

'Twas an horrid pile
Of hills, with many a shaggy forest mix'd, &c.

His Odes are distributed into two books; the first containing eighteen odes, and the second fifteen. It was his intention, if he had lived, to have made each book consist of twenty. Those which he had formerly published are greatly altered and improved. His odes are not equal to the sublime and beautiful productions of Gray and Collins, nor perhaps to those of Mason and Warton: But still there is in them a noble vein of poetry, united with manly sense, and applied to excellent purposes. This praise cannot be extended to the whole of the odes, without exception. Akenfide does not always preserve the dignity of the lyric muse. He is defective in the pathetic, even upon a subject which peculiarly required it, and where it might have been expected, the death of his mistress, in the Ode to the Evening Star. His Hymn, however, to Cheerfulness, his Odes, on Leaving Holland, on Lyric Poetry, to the Earl of Huntingdon, and on Recovering from a Fit of Sickness, justly entitle him to a place among the principal lyric writers of his country. Love, an Elegy, a British Philippic, and Hymn to Science, composed when he was very young, and omitted in the publication of his works by Mr. Dyson, reflect no discredit on his memory. The first was originally printed with the Ode on the Winter Solstice, and given to his friends. The two last were printed in the "Gentleman's Magazine," Vol. VIII. In the seventh volume of that work, a poem, called The Virtuoso, in imitation of Spenser's style, dated from Newcastle, and signed Marcus, and two other pieces, may justly be reckoned among his youthful compositions. His Inscriptions are, for the most part, simple, energetic, and sufficiently poetical. His Hymn to the Naiads is justly esteemed a classical performance. Lloyd, speaking of Homer's hymns, which he had some thoughts of translating, says: "They who would form the justest idea of this sort of composition among the ancients, may be better informed by perusing Dr. Akenfide's most classical Hymn to the Naiads, than from any translation of Homer or Callimachus." The same writer concludes his "Ode to Genius," with the following apostrophe to Akenfide:

And thou, blest bard! around whose sacred brow
Great Pindar's delegated wreath is hung;
Arise, and snatch the majesty of song
From dulness' servile tribe, and art's unhallow'd throng.

Cooper, the "English Aristippus," with great propriety, addressed his "Call of Aristippus" to Akenfide, by the designation of "two-fold disciple of Apollo;" in which he tells him, that, in Elysium, Plato and Virgil shall weave him a never-fading crown; while Lucretius, Pindar, and Horace, should yield him precedence with pleasure.

Mr. Murphy, in his "Poetical Epistle to Dr. Johnson," has joined Akenfide with Gray among the examples which he enumerates of "wealthy genius pining amidst its store."

Even Gray unwilling strikes his living lyre,
And wishes, not content, for Pindar's fire:
And that sweet bard, who to our fancy brings,
"The gayest, happiest attitudes of things."
His raptur'd verse can throw neglected by,
And to Lucretius lift a reverend eye.

Dr. Warton, in his excellent "Essay on Pope," calls Akenfide a didactic poet, who has happily indulged himself in bolder flights of enthusiasm, supported by a more figurative style than was used by Pope; and, after producing a passage from the Pleasures of Imagination, adds: "We have here a striking example of that poetic spirit, that harmonious and varied versification, and that strength of imagery which conspire to excite our admiration of this beautiful poem."

The character of Akenfide, as given by Dr. Johnson, is less favourable to his pretensions as a didactic poet; and, as a writer of odes, is so unjust and degrading, that it cannot be generally allowed, without many exceptions.

"His great work is the Pleasures of Imagination, a performance which, published as it was at the age of twenty-three, raised expectations that were not very amply satisfied. It has undoubtedly a just claim to very particular notice, as an example of great felicity of genius, and uncommon amplitude of acquisitions, of a young mind stored with images, and much exercised in combining and comparing them. The subject is well chosen, as it includes all images that can strike or please, and thus comprises every species of poetical delight. The only difficulty is the choice of examples and illustrations; and it is not easy, in such exuberance of matter, to find the middle point between penury and satiety. The parts seem artfully disposed, with sufficient coherence, so as that they cannot change their places without injury to the general design.

"His images are displayed with such luxuriance of expression, that they are hidden, like Butler's moon, "by a veil of light;" they are forms fantastically lost under superfluity of dress. Pars minima est ipsa puella sui. The words are multiplied till the sense is hardly perceived; attention deserts the mind and settles in the ear. The reader wanders through the gay diffusion, sometimes amazed, and sometimes delighted; but, after many turnings in the flowery labyrinth, comes out as he went in. He remarked little, and laid hold on nothing.

"To his versification, justice requires that praise should not be denied. In the general formation of his lines, he is perhaps superior to any other writer of blank verse: His flow is smooth, and his pauses are musical; but the concatenation of his verses is commonly too long continued, and the full close does not recur with sufficient frequency. The verse is carried on through a long intertexture of complicated clauses; and as nothing is distinguished, nothing is remembered.

"The exemption which blank verse affords from the necessity of closing the sense with the couplet, betrays luxuriant and active minds into such self-indulgence, that they pile image upon image, ornament upon ornament, and are not easily persuaded to close the sense at all. Blank verse will therefore, I fear, be too often found in description exuberant, in argument loquacious, and in narration tiresome.

"His diction is certainly poetical, as it is not prosaic, and elegant, as it is not vulgar. He is to be commended as having fewer artifices of disgust than most of his brethren of the blank song. He rarely either recalls old phrases, or twists his metre into harsh inversions. The sense, however, of his words is strained, when "he views the Ganges from Alpine heights," that is, from mountains like the Alps. And the pedant surely intrudes (but when was blank verse without pedantry?) when he tells us how: "planets absolve the stated round of time."

"It is generally known to the readers of poetry, that he intended to revise and augment this work, but died before he had completed his design. The reformed work, as he left it, and the additions which he had made, are very properly retained in the present collection. He seems to have somewhat contracted his diffusion; but I know not whether he has gained in closeness what he has lost in splendour. In the additional book, his Tale of Solon is too long.

"It is not easy to guess why he addicted himself so diligently to lyric poetry, having neither the ease and airiness of the lighter, nor the vehemence and elevation of the grander ode. When he lays his ill-fated hand upon his harp, his former powers seem to desert him; he has no longer his luxuriance of expression, nor variety of images. His thoughts are cold, and his words inelegant. Yet such was his love of lyrics, that having once written with great vigour and poignancy his Epistle to Curio, he transformed it afterwards into an ode, disgraceful only to its author.

"Of his Odes nothing favourable can be said; the sentiments commonly want force, nature, or novelty; the diction is sometimes harsh and uncouth; the stanzas ill-constructed, and unpleasant, and the rhymes dissonant or unskillfully disposed, too distant from each other, or arranged with too little regard to established use, and therefore unpleasing to the ear, which, in a short composition, has not time to grow familiar with an innovation.

"To examine such compositions singly cannot be required: They have doubtless brighter and darker parts; but when they are once found to be generally dull, all further trouble may be spared; for to what use can the work be criticised that will not be read?"

THE PLEASURES OF IMAGINATION.

A POEM, IN THREE BOOKS.

ADVERTISEMENT TO THE FIRST EDITION.

THIS volume contains a complete collection of the poems of the late Dr. Akenſide, either reprinted from the original editions, or faithfully published from copies which had been prepared by himſelf for publication.

That the principal poem ſhould appear in ſo diſadvantageous a ſtate, may require ſome explanation. The firſt publication of it was at a very early part of the author's life. That it wanted reviſion and correction, he was ſufficiently ſenſible; but ſo quick was the demand for ſeveral ſucceſſive republications, that in any of the intervals, to have completed the whole of his corrections was utterly impoſſible; and yet to have gone on from time to time making farther improvements in every new edition would (he thought) have had the appearance at leaſt of abuſing the favour of the public. He choſe therefore, to continue for ſome time reprinting it without alteration, and to forbear publiſhing any corrections or improvements until he ſhould be able at once to give them to the public complete. And with this view he went on for ſeveral years to review and correct the poem at his leiſure; till at length he found the taſk grow ſo much upon his hands, that, deſpairing of ever being able to execute it ſufficiently to his own ſatisfaction, he abandoned the purpoſe of correcting, and reſolved to write the poem over a new upon a ſomewhat different and an enlarged plan. And in the execution of this deſign he had made a conſiderable progreſs. What reaſon there may be to regret that he did not live to execute the whole of it, will beſt appear from the peruſal of the plan itſelf, as ſtated in the general Argument, and of the parts which he had executed, and which are here publiſhed. For the perſon *, to whom he intruſted the diſpoſal of his papers, would have thought himſelf wanting as well to the ſervice of the public, as to the fame of his friend, if he had not produced as much of the work as appeared to have been prepared for publication. In this light he conſidered the entire firſt and ſecond books, of which a few copies had been printed for the uſe only of the author and certain friends: alſo a very conſiderable part of the third book, which had been tranſcribed in order to its being printed in the ſame manner: and to theſe is added the Introduction to a ſubſequent book, which in the manuſcript is called the fourth, and which appears to have been compoſed at the time when the author intended to compriſe the whole in four books; but which, as he had afterwards determined to diſtribute the poem into more books, might perhaps more properly be called the laſt book. And this is all that is executed of the new work, which, although it appeared to the editor too valuable, even in its imperfect ſtate, to be withholden from the public, yet (he conceives) takes in by much too ſmall a part of the original poem to ſupply its place, and to ſuperſede the re-publication of it. For which reaſon, both the poems are inſerted in this collection.

Of Odes, the author had deſigned to make up two books, conſiſting of twenty odes each, including the ſeveral odes which he had before publiſhed at different times.

The Hymn to the Naiads is reprinted from the ſixth volume of Dodſley's Miſcellanies, with a few corrections and the addition of ſome notes. To the Inscriptions taken from the same volume, three new inscriptions are added; the last of which, is the only instance wherein liberty has been taken of inserting any thing in this collection, which did not appear to have been intended by the author for publication*; among whose papers no copy of this was found, but it is printed from a copy which he had many years since given to the editor.

The author of these poems was born at Newcastle-upon-Tyne, on the 9th day of November 1721. He was educated at the Grammar School at Newcastle and at the Universities of Edinburgh and Leyden, at the latter of which, he took his degree of Doctor in Physic. He was afterwards admitted by Mandamus, to the degree of Doctor in Physic, in the University of Cambridge; elected a fellow of the Royal College of physicians, and one of the physicians of St. Thomas's hospital; and, upon the establishment of the Queen's household, appointed one of the physicians to her Majesty. He died of a putrid fever, on the 23d day of June 1770, and is buried in the parish church of St. James's Westminster.

THE DESIGN.

THERE are certain powers in human nature, which seem to hold a middle place between the organs of bodily sense and the faculties of moral perception: They have been called by a very general name, The Powers of Imagination. Like the external senses, they relate to matter and motion; and at the same time, give the mind ideas analogous to those of moral approbation and dislike. As they are the inlets of some of the most exquisite pleasures with which we are acquainted, it has naturally happened that men of warm and sensible tempers have sought means to recall the delightful preceptions which they afford, independent of the object which originally produced them. This gave rise to the imitative or designing arts; some of which, as painting and sculpture, directly copy the external appearances which were admired in nature; others, as music and poetry, bring them back to remembrance by signs universally established and understood.

But these arts, as they grew more correct and deliberate, were of course led to extend their imitation beyond the peculiar objects of the imaginative powers: especially poetry, which, making use of language as the instrument by which it imitates, it consequently becomes an unlimited representative of every species and mode of being. Yet, as their intention was only to express the objects of imagination, and as they still abound chiefly in ideas of that class, they of course retain their original character; and all the different pleasures which they excite, are termed, in general, Pleasures of Imagination.

The design of the following poem is to give a view of these in the largest acceptation of the term; so that whatever our imagination feels from the agreeable appearances of nature, and all the various entertainment we meet with, either in poetry, painting, music, or any of the elegant arts, might be deducible from one or other of those principles in the constitution of the human mind, which are here established and explained.

In executing this general plan, it was necessary, first of all, to distinguish the imagination from our other faculties; and, in the next place, to characterize those original forms or properties of being, about which it is conversant, and which are by nature adapted to it as light is to the eyes, or truth to the understanding. These properties Mr. Addison had reduced to the three general classes of greatness, novelty, and beauty; and into these we may analyse every object, however complex, which, properly speaking, is delightful to the imagination. But such an object may also include many other sources of pleasure; and its beauty, or novelty, or grandeur, will make a stronger impression by reason of this concurrence. Besides which, the imitative arts, especially poetry, owe much of their effect to a similar exhibition of properties quite foreign to the imagination, inasmuch that in every line of the most applauded poems, we meet with either ideas drawn from the external senses, or truths discovered to the understanding, or illustrations of contrivance and final causes, or, above all the rest, with circumstances proper to awaken and engage the passions. It was therefore necessary to enumerate and exemplify these different species of pleasure; especially that from the passions, which, as it is supreme in the noblest work of human genius, so being in some particulars not a little surprising, gave an opportunity to enliven the didactic turn of the poem, by introducing an allegory to account for the appearance.

After these parts of the subject which hold chiefly of admiration, or naturally warm and interest the mind, a pleasure of a very different nature, that which arises from ridicule, came next to be considered. As this is the foundation of the comic manner in all the arts, and has been but very imperfectly treated by moral writers, it was thought proper to give it a particular illustration, and to distinguish the general sources from which the ridicule of characters is derived. Here too a change of style became necessary; such a one as might yet be consistent, if possible, with the general taste of composition in the serious parts of the subject: nor is it an easy task to give any tolerable force to images of this kind, without running either into the gigantic expressions of the mock heroic, or the familiar and poetical raillery of professed satire; neither of which would have been proper here.

The materials of all imitation being thus laid open, nothing now remained but to illustrate some particular pleasures, which arise either from the relations of different objects one to another, or from the nature of imitation itself. Of the first, is that various and complicated resemblance existing between several parts of the material and immaterial worlds, which is the foundation of metaphor and wit. As it seems in a great measure to depend on the early association of our ideas, and as this habit of associating is the source of many pleasures and pains in life, and on that account bears a great share in the influence of poetry and the other arts, it is therefore mentioned here, and its effects described. Then follows a general account of the production of these elegant arts, and of the secondary pleasure, as it is called, arising from the resemblance of their imitations to the original appearances of nature. After which, the work concludes with some reflections on the general conduct of the powers of imagination, and on their natural and moral usefulness in life.

Concerning the manner or turn of composition which prevails in this piece, little can be said with propriety by the author. He had two models; that ancient and simple one of the first Grecian poets, as it is refined by Virgil in the Georgics, and the familiar epistolary way of Horace. This latter has several advantages. It admits of a greater variety of style; it more readily engages the generality of readers, as partaking more of the air of conversation; and, especially with the assistance of rhyme, leads to a closer and more concise expression. Add to this, the example of the most perfect of modern poets, who has so happily applied this manner to the noblest parts of philosophy, that the public taste is in a great measure formed to it alone. Yet, after all, the subject before us, tending almost constantly to admiration and enthusiasm, seemed rather to demand a more open, pathetic, and figured style. This too appeared more natural, as the author's aim was not so much to give formal precepts, or enter into the way of direct argumentation, as, by exhibiting the most engaging prospects of nature, to enlarge and harmonize the imagination, and by that means insensibly dispose the minds of men to a similar taste and habit of thinking in religion, morals, and civil life. It is on this account that he is so careful to point out the benevolent intention of the Author of Nature in every principle of the human constitution here insisted on; and also to unite the moral excellencies of life in the same point of view with the mere external objects of good taste; thus recommending them in common to our natural propensity for admiring what is beautiful and lovely. The same views have also led him to introduce some sentiments which may perhaps be looked upon as not quite direct to the subject; but, since they bear an obvious relation to it, the authority of Virgil, the faultless model of didactic poetry, will best support him in this particular. For the sentiments themselves, he makes no apology.

B O O K I.

ARGUMENT.

THE subject proposed. Difficulty of treating it poetically. The ideas of the Divine Mind, the origin of every quality pleasing to the imagination. The natural variety of constitution to the minds of men; with its final cause. The idea of a fine imagination, and the state of the mind in the enjoyment of those pleasures which it affords. All the primary pleasures of the imagination result from the perception of greatness, or wonderfulness, or beauty in objects. The pleasure from greatness, with its final cause. Pleasure from novelty or wonderfulness, with its final cause. Pleasure from beauty, with its final cause. The connection of beauty with truth and good, applied to the conduct of life. Invitation to the study of moral philosophy. The different degrees of beauty in different species of objects: colour; shape; natural concretes; vegetables; animals; the mind. The sublime, the fair, the wonderful of the mind. The connection of the imagination and the moral faculty. Conclusion.

WITH what attractive charms this goodly frame
Of nature touching the consenting hearts
Of mortal men; and what the pleasing stores
Which beauteous imitation thence derives
To deck the poet's, or the painter's toil;
My verse unfolds. Attend, ye gentle powers
Of musical delight! and while I sing
Your gifts, your honours, dance around my strain.
Thou, smiling queen of every tuneful breast,
Indulgent Fancy! from the fruitful banks 10
Of Avon, whence thy rosy fingers cull
Fresh flowers and dew to sprinkle on the turf
Where Shakspeare lies, be present: and with Let Fiction come, upon her vagrant wings [thee
Wafting ten thousand colours through the air,
Which, by the glances of her magic eye, [forms,
She blends and shifts at will, through countless
Her wild creation, Goddess of the lyre,

Which rules the accents of the moving sphere,
Wilt thou, eternal harmony! descend 20
And join this festive strain? for with thee comes
The guide, the guardian of their lovely sports,
Majestic Truth; and where Truth deigns to come
Her sister Liberty will not be far.
Be present all ye genii, who conduct
The wandering footsteps of the youthful bard,
New to your springs and shades: who touch his
With finer sounds: who heighten to his eye [ear
The bloom of nature, and before him turn
The gayest, happiest attitude of things. 30
Oft have the laws of each poetic strain
The critic-verse employ'd; yet still unsung
Lay this prime subject, though importing most
A poet's name: for fruitless is the attempt,
By dull obedience and by creeping toil
Obscure to conquer the severe ascent

Of high Parnassus. Nature's kindling breath
Must fire the chosen genius; nature's hand
Must string his nerves, and imp his eagle-wings.
Impatient of the painful steep, to soar 40
High as the summit; there to breathe at large
Æthereal air; with bards and sages old,
Immortal sons of praise. These flattering scenes,
To this neglected labour court my song;
Yet not unconscious what a doubtful task
To paint the finest features of the mind,
And to most subtle and mysterious things
Give colour, strength, and motion. But the love
Of nature and the muses bids explore,
Through secret paths erewhile untrod by man, 50
The fair poetic region to detect,
Untasted springs, to drink inspiring draughts,
And shade my temples with unfading flowers
Cull'd from the laureate vale's profound recess,
Where never poet gain'd a wreath before.

From heaven my strains begin; from heaven descends

The flame of genius to the human breast,
And love and beauty, and poetic joy
And inspiration. Ere the radiant sun 59
Sprang from the east, or 'mid the vault of night
The moon suspended her serener lamp; [globe,
Ere mountains, woods, or streams, adorn'd the
Or wisdom taught the sons of men her lore;
Then liv'd the almighty One: then, deep retir'd
In his unfathom'd essence, view'd the forms,
The forms eternal of created things;
The radiant sun, the moon's nocturnal lamp,
The mountains, woods, and streams, the rolling
globe,

And wisdom's mien celestial. From the first
Of days, on them his love divine he fix'd, 70
His admiration; till in time complete,
What he admir'd and lov'd, his vital smile
Unfolded into being. Hence the breath
Of life informing each organic frame,
Hence the green earth, and wild resounding waves; [cold;
Hence light and shade alternate; warmth and
And clear autumnal skies and vernal showers,
And all the fair variety of things.

But not alike to every mortal eye
Is this great scene unveil'd. For since the claims
Of social life, to different labours urge 81
The active powers of man: with wise intent
The hand of nature on peculiar minds
Imprints a different bias, and to each
Decrees its province in the common toil.
To some she taught the fabric of the sphere,
The changeful moon, the circuit of the stars,
The golden zones of heaven; to some she gave
To weigh the moment of eternal things,
Of time, and space, and fate's unbroken chain, 90
And will's quick impulse: others by the hand
She led o'er vales and mountains, to explore
What healing virtue swells the tender veins
Of herbs and flowers; or what the beams of morn
Draw forth, distilling from the clefted rind
In balmy tears. But some, to higher hopes
Were destin'd; some within a finer mould
She wrought, and temper'd with a purer flame.
To this the Sire Omnipotent unfolds
The world's harmonious volume, there to read

The transcript of himself. On every part 107
They trace the bright impressions of his hand:
In earth or air, the meadow's purple stores,
The moon's mild radiance, or the virgin's form
Blooming with rosy smiles, they see portray'd
That uncreated beauty, which delights
The mind supreme. They also feel her charms,
Enamour'd; they partake the eternal joy.

For as old Memnon's image long renown'd
By fabling Nilus, to the quivering touch 110
Of Titan's ray, with each repulsive string
Consenting, sounded through the warbling air
Unbidden strains; even so did nature's hand
To certain species of external things,
Attune the finer organs of the mind:
So the glad impulse of congenial powers,
Or of sweet sounds, or fair proportion'd form,
The grace of motion, or the bloom of light,
Thrills through imagination's tender frame,
From nerve to nerve: all naked and alive 120
They catch the spreading rays; till now the soul
At length discloses every tuneful spring,
To that harmonious movement from without Responsive. Then the expressive strain
Diffuses its enchantment: fancy dreams
Of sacred fountains and Elysian groves,
And vales of bliss: the intellectual power
Bends from his awful throne a wondering ear,
And smiles: the passions, gently sooth'd away,
Sink to divine repose, and love and joy 130

Alone are waking; love and joy, serene
As airs that fan the summer. O! attend,
Whoe'er thou art, whom these delights can touch,
Whose candid bosom the refining love
Of nature warms, O! listen to my song;
And I will guide thee to her favourite walks,
And teach thy solitude her voice to hear,
And point her loveliest features to thy view.

Know then, whate'er of nature's pregnant
Whate'er of mimic art's reflected forms [stores,
With love and admiration thus inflame 141
The powers of fancy, her delighted sons
To three illustrious orders have refer'd;
Three sister-graces, whom the painter's hand,
The poet's tongue, confesses; the sublime,
The wonderful, the fair. I see them drawn!
I see the radiant visions, where they rise,
More lovely than when Lucifer displays
His beaming forehead through the gates of morn,
To lead the train of Phœbus and the spring. 150

Say, why was man so eminently rais'd
Amid the vast creation; why ordain'd
Through life and death to dart his piercing eye,
With thoughts beyond the limit of his frame;
But that the omnipotent might send him forth
In sight of mortal and immortal powers,
As on a boundless theatre, to run
The great career of justice; to exalt
His generous aim to all diviner deeds; 159
To chase each partial purpose from his breast:
And through the mists of passion and of sense,
And through the tossing tide of chance and pain,
To hold his course unflinching, while the voice
Of truth and virtue, up the steep ascent
Of nature, calls him to his high reward.
The applauding smile of heaven? Else wherefore
In mortal bosoms this unquenched hope, [burns

That breathes from day to day sublimer things,
And mocks possession? wherefore darts the mind,
With such restless ardour to embrace 170
Majestic forms; impatient to be free,
Spurning the gross control of wilful might;
Proud of the strong contention of her toils;
Proud to be daring? Who but rather turns
To heaven's broad fire his unconstrained view
Than to the glimmering of a waxen flame?
Who that, from Alpine heights, his labouring eye
Shoots round the wide horizon, to survey
Nilus or Ganges rolling his bright wave
Through mountains, plains, through empires black with shade 180

And continents of sand; will turn his gaze
To mark the windings of a scanty rill
That murmurs at his feet? The high-born soul
Disdains to rest her heaven-aspiring wing
Beneath its native quarry. Tir'd of earth
And this diurnal scene, she springs aloft
Through fields of air; pursues the flying storm;
Rides on the vollied lightning through the heavens;

Or, yok'd with whirlwinds and the northern blast, Sweeps the long tract of day. Then high she soars 190

The blue profound, and hovering round the sun
Beholds him pouring the redundant stream
Of light; beholds his unrelenting sway
Bend the reluctant planets to absolve
The fated rounds of time. Thence far effus'd
She darts her swiftness up the long career
Of devious comets; through its burning signs
Exulting measures the perennial wheel
Of nature, and looks back on all the stars,
Whose blended light, as with a milky zone, 200
Invest the orient. Now amaz'd she views
The empyreal waste, where happy spirits hold,
Beyond this concave heaven, their calm abode;
And fields of radiance, whose unfading light
Has travel'd the profound six thousand years,
Nor yet arrives in sight of mortal things,
Even on the barriers of the world untir'd
She meditates the eternal depth below;
Till half recoiling, down the headlong steep
She plunges; soon o'erwhelm'd and swallow'd up
In that immense of being. There her hopes 211
Rest at the fated goal. For from the birth
Of mortal man, the sovereign Maker said,
That not in humble nor in brief delight,
Not in the fading echoes of renown,
Power's purple robes, nor pleasure's flowery lap,
The soul should find enjoyment: but from these
Turning disdainful to an equal good,
Through all the ascent of things enlarge her view,
Till every bound at length should disappear, 220
And infinite perfection close the scene.

Call now to mind what high capacious powers
Lie folded up in man; how far beyond
The praise of mortals, may the eternal growth
Of nature to perfection half divine,
Expand the blooming soul? What pity then
Should sloth's unkindly fogs depress to earth,
Her tender blossom; choke the streams of life,
And blast her spring! Far otherwise design'd
Almighty wisdom; nature's happy cares 230
The obedient heart far otherwise incline.

VOL. IX.

Witness the sprightly joy when aught unknown
Strikes the quick sense, and wakes each active
To brisker measures: witness the neglect [power
Of all familiar prospects, though beheld
With transport once; the fond attentive gaze
Of young astonishment; the sober zeal
Of age, commenting on prodigious things,
For such the bounteous providence of heaven,
In every breast implanting this desire 240
Of objects new and strange, to urge us on
With unremitted labour to pursue
Those sacred stores that wait the ripening soul,
In truth's exhaustless bosom. What need words
To paint its power? For this the daring youth
Breaks from his weeping mother's anxious arms,
In foreign climes to rove: the pensive sage,
Heedless of sleep, or midnight's harmful damp
Hangs o'er the sickly taper; and untir'd
The virgin follows, with enchanted step, 250
The mazes of some wild and wondrous tale,
From morn till eve; unmindful of her form,
Unmindful of the happy dress that stole
The wishes of the youth, when every maid
With envy pin'd. Hence, finally, by night
The village-matron, round the blazing hearth,
Suspends the infant-audience with her tales,
Breathing astonishment! of witching rhymes,
And evil spirits; of the death-bed call
Of him who robb'd the widow, and devour'd 260
The orphan's portion, of unquiet souls
Risen from the grave to ease the heavy guilt
Of deeds in life conceal'd; of shapes that walk
At dead of night, and clank their chains, and wave
The torch of hell around the murderer's bed.
At every solemn pause the crowd recoil
Gazing each other speechless, and congeal'd
With shivering sighs: till eager for the event,
Around the beldame all erect they hang,
Each trembling heart with grateful terrors quell'd.

But lo! disclos'd in all her smiling pomp, 271
Where beauty onward moving claims the verse
Her charms inspire: the freely-flowing verse
In thy immortal praise, O form divine, [thee
Smooths her mellifluous stream. Thee, Beauty,
The regal dome, and thy enlivening ray
The mossy roofs adore: thou, better sun!
For ever beamest on the enchanted heart
Love, and harmonious wonder, and delight
Poetic. Brightest progeny of heaven! 280
How shall I trace thy features? where select
The roseate hues to emulate thy bloom?
Haste then, my song, thro' nature's wide expanse,
Haste then, and gather all her comeliest wealth,
Whate'er bright spoils the florid earth contains,
Whate'er the waters, or the liquid air,
To deck thy lovely labour. Wilt thou fly
With laughing autumn to the Atlantic isles,
And range with him the Hesperian field, and see
Where'er his fingers touch the fruitful grove, 290
The branches shoot with gold; where'er his step
Marks the glad soil, the tender clusters grow
With purple ripeness, and invest each hill
As with the blushes of an evening sky?
Or wilt thou rather troop thy vagrant plume,
Where gliding through his daughter's honour'd shades,

The smooth Peneus from his glassy flood

Reflects purpureal Tempe's pleasant scene?
 Fair Tempe! haunt belov'd of sylvan powers,
 Of nymphs and fauns; where in the golden age
 They play'd in secret on the shady brink 301
 With ancient Pan: while round their choral steps
 Young hours and genial gales with constant hand
 Shower'd blossoms, odours, shower'd ambrosial dews,
 And spring's Elysian bloom. Her flowery store
 To thee nor Tempe shall refuse; nor watch
 Of winged Hydra guard Hesperian fruits
 From thy free spoil. O bear then, unprov'd,
 Thy smiling treasures to the green recess
 Where young Dione stays. With sweetest airs
 Entice her forth to lend her angel-form 311
 For beauty's honour'd image. Hither turn
 Thy graceful footsteps; hither, gentle maid,
 Incline thy polish'd forehead: let thy eyes
 Effuse the mildness of their azure dawn;
 And may the fanning breezes waft aside
 Thy radiant locks: disclosing, as it bends
 With airy softness from the marble neck,
 The cheek fair-blooming, and the rosy lip,
 Where winning smiles and pleasures sweet as love,
 With sanctity and wisdom, tempering blend 321
 Their soft allurements: Then the pleasing force
 Of nature, and her kind parental care
 Worthier I'd sing: then all the enamour'd youth,
 With each admiring virgin, to my lyre
 Should throng attentive, while I point on high
 Where beauty's living image, like the morn
 That wakes in Zephyr's arms the blushing May,
 Moves onward; or as Venus, when she stood
 Effulgent on the pearly car and smil'd, 330
 Fresh from the deep, and conscious of her form,
 To see the Triton's tune their vocal shells,
 And each cerulean sister of the flood
 With loud acclaim attend her o'er the waves,
 To seek the Idalian bower. Ye smiling band
 Of youths and virgins, who through all the maze
 Of young desire with rival-steps pursue
 This charm of beauty; if the pleasing toil
 Can yield a moment's respite, hither turn
 Your favourable ear, and trust my words. 340
 I do not mean to wake the gloomy form
 Of superstition dress'd in wisdom's garb,
 To damp your tender hopes; I do not mean
 To bid the jealous thunderer fire the heavens,
 Or shapes infernal rend the groaning earth
 To fright you from your joys: my cheerful song
 With better omens calls you to the field,
 Pleas'd with your generous ardour in the chase,
 And warm like you. Then tell me, for ye know,
 Does beauty ever deign to dwell where health 350
 And active use are strangers! Is her charm
 Confess'd in aught, whose most peculiar ends
 Are lame and fruitless? Or did nature mean
 This pleasing call the herald of a lie;
 To hide the shame of discord and disease,
 And catch with fair hypocrisy the heart
 Of idle faith? O no! with better cares
 The indulgent mother, conscious how infirm
 Her offspring tread the paths of good and ill,
 By this illustrious image, in each kind 360
 Still most illustrious where the object holds
 Its native powers most perfect, she by this
 Illumes the headstrong impulse of desire,
 And sanctifies his choice. The generous glebe

Whose bosom smiles with verdure, the clear tract
 Of streams delicious to the thirsty soul,
 The bloom of nectar'd fruitage ripe to sense,
 And every charm of animated things,
 Are only pledges of a state sincere,
 The integrity and order of their frame, 370
 When all is well within, and every end
 Accomplish'd. Thus was beauty sent from heaven,
 The lovely ministrers of truth and good
 In this dark world: for truth and good are one,
 And beauty dwells in them, and they in her,
 With like participation. Wherefore then,
 O sons of earth! would ye dissolve the tie?
 O wherefore, with a rash impetuous aim,
 Seek ye those flowery joys with which the hand
 Of lavish fancy paints each flattering scene 380
 Where beauty seems to dwell, nor once inquire
 Where is the sanction of eternal truth,
 Or where the seal of undecitful good,
 To save your search from folly! Wanting these,
 Lo! beauty withers in your void embrace,
 And with the glittering of an idiot's toy
 Did fancy mock your vows. Nor let the gleam
 Of youthful hope that shines upon your hearts,
 Be chill'd or clouded at this awful task,
 To learn the lore of undecitful good, 390
 And truth eternal. Though the poisonous charms
 Of baleful superstition guide the feet
 Of servile numbers, through a dreary way
 To their abode, through deserts, thorns, and mire;
 And leave the wretched pilgrim all forlorn
 To muse at last, amid the ghostly gloom
 Of graves, and hoary vaults, and cloister'd cells;
 To walk with spectres through the midnight shade,
 And to the screaming owl's accursed song
 Attune the dreadful workings of his heart; 400
 Yet be not ye dismay'd. A gentler star
 Your lovely search illumines. From the grove
 Where wisdom talk'd with her Athenian sons,
 Could my ambitious hand entwine a wreath
 Of Plato's olive with the Mantuan bay,
 Then should my powerful verse at once dispell
 Those monkish horrors: then in light divine
 Disclose the Elysian prospect, where the steps
 Of those whom nature charms, through blooming walks,
 Through fragrant mountains and poetic streams,
 Amid the train of sages, heroes, bards, 410
 Led by their winged genius and the choir
 Of laurel'd science, and harmonious art,
 Proceed exulting to the eternal shrine,
 Where truth conspicuous with her sister-twins,
 The undivided partners of her sway,
 With good and beauty reign. O let not us,
 Lull'd by luxurious pleasures languid strain,
 Or crouching to the frowns of bigot-rage,
 O let us not a moment pause to join 420
 That godlike band. And if the gracious power
 Who first awaken'd my untutor'd song,
 Will to my invocation breathe anew
 The tuneful spirit; then through all our paths,
 Ne'er shall the sound of this devoted lyre
 Be wanting, whether on the rosy mead,
 When summer smiles, to warn the melting heart
 Of luxury's allurements; whether firm
 Against the torrent and the stubborn hill
 To urge bold virtue's unremitted nerve, 430
 And wake the strong divinity of soul

That conquers chance and fate; or whether struck

For sounds of triumph, to proclaim her toils
Upon the lofty summit, round her brow
To twine the wreath of incorruptive praise;
To trace her hallow'd light through future worlds,
And bless heaven's image in the heart of man.

Thus with a faithful aim have we presum'd,
Adventurous, to delineate nature's form;
Whether in vast, majestic pomp array'd, 440
Or dress'd for pleasing wonder, or serene
In beauty's rosy smile. It now remains,
Through various being's fair-proportion'd scale,
To trace the rising lustre of her charms,
From their first twilight, shining forth at length
To full meridian splendour. Of degree
The least and lowliest, in the effusive warmth
Of colours mingling with a random blaze,
Doth beauty dwell. Then higher in the line
And variation of determin'd shape, 450

Where truth's eternal measures mark the bound
Of circle, cube, or sphere. The third ascent
Unites this varied symmetry of parts
With colour's bland allurement; as the pearl
Shines in the concave of its azure bed,
And painted shells indent their speckled wreath.
Then more attractive rise the blooming forms
Through which the breath of nature has infus'd,
Her genial power to draw with pregnant veins
Nutritious moisture from the bounteous earth, 460
In fruit and seed prolific: thus the flowers
Their purple honours with the spring resume;
And such the stately tree with autumn bends
With blushing treasures. But more lovely still
Is nature's charm, where to the full consent
Of complicated members to the bloom
Of colour, and the vital change of growth,
Life's holy flame and piercing sense are given,
And active motion speaks the temper'd soul:

So moves the bird of Juno; so the steed 470
With rival ardour beats the dusty plain,
And faithful dogs with eager airs of joy
Salute their fellows. Thus doth beauty dwell
There most conspicuous, even in outward shape,
Where dawns the high expression of a mind:
By steps conducting our enraptur'd search
To that eternal origin, whose power,
Through all the unbounded symmetry of things,
Like rays effulging from the parent sun,
This endless mixture of her charms diffus'd. 480
Mind, mind alone, (bear witness earth and heaven!)

The living fountains in itself contains
Of beauteous and sublime: here hand in hand,
Sit paramount the graces; here enthron'd,
Celestial Venus, with divinest airs,
Invites the soul to never-fading joy.
Look then abroad through nature, to the range
Of planets, suns, and adamantine spheres
Wheeling unshaken through the void immense;
And speak, O man! does this capacious scene 490
With half that kindling majesty dilate
Thy strong conception, as when Brutus rose
Refulgent from the stroke of Cæsar's fate,
Amid the crowd of patriots; and his arm
Aloft extending, like eternal Jove
When guilt brings down the thunder, call'd aloud
On Tully's name, and shook his crimson steel,

And bade the father of his country hail!
For lo! the tyrant prostrate on the dust,
And Rome again is free! Is aught so fair 500
In all the dewy landscapes of the spring,
In the bright eye of Hesper or the morn,
In nature's fairest forms, is aught so fair
As virtuous friendship? as the candid blush
Of him who strives with fortune to be just?
The graceful tear that streams for others woes?
Or the mild majesty of private life,
Where peace with ever-blooming olive crowns
The gate; where honour's liberal hands effuse
Unenvied treasures, and the snowy wings 510
Of innocence and love protect the scene?
Once more search, undismay'd, the dark profound
Where nature works in secret; view the beds
Of mineral treasure, and the eternal vault
That bounds the hoary ocean; trace the forms
Of atoms moving with incessant change
Their elemental round; behold the seeds
Of being, and the energy of life
Kindling the mass with ever-active flame:
Then to the secrets of the working mind 520
Attentive turn; from dim oblivion call
Her fleet, ideal band; and bid them, go!
Break through time's barrier, and o'ertake the hour

That saw the heavens created: then declare
If aught were found in those external scenes
To move thy wonder now. For what are all
The forms which brute, unconscious matter wears,
Greatness of bulk, or symmetry of parts?
Not reaching to the heart, soon feeble grows
The superficial impulse; dull their charms, 530
And satiate soon, and pall the languid eye.
Not so the moral species, nor the powers
Of genius and design; the ambitious mind
There sees herself: by these congenial forms
Touch'd and awaken'd, with intenser act
She bends each nerve, and meditates well pleas'd
Her features in the mirror. For of all
The inhabitants of earth, to man alone
Creative wisdom gave to lift his eye
To truth's eternal measures; thence to frame 540
The sacred laws of action and of will.
Discerning justice from unequal deeds,
And temperance from folly. But beyond
This energy of truth whose dictates bind
Assenting reason the benignant fire,
To deck the honour'd paths of just and good,
Has added bright imagination's rays:
Where virtue rising from the awful depth
Of truth's mysterious bosom, doth forsake 550
The unadorn'd condition of her birth;
And dress'd by fancy in ten thousand hues,
Assumes a various feature, to attract
With charms responsive to each gazer's eye,
The hearts of men. Amid his rural walk,
The ingenious youth, whom solitude inspires
With purest wishes, from the pensive shade
Beholds her moving, like a virgin-muse
That wakes her lyre to some indulgent theme
Of harmony and wonder: while among
The herd of servile minds her strenuous form 560
Indignant flashes on the patriot's eye,
And through the rolls of memory appeals
To ancient honour, or, in act serene,
Yet watchful raises the majestic sword

Of public power, from dark ambition's reach
 To guard the sacred volume of the laws.
 O Genius of ancient Greece! whose faithful steps
 Well-pleas'd I follow through the sacred paths
 Of nature and of science; nurse divine
 Of all heroic deeds and fair desires! 570
 O! let the breath of thy extended praise
 Inspire my kindling bosom to the height
 Of this untempted theme. Nor be my thoughts
 Presumptuous counted, if amid the calm
 That soothes this vernal evening into smiles,
 I steal impatient from the sordid haunts
 Of strife and low ambition, to attend
 Thy sacred presence in the sylvan shade,
 By their malignant footsteps ne'er profan'd.
 Descend, propitious! to my favour'd eye; 580
 Such in thy mien, thy warm, exalted air,
 As when the Persian tyrant, foil'd and stung
 With shame and desperation, gnash'd his teeth
 To see thee reëd the pageants of his throne;
 And at the lightning of thy lifted spear
 Crouch'd like a slave. Bring all thy martial spoils,
 Thy palms, thy laurels, thy triumphal songs,
 Thy smiling band of arts, thy godlike fires
 Of civil wisdom, thy heroic youth 589
 Warm from the schools of glory. Guide my way
 Trough fair Lycæum's walk, the green retreats
 Of Academus, and the thymy vale,
 Where oft enchanted with Socratic sounds,
 Ilissus pure devolv'd his tuneful stream
 In gentle murmurs. From the blooming store
 Of these auspicious fields, may I unblam'd
 Transplant some living blossoms to adorn
 My native clime: while far above the flight
 Of fancy's plume aspiring, I unlock
 The springs of ancient wisdom! while I join 600
 Thy name, thrice honour'd! with the immortal
 Of nature, while to my compatriot youth [praise
 I point the high example of thy sons,
 And tune to Attic themes the British lyre.

BOOK II.

THE separation of the works of imagination from philosophy, the cause of their abuse among the moderns. Prospect of the re-union under the influence of public liberty. Enumeration of accidental pleasures, which increase the effect of objects delightful to the imagination. The pleasures of sense. Particular circumstances of the mind. Discovery of truth. Perception of contrivance and design. Emotion of the passion. All the natural passions partake of a pleasing sensation; with the final cause of this constitution illustrated by an allegorical vision, and exemplified in sorrow, pity, terror, and indignation.

WHEN shall the laurel and the vocal string
 Resume their honours? When shall we behold
 The tuneful tongue, the Promethean hand,
 Aspire to ancient praise? Alas! how faint,
 How flow, the dawn of beauty and of truth
 Breaks the reluctant shades of Gothic night
 Which yet involve the nations! Long they
 Beneath the furies of rapacious force; [groan'd
 Oft as the gloomy north, with iron-swarms
 Tempestuous pouring from her frozen caves, 10

Blasted the Italian shore, and swept the works
 Of liberty and wisdom down the gulf
 Of all-devouring night. As long immur'd
 In noon-tide darkness by the glimmering lamp,
 Each muse and each fair science pit'd away
 The sordid hours: while foul, barbarian hands
 Their mysteries profan'd, unstrung the lyre,
 And chain'd the soaring pinion down to earth.
 At last the muses rose, and spurn'd their bonds,
 And, wildly warbling, scatter'd, as they flew, 20
 Their blooming wreaths from fair Valclusa's
 To Arno's myrtle border and the shore [bowers
 Of soft Parthenope. But still the rage
 Of dire ambition and gigantic power,
 From public aims and from the busy walk
 Of civil commerce, drove the bolder train
 Of penetrating science to the cells,
 Where studious ease consumes the silent hour
 In shadowy searches and unfruitful care.
 Thus from their guardians torn, the tender arts 30
 Of mimic fancy and harmonious joy,
 To priestly domination and the lust
 Of lawless courts, their amiable toil
 For three inglorious ages have resign'd,
 In vain reluctant: and Torquato's tongue
 Was tun'd for slavish pæans at the throne
 Of tinsel pomp: and Raphael's magic hand
 Effus'd its fair creation to enchant
 The fond adoring herd in Latian fanes
 To blind belief; while on their prostrate necks 40
 The fable tyrant plants his heel secure.
 But now, behold! the radiant era dawns,
 When freedom's ample fabric, fixed at length
 For endless years on Albion's happy shore
 In full proportion, once more shall extend
 To all the kindred powers of social bliss
 A common mansion, a parental roof.
 There shall the virtues, there shall wisdom's train,
 Their long-lost friends rejoining, as of old,
 Embrace the smiling family of arts, 50
 The muses and the graces. Then no more
 Shall vice, distracting their delicious gifts
 To aims abhorr'd, with high distaste and scorn
 Turn from their charms the philosophic eye,
 The patriot-bosom; then no more the paths
 Of public care or intellectual toil,
 Alone by footsteps haughty and severe
 In gloomy state be trod: the harmonious muse
 And her persuasive sisters then shall plant
 Their sheltering laurels o'er the black ascent, 60
 And scatter flowers along the rugged way.
 Arm'd with the lyre, already have we dar'd
 To pierce divine philosophy's retreats,
 And teach the muse her lore; already strove
 Their long-divided honours to unite.
 While tempering this deep argument we sang
 Of truth and beauty. Now the same glad task
 Impends; now urging our ambitious toil,
 We hasten to recount the various springs
 Of adventitious pleasure, which adjoin 70
 Their grateful influence to the prime effect
 Of objects grand or beauteous, and enlarge
 The complicated joy. The sweets of sense,
 Do they not oft with kind accession flow,
 To raise harmonious fancy's native charm?
 So while we taste the fragrance of the rose,
 Glows not her blush the fairer? While we view
 Amid the noontide walk a limpid rill

Gush through the trickling herbage, to the thirst
Of summer yielding the delicious draught 80
Of cool refreshment; o'er the mossy brink
Shines not the surface clearer, and the waves
With sweeter music murmur as they flow?

Nor this alone; the various lot of life
Oft from external circumstance assumes
A moment's disposition to rejoice
In those delights which at a different hour
Would pass unheeded. Fair the face of spring,
When rural songs and odours wake the morn,
'To every eye; but how much more to his 90
Round whom the bed of sickness long diffus'd
Its melancholy gloom! how doubly fair,
When first with fresh-born vigour he inhales
The balmy breeze, and feels the blessed sun
Warm at his bosom, from the springs of life
Chasing oppressive damps and languid pain!

Or shall I mention, where celestial truth
Her awful light discloses, to bestow
A more majestic pomp on beauty's frame? 99
For man loves knowledge, and the beams of truth
More welcome touch his understanding's eye,
Than all the blandishments of sound his ear,
Than all of taste his tongue. Nor ever yet
The melting rainbow's vernal-tinctur'd hues
To me have shone so pleasing, as when first
The hand of science pointed out the path
In which the sun-beams gleaming from the west
Fall on the watery cloud, whose darksome veil
Involves the orient; and that trickling shower
Piercing through every crystalline convex 110
Of clustering dew-drops to their flight oppos'd,
Recoil at length where concave all behind
The internal surface on each glassy orb
Repells their forward passage into air;
That thence direct they seek the radiant goal
From which their course began; and, as they
In different lines the gazer's obvious eye, [strike
Assume a different lustre, through the brede
Of colours changing from the splendid rose
To the pale violet's dejected hue. 120

Or shall we touch that kind access of joy,
That springs to each fair object, while we trace
Through all its fabric, wisdom's artful aim
Disposing every part, and gaining still
By means proportion'd her benignant end?
Speak, ye, the pure delight, whose favour'd steps
The lamp of science through the jealous maze
Of nature guides, when haply you reveal
Her secret honours: whether in the sky, 129
The beauteous laws of light, the central powers
That wheel the pensile planets round the year;
Whether in wonders of the rolling deep,
Or the rich fruits of all-sustaining earth,
Or fine-adjusted springs of life and sense,
Ye scan the counsels of their author's hand.

What, when to raise the meditated scene,
The flame of passion through the struggling soul
Deep-kindled, shows across that sudden blaze
The object of its rapture, vast of size,
With fiercer colours and a night of shade? 140
What? like a storm from their capacious bed
The sounding seas o'erwhelming, when the might
Of these eruptions, working from the depth
Of man's strong apprehension, shakes his frame
Ev'n to the base; from every naked sense
Of pain or pleasure dissipating all

Opinion's feeble coverings, and the veil
Spun from the cobweb fashion of the times
To hide the feeling heart? Then nature speaks
Her genuine language, and the words of men,
Big with the very motion of their souls, 151
Declare with what accumulated force,
The impetuous nerve of passion urges on
The native weight and energy of things.

Yet more; her honours where no beauty claims
Nor shows of good the thirsty sense allure,
From passion's power alone our nature holds
Essential pleasure. Passion's fierce illapse
Rouses the mind's whole fabric; with supplies
Of daily impulse keeps the elastic powers 160
Intensely pois'd, and polishes anew
By that collision all the fine machine:
Else rust would rise, and foulness, by degrees
Encumbering, choke at last what heaven design'd
For ceaseless motion and a round of toil.

—But say, does every passion thus to man
Administer delight? That name indeed
Becomes the rosy breath of love; becomes
The radiant smiles of joy, the applauding hand
Of admiration: but the bitter shower 170
That sorrow sheds upon a brother's grave,
But the dumb palsy of nocturnal fear,
Or those consuming fires that gnaw the heart
Of panting indignation, find we there
To move delight?—Then listen while my tongue
The unalter'd will of heaven with faithful awe
Reveals; what old Harmodius, wont to teach
My early age; Harmodius, who had weigh'd
Within his learned mind whate'er the schools
Of wisdom, or thy lonely-whispering voice, 180
O faithful nature! dictate of the laws
Which govern and support this mighty frame
Of universal being. Oft the hours
From morn to eve have stolen unmark'd away,
While mute attention hung upon his lips,
As thus the sage his awful tale began.

'Twas in the windings of an ancient wood,
When spotless youth with solitude resigns
To sweet philosophy the studious day,
What time pale autumn shades the silent eve, 190
Musing I rov'd. Of good and evil much,
And much of mortal man my thought revolv'd;
When starting full on fancy's gushing eye
The mournful image of Parthenia's fate,
That hour, O long belov'd and long deplor'd!
When blooming youth, nor gentlest wisdom's arts,
Nor Hymen's honours gather'd for thy brow,
Nor all thy lover's, all thy father's tears
Avail'd to snatch thee from the cruel grave;
Thy agonizing looks, thy last farewell 200
Struck to the inmost feeling of my soul
As with the hand of death. At once the shade
More horrid nodded o'er me, and the winds
With hoarser murmuring shook the branches. Dark
As midnight storms, the scene of human things
Appear'd before me; deserts, burning sands,
Where the parch'd adder dies; the frozen south;
And desolation blasting all the west
With rapine and with murder, tyrant power, 209
Here sits enthron'd with blood; the baleful charms
Of superstition there infect the skies,
And turn the sun to horror. Gracious heaven!
What is the life of man? Or cannot these,
Not these portents thy awful will suffice?

That, propagated thus beyond their scope,
They rise to act their cruelties anew
In my afflicted bosom, thus decreed
The universal sensitive of pain,
The wretched heirs of evils not its own!

Thus I impatient; when, at once effus'd, 220
A flashing torrent of celestial day [scint
Burst through the shadowy void. With slow de-
A purple cloud came floating through the sky,
And pois'd at length within the circling trees,
Hung obvious to my view, till opening wide
Its lucid orb, a more than human form
Emerging lean'd majestic o'er my head,
And instant thunder shook the conscious grove.
Then met into air the liquid cloud,
Then all the shining vision stood reveal'd. 230
A wreath of palm his ample forehead bound,
And o'er his shoulder, mantling to his knee,
Flow'd the transparent robe, around his waist
Collected with a radiant zone of gold
Ethereal; there in mystic signs engrav'd,
I read his office high and sacred name,
Genius of human kind. Appall'd I gaz'd
The godlike presence; for athwart his brow
Displeasure, temper'd with a mild concern,
Look'd down reluctant on me, and his words 240
Like distant thunders broke the murmuring air.

Vain are thy thoughts, O child of mortal birth!
And impotent thy tongue. Is thy short span
Capacious of this universal frame?
Thy wisdom all-sufficient? Thou, alas!
Dost thou aspire to judge between the Lord
Of nature and his works? to lift thy voice
Against the sovereign order he decreed,
All good and lovely? to blaspheme the bands
Of tenderness innate and social love, 250
Holiest of things! by which the general orb
Of being, as by adamant links,
Was drawn to perfect union and sustain'd
From everlasting? Hast thou felt the pangs
Of softening sorrow, of indignant zeal
So grievous to the soul, as thence to wish
The ties of nature broken from thy frame;
That so thy selfish, unrelenting heart
Might cease to mourn its lot, no longer then,
The wretched heir of evils not its own? 260
O fair benevolence of generous minds!
O man by nature form'd for all mankind!

He spoke; abash'd and silent I remain'd,
As conscious of my tongue's offence, and aw'd
Before his presence, though my secret soul
Disdain'd the imputation. On the ground
I fix'd my eyes; till from his airy couch
He stoop'd sublime, and touching with his hand
My dazzling forehead, Raise thy sight, he cry'd,
And let thy sense convince thy erring tongue. 270

I look'd, and lo! the former scene was chang'd;
For verdant alleys and surrounding trees,
A solitary prospect, wide and wild,
Rush'd on my senses. 'Twas an horrid pile
Of hills and many a shaggy forest mix'd,
With many a fable cliff and glittering stream.
Aloft recumbent o'er the hanging ridge,
The brown woods wav'd; while ever trickling
springs

Wash'd from the naked roots of oak and pine
The crumbling soil; and still at every fall 280
Down the steep windings of the channel'd rock,

Remurmuring rush'd the congregated floods
With hoarser inundation; till at last
They reach'd a grassy plain, which from the skirts
Of that high desert spread her verdant lap,
And drank the gushing moisture, where confin'd
In one smooth current, o'er the lily vale
Clearer than glass it flow'd. Autumnal spoils
Luxuriant spreading to the rays of morn, 289
Blush'd o'er the cliffs, whose half-encircling mound
As in a sylvan theatre enclos'd
That flowery level. On the river's brink
I spy'd a fair pavilion, which diffus'd
Its floating umbrage 'mid the silver shade
Of osiers. Now the western sun reveal'd
Between two parting cliffs his golden orb,
And pour'd across the shadow of the hills,
On rocks and floods, a yellow stream of light
That cheer'd the solemn scene. My listening
powers 299

Were aw'd, and every thought in silence hung,
And wondering expectation. Then the voice
Of that celestial power, the mystic shew
Declaring, thus my deep attention call'd.

Inhabitants of earth, to whom is given
The gracious ways of providence to learn,
Receive my sayings with a steadfast ear—
Know then, the sov'reign spirit of the world,
Though, self-collected from eternal time,
Within his own deep essence he beheld
The bounds of true felicity complete; 310
Yet by immense benignity inclin'd
To spread around him that primeval joy
Which fill'd himself, he rais'd his plastic arm,
And sounded through the hollow depth of space
The strong, creative mandate. Strait arose
These heavenly orbs, the glad abodes of life
Effusive kindled by his breath divine
Through endless forms of being. Each inhal'd
From him its portion of the vital flame, 319
In measure such, that, from the wide complex
Of co-existent orders, one might rise,
One order, all involving and intire.
He too beholding in the sacred light
Of his essential reason, all the shapes
Of swift contingency, all successive ties
Of action propagated through the sum
Of possible existence, he at once,
Down the long series of eventful time,
So fix'd the dates of being, so dispos'd,
To every living soul of every kind 330

The field of motion and the hour of rest,
That all conspir'd to his supreme design,
To universal good: with full accord
Answering the mighty model he had chosen,
The best and fairest of unnumber'd worlds
That lay from everlasting in the store
Of his divine conceptions. Nor content,
By one exertion of creative power
His goodness to reveal; through every age,
Through every moment up the tract of time 340
His parent-hand with ever-new increase
Of happiness and virtue has adorn'd
The vast harmonious frame: his parent hand,
From the mute shell-fish gasping on the shore,
To men, to angels, to celestial minds,
For ever leads the generations on
To higher scenes of being; while supply'd
From day to day with his enlivening breath,

Inferior orders in succession rise
 To fill the void below. As flame ascends, 350
 As bodies to their proper centre move,
 As the pois'd ocean to the attracting moon
 Obedient swells, and every headlong stream
 Devolves its winding waters to the main;
 So all things which have life aspire to God,
 The sun of being, boundless, unimpair'd,
 Centre of souls! Nor does the faithful voice
 Of nature cease to prompt their eager steps
 Aright; nor is the care of heaven withheld
 From granting to the task proportion'd aid; 360
 That in their stations all may persevere
 To climb the ascent of being, and approach
 For ever nearer to the life divine.

That rocky pile thou seest, that verdant lawn
 Fresh water'd from the mountains. Let the scene
 Paint in thy fancy the primeval seat
 Of man, and where the will supreme ordain'd
 His mansion, that pavilion fair diffus'd
 Along the shady brink; in this recess
 To wear the appointed season of his youth, 370
 Till riper hours should open to his toil
 The high communion of superior minds,
 Of consecrated heroes and of gods.
 Nor did the Sire Omnipotent forget
 His tender bloom to cherish; nor withheld
 Celestial footsteps from his green abode.
 Oft from the radiant honours of his throne,
 He sent whom most he lov'd, the sovran fair,
 The effluence of his glory, whom he plac'd
 Before his eyes for ever to behold; 380
 The goddess from whose inspiration flows
 The toil of patriots, the delight of friends;
 Without whose work divine, in heaven or earth,
 Nought lovely, nought propitious comes to pass,
 Nor hope, nor praise, nor honour. Her the sire
 Gave it in charge to rear the blooming mind,
 The folded powers to open, to direct
 The growth luxuriant of his young desires,
 And from the laws of this majestic world 389
 To teach him what was good. As thus the nymph
 Her daily care attended, by her side
 With constant steps her gay companions stay'd
 The fair Euphrosyne, the gentle queen
 Of smiles, and graceful gladness, and delights
 That cheer alike the hearts of mortal men
 And powers immortal. See the shining pair!
 Behold, where from his dwelling now disclos'd
 They quit their youthful charge, and seek the skies.

I look'd, and on the flowery turf there stood
 Between two radiant forms a smiling youth 400
 Whose tender cheeks display'd the vernal flower
 Of beauty; sweetest innocence illum'd
 His bashful eyes, and on his polish'd brow
 Sate young simplicity. With fond regard
 He view'd the associates, as their steps they mov'd;
 The younger chief his ardent eyes detain'd,
 With mild regret invoking her return.
 Bright as the star of evening she appear'd
 Amid the dusky scene. Eternal youth 409
 O'er all her form its glowing honours breath'd;
 And smiles eternal from her candid eyes
 Flow'd, like the dewy lustre of the morn
 Effusive trembling on the placid waves.
 The spring of heaven had shed its blushing spoils
 To bind her sable tresses: full diffus'd
 Her yellow mantle floated in the breeze;

And in her hand she wav'd a living branch
 Rich with immortal fruits, of power to calm
 The wrathful heart, and from the brightening eyes,
 To chase the cloud of sadness. More sublime 420
 The heavenly partner mov'd. The prime of age
 Compos'd her steps. The presence of a god,
 High on the circle of her brow enthron'd,
 From each majestic motion darted awe,
 Devoted awe! till, cherish'd by her looks
 Benevolent and meek, confiding love
 To filial rapture soften'd all the soul.
 Free in her graceful hand she pois'd the sword
 Of chaste dominion. An heroic crown
 Display'd the old simplicity of pomp 430
 Around her honour'd head. A matron's robe,
 White as the sunshine streams through vernal clouds,

Her stately form invested. Hand in hand
 The immortal pair forsook the enamel'd green,
 Ascending slowly. Rays of limpid light [heard,
 Gleam'd round their path; celestial sounds were
 And through the fragrant air æthereal dews
 Distill'd around them; till at once the clouds
 Disparting wide in midway sky, withdrew
 Their airy veil, and left a bright expanse 440
 Of empyrean flame, where spent and drown'd,
 Afflicted vision plung'd in vain to scan
 What object it involv'd. My feeble eyes
 Endur'd not. Bending down to earth I stood,
 With dumb attention. Soon a female voice,
 As watery murmurs sweet, or warbling shades,
 With sacred invocation thus began:

Father of gods and mortals! whose right arm
 With reins eternal guides the moving heavens,
 Bend thy propitious ear. Behold well pleas'd
 I seek to finish thy divine decree. 451
 With frequent steps I visit yonder seat
 Of man, thy offspring; from the tender seeds
 Of justice and of wisdom, to evolve
 The latent honours of his generous frame;
 Till thy conducting hand shall raise his lot
 From earth's dim scene to these ethereal walks,
 The temple of thy glory. But not me,
 Not my directing voice he oft requires,
 Or hears delighted: this enchanting maid, 460
 The associate thou hast given me, her alone
 He loves, O Father! absent, her he craves;
 And but for her glad presence ever join'd,
 Rejoices not in mine: that all my hopes
 This thy benignant purpose to fulfil,
 I deem uncertain: and my daily cares
 Unfruitful all and vain, unless by thee
 Still farther aided in the work divine.

She ceas'd; a voice more awful thus reply'd:
 O thou! in whom for ever I delight, 470
 Fairer than all the inhabitants of heaven,
 Best image of thy author! far from thee
 Be disappointment, or distaste, or blame;
 Who soon or late shall every work fulfil,
 And no resistance find. If man refuse
 To hearken to thy dictates; or, allur'd
 By meaner joys, to any other power
 Transfer the honours due to thee alone;
 That joy which he pursues he ne'er shall taste.
 That power in whom delighteth ne'er behold. 480
 Go then, once more, and happy be thy toil;
 Go then! but let not this thy smiling friend
 Partake thy footsteps. In her stead, behold!

With thee the son of Nemesis I send;
 The fiend abhorr'd! whose vengeance takes ac-
 Of sacred order's violated laws. [count
 See where he calls thee, burning to be gone,
 Fierce to exhaust the tempest of his wrath
 On yon devoted head. But thou, my child,
 Control his cruel phrenzy, and protect 490
 Thy tender charge; that when despair shall grasp
 His agonizing bosom, he may learn,
 Then he may learn to love the gracious hand
 Alone sufficient in the hour of ill,
 To save his feeble spirit; then confess
 Thy genuine honours, O excelling fair!
 When all the plagues that wait the deadly will
 Of this avenging demon, all the storms
 Of night infernal, serve but to display
 The energy of thy superior charms 500
 With mildest awe triumphant o'er his rage,
 And shining clearer in the horrid gloom.

Here ceas'd that awful voice, and soon I felt
 The cloudy curtain of refreshing eye
 Was clos'd once more, from that immortal fire
 Sheltering my eyes. Looking up, I view'd
 A vast gigantic spectre striding on [clouds,
 Through murmuring thunders and a waste of
 With dreadful action. Black as night his brow
 Relentless frowns involv'd. His savage limbs 510
 With sharp impatience violent he writh'd,
 As through convulsive anguish; and his hand,
 Arm'd with a scorpion-lash, full oft he rais'd
 In madness to his bosom; while his eyes
 Rain'd bitter tears, and bellowing loud he shook
 The void with horror. Silent by his side
 The virgin came. No discomposure stirr'd
 Her features. From the glooms which hung around

No stain of darkness mingled with the beam
 Of her divine effulgence. Now they stoop 520
 Upon the river bank; and now to hail,
 His wonted guests, with eager steps advanc'd
 The unsuspecting inmate of the shade.

As when a famish'd wolf, that all night long
 Had rang'd the Alpine snows, by chance at morn
 Sees from a cliff incumbent o'er the smoke
 Of some lone village, a neglected kid
 That strays along the wild for herb or spring;
 Down from the winding ridge he sweeps amain,
 And thinks he tears him: so with tenfold rage,
 The monster sprung remorseless on his prey. 531
 Amaz'd the stripling stood: with panting breast
 Feebly he pour'd the lamentable wail
 Of helpless consternation, struck at once,
 And rooted to the ground. The queen beheld
 His terror, and with looks of tenderest care
 Advanc'd to save him. Soon the tyrant felt
 Her awful power. His keen, tempestuous arm
 Hung nerveless, nor descended where his rage
 Had aim'd the deadly blow: then dumb retir'd
 With sullen rancour. Lo! the sovran maid 541
 Folds with a mother's arms the fainting boy,
 Till life rekindles in his rosy cheek; [tongue.
 Then grasps his hands, and cheers him with her

O wake thee, rouse thy spirit! Shall the spite
 Of yon tormentor thus appall thy heart,
 While I, thy friend and guardian, am at hand
 To rescue and to heal? O let thy soul
 Remember, what the will of heaven ordains
 Is ever good for all; and if for all, 550

Then good for thee. Nor only by the warmth
 And soothing sunshine of delightful things,
 Do minds grow up and flourish. Oft misled
 By that bland light, the young unpractis'd views
 Of reason wander through a fatal road,
 Far from their native aim; as if to lie
 Inglorious in the fragrant shade, and wait
 The soft access of ever-circling joys,
 Were all the end of being. Ask thyself,
 This pleasing error did it never lull 560
 Thy wishes? Has thy constant heart refus'd
 The silken fetters of delicious ease?
 Or when divine Euphrosyne appear'd
 Within this dwelling, did not thy desires
 Hang far below the measure of thy fate,
 Which I reveal'd before thee? and thy eyes,
 Impatient of my counsels, turn away
 To drink the soft effusion of her smiles?
 Know then, for this the everlasting fire
 Deprives thee of her presence, and instead, 570
 O wife and still benevolent! ordains
 This horrid visage hither to pursue
 My steps; that so thy nature may discern
 Its real good, and what alone can save
 Thy feeble spirit in this hour of ill
 From folly and despair. O yet below'd!
 Let not this headlong terror quite o'erwhelm
 Thy scatter'd powers; nor fatal deem the rage
 Of this tormentor, nor his proud assault,
 While I am here to vindicate thy toil, 580
 Above the generous question of thy arm.
 Brave by thy fears, and in thy weakness strong,
 This hour he triumphs; but confront his might,
 And dare him to the combat, then with ease
 Disarm'd and quell'd, his fierceness he resigns
 To bondage and to scorn: while thus inur'd
 By watchful danger, by unceasing toil,
 The immortal mind, superior to his fate,
 Amid the outrage of external things,
 Firm as the solid base of this great world, 590
 Rests on his own foundations. Blow, ye winds!
 Ye waves! ye thunders! roll your tempest on;
 Shake, ye old pillars of the marble sky!
 Till all its orbs and all its worlds of fire
 Be loosen'd from their seats; yet still serene,
 The unconquer'd mind looks down upon the wreck;

And ever stronger as the storms advance,
 Firm through the closing ruin holds his way,
 Where nature calls him to the destin'd goal. 599

So spake the goddess; while through all her
 Celestial raptures flow'd, in every word, [frame
 In every motion kindling warmth divine
 To seize who listen'd. Vehement and swift
 As lightning fires the aromatic shade
 In Ethiopian fields, the stripling felt
 Her inspiration catch his fervid soul,
 And starting from his languor thus exclaim'd:
 Then let the trial come! and witness thou,
 If terror be upon me; if I shrink
 To meet the storm, or falter in my strength 610
 When hardest it besets me. Do not think
 That I am fearful and infirm of soul,
 As late thy eyes beheld, for thou hast chang'd
 My nature; thy commanding voice has wak'd
 My languid powers to bear me boldly on,
 Where'er the will divine my path ordains
 Through toil or peril: only do not thou

Forfake me; O be thou for ever near,
 That I may listen to thy sacred voice,
 And guide by thy decrees my constant feet. 620
 But say, for ever are my eyes bereft?
 Say, shall the fair Euphrosyne not once
 Appear again to charm me? Thou, in heaven!
 O thou eternal arbiter of things!
 Be thy great bidding done: for who am I,
 To question thy appointment? Let the frowns
 Of this avenger every morn o'ercast
 The cheerful dawn, and every evening damp
 With double night my dwelling; I will learn
 To hail them both, and unrepining bear 630
 His hateful presence: but permit my tongue
 One glad request, and if my deeds may find
 Thy awful eye propitious, O restore
 The rosy-featur'd maid, again to cheer
 This lonely seat, and bless me with her smiles.

He spoke; when instant through the sable glooms

With which that furious presence had involv'd
 The ambient air, a flood of radiance came
 Swift as the lightning flash; the melting clouds
 Flew diverse, and amid the blue serene 640
 Euphrosyne appear'd. With sprightly step
 The nymph alighted on the irriguous lawn,
 And to her wondering audience thus began:

Lo! I am here to answer to your vows,
 And be the meeting fortunate! I come
 With joyful tidings; we shall part no more—
 Hark! how the gentle echo from her cell
 Talks through the cliffs, and murmuring o'er the stream

Repeats the accents; we shall part no more.
 O my delightful friends! well pleas'd on high 650
 The father has beheld you, while the might
 Of that stern foe with bitter trial prov'd
 Your equal doings; then for ever spake
 The high decree: that thou, celestial maid!
 Howe'er that grisly phantom on thy steps
 May sometimes dare intrude, yet never more
 Shalt thou, descending to the abode of man,
 Alone endure the rancour of his arm,
 Or leave thy lov'd Euphrosyne behind.

She ended; and the whole romantic scene 660
 Immediate vanish'd; rocks, and woods, and rills,
 The mantling tent, and each mysterious form,
 Flew like the pictures of a morning dream,
 When sun-shine fills the bed. A while I stood
 Perplex'd and giddy; till the radiant power
 Who bade the visionary landscape rise,
 As up to him I turn'd, with gentlest looks
 Preventing my inquiry, thus began:

There let thy soul acknowledge its complaint
 How blind! how impious! There behold the ways
 Of heaven's eternal destiny to man, 671
 For ever just, benevolent, and wise:

That virtue's awful steps, howe'er pursued
 By vexing fortune and intrusive pain,
 Should never be divided from her chaste,
 Her fair attendant, pleasure. Need I urge
 Thy tardy thought through all the various round
 Of this existence, that thy softening soul
 At length may learn what energy the hand
 Of virtue mingles in the bitter tide 680
 Of passion swelling with distress and pain,
 To mitigate the sharp with gracious drops
 Of cordial pleasure? Ask the faithful youth,

Why the cold urn of her whom long he lov'd
 So often fills his arms; so often draws
 His lonely footsteps at the silent hour,
 To pay the mournful tribute of his tears?
 O! he will tell thee, that the wealth of worlds
 Should ne'er seduce his bosom to forego 689
 That sacred hour, when stealing from the noise
 Of care and envy, sweet remembrance soothes
 With virtue's kindest looks his aching breast,
 And turns his tears to rapture.—Ask the crowd
 Which flies impatient from the village-walk
 To climb the neighbouring cliffs, when far below
 The cruel winds have hurl'd upon the coast
 Some helpless bark; while sacred pity melts
 The general eye, or terror's icy hand
 Smites their distorted limbs and horrent hair;
 While every mother closer to her breast 700
 Catches her child, and pointing where the waves
 Foam through the shatter'd vessel, shrieks aloud,
 As one poor wretch that spreads his piteous arms
 For succour, swallow'd by the roaring surge,
 As now another, dash'd against the rock,
 Drops lifeless down: O! deemest thou indeed
 No kind endearment here by nature given
 To mutual terror and compassion's tears?
 No sweetly melting softness which attracts,
 O'er all that edge of pain, the social powers 710
 To this their proper action and their end?
 —Ask thy own heart; when at the midnight hour,
 Slow through that studious gloom thy pausing
 eye

Led by the glimmering taper moves around
 The sacred volumes of the dead, the songs
 Of Grecian bards, and records writ by fame
 For Grecian heroes, where the present power
 Of heaven and earth surveys the immortal page,
 Even as a father blessing, while he reads
 The praises of his son. If then thy soul, 720
 Spurning the yoke of these inglorious days,
 Mix in their deeds and kindle with their flame;
 Say, when the prospect blackens on thy view,
 When rooted from the base, heroic states
 Mourn in the dust, and tremble at the frown
 Of curst ambition; when the pious band
 Of youths who fought for freedom and their fires,
 Lie side by side in gore; when ruffian pride
 Usurps the throne of justice, turns the pomp
 Of public power, the majesty of rule, 730
 The sword, the laurel, and the purple robe,
 To slavish empty pageants, to adorn
 A tyrant's walk, and glitter in the eyes
 Of such as bow the knee; when honour'd urns
 Of patriots and of chiefs the awful bust
 And storied arch, to glut the coward-age
 Of regal envy, strew the public way
 With hallow'd ruins; when the muse's haunt,
 The marble porch where wisdom wont to talk
 With Socrates or Tully, hears no more, 740
 Save the hoarse jargon of contentious monks,
 Or female superstition's midnight prayer;
 When ruthless rapine from the hand of time
 Tears the destroying scythe, with surer blow
 To sweep the works of glory from their base;
 Till desolation o'er the grass-grown street
 Expands his raven-wings, and up the wall,
 Where senates once the price of monarchs doom'd,
 Hisses the gliding snake through hoary weeds 749
 That clasp the mouldering column; thus defac'd,

Thus widely mournful when the prospect thrills
 Thy beating bosom, when the patriot's tear
 Starts from thine eye, and thy extended arm
 In fancy hurls the thunderbolt of Jove
 To fire the impious wreath on Philip's brow,
 Or dash Octavius from the trophied car;
 Say, does thy secret soul repine to taste
 The big distress: Or wouldst thou then exchange
 Those heart-ennobling sorrows for the lot
 Of him who sits amid the gaudy herd 760
 Of mute barbarians bending to his nod,
 And bears aloft his gold-invested front,
 And says within himself, "I am a king, [woe
 "And wherefore should the clamorous voice of
 "Intrude upon mine ear?—" The baleful dregs
 Of these late ages, this inglorious draught
 Of servitude and folly, have not yet,
 Blest be the eternal ruler of the world!
 Defil'd to such a depth of sordid shame
 The native honours of the human soul, 770
 Nor so effac'd the image of its fire.

BOOK III.

PLEASURE in observing the tempers and manners of men, even where vicious or absurd. The origin of vice, from false representations of the fancy, producing false opinions concerning good and evil. Inquiry into ridicule. The general sources of ridicule in the minds and characters of men, enumerated. Final cause of the sense of ridicule. The resemblance of certain aspects of inanimate things to the sensations and properties of the mind. The operations of the mind in the production of the works of imagination, described. The secondary pleasure from imitation. The benevolent order of the world illustrated in the arbitrary connexion of these pleasures with the objects which excite them. The nature and conduct of taste. Concluding with an account of the natural and moral advantages resulting from a sensible and well-formed imagination.

WHAT wonder therefore, since the endearing ties
 Of passion link the universal kind
 Of man so close, what wonder if to search
 This common nature through the various change
 Of sex, and age, and fortune, and the frame
 Of each peculiar, draw the busy mind
 With unresisted charms: the spacious west,
 And all the teeming regions of the south
 Hold not a quarry, to the curious flight
 Of knowledge, half so tempting or so fair, 10
 As man to man. Nor only where the smiles
 Of love invite; nor only where the applause
 Of cordial honour turns the attentive eye
 On virtue's graceful deeds. For since the course
 Of things external acts in different ways
 On human apprehensions, as the hand
 Of nature temper'd to a different frame
 Peculiar minds; so happily where the powers
 Of fancy neither lessen nor enlarge
 The images of things, but paint in all 20
 Their genuine hues, the features which they wore
 In nature; their opinion will be true,
 And action right. For action treads the path
 In which opinion says he follows good,

Or flies from evil; and opinion gives
 Report of good or evil, as the scene
 Was drawn by fancy, lovely or deform'd:
 Thus her report can never there be true
 Where fancy cheats the intellectual eye,
 With glaring colours and distorted lines. 30
 Is there a man, who at the sound of death
 Sees ghastly shapes of terror conjur'd up, [groans
 And black before him; nought but death-bed
 And fearful prayers, and plunging from the brink
 Of light and being, down the gloomy air
 An unknown depth? Alas! in such a mind,
 If no bright forms of excellence attend
 The image of his country; nor the pomp
 Of sacred senates, nor the guardian voice
 Of justice on her throne, nor aught that wakes 40
 The conscious bosom with a patriot's flame;
 Will not opinion tell him, that to die,
 Or stand the hazard, is a greater ill
 Than to betray his country? And in act
 Will he not choose to be a wretch and live?
 Here vice begins then. From the enchanting cup
 Which fancy holds to all, the unwary thirst
 Of youth oft swallows a Circean draught,
 That sheds a baleful tincture o'er the eye
 Of reason, till no longer he discerns, 50
 And only guides to err. Then revel forth
 A furious band that spurns him from the throne!
 And all is uproar. Thus ambition grasps
 The empire of the soul: thus pale revenge
 Unsheaths her murderous dagger; and the hands
 Of lust and rapine, with unholy arts,
 Watch to o'erturn the barrier of the laws
 That keeps them from their prey: thus all the plagues
 The wicked bear, or o'er the trembling scene
 The tragic muse discloses, under shapes 60
 Of honour, safety, pleasure, ease, or pomp,
 Stole first into the mind. Yet not by all
 Those lying forms which fancy in the brain
 Engenders, are the kindling passions driven,
 To guilty deeds; nor reason bound in chains,
 That vice alone may lord it: oft adorn'd
 With solemn pageants, folly mounts the throne,
 And plays her idiot-antics, like a queen.
 A thousand garbs she wears; a thousand ways
 She wheels her giddy empire.—Lo! thus far 70
 With bold adventure, to the Mantuan lyre
 I sing of nature's charms, and touch well-pleas'd
 A stricter note: now happily must my song
 Unbend her serious measure, and reveal
 In lighter strains, how folly's awkward arts
 Excite impetuous laughter's gay rebuke;
 The sportive province of the comic muse.
 See! in what crowds the uncouth forms advance;
 Each would outstrip the other, each prevent
 Our careful search, and offer to your gaze, 80
 Unask'd his motley features. Wait a while,
 My curious friends! and let us first arrange
 In proper order your promiscuous throng.
 Behold the foremost band of slender thought,
 And easy faith; whom flattering fancy soothes
 With lying spectres, in themselves to view
 Illustrious forms of excellence and good,
 That scorn the mansion. With exulting hearts
 They spread their spurious treasures to the sun,
 And bid the world admire! but chief the glance
 Of wishful envy draws their joy-bright eyes, 91

And lifts with self-applause each lordly brow.
 In numbers boundless as the blooms of spring,
 Behold their glaring idols, empty shades
 By fancy gilded o'er, and then set up
 For adoration. Some in learning's garb,
 With formal hand, and fable-cinctur'd gown,
 And rags of mouldy volumes. Some elate
 With martial splendor, steely pikes and swords
 Of costly frame, and gay Phœnician robes 100
 Inwrought with flowery gold, assume the port
 Of stately valour: listening by his side
 There stands a female form; to her, with looks
 Of earnest import, pregnant with amaze,
 He talks of deadly deeds, of breaches, storms,
 And sulphurous mines, and ambush: then at once
 Breaks off, and smiles to see her look so pale,
 And asks some wondering question of her fears.
 Others of graver mien; behold, adorn'd
 With holy ensigns, how sublime they move, 110
 And bending oft their sanctimonious eyes
 Take homage of the simple-minded throng;
 Ambassadors of heaven! Nor much unlike
 Is he whose visage, in the lazy mist
 That mantles every feature, hides a brood
 Of politic conceits; of whispers, nods,
 And hints deep omen'd with unwieldy schemes,
 And dark portents of state. Ten thousand more,
 Prodigious habits and tumultuous tongues, 119
 Pour dauntless in, and swell the boastful band.

Then comes the second order, all who seek
 The debt of praise, where watchful unbelief
 Darts through the thin pretence her squinting eye
 On some retir'd appearance which belies
 The boasted virtue, or annuls the applause
 That justice else would pay. Here side by side
 I see two leaders of the solemn train
 Approaching: one a female old and gray,
 With eyes demure, and wrinkle-furrow'd brow,
 Pale as the cheeks of death; yet still she stuns
 The sickening audience with a nauseous tale; 131
 How many youths her myrtle-chains have worn,
 How many virgins at her triumphs pin'd!
 Yet how resolv'd she guards her cautious heart;
 Such is her terror at the risks of love,
 And man's seducing tongue! The other seems
 A bearded sage ungentle in his mien,
 And fordid all his habit; peevish want
 Grins at his heels, while down the gazing throng
 He stalks, resounding in magnificent phrase 140
 The vanity of riches, the contempt
 Of pomp and power. Be prudent in your zeal,
 Ye grave associates! let the silent grace
 Of her who blushes at the fond regard
 Her charms inspire, more eloquent unfold
 The praise of spotless honour: let the man
 Whose eye regards not his illustrious pomp
 And ample store, but as indulgent streams
 To cheer the barren soil and spread the fruits
 Of joy, let him by juster measures fix 150
 The price of riches and the end of power.

Another tribe succeeds; deluded long
 By fancy's dazzling optics, these behold
 The images of some peculiar things
 With brighter hues resplendent, and pourtray'd
 With features nobler far than e'er adorn'd
 Their genuine objects. Hence the fever'd heart
 Pants with delirious hope for tinsel charms;
 Hence oft obtusive on the eye of scorn,

Untimely zeal her witless pride betrays, 160
 And serious manhood from the towering aim
 Of wisdom stoops to emulate the boast
 Of childish toil. Behold yon mystic form,
 Bedeck'd with feathers, insects, weeds, and shells!
 Not with intenser view the Samian sage
 Bent his fixt eye on heaven's intenser fires,
 When first the order of that radiant scene
 Swell'd his exulting thought, than this surveys
 A muckworm's entrails, or a spider's fang.
 Next him a youth with flowers and myrtles
 crown'd, 170

Attends that virgin form, and blushing kneels,
 With fondest gesture and a suppliant's tongue,
 To win her coy regard: adieu, for him,
 The dull engagements of the bustling world!
 Adieu the sick impertinence of praise!
 And hope, and action! for with her alone,
 By streams and shades, to steal these fighting hours,
 Is all he asks, and all that fate can give!
 Thee too, facetious Momion, wandering here,
 Thee, dreaded censor, oft have I beheld 180
 Bewilder'd unawares: alas! too long
 Flush'd with thy comic triumphs and the spoils
 Of fly derision! till on every side
 Hurling thy random bolts, offended truth
 Assign'd thee here thy station with the slaves
 Of folly. Thy once formidable name
 Shall grace her humble records, and be heard
 In scoffs and mockery bandied from the lips
 Of all the vengeful brotherhood around,
 So oft the patient victims of thy scorn. 190

But now, ye gay! to whom indulgent fate,
 Of all the muse's empire hath assign'd
 The fields of folly, hither each advance
 Your sickles; here the teeming soil affords
 Its richest growth. A favourite brood appears;
 In whom the demon, with a mother's joy,
 Views all her charms reflected, all her cares
 At full repay'd. Ye most illustrious band!
 Who, scorning reason's tame, pedantic rules,
 And order's vulgar bondage, never meant 200
 For souls sublime as yours, with generous zeal
 Pay vice the reverence virtue long usurp'd,
 And yield deformity the fond applause
 Which beauty wont to claim; forgive my song,
 That for the blushing diffidence of youth,
 It shuns the unequal province of your praise.

Thus far triumphant in the pleasing guile
 Of bland imagination, folly's train
 Have dar'd our search: but now a dastard kind
 Advance reluctant, and with faltering feet 210
 Shrink from the gazer's eye: enfeebled hearts
 Whom fancy chills with visionary fears,
 Or bends to servile tameness with conceits
 Of shame, of evil, or of base defect,
 Fantastic and delusive. Here the slave
 Who droops abash'd when sullen pomp surveys
 His humbler habit; here the trembling wretch
 Unnerv'd and struck with terror's icy bolts,
 Spent in weak wailings, drown'd in shameful
 tears,

At every dream of danger: here subdued 220
 By frontless laughter and the haughty scorn
 Of old, unfeeling vice, the abject soul,
 Who blushing half resigns the candid praise
 Of temperance and honour; half disowns
 A freeman's hatred of tyrannic pride;

And hears with sickly smiles the venal mouth
With foulest licence mock the patriot's name.

Last of the motely bands on whom the power
Of gay derision bends her hostile aim,
Is that where shameful ignorance presides. 230
Beneath her sordid banners, lo! they march,
Like blind and lame. Whate'er their doubtful hands

Attempt, confusion straight appears behind,
And troubles all the work. Through many a maze,
Perplex'd they struggle, changing every path,
O'erturning every purpose; then at last
Sit down dismay'd, and leave the entangled scene
For scorn to sport with. Such then is the abode
Of folly in the mind; and such the shapes
In which she governs her obsequious train. 240

Through every scene of ridicule in things
To lead the tenour of my devious lay;
Through every swift occasion, which the hand
Of laughter points at, when the mirthful sting
Distends her fallying nerves and chokes her
tongue;

What were it but to count each crystal drop
Which morning's dewy fingers on the blooms
Of May distil? Suffice it to have said,
Where'er the power of ridicule displays 249
Her quaint-cy'd visage, some incongruous form,
Some stubborn dissonance of things combin'd,
Strikes on the quick observer: whether pomp,
Or praise, or beauty, mix their partial claim
Where sordid fashions, where ignoble deeds,
Where foul deformity, are wont to dwell;
Or whether these with violation loath'd,
Invade resplendent pomp's imperious mien,
The charms of beauty, or the boast of praise.

Ask we for what fair end the Almighty Sire
In mortal bosoms wakes this gay contempt, 260
These grateful stings of laughter, from disgust
Educing pleasure? Wherefore, but to aid
The tardy steps of reason, and at once
By this prompt impulse urge us to depress
The giddy aims of folly? Though the light
Of truth slow dawning on the inquiring mind,
At length unfolds, through many a subtle tie,
How these uncouth disorders end at last
In public evil! yet benignant heaven, 269
Conscious how dim the dawn of truth appears
To thousands; conscious what a scanty pause
From labours and from care, the wider lot
Of humble life affords for studious thought
To scan the maze of nature; therefore stamp'd
The glaring scenes with characters of scorn,
As broad, as obvious, to the passing clown,
As to the letter'd sage's curious eye.

Such are the various aspects of the mind—
Some heavenly genius, whose unclouded thoughts
Attain that secret harmony which blends 280
The ethereal spirit with its mold of clay;
O! teach me to reveal the grateful charm
That searchless nature o'er the sense of man
Diffuses, to behold, in lifeless things,
The inexpressive semblance of himself,
Of thought and passion. Mark the fable woods
That shade sublime yon mountain's nodding
brow;

With what religious awe the solemn scene
Commands your steps! as if the reverend form
Of Minos or of Numa should forsake 290

The Elysian seats, and down the embowering glade

Move to your pausing eye! Behold the expanse
Of yon gay landscape, where the silver clouds
Flit o'er the heavens before the sprightly breeze:
Now their gray cincture skirts the doubtful sun;
Now streams of splendour, through their opening
Effulgent, sweep from off the gilded lawn [veil
The ærial shadows; on the curling brook,
And on the shady margin's quivering leaves 299
With quickest lustre glancing; while you view
The prospect, say, within your cheerful breast
Plays not the lively sense of winning mirth
With clouds and sun-shine checquer'd, while the
Of social converse, to the inspiring tongue [round
Of some gay nymph amid her subject train,
Moves all obsequious? Whence is this effect,
This kindred power of such discordant things?
Or flows their semblance from that mystic tone
To which the new-born mind's harmonious powers
At first were strung? Or rather from the links 310
Which artful custom twines around her frame?

For when the different images of things
By chance combin'd, have struck the attentive soul
With deeper impulse, or, connected long,
Have drawn her frequent eye; how'er distinct
The external scenes, yet oft the ideas gain
From that conjunction an eternal tie,
And sympathy unbroken. Let the mind
Recall one partner of the various league,
Immediate, lo! the firm confederates rise, 320
And each his former station strait resumes:
One movement governs the consenting throng,
And all at once with rosy pleasure shine,
Or all are sadden'd with the glooms of care.
'Twas thus, if ancient fame the truth unfold,
Two faithful needles from the informing touch
Of the same parent-stone, together drew
Its mystic virtue, and at first conspir'd
With fatal impulse quivering to the pole:
Then, though disjoin'd by kingdoms, though the main 330

Roll'd its broad surge betwixt, and different stars
Beheld their wakeful motions, yet preserv'd
The former friendship, and remember'd still
The alliance of their birth: whate'er the line
Which once possess'd, nor pause, nor quiet knew
The sure associate, ere with trembling speed
He found its path, and fix'd unerring there.
Such is the secret union, when we feel
A song, a flower, a name, at once restore 339
Those long-connected scenes where first they mov'd [walks

The attention: backward through her mazy
Guiding the wanton fancy to her scope,
To temples, courts, or fields; with all the band
Of painted forms, of passions and designs
Attendant: whence, if pleasing in itself,
The prospect from that sweet accession gains
Redoubled influence o'er the listening mind.

By these mysterious ties the busy power
Of memory her ideal train preserves 349
Intire; or when they would elude her watch,
Reclaims their fleeting footsteps from the waste
Of dark oblivion; thus collecting all
The various forms of being to present,
Before the curious aim of mimic art,

Their largest choice : like spring's unfolded blooms
Exhaling sweetness, that the skilful bee
May taste at will, from their selected spoils
To work her dulcet food. For not the expanse
Of living lakes in summer's noontide calm,
Reflects the bordering shade, and sun-bright heavens

With fairer semblance ; not the sculptur'd gold
More faithful keeps the graver's lively trace,
Than he whose birth the sister powers of art
Propitious view'd, and from his genial star
Shed influence to the seeds of fancy kind ;
Than his attemper'd bosom must preserve
The seal of nature. There alone unchang'd,
Her form remains. The balmy walks of May
There breathe perennial sweets: the trembling chord
Resounds for ever in the abstracted ear, 370
Melodious : and the virgin's radiant eye,
Superior to disease, to grief, and time,
Shines with unbating lustre. Thus at length
Indow'd with all that nature can bestow,
The child of fancy oft in silence bends
O'er these mixt treasures of his pregnant breast,
With conscious pride. From them he oft resolves
To frame he knows not what excelling things ;
And win he knows not what sublime reward 379
Of praise and wonder. By degrees, the mind
Feels her young nerves dilate : the plastic powers
Labour for action : blind emotions heave
His bosom, and with loveliest phrenzy caught,
From earth to heaven he rolls his daring eye,
From heaven to earth. Anon ten thousand shapes,
Like spectres trooping to the wizard's call,
Flit swift before him. From the womb of earth,
From ocean's bed they come : the eternal heavens
Disclose their splendours, and the dark abyss 389
Pours out her births unknown. With fixed gaze
He marks the rising phantoms. Now compares
Their different forms ; now blends them, now divides

Enlarges and extenuates by turns ;
Opposes, ranges in fantastic bands,
And infinitely varies. Hither now,
Now thither fluctuates his inconstant aim,
With endless choice perplex'd. At length his plan
Begins to open. Lucid order dawns ;
And as from Chaos old the jarring seeds
Of nature at the voice divine repair'd 400
Each to its place, till rosy earth unveil'd
Her fragrant bosom, and the joyful sun
Sprung up the blue serene ; by swift degrees
Thus disentangled, his entire design
Emerges. Colours mingle, features join,
And lines converge : the fainter parts retire ;
The fairer eminent in light advance ;
And every image on its neighbour smiles.
Awhile he stands, and with a father's joy
Contemplates. Then with Promethéan art, 410
Into its proper vehicle he breathes
The fair conception ; which, embodied thus,
And permanent becomes to eyes or ears
An object ascertain'd : while thus inform'd,
The various organs of his mimic skill,
The consonance of sounds, the featur'd rock,
The shadowy picture and impassion'd verse,
Beyond their proper powers attract the soul
By that expressive semblance, while in sight

Of nature's great original we scan 420
The lively child of art; while line by line,
And feature after feature we refer
To that sublime exemplar whence it stole
Those animating charms. Thus beauty's palm
Betwixt them wavering hangs: applauding love
Doubts where to choose; and mortal man aspires.
To tempt creative praise. As when a cloud
Of gathering hail with limpid crusts of ice
Enclos'd and obvious to the beaming sun, 429
Collects his large effulgence; strait the heavens
With equal flames present on either hand
The radiant visage: Persia stands at gaze,
Appall'd; and on the brink of Ganges doubts
The snowy-vested seer, in Mithra's name,
To which the fragrance of the south shall burn,
To which his warbled orisons ascend.

Such various blifs the well-tun'd heart enjoys,
Favour'd of heaven! while, plung'd in sordid
cares.

The unfeeling vulgar mocks the boon divine :
And harsh austerity, from whose rebuke 440
Young love and smiling wonder shrink away
Abash'd and chill of heart, with sager frowns
Condemns the fair enchantment. On my strain,
Perhaps even now, some cold, fastidious judge
Casts a disdainful eye ; and calls my toil,
And calls the love and beauty which I sing,
The dream of folly. Thou, grave censor ! say,
Is beauty then a dream, because the glooms
Of dullness hang too heavy on thy sense,
To let her shine upon thee ? So the man 450
Whose eye ne'er open'd on the light of heaven,
Might smile with scorn while raptur'd vision tells
Of the gay colour'd radiance flushing bright
O'er all creation. From the wise be far
Such gross unhallow'd pride ; nor needs my song
Descend so low ; but rather now unfold,
If human thought could reach, or words unfold
By what mysterious fabric of the mind,
The deep-felt joys and harmony of sound
Result from airy motion ; and from shape 460
The lovely phantoms of sublime and fair.
By what fine ties hath God connected things
When present in the mind, which in themselves
Have no connection ? Sure the rising sun
O'er the cerulean convex of the sea,
With equal brightness and with equal warmth
Might roll his fiery orb ; nor yet the soul
Thus feel her frame expanded and her powers
Exulting in the splendour she beholds ; 469
Like a young conqueror moving through the pomp
Of some triumphal day. When join'd at eve,
Soft-murmuring streams and gales of gentlest
Melodious Philomela's wakeful strain [breath
Attemper, could not man's discerning ear
Through all its tones the sympathy pursue ;
Nor yet this breath divine of nameless joy
Steal through his veins and fan the awaken'd
heart.

Mild as the breeze, yet rapturous as the song.
But were not nature still endow'd at large 479
With all which life requires, though unadorn'd
With such enchantment : Wherefore then her form
So exquisitely fair ? her breath perfum'd
With such ethereal sweetness ? whence her voice
Inform'd at will to raise or to depress

The impassion'd soul? and whence the robes of light
Which thus invest her with more lovely pomp
Than fancy can describe? Whence but from thee,
O source divine of ever-flowing love,
And thy unmeasur'd goodness? Not content
With every food of life to nourish man, 490
By kind illusions of the wondering sense
Thou mak'st all nature beauty to his eye,
Or music to his ear: well pleas'd he scans
The goodly prospect; and with inward smiles
Treads the gay verdure of the painted plain;
Beholds the azure canopy of heaven,
And living lamps that over-arch his head
With more than regal splendour; bends his ears
To the full choir of water, air, and earth;
Nor heeds the pleasing error of his thought, 500
Nor doubts the painted green or azure arch,
Nor questions more the music's mingling sounds
Than space, or motion, or eternal time;
So sweet he feels their influence to attract
The fixed soul; to brighten the dull glooms
Of care, and make the destin'd road of life
Delightful to his feet. So fables tell,
The adventurous hero, bound on hard exploits,
Beholds with glad surprise, by secret spells
Of some kind sage, the patron of his toils, 510
A visionary paradise disclos'd
Amid the dubious wild: with streams, and shades,
And airy songs, the enchanted landscapes smiles,
Cheers his long labours and renews his frame.

What then is taste, but these internal powers
Active, and strong, and feelingly alive
To each fine impulse? a discerning sense
Of decent and sublime, with quick disgust
From things deform'd, or disarrang'd, or gross
In species? This, nor gems, nor stores of gold,
Nor purple state, nor culture can bestow; 521
But god alone when first his active hand
Imprints the secret bias of the soul.
He, mighty parent! wise and just in all,
Free as the vital breeze or light of heaven,
Reveals the charms of nature. Ask the swain
Who journeys homeward from a summer day's Long labour, why, forgetful of his toils
And due repose, he loiters to behold 529
The sun-shine gleaming as through amber clouds,
O'er all the western sky; full soon, I ween,
His rude expression and untutor'd airs,
Beyond the power of language, will unfold
The form of beauty smiling at his heart, [heaven
How lovely! how commanding! But though
In every breast hath sown these early seeds
Of love and admiration, yet in vain,
Without fair culture's kind parental aid
Without enlivening suns, and genial showers,
And shelter from the blast, in vain we hope 540
The tender plant should rear its blooming head,
Or yield the harvest promis'd in its spring.
Nor yet will every soil with equal stores
Repay the tiller's labour; or attend
His will, obsequious, whether to produce
The olive or the laurel. Different minds
Incline to different objects: one pursues
The vast alone, the wonderful, the wild;
Another sighs for harmony, and grace, 549
And gentlest beauty. Hence when lightning fires
The arch of heaven, and thunders rock the ground,
When furious whirlwinds rend the howling air,

And ocean, groaning from its lowest bed,
Heaves his tempestuous billows to the sky;
Amid the mighty uproar, while below
The nations tremble, Shakspeare looks abroad
From some high cliff, superior, and enjoys
The elemental war. But Waller longs,
All on the margin of some flowery stream
To spread his careless limbs amid the cool 560
Of plantane shades, and to the listening deer
The tale of slighted vows and love's disdain
Resound soft-warbling all the live-long day:
Consenting Zephyr sighs; the weeping rill
Joins in his plaint, melodious; mute the groves;
And hill and dale with all their echoes mourn.
Such and so various are the tastes of men. [songs
Oh! blest of heaven, whom not the languid
Of luxury, the Syren! not the bribes
Of sordid wealth, nor all the gaudy spoils 570
Of pageant honour can seduce to leave
Those ever-blooming sweets, which from the store
Of nature fair imagination culls
To charm the enliven'd soul! What though not all
Of mortal offspring can attain the heights
Of envied life; though only few possess
Patrician treasures or imperial state;
Yet nature's care, to all her children just,
With richer treasures and an ampler state,
Indows at large whatever happy man 580
Will deign to use them. His the city's pomp,
The rural honours his. Whate'er adorns
The princely dome, the column and the arch,
The breathing marbles and the sculptur'd gold,
Beyond the proud possessor's narrow claim
His tuneful breast enjoys. For him, the spring
Distils her dews, and from the filken gem
Its lucid leaves unfolds: for him, the hand
Of autumn tinges every fertile branch 589
With blooming gold and blushes like the morn.
Each passing hour sheds tribute from her wings;
And still new beauties meet his lonely walk,
And loves unfelt attract him. Not a breeze
Flies o'er the meadow, not a cloud imbibes
The setting sun's effulgence, not a strain
From all the tenants of the warbling shade
Ascends, but whence his bosom can partake
Fresh pleasure, unprov'd. Nor thence partakes
Fresh pleasure only: for the attentive mind,
By this harmonious action on her powers 600
Becomes herself harmonious: wont so oft
In outward things to meditate the charm
Of sacred order, soon she seeks at home
To find a kindred order, to exert
Within herself this elegance of love,
This fair inspir'd delight: her temper'd powers
Refine at length, and every passion wears
A chaster, milder, more attractive mien,
But if to ampler prospects, if to gaze
On nature's form, where negligent of all 610
These lesser graces, she assumes the port
Of that eternal majesty that weigh'd
The world's foundations, if to these the mind
Exalts her daring eye; then mightier far
Will be the change, and nobler. Would the forms
Of servile custom cramp her generous power?
Would sordid policies, the barbarous growth
Of ignorance and rapine, bow her down
To tame pursuits, to indolence and fear?
Lo! she appeals to nature, to the winds 620

And rolling waves, the sun's unwearied course,
The elements and seasons: all declare
For what the eternal maker has ordain'd
The powers of man: we feel within ourselves
His energy divine: he tells the heart,
He meant, he made us to behold and love
What he beholds and loves, the general orb

Of life and being; to be great like him,
Beneficent and active. Thus the men
Whom nature's works can charm, with God himself
Hold converse; grow familiar, day by day, 631.
With his conceptions act upon his plan;
And form to his, the relish of their souls.

NOTES ON THE THREE BOOKS OF THE PLEASURES OF IMAGINATION.

NOTES ON BOOK I.

VER. 154. Say, why was man, &c.] In apologizing for the frequent negligences of the sublimest authors of Greece, "Those godlike geniuses," says Longinus, "were well assured, that nature had not intended man for a low-spirited or ignoble being: but bringing us into life and the midst of this wide universe, as before a multitude assembled at some heroic solemnity, that we might be spectators of all her magnificence, and candidates high in emulation for the prize of glory; she has therefore implanted in our souls an inextinguishable love of every thing great and exalted, of every thing which appears divine beyond our comprehension. Whence it comes to pass, that even the whole world is not an object sufficient for the depth and rapidity of human imagination, which often sallies forth beyond the limits of all that surrounds us. Let any man cast his eye through the whole circle of our existence, and consider how especially it abounds in excellent and grand objects; he will soon acknowledge for what enjoyments and pursuits we were destined. Thus by the very propensity of nature we are led to admire, not little springs or shallow rivulets, however clear and delicious, but the Nile, the Rhine, the Danube, and, much more than all, the Ocean, &c." Dionys. Longin. de Sublim. § xxiv.

Ver. 202. The empyreal waste.] "Ne se peut-il point qu'il y a un grand espace au delà de la région des étoiles? Que se soit le ciel empyrée, ou non, toujours cet espace immense qui environne toute cette région, pourra être rempli de bonheur & de gloire. Il pourra être conçu comme l'océan, où se redent les flueves de toutes les créatures bienheureuses, quand elles seront venues à leur perfection dans le système des étoiles." Leibnitz dans la Theodicée, part. I. §. 19.

Ver. 204. Whose unfading light, &c.] It was a notion of the great Mr. Huygens, that there may be fixed stars at such a distance from our solar system, as that their light should not have had time to reach us, even from the creation of the world to this day.

Ver. 234. ——— the neglect

Of all familiar prospects, &c. It is here said, that in consequence of the love of novelty, objects which at first were highly delightful to the mind, lose that effect by repeated attention to them. But the instance of habit is opposed to this observation; for there, objects at first distasteful are in time rendered entirely agreeable by repeated attention.

The difficulty in this case will be removed, if we consider, that, when objects at first agreeable, lose that influence by frequently recurring, the mind is wholly passive, and the preception involuntary; but habit, on the other hand, generally supposes choice and activity accompanying it; so that the pleasure arises here not from the object, but from the mind's conscious determination of its own activity; and consequently increases in proportion to the frequency of that determination.

It will still be urged perhaps, that a familiarity with disagreeable objects renders them at length acceptable, even where there is no room for the mind to resolve or act at all. In this case, the appearance must be accounted for, one of these ways:

The pleasure from habit may be merely negative. The object at first gave uneasiness; this uneasiness gradually wears off as the object grows familiar: and the mind, finding it at last entirely removed, reckons its situation really pleasurable, compared with what it had experienced before.

The dislike conceived of the object at first, might be owing to prejudice or want of attention. Consequently the mind, being necessitated to review it often, may at length perceive its own mistake, and be reconciled to what it had looked on with aversion. In which case, a sort of instinctive justice naturally leads it to make amends for the injury, by running toward the other extreme of fondness and attachment.

Or lastly, though the object itself should always continue disagreeable, yet circumstances of pleasure or good fortune may occur along with it. Thus an association may arise in the mind, and the object never be remembered without those pleasing circumstances attending it; by which means the disagreeable impression which it at first occasioned will in time be quite obliterated.

Ver. 240.

——— this desire

Of objects new and strange——] These two ideas are often confounded; though it is evident the mere novelty of an object makes it agreeable, even where the mind is not affected with the least degree of wonder: whereas wonder indeed always implies novelty, being never excited by common or well-known appearances. But the pleasure in both cases is explicable from the same final cause, the acquisition of knowledge and enlargement of our views of nature: on this account, it is natural to treat of them together.

Ver. 374. ——— *Truth and good are one,
And beauty dwells in them, &c.*] “Do you imagine,” says Socrates to Aristippus, “that what is good is not beautiful? Have you not observed that these appearances always coincide? Virtue, for instance, in the same respect as to which we call it good, is ever acknowledged to be beautiful also. In the characters of men we always * join the two denominations together. The beauty of human bodies corresponds, in like manner, with that economy of parts which constitutes them good; and in every circumstance of life, the same object is constantly accounted both beautiful and good, inasmuch as it answers the purposes for which it was designed.” Xenophon. Memorab. Socrat. l. iii. c. 8.

This excellent observation has been illustrated and extended by the noble restorer of ancient philosophy; see the Characteristics, vol. ii. p. 339 and 422, and vol. iii. p. 181. And another ingenious author has particularly shown, that it holds in the general laws of nature, in the works of art, and the conduct of the sciences. Inquiry into the original of our ideas of beauty and virtue, Treat. i. § 8. As to the connection between beauty and truth, there are two opinions concerning it. Some philosophers assert an independent and invariable law in nature, in consequence of which “all rational beings must alike perceive beauty in some certain proportions, and deformity in the contrary.” And this necessity being supposed the same with that which commands the assent or dissent of the understanding, it follows of course that beauty is founded on the universal and unchangeable law of truth.

But others there are, who believe beauty to be merely a relative and arbitrary thing; that indeed it was a benevolent provision in nature to annex so delightful a sensation to those objects which are best and most perfect in themselves, that so we might be engaged to the choice of them at once and without staying to infer their usefulness from their structure and effects; but that it is not impossible, in a physical sense, that two beings, of equal capacities for truth, should perceive, one of them beauty and the other deformity, in the same proportions. And upon this supposition, by that truth which is always connected with beauty, nothing more can be meant than the conformity of any object to those proportions upon which, after careful examination, the beauty of that species is found to depend. Polycletus, for instance, a famous ancient sculptor, from an accurate mensuration of the several parts of the most perfect human bodies, deduced a canon or system of proportions, which was the rule of all succeeding artists. Suppose a statue modelled according to this: a man of mere natural taste, upon looking at it, without entering into its proportions, confesses and admires its beauty; whereas a professor of the art applies his measure to the head, the neck, or the hand, and, without attending to its beauty, pronounces the workmanship to be just and true.

* This the Athenians did in a particular manner, by the word καλοκαγαθός, καλοκαγαθία.

Ver. 492 As when Brutus rose, &c.] Cicero himself describes this fact—“Cæsare interfecto—statim, cruentum altè extollens M. Brutus pugionem, Ciceronem nominatim exclamavit, atque ei recuperatam libertatem est gratulatus.” Cic. Philipp. ii. 12.

Ver. 548. *Where virtue rising from the awful depth
Of truths mysterious bosom, &c.*] According to the opinion of those who assert moral obligation to be founded on an immutable and universal law; and that which is usually called the moral sense, to be determined by the peculiar temper of the imagination and the earliest associations of ideas.

Ver. 591. Lyceum.] The school of Aristotle.

Ver. 592. Academy.] The school of Plato.

Ver. 594. Ilyssus.] One of the rivers on which Athens was situated. Plato, in some of his finest dialogues, lays the scene of conversation with Socrates on its banks.

NOTES ON BOOK II.

Ver. 19. At last the muses rose, &c.] About the age of Hugh Capet, founder of the third race of French kings, the poets of Provence were in high reputation; a sort of strolling bards or rhapsodists, who went about the courts of princes and noblemen, entertaining them at festivals with music and poetry. They attempted both the epic, ode, and satire; and abounded in a wild and fantastic vein of fable, partly allegorical, and partly founded on traditionary legends of the Saracen wars. These were the rudiments of Italian poetry. But their taste and composition must have been extremely barbarous, as we may judge by those who followed the turn of their fable in much politer times; such as Boiardo, Bernardo, Tasso, Ariosto, &c.

Ver. 21. Valclufa.] The famous retreat of Francisco Petrarcha, the father of Italian poetry, and his mistress Laura, a lady of Avignon.

Ver. 22. Arno.] The river which runs by Florence, the birth-place of Dante and Boccaccio.

Ver. 23. Parthenope.] Or Naples, the birth-place of Sannazarro. The great Torquato Tasso was born at Sorrento, in the kingdom of Naples.

Ibid. ——— the rage

Of dire ambition, &c.] This relates to the cruel wars among the republics of Italy, and abominable politics of its little princes, about the fifteenth century. These at last, in conjunction with the Papal power, entirely extinguished the spirit of liberty in that country, and established that abuse of the fine arts which has been since propagated over all Europe.

Ver. 30. Thus from their guardians torn, the tender arts, &c.] Nor were they only losers by the separation. For philosophy itself, to use the words of a noble philosopher, “being thus severed by the sprightly arts and sciences, must consequently grow dronish, insipid, pedantic, useless, and directly opposite to the real knowledge and practice of the world.” Inasmuch that “a gentleman,” says another excellent writer, “cannot easily bring himself to like so austere and ungainly a form: so greatly is it changed from what was once the delight of the finest gentlemen of antiquity, and their recreation after the hurry of public affairs!” From this condition it cannot be recovered but by uniting it once more with the works of imagination; and we have had the pleasure of observing a very great progress made towards their union in England within these few years. It is hardly possible to conceive them at a greater distance from each other than at the Revolution, when Locke stood at the head of one party, and Dryden of the other. But the general spirit of liberty, which has ever since been growing, naturally invited our men of wit and genius to improve that influence which the arts of persuasion gave them with the people, by applying them to subjects of importance to society. Thus poetry and eloquence became considerable; and philosophy is now of course obliged to borrow of their embellishments, in order even to gain audience with the public.

Ver. 157. From Passion's power alone, &c.] This very mysterious kind of pleasure, which is often found in the exercise of passions generally counted painful, has been taken notice of by several authors. Lucretius resolves it into self-love.

"Suave Mari magno," &c. lib. ii. 1.

As if a man was never pleased in being moved at the distress of a tragedy, without a cool reflection that though these fictitious personages were so unhappy, yet he himself was perfectly at ease and in safety. The ingenious author of the Reflexions critiques sur la poésie & sur la peinture, accounts for it by the general delight which the mind takes in its own activity, and the abhorrence it feels of an indolent and inattentive state: and this, joined with the moral approbation of its own temper, which attends these emotions when natural and just, is certainly the true foundation of the pleasure, which, as it is the origin and basis of tragedy and epic, deserved a very particular consideration in this poem.

Ver. 304. Inhabitant of earth, &c.] The account of the economy of Providence here introduced, as the most proper to calm and satisfy the mind when under the compunction of private evils, seems to have come originally from the Pythagorean school: but of the ancient philosophers, Plato has most largely insisted upon it, has established it with all the strength of his capacious understanding, and ennobled it with all the magnificence of his divine imagination. He has one passage so full and clear on this head, that I am persuaded the reader will be pleased to see it here, though somewhat long. Addressing himself to such as are not satisfied concerning Divine Providence: "The being who presides over the whole," says he, "has disposed and complicated all things for the happiness and virtue of the whole, every part of which, according to the extent of its influence, does and suffers what is fit and proper. One of these parts is yours, O unhappy man, which though in itself most inconsiderable and minute, yet being connected with the universe, ever seeks to co-operate with that supreme order. You in the mean time are ignorant of the very end for which all particular natures are brought into existence, that the all-comprehending nature of the whole may be perfect and happy; existing as it does, not for your sake, but the cause and reason of your existence, which, as in the symmetry of every artificial work, must of necessity concur with the general design of the artist, and be subservient to the whole of which it is a part."

VOL. IX.

"Your complaint therefore is ignorant and groundless; since, according to the various energy of creation, and the common laws of nature, there is a constant provision of that which is best at the same time for you and for the whole.—For the governing intelligence clearly beholding all the actions of animated and self-moving creatures, and that mixture of good and evil which diversifies them, considered first of all by what disposition of things, and by what situation of each individual in the general system, vice might be depressed and subdued, and virtue made secure of victory and happiness; with the greatest facility, and in the highest degree possible: In this manner he ordered through the entire circle of being, the internal constitution of every mind, where should be its station in the universal fabric, and through what variety of circumstances it should proceed in the whole tenor of its existence." He goes on in his sublime manner to assert a future state of retribution, "as well for those who, by the exercise of good dispositions being harmonized and assimilated into the divine virtue, are consequently removed to a place of unblemished sanctity and happiness; as of those who by the most flagitious arts have risen from contemptible beginnings to the greatest affluence and power, and whom you therefore look upon as unanswerable instances of negligence in the gods, because you are ignorant of the purposes to which they are subservient, and in what manner they contribute to that supreme intention of good to the whole." Plato de Leg. x. 16.

This theory has been delivered of late, especially abroad, in a manner which subverts the freedom of human actions; whereas Plato appears very careful to preserve it, and has been in that respect imitated by the best of his followers.

Ver. 355. The best and fairest, &c.] This opinion is so old, that Timotheus Locrus calls the Supreme Being ἀριστὸς καὶ βελτίονος, "the artificer of that which is best;" and represents him as resolving in the beginning to produce the most excellent work, and as copying the world most exactly from his own intelligible and essential idea; so that it yet remains, as it was at first, perfect in beauty, and will never stand in need of any correction or improvement." There can be no room for a caution here, to understand the expressions, not of any particular circumstances of human life separately considered, but of the sum or universal system of life and being. See also the vision at the end of the Theodicee of Leibnitz.

Ver. 350. As flame ascends, &c.] This opinion, though not held by Plato nor any of the ancients, is yet a very natural consequence of his principles: But the disquisition is too complex and extensive to be entered upon here.

Ver. 18.

—where the powers

Of fancy, &c.] The influence of the imagination

gination on the conduct of life, is one of the most important points in moral philosophy. It were easy by an induction of facts to prove that the imagination directs almost all the passions, and mixes with almost every circumstance of action or pleasure. Let any man, even of the coldest head and soberest industry, analyze the idea of what he calls his interest; he will find that it consists chiefly of certain degrees of decency, beauty, and order, variously combined into one system, the idol which he seeks to enjoy by labour, hazard, and self-denial. It is on this account of the last consequence to regulate these images by the standard of nature and the general good; otherwise the imagination, by heightening some objects beyond their real excellence and beauty, or by representing others in a more odious or terrible shape than they deserve, may of course engage us in pursuits utterly inconsistent with the moral order of things.

If it be objected that this account of things supposes the passions to be merely accidental, whereas there appears in some a natural and hereditary disposition to certain passions prior to all circumstances of education or fortune; it may be answered, that though no man is born ambitious or a miser, yet he may inherit from his parents a peculiar temper or complexion of mind, which shall render his imagination more liable to be struck with some particular objects, consequently dispose him to form opinions of good and ill, and entertain passions of a particular turn. Some men, for instance, by the original frame of their minds, are more delighted with the vast and magnificent, others on the contrary, with the elegant and gentle aspects of nature. And it is very remarkable, that the disposition of the moral powers is always similar to this of the imagination; that those who are most inclined to admire prodigious and sublime objects in the physical world, are also most inclined to applaud examples of fortitude and heroic virtue in the moral. While those who are charmed rather with the delicacy and sweetness of colours, and forms, and sounds, never fail in like manner to yield the preference to the softer scenes of virtue and the sympathies of a domestic life. And this is sufficient to account for the objection.

Among the ancient philosophers, though we have several hints concerning this influence of the imagination upon morals among the remains of the Socratic school, yet the Stoics were the first who paid it a due attention. Zeno, their founder, thought it impossible to preserve any tolerable regularity in life, without frequently inspecting those pictures or appearances of things, which the imagination offers to the mind (Diog. Laërt. l. vii.) The meditations of M. Aurelius, and the discourses of Epictetus, are full of the same sentiment; inasmuch that the latter makes the Χρησις αἴα, διὰ φαντασιῶν or "right management of the "fancies," the only thing for which we are accountable to Providence, and without which a man is no other than stupid or frantic. Arrian. l. i. c. 12. & l. ii. c. 22. See also the Characteristics, vol. i. from p. 313. to 321. where this Stoical doctrine is embellished with all the elegance and graces of Plac.

Ver. 75.—or folly's awkward arts, &c.] Notwithstanding the general influence of ridicule on private and civil life, as well as on learning and the sciences, it has been almost constantly neglected or misrepresented by divines especially. The manner of treating these subjects in the science of human nature, should be precisely the same as in natural philosophy; from particular facts to investigate the stated order in which they appear, and then apply the general law, thus discovered, to the explication of other appearances and the improvement of useful arts.

Ver. 84. Behold the foremost band, &c.] The first and most general source of ridicule in the characters of men, is vanity, or self-applause for some desirable quality or possession which evidently does not belong to those who assume it.

Ver. 121. Then comes the second order, &c.] Ridicule from the same vanity, where, though the possession be real, yet no merit can arise from it because of some particular circumstances, which, though obvious to the spectator, are yet overlooked by the ridiculous character.

Ver. 152. Another tribe succeeds, &c.] Ridicule, from a notion of excellence in particular objects, disproportion'd to their intrinsic value, and inconsistent with the order of nature.

Ver. 191. But now, ye gay, &c.] Ridicule, from a notion of excellence, when the object is absolutely odious or contemptible. This is the highest degree of the ridiculous; as in the affectation of diseases or vices.

Ver. 207. Thus far triumphant, &c.] Ridicule from false shame or groundless fear.

Ver. 228. Last of the, &c.] Ridicule from the ignorance of such things as our circumstances require us to know.

Ver. 248.—Suffice it to have said, &c.] By comparing these general sources of ridicule with each other, and examining the ridiculous in other objects, we may obtain a general definition of it, equally applicable to every species. The most important circumstance of this definition is laid down in the lines referred to; but others more minute we shall subjoin here. Aristotle's account of the matter seems both imperfect and false; τὸ γὰρ γελοῖον, says he, ἐστὶν ἀμάρτημα τι καὶ αἰσχος, ἀνώδυτον καὶ ὁ φθαρτικόν: "the ridiculous is some certain fault or turpitude without pain, and not destructive to its subject." (Poet. c. 5.) For, allowing it to be true, as it is not, that the ridiculous is never accompanied with pain, yet we might produce many instances of such a fault or turpitude which cannot, with any tolerable propriety, be called ridiculous. So that the definition does not distinguish the thing designed. Nay farther; even when we perceive the turpitude tending to the destruction of its subject, we may still be sensible of a ridiculous appearance, till the ruin become imminent, and the keener sensations of pity or terror banish the ludicrous apprehension from our minds. For the sensation of ridicule is not a bare perception of the agreement or disagreement of ideas; but a passion or emotion of the mind consequential to that perception. So that the mind may perceive the agreement or disagreement, and yet not feel the ridiculous, because it is engrossed by a more violent emotion. Thus it happens that some men think those objects ridiculous, to which others cannot endure to apply the name; because in them they excite a much intenser and more important feeling. And this difference, among other causes, has brought a good deal of confusion into this question.

“That which makes objects ridiculous, is some ground of admiration or esteem connected with other more general circumstances comparatively worthless or deformed; or it is some circumstance of turpitude or deformity connected with what is in general excellent or beautiful: the inconsistent properties existing either in the objects themselves, or in the apprehension of the person to whom they relate; belonging always to the same order or class of beings; imply sentiment or design; and exciting no acute or vehement emotion of the heart.”

To prove the several parts of this definition: “The appearance of excellence or beauty connected with a general condition comparatively fordid or deformed,” is ridiculous: for instance, pompous pretensions of wisdom joined with ignorance or folly in the Socrates of Aristophanes; and the ostentations of military glory with cowardice and stupidity in the Thrafo of Terence.

“The appearance of deformity or turpitude in conjunction with what is in general excellent or venerable,” is also ridiculous; for instance, the personal weaknesses of a magistrate appearing in the solemn and public functions of his station.

“The incongruous properties may either exist in the objects themselves, or in apprehension of the person to whom they relate;” in the last-mentioned instance, they both exist in the objects; in the instances from Aristophanes and Terence, one of them is objective and real, the other only founded in the apprehension of the ridiculous character.

“The inconsistent properties must belong to the same order or class of being.” A coxcomb in fine clothes, bedaubed by accident in foul weather, is a ridiculous object; because his general apprehension of excellence and esteem is referred to the splendour and expence of his dress. A man of sense and merit, in the same circumstances, is not counted ridiculous: because the general ground of excellence and esteem in him is, both in fact, and in his own apprehension, of a very different species.

“Every ridiculous object implies sentiment or design.” A column placed by an architect without a capital or base, is laughed at: the same column in a ruin causes a very different sensation.

And lastly, “the occurrence must excite no acute or vehement emotion of the heart,” such as terror, pity, or indignation; for in that case, as was observed above, the mind is not at leisure to contemplate the ridiculous.

Whether any appearance not ridiculous be involved in this description, and whether it comprehend every species and form of the ridiculous, must be determined by repeated applications of it to particular instances.

Ver. 259. Ask we for what fair end, &c] Since it is beyond all contradiction evident that we have a natural sense or feeling of the ridiculous, and since so good a reason may be assigned to justify the Supreme Being for bestowing it; one cannot without astonishment reflect on the conduct of those men who imagine it is for the service of true religion to vilify and blacken it without distinction, and endeavour to persuade us that it is never applied but in a bad cause. Ridicule is not concerned with mere speculative truth or falsehood. It is not in abstract propositions or theorems, but in actions and passions, good and evil, beauty and deformity, that we find materials for it; and all these terms are relative, implying approbation or blame. To ask them whether ridicule be a test of truth, is, in other words, to ask whether that which is ridiculous can be morally true, can be just and becoming; or whether that which is just and becoming, can be ridiculous. A question that does not deserve a serious answer. For it is most evident, that, as in a metaphysical proposition offered to the understanding for its assent, the faculty of reason examines the terms of the proposition, and finding one idea, which was supposed equal to another, to be in fact unequal, of consequence rejects the proposition as a falsehood; so, in objects offered to the mind for its esteem or applause, the faculty of ridicule, finding an incongruity in the claim, urges the mind to reject it with laughter and contempt. When, therefore, we observe such a claim obtruded upon mankind, and the inconsistent circumstances carefully concealed from the eye of the public, it is our business, if the matter be of importance to society, to drag out those latent circumstances, and, by setting them in full view, to convince the world how ridiculous the claim is: and thus a double advantage is gained; for we both detect the moral falsehood sooner than in the way of speculative inquiry, and impress the minds of men with a stronger sense of the vanity and error of its authors. And this, and no more, is meant by the application of ridicule.

But it is said, the practice is dangerous, and may be inconsistent with the regard we owe to objects of real dignity and excellence. I answer, the practice fairly managed can never be dangerous; men may be dishonest in obtaining circumstances foreign to the object, and we may be inadvertent in allowing those circumstances to impose upon us; but the sense of ridicule always judges right. The Socrates of Aristophanes is as truly ridiculous a character as ever was drawn:—True; but it is not the character of Socrates, the divine moralist and father of ancient wisdom. What then? did the ridicule of the poet hinder the philosopher from detecting and disclaiming those foreign circumstances which he had falsely introduced into his character, and thus rendered the satirist doubly ridiculous in his turn? No; but it nevertheless had an ill influence on the minds of the people. And so has the reasoning of Spinoza made many atheists: he has founded it indeed on suppositions utterly false; but allow him these, and his conclusions are unavoidably true. And if we must reject the use of ridicule, because, by the imposition of false circumstances, things may be made to seem ridiculous, which are not so in themselves; why we ought not in the same manner to reject the use of reason, because, by proceeding on false principles, conclusions will appear true which are impossible in nature, let the vehement and obstinate declaimers against ridicule determine.

Ver. 593. Not a breeze, &c.] That this account may not appear rather poetically extravagant than just in philosophy, it may be proper to produce the sentiment of one of the greatest, wisest, and best of men on this head; one so little to be suspected of partiality in the case, that he reckons it among those favours for which he was especially thankful to the gods, that they had not suffered him to make any great proficiency in the arts of eloquence and poetry, lest by that means he should have been diverted from pursuits of more importance to his high station. Speaking of the beauty of universal nature, he observes, that “there is a pleasing and graceful aspect in every object we perceive,” when once we consider its connection with that general order. He instances in many things which at first sight would be thought rather deformities; and then adds, “that a man who enjoys a sensibility of temper with a just comprehension of the universal order—will discern many amiable things, not credible to every mind, but to those alone who have entered into an honourable familiarity with nature and her works.” M. Antonin. iii. 2.

THE PLEASURES OF THE IMAGINATION;

A POEM.

THE GENERAL ARGUMENT.

THE pleasures of the imagination proceed either from natural objects, as from a flourishing grove, a clear and murmuring fountain, a calm sea by moon light; or from works of art, such as a noble edifice, a musical tune, a statue, a picture, a poem. In treating of these pleasures, we must begin with the former class; they being original to the other; and nothing more being necessary, in order to explain them, than a view of our natural inclination toward greatness and beauty, and of those appearances, in the world around us, to which that inclination is adapted. This is the subject of the first book of the following poem.

But the pleasures which we receive from the elegant arts, from music, sculpture, painting, and poetry, are much more various and complicated. In them (besides greatness and beauty, or forms proper to the imagination) we find interwoven frequent representations of truth, of virtue and vice, of circumstances proper to move us with laughter, or to excite in us pity, fear, and the other passions. These moral and intellectual objects are described in the second book; to which the third properly belongs as an episode, though too large to have been included in it.

With the above-mentioned causes of pleasure, which are universal in the course of human life, and appertain to our higher faculties, many others do generally concur, more limited in their operation, or of an inferior origin: such are the novelty of objects, the association of ideas, affections of the bodily senses, influences of education, national habits, and the like. To illustrate these, and form the whole to determine the character of a perfect taste, is the argument of the fourth book.

Hitherto the pleasures of the imagination belong to the human species in general. But there are certain particular men whose imagination is endowed with powers, and susceptible of pleasures, which the generality of mankind never participate, these are the men of genius, destined by nature to excel in one or other of the arts already mentioned. It is proposed, therefore, in the last place, to delineate that genius which in some degree appears common to them all; yet with a more peculiar consideration of poetry: inasmuch as poetry is the most extensive of those arts, the most philosophical, and the most useful.

MDCCLVII.

THE subject proposed. Dedication. The ideas of the Supreme Being, the exemplars of all things.

The variety of constitution in the minds of men; with its final cause. The general character of a fine imagination. All the immediate pleasures of the human imagination proceed either from greatness or beauty in external objects. The pleasure from greatness; with its final cause. The natural connection of beauty with truth and good. The different orders of beauty in different objects. The infinite and all-comprehending form of beauty, which belongs to the divine mind. The partial and artificial forms of beauty, which belong to inferior intellectual beings. The origin and general conduct of beauty in man. The subordination of local beauties to the beauty of the universe. Conclusion.

WITH what enchantment nature's goodly scene
Attracts the sense of mortals; how the mind
For its own eye doth objects nobler still

Ye guardians of the sacred task, attend
Propitious. Hand in hand around your bard
Move in majestic measures, leading on
His doubtful step through many a solemn path
Conscious of secrets which to human sight
Ye only can reveal. Be great in him:
And let your favour make him wise to speak
Of all your wondrous empire; with a voice
So temper'd to his theme, that those, who hear,
May yield perpetual homage to yourselves.

Allur'd my heart, nor conscious whence they

Nor heedful of their end? yet serious truth

Have other tasks impos'd. To thee, my friend,
The ministry of freedom and the faith
Of popular decrees, in early youth,
Not vainly they committed. Me they sent
To wait on pain; and silent arts to urge,
Inglorious: not ignoble; if my cares,
To such as languish on a grievous bed,
Ease and the sweet forgetfulness of ill
Conciliate: nor delightful; if the muse

If some distinguish'd hours the bounteous muse
Impart, and grant (what she and she alone
Can grant to mortals) that my hand those wreaths
Of fame and honest favour, which the blest'd
Wear in Elysium, and which never felt
The breath of envy or malignant tongues,
That these my hand for thee and for myself
May gather. Meanwhile, O my faithful friend,
O early chosen, ever found the same,
And trusted and lov'd; once more the verse
Long destin'd, always obvious to thine ear,
Attend, indulgent. So in latest years, [cloth'd
When time thy head with honours shall have Sacred to even virtue, may thy mind,
Amid the calm review of seasons past,
Fair offices of friendship or kind peace,
Or public zeal, may then thy mind well-pleas'd
Recall these happy studies of our prime. [scends
From heaven my strains begin. From heaven de-
The flame of genius to the chosen breast,
And beauty with poetic wonder join'd,
And inspiration. Ere the rising sun
Shone o'er the deep, or 'mid the vault of night
The moon her silver lamp suspended: ere
The vales with springs were water'd, or with groves
Of oak or pine the ancient hills were crown'd;
Then the great spirit, whom his works adore,
Within his own deep essence view'd the forms,
The forms eternal of created things:
The radiant sun; the moon's nocturnal lamp;
The mountains and the streams; the ample stores
Of earth, of heaven, of nature. From the first,
On that full scene his love divine he fix'd
His admiration. Till, in time complete,
What he admir'd and lov'd his vital power
Unfolded into being. Hence the breath
Of life informing each organic frame:

Hence the green earth, and wild-resounding waves:
Hence light and shade alternate; warmth and cold;
And bright autumnal skies, and vernal showers,
And all the fair variety of things.

But not alike to every mortal eye
Is this great scene unveil'd. For while the claims
Of social life to different labours urge
The active powers of man, with wisest care
Hath nature on the multitude of minds
Impress'd a various bias; and to each
Decreed its province in the common toil.
To some she taught the fabric of the sphere,
The changeful moon, the circuit of the stars,
The golden zones of heaven. To some she gave
To search the story of eternal thought;
Of space and time; of fate's unbroken chain,
And will's quick movement. Others by the hand
She led o'er vales and mountains, to explore
What healing virtue dwells in every vein
Of herbs or trees. But some to nobler hopes
Were destin'd: some within a finer mould
She wrought, and temper'd with a purer flame.
To these the Sire Omnipotent unfolds,
In fuller aspects and with fairer lights,
This picture of the world. Through every part
They trace the lofty sketches of his hand:
In earth or air, the meadows flowery store,
The moon's mild radiance, or the virgin's mien
Dress'd in attractive smiles they see portray'd
(As far as mortal eyes the portrait scan)
Those lineaments of beauty which delight
The mind supreme. They also feel their force,
Enamour'd: they partake the eternal joy.
For as old Memnon's image long renown'd
Through fabling Egypt, at the genial touch
Of morning, from its inmost frame set forth
Spontaneous music; so doth nature's hand,
To certain attributes which matter claims,
Adapt the finer organs of the mind:
So the glad impulse of those kindred powers
(Of form, of colour's cheerful pomp, of sound
Melodious, or of motion aptly sped)
Detains th' enliven'd sense; till soon the soul
Feels the deep concord, and assents through all
Her functions. Then the charm by fate prepar'd
Diffuseth its enchantment. Fancy dreams,
Rapt into high discourse with prophets old,
And wandering through Elysium, fancy dreams
Of sacred fountains, of o'ershadowing groves,
Whose walks with godlike harmony resound:
Fountains, which Homer visits; happy groves,
Where Milton dwells. The intellectual power,
On the mind's throne, suspends his graver cares,
And smiles. The passions, to divine repose
Persuaded yield: and love and joy alone
Are waking: love and joy, such as await
An angel's meditation. O! attend,
Whoe'er thou art whom these delights can touch;
Whom nature's aspect, nature's simple garb,
Can thus command; O! listen to my song;
And I will guide thee to her blissful walks,
And teach thy solitude her voice to hear,
And point her gracious features to thy view.
Know then, whate'er of the world's ancient
Whate'er of mimic art's reflected scenes, [store,
With love and admiration thus inspire
Attentive fancy, her delighted sons

In two illustrious orders comprehend,
Self-taught. From him whose rustic toil the lark
Cheers warbling, to the bard whose daring thoughts
Range the full orb of being, still the form,
Which fancy worships, or sublime or fair
Her votaries proclaim. I see them dawn:
I see the radiant visions where they rise,
More lovely than when Lucifer displays
His glittering forehead through the gates of morn,
To lead the train of Phœbus and the spring.

Say, why was man so eminently rais'd
Amid the vast creation; why empower'd
Through life and death to dart his watchful eye,
With thoughts beyond the limit of his frame;
But that the Omnipotent might send him forth,
In sight of angels and immortal minds,
As on an ample theatre to join
In contest with his equals, who shall best
The task achieve, the course of noble toils,
By wisdom and by mercy preordain'd?
Might send him forth the sovran good to learn;
To chase each meaner purpose from his breast;
And through the mists of passion and of sense,
And through the pelting storms of chance and pain,

To hold strait on with constant heart and eye
Still fix'd upon his everlasting palm, [burns
The approving smile of heaven? Else wherefore
In mortal bosoms this unquenched hope,
That seeks from day to day sublimer ends;
Happy, though restless? Why departs the soul
Wide from the track and journey of her times,
To grasp the good she knows not? in the field
Of things which may be, in the spacious field
Of science, potent arts, or dreadful arms,
To raise up scenes in which her own desires
Contented may repose; when things, which are,
Pall on her temper, like a twice-told tale:
Her temper, still demanding to be free;
Spurning the rude control of wilful might;
Proud of her dangers brav'd, her grief endur'd,
Her strength severely prov'd? To these high aims,
Which reason and affection prompt in man,
Not adverse nor unapt hath nature fram'd
His bold imagination. For, amid
The various forms which this full world presents
Like rivals to his choice, what human breast
E'er doubts, before the transient and minute,
To prize the vast, the stable, the sublime?
Who, that from heights aerial sends his eye
Around a wild horizon, and surveys
Indus or Ganges rolling his broad wave [old,
Through mountains, plains, through spacious cities
And regions dark with woods; will turn away
To mark the path of some penurious rill
Which murmureth at his feet? Where does the Consent her soaring fancy to restrain [soul
Which bears her up as on an eagle's wings,
Destin'd for highest heaven; or which of fate's
Tremendous barriers shall confine her flight
To any humbler quarry? The rich earth
Cannot detain her; nor the ambient air
With all its changes. For a while with joy
She hovers o'er the sun, and views the small
Attendant orbs, beneath his sacred beam,
Emerging from the deep, like cluster'd isles
Whose rocky shores to the glad sailor's eye

Reflect the gleams of morning : for a while
 With pride she sees his firm, paternal sway
 Bend the reluctant planets to move each
 Round its perpetual year. But soon she quits
 That prospect : meditating loftier views,
 She darts adventurous up the long career
 Of comets ; through the constellations holds
 Her course, and now looks back on all the stars
 Whose blended flames as with a milky stream
 Part the blue region. Empyræan tracts,
 Where happy souls beyond their concave heaven
 Abide, she then explores, whence purer light
 For countless ages travels through the abyss
 Nor hath in sight of mortals yet arriv'd.
 Upon the wide creation's utmost shore
 At length she stands, and the dread space beyond
 Contemplates, half-recoiling ; nathless down
 The gloomy void, astonish'd, yet unquell'd,
 She plungeth ; down the unfathomable gulf
 Where God alone hath being. There her hopes
 Rest at the fated goal. For, from the birth
 Of human kind, the Sovereign Maker said
 That not in humble, nor in brief delight,
 Not in the fleeting echoes of renown,
 Power's purple robes, nor pleasure's flowery lap,
 The soul should find contentment ; but, from these
 Turning disdainful to an equal good,
 Through nature's opening walks enlarge her aim,
 Till every bound at length should disappear,
 And infinite perfection fill the scene.

But lo, where beauty, dress'd in gentler pomp,
 With comely steps advancing, claims the verse
 Her charms inspire. O beauty, source of praise,
 Of honour, even to mute and lifeless things ;
 O thou that kindlest in each human heart
 Love, and the wish of poets, when their tongue
 Would teach to other bosoms what so charms
 Their own ; O child of nature and the soul,
 In happiest hour brought forth ; the doubtful garb
 Of words, of earthly language, all too mean,
 Too lowly I account, in which to clothe
 Thy form divine. For thee the mind alone
 Beholds ; nor half thy brightness can reveal
 Through those dim organs, whose corporeal touch
 O'ershadoweth thy pure essence. Yet, my muse,
 If fortune call thee to the task, wait thou
 Thy favourable seasons : then, while fear
 And doubt are absent, through wide nature's bounds

Expatriate with glad step, and choose at will
 Whate'er bright spoils, the florid earth contains,
 What'er the waters, or the liquid air,
 To manifest unblemish'd beauty's praise,
 And o'er the breasts of mortals to extend
 Her gracious empire. Wilt thou to the isles
 Atlantic, to the rich Hesperian clime,
 Fly in the train of Autumn ; and look on,
 And learn from him ; while, as he roves around,
 Where'er his fingers touch the fruitful grove,
 The branches bloom with gold ; where'er his foot
 Imprints the soil, the ripening clusters swell,
 Turning aside their foliage, and come forth
 In purple lights till every hillock grows
 As with the blushes of an evening sky ?
 Or wilt thou that Thessalian landscape trace,
 Where slow Penæus his clear glassy tide
 Draws smooth along, between the winding cliffs

Of Ossa and the pathless woods unshorn
 That wave o'er huge Olympus ? Down the stream,
 Look how the mountains with their double range
 Embrace the vale of Tempe : from each side
 Ascending steep to heaven, a rocky mound
 Cover'd with ivy and the laurel boughs
 That crown'd young Phœbus for the Python slain.
 Fair Tempe ! on whose primrose banks the morn
 Awoke most fragrant, and the noon repos'd
 In pomp of lights and shadows most sublime : [yet
 Whose lawns, whose glades, ere human footsteps
 Had trac'd an entrance, were the hallow'd haunt
 Of sylvan powers immortal ; where they sat
 Oft in the golden age, the nymphs and fauns,
 Beneath some arbor branching o'er the flood,
 And leaning round hung on the instructive lips
 Of hoary Pan, or o'er some open dale
 Danc'd in light measures to his sevenfold pipe,
 While Zephyr's wanton hand along their path
 Flung showers of painted blossoms, fertile dews,
 And one perpetual Spring. But if our task
 More lofty rites demand, with all good vows
 Then let us hasten to the rural haunt
 Where young Melissa dwells. Nor thou refuse
 The voice which calls thee from thy lov'd retreat,
 But hither, gentle maid, thy footsteps turn :
 Here, to thy own unquestionable theme,
 O fair, O graceful, bend thy polish'd brow,
 Assenting ; and the gladness of thy eyes
 Impart to me, like morning's wished light
 Seen through the vernal air. By yonder stream,
 Where beech and elm along the bordering mead
 Send forth wild melody from every bough,
 Together let us wander ; where the hills
 Cover'd with fleeces to the lowing vale
 Reply ; where tidings of content and peace
 Each echo brings. Lo, how the western sun
 O'er fields and floods, o'er every living soul,
 Diffuseth glad repose ! There while I speak
 Of beauty's honours, thou, Melissa, thou
 Shalt hearken, not unconscious. While I tell
 How first from heaven she came : how after all
 The works of life, the elemental scenes,
 The hours, the seasons, she had oft explor'd,
 At length her favourite mansion and her throne
 She fix'd in woman's form : what pleasing ties
 To virtue bind her ; what effectual aid
 They lend each other's power ; and how divine
 Their union, should some ambitious maid,
 To all the enchantment of the Idalian queen,
 Add sanctity and wisdom : while my tongue
 Prolongs the tale, Melissa, thou may'st feign
 To wonder whence my rapture is inspir'd ;
 But soon the smile which dawns upon thy lip
 Shall tell it, and the tenderer bloom o'er all
 That soft cheek springing to the marble neck,
 Which bends aside in vain, revealing more
 What it would then keep silent, and in vain
 The sense of praise dissembling. Then my song
 Great nature's winning arts, which thus inform
 With joy and love the rugged breast of man,
 Should sound in numbers worthy of such a theme :
 While all whose souls have ever felt the force
 Of those enchanting passions, to my lyre
 Should throng attentive, and receive once more
 Their influence, unobscur'd by any cloud
 Of vulgar care, and purer than the hand

Of fortune can bestow; nor, to confirm
 Their sway, should awful contemplation scorn
 To join his dictates to the genuine strain
 Of pleasure's tongue; nor yet should pleasure's
 Be much averse. Ye chiefly, gentle band [fear
 Of youths and virgins, who through many a wish
 And many a fond pursuit, as in some scene
 Of magic bright and fleeting, are allur'd
 By various beauty; if the pleasing toil
 Can yield a moment's respite, hither turn
 Your favourable ear, and trust my words.
 I do not mean, on blest Religion's seat
 Presenting Superstition's gloomy form,
 To dash your soothing hopes: I do not mean
 To bid the jealous thunderer fire the heavens,
 Or shapes infernal rend the groaning earth,
 And scare you from your joys. My cheerful song
 With happier omens call you to the field,
 Pleas'd with your generous ardor in the chase,
 And warm like you. Then tell me (for ye know)
 Doth beauty ever deign to dwell where use
 And aptitude are strangers? is her praise
 Confess'd in aught whose most peculiar ends
 Are lame and fruitless? or did nature mean
 This pleasing call the herald of a lie,
 To hide the shame of discord and disease,
 And win each fond admirer into snares,
 Foil'd, baffled? No. With better providence
 The general mother, conscious how infirm
 Her offspring tread the paths of good and ill,
 Thus, to the choice of credulous desire,
 Deth objects the completest of their tribe
 Distinguish and commend. Yon flowery bank
 Cloth'd in the soft magnificence of spring,
 Will not the flocks approve it? will they ask
 The reedy fen for pasture? That clear rill
 Which trickleth murmuring from the mossy rock,
 Yields it wholesome beverage to the worn
 And thirsty traveller, than the standing pool
 With muddy weeds o'ergrown? Yon ragged vine
 Whose lean and sullen clusters mourn the rage
 Of Eurus, will the wine-press or the bowl
 Report of her, as of the swelling grape
 Which glitters through the tendrils, like a gem
 When first it meets the sun? Or what are all
 The various charms to life and sense adjoin'd?
 Are they not pledges of a state intire,
 Where native order reigns, with every part
 In health, and every function well perform'd?

Thus then at first was beauty sent from heaven,
 The lovely ministrers of truth and good
 In this dark world. For truth and good are one;
 And Beauty dwells in them, and they in her
 With like participation. Wherefore then,
 O sons of earth, would ye dissolve the tie?
 O! wherefore with a rash and greedy aim
 Seek ye to rove through every flattering scene
 Which beauty seems to deck, nor once inquire
 Where is the suffrage of eternal truth,
 Or where the seal of undeceitful good,
 To save your search from folly? Wanting these,
 Lo, beauty withers in your void embrace;
 And with the glittering of an idiot's toy
 Did fancy mock your vows. Nor yet let hope,
 That kindest inmate of the youthful breast,
 Be hence appall'd; be turn'd to coward sloth
 Sitting in silence, with dejected eyes

Incurious and with folded hands. Far less
 Let scorn of wild fantastic folly's dreams
 Or hatred of the bigot's savage pride
 Persuade you e'er that beauty, or the love
 Which waits on beauty, may not brook to hear
 The sacred lore of undeceitful good
 And truth eternal. From the vulgar crowd
 Though superstition, tyranness abhor'd,
 The reverence due to this majestic pair
 With threats and execration still demands;
 Though the tame wretch, who asks of her the way
 To their celestial dwelling, she constrains
 To quench or set at nought the lamp of God
 Within his frame; through many a cheerless wild
 Though forth she leads him credulous and dark,
 And aw'd with dubious notion; though at length
 Haply she plunge him into cloister'd cells
 And mansions unrelenting as the grave,
 But void of quiet, there to watch the hours
 Of midnight; there, amid the screaming owl's
 Dire song, with spectres or with guilty shades
 To talk of pangs and everlasting woe;
 Yet be not ye dismay'd. A gentler star
 Presides o'er your adventure. From the bower
 Where Wisdom sate with her Athenian sons,
 Could but my happy hand intwine a wreath
 Of Plato's olive with the Mantuan bay,
 Then (for what need of cruel fear to you,
 To you whom godlike love can well command?
 Then should my powerful voice at once dispel
 Those monkish horrors; should in words divine
 Relate how favour'd minds like you inspir'd,
 And taught their inspiration to conduct
 By rulling heaven's decree, through various walks
 And prospects various, but delightful all,
 Move onward; while now myrtle groves appear,
 Now arms and radiant trophies, now the rods
 Of empire with the curule throne, or now
 The domes of contemplation and the muse.
 Led by that hope sublime, whose cloudless eye
 Through the fair toils and ornaments of earth
 Discerns the nobler life reserv'd for heaven,
 Favour'd alike they worship round the shrine
 Where truth conspicuous with her sister-twins,
 The undivided partners of her sway,
 With good and beauty reigns. O! let not us
 By Pleasure's lying blandishments detain'd,
 Or crouching to the frowns of bigot Rage,
 O! let not us one moment pause to join
 That chosen band. And if the gracious power,
 Who first awaken'd my untutor'd song,
 Will to my invocation grant anew
 The tuneful spirit, then through all our paths
 Ne'er shall the found of this devoted lyre
 Be wanting; whether on the rosy mead
 When summer smiles, to warn the melting heart
 Of luxury's allurements; whether firm
 Against the torrent and the stubborn hill
 To urge free virtue's steps, and to her side
 Summon that strong divinity of soul
 Which conquers chance and fate: or on the height,
 The goal assign'd her, haply to proclaim
 Her triumph; on her brow to place the crown
 Of uncorrupted praise; through future worlds
 To follow her interminated way,
 And blest heaven's image in the heart of man.
 Such is the worth of beauty: such her power,

So blameless, so rever'd. It now remains,
In just gradation through the various ranks
Of being, to contemplate how her gifts
Rise in due measure, watchful to attend
The steps of rising nature. Last and least,
In colours mingling with a random blaze,
Doth beauty dwell. Then higher in the forms
Of simplest, easiest measure; in the bounds
Of circle, cube, or sphere. The third ascent
To symmetry adds colour: thus the pearl
Shines in the concave of its purple bed,
And painted shells along some winding shore
Catch with indented folds the glancing sun:
Next, as we rise, appear the blooming tribes
Which clothe the fragrant earth; which draw from her

Their own nutrition; which are born and die;
Yet, in their seed, immortal; such the flowers
With which young Maia pays the village-maids
That hail her natal morn; and such the groves
Which blithe Pomona rears on Vaga's bank,
To feed the bowels of Ariconian swains
Who quaff beneath her branches. Nobler still
Is beauty's name, where, to the full consent
Of members and of features, to the pride
Of colour, and the vital change of growth,
Life's holy flame with piercing sense is given,
While active motion speaks the temper'd soul;
So moves the bird of Juno: so the steed
With rival swiftness beats the dusty plain,
And faithful dogs with eager ears of joy
Salute their fellows. What sublimer pomp
Adorns the seat where virtue dwells on earth,
And truth's eternal day-light shines around;
What palm belongs to man's imperial front,
And woman powerful with becoming smiles,
Chief of terrestrial natures; need we now
Strive to inculcate? Thus hath beauty there
Her most conspicuous praise to matter lent,
Where most conspicuous through that shady veil
Breaks forth the bright expression of a mind:
By steps directing our enraptur'd search
To him, the first of minds; the chief, the sole;
From whom, through this wide, complicated world,
Did all her various lineaments begin;
To whom alone, consenting and intire,
At once their mutual influence all display.
He, God most high (bear witness, earth and heaven)
The living fountains in himself contains
Of beauteous and sublime. With him enthron'd
Ere days or years trod their ethereal way,
In his supreme intelligence inthron'd,
The queen of love holds her unclouded state,
Urania. Thee, O father, this extent
Of matter; thee the sluggish earth and tract
Of seas, the heavens and heavenly splendours feel
Pervading, quickening, moving. From the depth
Of thy great essence, forth didst thou conduct
Eternal form; and there, where Chaos reign'd,
Gav'st her dominion to erect her seat,
And sanctify the mansion. All her works
Well pleas'd thou didst behold. The gloomy fires
Of storm or earthquake, and the purest light
Of summer; soft Campania's new-born rose
And the slow weed, which pines on Russian hills,
Comely alike to thy full vision stand:
To thy surrounding vision, which unites

All essences and powers of the great world
In one sole order; fair alike they stand,
As features well consenting, and alike
Requir'd by nature ere she could attain
Her just resemblance to the perfect shape
Of universal beauty, which with thee
Dwelt from the first. Thou also, ancient mind,
Whom love and free beneficence await
In all thy doings; to inferior minds,
Thy offspring, and to man, thy youngest son,
Refusing no convenient gift nor good.
Their eyes didst open, in this earth, yon heaven,
Those starry worlds, the countenance divine
Of beauty to behold. But not to them
Didst thou her awful magnitude reveal
Such as before thine own unbounded sight
She stands (for never shall created soul
Conceive that object); nor, to all their kinds,
The same in shape or features didst thou frame
Her image. Measuring well their different spheres
Of sense and action, thy paternal hand
Hath for each race prepar'd a different test
Of beauty, own'd and reverenc'd as their guide
Most apt, most faithful. Thence inform'd, they scan

The objects that surround them; and select,
Since the great whole disclaims their scanty view,
Each for himself selects peculiar parts
Of nature; what the standard fix'd by heaven
Within his breast approves: acquiring thus
A partial beauty, which becomes his lot;
A beauty which his eye may comprehend,
His hand may copy: leaving, O supreme,
O thou whom none hath utter'd, leaving all
To thee that infinite, consummate form,
Which the great powers, the gods around thy throne

And nearest to thy counsels, know with thee
For ever to have been; but who she is,
Or what her likeness, know not. Man surveys
A narrower scene, where, by the mix'd effect
Of things corporeal on his passive mind,
He judgeth what is fair. Corporeal things
The mind of man impell with various powers,
And various features to his eye disclose.
The powers which move his sense with instant joy,
The features which attract his heart to love,
He marks, combines, reposes. Other powers
And features of the self-same thing (unless
The beauteous form, the creature of his mind,
Request their close alliance) he o'erlooks
Forgotten; or with self-beguiling zeal,
Whene'er his passions mingle in the work,
Half alters, half disowns. The tribes of men
Thus from their different functions and the shapes
Familiar to their eye, with art obtain,
Unconscious of their purpose, yet with art
Obtain the beauty fitting man to love:
Whose proud desires from nature's homely toil
Oft turn away, fastidious: asking still
His mind's high aid, to purify the form
From matter's gross communion; to secure
For ever, from the meddling hand of change
Or rude decay, her features; and to add
Whatever ornaments may suit her mien,
Where'er he finds them scatter'd though the paths
Of nature or of fortune. Then he seats

The accomplish'd image deep within his breast,
Reviews it, and accounts it good and fair.

Thus the one beauty of the world intire,
The universal Venus, far beyond
The keenest effort of created eyes,
And their most wide horizon, dwells enthron'd
In ancient silence. At her footstool stands
An altar burning with eternal fire
Unfullied, unconsum'd. Here every hour,
Here every moment, in their turns arrive
Her offspring; an innumerable band
Of sisters, comely all; but differing far
In age, in stature, and expressive mien,
More than bright Helen from her new-born babe.
To this maternal shrine in turns they come,
Each with her sacred lamp; that from the source
Of living flame, which here immortal flows,
Their portions of its lustre they may draw
For days, or months, or years; for ages, some;
As their great parent's discipline requires.
Then to their several mansions they depart,
In stars, in planets, through the unknown shores
Of yon ethereal ocean. Who can tell,
Even on the surface of this rolling earth,
How many make abode? The fields the groves,
The winding rivers, and the azure main,
Are render'd solemn by their frequent feet,
Their rites sublime. There each her destin'd home
Informs with that pure radiance from the skies
Brought down, and shines throughout her little Exulting. Strait, as travellers by night [sphere,
Turn towards a distant flame, so some fit eye,
Among the various tenants of the scene,
Discerns the heaven-born phantom seated there,
And owns her charms. Hence the wide universe,
Through all the seasons of revolving worlds,
Bears witness with its people, gods and men,
To beauty's blissful bower, and with the voice
Of grateful admiration still resounds:
That voice, to which is beauty's frame divine
As is the cunning of the master's hand
To the sweet accent of the well-tun'd lyre.

Genius of ancient Greece, whose faithful steps
Have led us to these awful solitudes
Of nature and of science; nurse rever'd
Of generous counsels and heroic deeds;
O! let some portion of thy matchless praise
Dwell in my breast, and teach me to adorn
This unattempted theme. Nor be my thoughts
Presumptuous counted, if amid the calm
Which Hesper sheds along the vernal heaven,
If I from vulgar superstition's walk,
Impatient steal, and from the unseemly rites
Of splendid adulation, to attend
With hymns thy presence in the sylvan shade,
By their malignant footsteps unprofan'd.
Come, O renowned power; thy glowing mien
Such, and so elevated all thy form,
As when the great barbaric lord, again
And yet again diminish'd, hid his face
Among the herd of satraps and of kings;
And, at the lightning of thy lifted spear,
Crouch'd like a slave. Bring all thy martial spoils;
Thy palms, thy laurels, thy triumphal songs,
Thy smiling band of arts, thy god-like fires
Of civil wisdom, thy unconquer'd youth
After some glorious day rejoicing round

Their new-erected trophy. Guide my feet
Through fair Lyceum's walk, the olive shades
Of Academus, and the sacred vale
Haunted by steps divine, where once beneath
That ever-living platane's ample boughs
Ilissus, by Socratic sounds detain'd,
On his neglected urn attentive lay;
While Boreas, lingering on the neighbouring sleep
With beauteous Orithylla, his love-tale
In silent awe suspended. There let me
With blameless hand, from thy unenvious fields,
Transplant some living blossoms, to adorn
My native clime: while, far beyond the meed
Of fancy's toil aspiring, I unlock
The springs of ancient Wisdom: while I add
(What cannot be disjoin'd from beauty's praise)
Thy name and native dress, thy works belov'd
And honour'd: while to my compatriot youth
I point the great example of thy sons,
And tune to Attic themes the British lyre.

BOOK II.

MDCCLXV.

INTRODUCTION to this more difficult part of the subject. Of truth and its three classes, matter of fact, experimental or scientific truth (contradistinguished from opinion), and universal truth: which last is either metaphysical or geometrical, either purely intellectual or perfectly abstracted. On the power of discerning truth depends that of acting with the view of an end; a circumstance essential to virtue. Of virtue considered in the divine mind as a perpetual and universal beneficence. Of human virtue, considered as a system of particular sentiments and actions, suitable to the design of providence and the condition of man; to whom it constitutes the chief good and the first beauty. Of vice and its origin. Of ridicule: its general nature and final cause. Of the passions; particularly of those which relate to evil, natural or moral, and which are generally accounted painful, though not always unattended with pleasure.

Thus far of beauty and the pleasing forms
Which man's untutor'd fancy, from the scenes
Imperfect of this ever-changing world,
Creates; and views, enamour'd. Now my song
Severer themes demand: mysterious truth;
And virtue, sovran good: the spells, the trains,
The progeny of error: the dreadful sway
Of passion; and whatever hidden stores
From her own lofty deeds and from herself
The mind acquires. Severer argument:
Not less attractive; nor deserving less
A constant ear. For what are all the forms
Educ'd by fancy from corporeal things,
Greatness, or pomp, or symmetry of parts?
Not tending to the heart, soon feeble grows,
As the blunt arrow 'gainst the knotty trunk,
Their impulse on the sense: while the pall'd eye
Expects in vain its tribute; asks in vain,
Where are the ornaments it once admired?
Not so the moral species, nor the powers
Of passion and of thought. The ambitious mind
With objects boundless as her own desires

Can there converse : by these unfading forms
 Touch'd and awaken'd still, with eager act
 She bends each nerve, and meditates well-pleas'd
 Her gifts, her godlike fortune. Such the scenes
 Now opening round us. May the destin'd verse
 Maintain its equal tenor, though in tracts
 Obscure and arduous ! May the source of light,
 All-present, all-sufficient, guide our steps
 Through every maze : and whom in childish years
 From the loud throng, the beaten paths of wealth
 And power, thou didst apart send forth to speak
 In tuneful words concerning highest things,
 Him still do thou, O Father, at those hours
 Of pensive freedom when the human soul
 Shuts out the rumour of the world, him still Touch thou with secret lessons : call thou back
 Each erring thought ; and let the yielding strains
 From his full bosom, like a welcome rill
 Spontaneous from its healthy fountain, flow !

But from what name, what favourable sign,
 What heavenly auspice, rather shall I date
 My perilous excursion, than from truth,
 That nearest inmate of the human soul ;
 Estrang'd from whom, the countenance divine
 Of man disfigur'd and dishonour'd sinks
 Among inferior things ? For to the brutes
 Perception and the transient boons of sense
 Hath fate imparted : but to man alone
 Of sublunary beings was it given
 Each fleeting impulse on the sensual powers
 At leisure to review ; with equal eye
 To scan the passion of the stricken nerve
 Or the vague object striking : to conduct
 From sense, the portal turbulent and loud,
 Into the mind's wide palace one by one
 The frequent, pressing, fluctuating forms,
 And question and compare them. Thus he learns
 Their birth and fortunes ; how allied the haunt
 The avenues of sense : what laws direct
 Their union ; and what various discords rise,
 Or fix'd or casual : which when his clear thought
 Retains and when his faithful words express,
 That living image of the external scene,
 As in a polish'd mirror held to view,
 Is truth : where'er it varies from the shape
 And hue of its exemplar, in that part
 Dim error lurks. Moreover, from without
 When oft the same society of forms
 In the same order have approach'd his mind,
 He deigns no more their steps with curious heed
 To trace ; no more their features or their garb
 He now examines ; but of them and their Condition, as with some diviner's tongue,
 Affirms what heaven in every distant place,
 Through every future season, will decree.
 This too is truth : where'er his prudent lips
 Wait till experience diligent and slow
 Has authoriz'd their sentence, this is truth ;
 A second, higher kind : the parent this
 Of science ; or the lofty power herself,
 Science herself : on whom the wants and cares
 Of social life depend ; the substitute
 Of God's own wisdom in this toilsome world ;
 The providence of man. Yet oft in vain,
 To earn her aid, with fixt and anxious eye
 He looks on nature's and on fortune's course :
 Too much in vain. His duller visual ray

The Willness and the persevering acts
 Of nature oft elude ; and fortune oft
 With step fantastic from her wonted walk
 Turns into mazes dim. His sight is foil'd ;
 And the crude sentence of his faltering tongue
 Is but opinion's verdict, half believ'd
 And prone to change. Here thou, who feel'st thine ear

Congential to my lyre's profounder tone,
 Pause, and be watchful. Hitherto the stores,
 Which feed thy mind and exercise her powers,
 Partake the relish of their native soil,
 Their parent earth. But know, a nobler dower
 Her fire at birth decreed her ; purer gifts
 From his own treasure ; forms which never deign'd

In eyes or ears to dwell, within the sense
 Of earthly organs ; but sublime were plac'd
 In his essential reason, leading there
 That vast ideal host which all his works
 Through endless ages never will reveal.
 Thus then endow'd, the feeble creature man,
 The slave of hunger, and the prey of death,
 Ev'n now, even here, in earth's dim prison bound,
 The language of intelligence divine
 Attains ; repeating oft concerning one
 And many, past and present, parts and whole,
 Those sov'reign dictates which in farthest heaven,
 Where no orb rolls, eternity's fix'd ear
 Hears from coeval truth, when chance nor change,
 Nature's loud progeny, nor nature's self
 Dares intermeddle or approach her throne.
 Ere long, o'er this corporeal world he learns
 To extend her sway ; while calling from the deep,
 From earth and air, their multitudes untold
 Of figures and of motions round his walk,
 For each wide family some single birth
 He sets in view, the impartial type of all
 Its brethren ; suffering it to claim, beyond
 Their common heritage, no private gift,
 No proper fortune. Then whate'er his eye
 In this discerns, his bold unerring tongue
 Pronounceth of the kindred, without bound,
 Without condition. Such the rise of forms
 Sequester'd far from sense and every spot
 Peculiar in the realms of space or time :
 Such is the throne which man for truth amidst
 The paths of mutability hath built
 Secure, unshaken, still ; and whence he views,
 In matter's mouldering structures, the pure forms
 Of triangle or circle, cube or cone,
 Impassive all ; whose attributes nor force
 Nor fate can alter. There he first conceives
 True being, and an intellectual world
 The same this hour and ever. Thence he deems
 Of his own lot ; above the painted shapes
 That fleeting move o'er this terrestrial scene
 Looks up ; beyond the adamant gates
 Of death expatiates ; as his birthright claims
 Inheritance in all the works of God ;
 Prepares for endless time his plan of life,
 And counts the universe itself his home.

Whence also but from truth, the light of minds,
 Is human fortune gladden'd with the rays
 Of virtue ? with the moral colours thrown
 On every walk of this our social scene,
 Adorning for the eye of gods and men

The passions, action, habitudes of life,
And rendering earth like heaven, a sacred place
Where love and praise may take delight to dwell?
Let none with heedless tongue from truth disjoin
The reign of virtue. Ere the day spring flow'd,
Like sisters link'd in concord's golden chain,
They stood before the great eternal mind
Their common parent; and by him were both
Sent forth among his creatures, hand in hand,
Inseparably join'd: nor e'er did truth
Find an apt ear to listen to her lore,
Which knew not virtue's voice; nor, save where truth's

Majestic words are heard and understood,
Doth virtue deign to inhabit. Go, inquire
Of nature: not among Tartarian rocks,
Whither the hungry vulture with its prey
Returns: not where the lion's fullen roar
At noon resounds along the lonely banks
Of ancient Tigris: but her gentler scenes,
The dove-cote and the shepherd's fold at morn,
Consult; or by a meadow's fragrant hedge,
In spring-time when the woodlands first are green,
Attend the linnet singing to his mate,
Couch'd o'er their tender young. To this fond care

Thou dost not virtue's honourable name
Attribute: wherefore, save that not one gleam
Of truth did e'er discover to themselves
Their little hearts, or teach them, by the effects
Of that parental love, the love itself
To judge, and measure its officious deeds?
But man, whose eyelids truth has fill'd with day,
Discerns how skilfully to bounteous ends
His wise affections move; with free accord
Adopts their guidance; yields himself secure
To nature's prudent impulse; and converts
Instinct to duty and to sacred law.
Hence right and fit on earth; while thus to man
The Almighty Legislator hath explain'd
The springs of action fix'd within his breast;
Hath given him power to slacken or restrain
Their effort; and hath shown him how they join
Their partial movements with the master-wheel
Of the great world, and serve that sacred end
Which he, the unerring reason, keeps in view.

For (if a mortal tongue may speak of him
And his dread ways) even as his boundless eye,
Connecting every form and every change,
Beholds the perfect beauty; so his will,
Through every hour producing good to all
The family of creatures, is itself
The perfect virtue. Let the grateful swain
Remember this, as oft with joy and praise
He looks upon the falling dews which clothe
His lawns with verdure, and the tender seed
Nourish within his furrows: when between
Dead seas and burning skies, where long unmov'd
The bark had languish'd, now a rustling gale
Lifts o'er the fickle waves her dancing prow,
Let the glad pilot, bursting out in thanks,
Remember this: lest blind o'erweening pride
Pollute their offerings: lest their selfish heart
Say to the heavenly ruler, "At our call
"Relents thy power: by us thy arm is mov'd."
Fools! who of God as of each other deem;
Who his inviolable acts deduce

From sudden counsels transient as their own;
Nor farther of his bounty, than the event
Which haply meets their loud and eager prayer,
Acknowledge; nor, beyond the drop minute
Which haply they have tasted, heed the source
That flows for all; the fountain of his love
Which, from the summit where he sits enthron'd,
Pours health and joy, unfailing streams, throughout
The spacious region flourishing in view,
The goodly work of his eternal day,
His own fair universe; on which alone
His counsels fix, and whence alone his will Assumes her strong direction. Such is now
His sov'reign purpose: such it was before
All multitude of years. For his right arm
Was never idle: his bestowing love
Knew no beginning; was not as a change
Of mood that woke at last and started up
After a deep and solitary sloth
Of boundless ages. No: he now is good,
He ever was. The feet of hoary time
Through their eternal course have travell'd o'er
No speechless, lifeless desert; but through scenes
Cheerful with bounty still; among a pomp
Of worlds, for gladness round the maker's throne
Loud-thouting, or, in many dialects
Of hope and filial trust, imploring thence
The fortunes of their people: where so fix'd
Where all the dates of being, so dispos'd
To every living soul of every kind
The field of motion and the hour of rest,
That each the general happiness might serve;
And by the discipline of laws divine
Convinc'd of folly or chastis'd from guilt,
Each might at length be happy. What remains Shall be like what is pass'd; but fairer still,
And still increasing in the godlike gifts
Of life and truth. The same paternal hand,
From the mute shell-fish gasping on the shore,
To men, to angels, to celestial minds,
Will ever lead the generations on
Through higher scenes of being: while, supply'd
From day to day by his enlivening breath
Inferior orders in succession rise
To fill the void below. As flame ascends,
As vapours to the earth in showers return,
As the pois'd ocean toward the attracting moon
Swells, and the ever-listening planets charm'd
By the sun's call their onward pace incline,
So all things which have life aspire to God,
Exhaustless fount of intellectual day,
Centre of souls. Nor doth the mastering voice
Of nature cease within to prompt aright
Their steps; nor is the care of heaven withheld
From sending to the toil external aid;
That in their stations all may persevere
To climb the ascent of being, and approach
For ever nearer to the life divine.

But this eternal fabric was not rais'd
For man's inspection. Though to some be given
To catch a transient visionary glimpse
Of that majestic scene which boundless power
Prepares for perfect goodness, yet in vain
Would human life her faculties expand
To imbosom such an object. Nor could e'er
Virtue or praise have touch'd the hearts of men.
Had not the sovereign guide, through every stage

Of this their various journey, pointed out
New hopes, new toils, which to their humble sphere

Of sight and strength might such importance hold
As doth the wide creation to his own.

Hence all the little charities of life,
With all their duties: hence that favourite palm
Of human will, when duty is suffic'd,
And still the liberal soul in ampler deeds
Would manifest herself; that sacred sign
Of her rever'd affinity to him

Whose bounties are his own; to whom none said,

"Create the wisest, fullest, fairest world,

"And make its offspring happy;" who, intent

Some likeness of himself among his works

To view, hath pour'd into the human breast

A ray of knowledge and of love, which guides

Earth's feeble race to act their Maker's part,

Self-judging, self-oblig'd: while, from before

That godlike function, the gigantic power

Necessity, though wont to curb the force

Of Chaos and the savage elements,

Retires abash'd, as from a scene too high

For her brute tyranny, and with her bears

Her scorned followers, terror, and base awe

Who blinds herself, and that ill-suited pair,

Obedience link'd with hatred. Then the soul

Arises in her strength; and, looking round

Her busy sphere, whatever work she views,

Whatever counsel bearing any trace

Of her Creator's likeness, whether apt

To aid her fellows or preserve herself

In her superior functions unimpair'd,

Thither she turns exulting: that she claims

As her peculiar good: on that, through all

The fickle seasons of the day, she looks

With reverence still: to that, as to a fence

Against affliction and the darts of pain,

Her drooping hopes repair: and, once oppos'd

To that, all other pleasure, other wealth

Vile, as the dross upon the molten gold,

Appears, and loathsome as the briny sea

To him who languishes with thirst, and sighs

For some known fountain pure. For what can strive

With virtue? which of nature's regions vast

Can in so many forms produce to sight

Such powerful beauty? beauty, which the eye

Of hatred cannot look upon secure:

Which envy's self contemplates, and is turn'd

Ere long to tenderness, to infant smiles,

Or tears of humblest love. Is aught so fair

In all the dewy landscapes of the spring,

The summer's noon-tide groves, the purple eve

At harvest-home, or in the frosty moon

Glittering on some smooth sea, is aught so fair

As virtuous friendship? as the honour'd roof

Whither from highest heaven immortal love

His torch ethereal and his golden bow

Propitious brings, and there a temple holds

To whose unspotted service gladly vow'd

The social band of parent, brother, child,

With smiles and sweet discourse and gentle deeds

Adore his power? What gift of richest clime

E'er drew such eager eyes, or prompted such

Deep wishes, as the zeal that snatcheth back

From slander's poisonous tooth a foe's renown;

Or crosseth danger in his lion-walk,

A rival's life to rescue? as the young

Athenian warrior sitting down in bonds,

That his great father's body might not want

A peaceful, humble tomb? the Roman wife

Teaching her lord how harmless was the wound

Of death, how impotent the tyrant's rage,

Who nothing more could threaten to afflict

Their faithful love? Or is there in the abyss,

Is there, among the adamantine spheres

Wheeling unshaken through the boundless void,

Aught that with half such majesty can fill

The human bosom, as when Brutus rose

Refulgent from the stroke of Cæsar's fate

Amid the crowd of patriots; and, his arm

Aloft extending like eternal Jove

When guilt brings down the thunder, call'd aloud

On Tully's name, and shook the crimson sword

Of justice in his rapt astonish'd eye,

And bad the father of his country hail,

For so the tyrant prostrate on the dust,

And Rome again is free? Thus, through the paths

Of human life, in various pomp array'd

Walks the wise daughter of the Judge of heaven,

Fair virtue; from her Father's throne supreme

Sent down to utter laws, such as on earth

Most apt he knew, most powerful to promote

The weal of all his works, the gracious end

Of his dread empire. And though haply man's

Obscure sight, so far beyond himself

And the brief labours of his little home,

Extends not; yet, by the bright presence won

Of this divine instructress, to her sway

Pleas'd he assents, nor heeds the distant goal

To which her voice conducts him. Thus hath
God,

Still looking toward his own high purpose, fix'd

The virtues of his creatures; thus he rules

The parent's fondness and the patriot's zeal;

Thus the warm sense of honour and of shame;

The vows of gratitude, the faith of love;

And all the comely intercourse of praise,

The joy of human life, the earthly heaven.

How far unlike them must the lot of guilt

Be found! Or what terrestrial woe can match

The self-convicted bosom, which hath wrought

The bane of others, or enslav'd itself

With shackles vile? Not poison, nor sharp fire

Nor the worst pangs that ever monkish hate

Suggested, or despotic rage impos'd,

Were at that season an unwish'd exchange:

When the soul loaths herself: when, flying thence

To crowds, on every brow she sees portray'd

Fell demons, hate or scorn, which drive her back

To solitude, her judge's voice divine

To hear in secret, haply sounding through

The troubled dreams of midnight, and still, still

Demanding for his violated laws

Fit recompense, or charging her own tongue

To speak the award of justice on herself.

For well she knows what faithful hints within

Were whisper'd to beware the lying forms

Which turn'd her footsteps from the safer way:

What cautions to suspect their painted dross,

And look with steady eyelid on their smiles,

Their frowns, their tears. In vain. The dazzling hues

Of fancy, and opinion's eager voice,
 Too much prevail'd. For mortals tread the path
 In which opinion says they follow good
 Or fly from evil: and opinion gives
 Report of good or evil, as the scene
 Was drawn by fancy, pleasing or deform'd:
 Thus her report can never there be true
 Where fancy cheats the intellectual eye
 With glaring colours and distorted lines.
 Is there a man to whom the name of death
 Brings terror's ghastly pageants conjur'd up
 Before him, death-bed groans, and dismal vows,
 And the frail soul plung'd headlong from the brink
 Of life and day-light down the glomy air,
 An unknown depth, to gulfs of torturing fire
 Unvisited by mercy? Then what hand
 Can snatch this dreamer from the fatal toils
 Which fancy and opinion thus conspire
 To twine around his heart? or who shall hush
 Their clamour, when they tell him that to die,
 To risk those horrors, is a direr curse
 Than basest life can bring? Though love with prayers

Most tender, with affliction's sacred tears,
 Beseech his aid; though gratitude and faith
 Condemn each step which loiters; yet let none
 Make answer for him that, if any frown
 Of danger thwart his path, he will not stay,
 Content, and be a wretch to be secure.
 Here vice begins then: at the gate of life,
 Ere the young multitude to diverse roads,
 Part, like fond pilgrims on a journey unknown,
 Sits fancy, deep enchantress; and to each
 With kind maternal looks presents her bowl,
 A potent beverage. Heedless they comply:
 Till the whole soul from that mysterious draught
 Is ting'd, and every transient thought imbibes
 Of gladness or disgust, desire or fear,
 One homebred colour: which not all the lights
 Of science e'er shall change; not all the storms
 Of adverse fortune wash away, nor yet
 The robe of purest virtue quite conceal.
 Thence on they pass, where meeting frequent
 shapes

Of good and evil, cunning phantoms apt
 To fire or freeze the breast, with them they join
 In dangerous parley; listening oft, and oft
 Gazing with reckless passion, while its garb
 The spectre heightens, and its pompous tale
 Repeats with some new circumstance to suit
 That early tincture of the hearer's soul.
 And should the guardian, reason, but for one
 Short moment yield to this illusive scene
 His ear and eye the intoxicating charm
 Involves him, till no longer he discerns,
 Or only guides to err. Then revel forth
 A furious band that spurn him from the throne,
 And all is uproar. Hence ambition climbs
 With sliding feet and hands impure, to grasp
 Those solemn toys which glitter in his view
 On fortune's rugged steep: hence pale revenge
 Unsheaths her murderous dagger: Rapine hence
 And envious lust, by venal fraud upborne,
 Surmount the reverend barrier of the laws
 Which kept them from their prey: hence all the crimes
 That e'er defil'd the earth, and all the plagues

That follow them for vengeance, in the guise
 Of honour, safety, pleasure, ease, or pomp,
 Stole first into the fond believing mind.

Yet not by fancy's witchcraft on the brain
 Are always the tumultuous passions driven
 To guilty deeds, nor reason bound in chains
 That vice alone may lord it. Oft, adorn'd,
 With motley pageants, folly mounts his throne,
 And plays her idiot antics, like a queen.
 A thousand garbs she wears; a thousand ways
 She whirls her giddy empire. Lo, thus far
 With bold adventure to the Mantuan lyre
 I sing for contemplation link'd with love
 A pensive theme. Now haply should my song
 Unbend that serious countenance, and learn
 Thalia's tripping gait, her shrill-ton'd voice,
 Her wiles familiar: whether scorn she darts
 In wanton ambush from her lip or eye,
 Or whether with a sad disguise of care,
 O'ermentling her gay brow, she acts in sport
 The deeds of folly, and from all sides round
 Calls forth impetuous laughter's gay rebuke;
 Her province. But through every comic scene
 To lead my muse with her light pencil arm'd;
 Through every swift occasion which the hand
 Of laughter points at, when the mirthful sting
 Distends her labouring sides and chokes her tongue;
 Were endless as to sound each grating note
 With which the rooks, and chattering daws, and Unwieldy inmates of the village pond, [grave
 The changing seasons of the sky proclaim;
 Sun, cloud, or shower. Suffice it to have said,
 Where'er the power of ridicule displays
 Her quaint ey'd visage, some incongruous form,
 Some stubborn dissonance of things combin'd,
 Strikes on her quick perception: whether pomp,
 Or praise, or beauty be dragg'd in and shown
 Where sordid fashions, where ignoble deeds,
 Where foul deformity is wont to dwell;
 Or whether these with shrewd and wayward spite
 Invade resplendent pomps imperious mien,
 The charms of beauty, or the boast of praise.

Ask we for what fair end the almighty fire
 In mortal bosoms stirs this gay contempt,
 These grateful pangs of laughter; from disgust
 Educating pleasure? Wherefore, but to aid
 The tardy steps of reason, and at once
 By this prompt impulse urge us to depress
 Wild folly's aims? For though the sober light
 Of truth slow dawning on the watchful mind
 At length unfolds, through many a subtle tie,
 How these uncouth disorders end at last
 In public evil; yet benignant heaven,
 Conscious how dim the dawn of truth appears
 To thousands, conscious what a scanty pause
 From labour and from care the wider lot
 Of humble life affords for studious thought
 To scan the maze of nature, therefore stamp'd
 These glaring scenes with characters of scorn,
 As broad, as obvious to the passing clown
 As to the letter'd sage's curious eye.

But other evils o'er the steps of man
 Through all his walks impend; against whose might
 The slender darts of laughter nought avail:
 A trivial warfare. Some, like cruel guards,
 On nature's ever-moving throne attend;
 With mischief arm'd for him whome'er shall thwart

The path of her inexorable wheels,
While she pursues the work that must be done
Through ocean, earth, and air. Hence frequent forms

Of woe; the merchant, with his wealthy bark,
Bury'd by dashing waves; the traveller
Pierc'd by the pointed lightning in his haste;
And the poor husbandman, with folded arms,
Surveying his lost labours, and a heap
Of blasted chaff the product of the field
Whence he expected bread. But worse than these
I deem, far worse, that other race of ills
Which human kind rear up among themselves;
That horrid offspring which misgovern'd will
Bears to fantastic error; vices, crimes,
Furies that curse the earth, and make the blows,
The heaviest blows, of nature's innocent hand
Seem sport; which are indeed but as the care
Of a wise parent, who solicits good
To all her house, though haply at the price
Of tears and froward wailing and reproach
For some unthinking child, whom not the less
Its mother destines to be happy still.

These sources then of pain, this double lot
Of evil in the inheritance of man,
Requir'd for his protection no slight force,
No careless watch. And therefore was his breast
Fenc'd round with passions quick to be alarm'd,
Or stubborn to oppose; with fear more swift
Than beacons catching flame from hill to hill,
Where armies land; with anger, uncontroll'd
As the young lion bounding on his prey;
With sorrow, that locks up the struggling heart;
And shame, that overcasts the drooping eye
As with a cloud of lighting. These the part
Perform of eager monitors, and goad
The soul more sharply than with points of steel,
Her enemies to shun or to resist.

And as those passions, that converse with good,
Are good themselves; as hope and love and joy,
Among the fairest and the sweetest boons
Of life, we rightly count: so these, which guard
Against invading evil, still excite
Some pain, some tumult: these, within the mind
Too oft admitted or too long retain'd,
Shock their frail seat, and by their uncurb'd rage
To savages more fell than Libya breeds
Transform themselves; till human thought becomes
A gloomy ruin, haunt of shapes unblest'd,
Of self-tormenting fiends; horror, despair,
Hatred, and wicked envy: foes to all
The works of nature, and the gifts of heaven.

But when through blameless paths to righteous ends

Those keener passions urge the awaken'd soul,
I would not, as ungracious violence,
Their sway describe, nor from their free career
The fellowship of pleasure quite exclude.
For what can render, to the self-approv'd,
Their temper void of comfort, though in pain?
Who knows not with what majesty divine
The forms of truth and justice to the mind
Appear, ennobling oft the sharpest woe
With triumph and rejoicing? Who, that bears
A human bosom, hath not often felt
How dear are all those ties which bind our race
In gentleness together, and how sweet

Their force, let fortune's wayward hand the while
Be kind or cruel? Ask the faithful youth
Why the cold urn, of her whom long he lov'd,
So often fills his arms; so often draws
His lonely footsteps, silent and unseen,
To pay the mournful tribute of his tears?
Oh! he will tell thee that the wealth of worlds
Should ne'er seduce his bosom to forego
Those sacred hours, when, stealing from the noise
Of care and envy, sweet remembrance soothes
With virtue's kindest looks his aching breath,
And turns his tears to rapture. Ask the crowd
Which flies impatient from the village walk
To climb the neighbouring cliffs, when far below
The savage winds have hurl'd upon the coast
Some helpless bark; while holy pity melts
The general eye, or terror's icy hand
Smites their distorted limbs and horrent hair;
While every mother closer to her breast
Catcheth her child, and, pointing where the waves
Foam through the shatter'd vessel, shrieks aloud
As one poor wretch, who spreads his piteous arms
For succour, swallow'd by the roaring surge,
As now another, dash'd against the rock,
Drops lifeless down. O! deemest thou indeed
No pleasing influence here by nature given
To mutual terror and compassion's tears?
No tender charm mysterious, which attracts
O'er all that edge of pain the social powers
To this their proper action and their end?
Ask thy own heart; when, at the midnight hour,
Slow through that pensive gloom thy pausing eye,
Led by the glimmering taper, moves around
The reverend volumes of the dead, the songs
Of Grecian bards, and records writ by fame
For Grecian heroes, where the sov'reign power
Of heaven and earth surveys the immortal page
Even as a father meditating all
The praises of his son, and bids the rest
Of mankind there the fairest model learn
Of their own nature, and the noblest deeds
Which yet the world hath seen. If then thy soul
Join in the lot of those diviner men;
Say, when the prospect darkens on thy view;
When, sunk by many a wound, heroic states
Mourn in the dust, and tremble at the frown
Of hard ambition; when the generous band
Of youths who fought for freedom and their fires
Lie side by side in death; when brutal force
Usurps the throne of justice, turns the pomp
Of guardian power, the majesty of rule,
The sword, the laurel, and the purple robe,
To poor dishonest pageants, to adorn
A robber's walk, and glitter in the eyes
Of such as bow the knee; when beauteous works,
Rewards of virtue, sculptur'd forms which deck'd
With more than human grace the warrior's arch
Or patriot's tomb, now victims to appease
Tyrannic envy, strew the common path
With awful ruins; when the muse's haunt,
The marble porch where wisdom wont to talk
With Socrates or Tully, hears no more
Save the hoarse jargon of contentious monks,
Or female superstition's midnight prayer;
When ruthless havoc from the hand of time
Tears the destroying scythe, with surer stroke
To mow the monuments of glory down;

Till desolation o'er the grass-grown street
 Expands her raven wings, and, from the gate
 Where senates once the weal of nation's plann'd,
 Hisseth the gliding snake through hoary weeds
 That clasp the mouldering column: thus when all
 The widely mournful scene is fix'd within
 Thy throbbing bosom; when the patriot's tear
 Starts from thine eye, and thy extended arm
 In fancy hurls the thunderbolt of Jove
 To fire the impious wreath on Philip's brow,
 Or dash Octavius from the trophied car;
 Say, doth thy secret soul repine to taste
 The big distress? or wouldst thou then exchange
 Those heart-ennobling sorrows for the lot
 Of him who sits amid the gaudy herd
 Of silent flatterers bending to his nod,
 And o'er them, like a giant, casts his eye,
 And says within himself, "I am a king,
 "And wherefore should the clamorous voice of woe
 "Intrude upon mine ear?" The dregs corrupt
 Of barbarous ages, that Circean draught
 Of servitude and folly, have not yet,
 Bless'd be the eternal ruler of the world!
 Yet have no so dishonour'd, so deform'd
 The native judgment of the human soul,
 Nor so effac'd the image of her fire.

B O O K III.

MDCCLXX.

WHAT tongue then may explain the various fate
 Which reigns o'er earth? or who to mortal eyes
 Illustrate this perplexing labyrinth
 Of joy and woe through which the feet of man
 Are doom'd to wander? That eternal mind
 From passions, wants, and envy far estrang'd
 Who built the spacious universe, and deck'd
 Each part so richly with whate'er pertains
 To life, to health, to pleasure; why bade he
 The viper evil, creeping in, pollute
 The goodly scene, and with insidious rage,
 While the poor inmate looks around and smiles,
 Dart her fell sting with poison to his soul?
 Hard is the question, and from ancient days
 Hath still oppress'd with care the sage's thought;
 Hath drawn forth accents from the poet's lyre
 Too sad, too deeply plaintive: nor did e'er
 Those chiefs of human kind, from whom the light
 Of heavenly truth first gleam'd on barbarous lands,
 Forget this dreadful secret when they told
 What wondrous things had to their favour'd eyes
 And ears on cloudy mountain been reveal'd,
 Or in deep cave by nymph or power divine,
 Portentous oft and wild. Yet one I know,
 Could I the speech of lawgivers assume,
 One old and splendid tale I would record
 With which the muse of Solon in sweet strains
 Adorn'd this theme profound, and render'd all
 Its darkness, all its terrors, bright as noon,
 Or gentle as the golden star of eve.
 Who knows not Solon? last, and wisest far,
 Of those whom Greece triumphant in the height
 Of glory, styl'd her fathers? him whose voice
 Through Athens hush'd the storm of civil wrath;
 Taught envious want and cruel wealth to join

In friendship; and, with sweet compulsion, tam'd
 Minerva's eager people to his laws,
 Which their own goddess in his breast inspir'd?

'Twas now the time when his heroic task
 Seem'd but perform'd in vain: when sooth'd by
 Of flattering service, the fond multitude [years
 Hung with their sudden counsels on the breath
 Of great Pisistratus: that chief renown'd,
 Whom Hermes and the Idalian queen had train'd
 Even from his birth to every powerful art
 Of pleasing and persuading: from whose lips
 Flow'd eloquence, which like the vows of love
 Could steal away suspicion from the hearts
 Of all who listen'd. Thus from day to day
 He won the general suffrage, and beheld
 Each rival overshadow'd and depress'd
 Beneath his ampler state: yet oft complain'd,
 As one less kindly treated, who had hop'd
 To merit favour, but submits perforce
 To find another's services prefer'd,
 Nor yet relaxeth aught of faith or zeal.
 Then tales were scatter'd of his envious foes,
 Of snares that watch'd his fame, of daggers aim'd
 Against his life. At last with trembling limbs,
 His hair diffus'd and wild, his garments loose,
 And stain'd with blood from self inflicted wounds,
 He burst into the public place, as there,
 There only, were his refuge; and declar'd
 In broken words, with sighs of deep regret,
 The mortal danger he had scarce repell'd.
 Fir'd with his tragic tale, the indignant crowd,
 To guard his steps, forthwith a menial band,
 Array'd beneath his eye for deeds of war,
 Decree. O still too liberal of their trust,
 And oft betray'd by over-grateful love,
 The generous people! Now behold him fenc'd
 By mercenary weapons, like a king
 Forth issuing from the city gate at eve
 To seek his rural mansion, and with pomp
 Crowding the public road. The swain stops short,
 And sighs: the officious townsmen stand at gaze
 And shrinking give the fallen pageant room.
 Yet not the less obsequious was his brow;
 Nor less profuse of courteous words his tongue,
 Of gracious gifts his hand: the while by stealth,
 Like a small torrent fed with evening showers,
 His train increas'd. Till, at that fatal time
 Just as the public eye with doubt and shame
 Startled, began to question what it saw,
 Swift as the sound of earthquakes rush'd a voice
 Through Athens, that Pisistratus had fill'd
 The rocky citadel with hostile arms,
 Had bar'd the steep ascent, and sat within Amid his hirelings, meditating death
 To all whose stubborn necks his yoke refus'd.
 Where then was Solon? After ten long years
 Of absence, full of haste from foreign shores
 The sage, the lawgiver, had now arriv'd:
 Arriv'd, alas, to see that Athens, that
 Fair temple rais'd by him and sacred call'd
 To Liberty and Concord, now profan'd,
 By savage hate, or sunk into a den
 Of slaves who crouch beneath the master's scourge,
 And deprecate his wrath and court his chains.
 Yet did not the wise patriot's grief impede
 His virtuous will, nor was his heart inclin'd
 One moment with such woman-like distress

To view the transient storms of civil war,
 As thence to yield his country and her hopes
 To all-devouring bondage. His bright helm,
 Ev'n while the traitor's impious act is told,
 He buckles on his hoary head: he girds [spear
 With mail his stooping breast: the shield, the
 He snatcheth; and with swift indignant strides
 The assembled people seeks: proclaims aloud
 It was no time for counsel: in their spears
 Lay all their prudence now: the tyrant yet
 Was not so firmly seated on his throne,
 But that one shock of their united force
 Would dash him from the summit of his pride
 Headlong and groveling in the dust. What else
 Can reassert the lost Athenian name
 So cheaply to the laughter of the world
 Betray'd; by guile beneath an infant's faith [now
 So mock'd and scorn'd? Away, then: freedom
 And safety dwell not but with fame in arms:
 Myself will show you where their mansion lies,
 And through the walks of danger or of death
 Conduct you to them. While he spake, through all
 Their crowded ranks his quick sagacious eye
 He darted; where no cheerful voice was heard
 Of social daring; no stretch'd arm was seen
 Hastening their common talk: but pale mistrust
 Wrinkled each brow: they shook their heads, and down [doubts
 Their slack hands hung: cold sighs and whisper'd
 From breath to breath stole round. The sage meantime

Look'd speechless on, while his big bosom heav'd
 Struggling with shame and sorrow: till at last
 A tear broke forth; and, O immortal shades!
 O Theseus! he exclaim'd, O Codrus, where,
 Where are ye now? behold for what ye toil'd
 Through life! behold for whom ye chose to die!
 No more he added; but with lonely steps
 Weary and slow, his silver beard depress'd,
 And his stern eyes bent heedless on the ground,
 Back to his silent dwelling he repair'd.
 There o'er the gate, his armour, as a man
 Whom from the service of the war his chief
 Dismisseth after no inglorious toil,
 He fix'd in general view. One wishful look
 He sent, unconscious, toward the public place
 At parting: then beneath his quiet roof
 Without a word, without a sigh, retir'd.

Scarce had the morrow's sun his golden rays
 From sweet Hymettus darted o'er the fanes
 Of Cecrops to the Salaminian shores,
 When lo, on Solon's threshold met the feet
 Of four Athenians by the same sad care
 Conducted all: than whom the state beheld
 None nobler. First came Megacles, the son
 Of great Alcmaeon, whom the Lydian king,
 The mild, unhappy Cræsus, in his days
 Of glory had with costly gifts adorn'd,
 Fair vessels, splendid garments, tinctur'd webs,
 And heaps of treasur'd gold beyond the lot
 Of many sov'reigns; thus requitting well
 That hospitable favour which erewhile
 Alcmaeon to his messengers had shown,
 Whom he with offerings worthy of the God
 Sent from his throne in Sardis to revere
 Apollo's Delphic shrine. With Megacles
 Approach'd his son, whom Agarista bore,
 The virtuous child of Clithenes whose hand

Of Grecian sceptres the most ancient far
 In Sicyon sway'd: but greater fame he drew
 From arms control'd by justice, from the love
 Of the wise muses, and the unenvied wreath
 Which glad Olympia gave. For thither once
 His warlike steeds the hero led, and there
 Contended through the tumult of the course
 With skilful wheels. Then victor at the goal,
 Amid the applauses of assembled Greece,
 High on his car he stood and wav'd his arm.
 Silence ensued: when strait the herald's voice
 Was heard, inviting every Grecian youth,
 Whom Clithenes content might call his son
 To visit, ere twice thirty days were pass'd,
 The towers of Sicyon. There the chief decreed,
 Within the circuit of the following year,
 To join at Hymen's altar, hand in hand
 With his fair daughter, him among the guests
 Whom worthiest he should deem. Forthwith from all [came

The bounds of Greece the ambitious wooers
 From rich Hesperia; from the Illyrian shore
 Where Epidamnus over Adria's surge
 Looks on the setting sun; from those brave tribes
 Chaonian or Molossian whom the race
 Of great Achilles governs, glorying still
 In Troy o'erthrown; from rough Ætolia, nurse
 Of men who first among the Greeks threw off
 The yoke of kings, to commerce and to arms
 Devoted; from Thessalia's fertile meads,
 Where flows Peneus near the lofty walls
 Of Cranon old; from strong Eretria, queen
 Of all Eubœan cities, who, sublime
 On the steep margin of Euripus, views
 Across the tide the Marathonian plain,
 Nor yet the haunt of glory. Athens too,
 Minerva's care, among her graceful sons
 Found equal lovers for the princely maid:
 Nor was proud Argos wanting; nor the domes
 Of sacred Elis; nor the Arcadian groves
 That overshadow Alphæus, echoing oft
 Some shepherd's song. But through the illustrious band

Was none who might with Megacles compare
 In all the honours of unblemish'd youth.
 His was theauteous bride: and now their son
 Young Clithenes, betimes, at Solon's gate
 Stood anxious; leaning forward on the arm
 Of his great fire, with earnest eyes that ask'd
 When the slow hinge would turn, with restless feet, [heart
 And cheeks now pale, now glowing: for his
 Throbb'd, full of bursting passions, anger, grief
 With scorn imbitter'd, by the generous boy
 Scarce understood, but which, like noble seeds,
 Are destin'd for his country and himself
 In riper years to bring forth fruits divine
 Of liberty and glory. Next appear'd
 Two brave companions whom one mother bore
 To different lords; but whom the better ties
 Of firm esteem and friendship render'd more
 Than brothers: first Miltiades, who drew
 From godlike Æacus his ancient line;
 That Æacus whose unimpeach'd renown
 For sanctity and justice won the lyre
 Of elder bards to celebrate him thron'd
 In Hades o'er the dead, where his decrees
 The guilty soul within the burning gates

Of Tartarus compel, or send the good
To inhabit with eternal health and peace
The vallies of Elysium. From a stem
So sacred, ne'er could worthier scyon spring
Than this Miltiades; whose aid erelong
The chiefs of Thrace, already on their ways
Sent by the inspir'd foreknowing maids who sit
Upon the Delphic tripod, shall implore
To wield their sceptre, and the rural wealth
Of fruitful Chersonesus to protect
With arms and laws. But, nothing careful now
Save for his injur'd country, here he stands
In deep solicitude with Cymon join'd:
Unconscious both what widely different lots
Await them, taught by nature as they are
To know one common good, one common ill.
For Cymon not his valour, not his birth
Deriv'd from Codrus, not a thousand gifts
Dealt round him with a wise, benignant hand,
No, not the Olympic olive by himself
From his own brow transferr'd to sooth the mind
Of this Pisistratus, can long preserve
From the fell envy of the tyrant's sons,
And their assassin dagger. But if death
Obscure upon his gentle steps attend,
Yet fate an ample recompense prepares
In his victorious son, that other great
Miltiades, who o'er the very throne
Of glory shall with time's assiduous hand
In adamant characters engrave
The name of Athens; and, by freedom arm'd
Gainst the gigantic pride of Asia's king,
Shall all the achievements of the heroes old
Surmount, of Hercules, of all who sail'd
From Thessaly with Jason, all who fought
For empire or for fame at Thebes or Troy.

Such were the patriots who within the porch
Of Solon had assembled. But the gate
Now opens, and across the ample floor
Strait they proceed into an open space
Bright with the beams of morn: a verdant spot,
Where stands a rural altar, pil'd with sods
Cut from the grassy turf and girt with wreaths
Of branching palm. Here Solon's self they found
Clad in a robe of purple pure, and deck'd
With leaves of olive on his reverend brow.
He bow'd before the altar, and o'er cakes
Of barley from two earthen vessels pour'd
Of honey and of milk a plenteous stream;
Calling meantime the muses to accept
His simple offering, by no victim ting'd
With blood, nor sullied by destroying fire,
But such as for himself Apollo claims
In his own Delos, where his favourite haunt
Is thence the altar of the pious nam'd.
Unseen the guests drew near, and silent view'd
That worship; till the hero priest his eye
Turn'd toward a seat on which prepar'd there lay
A branch of laurel. Then his friends confess'd
Before him stood. Backward his step he drew,
As loth that care or tumult should approach
Those early rites divine: but soon their looks,
So anxious, and their hands, held forth with such Desponing gesture, bring him on perforce
To speak to their affliction. Are ye come,
He cried, to mourn with me this common shame?
Or aske some new effort which may break

Our fetters? Know then, of the public cause
Not for yon traitor's cunning or his might
Do I despair: nor could I wish from Jove
Aught dearer, than at this late hour of life,
As once by laws, so now by strenuous arms
From impious violation to assert
The rights our fathers left us: But, alas!
What arms? or who shall wield them? Ye beheld

The Athenian people. Many bitter days
Must pass, and many wounds from cruel pride
Be felt, ere yet their partial hearts find room
For just resentment, or their hands endure
To smite this tyrant brood, so near to all
Their hopes, so oft admir'd, so long belov'd.
That time will come, however. Be it yours
To watch its fair approach, and urge it on
With honest prudence: me it ill beseems
Again to supplicate the unwilling crowd
To rescue from a vile deceiver's hold
That envied power which once with eager zeal
They offer'd to myself; nor can I plunge
In counsels deep and various, nor prepare
For distant wars, thus faltering, as I tread
On life's last verge, ere long to join the shades
Of Minos and Lycurgus. But behold
What care employs me now. My vows I pay
To the sweet muses, teachers of my youth
And solace of my age. If right I deem
Of the still voice that whispers at my heart,
The immortal sisters have not quite withdrawn
Their old harmonious influence. Let your tongues
With sacred silence favour what I speak,
And haply shall my faithful lips be taught
To unfold celestial counsels, which may arm
As with impenetrable steel your breasts
For the long strife before you; and repel
The darts of adverse fate. He said, and snatch'd
The laurel bough, and fate in silence down,
Fix'd, wrapp'd in solemn musing, full before
The sun, who now from all his radiant orb
Drove the gray clouds, and pour'd his genial light
Upon the breast of Solon. Solon rais'd
Aloft the leafy rod, and thus began:

Ye beauteous offspring of Olympian Jove
And memory divine, Pierian maids,
Hear me, propitious. In the morn of life,
When hope shone bright and all the prospect smil'd,
To your sequester'd mansion oft my steps
Were turn'd, O muses, and within your gate
My offerings paid. Ye taught me then with strains
Of flowing harmony to soften war's
Dire voice, or in fair colours, that might charm
The public eye, to clothe the form austere
Of civil counsel. Now my feeble age
Neglected, and supplanted of the hope
On which it lean'd, yet sinks not, but to you,
To your mild wisdom flies, refuge belov'd
Of solitude and silence. Ye can teach
The visions of my bed whate'er the gods
In the rude ages of the world inspir'd,
Or the first heroes acted: ye can make
The morning light more glad some to my sense
Than ever it appear'd to active youth
Pursuing careless pleasure: ye can give
To this long leisure, these unheeded hours,
A labour as sublime, as when the sons
Of Athens throng'd and speechless round me stood

To hear pronounc'd for all their future deeds
 The bounds of right and wrong. Celestial powers,
 I feel that ye are near me : and behold,
 To meet your energy divine, I bring
 A high and sacred theme ; nor less than those
 Which to the eternal custody of fame
 Your lips intrusted, when of old ye deign'd
 With Orpheus or with Homer to frequent
 The groves of Flæmus or the Chian shore.
 Ye know, harmonious maids (for what of all
 My various life was e'er from you estrang'd ?)
 Oft hath my solitary song to you
 Reveal'd that duteous pride which turn'd my steps
 To willing exile ; earnest to withdraw
 From envy and the disappointed thirst
 Of lucre, lest the bold familiar strife,
 Which in the eye of Athens they upheld
 Against her legislator, should impair
 With trivial doubt the reverence of his laws.
 To Ægypt, therefore, through the Ægean isles
 My course I steer'd, and by the banks of Nile
 Dwelt in Canopus. Thence the hallow'd domes
 Of Sais, and the rites to Isis paid,
 I sought, and in her temple's silent courts,
 Through many changing moons, attentive heard
 The venerable Sonchis, while his tongue
 At morn or midnight the deep story told
 Of her who represents whate'er has been,
 Or is, or shall be ; whose mysterious veil
 No mortal hand hath ever yet remov'd.
 By him exhorted, southward to the walls
 Of On I pass'd, the city of the sun,
 The ever-youthful god. 'Twas there, amid
 His priests and sages, who the live-long night
 Watch the dread movements of the starry sphere,
 Or who in wondrous fables half disclose
 The secrets of the elements, 'twas there
 That great Psenophis taught my raptur'd ears
 The fame of old Atlantis, of her chiefs,
 And her pure laws, the first which earth obey'd.
 Deep in my bosom sunk the noble tale ;
 And often, while I listen'd, did my mind
 Foretell with what delight her own free lyre
 Should sometime for an Attic audience raise
 Anew that lofty scene, and from their tombs
 Call forth those ancient demigods to speak
 Of justice and the hidden providence
 That walk among mankind. But yet meantime
 The mystic pomp of Ammon's gloomy sons
 Became less pleasing. With contempt I gaz'd
 On that tame garb and those unvarying paths
 To which the double yoke of king and priest
 Had cramp'd the fullen race. At last with hymns
 Invoking our own Pallas and the gods
 Of cheerful Greece, a glad farewell I gave
 To Egypt, and before the southern wind
 Spread my full sails. What climes I then survey'd,
 What fortunes I encounter'd in the realm
 Of Cræsus or upon the Cyprian shore,
 The muse, who prompts my bosom, doth not now
 Consent that I reveal. But when at length
 Ten times the sun returning from the south [fill'd
 Had strow'd with flowers the verdant earth and
 The groves with music, pleas'd I then beheld
 The term of those long errors drawing nigh.
 Nor yet, I said, will I sit down within
 The walls of Athens, till my feet have trod
 The Cretan soil, have pierc'd those reverend haunts

Whence law and civil concord issued forth
 As from their ancient home, and still to Greece
 Their wisest, loftiest discipline proclaim.
 Straight where Amnisus, mart of wealthy ships,
 Appears beneath fam'd Cnossus and her towers
 Like the fair handmaid of a stately queen,
 I check'd my prow, and thence with eager steps
 The city of Minos enter'd. O ye gods,
 Who taught the leaders of the simpler time
 By written words to curb the untoward will
 Of mortals, how within that generous isle
 Have ye the triumphs of your powers display'd,
 Munificent ! Those splendid merchants, lords
 Of traffic and the sea, with what delight
 I saw them at their public meal, like sons
 Of the same household, join the plainer sort
 Whose wealth was only freedom ! whence to these
 Vile envy, and to those fantastic pride,
 Alike was strange ; but noble concord still
 Cherish'd the strength untam'd, the rustic faith,
 Of their first fathers. Then the growing race,
 How pleasing to behold them in their schools,
 Their sports, their labours, ever plac'd within,
 O shade of Minos, thy controlling eye !
 Here was a docile band in tuneful tones
 Thy laws pronouncing, or with lofty hymns
 Praising the bounteous gods, or, to preserve
 Their country's heroes from oblivious night,
 Resounding what the muse inspir'd of old ;
 There, on the verge of manhood, others met,
 In heavy armour through the heats of noon
 To march, the rugged mountains height to climb
 With measur'd swiftness, from the hard-bent bow
 To send resistless arrows to their mark,
 Or for the fame of prowess to contend,
 Now wrestling, now with fists and staves oppos'd,
 Now with the biting falchion, and the fence
 Of brazen shields ; while still the warbling flute
 Presided o'er the combat, breathing strains
 Grave, solemn, soft ; and changing headlong spite
 To thoughtful resolution cool and clear.
 Such I beheld those islanders renown'd,
 So tutor'd from their birth to meet in war
 Each bold invader, and in peace to guard
 That living flame of reverence for their laws
 Which, nor the storms of fortune, nor the flood
 Of foreign wealth diffus'd o'er all the land,
 Could quench or slacken. First of human names
 In every Cretan's heart was Minos still ;
 And holiest far, of what the sun surveys [seats
 Through his whole course, were those primeval
 Which with religious footsteps he had taught
 Their fires to approach the wild Dactæan cave
 Where Jove was born ; the ever-verdant meads
 Of Ida, and the spacious grotto, where
 His active youth he pass'd, and where his throne
 Yet stands mysterious ; whither Minos came
 Each ninth returning year, the king of gods
 And mortals there in secret to consult
 On justice, and the tables of his law
 To inscribe anew. Oft also with like zeal
 Great Rhea's mansion from the Cnossian gates
 Men visit ; nor less oft the antique fane.
 Built on that sacred spot, along the banks
 Of shady Theron, where benignant Jove
 And his majestic consort join'd their hands
 And spoke their nuptial vows. Alas, 'twas there
 That the dire fame of Athens sunk in bonds

I first receiv'd; what time an annual feast
 Had summon'd all the genial country round,
 By sacrifice and pomp to bring to mind [youths
 That first great spousal; while the enamour'd
 And virgins, with the priest before the shrine,
 Observe the same pure ritual, and invoke
 The same glad omens. There, among the crowd
 Of strangers from those naval cities drawn
 Which deck, like gems, the island's northern shore,
 A merchant of Ægina I descri'd,
 My ancient host. But, forward as I sprung
 To meet him, he with dark dejected brow,
 Stopp'd half-averse; and, O Athenian guest,
 He said, art thou in Crete; these joyful rites
 Partaking? Know thy laws are blotted out:
 Thy country kneels before a tyrant's throne.
 He added names of men, with hostile deeds
 Disastrous; which obscure and indistinct
 I heard: for, while he spake, my heart grew cold
 And my eyes dim: the altars and their train
 No more were present to me: how I far'd,
 Or whither turn'd, I know not; nor recall
 Aught of those moments other than the sense
 Of one who struggles in oppressive sleep,
 And, from the toils of some distressful dream
 To break away, with palpitating heart,
 Weak limbs, and temples bath'd in death-like dew,
 Makes many a painful effort. When at last
 The sun and nature's face again appear'd,
 Not far I found me; where the public path,
 Winding through cypress groves and swelling
 meads,
 From Cnossus to the cave of Jove ascends.
 Heedless I follow'd on; till soon the skirts
 Of Ida rose before me, and the vault
 Wide-opening pierc'd the mountain's rocky side.
 Entering within the threshold, on the ground
 I flung me, sad, faint, overworn with toil,

BEGINNING OF BOOK IV.

MDCCLXX.

ONE effort more, one cheerful sally more,
 Our destin'd course will finish. And in peace
 Then for an offering sacred to the powers
 Who lent us gracious guidance, we will then
 Inscribe a monument of deathless praise.
 O my adventurous song! with steady speed
 Long hast thou, on an untry'd voyage bound
 Sail'd between earth and heaven: hast now sur-
 vey'd,
 Stretch'd out beneath thee, all the mazy tracts
 Of passion and opinion; like a waste
 Of sands and flowery lawns and tangling woods,
 Where mortals roam bewilder'd: and hast now
 Exulting soar'd among the worlds above,
 Or hover'd near the eternal gates of heaven,
 If haply the discourses of the gods,
 A curious, but an unpresuming guest,
 Thou might'st partake, and carry back some strain
 Of divine wisdom, lawful to repeat,
 And apt to be conceiv'd of man below.
 A different task remains; the secret paths
 Of early genius to explore: to trace
 Those haunts where fancy her predestin'd sons,

Like to the demi-gods of old, doth nurse
 Remote from eyes profane. Ye happy souls
 Who now her tender discipline obey,
 Where dwell ye? What wild river's brink at eve
 Imprint your steps? What solemn groves at noon
 Use ye to visit, often breaking forth
 In rapture 'mid your dilatory walk,
 Or musing, as in slumber, on the green?
 —Would I again were with you!—O ye dales
 Of Tyne, and ye most ancient woodlands; where
 Oft as the giant flood obliquely strides,
 And his banks open, and his lawns extend,
 Stops short the pleased traveller to view
 Presiding o'er the scene some rustic tower,
 Founded by Norman or by Saxon hands:
 O ye Northumbrian shades, which overlook
 The rocky pavement and the mossy falls
 Of solitary Wensbeck's limpid stream;
 How gladly I recall your well-known seats
 Belov'd of old, and that delightful time
 When all alone, for many a summer's day,
 I wander'd through your calm recesses, led
 In silence by some powerful hand unseen,
 Nor will I e'er forget you. Nor shall e'er
 The graver tasks of manhood, or the advice
 Of vulgar wisdom move me to disclaim
 Those studies which possess'd me in the dawn
 Of life, and fix'd the colour of my mind
 For every future year: whence even now
 From sleep I rescue the clear hours of morn,
 And, while the world around lies overwhelm'd
 In idle darkness, am alive to thoughts
 Of honourable fame, of truth divine
 Or moral, and of minds to virtue won
 By the sweet magic of harmonious verse;
 The themes which now expect us. For thus far
 On general habits, and on arts which grow
 Spontaneous in the minds of all mankind,
 Hath dwelt our argument; and how self-taught,
 Though seldom conscious of their own employ,
 In nature's or in fortune's changeful scene
 Men learn to judge of beauty, and acquire
 Those forms set up, as idols in the soul
 For love and zealous praise. Yet indistinct,
 In vulgar bosoms, and unnotic'd lie
 These pleasing stores, unless the casual force
 Of things external prompt the heedless mind
 To recognize her wealth. But some there are Conscious of nature, and the rule which man
 O'er nature holds: some who, within themselves
 Retiring from the trivial scenes of chance
 And momentary passion, can at will
 Call up these fair exemplars of the mind;
 Review their features; scan the secret laws
 Which bind them to each other: and display
 By forms, or sounds, or colours, to the sense
 Of all the world their latent charms display:
 Even as in nature's frame (if such a word,
 If such a word, so bold, may from the lips
 Of man proceed) as in this outward frame
 Of things, the Great Artificer portrays
 His own immense idea. Various names
 These among mortals bear, as various signs
 They use, and by peculiar organs speak
 To human sense. There are who, by the flight
 Of air through tubes with moving stops distinct,
 Or by extended chords in measure taught
 To vibrate, can assemble powerful sounds

Expressing every temper of the mind
 From every cause, and charming all the soul
 With passion void of care. Others meantime
 The rugged mass of metal, wood, or stone,
 Patiently taming; or with easier hand
 Describing lines, and with more ample scope
 Uniting colours; can to general sight
 Produce those permanent and perfect forms,
 Those characters of heroes and of gods,
 Which from the crude materials of the world
 Their own high minds created. But the chief
 Are poets; eloquent men, who dwell on earth
 To clothe what'er the soul admires or loves
 With language and with numbers. Hence to
 A field is open'd wide as nature's sphere; [these
 Nay, wider: various as the sudden acts
 Of human wit, and vast as the demands
 Of human will. The bard nor length, nor depth,
 Nor place, nor form controls. To eyes, to ears,
 To every organ of the copious mind,
 He offereth all its treasures. Him the hours,

The seasons him obey: and changeful time
 Sees him at will keep measure with his flight,
 At will outstrip it. To enhance his toil,
 He summoneth from the uttermost extent
 Of things which God hath taught him, every form
 Auxiliar, every power; and all beside
 Excludes imperious. His prevailing hand
 Gives to corporeal essence, life and sense
 And every stately function of the soul.
 The soul itself to him obsequious lies,
 Like matter's passive heap; and as he wills,
 To reason and affection he assigns
 Their just alliances, their just degrees:
 Whence his peculiar honours; whence the race
 Of men who people his delightful world,
 Men genuine and according to themselves,
 Transcend as far the uncertain sons of earth,
 As earth itself to his delightful world
 The palm of spotless beauty doth resign.

O D E S.

BOOK I. ODE I.

PREFACE.

I.

ON yonder verdant hillock laid,
 Where oaks and elms, a friendly shade,
 O'erlook the falling stream,
 O master of the Latin lyre,
 A while with thee will I retire
 From summer's noontide beam.

II.

And, lo, within my lonely bower,
 The industrious bee from many a flower
 Collects her balmy dews:
 "For me," she sings, "the gems are borne,
 "For me their silken robe adorn,
 "Their fragrant breath diffuse."

III.

Sweet murmurer! may no rude storm
 This hospitable scene deform,
 Nor check thy gladsome toils;
 Still may the buds unsullied spring,
 Still showers and sunshine court thy wing
 To these ambrosial spoils.

IV.

Nor shall my muse hereafter fail
 Her fellow-labourer thee to hail;
 And lucky be the strains!
 For long ago did nature frame
 Your seasons and your arts the same,
 Your pleasures and your pains.

V.

Like thee, in lowly sylvan scenes,
 On river-banks and flowery greens
 My muse delighted plays;
 Nor through the desert or the air,
 Though swans or eagles triumph there,
 With fond ambition strays,

VI.

Nor where the boding raven chaunts,
 Nor near the owl's unhallowed haunts
 Will she her cares employ;
 But flies from ruins and from tombs,
 From superstition's horrid glooms,
 To day-light and to joy.

VII.

Nor will she tempt the barren waste;
 Nor deigns the lurking strength to taste
 Of any noxious thing;
 But leaves with scorn to envy's use
 The insipid nightshade's baneful juice,
 The nettle's fordid sting.

VIII.

From all which nature fairest knows,
 The vernal blooms, the summer rose,
 She draws her blameless wealth;
 And, when the generous task is done,
 She consecrates a double boon,
 To pleasure and to health.

ODE II. No. I.

FOR THE WINTER SOLSTICE,

Dec. 2, 1740*.

I.

Now to the utmost southern goal
 The sun has trac'd his annual way,
 And backward now prepares to roll,
 And bless the north with earlier day,
 Prone on Potosi's lofty brow,
 Floods of sublimer splendor flow,

* This ode was afterwards entirely altered; as may be seen in the following poem. The reader will not be displeased to see it as it was originally written.

Ripening the latent seeds of gold,
Whilst, panting in the lonely shade,
The afflicted Indian hides his head,
Nor dares the blaze of noon behold.

II.

But lo! on this deserted coast,
How faint the light! how chill the air!
Lo! arm'd with whirlwind, hail, and frost,
Fierce winter desolates the year.
The fields resign their cheerful bloom;
No more the breezes breathe perfume;
No more the warbling waters roll:
Desarts of snow fatigue the eye;
Successive tempests bloat the sky,
And gloomy damps oppress the soul.

III.

But let my drooping genius rise,
And hail the sun's remotest ray:
Now, now he climbs the northern skies,
To-morrow nearer than to-day.
Then, louder howl the stormy waste,
Be sand and ocean worse defac'd,
Yet brighter hours are on the wing,
And fancy, through the wintry gloom,
Radiant with dews and flowers in bloom,
Already hails the emerging spring.

IV.

O fountain of the golden day,
Could mortal vows but urge thy speed,
How soon, before the vernal ray,
Should each unkindly damp recede!
How soon each tempest hovering fly,
That now, fermenting, loads the sky,
Prompt on our heads to burst amain,
To rend the forest from the steep,
And thundering o'er the Baltic deep,
To 'whelm the merchant's hopes of gain!

V.

But let not man's imperfect views,
Presume to tax wise nature's laws:
'Tis his with silent joy to use
The indulgence of the sovereign cause;
Secure that from the whole of things
Beauty and good consummate springs,
Beyond what he can reach to know,
And that the providence of heaven
Has some peculiar blessing given
To each allotted state below.

VI.

Ev'n now how sweet the wintry night
Spent with the old illustrious dead:
While, by the taper's trembling light,
I seem the awful course to tread;
Where chiefs and legislators lie,
Whose triumphs move before my eye,
With every laurel fresh display'd:
While, charm'd, I rove in classic song,
Or bend to freedom's fearless tongue,
Or walk the academic shade.

ODE II. No. II.

ON THE WINTER SOLSTICE.

1740.

I.

THE radiant ruler of the year
At length his wintry goal attains;

Seems to reverse the long career,
And northward bend his steady reins.
Now, piercing half Potofi's height,
Prone rush the fiery floods of light
Ripening the mountain's silver stores:
While in some cavern's horrid shade,
The panting Indian hides his head,
And oft the approach of eve implores.

II.

But lo, on this deserted coast
How pale the sun! how thick the air!
Mustering his storms, a sordid host,
Lo, winter desolates the year:
The fields resign their latest bloom;
No more the breezes waft perfume,
No more the streams in music roll:
But snows fall dark, or rains resound;
And, while great nature mourns around,
Her griefs infect the human soul.

III.

Hence the loud city's busy throngs
Urge the warm bowl and splendid fire;
Harmonious dances, festive songs
Against the spiteful heaven conspire:
Meantime perhaps with tender fears
Some village-dame the curfew hears,
While round the hearth her children play
At morn their father went abroad;
The moon is sunk and deep the read;
She sighs, and wonders at his stay.

IV.

But thou, my lyre, awake, arise,
And hail the sun's returning force:
Even now he climbs the northern skies,
And health and hope attend his course.
Then louder howl the aerial waste,
Be earth with keener cold embrac'd,
Yet gentle hours advance their wing;
And fancy, mocking winter's might,
With flowers and dews and streaming light
Already decks the new-born spring.

V.

O fountain of the golden day,
Could mortal vows promote thy speed,
How soon before thy vernal ray
Should each unkindly damp recede!
How soon each hovering tempest fly,
Whose stores for mischief arm the sky,
Prompt on our heads to burst amain,
To rend the forest from the steep,
Or, thundering o'er the Baltic deep,
To 'whelm the merchant's hopes of gain!

VI.

But let not man's unequal views
Presume o'er nature and her laws:
'Tis his with grateful joy to use
The indulgence of the sov'reign cause;
Secure that health and beauty springs
Through this majestic frame of things,
Beyond what he can reach to know;
And that heaven's all-subduing will,
With good the progeny of ill,
Attempereth every state below.

VII.

How pleasing wears the wintry night,
Spent with the old illustrious dead!
While, by the taper's trembling light,
I seem those awful scenes to tread

Where chiefs or legislators lie,
Whose triumphs move before my eye
In arms and antique pomp array'd;
While now I taste the Ionian song,
Now bend to Plato's godlike tongue
Resounding through the olive shade.

VIII.

But should some cheerful, equal friend
Bid leave the studious page a while,
Let mirth on wisdom then attend,
And social ease on learned toil.
Then while, at love's uncared-for shrine,
Each dictates to the god of wine
Her name whom all his hopes obey,
What flattering dreams each bosom warm,
While absence, heightening every charm,
Invokes the slow returning May!

IX.

May, thou delight of heaven and earth,
When will thy genial star arise?
The auspicious morn, which gives thee birth,
Shall bring Eudora to my eyes.
Within her sylvan haunt behold,
As in the happy garden old,
She moves like that primeval fair:
Thither, ye silver-sounding lyres,
Ye tender smiles, ye chaste desires,
Fond hope and mutual faith, repair.

X.

And if believing love can read
His better omens in her eye,
Then shall my fears, O charming maid,
And every pain of absence die:
Then shall my jocund harp, attun'd
To thy true ear, with sweeter sound
Pursue the free Horatian song;
Old Tyne shall listen to my tale,
And echo down the bordering vale
The liquid melody prolong.

O D E III.

TO A FRIEND UNSUCCESSFUL IN LOVE.

I.

INDEED, my Phædria, if to find
That wealth can female wishes gain,
Had e'er disturb'd your thoughtful mind,
Or cost one serious moment's pain,
I should have said that all the rules,
You learn'd of moralists and schools,
Were very useless, very vain.

II.

Yet I perhaps mistake the case—
Say, though with this heroic air,
Like one that holds a nobler chase,
You try the tender loss to bear,
Does not your heart renounce your tongue!
Seems not my censure strangely wrong
To count it such a slight affair?

III.

When Hesper gilds the shaded sky,
Oft as you seek the well-known grove,
Methinks I see you cast your eye
Back to the morning scenes of love:
Each pleasing word you heard her say,
Her gentle look, her graceful way,
Again your struggling fancy move.

IV.

Then tell me, is your soul entire?
Does wisdom calmly hold her throne?
Then can you question each desire,
Bid this remain, and that begone?
No tear half-starting from your eye?
No kindling blush you know not why?
No stealing sigh, nor stifled groan?

V.

Away with this unmanly mood!
See where the hoary churl appears,
Whose hand hath seiz'd the favourite good
Which you reserv'd for happier years:
While, side by side, the blushing maid
Shrinks from his visage, half afraid,
Spite of the sickly joy she wears.

VI.

Ye guardian powers of love and fame,
This chaste, harmonious pair behold;
And thus reward the generous flame
Of all who barter vows for gold.
O bloom of youth, O tender charms
Well buried in a dotard's arms!
O equal price of beauty sold!

VII.

Cease then to gaze with looks of love:
Bid her adieu, the venal fair:
Unworthy she your bliss to prove;
Then wherefore should she prove your care?
No: lay your myrtle garland down;
And let a while the willow's crown
With luckier omens bind your hair.

VIII.

O just escap'd the faithless main,
Though driven unwilling on the land:
To guide your favour'd steps again,
Behold your better genius stand:
Where truth revolves her page divine,
Where virtue leads to honour's shrine,
Behold, he lifts his awful hand.

IX.

Fix but on these your ruling aim,
And time, the sire of manly care,
Will fancy's dazzling colours tame
A soberer dress will beauty wear:
Then shall esteem by knowledge led
Enthroned within your heart and head
Some happier love, some truer fair.

O D E IV.

AFFECTED INDIFFERENCE.

To the same.

I.

YES, you condemn the perjur'd maid
Who all your favourite hopes betray'd:
Nor, though her heart should home return,
Her tuneful tongue its falsehood mourn,
Her wining eyes your faith implore,
Would you her hand receive again,
At once dissemble your disdain,
Or listen to the siren's theme,
Or stoop to love: since now esteem,
And confidence, and friendship is no more.

II.

Yet tell me, Phædria, tell me why,
When summoning your pride you try

To meet her looks with cool neglect,
 Or cross her walk with slight respect,
 (For so is falsehood best repaid)
 Whence do your cheeks indignant glow?
 Why is your struggling tongue so slow?
 What means that darkness on your brow?
 As if with all her broken vow
 You meant the fair apostate to upbraid?

O D E V.

AGAINST SUSPICION.

I.

Oh fly! 'tis dire suspicion's mien;
 And, meditating plagues unseen,
 The sorceress hither bends:
 Behold her torch in gall imbrued:
 Behold—her garment drops with blood
 Of lovers and of friends.

II.

Fly far! already in your eyes
 I see a pale suffusion rise;
 And soon through every vein,
 Soon will her secret venom spread,
 And all your heart and all your head,
 Imbibe the potent stain.

III.

Then many a demon will she raise
 To vex your sleep, to haunt your ways;
 While gleams of lost delight
 Raise the dark tempest of the brain,
 As lightning shines across the main
 Through whirlwinds and through night.

IV.

No more can faith or candour move;
 But each ingenuous deed of love,
 Which reason would applaud,
 Now, smiling o'er her dark distress,
 Fancy malignant strives to dress
 Like injury and fraud.

V.

Farewell to virtue's peaceful times:
 Soon will you stoop to act the crimes
 Which thus you stoop to fear:
 Guilt follows guilt: and where the train
 Begins with wrongs of such a stain,
 What horrors from the rear!

VI.

'Tis thus to work her baleful power,
 Suspicion waits the sullen hour
 Of fretfulness and strife,
 When care the infirm bosom wrings,
 Or Eurus waves his murky wings
 To damp the seats of life.

VII.

But come, forsake the scene unblest
 Which first beheld your faithful breast
 To groundless fears a prey:
 Come, where with my prevailing lyre
 The skies, the streams, the groves conspire
 To charm your doubts away.

VIII.

Thron'd in the sun's descending car,
 What power unseen diffuseth far
 This tenderness of mind?
 What genius smiles on yonder flood?

What god, in whispers from the wood,
 Bids every thought be kind?

IX.

O thou, whate'er thy awful name.
 Whose wisdom our untoward frame
 With social love restrains;
 Thou, who by fair affection's ties
 Giv'st us to double all our joys
 And half disarm our pains:

X.

Let universal candour still,
 Clear as yon heaven-reflecting rill,
 Preserve my open mind;
 Nor this nor that man's crooked ways
 One fordid doubt within me raise
 To injure human kind.

O D E VI.

HYMN TO CHEERFULNESS.

How thick the shades of evening close!
 How pale the sky with weight of snows!
 Haste, light the tapers, urge the fire,
 And bid the joyless day retire.
 —Alas, in vain I try within
 To brighten the dejected scene,
 While rous'd by grief these fiery pains
 Tear the frail texture of my veins:
 While winter's voice, that storms around,
 And yon deep death-bell's groaning sound
 Renew my mind's oppressive gloom,
 Till starting horror shakes the room.

Is there in nature no kind power
 To sooth affliction's lonely hour?
 To blunt the edge of dire disease,
 And teach these wintry shades to please?
 Come, cheerfulness, triumphant fair,
 Shine through the hovering cloud of care:
 O sweet of language, mild of mien,
 O virtue's friend and pleasure's queen,
 Assuage the flames that burn my breast,
 Compose my jarring thoughts to rest;
 And while thy gracious gifts I feel,
 My song shall all thy praise reveal.
 As once ('twas in Astrea's reign)
 The vernal powers renew'd their train,
 It happen'd that immortal love
 Was ranging through the spheres above,
 And downward hither cast his eye
 The year's returning pomp to spy.
 He saw the radiant god of day,
 Waft in his car the rosy May;
 The fragrant airs and genial hours
 Were shedding round him dews and flowers;
 Before his wheels Aurora pass'd,
 And Hesper's golden lamp was last.
 But, fairest of the blooming throng,
 When health majestic mov'd along,
 Delighted to survey below
 The joys which from her presence flow,
 While earth enliven'd hears her voice,
 And swains, and flocks, and fields rejoice;
 Then mighty love her charms confess'd,
 And soon his vows inclin'd her breast,
 And, known from that auspicious morn,
 Thee pleasing cheerfulness, was born.

Thou cheerfulness, by heaven design'd
To sway the movements of the mind,
Whatever fretful passion springs,
Whatever wayward fortune brings
To disarrange the power within,
And strain the musical machine;
Thou, Goddess, thy attempering hand
Doth each discordant string command,
Refines the soft, and swells the strong;
And, joining nature's general song,
Through many a varying tone unfolds
The harmony of human souls.

Fair guardian of domestic life,
Kind banisher of homebred strife,
Nor sullen lip, nor taunting eye,
Deforms the scene where thou art by:
No sickening husband damns the hour
Which bound his joys to female power;
No pining-mother weeps the cares
Which parent's waste on thankless heirs:
The officious daughters pleas'd attend;
The brother adds the name of friend:
By thee with flowers their board is crown'd,
With songs from thee their walks resound;
And morn with welcome lustre shines,
And evening unperceiv'd declines.

Is there a youth, whose anxious heart
Labours with love's unpitied smart?
Though now he stray by rills and bowers,
And weeping waste the lonely hours,
Or if the nymph her audience deign,
Debase the story of his pain
With slavish looks, discolour'd eyes,
And accents faltering into sighs;
Yet thou, auspicious power, with ease
Canst yield him happier arts to please,
Inform his mien with manlier charms,
Instruct his tongue with noble arms,
With more commanding passion move,
And teach the dignity of love.

Friend to the muse and all her train,
For thee I court the muse again:
The muse for thee may well exert
Her pomp, her charms, her fondest art,
Who owes to thee that pleasing sway
Which earth and peopled heaven obey.
Let melancholy's plaintive tongue
Repeat what later bards have sung;
But thine was Homer's ancient might,
And thine victorious Pindar's flight:
Thy hand each Lesbian wreath attir'd:
Thy lip Sicilian reeds inspir'd:
Thy spirit lent the glad perfume
Whence yet the flowers of Teos bloom;
Whence yet from Tibur's Sabine vale
Delicious blows the enlivening gale,
While Horace calls thy sportive choir,
Heroes and nymphs, around his lyre.

But see where yonder pensive sage
(A prey perhaps to fortune's rage,
Perhaps by tender griefs oppress'd,
Or blooms congenial to his breast)
Retires in desert scenes to dwell,
And bids the joyless world farewell.
Alone he treads the autumnal shade,
Alone beneath the mountain laid

He sees the nightly damps ascend,
And gathering storms aloft impend;
He hears the neighbouring surges roll,
And raging thunders shake the pole:
Then, struck by every object round,
And stunn'd by every horrid sound,
He asks a clue for nature's ways;
But evil haunts him through the maze:
He sees ten thousand demons rise
To wield the empire of the skies,
And chance and fate assume the rod,
And malice blot the throne of God.
—O thou, whose pleasing power I sing,
Thy lenient influence hither bring;
Compose the storm, dispel the gloom,
Till nature wear her wonted bloom,
Till fields and shades their sweets exhale,
And music swell each opening gale:
Then o'er his breast thy softness pour,
And let him learn the timely hour
To trace the world's benignant laws,
And judge of that presiding cause,
Who sounds on discord beauty's reign,
Converts to pleasure every pain,
Subdues each hostile form to rest,
And bids the universe be blest'd.

O thou whose pleasing power I sing,
If right I touch the votive string,
If equal praise I yield thy name,
Still govern thou thy poet's flame;
Still with the muse my bosom share,
And sooth to peace intruding care.
But most exert thy pleasing power
On friendship's consecrated hour;
And while my Sophron points the road
To godlike wisdom's calm abode,
Or warm in freedom's ancient cause
Traceth the source of Albion's laws,
Add thou o'er all the generous toil
The light of thy unclouded smile.
But, if by fortune's stubborn sway,
From him and friendship torn away,
I court the muse's healing spell
For griefs that still with abience dwell,
Do thou conduct my fancy's dreams
To such indulgent placid themes,
As just the struggling breast may cheer
And just suspend the starting tear,
Yet leave that sacred sense of woe
Which none but friends and lovers know.

O D E VII.

ON THE USE OF POETRY.

I.

NOT for themselves did human kind
Contrive the parts by heaven assign'd
On life's wide scene to play:
Not Scipio's force, nor Cæsar's skill
Can conquer glory's arduous hill,
If fortune close the way.

II.

Yet still the self-depending soul,
Though last and least in fortune's roll,
His proper sphere commands;

And knows what nature's seal bestow'd,
And sees, before the throne of God,
The rank in which he stands.

III.

Who train'd by laws the future age,
Who rescued nations from the rage
Of partial, factious power,
My heart with distant homage views;
Content if thou, celestial muse,
Didst rule my natal hour.

IV.

Not far beneath the hero's feet,
Nor from the legislator's seat
Stands far remote the bard.
Though not with public terrors crown'd,
Yet wider shall his rule be found,
More lasting his award.

V.

Lycurgus fashion'd Sparta's fame,
And Pompey to the Roman name
Gave universal sway:
Where are they?—Homer's reverend page
Holds empire to the thirtieth age,
And tongues and climes obey.

VI.

And thus when William's acts divine
No longer shall from Bourbon's line
Draw one vindictive vow;
When Sidney shall with Cato rest,
And Ruffel move the patriot's breast
No more than Brutus now:

VII.

Yet then shall Shakspeare's powerful art
O'er every passion, every heart,
Confirm his awful throne:
Tyrants shall bow before his laws;
And freedom's, glory's, virtue's cause,
Their dread assertor own.

O D E VIII.

ON LEAVING HOLLAND.

I. 1.

FAREWELL to Leyden's lonely bound,
The Belgian muse's sober seat;
Where dealing frugal gifts around
To all the favorites at her feet,
She trains the body's bulky frame
For passive, persevering toils;
And left, from any prouder aim,
The daring mind should scorn her homely spoils,
She breathes maternal fogs to damp its restless
flame.

I. 2.

Farewell the grave, pacific air,
Where never mountain zephyr blew:
The marshy levels lank and bare,
Which Pan, which Ceres never knew;
The Naiads, with obscene attire,
Urging in vain their urns to flow;
While round them chaunt the croaking choir,
And haply sooth some lover's prudent woe,
Or prompt some restive bard, and modulate his lyre.

I. 3.

Farewell, ye nymphs, whom sober care of gain
Snatch'd in your cradles from the god of love:

She render'd all his boasted arrows vain;
And all his gifts did he in spite remove.
Ye too, the slow-ey'd fathers of the land, [hand,
With whom dominion steals from hand to
Unown'd, undignify'd by public choice,
I go where liberty to all is known,
And tells a monarch on his throne,
He reigns not but by her preserving voice.

II. 1.

O my lov'd England, when with thee
Shall I sit down, to part no more?
Far from this pale, discolour'd sea,
That sleeps upon the reedy shore,
When shall I plough thy azure tide?
When on thy hills the flocks admire,
Like mountain snows; till down their side
I trace the village and the sacred spire, [divide,
While bowers and copses green the golden slope

II. 2.

Ye nymphs who guard the pathless grove,
Ye blue-ey'd sisters of the streams,
With whom I wont at morn to rove,
With whom at noon I talk'd in dreams:
O! take me to your haunts again,
The rocky spring, the greenwood glade;
To guide my lonely footsteps deign,
To prompt my slumbers in the murmuring shade,
And sooth my vacant ear with many an airy strain.

II. 3.

And thou, my faithful harp, no longer mourn
Thy drooping master's inauspicious hand:
Now brighter skies and fresher gales return,
Now fairer maids thy melody demand.
Daughters of Albion, listen to my lyre!
O Phoebus, guardian of the Aonian choir,
Why sounds not mine harmonious as thy own,
When all the virgin deities above
With Venus and with Juno move
In concert round the Olympian fathers throne?

III. 1.

Thee too, protectress of my lays,
Elate with whose majestic call
Above degenerate Latium's praise,
Above the slavish boast of Gaul,
I dare from impious thrones reclaim,
And wanton sloth's ignoble charms,
The honours of a poet's name
To Somers' counsels, or to Hamden's arms,
Thee, freedom, I rejoin, and bless thy genuine flame.

III. 2.

Great citizen of Albion! Thee
Heroic valour still attends
And useful science pleas'd to see
How art her studious toil extends.
While truth diffusing from on high
A lustre unconfin'd as day,
Fills and commands the public eye;
Till, pierc'd and sinking by her powerful ray,
Tame faith and monkish awe, like nightly demons,
fly.

III. 3.

Hence the whole land the patriot's ardour
shares:
Hence dread religion dwells with social joy;
And holy passions and un sullied cares,
In youth, in age, domestic life employ.

O fair Britannia, hail!—With partial love
The tribes of men their native seats approve,
Unjust and hostile to each foreign fame:
But when for generous minds and manly laws
A nation holds her prime applause,
Their public zeal shall all reproof disclaim.

O D E IX.

TO CURIO*.

1744.

I.

THRICE hath the spring beheld thy faded fame
Since I exulting grasp'd the tuneful shell:
Eager through endless years to sound thy name,
Proud that my memory with thine should dwell.
How hast thou stain'd the splendor of my choice!
Those godlike forms which hover'd round thy
voice,
Laws, freedom, glory, whither are they flown?
What can I now of thee to time report,
Save thy fond country made thy impious sport,
Her fortune and her hope the victims of thy own?

II.

There are with eyes unmov'd and reckless heart
Who saw thee from thy summit fall thus low,
Who deem'd thy arm extended but to dart
The public vengeance on thy private foe.
But, spite of every gloss of envious minds,
The owl-ey'd race whom virtue's lustre blinds,
Who sagely prove that each man hath his price,
I still believ'd thy aim from blemish free,
I yet, even yet, believe it, spite of thee
And all thy painted pleas to greatness and to vice.

III.

"Thou didst not dream of liberty decay'd,
"Nor wish to make her guardian laws more strong:
"But the rash many, first by thee misled,
"Bore thee at length unwillingly along."
Rise from your sad abodes, ye curst of old,
For faith deserted or for cities sold,
Own here one untry'd, unexampled, deed;
One mystery of shame from Curio, learn,
To beg the infamy he did not earn, [meed.
And scape in guilt's disguise from virtue's offer'd

IV.

For saw we not that dangerous power avow'd,
Whom freedom oft hath found her mortal bane,
Whom public wisdom ever strove to exclude,
And but with blushes suffereth in her train?
Corruption vaunted her bewitching spoils,
O'er court, o'er senate, spread in pomp her toils,
And call'd herself the states directing soul:
Till Curio, like a good magician, try'd
With eloquence and reason at his side, [trol,
By strength of holier spells the enchantress to con-

V.

Soon with thy country's hope thy fame extends;
The rescued merchant oft thy words resounds:
Thee and thy cause the rural hearth defends:
His bowl to thee the grateful sailor crowns:
The learn'd recluse, with awful zeal who read
Of Grecian heroes, Roman patriots dead.

* See the "Epistle to Curio."

Now with like awe doth living merit scan:
While he, whom virtue in his blest retreat
Bade social ease and public passions meet,
Ascends the civil scene, and knows to be a man.

VI.

At length in view the glorious end appear'd:
We saw thy spirit through the senate reign;
And freedom's friends thy instant omen heard
Of laws for which their fathers bled in vain.
Wak'd in the strife the public genius rose
More keen, more ardent from his long repose:
Deep through her bounds the city felt his call:
Each crowded haunt was stirr'd beneath his
power,
And murmuring challeng'd the deciding hour
Of that too vast event, the hope and dread of all.

VII.

O ye good powers who look on human kind,
Instruct the mighty moments as they roll,
And watch the fleeting shapes in Curio's mind,
And steer his passions steady to the goal.
O Alfred! father of the English name,
O valiant Edward! first in civil fame,
O William! height of public virtue pure,
Bend from your radiant seats a joyful eye
Behold the sum of all your labours nigh,
Your plans of law complete, your ends of rule secure.

VIII.

'Twas then—O shame! O soul from faith
estrang'd!
O Albion oft to flattering vows a prey!
'Twas then—Thy thought what sudden frenzy chang'd?
What rushing palsy took thy strength away?
Is this the man in freedom's cause approv'd?
The man so great, so honour'd, so belov'd?
Whom the dead envy'd, and the living bless'd?
This patient slave by tinsel bonds allur'd?
This wretched suitor for a boon abjur'd?
Whom those that fear'd him, scorn; that trusted him, detest?

IX.

O lost alike to action and repose!
With all that habit of familiar fame,
Sold to the mockery of relentless foes, [shame,
And doom'd to exhaust the dregs of life in
To act with burning brow and throbbing heart
A poor deserter's dull exploded part,
To slight the favour thou canst hope no more,
Renounce the giddy crowd the vulgar wind,
Charge thy own lightness on thy country's mind,
And from her voice appeal to each tame foreign shore.

X.

But England's sons, to purchase thence applause,
Shall ne'er the loyalty of slaves pretend,
By courtly passions try the public cause;
Nor to the forms of rule betray the end.
O race erect! by manliest passions mov'd,
The labours which to virtue stand approv'd,
Prompt with a lover's fondness to survey;
Yet, where injustice works her wilful claim,
Fierce as the flight of Jove's destroying flame,
Impatient to confront, and dreadful to repay.

XI.

These thy heart owns no longer. In their room
See the grave queen of pageants, honour, dwell,

Couch'd in thy bosom's deep tempestuous gloom
Like some grim idol in a forcerer's cell.
Before her rites thy sickening reason flew,
Divine persuasion from thy tongue withdrew,
While laughter mock'd, or pity stole a sigh:
Can wit her tender movements rightly frame
Where the prime function of the soul is lame?
Can fancy's feeble springs the force of truth supply?

XII.

But come: 'tis time: strong destiny impends
To shut thee from the joys thou hast betray'd:
With princes fill'd, the solemn fane ascends,
By infamy, the mindful demon sway'd.
There vengeful vows for guardian laws effac'd,
From nations fetter'd, and from towns laid waste,
For ever through the spacious courts resound:
Their long posterity's united groan
And the sad charge of horrors not their own,
Assail the giant chiefs, and press them to the ground.

XIII.

In sight old Time, imperious judge, awaits:
Above revenge, or fear, or pity, just,
He urgeth onward to those guilty gates
The great, the sage, the happy, and august.
And still he asks them of the hidden plan
Whence every treaty, every war began,
Evolves their secrets and their guilt proclaims:
And still his hands despoil them on the road
Of each vain wreath by lying bards bestow'd,
And crush their trophies huge, and raise their sculptur'd names.

XIV.

Ye mighty shades, arise, give place, attend:
Here his eternal mansion Curio seeks: [bend,
—Low doth proud Wentworth to the stranger
And his dire welcome hardy Clifford speaks:
"He comes, whom fate with surer arts prepar'd
"To accomplish all which we but vainly dar'd:
"Whom o'er the stubborn herd she taught to
"reign— [power
"Who sooth'd with gaudy dreams their raging
"Even to its last irrevocable hour:
"Then baffled their rude strength, and broke
"them to the chain."

XV.

But ye, whom yet wise liberty inspires,
Whom for her champions o'er the world she claims,
(That household godhead whom of old your fires Sought in the woods of Elbe, and bore to Thames)
Drive ye this hostile omen far away;
Their own fell efforts on her foes repay;
Your wealth, your arts, your fame, be hers alone:
Still gird your swords to combat on her side;
Still frame your laws her generous test to abide;
And win to her defence the altar and the throne.

XVI.

Protect her from yourselves, ere yet the flood
Of golden luxury, which commerce pours,
Hath spread that selfish fierceness through your blood,
Which not her lightest discipline endures:
Snatch from fantastic demagogues her cause:
Dream not of Numa's manners, Plato's laws:
A wiser founder, and a nobler plan,
O sons of Alfred, were for you assign'd;
Bring to that birthright but an equal mind,
And no sublimer lot will fate reserve for man.

O D E X.

TO THE MUSE.

I.

QUEEN of my songs, harmonious maid,
Ah why hast thou withdrawn thy aid?
Ah why forsaken thus my breast
With inauspicious damps oppress'd?
Where is the dread prophetic heat,
With which my bosom wont to beat?
Where all the bright mysterious dreams
Of haunted groves and tuneful streams,
That woo'd my genius to divinest themes?

II.

Say, goddess, can the festal board,
Or young Olympia's form ador'd:
Say, can the pomp of promis'd fame
Relume thy faint, thy dying flame?
Or have melodious airs the power
To give one free, poetic hour?
Or, from amid the Elysian train,
The soul of Milton shall I gain,
To win thee back with some celestial strain?

III.

O powerful strain, O sacred soul!
His numbers every sense controul:
And now again my bosom burns;
The muse, the muse herself, returns.
Such on the banks of Tyne, confess'd,
I hail'd the fair immortal guest,
When first she seal'd me for her own,
Made all her blissful treasures known,
And bade me swear to follow her alone.

O D E XI.

ON LOVE. TO A FRIEND.

I.

No, foolish youth—To virtuous fame
If now thy early hopes be vow'd,
If true ambition's nobler flame
Command thy footsteps from the crowd,
Lean not to love's enchanting snare;
His songs, his words, his looks beware,
Nor join his votaries, the young and fair.

II.

By thought, by dangers, and by toils,
The wreath of just renown is worn;
Nor will ambition's awful spoils
The flowery pomp of ease adorn:
But love unbends the force of thought;
By love unmanly fears are taught;
And love's reward with gaudy sloth is bought.

III.

Yet thou hast read in tuneful lays,
And heard from many a zealous breast,
The pleasing tale of beauty's praise
In wisdom's lofty language dress'd;
Of beauty powerful to impart
Each finer sense, each comelier art,
And sooth and polish man's ungente heart.

IV.

If then, from love's deceit secure,
Thus far alone thy wishes tend,
Go; see the white-wing'd evening hour
On Delia's vernal walk descend:
Go, while the golden light serene,
The grove, the lawn, the soften'd scene,
Becomes the presence of the rural queen.

V.

Attend, while that harmonious tongue
Each bosom, each desire commands:
Apollo's lute by Hermes strung
And touch'd by chaste Minerva's hands,
Attend. I feel a force divine,
O Delia, win my thoughts to thine;
That half the colour of thy life is mine.

VI.

Yet, conscious of the dangerous charm,
Soon would I turn my steps away;
Nor oft provoke the lovely harm,
Nor lull my reason's watchful sway.
But thou, my friend—I hear thy sighs:
Alas, I read thy downcast eyes;
And thy tongue falters; and thy colour flies.

VII.

So soon again to meet the fair?
So pensive all this absent hour?
—O yet, unlucky youth, beware,
While yet to think is in thy power.
In vain with friendship's flattering name
Thy passion veils its inward shame;
Friendship, the treacherous fuel of thy flame!

VIII.

Once I remember, new to love,
And dreading his tyrannic chain,
I sought a gentle maid to prove
What peaceful joys in friendship reign;
Whence we forsooth might safely stand,
And pitying view the love-sick band,
And mock the winged boy's malicious hand.

IX.

Thus frequent pass'd the cloudless day,
To smiles and sweet discourse resign'd;
While I exulted to survey
One generous woman's real mind:
Till friendship soon my languid breast
Each night with unknown cares possess'd,
Dash'd my coy slumbers, or my dreams distress'd.

X.

Fool that I was!—And now, even now
While thus I preach the Stoic strain,
Unless I shun Olympia's view,
An hour unsays it all again.
O friend!—when love directs her eyes
To pierce where every passion lies,
Where is the firm, the cautious, or the wise?

O D E XII.

TO SIR FRANCIS HENRY DRAKE, BART.

I.

BEHOLD, the balance in the sky
Swift on the wintery scale inclines;
To earthy caves the Dryads fly,
And the bare pastures Pan resigns.
Late did the farmer's fork o'erspread
With recent soil the twice-mown mead,
Tainting the bloom which autumn knows:
He whets the rusty coulter now,
He binds his oxen to the plough,
And wide his future harvest throws.

II.

Now, London's busy confines round,
By Kensington's imperial towers,

From Highgate's rough descent profound,
Essexian heaths, or Kentish bowers,
Where'er I pass, I see approach
Some rural statesman's eager coach
Hurried by senatorial cares:
Where rural nymphs (alike within,
Aspiring courtly praise to win)
Debate their dress, reform their airs.

III.

Say, what can now the country boast,
O Drake, thy footsteps to detain,
When peevish winds and gloomy frost
The sunshine of the temper stain?
Say, are the priests of Devon grown
Friends to this tolerating throne,
Champions for George's legal right?
Have general freedom, equal law,
Won to the glory of Nassau
Each bold Westsaxon squire and knight?

IV.

I doubt it much; and guess at least
That when the day, which made us free,
Shall next return, that sacred feast
Thou better may'st observe with me.
With me the sulphurous treason old
A far inferior part shall hold
In that glad day's triumphal strain;
And generous William be rever'd,
Nor one untimely accent heard
Of James or his ignoble reign.

V.

Then, while the Gascon's fragrant wine
With modest cups our joy supplies,
We'll truly thank the power divine
Who bade the chief, the patriot rise;
Rise from heroic ease (the spoil
Due, for his youth's Herculean toil,
From Belgium to her saviour son)
Rise with the same unconquer'd zeal
For our Britannia's injur'd weal,
Her laws defac'd, her shrines o'erthrown.

VI.

He came. The tyrant from our shore,
Like a forbidden demon, fled;
And to eternal exile bore
Pontific rage and vassal dread.
There sunk the mouldering Gothic reign:
New years came forth, a liberal train,
Call'd by the people's great decree.
That day, my friend, let blessings crown:
—Fill, to the demigod's renown
From whom thou hast that thou art free.

VII.

Then, Drake, (for wherefore should we part
The public and the private weal?)
In vows to her who sways thy heart,
Fair health, glad fortune, will we deal.
Whether Aglaia's blooming cheek,
Or the soft ornaments that speak
So eloquent in Daphne's smile,
Whether the piercing lights that fly
From the dark heaven of Myrto's eye,
Haply thy fancy then beguile.

VIII.

For so it is. Thy stubborn breast,
Though touch'd by many a slighter wound,
Hath no full conquest yet confess'd,
Nor the one fatal charmer found.

While I, a true and loyal swain,
My fair Olympia's gentle reign
Through all the varying seasons own.
Her genius still my bosom warms :
No other maid for me hath charms,
Or I have eyes for her alone.

O D E XIII.

ON LYRIC POETRY.

I. 1.

ONCE more I join the Thespian choir,
And taste the inspiring fount again :
O parent of the Grecian lyre,
Admit me to thy powerful strain—
And lo, with ease my step invades
The pathless vale and opening shades,
Till now I spy her verdant seat :
And now at large I drink the sound,
While these her offspring, listening round,
By turns her melody repeat.

I. 2.

I see Anacreon smile and sing,
His silver tresses breathe perfume ;
His cheek displays a second spring
Of roses taught by wine to bloom.
Away, deceitful cares, away,
And let me listen to his lay ;
Let me the wanton pomp enjoy,
While in smooth dance his light-wing'd hours
Lead round his lyre its patron powers,
Kind laughter and convivial joy.

I. 3.

Broke from the fetters of his native land,
Devoting shame and vengeance to her lords,
With louder impulse and a threatening hand
The Lesbian patriot smites the sounding chords :
Ye wretches, ye perfidious train,
Ye curs'd of gods and free-born men,
Ye murderers of the laws,
Though now ye glory in your lust,
Though now ye tread the feeble neck in dust,
Yet time and righteous Jove will judge your dreadful cause.

II. 1.

But lo, to Sappho's melting airs
Descends the radiant queen of love :
She smiles, and asks what fonder cares
Her suppliant's plaintive measures move :
Why is my faithful maid distress'd ?
Who, Sappho, wounds thy tender breast !
Say, flies he ?—Soon he shall pursue :
Shuns he thy gifts ?—He soon shall give :
Slights he thy sorrows ?—He shall grieve,
And soon to all thy wishes bow.

II. 2.

But, O Melpomene, for whom
Awakes thy golden shell again ?
What mortal breath shall e'er presume
To echo that unbounded strain ?
Majestic in the frown of years,
Behold the † man of Thebes appears :
For some there are, whose mighty frame
The hand of Jove at birth endow'd

* Alcæus.

† Pindar.

With hopes that mock the gazing crowd ;
As eagles drink the noon-tide flame.

II. 3.

While the dim raven beats her weary wings,
And clamours far below.—Propitious muse,
While I so late unlock thy purer springs,
And breathe whate'er thy ancient airs infuse,
Wilt thou for Albion's sons around
(Ne'er hadst thou audience more renown'd)
Thy charming arts employ,
As when the winds from shore to shore
Through Greece thy lyre's persuasive language
bore,

Till towns and isles and seas return'd the vocal joy ?

III. 1.

Yet then did pleasure's lawless throng,
Oft rushing forth in loose attire,
Thy virgin dance, thy graceful song,
Pollute with impious revels dire.
O fair ! O chaste ! thy echoing shade
May no foul discord here invade :
Nor let thy strings one accent move,
Except what earth's untroubled ear
'Mid all her social tribes may hear,
And heaven's unerring throne approve.

III. 2.

Queen of the lyre, in thy retreat
The fairest flowers of Pindus glow ;
The vine aspires to crown thy seat,
And myrtles round thy laurel grow :
Thy strings adapt their varied strain
To every pleasure, every pain,
Which mortal tribes were born to prove ;
And strait our passions rise or fall,
As at the wind's imperious call
The ocean swells, the billows move.

III. 3.

When midnight listenso'er the slumbering earth,
Let me, O muse ! thy solemn whispers hear :
When morning sends her fragrant breezes forth,
With airy murmurs touch my opening ear.
And ever watchful at thy side,
Let wisdom's awful suffrage guide
The tenor of thy lay :
To her of old by Jove was given
To judge the various deeds of earth and heaven ;
'Twas thine by gentle arts to win us to her sway.

IV. 1.

Oft as, to well-earn'd ease resign'd,
I quit the maze where science toils,
Do thou refresh my yielding mind
With all thy gay, delusive spoils,
But, O indulgent, come not nigh
The busy steps, the jealous eye
Of wealthy care or gainful age ;
Whose barren souls thy joys disdain,
And hold as foes to reason's reign
Whome'er thy lovely works engage.

IV. 2.

When friendship and when letter'd mirth
Haply partake my simple board,
Then let thy blameless hand call forth
The music of the Teian chord.
Or if invok'd at softer hours,
O ! seek with me the happy bowers
That hear Olympia's gentle tongue ;
To beauty link'd with virtue's train,

To love devoid of jealous pain,
There let the Sapphic lute be strung:

IV. 3.

But when from envy and from death to claim
A hero bleeding for his native land;
When to throw incense on the vestal flame
Of liberty my genius gives command,
Nor Theban voice nor Lesbian lyre
From thee! O muse, do I require;
While my presaging mind,
Conscious of powers she never knew,
Astonish'd grasps at things beyond her view,
Nor by another's fate submits to be confin'd.

O D E XIV.

TO THE HON. CHARLES TOWNSEND.

From the country.

I.

SAY, Townshend, what can London boast
To pay thee for the pleasures lost,
The health to-day resign'd;
When spring from this her favourite seat
Bade winter hasten his retreat,
And met the western wind.

II.

Oh knew'st thou how the barmy air,
The sun, the azure heavens prepare
To heal thy languid frame;
No more would noisy courts engage,
In vain would lying faction's rage
Thy sacred leisure claim.

III.

Oft I look'd forth, and oft admir'd;
Till with the studious volume tir'd
I sought the open day;
And sure, I cry'd, the rural gods
Expect me in their green abodes,
And chide my tardy stay.

IV.

But ah in vain my restless feet
Trac'd every silent shady seat
Which knew their forms of old:
Nor Naiad by her fountain laid,
Nor Wood-nymph tripping through her glade,
Did now their rites unfold:

V.

Whether to nurse some infant oak
They turn the slowly-tinkling brook
And catch the pearly showers,
Or brush the mildew from the woods,
Or paint with noon-tide beams the buds,
Or breathe on opening flowers.

VI.

Such rites, which they with spring renew,
The eyes of care can never view;
And care hath long been mine:
And hence offended with their guest,
Since grief of love my soul oppress'd,
They hide their toils divine.

VII.

But soon shall thy enlivening tongue
This heart, by dear affliction wrung,
With noble hope inspire:

Then will the sylvan powers again
Receive me in their genial train,
And listen to my lyre.

VIII.

Beneath yon Dryad's lonely shade,
A rustic altar shall be paid,
Of turf with laurel fram'd:
And thou the inscription wilt approve;
"This for the peace which, lost by love,
"By friendship was reclaim'd."

O D E XV.

TO THE EVENING-STAR.

I.

TO-NIGHT retir'd the queen of heaven
With young Endymion strays:
And now to Hesper is it given
A while to rule the vacant sky,
Till she shall to her lamp supply
A stream of lighter rays.

II.

O Hesper! while the starry throng
With awe thy paths surrounds,
Oh listen to my suppliant song,
If haply now the vocal sphere
Can suffer thy delighted ear
To stoop to mortal sounds.

III.

So may the bridegroom's genial strain
Thee still invoke to shine:
So may the bride's unmarried train
To Hymen chaunt their flattering vow,
Still that his lucky torch may glow
With lustre pure as thine.

IV.

Far other vows must I prefer
To thy indulgent power,
Alas! but now I paid my tear
On fair Olympia's virgin tomb:
And lo, from thence, in quest I roam
Of Philomela's bower.

V.

Propitious send thy golden ray,
Thou purest light above:
Let no false flame seduce to stray
Where gulf or steep lie hid for harm:
But lead where music's healing charm
May sooth afflicted love.

VI.

To them, by many a grateful song
In happier seasons vow'd,
These lawns, Olympia's haunt, belong:
Oft by yon silver stream we walk'd,
Or fix'd, while Philomela talk'd,
Beneath yon copses stood.

VII.

Nor seldom, where the beachen boughs
That roofless tower invade,
We come while her enchanting muse
The radiant moon above us held:
Till by a clamorous owl compell'd
She fled the solemn shade.

VIII.

But hark; I hear her liquid tone.
Now, Hesper, guide my feet
Down the red marl with moss o'ergrown,

Through yon wild thicket next the plain,
Whose hawthorns choke the winding lane
Which leads to her retreat.

IX.

See the green space; on either hand
Enlarg'd it spreads around:
See, in the midst she takes her stand,
Where one old oak his awful shade
Extends o'er half the level mead
Enclos'd in woods profound.

X.

Hark, how through many a melting note
She now prolongs her lays:
How sweetly down the void they float!
The breeze their magic path attends:
The stars shine out: the forest bends:
The wakeful heifers gaze.

XI.

Whoe'er thou art whom chance may bring
To this sequester'd spot,
If then the plaintive syren sing,
Oh softly tread beneath her bower,
And think of heaven's disposing power,
Of man's uncertain lot.

XII.

Oh think, o'er all this mortal stage,
What mournful scenes arise:
What ruin waits on kingly rage:
How often virtue dwells with woe:
How many griefs from knowledge flow:
How swiftly pleasure flies.

XIII.

O sacred bird, let me at eve,
Thus wandering all alone,
Thy tender counsel oft receive,
Bear witness to thy pensive airs,
And pity nature's common cares
Till I forget my own.

O D E XVI.

TO CALEB HARDINGE, M. D.

I.

With sordid floods the wintery * urn
Hath stain'd fair Richmond's level green:
Her naked hill the Dryads mourn,
No longer a poetic scene.
No longer there thy raptur'd eye
The beauteous forms of earth or sky
Surveys as in their author's mind;
And London shelters from the year
Those whom thy social hours to share
The Attic muse design'd.

II.

From Hampstead's airy summit me
Her guest the city shall behold,
What day the people's stern decree
To unbelieving kings is told,
When common men (the dread of fame)
Adjudget as one of evil name,
Before the sun, the anointed head.
Then seek thou too the pious town,

* Aquarius.

With no unworthy cares to crown
That evening's awful shade.

III.

Deem not I call thee to deplore
The sacred martyr of the day,
By fast and penitential lore
To purge our ancient guilt away.
For this, on humble faith I rest
That still our advocate, the priest,
From heavenly wrath will save the land:
Nor ask what rites our pardon gain,
Nor how his potent sounds restrain
The thunderer's lifted hand.

IV.

No, Hardinge: peace to church and state
That evening, let the muse give law:
While I anew the theme relate
Which my first youth enamour'd saw.
Then will I oft explore thy thought,
What to reject which Locke hath taught,
What to pursue in Virgil's lay:
Till hope ascends to loftiest things,
Nor envious demagogues or kings
Their frail and vulgar sway.

V.

O vers'd in all the human frame,
Lead thou where'er my labour lies,
And English fancy's eager flame
To Grecian purity chastise:
While hand in hand, at wisdom's shrine,
Beauty with truth I strive to join,
And grave assent with glad applause;
To paint the story of the soul,
And Plato's visions to controul
By Verulamian * laws.

O D E XVII.

ON A SERMON AGAINST GLORY.

1747.

I.

Come then, tell me, sage divine,
Is it an offence to own
That our bosoms e'er incline
Toward immortal glory's throne?
For with me nor pomp, nor pleasure,
Bourbon's might, Braganza's treasure,
So can fancy's dream rejoice,
So conciliate reason's choice,
As one approving word of her impartial voice.

II.

If to spurn at noble praise
Be the passport to thy heaven,
Follow thou those gloomy ways;
No such law to me was given,
Nor, I trust, shall I deplore me
Faring like my friends before me;
Nor an holier place desire
Than Timoleon's arms acquire,
And Tully's curule chair, and Milton's golden lyre.

* Verulum gave one of his titles to Francis Bacon, Novum Organum.

O D E XVIII.

TO THE RIGHT HONOURABLE FRANCIS EARL OF HUNTINGDON.

1747.

I. 1.

THE wise and great of every clime,
Through all the spacious walks of time,
Where'er the muse her power display'd,
With joy have listen'd, and obey'd.
For, taught of heaven the sacred nine
Persuasive numbers, forms divine,
To mortal sense impart :
They best the soul with glory fire ;
They noblest counsels, boldest deeds inspire ;
And high o'er fortune's rage enthrone the fixed heart.

I. 2.

Nor less prevailing is their charm
The vengeful bosom to disarm ;
To melt the proud with human woe,
And prompt unwilling tears to flow.
Can wealth a power like this afford ?
Can Cromwell's arts, or Marlborough's sword,
An equal empire claim ?
No, Hastings. Thou my words will own :
Thy breast the gifts of every Muse hath known ;
Nor shall the giver's love disgrace thy noble
name.

I. 3.

The Muse's awful art,
And the blest function of the poet's tongue,
Ne'er shalt thou blush to honour ; to assert
From all that scorned vice or slavish fear hath sung,
Nor shall the blandishment of Tuscan strings,
Warbling at will in pleasure's myrtle bower ;
Nor shall the servile notes to Celtic kings
By flattering minstrels paid in evil hour,
Move thee to spurn the heavenly Muse's reign,
A different strain,
And other themes
From her prophetic shades and hallow'd streams
(Thou well canst witness) meet the purged
ear :
Such, as when Greece to her immortal shell
Rejoicing listen'd, godlike sounds to hear ;
To hear the sweet instructress tell
(While men and heroes throng'd around)
How life its noblest use may find,
How well for freedom be resign'd ;
And how, by glory, virtue shall be crown'd.

II. 1.

Such was the Chian father's strain
To many a kind domestic train,
Whose pious hearth and genial bowl
Had cheer'd the reverend pilgrim's soul :
When, every hospitable rite
With equal bounty to requite,
He struck his magic strings ;
And pour'd spontaneous numbers forth,
And seiz'd their ears with tales of ancient worth, [things.
And fill'd their musing hearts with vast heroic
VOL. IX.

II. 2.

Now oft, where happy spirits dwell,
Where yet he tunes his charming shell,
Oft near him, with applauding hands,
The genius of his country stands.
To listening gods he makes him known,
That man divine, by whom were sown
The seeds of Grecian fame :
Who first the race with freedom fir'd ;
From whom Lycurgus Sparta's sons inspir'd ;
From whom Platæan palms and Cyprian trophies came.

II. 3.

O noblest, happiest age !
When Aristides rul'd, and Cimon fought ;
When all the generous fruits of Homer's page
Exulting Pindar saw to full perfection brought.
O Pindar, oft shalt thou be hail'd of me :
Not that Apollo fed thee from his shrine ;
Not that thy lips drank sweetness from the bee ;
Nor yet that, studious of thy notes divine,
Pan danc'd their measure with the sylvan
throng :

But that thy song
Was proud to unfold
What thy base rulers trembled to behold ;
Amid corrupted Thebes was proud to tell
The deeds of Athens and the Persian shame :
Hence on thy head their impious vengeance fell,
But thou, O faithful to thy fame,
The Muse's law didst rightly know ;
That who would animate his lays,
And other minds to virtue raise,
Must feel his own with all her spirit glow.

III. 1.

Are there, approv'd of later times,
Whose verse adorn'd a tyrant's crimes ?
Who saw majestic Rome betray'd,
And lent the imperial ruffian aid ?
Alas ! not one polluted bard,
No, not the strains that Mincius heard,
Or Tibur's hills reply'd,
Dare to the Muse's ear aspire ;
Save that, instructed by the Grecian lyre,
With freedom's ancient notes their shameful task they hide.

III. 2.

Mark, how the dread Pantheon stands,
Amid the domes of modern hands :
Amid the toys of idle state,
How simply, how serenely great !
Then turn, and, while each western clime
Presents her tuneful sons to time,
So mark thou Milton's name ;
And add, " Thus differs from the throng
" The spirit which inform'd thy awful song,
" Which bade thy potent voice protect thy
" country's fame."

III. 3.

Yet hence barbaric zeal
His memory with unholy rage pursues ;
While from these arduous cares of public weal
She bids each bard begone, and rest him with his Muse.

* Octavianus Caesar.

O fool ! to think the man, whose ample mind
Must grasp at all that yonder stars survey ;
Must join the noblest forms of every kind,
The world's most perfect image to display,
Can e'er his country's majesty behold,
Unmov'd or cold !

O fool ! to deem

That he, whose thought must visit every theme,
Whose heart must every strong emotion know
Inspir'd by nature, or by fortune taught ;
That he, if haply some presumptuous foe,
With false ignoble science fraught,
Shall spurn at freedom's faithful band ;
That he their dear defence will shun,
Or hide their glories from the sun,
Or deal their vengeance with a woman's hand !

IV. 1.

I care not that in Arno's plain,
Or on the sportive banks of Seine,
From public themes the Muse's quire
Content with polish'd ease retire.
Where priests the studious head command,
Where tyrants bow the warlike hand
To vile ambition's aim,
Say, what can public themes afford,
Save venal honours to an hateful lord,
Reserv'd for angry heaven, and scorn'd of honest
fame ?

IV. 2.

But here, where freedom's equal throne
To all her valiant sons is known ;
Where all are conscious of her cares,
And each the power, that rules him, shares ;
Here let the bard, whose dastard tongue
Leaves public arguments unsung,
Bid public praise farewell :
Let him to fitter climes remove,
Far from the hero's and the patriot's love,
And lull mysterious monks to slumber in their cell.

IV. 3.

O Hastings, not to all
Can ruling heaven the same endowments lend :
Yet still doth nature to her offspring call,
That to one general weal their different powers
they bend,

Unenvious. Thus alone, though strains divine
Inform the bosom of the Muse's son ;
Though with new honours the patrician's line
Advance from age to age ; yet thus alone
They win the suffrage of impartial fame.

The poet's name

He best shall prove,

Whose lays the soul with noblest passions
move.

But thee, O progeny of heroes old,
Thee to severer toils thy fate requires :

The fate which form'd thee in a chosen mould,
The grateful country of thy fires,
Thee to sublimer paths demand ;
Sublimier than thy fires could trace,
Or thy own Edward teach his race,
Though Gaul's proud genius sank beneath his hand.

V. 1.

From rich domains and subject farms,
They led the rustic youth to arms ;

And kings their stern atchievements fear'd
While private strife their banners rear'd.
But loftier scenes to thee are shown,
Where empire's wide-establish'd throne

No private master fills :

Where, long foretold, the people reigns :
Where each a vassal's humble heart disdains ;
And judgeth what he sees ; and, as he judgeth, wills.

V. 2.

Here be it thine to calm and guide
The swelling democratic tide ;
To watch the state's uncertain frame,
And baffle faction's partial aim :
But chiefly, with determin'd zeal,
To quell that servile band, who kneel
To freedom's banish'd foes ;
That monster, which is daily found
Expert and bold thy country's peace to wound ;
Yet dreads to handle arms, nor manly counsel knows.

V. 3.

'Tis highest heaven's command,
That guilty aims should fordid paths pursue ;
That what ensnares the heart should maim the
hand,
And virtue's worthless foes be false to glory too.
But look on freedom. See, through every age,
What labours, perils, griefs, hath she disdain'd !
What arms, what regal pride, what priestly rage,
Have her dread offspring conquer'd or sustain'd !
For Albion well have conquer'd. Let the strains

Of happy swains,

Which now resound

Where Scarfsdale's cliffs the swelling pastures
bound,

Bear witness. There, oft let the farmer hail
The sacred orchard which embowers his gate,
And show to strangers passing down the vale,
Where Ca'ndish, Booth, and Osborne fate ;
When, bursting from their country's chain,
Even in the midst of deadly harms,
Of papal snares and lawless arms,
They plann'd for freedom this her noblest reign.

VI. 1.

This reign, these laws, this public care,
Which Nassau gave us all to share,
Had ne'er adorn'd the English name,
Could fear have silenc'd freedom's claim,
But fear in vain attempts to bind
Those lofty efforts of the mind
Which social good inspires ;
Where men, for this, assault a throne,
Each adds the common welfare to his own ;
And each unconquer'd heart the strength of all acquires.

VI. 2.

Say, was it thus, when late we view'd
Our fields in civil blood imbrued ?
When fortune crown'd the barbarous host,
And half the astonish'd isle was lost ?
Did one of all that vaunting train,
Who dare affront a peaceful reign,
Durst one in arms appear ?
Durst one in counsels pledge his life ?

Stake his luxurious fortunes in the strife?
Or lend his boasted name his vagrant friends to cheer?

VI. 3.

Yet, Hastings, these are they
Who challenge to themselves thy country's love;
The true; the constant: who alone can weigh,
What glory should demand, or liberty approve!
But let their works declare them. Thy free
powers,

The generous powers of thy prevailing mind,
Not for the talks of their confederate hours,
Lewd brawls and lurking slander, where design'd,
Be thou thy own approver. Honest praise

Oft nobly sways

Ingenuous youth:

But, fought from cowards and the lying mouth,
Praise is reproach. Eternal God alone
For mortals fixeth that sublime award.

He, from the faithful records of his throne,

Bids the historian and the bard

Dispose of honour and of scorn;

Discern the patriot from the slave;

And write the good, the wise, the brave,
For lessons to the multitude unborn.

BOOK II. ODE I.

THE REMONSTRANCE OF SHAKESPEARE.

*Supposed to have been spoken at the Theatre-
Royal, while the French Comedians were acting by Subscription.*

1749.

If, yet regardful of your native land,
Old Shakspeare's tongue you deign to understand,

Lo, from the blissful bowers where Heaven rewards
Instructive sages and unblemish'd bards,
I come, the ancient founder of the stage,
Intent to learn, in this discerning age,
What form of wit your fancies have embrac'd,
And wither tends your elegance of taste,
That thus at length our homely toils you spurn,
That thus to foreign scenes you proudly turn,
That from my brow the laurel wreath you claim
To crown the rivals of your country's fame.

What, though the footsteps of my devious muse
The measur'd walks of Grecian art refuse?
Or though the frankness of my hardy style
Mock the nice touches of the critic's file?
Yet, what my age and climate held to view,
Impartial I survey'd and fearless drew.

And say, ye skilful in the human heart,
Who know to prize a poet's noblest part,
What age, what clime, could e'er an ampler field
For lofty thought, for daring fancy, yield?

I saw this England break the shameful bands

Forg'd for the souls of men by sacred hands:

I saw each groaning realm her aid implore;

Her sons the heroes of each warlike shore:

Her naval standard (the dire Spaniard's bane)

Obey'd through all the circuit of the main.

Then too great commerce, for a late-found world,
Around your coast her eager sails unfurl'd;

New hopes, new passions, thence the bosom fir'd;
New plans, new arts, the genius thence inspir'd;
Thence every scene, which private fortune knows
In stronger life, with bolder spirit rose.

Disgrac'd I this full prospect which I drew?
My colours languid, or my strokes untrue?
Have not your sages, warriors, swains, and kings,
Confess'd the living draught of men and things?

What other bard in any clime appears

Alike the master of your smiles and tears?

Yet have I deign'd your audience to entice

With wretched bribes to luxury and vice!

Or have my various scenes a purpose known

Which freedom, virtue, glory, might not own?

Such from the first was my dramatic plan;

It should be yours to crown what I began:

And now that England spurns her Gothic chain,

And equal laws and social science reign,

I thought, Now surely shall my zealous eyes

View nobler bards and juster critics rise,

Intent with learned labour to refine

The espious ore of Albion's native mine,

Our stately muse more graceful airs to teach,

And form her tongue to more attractive speech,

Till rival nations listen at her feet,

And own her polish'd as they own'd her great.

But do you thus my favourite hopes fulfil?

Is France at last the standard of your skill?

Alas for you! that so betray a mind

Of art unconscious, and to beauty blind.

Say; does her language your ambition raise,

Her barren, trivial, unharmonious phrase,

Which fetters eloquence to scantiest bounds,

And maims the cadence of poetic sounds?

Say; does your humble admiration choose

The gentle prattle of her comic muse,

While wits, plain-dealers, fops, and fools appear,

Charg'd to say nought but what the king may hear?

Or rather melt your sympathizing hearts

Won by her tragic scene's romantic arts,

Where old and young declaim on soft desire,

And heroes never, but for love expire?

No. Though the charms of novelty, a while,

Perhaps too fondly win your thoughtless smile,

Yet not for you design'd indulgent fate

The modes or manners of the Bourbon state.

And ill your minds my partial judgment reads,

And many an augury my hope misleads,

If the fair maids of yonder blooming train

To their light courtship would an audience deign,

Or those chaste matrons a Parisian wife,

Choose for the model of domestic life;

Or if one youth of all that generous band,

The strength and splendour of their native land,

Would yield his portion of his country's fame,

And quit old freedom's patrimonial claim,

With lying smiles oppression's pomp to see,

And judge of glory by a king's decree.

O blest at home with justly-envied laws,

O long the chiefs of Europe's general cause,

Whom Heaven hath chosen at each dangerous hour

To check the inroads of barbaric power,

The rights of trampled nations to reclaim,

And guard the social world from bonds and shame;

Oh let not luxury's fantastic charms

Thus give the lie to your heroic arms:

Nor for the ornaments of life embrace
 Dishonest lessons from that vaunting race,
 Whom fate's dread laws (for, in eternal fate,
 Despotic rule was heir to freedom's hate)
 Whom, in each warlike, each commercial part,
 In civil counsel, and in pleasing art,
 The judge of earth predestin'd for your foes,
 And made it fame and virtue to oppose.

O D E II.

TO SLEEP.

I.

Thou silent power, whose welcome sway
 Charms every anxious thought away;
 In whose divine oblivion drown'd,
 Sore pain and weary toil grow mild,
 Love is with kinder looks beguil'd,
 And grief forgets her fondly-cherish'd wound;
 O whither hast thou flown, indulgent god?
 God of kind shadows and of healing dews,
 Whom dost thou touch with thy Lethæan rod?
 Around whose temples now thy opiate airs diffuse?

II.

Lo, midnight from her starry reign
 Looks awful down on earth and main.
 The tuneful birds lie hush'd in sleep,
 With all that crop the verdant food,
 With all that skim the crystal flood,
 Or haunt the caverns of the rocky steep.
 No rushing winds disturb the tufted bowers;
 No wakeful sound the moon-light valley knows,
 Save where the brook its liquid murmur pours,
 And lulls the waving scene to more profound repose.

III.

O let not me alone complain,
 Alone invoke thy power in vain!
 Descend, propitious, on my eyes;
 Not from the couch that bears a crown,
 Not from the courtly statesman's down,
 Nor where the miser and his treasure lies: [rest,
 Bring not the shapes that break the murderer's
 Nor those the hireling soldier loves to see,
 Nor those which haunt the bigot's gloomy breast:
 Far be their guilty nights, and far their dreams
 from me!

IV.

Nor yet those awful forms present,
 For chiefs and heroes only meant:
 The figur'd brass, the choral song,
 The rescued people's glad applause,
 The listening senate, and the laws
 Fix'd by the counsels of * Timoleon's tongue,
 Are scenes too grand for fortune's private ways;
 And though they shine in youth's ingenuous
 view,
 The sober gainful arts of modern days
 To such romantic thoughts have bid a long adieu.

* After Timoleon had delivered Syracuse from the tyranny of Dionysius, the people on every important deliberation sent for him into the public assembly, asked his advice, and voted according to it. PLUTARCH.

V.

I ask not, god of dreams, thy care
 To banish love's presentments fair:
 Nor rosy cheek, nor radiant eye
 Can arm him with such strong command
 That the young forcerer's fatal hand
 Shall round my soul his pleasing fetters tie.
 Nor yet the courtier's hope, the giving smile
 (A lighter phantom, and a baser chain)
 Did e'er in slumber my proud lyre beguile
 To lend the pomp of thrones her ill-according strain.

VI.

But Morpheus, on thy balmy wing
 Such honourable visions bring,
 As sooth'd great Milton's injur'd age,
 When in prophetic dreams he saw
 The race unborn with pious awe
 Imbibe each virtue from his heavenly page:
 Or such as Mead's benignant fancy knows
 When health's deep treasures, by his heart ex-
 plor'd,
 Have sav'd the infant from an orphan's woes,
 Or to the trembling fire his age's hope restor'd.

O D E III.

TO THE CUCKOW.

I.

O RUSTIC herald of the spring,
 At length in yonder woody vale
 Fast by the brook I hear thee sing;
 And, studious of thy homely tale,
 Amid the vespers of the grove,
 Amid the chaunting choir of love,
 Thy sage responses hail.

II.

The time has been when I have frown'd
 To hear thy voice the woods invade;
 And while thy solemn accent drown'd
 Some sweeter poet of the shade,
 Thus, thought I, thus the sons of care
 Some constant youth, or generous fair
 With dull advice upbraid.

III.

I said, "While Philomela's song
 Proclaims the passion of the grove,
 "It ill befits a cuckow's tongue
 "Her charming language to reprove"
 Alas, how much a lover's ear
 Hates all the sober truth to hear,
 The sober truth of love!

IV.

When hearts are in each other blest'd,
 When nought but lofty faith can rule
 The nymph's and swain's consenting breast,
 How cuckow-like in Cupid's school,
 With store of grave prudential saws
 On fortune's power, and custom's laws,
 Appears each friendly fool!

V.

Yet think betimes, ye gentle train
 Whom love, and hope, and fancy sway,
 Whom every harsher care disdain,
 Who by the morning judge the day,
 Think that, in April's fairest hours,

To warbling shades and painted flowers
The cuckow joins his lay.

O D E IV.

TO THE HONOURABLE CHARLES TOWNSHEND.

1750.

I. 1.

How oft shall I survey
This humble roof, the lawn, the greenwood shade,
The vale with sheaves o'erspread,
The glassy brook, the flocks which round thee stray;
When will thy cheerful mind
Of these have utter'd all her dear esteem?
Or, tell me, dost thou deem
No more to join in glory's toilsome race,
But here content embrace
That happy leisure which thou hadst resign'd?

I. 2.

Alas, ye happy hours,
When books and youthful sport the soul could share,
Ere one ambitious care
Of civil life had aw'd her simpler powers;
Oft as your winged train
Revisit here my friend in white array,
O fail not to display
Each fairer scene where I perchance had part,
That so his generous heart
The abode of even friendship may remain.

I. 3.

For not imprudent of my loss to come,
I saw from contemplation's quiet cell
His feet ascending to another home,
Where public praise and envied greatness dwell.
But shall we therefore, O my lyre,
Reprove ambition's best desire?
Extinguish glory's flame?
Far other was the task enjoin'd
When to my hand thy strings were first assign'd:
Far other faith belongs to friendship's honour'd
name.

II. 1.

Thee, Townshend, not the arms
Of slumbering ease, nor pleasure's rosy chain,
Were destin'd to detain:
No, nor bright science, nor the muse's charms.
For them high heaven prepares
Their proper votaries, an humbler band:
And ne'er would Spenser's hand
Have deign'd to strike the warbling Tuscan shell,
Nor Harrington to tell
What habit an immortal city wears.

II. 2.

Had this been born to shield [tray'd,
The cause which Cromwell's impious hand be-
Or that, like Vere, display'd
His redcross banner o'er the Belgian field;
Yet where the will divine
Hath shut those loftiest paths, it next remains,
With reason clad in strains
Of harmony, selected minds to inspire,
And virtue's living fire
To feed and eternize in hearts like thine.

II. 3.

For never shall the herd, whom envy sways,
So quell my purpose or my tongue controul,
That I should fear illustrious worth to praise,
Because its master's friendship mov'd my soul.
Yet, if this undissembling strain
Should now perhaps thine ear detain
With any pleasing sound,
Remember thou that righteous fame
From hoary age a strict account will claim
Of each auspicious palm with which thy youth was crown'd.

III. 1.

Nor obvious is the way
Where heaven expects thee; nor the traveller leads.
Through flowers or fragrant meads,
Or groves that hark to Philomela's lay.
The impartial laws of fate
To nobler virtues wed severer cares.
Is there a man who shares
The summit next where heavenly natures dwell?
Ask him (for he can tell)
What storms beat round that rough laborious height.

III. 2.

Ye heroes, who of old
Did generous England freedom's throne ordain;
From Alfred's parent reign
To Nassau, great deliverer, wise and bold;
I know your perils hard.
Your wounds, your painful marches, wintery seas,
The night estrang'd from ease,
The day by cowardice and falsehood vex'd,
The head with doubt perplex'd,
The indignant heart disdaining the reward.

III. 3.

Which envy hardly grants. But, O renown,
O praise from judging heaven and virtuous men,
If thus they purchas'd thy divinest crown,
Say, who shall hesitate? or who complain?
And now they sit on thrones above:
And when among the gods they move
Before the sov'reign mind,
"Lo, these," he saith, "lo, these are they
"Who to the laws of mine eternal sway
"From violence and fear asserted human kind."

IV. 1.

Thus honour'd while the train
Of legislators in his presence dwell;
If I may aught foretell,
The statesman shall the second palm obtain.
For dreadful deeds of arms
Let vulgar bards, with undiscerning praise,
More glittering trophies raise:
But wisest heaven what deeds may chiefly move
To favour and to love?
What, save the blessings, or averted harms?

IV. 2.

Nor to the embattled field
Shall the achievements of the peaceful gown,
The green immortal crown
Of valour, or the songs of conquest yield.
Nor Fairfax wildly bold,
While bare of crest he hew'd his fatal way,
Through Naseby's firm array,
To heavier dangers did his breast oppose,

Than Pym's free virtue chose,
When the proud force of Strafford he control'd.

IV. 3.

But what is man at enmity with truth? [mind
What were the fruits of Wentworth's copious
When blighted all the promise of his youth)
The patriot in a tyrant's league had join'd?

Let Ireland's loud-lamenting plains,
Let Tyne's and Humber's trampled swains,
Let menac'd London tell
How impious guile made wisdom base;
How generous zeal to cruel rage gave place;
And how unblest'd he liv'd, and how dishonour'd fell.

V. 1.

Thence never hath the muse
Around his tomb Pierian roses flung:
Nor shall one poet's tongue
His name for music's pleasing labour choose.
And sure, when nature kind
Hath deck'd some favour'd breast above the throng,
That man with grievous wrong
Affronts and wounds his genius, if he bends
To guilt's ignoble ends
The functions of his ill-submitting mind.

V. 2.

For worthy of the wise
Nothing can seem but virtue: nor earth yield
Their fame an equal field,
Save where impartial freedom gives the prize.
There Somers fix'd his name,
Enroll'd the next to William. There shall time
To every wondering clime
Point out that Somers, who from faction's crowd,
The slanderous and the loud,
Could fair assent and modest reverence claim.

V. 3.

Nor aught did laws or social arts acquire,
Nor this majestic weal of Albion's land
Did aught accomplish, or to aught aspire,
Without his guidance, his superior hand.
And rightly shall the muse's care
Wreaths like her own for him prepare,
Whose mind's enamour'd aim
Could forms of civil beauty draw
Sublime as ever sage or poet saw,
Yet still to life's rude scene the proud ideas tame.

VI. 1.

Let none profane be near!
The muse was never foreign to his breast:
On power's great feat confess'd.
Still to her voice he bent a lover's ear.
And if the blessed know
Their ancient cares, even now the unfading groves,
Where haply Milton roves
With Spenser, hear the enchanted echoes round
Through farthest heaven resound
With Somers, guardian of their fame below.

VI. 2.

He knew, the patriot knew,
That letters and the muses powerful art
Exalt the ingenuous heart,
And brighten every form of just and true.
They lend a nobler sway
To civil wisdom, than corruption's lure
Could ever yet procure:
They too from envy's pale malignant light
Conduct her forth to fight
Cloth'd in the fairest colours of the day.

I

VI. 3.

O Townshend, thus may time, the judge severe,
Instruct my happy tongue of thee to tell:
And when I speak of one to freedom dear
For planning wisely and for acting well,
Of one whom glory loves to own,
Who still by liberal means alone
Hath liberal ends pursued;
Then for the guerdon of my lay,
"This man with faithful friendship, will I say,
"From youth to honour'd age my arts and me
"hath view'd."

ODE V.

ON LOVE OF PRAISE.

I.

Of all the springs within the mind
Which prompt her steps in fortune's maze,
From none more pleasing aid we find
Than from the genuine love of praise.

II.

Nor any partial, private end
Such reverence to the public bears;
Nor any passion, virtue's friend,
So like to virtue's self appears.

III.

For who in glory can delight
Without delight in glorious deeds?
What man a charming voice can fling,
Who courts the echo that succeeds?

IV.

But not the echo on the voice
More, than on virtue praise depends;
To which, of course, its real price
The judgment of the praiser lends.

V.

If praise then with religious awe
From the sole perfect judge be sought,
A nobler aim, a purer law,
Nor priest, nor bard, nor sage hath taught.

VI.

With which in character the same
Though in an humbler sphere it lies,
I count that foul of human fame,
The suffrage of the good and wise.

ODE VI.

TO WILLIAM HALL, ESQUIRE.

With the Works of Chaulieu.

I.

ATTEND to Chaulieu's wanton lyre;
While, fluent as the sky-lark sings
When first the morn allures its wings,
The epicure his theme pursues:
And tell me if, among the choir
Whose music charms the bank of Seine,
So full, so free, so rich a strain
E'er dictated the warbling muse.

II.

Yet, Hall, while thy judicious ear
Admires the well-dissembled art
That can such harmony impart
To the lame pace of Gallic rhymes;
While wit from affectation clear,

Bright images, and passions true,
Recal to thy assenting view
The envied bards of nobler times;

III.

Say, is not oft his doctrine wrong?
This priest of pleasure, who aspires
To lead us to her sacred fires,
Knows he the ritual of her shrine?
Say (her sweet influence to thy song
So may the goddess still afford)
Doth she consent to be ador'd
With shameless love and frantic wing?

IV.

Nor Cato, nor Chrysippus here
Need we in high indignant phrase
From their Elysian quiet raise;
But pleasure's oracle alone
Consult; attentive, not severe.
O pleasure, we blaspheme not thee;
Nor emulate the rigid knee
Which bends but at the stoic throne.

V.

We own had fate to man assign'd
Nor sense, nor wish, but what obey
Or Venus soft or Bacchus gay,
Then might our bard's voluptuous creed
Most aptly govern human kind:
Unless perchance what he hath sung
Of tortur'd joints and nerves unstrung,
Some wrangling heretic should plead.

VI.

But now with all these proud desires
For dauntless truth and honest fame;
With that strong master of our frame,
The inexorable judge within,
What can be done? Alas, ye fires
Of love; alas, ye rosy smiles,
Ye nectar'd cups from happier soils,
—Ye have no bribe his grace to win.

O D E VII.

TO THE RIGHT REVEREND BENJAMIN LORD
BISHOP OF WINCHESTER. 1754.

I. 1.

For toils which patriots have endur'd,
For treason quell'd and laws secur'd,
In every nation time displays
The palm of honourable praise.
Envy may rail; and faction fierce
May strive: but what, alas, can those (Though bold, yet blind and sordid foes)
To gratitude and love oppose,
To faithful story and persuasive verse?

I. 2.

O nurse of freedom, Albion, say,
Thou tamer of despotic sway,
What man, among thy sons around,
Thus heir to glory hast thou found?
What page, in all thy annals bright,
Hast thou with purer joy survey'd
Than that where truth, by Hoadly's aid,
Shines through imposture's solemn shade,
Through kingly and through sacerdotal night.

I. 3.

To him the teacher blest'd,
Who sent religion, from the palmy field
By Jordan, like the morn to cheer the west,

And lifted up the veil which heaven from earth
conceal'd,

To Hoadly thus his mandate he address'd:

"Go thou, and rescue my dishonour'd law
From hands rapacious and from tongues impure:

"Let not my peaceful name be made a lure
Fell persecution's mortal snares to aid:
Let not my words be impious chains to draw
The freeborn soul in more than brutal awe,
To faith without assent, allegiance unrepaid."

II. 1.

No cold or unperforming hand
Was arm'd by heaven with this command.
The world soon felt it: and, on high,
To William's ear, with welcome joy
Did Locke among the blest unfold
The rising hope of Hoadly's name,
Godolphin then confirm'd the same;
And Somers, when from earth he came,
And generous Stanhope the fair sequel told.

II. 2.

Then drew the lawgivers around,
(Sires of the Grecian name renown'd)
And listening ask'd, and wondering knew,
What private force could thus subdue
The vulgar and the great combin'd;
Could war with sacred folly wage;
Could a whole nation disengage
From the dread bonds of many an age,
And to new habits mould the public mind.

II. 3.

For not a conqueror's sword,
Nor the strong powers to civil founders known,
Were his: but truth by faithful search explor'd,
And social sense, like seed, in genial plenty sown.
Wherever it took root, the soul (restor'd
To freedom) freedom too for others sought.
Not monkish craft the tyrant's claim divine,
Not regal zeal the bigot's cruel shrine
Could longer guard from reason's warfare sage;
Not the wild rabble to sedition wrought,
Nor synods by the papal genius taught,
Nor St. John's spirit loose, nor Atterbury's rage.

III. 1.

But where shall recompence be found?
Or how such arduous merit crown'd?
For look on life's laborious scene;
What rugged spaces lie between Adventurous virtue's early toils
And her triumphal throne! The shade
Of death, meantime, does oft invade
Her progress; nor to us display'd,
Wears the bright heroine her expected spoils.

III. 2.

Yet born to conquer is her power:
—O Hoadly, if that favourite hour
On earth arrive, with thankful awe,
We own just heaven's indulgent law,
And proudly thy success behold;
We attend thy reverend length of days
With benediction and with praise,
And hail thee in our public ways
Like some great spirit fam'd in ages-old.

III. 3.

While thus our vows prolong
Thy steps on earth, and when by us resign'd
Thou join'st thy seniors, that heroic throng

Who rescued or preserv'd the rights of human kind,
 O! not unworthy may thy Albion's tongue
 Thee still, her friend and benefactor, name:
 O! never, Hoadly, in thy country's eyes,
 May impious gold, or pleasures gaudy prize,
 Make public virtue, public freedom, vile;
 Nor our own manners tempt us to disclaim
 That heritage, our noblest wealth and fame,
 Which thou hast kept entire from force and fac-tion's guile.

O D E VIII.

I. If rightly tuneful bards decide,
 If it be fix'd in love's decrees,
 That beauty ought not to be tried
 But by its native power to please,
 Then tell me, youths and lovers, tell,
 What fair can Amoret excel?

II.

Behold that bright unfullied smile,
 And wisdom speaking in her mien:
 Yet (she so artless all the while,
 So little studious to be seen)
 We nought but instant gladness know,
 Nor think to whom the gift we owe.

III.

But neither music, nor the powers
 Of youth and mirth and frolic cheer,
 Add half that sunshine to the hours,
 Or make life's prospect half so clear,
 As memory brings it to the eye
 From scenes where Amoret was by.

IV.

Yet not a satirist could there
 Or fault of indiscretion find;
 Nor any prouder sage declare
 One virtue, pictur'd in his mind,
 Whose form with lovelier colours glows
 Than Amoret's demeanor shows.

V.

This sure is beauty's happiest part:
 This gives the most unbounded sway:
 This shall enchant the subject heart
 When rose and lily fade away;
 And she be still, in spite of time,
 Sweet Amoret in all her prime.

O D E IX.

AT STUDY.

I.

WHITHER did my fancy stray?
 By what magic drawn away
 Have I left my studious theme?
 From his philosophic page,
 From the problems of the sage,
 Wandering through a pleasing dream?

II.

'Tis in vain, alas! I find,
 Much in vain, my zealous mind
 Would to learned wisdom's throne
 Dedicate each thoughtful hour:
 Nature bids a softer power
 Claim some minutes for his own

III.

Let the busy or the wise
 View him with contemptuous eyes;
 Love is native to the heart;

Guide its wishes as you will;
 Without love, you'll find it still
 Void in one essential part.

IV.

Me though no peculiar fair
 Touches with a lover's care;
 Though the pride of my desire
 Asks immortal friendship's name,
 Asks the palm of honest fame,
 And the old heroic lyre;

V.

Though the day have smoothly gone,
 Or to letter'd leisure known,
 Or in social duty spent;
 Yet at eve my lonely breast
 Seeks in vain for perfect rest;
 Languishes for true content.

O D E X.

TO THOMAS EDWARDS, ESQUIRE:

On the late edition of Mr. Pope's Works.

1751.

I.

BELIEVE me, Edwards, to restrain
 The licence of a railer's tongue
 Is what but seldom men obtain
 By sense or wit, by prose or song:
 A task for more Herculean powers,
 Nor suited to the sacred hours
 Of leisure in the muse's bowers.

II.

In bowers where laurel weds with palm,
 The muse, the blameless queen, resides;
 Fair fame attends, and wisdom calm
 Her eloquence harmonious guides:
 While, shut for ever from her gate,
 Oft trying, still repining, wait
 Fierce envy and calumnious hate.

III.

Who then from her delightful bounds
 Would step one moment forth to heed
 What impotent and savage sounds
 From their unhappy mouths proceed?
 No: rather Spenser's lyre again
 Prepare, and let thy pious strain
 For Pope's dishonour'd shade complain,

IV.

Tell how displeas'd was every bard,
 When lately in the Elysian grove
 They of his muses guardian heard,
 His delegate to fame above;
 And what with one accord they said
 Of wit in drooping age misled,
 And Warburton's officious aid:

V.

How Virgil mourn'd the sordid fate
 To that melodious lyre assign'd,
 Beneath a tutor who so late
 With Midas and his rout combin'd
 By spiteful clamour to confound
 That very lyre's enchanting sound,
 Though listening realms admir'd around:

VI.

How Horace own'd he thought the fire
 Of his friend Pope's satiric line

Did farther fuel scarce require
From such a militant divine :
How Milton scorn'd the sophist vain
Who durst approach his hallow'd strain
With unwash'd hands and lips profane.

VII.

Then Shakspeare debonnair and mild
Brought that strange comment forth to view ;
Conceits more deep, he said and smil'd,
Than his own fools or madmen knew :
But thank'd a generous friend above,
Who did with free adventurous love
Such pageants from his tomb remove.

VIII.

And if to Pope, in equal need,
The same kind office thou would'st pay,
Then, Edwards, all the band decreed
That future bards with frequent lay
Should call on thy auspicious name,
From each absurd intruder's claim,
To keep inviolate their fame.

O D E XL.

TO THE COUNTRY GENTLEMEN OF ENGLAND.

1758.

I.

WHITHER is Europe's ancient spirit fled ?
Where are those valiant tenants of her shore,
Who from the warrior bow the strong dart sped,
Or with firm hand the rapid pole-ax bore ?
Freeman and soldier was their common name,
Who late with reapers to the furrow came,
Now in the front of battle charg'd the foe :
Who taught the steer the wintery plough to endure,

Now in full councils check'd encroaching power,
And gave the guardian laws their majesty to know.

II.

But who are ye ? from Ebro's loitering sons
To Tiber's pageants, to the sports of Seine ;
From Rhine's frail palaces to Danube's thrones
And cities looking on the Cimbric main,
Ye lost, ye self-deserted ? whose proud lords
Have baffled your tame hands, and given your swords

To slavish ruffians, hir'd for their command :
These, at some greedy monk's or harlot's nod,
See rifled nations crouch beneath their rod :
These are the public will, the reason of the land.

III.

Thou, heedless Albion, what, alas ! the while
Dost thou presume ? O inexpert in arms,
Yet vain of freedom, how dost thou beguile,
With dreams of hope, these near and loud alarms ?
Thy splendid home, thy plan of laws renown'd,
The praise and envy of the nations round,
What care hast thou to guard from fortune's fway ?

Amid the storms of war, how soon may all
The lofty pile from its foundations fall,
Of ages the proud toil, the ruin of a day !

IV.

No : thou art rich, thy streams and fertile vales
Add industry's wise gifts to nature's store ;

And every port is crowded with thy sails,
And every wave throws treasure on thy shore.
What boots it ? If luxurious plenty charm
Thy selfish heart from glory, if thy arm
Shrink at the frowns of danger and of pain,
Those gifts, that treasure is no longer thine.
Oh rather far be poor. Thy gold will shine Tempting the eye of force, and deck thee to thy bane.

V.

But what hath force or war to do with thee ?
Girt by the azure tide, and thron'd sublime
Amid thy floating bulwarks, how canst see,
With scorn, the fury of each hostile clime
Dash'd ere it reach thee. Sacred from the foe
Are thy fair fields. Athwart thy guardian prow
No bold invader's foot shall tempt the strand—
Yet say, my country, will the waves and wind
Obey thee ? Haste thou all thy hopes resign'd
To the sky's fickle faith ? the pilot's wavering hand ?

VI.

For oh ! may neither fear nor stronger love
(Love, by thy virtuous princes nobly won)
Thee, last of many wretched nations, move,
With mighty armies station'd round the throne
To trust thy safety. Then, farewell the claims
Of freedom ! her proud records to the flames
Then bear, an offering at ambition's shrine ;
Whate'er thy ancient patriots dar'd demand
From furious John's, or faithless Charles's hand,
Or what great William seal'd for his adopted line.

VII.

But if thy sons be worthy of their name,
If liberal laws with liberal hearts they prize,
Let them from conquest, and from servile shame,
In war's glad school their own protectors rise.
Ye chiefly, heirs of Albion's cultur'd plains,
Ye leaders of her bold and faithful swains,
Now not unequal to your birth be found :
The public voice bids arm your rural state,
Paternal hamlets for your ensigns wait,
And grange and fold prepare to pour their youth around.

VIII.

Why are ye tardy ? what inglorious care
Detains you from their head, your native post ?
Whomost their country's fame and fortune share,
'Tis theirs to share her toils, her perils most.
Each man his task in social life sustains.
With partial labours, with domestic gains,
Let others dwell : to you indulgent heaven
By council and by arms the public cause
To serve for public love and love's applause,
The first employment far, the noblest hire, hath given.

IX.

Have ye not heard of Lacedemon's fame ?
Of Attic chiefs in freedom's war divine ?
Of Rome's dread generals ? the Valerian name ?
The Fabian sons ? the Scipios, matchless line ?
Your lot was theirs. The farmer and the swain
Met his lov'd patron's summons from the plain ;
The legions gather'd ; the bright eagles flew :
Barbarian monarchs in the triumph mourn'd ;
The conquerors to their household gods return'd.
And fed Calabrian flocks, and steer'd the Sabine plough.

x.

Shall then this glory of the antique age,
This pride of men, be lost among mankind?
Shall war's heroic arts no more engage
The unbought hand, the unsubjected mind?
Doth valour to the race no more belong?
No more with scorn of violence and wrong
Doth forming nature now her sons inspire,
That, like some mystery to few reveal'd,
The skill of arms abash'd and aw'd they yield,
And from their own defence with hopeless hearts retire?

xi.

O shame to human life, to human laws!
The loose adventurer, hireling of a day,
Who his fell sword without affection draws,
Whose God, whose country, is a tyrant's pay,
This man the lessons of the field can learn;
Can every palm, which decks a warrior, earn,
And every pledge of conquest: while in vain,
To guard your altars, your paternal lands,
Are social arms held out to your free hands:
Too arduous is the lore; too irksome were the pain.

xii.

Meantime by pleasure's lying tales allur'd,
From the bright sun and living breeze ye stray;
And deep in London's gloomy haunts immur'd,
Brood o'er your fortune's, freedom's health's decay.

O blind of choice and to yourselves untrue!
The young grove shoots, their bloom the fields renew,
The mansion asks its lord, the swains their friend;
While he doth riot's orgies haply share,
Or tempt the gamester's dark, destroying snare,
Or at some courtly shrine with slavish incense bend.

xiii.

And yet full oft your anxious tongues complain
That lawless tumult prompts the rustic throng;
That the rude village-inmates now disdain
Those homely ties which rul'd their fathers long.
Alas! your fathers did by other arts
Draw those kind ties around their simple hearts,
And led in other paths their ductile will;
By succour, faithful counsel, courteous cheer,
Won them the ancient manners to revere,
To prize their country's peace, and heaven's due rites fulfil.

xiv.

But mark the judgment of experienc'd time,
Tutor of nations. Doth light discord tear
A state? and impotent sedition's crime?
The powers of warlike prudence dwell not there;
The powers who to command and to obey.
Instruct the valiant. There would civil sway
The rising race to manly concord tame?
Oft let the marshall'd field their steps unite,
And in glad splendour bring before their fight
One common cause and one hereditary fame.

xv.

Nor yet be aw'd, nor yet your task disown,
Though war's proud votaries look on severe;
Though secrets taught erewhile to them alone,
They deem profan'd by your intruding ear.
Let them in vain, your martial hope to quell,
Of new refinements, fiercer weapons tell,

And mock the old simplicity, in vain:
To the time's warfare, simple or refin'd,
The time itself adapts the warrior's mind;
And equal prowess still shall equal palms obtain.

xvi.

Say then; if England's youth, in earlier days,
On glory's field with well-train'd armies vy'd,
Why shall they now renounce that generous praise?

Why dread the foreign mercenary's pride?
Though Valois brav'd young Edward's gentle
hand,

And Albert's rush'd on Henry's way-worn band,
With Europe's chosen sons in arms renown'd,
Yet not on Vere's bold archers long they look'd,
Nor Audley's squires, nor Mowbray's yeomen brook'd: [bound.

They saw their standard fall, and left their monarch

xvii.

Such were the laurels which your fathers won;
Such glory's dictates in their dauntless breast;
—Is there no voice that speaks to every son?
No nobler, holier call to you address'd?
O! by majestic freedom, righteous laws,
By heavenly truth's, by manly reason's cause,
Awake; attend; be indolent no more:
By friendship, social peace, domestic love,
Rise; arm; your country's living safety prove;
And train her valiant youth, and watch around her shore.

O D E XII.

ON RECOVERING FROM A FIT OF SICKNESS.

In the Country. 1458.

I.

THY verdant scenes, O Goulder's hill,
Once more I seek, a languid guest:
With throbbing temples and with burden'd breast
Once more I climb thy steep aerial way.
O faithful cure of oft-returning ill,
Now call thy sprightly breezes round,
Dissolve this rigid cough profound,
And bid the springs of life with gentler movement play.

II.

How gladly 'mid the dews of dawn
By weary lungs thy healing gale,
The balmy west or the fresh north, inhale!
How gladly, while my musing footsteps rove
Round the cool orchard or the sunny lawn,
Awak'd I stop, and look to find
What shrub perfumes the pleasant wind,
Or what wild songster charms the Dryads of the grove.

III.

Now, ere the morning walk is done,
The distant voice of health I hear
Welcome as beauty's to the lover's ear.
"Droop not, nor doubt of my return," she cries;
"Here will I, 'mid the radiant calm of noon,
Meet thee beneath yon chefnut bower,
And lenient on thy bosom pour
That indolence divine which hushes the earth and "skies."

O D E S.

IV.

The goddess promis'd not in vain.
I found her at my favourite time.
Nor wish'd to breathe in any softer clime,
While (half-reclin'd, half-slumbering as I lay)
She hover'd o'er me. Then, among her train
Of nymphs and zephyrs, to my view
Thy gracious form appear'd anew
Then first, O heavenly muse, unseen for many a day.

V.

In that soft pomp the tuneful maid
Shone like the golden star of love.
I saw her hand in careless measures move;
I heard sweet preludes dancing on her lyre,
While my whole frame the sacred sound obey'd.
New sunshine o'er my fancy springs,
New colours clothe external things,
And the last glooms of pain and sickly plaint retire.

IV.

O Goulder's hill, by thee restor'd
Once more to this enliven'd hand,
My harp, which late resounded o'er the land
The voice of glory, solemn and severe,
My Dorian harp shall now with mild accord
To thee her joyful tribute pay,
And send a less-ambitious lay
Of friendship and of love to greet thy master's ear.

VII.

For when within thy shady seat
First from the sultry town he chose,
And the tir'd senate's cares, his wish'd repose,
Then, wast thou mine; to me a happier home
For social leisure: where my welcome feet,
Estrang'd from all the entangling ways
In which the restless vulgar strays,
Through nature's simple paths with ancient faith might roam.

VIII.

And while around his sylvan scene
My Dyson led the white-wing'd hours,
Oft from the Athenian Academic bowers
Their sages came: oft heard our lingering walk
The Mautuan music warbling o'er the green:
And oft did Tully's reverend shade,
Though much for liberty afraid,
With us of letter'd ease or virtuous glory talk.

IX.

But other guests were on their way,
And reach'd ere long this favour'd grove;
Ev'n the celestial progeny of Jove,
Bright Venus, with her all-subduing son,
Whose golden shaft most willingly obey
The best and wisest. As they came,
Glad Hymen wav'd his genial flame,
And sang their happy gifts, and prais'd their spotless throne.

X.

I saw when through yon festive gate
He led along his chosen maid,
And to my friend with smiles presenting said;
"Receive that fairest wealth which heaven af-
" sign'd
" To human fortune. Did thy lonely state
" One wish, one utmost hope confess?
" Behold, she comes, to adorn and bless:
" Comes, worthy of thy heart, and equal to thy
" mind."

O D E XIII.

TO THE AUTHOR OF MEMOIRS OF THE HOUSE OF

1751.

I.

THE men renown'd as chiefs of human race,
And born to lead in counsels or in arms,
Have seldom turn'd their feet from glory's chase,
To dwell with books, or court the muse's charms.
Yet, to our eyes if haply time hath brought
Some genuine transcript of their calmer thought,
There still we own the wise, the great, or good;
And Cæsar there and Xenophon are seen,
As clear in spirit and sublime of mien,
As on Pharsalian plains, or by the Assyrian flood.

II.

Say thou too, Frederick, was not this thy aim?
Thy vigils could the student's lamp engage,
Except for this? except that future fame
Might read thy genius in the faithful page?
That hereafter envy shall presume
With words irreverent to inscribe thy tomb,
And baser weeds upon thy palms to fling,
That hence posterity may try thy reign,
Assert thy treaties, and thy wars explain,
And view in native lights the hero and the king.

III.

O evil foresight and pernicious care!
Wilt thou indeed abide by this appeal?
Shall we the lessons of thy pen compare
With private honour or with public zeal?
Whence then at things divine those darts of scorn?
Why are the woes, which virtuous men have borne
For sacred truth, a prey to laughter given?
What fiend, what foe of nature, urg'd thy arm
The Almighty of his sceptre to disarm?
To push this earth adrift, and leave it loose from heaven?

IV.

Ye godlike shades of legislators old,
Ye who made Rome victorious, Athens wise,
Ye first of mortals with the blest'd enroll'd,
Say, did not horror in your bosoms rise,
When thus by impious vanity impell'd
A magistrate, a monarch, ye beheld
Affronting civil order's holiest bands?
Those bands which ye so labour'd to improve?
Those hopes and fears of justice from above,
Which tam'd the savage world to your divine commands?

O D E XIV.

THE COMPLAINT,

I.

AWAY! Away!
Tempt me no more, insidious Love:
Thy soothing sway
Long did my youthful bosom prove:
At length thy treason is discern'd,
At length some dear-bought caution earn'd;
Away! nor hope my riper age to move,

II.

I know, I see
Her merit. Needs it now be shown,
Alas! to me?
How often, to myself unknown,
The graceful, gentle, virtuous maid
Have I admir'd! How often said,
What joy to call a heart like hers one's own,

III.

But, flattering god,
O squanderer of content and ease,
In thy abode
Will care's rude lesson learn to please?
O say, deceiver, hast thou won
Proud fortune to attend thy throne,
Or plac'd thy friends above her stern decrees?

O D E XV.

ON DOMESTIC MANNERS.

[Unfinished.]

I.

MEEK honour, female shame,
O! whither, sweetest offspring of the sky,
From Albion dost thou fly;
Of Albion's daughters once the favourite fame?
O beauty's only friend,
Who giv'st her pleasing reverence to inspire;
Who selfish, bold desire
Dost to esteem and dear affection turn;
Alas! of thee forlorn,
What joy, what praise, what hope can life pretend?

II.

Behold; your youths in vain
Concerning nuptial happiness inquire:
Our maids no more aspire
The arts of bashful Hymen to attain;
But with triumphant eyes
And cheeks impassive, as they move along,
Ask homage of the throng.
The lover swears that in a harlot's arms
Are found the self-same charms,
And worthless and deserted lives and dies.

III.

Behold; unblest'd at home,
The father of the cheerless household mourns;
The night in vain returns,
For love and glad content at distance roam;
While she, in whom his mind
Seeks refuge from the day's dull task of cares,
To meet him she prepares,
Through noise and spleen and all the gamester's art
A listless, harass'd heart,
Where not one tender thought can welcome find.

IV.

'Twas thus, along the shore
Of Thames, Britannia's guardian genius heard,
From many a tongue preferr'd,
Of strife and grief the fond invective lore:
At which the queen divine
Indignant, with her adamant spear
Like thunder sounding near,
Smote the red cross upon her silver shield
And thus her wrath reveal'd.
(I watch'd her awful words and made them mine.)

NOTES ON THE TWO BOOKS OF ODES.

B. I. Ode XVIII. Stanza II. 2.] Lycurgus the Lacedemonian lawgiver, brought into Greece from Asia Minor the first complete copy of Homer's Works.—At Platæa was fought the decisive battle between the Persian army and the united militia of Greece, under Pausanias and Aristides.—Cymon the Athenian erected a trophy in Cyprus, for two great victories gained on the same day over the Persians by sea and land. Diodorus Siculus has preserved the inscription which the Athenians affixed to the consecrated spoils, after this great success; in which it is very remarkable, that the greatness of the occasion has raised the manner of expression above the usual simplicity and modesty of all other ancient inscriptions. It is this:

ΕΞ. ΟΥ. Γ. ΕΤΡΩΠΗΝ. ΑΣΙΑΣ. ΔΙΧΑ. ΠΟΝΤΟΣ.

The following translation is almost literal:

Since first the sea from Asia's hostile coast
Divided Europe, and the god of war
Assail'd imperious cities; never yet,
At once among the waves and on the shore,
Had such a labour been achiev'd by men
Who earth inhabit. They, whose arms the Medes

In Cyprus felt pernicious, they, the same
Have won from skilful Tyre an hundred ships
Crowded with warriors. Asia groans in both
Her hands sore smitten, by the might of war.

Stanza II. 3.] Pindar was contemporary with Aristides and Cymon, in whom the glory of ancient Greece was at its height. When Xerxes invaded Greece, Pindar was true to the common interest of his country; though his fellow citizens, the Thebans, had sold themselves to the Persian king. In one of his odes, he expresses the great distress and anxiety of his mind, occasioned by the vast preparations of Xerxes against Greece. (Isthm. 8.) In another he celebrates the victories of Salamis, Plataea, and Himera. (Pyth. 1.) It will be necessary to add two or three other particulars of his life, real or fabulous, in order to explain what follows in the text concerning him. First, then, he was thought to be so great a favourite of Apollo, that the priests of that deity allotted him a constant share of their offerings. It was said of him, as of some other illustrious men, that at his birth a swarm of bees lighted on his lips, and fed him with their honey. It was also a tradition concerning him, that Pan was heard to recite his poetry, and seen dancing to one of his hymns on the mountains near Thebes. But a real historical fact in his life is, that the Thebans imposed a large fine upon him on account of the veneration which he expressed in his poems for that heroic spirit, shown by the people of Athens in defence of the common liberty, which his own fellow-citizens had shamefully betrayed. And as the argument of this ode implies, that great poetical talents, and high sentiments of liberty, do reciprocally produce and assist each other, so Pindar is perhaps the most exemplary proof of this connection, which occurs in history. The Thebans were remarkable, in general, for a slavish disposition through all the fortunes of their commonwealth, at the time of its ruin by Philip; and even in its best state, under the administration of Pelopidas and Epaminondas; and every one knows, they were no less remarkable for great dullness, and want of all genius. That Pindar should have equally distinguished himself from the rest of his fellow-citizens in both these respects, seems somewhat extraordinary, and is scarce to be accounted for but by the preceding observation.

Stanza III. 3.] Alluding to his "Defence of the people of England" against Salmasius. See particularly the manner in which he himself speaks of that undertaking, in the introduction to his reply to Morus.

Stanza IV. 3.] Edward III.; from whom descended Henry Hastings, third Earl of Huntingdon by the daughter of the Duke of Clarence, brother to Edward IV.

Stanza V. 3.] At Whittington, a village on the edge of Scarsdale in Derbyshire, the Earls of Devonshire and Danby, with the Lord Delamere, privately concerted the plan of the Revolution. The house in which they met is at present a farmhouse; and the country people distinguish the room in which they sat, by the name of "the plotting parlour."

B. II. Ode VII. Stanza II. 1.] Mr. Locke died in 1704, when Mr. Hoadly was beginning to distinguish himself in the cause of civil and religious liberty: Lord Godolphin in 1712, when the doctrines of the Jacobite faction chiefly favoured by those in power: Lord Somers in 1716, amid the practices of the Nonjuring clergy against the Protestant establishment; and Lord Stanhope in 1721, during the controversy with the lower house of convocation.

B. II. Ode X. Stanza V.] During Mr. Pope's war with Theobald, Concanen, and the rest of their tribe, Mr. Warburton, the present Lord Bishop of Gloucester, did with great zeal cultivate their friendship; having been introduced, forsooth, at the meetings of that respectable confederacy: a favour which he afterwards spoke of in very high terms of complacency and thankfulness. At the same time, in his intercourse with them, he treated Mr. Pope in a most contemptuous manner, and as a writer without genius. Of the truth of these assertions, his Lordship can have no doubt, if he recollects his own correspondence with Concanen; a part of which is still in being, and will probably be remembered as long as any of this prelate's writings.

B. II. Ode XIII.] In the year 1751 appeared a very splendid edition, in quarto, of "Memoires pour servir à l'Histoire de la Maison de Brandebourg, à Berlin & à la Haye;" with a privilege signed Frederick; the same being engraved in imitation of hand-writing. In this edition, among other extraordinary passages, are the two following, to which the third stanza of this ode more particularly refers:

Page 163.] "Il se fit une migration" (the author is speaking of what happened of the revocation of the edict of Nantes) "dont on n'avoit guere vu d'exemples dans l'histoire: un peuple entier sortit du royaume par l'esprit de parti en haine du pape; & pour recevoir sous un autre ciel la communion sous les deux especes: quatre cens mille ames s'expatrièrent ainsi & abandonnerent tous leur biens pour detonner dans d'autres temples les vieux psaumes de Clement Marot."

Page 242.] "La crainte donna le jour à la credulité, & l'amour propre interessa bientôt le ciel au destin des hommes."

HYMN TO THE NAIADS.

MDCCXLVI.

THE nymphs, who preside over springs and rivulets, are addressed at day-break, in honour of their several functions, and of the relations which they bear to the natural and to the moral world. Their origin is deduced from the first allegorical deities, or powers of nature; according to the doctrine of the old mythological poets, concerning the generation of the gods and the rise of things. They are then successively considered, as giving motion to the air and exciting summer-breezes; as nourishing and beautifying the vegetable creation; as contributing to the fullness of navigable rivers, and consequently to the maintenance of commerce; and by that means, to the maritime part of military power. Next is represented their favourable influence upon health, when assisted by rural exercise: which introduces their connection with the art of physic, and the happy effects of mineral medicinal springs. Lastly, they are celebrated for the friendship which the muses bear them, and for the true inspiration which temperance only can receive: in opposition to the enthusiasm of the more licentious poets.

O'er yonder eastern hill the twilight pale
Walks forth from darkness; and the god of day,
With bright Astræa seated by his side,
Waits yet to leave the ocean. Tarry, nymphs,
Ye nymphs, ye blue-ey'd progeny of Thames,
Who now the mazes of this rugged heath
Trace with your fleeting steps; who all night long
Repeat, amid the cool and tranquil air,
Your lonely murmurs; tarry, and receive
My offer'd lay. To pay you homage due, 10
I leave the gates of sleep; nor shall my lyre
Too far into the splendid hours of morn
Engage your audience: my observant hand
Shall close the strain ere any sultry beam
Approach you. To your subterranean haunts
Ye then may timely steal; to pace with care
The humid sands, to loosen from the soil
The bubbling sources; to direct the rills
To meet in wider channels; or beneath
Some grotto's dripping arch, at height of noon 20
To slumber, shelter'd from the burning heaven.

Where shall my song begin, ye nymphs? or end?
Wide is your praise and copious—First of things,
First of the lonely powers, ere time arose,
Were love and Chaos. Love the fire of fate;
Elder than Chaos. Born of fate was time,
Who many sons and many comely births
Devour'd, relentless father: till the child
Of Rhea drove him from the upper sky,
And quell'd his deadly might. Then social reign'd
The kindred powers, Tethys, and reverend Ops, 31
And spotless Vesta; while supreme of sway
Remain'd the cloud-compeller. From the couch
Of Tethys sprang the seditious crowned race,
Who from a thousand urns, o'er every clime,
Send tribute to their parent: and from them
Are ye, O Naiads! Arethusa fair,
And tuneful Aganippe; that sweet name,
Bandusia; that soft family which dwelt
With Syrian Daphne; and the honour'd tribes 40
Belov'd of Pæan. Listen to my strain,
Daughters of Tethys: listen to your praise.

You, nymphs the winged offspring, which of old
Aurora to divine Astræus bore,
Owns; and your aid beseecheth. When the might
Of Hyperion, from his noontide throne,
Unbends their languid pinions, aid from you
They ask; Favonius and the mild south-west
From you relief implore. Your fallying streams
Fresh vigour to their weary wings impart. 50
Again they fly, disporting; from the mead
Half ripen'd and the tender blades of corn,
To sweep the noxious mildew; or dispel
Contagious streams, which oft the parched earth
Breathes on her fainting sons. From noon to eve,
Along the river and the paved brook,
Ascend the cheerful breezes: hail'd of bards

Who, fast by learned Cam, the Æolian lyre
Solicit; nor unwelcome to the youth
Who on the heights of Tibur, all inclin'd 60
O'er rushing Anio, with a pious hand
The reverend scene delineates, broken fanes,
Or tombs, or pillar'd aqueducts, the pomp
Of ancient time; and haply, while he scans
The ruin, with a silent tear revolves
The fame and fortune of imperious Rome.

You too, O nymphs, and your unenvious aid
The rural powers confess; and still prepare
For you their choicest treasures. Pan commands,

Oft as the Delian king with Sirius holds 70
The central heavens, the father of the grove
Commands his Dryads over your abodes
To spread their deepest umbrage. Well the god
Remembereth how indulgent ye supplied
Your general dews to nurse them in their prime.

Pales, the pasture's queen, where-e'er ye stray,
Pursues your steps, delighted; and the path
With living verdure clothes. Around your haunts
The laughing Chloris, with profuseth hand, 79
Throws wide her blooms, her odours. Still with you
Pomona seeks to dwell: and o'er the lawns,
And o'er the vale of Richmond, where with Thames
Ye love to wander, Amalthea pours

Well-pleas'd the wealth of that Ammonian horn,
Her dower; unmindful of the fragrant isles
Nysean or Atlantic. Nor canst thou,
(Albeit oft, ungrateful, thou dost mock
The beverage of the sober Naiad's urn,
O Bromius, O Lenæan) nor canst thou
Disown the powers whose bounty, ill repaid, 90
With nectar feeds thy tendrils. Yet from me,
Yet, blameless nymphs, from my delighted lyre,
Accept the rites your bounty well may claim,
Nor heed the scoffings of the Edonian band.

For better praise awaits you. Thames, your fire,
As down the verdant slope your duteous rills
Descend, the tribute stately Thames, receives,
Delighted; and your piety applauds;
And bids his copious tide roll on secure,
For faithful are his daughters; and with words 100
Auspicious gratulates the bark which, now

His banks forsaking, her adventurous wings
Yield to the breeze, with Albion's happy gifts
Extremest isles to bless. And oft at morn,
When Hermes, from Olympus bent o'er earth
To hear the words of Jove, on yonder hill
Stoops lightly-sailing; oft intent your springs
He views: and waving o'er some new-born stream
His blest pacific wand, "And yet," he cries,

"Yet," cries the son of Maia, "though recluse 110
"And silent be your stores, from you, fair nymphs,
"Flows wealth and kind society to men.

"By you my function and my honour'd name
"Do I possess; while o'er the Bætic vale,
"Or through the towers of Memphis, or the palms

"By sacred Ganges water'd, I conduct
"The English merchant: with the buxom fleece
"Of fertile Ariconium while I clothe

"Sarmatian kings; or to the household gods
"Of Syria, from the bleak Cornubian shore, 120
"Dispense the mineral treasure which of old

"Sidonian pilots sought, when this fair land
"Was yet unconscious of those generous arts
"Which wise Phœnicia from their native clime
"Transplanted to a more indulgent heaven."

Such are the words of Hermes: such the praise,
 O Naiads, which from tongues celestial waits
 Your bounteous deeds. From bounty issueth power:
 And those who, sedulous in prudent works,
 Relieve the wants of nature, Jove repays 130
 With noble wealth, and his own seat on earth,
 Fit judgments to pronounce, and curb the might
 Of wicked men. Your kind unfailing urns
 Not vainly to the hospitable arts
 Of Hermes yield their store. For, O ye nymphs,
 Hath he not won the unconquerable queen
 Of arms to court your friendship? You she owns
 The fair associates who extend her sway
 Wide o'er the mighty deep; and grateful things
 Of you she uttereth, oft as from the shore 140
 Of Thames, or Medway's vale, or the green banks
 Of Vecta, she her thundering navy leads
 To Calpe's foaming channel, or the rough
 Cantabrian surge; her auspices divine
 Imparting to the senate and the prince
 Of Albion, to dismay barbaric kings,
 The Iberian, or the Celt. The pride of kings
 Was ever scorn'd by Pallas: and of old
 Rejoic'd the virgin, from the brazen prow
 Of Athens o'er Ægina's gloomy surge, 150
 To drive her clouds and storms; o'erwhelming all
 The Persian's promis'd glory, when the realms
 Of Indus and the soft Ionian clime,
 When Libya's torrid champain and the rocks
 Of cold Imaüs join'd their servile bands,
 To sweep the sons of liberty from earth.
 In vain: Minerva on the bounding prow
 Of Athens stood, and with the thunder's voice
 Denounc'd her terrors on their impious heads,
 And shook her burning ægis. Xerxes saw: 160
 From Heracléum, on the mountain's height
 Thron'd in his golden car, he knew the sign
 Celestial; felt unrighteous hope forsake
 His faltering heart, and turn'd his face with shame.
 Hail, ye who share the stern Minerva's power;
 Who arm the hand of liberty for war:
 And give to the renown'd Britannic name
 To awe contending monarchs: yet benign,
 Yet mild of nature: to the works of peace
 More prone, and lenient of the many ills 170
 Which wait on human life. Your gentle aid
 Hygeia well can witness, she who saves,
 From poisonous cates and cups of pleasing bane,
 The wretch devoted to the entangling snares
 Of Bacchus and of Comus. Him she leads
 To Cynthia's lonely haunts. To spread the toils,
 To beat the coverts, with the jovial horn
 At dawn of day to summon the loud hounds,
 She calls the lingering sluggard from his dreams:
 And where his breast may drink the mountain
 And where the fervor of the sunny vale [breeze,
 May beat upon his brow, through devious paths
 Beckons his rapid courser. Nor when ease,
 Cool ease and welcome slumbers have becalm'd
 His eager bosom, does the queen of health
 Her pleasing care withhold. His decent board
 She guards, presiding; and the frugal powers
 With joy sedate leads in: and while the brown
 Ennæan dame with Pan presents her stores;
 While changing still, and comely in the change, 190
 Vertumnus and the hours before him spread
 The garden's banquet: you to crown his feast,
 To crown his feast, O Naiads, you the fair

Hygeia calls: and from your shelving seats,
 And groves of poplar, plenteous cups ye bring,
 To flake his veins: till soon a purer tide
 Flows down those loaded channels: washeth off
 The dregs of luxury, the lurking seeds
 Of crude disease; and through the abodes of life
 Sends vigour, sends repose. Hail, Naiads! hail,
 Who give, to labour, health; to stooping age, 201
 The joys which youth had squander'd. Oft your
 Will I invoke! and, frequent in your praise, [urns
 Abash the frantic Thyrsus with my song.

For not estrang'd from you benignant arts
 Is he, the god, to whose mysterious shrine
 My youth was sacred, and my votive cares
 Belong; the learned Pæon. Oft when all
 His cordial treasures he hath search'd in vain;
 When herbs, and potent trees, and drops of balm
 Rich with the genial influence of the sun, 211
 (To rouse dark fancy from her plaintive dreams,
 To brace the nerveless arm, with food to win
 Sick appetite, or hush the unquiet breast
 Which pines with silent passion) he in vain
 Hath prov'd; to your deep mansions he descends,
 Your gates of humid rock, your dim arcades,
 He entereth; where impurpled veins of ore
 Gleam on the roof; where through the rigid mine
 Your trickling rills insinuate. There the god 220
 From your indulgent hands the streaming bowl
 Wafts to his pale-ey'd suppliants; wafts the seeds
 Metallic, and the elemental salts
 Wash'd from the pregnant glebe. They drink:
 and soon

Flies pain; flies inauspicious care: and soon
 The social haunt or unfrequented shade
 Hears lo, lo Pæan; as of old,
 When Python fell. And, O propitious nymphs!
 Oft as for helpless mortals I implore
 Your salutary springs, through every urn 230
 Oh shed your healing treasures. With the first
 And finest breath, which from the genial strife
 Of mineral fermentation springs, like light
 O'er the fresh morning's vapours, lustrate then
 The fountain, and inform the rising wave.

My lyre shall pay your bounty. Scorn not ye
 That humble tribute. Though a mortal hand
 Excite the strings to utterance, yet for themes
 Not unregarded of celestial powers,
 I frame their language; and the muses deign 240
 To guide the pious tenor of my lay.
 The muses (sacred by their gifts divine)
 In early days did not my wondering sense
 Their secrets oft reveal: oft my rais'd ear
 In slumber felt their music: oft at noon
 Or hour of sunset, by some lonely stream,
 In field or shady grove, they taught me words
 Of power from death and envy to preserve
 The good man's name. Whence yet with grateful
 mind,

And offerings unprofan'd by ruder eye, 250
 My vows I send, my homage, to the seats
 Of rocky Cirrha, where with you they dwell:
 Where you their chaste companions they admit
 Through all the hallowed scene: where oft intent,
 And leaning o'er Castalia's mossy verge,
 They mark the cadence of your confluent urns,
 How tuneful, yielding gratefulest repose
 To their consoled measure: till again,
 With emulation all the sounding choir,

And bright Apollo, leader of the song 260
 Their voices through the liquid air exalt,
 And sweep their lofty strings: those powerful
 strings
 That charm the mind of gods: that fill the courts
 Of wide Olympus with oblivion sweet
 Of evils, with immortal rest from cares:
 Assuage the terrors of the throne of Jove;
 And quench the formidable thunderbolt
 Of unrelenting fire. With slacken'd wings
 While now the solemn concert breathes around,
 Incumbent o'er the sceptre of his lord 270
 Sleeps the stern eagle; by the number'd notes,
 Possess'd; and satiate with the melting tone:
 Sovereign of birds. The furious god of war,
 His darts forgetting, and the winged wheels
 That bear him vengeful o'er th' embattled plain,
 Relents, and soothes his own fierce heart to ease,
 Most welcome ease. The fire of gods and men,
 In that great moment of divine delight,
 Looks down on all that live; and whatsoe'er
 He loves not, o'er the peopl'd earth and o'er 280
 The interminated ocean, he beholds
 Curs'd with abhorrence by his doom severe,
 And troubled at the sound. Ye, Naiads, ye
 With ravish'd ears the melody attend
 Worthy of sacred silence. But the slaves
 Of Bacchus with tempestuous clamours strive
 To drown the heavenly strains; of highest Jove
 Irreverent, and by mad presumption fir'd
 Their own discordant raptures to advance
 With hostile emulation. Down they rush 290
 From Nyssa's vine-impurpled cliff, the dames
 Of Thrace, the satyrs, and the unruly fauns,
 With old Silenus, reeling through the crowd
 Which gambols round him, in convulsions wild
 Tossing their limbs, and brandishing in air

The ivy-mantled Thyrsus, or the torch
 Through black smoke flaming, to the Phrygian pipe's
 Shrill voice, and to the clashing cymbals, mix'd
 With shrieks and frantic uproar. May the gods
 From every unpolluted ear avert 300
 Their orgies! If within the seats of men,
 Within the walls, the gates, where Pallas holds
 The guardian key, if haply there be found
 Who loves to mingle with the revel-band
 And hearken to their accents; who aspires
 From such instruction to inform his breast
 With verse; let him, fit votarist, implore
 Their inspiration. He perchance the gifts
 Of young Lyæus, and the dread exploits,
 May sing in aptest numbers: he the fate 310
 Of sober Pentheus, he the Paphian rites,
 And naked Mars with Cytherea chain'd,
 And strong Alcides in the spinster's robes,
 May celebrate, applauded. But with you,
 O Naiads, far from that unhallow'd rout,
 Must dwell the man whoe'er to praised themes
 Invokes the immortal muse. The immortal muse
 To your calm habitations, to the cave
 Corycian or the Delphic mount, will guide 319
 His footsteps; and with your un sullied streams
 His lips will bathe: whether the eternal lore
 Of Themis, or the majesty of Jove,
 To mortals he reveal; or teach his lyre
 The unenvy'd guerdon of the patriot's toils,
 In those unfading islands of the blest'd,
 Where sacred bards abide. Hail, honour'd nymphs;
 Thrice hail. For you the Cyrenaïc shell
 Behold, I touch, revering. To my songs
 Be present ye with favourable feet,
 And all profaner audience far remove, 330

NOTES ON THE HYMN TO THE NAIADS.

LINE 25.

—Love—

Elder than Chaos.] Hesiod, in his Theogony, gives a different account, and makes Chaos the eldest of beings; though he assigns to Love neither father nor superior: which circumstance is particularly mentioned by Phædrus, in Plato's Banquet, as being observable not only in Hesiod, but in all other writers both of verse and prose: and on the same occasion he cites a line from Parmenides, in which Love is expressly styled the eldest of all the gods. Yet Aristophanes, in the Birds, affirms, that "Chaos, and Night, and Erebus, and Tartarus, were first; and that Love was produced from an egg, which the fable-winged night deposited in the immense bosom of Erebus." But it must be observed, that the Love designed by this comic poet was always distinguished from the other, from that original and self-existent being the TO ON or ΑΓΑΘΟΝ of Plato, and meant only the ΔΗΜΙΟΥΡΓΟΣ or second person of the old Grecian trinity; to whom is inscribed an hymn among those which pass under the name of Orpheus, where he is called Protogonos, or the first-begotten, is said to have been born of an egg, and is represented as the principal or origin of all these external appearances of nature. In the fragments of Orpheus, collected by Henry Stephens, he is named Phanes, the discoverer or discloser; who unfolded the ideas of the supreme intelligence, and exposed them to the perception of inferior beings in this visible frame of the world; as Macrobius, and Proclus, and Athenagoras, all agree to interpret the several passages of Orpheus, which they have preserved.

But the Love designed in our text, is the one self-existent and infinite mind, whom if the generality of ancient mythologists have not introduced or truly described in accounting for the production of the world and its appearances; yet, to a modern poet, it can be no objection that he hath ventured to differ from them in this particular; though, in other respects, he professeth to imitate their manner and conform to their opinions. For in these great points of natural theology, they differ no less remarkably among themselves; and are perpetually confounding the philosophical relations of things with the traditional circumstances of mythic history: upon which very account, Callimachus, in his hymn to Jupiter, declareth his dissent from them concerning even an article of the national creed; adding, that the ancient bards were by no means to be depended on. And yet in the exordium of the old Argonautic poem, ascribed to Orpheus, it is said, that "Love, whom mortals in latter times call Phanes, was the father of the eternally begotten Night;" who is generally represented by these mythological poets, as being herself the parent of all things; and who, in the Indigitamenta, or Orphic Hymns, is said to be the same with Cypris, or Love itself. Moreover, in the body of this Argonautic poem, where the personated Orpheus introduceth himself singing to his lyre in reply to Chiron, he celebrateth "the obscure memory of Chaos, and the natures which it contained within itself in a state of perpetual vicissitude; how the heaven had its boundary determined; the generation of the earth; the depth of the ocean; and also the sapient Love, the most ancient, the self-sufficient; with all the beings which he produced when he separated one thing from another." Which noble passage is more directly to Aristotle's purpose in the first book of his metaphysics, than any of those he has there quoted, to show that the ancient poets and mythologists agreed with Empedocles, Anaxagoras, and the other more sober philosophers, in that natural anticipation and common notion concerning the necessity of mind and reason to account for the connection, motion, and good order of the world. For, though neither this poem, nor the hymns which pass under the same name, are, it should seem, the work of the real Orpheus; yet beyond all question they are very ancient. The hymns, more particularly, are allowed to be older than the invasion of Greece by Xerxes; and were probably a set of public and solemn forms of devotion: as appears by a passage in one of them, which Demosthenes hath almost literally cited in his first oration against Aristogiton, as the saying of Orpheus, the founder of their most holy mysteries. On this account, they are of higher authority than any other mythological work now extant, the Theogony of Hesiod himself not excepted. The poetry of them is often extremely noble; and the mysterious air which prevails in them, together with its delightful impression upon the mind, cannot be better expressed than in that remarkable description with which they inspired the German editor Eschenbach, when he accidentally met with them at Leipzig: "Thesaurum me reperisse credidi," says he, "& profecto thesaurum reperi. Incredibile dictu quo me sacro horrore afflaverint indigitamenta ista deorum: nam et tempus ad illorum lectionem eligere cogebat, quod vel solum horrorem incutere animo potest nocturnum; cum enim totam diem consumserim in contemplando urbis splendore, & in adeundis, quibus scatet urbs illa, viris doctis; sola nox restabat, quam Orpheo consecrare potui. In abyssum quendam mysteriorum venerandæ antiquitatis descendere videbat, quotiescunque

"silente mundo, solis vigilantibus astris et luna
" μυλωνφάντες istos hymnos ad manus sumsi."

Line 25. Chaos.] The unformed, undigested mass of Moses and Plato: which Milton calls

"The womb of nature."

Ibid. Love, the fire of Fate.] Fate is the universal system of natural causes; the work of the omnipotent mind, or of love: so Minucius Felix: "Quid aliud est fatum, quam quod de unoquoque nostrum deus fatus est." So also Cicero, in the first book on Divination: "Fatum autem id appellō, quod Græci ΕΙΡΜΑΡΜΕΝΗΝ; id est, ordinem seriemque causarum, cum causa causæ nexa rem ex se gignat---ex quo intelligitur, ut fatum sit non id quod superstitiose, sed id quod physice dicitur causa æterna rerum." To the same purpose is the doctrine of Hierocles, in that excellent fragment concerning Providence and Destiny. As to the three fates, or destinies of the poets, they represented that part of the general system of natural causes which relates to man, and to other mortal beings: for so we are told in the hymn addressed to them among the Orphic Indigitamenta, where they are called the daughters of Night (or Love) and, contrary to the vulgar notion, are distinguished by the epithets of gentle, and tender-hearted. According to Hesiod, Theog. ver. 904, they were the daughters of Jupiter and Themis; but in the Orphic hymn to Venus, or Love, that Goddess is directly styled the mother of Necessity, and is represented, immediately after, as governing the three destinies, and conducting the whole system of natural causes.

L. 26. Born of Fate was Time.] Cronos, Saturn, or Time, was, according to Apollodorus, the son of Cælum and Tellus. But the author of the hymns gives it quite undisguised by mythological language, and calls him plainly the offspring of the earth and the starry heaven; that is, of Fate, as explained in the preceding note.

L. 27. Who many sons devour'd.] The known fable of Saturn devouring his children was certainly meant to imply the dissolution of natural bodies; which are produced and destroyed by time.

L. 28. 29. The child of Rhea.] Jupiter so called by Pindar.

L. 29. Drove him from the upper sky.] That Jupiter dethroned his father Saturn, is recorded by all the mythologists. Phurnutus, or Cornutus, the author of a little Greek treatise on the nature of the gods, informs us, that by Jupiter was meant the vegetable soul of the world, which restrained and prevented those uncertain alterations which Saturn, or Time, used formerly to cause in the mundane system.

L. 30. Then social reign'd.] Our mythology here suppoeth, that before the establishment of the vital, vegetative, plastic nature (represented by Jupiter) the four elements were in a variable and unsettled condition; but afterwards, well-disposed and at peace among themselves. Tethys was the wife of the Ocean; Ops, or Rhea, the Earth; Vesta, the eldest daughter of Saturn, Fire; and the cloud-compeller or Ζεύς νεφέλην κειρτής, the Air; though he also represented the plastic principle of nature, as may be seen in the Orphic hymn inscribed to him.

And bright Apollo, leader of the song 260
 Their voices through the liquid air exalt,
 And sweep their lofty strings: those powerful
 strings
 That charm the mind of gods: that fill the courts
 Of wide Olympus with oblivion sweet
 Of evils, with immortal rest from cares:
 Assuage the terrors of the throne of Jove;

L. 26. Born of Fate was Time.] Cronos, Saturn, or Time, was, according to Apollodorus, the son of Cælum and Tellus. But the author of the hymns gives it quite undisguised by mythological language, and calls him plainly the offspring of the earth and the starry heaven; that is, of Fate, as explained in the preceding note.

L. 27. Who many sons devour'd.] The known fable of Saturn devouring his children was certainly meant to imply the dissolution of natural bodies; which are produced and destroyed by time.

L. 28. 29. The child of Rhea.] Jupiter so called by Pindar.

L. 29. Drove him from the upper sky.] That Jupiter dethroned his father Saturn, is recorded by all the mythologists. Phurnutus, or Cornutus, the author of a little Greek treatise on the nature of the gods, informs us, that by Jupiter was meant the vegetable soul of the world, which restrained and prevented those uncertain alterations which Saturn, or Time, used formerly to cause in the mundane system.

L. 30. Then social reign'd.] Our mythology here suppoeth, that before the establishment of the vital, vegetative, plastic nature (represented by Jupiter) the four elements were in a variable and unsettled condition; but afterwards, well-disposed and at peace among themselves. Tethys was the wife of the Ocean; Ops, or Rhea, the Earth; Vesta, the eldest daughter of Saturn Fire; and the cloud-compellor or Ζεύς νεφέληγεγς, the Air; though he also represented the plastic principle of nature, as may be seen in the Orphic hymn inscribed to him.

Line 34. The sedgy-crowned race.] The river-gods; who, according to Hesiod's Theogony, were the sons of Oceanus and Tethys.

L. 36, 37. From them, are ye, O Naiads.] The descent of the Naiads is less certain than most points of the Greek mythology. Homer Odyss. xiii. καὶ Διόσκ. Virgil, in the eighth book of the Æneid, speaks as if the nymphs, or Naiads, were the parents of the rivers: but in this he contradicts the testimony of Hesiod, and evidently departs from the orthodox system, which representeth several nymphs as retaining to every single river. On the other hand, Calimachus, who was very learned in all the school-divinity of those times, in his hymn to Delos, maketh Penus, the great Thessalian river-god, the father of his nymphs: and Ovid, in the fourteenth book of his Metamorphoses, mentions the Naiads of Latium as the immediate daughters of the neighbouring river-gods. Accordingly, the Naiads of particular rivers are occasionally, both by Ovid and Statius, called by a patronymic, from the name of the river to which they belong.

L. 40. Syrian Daphne.] The grove of Daphne in Syria, near Antioch, was famous for its delightful fountains.

Ibid. The tribes beloved by Pæon.] Mineral and medicinal springs. Pæon was the physician of the gods.

L. 43. The winged offspring.] The Winds; who, according to Hesiod and Apollodorus, were the sons of Astræus and Aurora.

L. 46. Hyperion.] A son of Cœlum and Tellus, and father of the Sun, who is thence called, by Pindar, Hyperionides. But Hyperion is put by Homer in the same manner as here, for the sun himself.

L. 49. Your fallying streams.] The state of the atmosphere with respect to rest and motion is, in several ways, affected by rivers and running streams; and that more especially in hot seasons: first, they destroy its equilibrium, by cooling those parts of it with which they are in contact; and secondly, they communicate their own motion: and the air which is thus moved by them, being left heated, is of consequence more elastic than other parts of the atmosphere, and therefore fitter to preserve and to propagate that motion.

L. 70. Delian king.] One of the epithets of Apollo, or the sun, in the Orphic hymn inscribed to him.

L. 79. Chloris.] The ancient Greek name for Flora.

L. 83. Amalthea.] The mother of the first Bacchus, whose birth and education was written, as Diodorus Siculus informs us, in the old Pelasgic character, by Thymoetes, grandson to Laomedon, and contemporary with Orpheus. Thymoetes had travelled over Libya to the country which borders on the western ocean; there he saw the island of Nyssa, and learned from the inhabitants, that "Ammon, king of Lybia, was married in former ages to Rhea, sister of Saturn and the Titans: that he afterwards fell in love with a beautiful virgin, whose name was Amalthea; had by her a son, and gave her possession of a neighbouring tract of land, wonderfully fertile; which in shape nearly resembling the horn of an ox, was thence called the Hesperian horn, and afterwards the horn of Amalthea: that, fearing the jealousy of Rhea, he concealed the young Bacchus, with his mother, in the island of Nyssa; the beauty of which, Diodorus describes with great dignity and pomp of style. This fable is one of the noblest in all the ancient mythology, and seems to have made a particular impression on the imagination of Milton; the only modern poet (unless perhaps it be necessary to except Spenser) who, in these mysterious traditions of the poetic story, had a heart to feel, and words to express, the simple and solitary genius of antiquity. To raise the idea of his Paradise, he prefers it even to

—"that Nysean isle

"Girt by the river Triton, where old Cham,

"(Whom Gentiles Ammon call, and Lybian

"Hid Amalthea, and her florid son, [Jove

"Young Bacchus, from his stepdame Rhea's eye."

L. 121. Edonian band.] The priestesses and other ministers of Bacchus; so called from Edonus, a mountain of Thrace, where his rites were celebrated.

L. 105. When Hermes.] Hermes, or Mercury, was the patron of commerce; in which benevolent character he is addressed by the author of the Indigitamenta in these beautiful lines:

Ἑρμῆνεν πάντων, κερδέμπορε, λυσιμέριμε,
Ὅς χερσὶν ἔχεις εἰρήνης ὄπλον ἀμέριμε.

L. 121. Dispense the mineral treasure.] The merchants of Sidon and Tyre made frequent voyages to the coast of Cornwall, from whence they carried home great quantities of tin.

L. 136. Hath he not won.] Mercury, the patron of commerce, being so greatly dependent on the good offices of the Naiads, in return obtains for them the friendship of Minerva, the goddess of war; for military power, at least the naval part of it, hath constantly followed the establishment of trade; which exemplifies the preceding observation, that "from bounty issueth power."

L. 143, 144. Calpe—Cantabrian surge.] Gibraltar and the bay of Biscay.

L. 150. Ægina's gloomy surge.] Near this island, the Athenians obtained the victory of Salamis, over the Persian navy.

L. 160. Xerxes saw.] This circumstance is recorded in that passage, perhaps the most splendid among all the remains of ancient history, where Plutarch, in his "Life of Themistocles," describes the sea-fights of Artemisium and Salamis.

L. 204. Thyrus.] A staff, or spear, wreathed round with ivy; of constant use in the Bacchanalian mysteries.

L. 217. Io Pæan.] An exclamation of victory and triumph, derived from Apollo's encounter with Python.

L. 252. Cirrha.] One of the summits or Parnassus, and sacred to Apollo. Near it were several fountains, said to be frequented by the muses. Nyssa, the other eminence of the same mountain, was dedicated to Bacchus.

L. 263. Charm the mind of gods.] This whole passage, concerning the effects of sacred music among the gods, is taken from Pindar's first Pythian ode.

L. 297. Phrygian pipe's.] The Phrygian music was fantastic and turbulent, and fit to excite disorderly passions.

L. 302, 303. The gates where Pallas holds The guardian key.] It was the office of Minerva to be the guardian of walled cities: whence she was named ΠΟΛΙΑΣ and ΠΟΛΙΟΤΧΟΣ, and had her statues placed in their gates, being supposed to keep the keys; and on that account styled ΚΑΗΔΟΤΧΟΣ.

L. 310, 311. Fate of sober Pentheus.] Pentheus was torn in pieces by the Bacchanalian priests and women, for despising their mysteries.

L. 318, 319. The cave Corycian.] Of this cave Pausanias, in his tenth book, gives the following description: "Between Delphi and the eminences of Parnassus, in a road to the grotto of Corycium, which has its name from the nymph Corycia, and is by far the most remarkable which I have seen. One may walk a great way into it without a torch. It is of a considerable height and hath several springs within it; and yet a much greater quantity of water distills from the shell and roof, so as to be continually dropping on the ground. The people round Parnassus hold it sacred to the Corycian nymphs and to Pan."

L. 319. Delphic mount] Delphi, the seat and oracle of Apollo, had a mountaneous and rocky situation, on the skirts of Parnassus.

L. 327. Cyrenaic.] Cyrene was the native country of Callimachus, whose hymns are the most remarkable example of that mythological passion which is assumed in the preceding poem, and have always afforded particular pleasure to the author of it, by reason of the mysterious solemnity with which they affect the mind. On this account he was induced to attempt somewhat in the same manner; solely by way of exercise: the manner itself being now almost entirely abandoned in poetry. And as the mere genealogy, or the personal adventures of heathen gods, could have been but little interesting to a modern reader; it was therefore thought proper to select some convenient part of the history of nature, and to employ these ancient divinities as it is probable they were first employed; to wit, in personifying natural causes, and in representing the mutual agreement or opposition of the corporeal and moral powers of the world: which hath been accounted the very highest office of poetry.

FOR A GROTTO.

To me, whom in their lays the shepherds call
Actæa, daughter of the neighbouring stream,
This cave belongs. The fig-tree and the vine,
Which o'er the rocky entrance downward shoot,
Where plac'd by Glycon. He with cowslips pale,
Primrose, and purple lychnis, deck'd the green
Before thy threshold, and my shelving walls
With honeysuckle cover'd. Here at noon,
Lull'd by the murmur of my rising fount,
I slumber: here my clustering fruits I tend:
Or from the humid flowers, at break of day,
Fresh garlands weave, and chase from all my
Each thing impure or noxious. Enter in, bounds
O stranger, undismay'd. Nor bat, nor toad
Here lurks: and if thy breast of blameless thoughts
Approve thee, not unwelcome shalt thou tread
My quiet mansion: chiefly, if thy name
Wife Pallas and the immortal muses own.

FOR A STATUE OF CHAUCER AT WOOD-STOCK.

SUCH was old Chaucer. Such the placid mien
Of him who first with harmony inform'd
The language of our fathers. Here he dwelt
For many a cheerful day. These ancient walls
Have often heard him, while his legends blithe

He sang; of love, or knighthood, or the wiles
Of homely life: through each estate and age,
The fashions and the follies of the world [chance
With cunning hand portraying. Though per-
From Blenheim's towers, O stranger, thou art come
Glowing with Churchill's trophies; yet in vain
Dost thou applaud them if thy breast be cold
To him, this other hero; who, in times
Dark and untaught, began with charming verse
To tame the rudeness of his native land.

III.

WHOE'ER thou art whose path in summer lies
Through yonder village, turn thee where the
Of branching oaks a rural palace old [grove
Imbosoms. There dwells Albert, generous lord
Of all the harvest round. And onward thence
A low plain chapel fronts the morning light
Fast by a silent rivulet. Humbly walk,
O stranger, o'er the consecrated ground;
And on that verdant hillock, which thou see'st
Beset with osiers, let thy pious hand
Sprinkle fresh water from the brook, and strew
Sweet-smelling flowers. For there doth Edmund
The learned shepherd; for each rural art [rest,
Fam'd, and for songs harmonious, and the woes
Of ill-requited love. The faithless pride
Of fair Matilda sank him to the grave [Heaven
In manhood's prime. But soon did righteous
With tears, with sharp remorse, and pining care,
Avenge her falsehood. Nor could all the gold,

And nuptial pomp, which lur'd her plighted faith
From Edmund to a loftier husband's home,
Relieve her breaking heart, or turn aside
The strokes of death. Go, traveller; relate
The mournful story. Haply some fair maid
May hold it in remembrance, and be taught
That riches cannot pay for truth or love.

IV.

O youths and virgins: O declining
O pale misfortune's slaves: O ye who dwell
Unknown with humble quiet; ye who wait
In courts, or fill the golden seat of kings:
O sons of sport and pleasure: O thou wretch
That weep'st for jealous love, or the sore wounds
Of conscious guilt, or death's rapacious hand
Which left thee void of hope: O ye who roam
In exile; ye who through the embattled field
Seek bright renown; or who for nobler palms
Contend, the leaders of a public cause;
Approach: behold this marble. Know ye not
The features? Hath not oft his faithful tongue
Told you the fashion of your own estate,
The secrets of your bosom? Here then, round
His monument with reverence while ye stand,
Say to each other: "This was Shakspeare's form;
"Who walk'd in every path of human life,
"Felt every passion; and to all mankind
"Doth now, will ever, that experience yield
"Which his own genius only could acquire,"

FOR A COLUMN AT RUNNYMEDE.

Thou, who the verdant plain dost traverse here,
While Thames among his willows from thy view
Retires; O stranger, stay thee, and the scene
Around contemplate well. This is the place
Where England's ancient barons, clad in arms
And stern with conquest, from their tyrant king
(Then render'd tame) did challenge and secure
The charter of thy freedom. Pass not on Till thou hast blest their memory, and paid
Those thanks which God appointed the reward
Of public virtue. And if chance thy home
Salute thee with a father's honour'd name,
Go, call thy sons: instruct them what a debt
They owe their ancestors; and make them swear
To pay it, by transmitting down entire [born.
Those sacred rights to which themselves were

VII.

THE WOOD-NYMPH.

Approach in silence. 'Tis no vulgar tale
Which I, the Dryad of this heavy oak,

Pronounce to mortal ears. The second age
Now hasteneth to its period, since I rose
On this fair lawn. The groves of yonder vale
Are all my offspring: and each nymph, who
The copses and the furrow'd fields beyond, [guards
Obeys me. Many changes have I seen
In human things, and many awful deeds
Of justice, when the ruling hand of Jove
Against the tyrants of the land, against
The unhallow'd sons of luxury and guile,
Was arm'd for retribution. Thus at length
Expert in laws divine, I know the paths
Of wisdom, and erroneous folly's end
Have oft presag'd: and now well-pleas'd I wait
Each evening till a noble youth, who loves
My shade, a while releas'd from public cares,
Yon peaceful gate shall enter, and sit down
Beneath my branches. Then his musing mind
I prompt, unseen; and place before his view
Sincerest forms of good; and move his heart
With the dread bounties of the Sire Supreme
Of gods and men, with freedom's generous deeds,
The lofty voice of glory and the faith
Of sacred friendship. Stranger, I have told
My function. If within thy bosom dwell
Aught which may challenge praise, thou wilt not Unhonour'd my abode, nor shall I hear [leave
A sparing benediction from thy tongue.

VIII.

Ye powers unseen, to whom the bards of Greece
Erected altars; ye who to the mind
More lofty views unfold, and prompt the heart
With more divine emotions; if erewhile
Not quite unpleasing have my votive rites
Of you been deem'd, when oft this lonely seat
To you I consecrated; then vouchsafe
Here with your instant energy to crown
My happy solitude. It is the hour
When most I love to invoke you, and have felt
Most frequent your glad ministry divine.
The air is calm: the sun's unveiled orb
Shines in the middle heaven. The harvest round
Stands quiet, and among the golden sheaves
The reapers lie reclin'd. The neighbouring groves
Are mute; nor even a linnet's random strain
Echoeth amid the silence. Let me feel
Your influence, ye kind powers. Aloft in heaven
Abide ye? or on those transparent clouds
Pass ye from hill to hill? or on the shades
Which yonder elms cast o'er the lake below
Do you converse retir'd? From what lov'd haunt Shall I expect you? Let me once more feel
Your influence, O ye kind inspiring powers:
And I will guard it well, nor shall a thought
Rise in my mind, nor shall a passion move
Across my bosom unobserv'd, unstor'd
By faithful memory. And then at some
More active moment, will I call them forth
Anew; and join them in majestic forms,
And give them utterance in harmonious strains;
That all mankind shall wonder at your sway.

IX.

Me though in life's sequester'd vale
The Almighty Sire ordain'd to dwell,

Remote from glory's toilsome ways,
And the great scenes of public praise;
Yet let me still with grateful pride
Remember how my infant frame
He temper'd with prophetic flame,
And early music to my tongue supply'd.

'Twas then my future fate he weigh'd.
And, this be thy concern, he said,
At once with passion's keen alarms,
And beauty's pleasurable charms,
And sacred truth's eternal light,
To move the various mind of man;
Till under one unblemish'd plan,
His reason, fancy, and his heart unite.

AN EPISTLE TO CURIO *.

THIRICK has the spring beheld thy faded fame,
And the fourth winter rises on thy shame,
Since I exulting grasp'd the votive shell,
In sounds of triumph all thy praise to tell;
Blest could my skill through ages make thee shine,
And proud to mix my memory with thine.
But now the cause that wak'd my song before,
With praise, with triumph, crowns the toil no more.

If to the glorious man, whose faithful cares,
Nor quell'd by malice, nor relax'd by years,
Had aw'd ambition's wild audacious hate,
And dragg'd at length corruption to her fate;
If every tongue its large applauses ow'd,
And well-earn'd laurels every muse bestow'd;
If public justice urg'd the high reward,
And freedom smil'd on the devoted bard:
Say then, to him whose levity or lust
Laid all a people's generous hopes in dust;
Who taught ambition firmer heights of power,
And sav'd corruption at her hopeless hour;
Does not each tongue its execrations owe?
Shall not each muse a wreath of shame bestow?
And public justice sanctify the award?
And freedom's hand protect the impartial bard?
Yet long reluctant I forbore thy name,
Long watch'd thy virtue like a dying flame,

* Curio was a young Roman Senator of distinguished birth and parts, who, upon his first entrance into the Forum, had been committed to the care of Cicero. Being profuse and extravagant, he soon dissipated a large and splendid fortune; to supply the want of which, he was driven to the necessity of abetting the designs of Caesar against the liberties of his country, although he had before been a professed enemy to him.—Cicero exerted himself with great energy to prevent his ruin, but without effect, and he became one of the first victims in the civil war. This epistle was first published in the year 1744, when a celebrated patriot, after a long, and at last a successful opposition to an unpopular minister, had deserted the cause of his country, and become the foremost in support and defence of the same measures he had so steadily, and for such a length of time contended against. It was altered by the Author into the "Ode to Curio;" but the original poem is too curious to be omitted.

Hung o'er each glimmering spark with anxious eyes,

And wish'd and hop'd the light again would rise,
But since thy guilt still more entire appears,
Since no art hides, no supposition clears;
Since vengeful slander now too sinks her blast,
And the first rage of party-hate is past;
Calm as the judge of truth, at length I come
To weigh thy merits, and pronounce thy doom:
So may my trust from all reproach be free,
And earth and time confirm the fair decree.

There are who say they view'd without amaze
Thy sad reverse of all thy former praise;
That through the pageants of a patriot's name,
They pierc'd the foulness of thy secret aim;
Or deem'd thy arm exalted but to throw
The public thunder on a private foe.
But I, whose soul consented to thy cause,
Who felt thy genious stamp its own applause,
Who saw the spirits of each glorious age
Move in thy bosom, and direct thy rage;
I scorn'd the ungenerous glois of slavish minds,
The owl-ey'd race, whom virtue's lustre blinds.
Spite of the learned in the ways of vice,
And all who prove that each man has his price,
I still believ'd thy end was just and free;
And yet, even yet believe it—spite of thee.
Even though thy mouth impure has dar'd disclaim,
Urg'd by the wretched impotence of shame,
Whatever filial cares thy zeal had paid
To laws infirm, and liberty decay'd;
Has begg'd ambition to forgive the show;
Has told corruption thou wert ne'er her foe;
Has boasted in thy country's awful ear,
Her gross delusion when she held thee dear;
How tame she follow'd thy tempestuous call,
And heard thy pompous tales, and trusted all—
Rise from your sad abodes, ye curst of old
For laws subverted, and for cities sold!
Paint all the noblest trophies of your guilt,
The oaths you perjur'd, and the blood you spilt;
Yet must you one untempted vileness own,
One dreadful palm reserv'd for him alone:
With studied arts his country's praise to spurn,
To beg the infamy he did not earn,
To challenge hate when honour was his due,
And plead his crimes where all his virtue knew,
Do robes of state the guarded heart enclose
From each fair feeling human nature knows?
Can pompous titles stun the enchanted ear
To all that reason, all that sense, would hear?
Else could'st thou e'er desert thy sacred post,
In such unthankful baseness to be lost?
Else could'st thou wed the emptiness of vice,
And yield thy glories at an idiot's price?

When they who, loud for liberty and laws,
In doubtful times had fought their country's cause,
When now of conquest and dominion sure,
They fought alone to hold their fruits secure;
When taught by these, oppression hid the face
To leave corruption stronger in her place,
By silent spells to work the public fate,
And taint the vitals of the passive state,
Till healing wisdom should avail no more,
And freedom loath to tread the poison'd shore;
Then, like some guardian god that flies to save,
The weary pilgrim from the instant grave,

Whom, sleeping and secure, the guileful snake
Steals near and nearer through the peaceful brake;
Then Curio rose to ward the public woe,
To wake the heedless, and incite the slow,
Against corruption liberty to arm,
And quell the enchantress by a mightier charm.

Swift o'er the land the fair contagion flew,
And with thy country's hopes thy honours grew.
Thee, patriot, the patrician roof confess'd:
Thy powerful voice the rescued merchant blest'd;
Of thee with awe the rural hearth resounds;
The bowl to thee the grateful sailor crowns;
Touch'd in the fighting shade with manlier fires,
To trace thy steps the love-sick youth aspires;
The learn'd recluse, who oft amaz'd had read
Of Grecian heroes, Roman patriots dead,
With new amazement hears a living name
Pretend to share in such forgotten fame;
And he who, scorning courts and courtly ways,
Left the tame tract of these dejected days,
The life of nobler ages to renew
In virtues sacred from a monarch's view,
Rous'd by thy labours from the blest retreat,
Where social ease and public passions meet,
Again ascending treads the civil scene,
To act and be a man, as thou hadst been.

Thus by degrees thy cause superior grew,
And the great end appear'd at last in view:
We heard the people in thy hopes rejoice;
We saw the senate bending to thy voice; [reign
The friends of freedom hail'd the approaching
Of laws for which our fathers bled in vain;
While venal faction, struck with new dismay,
Shrunk at the frown, and self-abandon'd lay.
Wak'd in the shock, the public genius rose,
Abash'd and keener from his long repose;
Sublime in ancient pride, he rais'd the spear
Which slaves and tyrants long were wont to fear.
The city felt his call: from man to man,
From street to street, the glorious horror ran;
Each crowded haunt was stir'd beneath his power,
And, murmuring, challeng'd the deciding hour.

Lo! the deciding hour at last appears;
The hour of every freeman's hopes and fears!
Thou, genius! guardian of the Roman name,
O ever prompt tyrannic rage to tame!
Instruct the mighty moments as they roll,
And guide each movement steady to the goal.
Ye spirits, by whose providential art
Succeeding motives turn the changeful heart,
Keep, keep the best in view to Curio's mind,
And watch his fancy, and his passions bind!
Ye shades immortal, who, by freedom led,
Or in the field, or on the scaffold bled,
Bend from your radiant seats a joyful eye,
And view the crown of all your labours nigh.
See, freedom mounting her eternal throne!
The sword submitted, and the laws her own:
See! public power chastis'd beneath her stands,
With eyes intent, and uncorrupted hands!
See private life by wisest arts reclaim'd!
See ardent youth to noblest manners fram'd!
See us acquire whate'er was fought by you,
If Curio, only Curio will be true.

'Twas then—O shame! O trust how ill repaid!
O Latium, oft by faithless sons betray'd!—
'Twas then—What frenzy on thy reason stole?
What spells unfix'd thy determin'd soul?

—Is this the man in freedom's cause approv'd?
The man so great, so honour'd, so belov'd?
This patient slave by tinsel chains allur'd?
This wretched suitor for a boon abjur'd?
This Curio, hated and despis'd by all?
Who sell himself to work his country's fall?

O lost, alike to action and repose!
Unknown, unpity'd in the worst of woes!
With all that conscious, undissembled pride,
Sold to the insults of a foe defy'd!
With all that habit of familiar fame,
Doom'd to exhaust the dregs of life in shame!
The sole sad refuge of thy baffled art,
To act a statesman's dull, exploded part,
Renounce the praise no longer in thy power,
Display thy virtue, though without a dower,
Contemn the giddy crowd, the vulgar wind,
And shut thy eyes that others may be blind.
—Forgive me, Romans, that I bear to smile
When shameless mouths your majesty defile,
Paint you a thoughtless, frantic, headlong crew,
And cast their own impieties on you.
For witness, freedom, to whose sacred power
My soul was vow'd from reason's earliest hour,
How have I flood exulting, to survey
My country's virtues opening in thy ray!
How, with the sons of every foreign shore
The more I match'd them, honour'd hers the more.
O race erect! whose native strength of soul,
Which kings, nor priests, nor sordid laws controul,
Bursts the tame round of animal affairs,
And seeks a nobler centre for its cares;
Intent the laws of life to comprehend,
And fix dominion's limits by its end.
Who, bold and equal in their love or hate,
By conscious reason judging every state,
The man forget not, though in rags he lies,
And know the mortal through a crown's disguise:
Thence prompt alike with witty scorn to view
Fastidious grandeur lift his solemn brow,
Or, all awake at pity's soft command,
Bend the mild ear, and stretch the gracious hand;
Thence large of heart, from envy far remov'd,
When public toils to virtue stand approv'd,
Not the young lover fonder to admire,
Nor more indulgent the delighted fire;
Yet high and jealous of their free-born name,
Fierce as the flight of Jove's destroying flame,
Where'er oppression works her wanton sway,
Proud to confront, and dreadful to repay.
But if, to purchase Curio's sage applause,
My country must with him renounce her cause,
Quit with a slave the path a patriot trod,
Bow the meek knee, and kiss the regal rod;
Then still, ye powers, instruct his tongue to rail,
Nor let his zeal, nor let his subject fail:
Else, ere he change the style, bear me away
To where the Cracchi, * where the Bruti stay!

O long rever'd, and late resign'd to shame!
If this uncourtly page thy notice claim
When the loud cares of business are withdrawn,
Nor well-drest beggars round thy footsteps fawn;

* The two brothers, Tiberius and Caius Gracchus lost their lives in attempting to introduce the only regulation that could give stability and good order to the Roman republic. L. Junius Brutus founded the commonwealth, and died in its defence. AKENSIDE.

In that still, thoughtful, solitary hour,
 When truth exerts her unresisted power,
 Breaks the false optics ting'd with fortune's glare,
 Unlocks the breast, and lays the passions bare:
 'Then turn thy eyes on that important scene,
 And ask thyself—if all be well within.
 Where is the heart-felt worth and weight of soul,
 Which labour could not stop, nor fear controul?
 Where the known dignity, the stamp of awe,
 Which, half abash'd, the proud and venal saw?
 Where the calm triumphs of an honest cause?
 Where the delightful taste of just applause?
 Where the strong reason, the commanding tongue,
 On which the senate fir'd or trembling hung!
 All vanish'd, all are sold—And in their room,
 Couch'd in thy bosom's deep, distracted gloom,
 See the pale form of barbarous grandeur dwell,
 Like some grim idol in a forcerer's cell!
 To her in chains thy dignity was led;
 At her polluted shrine thy honour bled;
 With blasted weeds thy awful brow she crown'd,
 Thy powerful tongue with poison'd philters bound,
 That baffled reason straight indignant flew,
 And fair persuasion from her seat withdrew:
 For now no longer truth supports thy cause;
 No longer glory prompts thee to applause;
 No longer virtue breathing in thy breast,
 With all her conscious majesty confest,
 Still bright and brighter wakes the almighty flame,
 To rouse the feeble, and the wilful name,
 And where she sees the catching glimpses roll,
 Spreads the strong blaze, and all involves the soul;
 But cold restraints thy conscious fancy chill,
 And formal passions mock thy struggling will;
 Or, if thy genius e'er forget his chain,
 And reach impatient at a nobler strain,
 Soon the sad bodings of contemptuous mirth
 Shoot through thy breast, and stab the generous
 birth,
 Till, blind with smart, from truth to frenzy tost,
 And all the tenor of thy reason lost,
 Perhaps thy anguish drains a real tear;
 While some with pity, some with laughter hear.
 —Can art, alas! or genius, guide the head,
 Where truth or freedom from the heart are fled?
 Can lesser wheels repeat their native stroke,
 When the prime function of the soul is broke?
 But come, unhappy man! thy fates impend;
 Come, quit thy friends, if yet thou hast a friend;
 Turn from the poor rewards of guilt like thine,
 Renounce thy titles, and thy robes resign;
 For see the hand of destiny display'd
 To shut thee from the joys thou hast betray'd!
 See the dire fane of infamy arise!
 Dark as the grave, and spacious as the skies;
 Where, from the first of time, thy kindred train,
 The chiefs and princes of the unjust remain.
 Eternal barriers guard the pathless road
 To warn the wanderer of the curst abode;
 But prone as whirlwinds scour the passive sky,
 The heights surmounted, down the steep they fly.
 There, black with frowns, relentless time awaits,
 And goads their footsteps to the guilty gates:
 And still he asks them of their unknown aims,
 Evolves their secrets, and their guilt proclaims;
 And still his hands despoil them on the road
 Of each vain wreath, by lying bards bestow'd,

Break their proud marbles, crush their festal cars,
 And rend the lawless trophies of their wars.
 At last the gates his potent voice obey;
 Fierce to their dark abode he drives his prey,
 Where, ever arm'd with adamantine chains,
 The watchful demon o'er her vassals reigns,
 O'er mighty names and giant-powers of lust,
 The great, the sage, the happy, and august*.
 No gleam of hope their baleful mansion cheers,
 No sound of honour hails their unblest ears;
 But dire reproaches from the friend betray'd,
 The childless fire and violated maid;
 But vengeful vows for guardian laws effac'd,
 From towns enslav'd and continents laid waste;
 But long posterity's united groan,
 And the sad charge of horrors not their own,
 For ever through the trembling space resound,
 And sink each impious forehead to the ground.

Ye mighty foes of liberty and rest,
 Give way, do homage to a mightier guest!
 Ye daring spirits of the Roman race,
 See Curio's toil your proudest claims efface!
 —Aw'd at the name, fierce † Appius rising bends,
 And hardy Cinna from his throne attends:
 "He comes, they cry, to whom the fates assign'd
 "With surer arts to work what we design'd,
 "From year to year the stubborn herd to sway,
 "Mouth all their wrongs, and all their rage obey;
 "Till, own'd their guide and trusted with their
 "power,

"He mock'd their hopes in one decisive hour:
 "Then, tir'd and yielding, led them to the chain,
 "And quench the spirit we provok'd in vain."

But thou, Supreme, by whose eternal hands
 Fair liberty's heroic empire stands;
 Whose thunders the rebellious deep controul,
 And quell the triumphs of the traitor's soul,
 O turn this dreadful omen far away!
 On freedom's foes their own attempts repay:
 Relume her sacred fire so near suppress'd,
 And fix her shrine in every Roman breast:
 Though bold corruption boast around the land,
 "Let virtue, if she can, my baits withstand!"
 Though bolder now she urge the accursed claim,
 Gay with her trophies rais'd on Curio's shame;
 Yet some there are who scorn her impious mirth,
 Who know what conscience and a heart are worth.
 ---O friend and father of the human mind,
 Whose art for noblest ends our frame design'd!
 If I, though fated to the studious shade
 Which party-strife nor anxious power invade,
 If I aspire in public virtue's cause,
 To guide the muses by sublimer laws,
 Do thou her own authority impart,
 And give my numbers entrance to the heart.
 Perhaps the verse might rouse her smother'd flame,
 And snatch the fainting patriot back to fame;
 Perhaps, by worthy thoughts of human kind,
 To worthy deeds exalt the conscious mind;
 Or dash corruption in her proud career,
 And teach her slaves that vice was born to fear.

LOVE. AN ELEGY.

Too much my heart of beauty's power hath
known,

Too long to love hath reason left her throne;
Too long my genius mourn'd his myrtle chain,
And three rich years of youth consum'd in vain.
My wishes, lull'd with soft inglorious dreams,
Forgot the patriot's and the sage's themes:
Through each Elysian vale and fairy grove,
Through all the enchanted paradise of love.
Milded by sickly hope's deceitful flame,
Averse to action, and renouncing fame.

At last the visionary scenes decay,
My eyes, exulting, bless the new-born day,
Whose faithful beams detect the dangerous road
In which my heedless feet securely trod,
And stript the phantoms of their lying charms
That lur'd my soul from wisdom's peaceful arms.

For silver streams and banks bespread with
flowers,

For mossy couches and harmonious bowers,
Lo! barren heaths appear, and pathless woods,
And rocks hung dreadful o'er unfathom'd floods:
For openness of heart, for tender smiles, [wiles,
Looks fraught with love, and wrath disarming
Lo! sullen spite, and perjur'd lust of gain,
And cruel pride, and crueller disdain.
Lo! cordial faith to idiot airs refin'd,
Now coolly civil, now transporting kind.
For graceful ease, lo! affectation walks;
And dull half-sense, for wit and wisdom talks.
New to each hour what low delight succeeds,
What precious furniture of hearts and heads!
By nought their prudence, but by getting, known;
And all their courage in deceiving shown.

See next what plagues attend the lover's state,
What frightful forms of terror, scorn, and hate!
See burning fury heaven and earth defy!
See dumb despair in icy fetters lie!
See black suspicion bend his gloomy brow,
The hideous image of himself to view!
And fond belief, with all a lover's flame,
Sinks in those arms that points his head with shame!
There wan dejection, faltering as he goes,
In shades and silence vainly seeks repose;
Musing through pathless wilds, consumes the day,
Then lost in darkness weeps the hours away.
Here the gay crowd of luxury advance,
Some touch the lyre, and others urge the dance;
On every head the rosy garland glows,
In every hand the golden goblet flows.
The Syren views them with exulting eyes,
And laughs at bashful virtue as she flies.
But see behind, where scorn and want appear,
The grave remonstrance and the witty sneer.
See fell remorse in action, prompt to dart
Her snaky poison through the conscious heart.
And sloth to cancel, with oblivious shame,
The fair memorial of recording fame.

Are these delights that one would wish to gain?
Is this the Elysium of a sober brain?
To wait for happiness in female smiles,
Bear all her scorn, be caught with all her wiles,
With prayers, with bribes, with lies, her pity crave,
Bless her hard bonds, and boast to be her slave;

To feel, for trifles, a distracting train
Of hopes and terrors equally in vain;
This hour to tremble, and the next to glow,
Can pride, can sense, can reason, stoop so low?
When virtue, at an easier price, displays
The sacred wreaths of honourable praise;
When wisdom utters her divine decree,
To laugh at pompous folly, and be free.

I bid adieu, then, to these woeful scenes;
I bid adieu to all the sex of queens;
Adieu to every suffering, simple soul
That lets a woman's will his ease controul.
There laugh, ye witty; and rebuke, ye grave!
For me, I scorn to boast that I'm a slave.
I bid the whining brotherhood be gone;
Joy to my heart! my wishes are my own!
Farewell the female heaven, the female hell;
To the great God of love a glad farewell.
Is this the triumph of thy awful name?
Are these the splendid hopes that urg'd thy aim,
When first my bosom own'd thy haughty sway?
When thus Minerva heard thee, boasting, say,
"Go, martial maid, elsewhere thy arts employ,
"Nor hope to shelter that devoted boy.
"Go teach the solemn sons of care and age,
"The pensive statesmen, and the midnight sage;
"The young with me must other lessons prove,
"Youth calls for pleasure, pleasure calls for love.
"Behold his heart thy grave advice disdains,
"Behold I bind him in eternal chains."

Alas! great love, how idle was the boast!
Thy chains are broken, and thy lessons lost;
Thy wilful rage has tir'd my suffering heart,
And passion, reason, forc'd thee to depart.

But wherefore dost thou linger on thy way?
Why vainly search for some pretence to stay,
When crowds of vassals court thy pleasing yoke,
And countless victims bow them to the stroke?
Lo! round thy shrine a thousand youths advance,
Warm with the gentle ardours of romance;
Each longs to assert thy cause with feats of arms,
And make the world confess Dulcinea's charms.
Ten thousand girls, with flowery chaplets crown'd,
To groves and streams thy tender triumph sound;
Each bids the stream in murmurs speak her flame,
Each calls the grove to sigh her shepherd's name.
But, if thy pride such easy honour scorn,
If nobler trophies must thy toil adorn,
Behold yon flowery antiquated maid
Bright in the bloom of threescore years display'd;
Her shalt thou bind in thy delightful chains,
And thrill with gentle pangs her wither'd veins,
Her frosty cheek with crimson blushes dye,
With dreams of rapture melt her maudlin eye.

Turn then thy labours to the servile crowd,
Entice the wary, and controul the proud;
Make the sad miser his best gains forego,
The solemn statesman sigh to be a beau,
The bold coquette with fondest passion burn,
The Bacchanalian o'er his bottle mourn:
And that chief glory of thy power maintain,
"To poise ambition in a female brain."
Be these thy triumphs. But no more presume
That my rebellious heart will yield thee room.
I know thy puny force, thy simple wiles;
I break triumphant through thy flimsy toils:

I see thy dying lamp's last languid glow,
Thy arrows blunted, and unbrac'd thy bow.
I feel diviner fires my breast inflame,
To active science, and ingenuous fame:
Resume the paths my earliest choice began,
And lose, with pride, the lover in the man.

A BRITISH PHILIPPIC:

Occasioned by the insults of the Spaniards, and the present preparations for war.

MDCCKXXVIII.

WHENCE this unwonted transport in my breast?
Why glow my thoughts, and whither would the muse

Aspire with rapid wing? Her country's cause
Demands her efforts; at that sacred call
She summons all her ardour, throws aside
The trembling lyre, and with the warrior's trump
She means to thunder in each British ear;
And if one spark of honour or of fame,
Disdain of insult, dread of infamy,
One thought of public virtue yet survive,
She means to wake it, rouse the generous flame,
With patriot zeal inspirit every breast,
And fire each British heart with British wrongs.

Alas, the vain attempt! what influence now
Can the muse boast! or what attention now
Is paid to fame or virtue? Where is now
The British spirit, generous, warm, and brave,
So frequent wont from tyranny and woe
To free the suppliant nations? Where, indeed!
If that protection, once to strangers given,
Be now withheld from sons? each nobler thought,
That warm'd our fires, is lost and buried now
In luxury and avarice. Baneful vice!
How it unman's a nation! yet I'll try,
I'll aim to shake this vile degenerate sloth;
I'll dare to rouse Britannia's dreaming sons
To fame, to virtue, and impart around
A generous feeling of compatriot woes.

Come then the various powers of forceful speech,
All that can move, awaken, fire, transport;
Come the bold ardour of the Theban bard!
The arousing thunder of the patriot Greek!
The soft persuasion of the Roman sage!
Come all! and raise me to an equal height,
A rapture worthy of my glorious cause!
Lest my best efforts failing should debase
The sacred theme; for with no common wing
The muse attempts to soar. Yet what need these?
My country's fame, my free-born British heart,
Shall be my best inspirers, raise my flight
High as the Theban's pinion, and with more
Than Greek or Roman flame exalt my soul.
Oh! could I give the vast ideas birth
Expressive of the thoughts that flame within,
No more should lazy luxury detain
Our ardent youth; no more shall Britain's sons
Sit tamely passive by, and careless hear
The prayers, sighs, groans (immortal infamy!)
Of fellow Britons, with oppression sunk,
In bitterness of soul demanding aid,
Calling on Britain, their dear native land,
The land of liberty; so greatly fam'd
For just redress: the land so often dyed

With her best blood, for that arousing cause,
The freedom of her sons; those sons that now
Far from the manly blessings of her sway,
Drag the vile fetters of a Spanish lord.
And dare they, dare the vanquish'd sons of Spain,
Enslave a Briton? Have they then forgot,
So soon forgot, the great, the immortal day,
When rescued Sicily with joy beheld
The swift-wing'd thunder of the British arm
Disperse their navies? when their coward bands
Fled, like the raven from the bird of Jove,
From swift impending vengeance fled in vain:
Are these our lords? And can Britannia see
Her foes oft vanquish'd, thus defy her power,
Insult her standard, and enslave her sons,
And not arise to justice? Did our fires,
Unaw'd by chains, by exile, or by death,
Preserve inviolate her guardian rights,
To Briton's ever sacred! that their sons
Might give them up to Spaniards?—Turn your eyes,

Turn ye degenerate, who with haughty boast
Call yourselves Britons, to that dismal gloom,
That dungeon dark and deep, where never thought
Of joy or peace can enter; see the gates
Harsh-creaking open; what an hideous void,
Dark as the yawning grave! while still as death
A frightful silence reigns: There on the ground
Behold your brethren chain'd like beasts of prey:
There mark your numerous glories, there behold
The look that speaks unutterable woe;
The mangled limb, the faint, the deathful eye
With famine sunk, the deep heart-bursting groan
Suppress'd in silence; view the loathsome food,
Refus'd by dogs, and oh! the stinging thought!
View the dark Spaniard glorying in their wrongs,
The deadly priest triumphant in their woes,
And thundering worse damnation on their souls:
While that pale form, in all the pangs of death,
Too faint to speak, yet eloquent of all.
His native British spirit yet untam'd,
Raises his head, and with indignant frowns
Of great defiance, and superior scorn,
Looks up and dies.—Oh! I am all on fire!
But let me spare the theme, lest future times
Should blush to hear that either conquer'd Spain
Durst offer Britain such outrageous wrong,
Or Britain tamely bore it—
Descend, ye guardian heroes of the land!
Scourges of Spain, descend! Behold your sons.
See! how they run the same heroic race,
How prompt, how ardent in their country's cause,
How greatly proud to assert their British blood,
And in their deeds reflect their fathers' fame!
Ah! would to heaven ye did not rather see
How dead to virtue in the public cause!
How cold, how careless, how to glory deaf,
They shame your laurels, and belie their birth!

Come, ye great spirits, Ca'ndish, Raleigh, Blake!
And ye of latter name your country's pride,
Oh! come, disperse these lazy fumes of sloth,
Teach British hearts with British fires to glow!
In wakening whispers rouse our ardent youth,
Blazon the triumphs of your better days,
Paint all the glorious scenes of rightful war,
In all its splendours; to their swelling souls
Say how ye bow'd the insulting Spaniards' pride,
Say how ye thunder'd o'er their prostrate heads,

Say how ye broke their lines and fir'd their ports,
 Say how not death, in all its frightful shapes,
 Could damp your souls, or shake the great resolve
 For right and Britain: Then display the joys
 The patriot's soul exalting, while he views
 Transported millions hail with loud acclaim
 The guardian of their civil, sacred rights.
 How greatly welcome to the virtuous man
 Is death for others good! the radiant thoughts
 That beam celestial on his passing soul,
 The unfading crowns awaiting him above,
 The exalting plaudit of the Great Supreme,
 Who in his actions with complacence views
 His own reflected splendour; then descend,
 Though to a lower, yet a nobler scene;
 Paint the just honours to his reliques paid,
 Show grateful millions weeping o'er his grave;
 While his fair fame in each progressive age
 For ever brightens; and the wise and good
 Of every land in universal choir
 With richest incense of undying praise
 His urn encircle, to the wondering world
 His numerous triumphs blazon; while with awe,
 With filial reverence, in his steps they tread,
 And, copying every virtue, every fame,
 Transplant his glories into second life,
 And, with unsparing hand, make nations blest
 By his example. Vast, immense rewards!
 For all the turmoils which the virtuous mind
 Encounters here. Yet, Britons, are ye cold?
 Yet deaf to glory, virtue, and the call
 Of your poor injur'd countrymen? Ah! no.
 I see ye are not; every bosom glows
 With native greatness, and in all its state
 The British spirit rises: Glorious change!
 Fame, virtue, freedom, welcome! O forgive
 The muse, that, ardent in her sacred cause,
 Your glory question'd: she beholds with joy;
 She owns, she triumphs in her wish'd mistake.

See! from her sea-beat throne in awful march
 Britannia towers: upon her laurel crest
 The plumes majestic nod; behold she heaves
 Her guardian shields, and terrible in arms
 For battle shakes her adamant spear:
 Loud at her foot the British lion roars,
 Frighting the nations; haughty Spain full soon
 Shall hear and tremble. Go then, Britons, forth,
 Your country's daring champions: tell your foes,
 Tell them in thunders o'er their prostrate land,
 You were not born for slaves: Let all your deeds
 Show that the sons of those immortal men,
 The stars of shining story, are not slow
 In virtue's path to emulate their fires,
 To assert their country's rights, avenge her sons,
 And hurl the bolts of justice on her foes.

HYMN TO SCIENCE.

"O Vitæ Philosophia Dux! O Virtutis indaga-
 "trix, expultrixque Vitiorum.---Tu Urbes pe-
 "peristi; tu inventrix Legum, tu magistra Mo-
 "rum & Disciplinæ fuisti: Ad te confugimus,
 "a te Opem petimus." Cic. Tusc. Quæst.

I.

SCIENCE! thou fair effusive ray
 From the great source of mental day,

Free, generous, and refin'd!
 Descend with all thy treasures fraught,
 Illumine each bewilder'd thought,
 And bless my labouring mind.

II.

But first with thy resistless light,
 Disperse those phantoms from my sight,
 Those mimic shades of thee:
 The scholiast's learning, sophist's cant,
 The visionary bigot's rant,
 The monk's philosophy.

III.

O! let thy powerful charms impart
 The patient head, the candid heart,
 Devoted to thy sway;
 Which no weak passions e'er mislead,
 Which still with dauntless steps proceed
 Where reason points the way.

IV.

Give me to learn each secret cause;
 Let number's, figure's, motion's laws
 Reveal'd before me stand;
 These to great nature's scenes apply,
 And round the globe, and through the sky,
 Disclose her working hand.

V.

Next, to thy nobler search resign'd,
 The busy, restless, human mind
 Through every maze pursue;
 Detect perception where it lies,
 Catch the ideas as they rise,
 And all their changes view.

VI.

Say from what simple springs began
 The vast, ambitious thoughts of man,
 Which range beyond controul;
 Which seek eternity to trace,
 Dive through the infinity of space,
 And strain to grasp the whole.

VII.

Her secret stores let memory tell,
 Bid fancy quit her fairy cell,
 In all her colours drest;
 While, prompt her sallies to controul,
 Reason, the judge, recalls the soul
 To truth's severest test.

VIII.

Then launch through being's wide extent;
 Let the fair scale, with just ascent,
 And cautious steps, be trod;
 And from the dead, corporeal mass,
 Through each progressive order pass
 To instinct, reason, God.

IX.

There, Science! veil thy daring eye;
 Nor dive too deep, nor soar too high,
 In that divine abyss;
 To faith content thy beams to lend,
 Her hopes to assure, her steps befriend,
 And light her way to bliss.

X.

Then downwards take thy flight again,
 Mix with the policies of men,
 And social nature's ties;
 The plan the genius of each state,
 Its interest and its powers relate,
 Its fortunes and its rise.

XI.

Through private life pursue thy course,
Trace every action to its source,
And means and motives weigh :
Put tempers, passions, in the scale,
Mark what degrees in each prevail,
And fix the doubtful sway.

XII.

That last, best effort of thy skill,
To form the life, and rule the will,
Propitious power ! impart :
Teach me to cool my passion's fires,
Make me the judge of my desires,
The master of my heart.

XIII.

Raise me above the vulgar's breath,
Pursuit of fortune, fear of death,
And all in life that's mean :
Still true to reason be my plan,
Still let my actions speak the man,
Through every various scene.

XIV.

Hail ! queen of manners, light of truth ;
Hail ! charm of age, and guide of youth ;
Sweet refuge of distress :
In business, thou ! exact, polite ;
Thou giv'st retirement its delight,
Prosperity its grace.

XV.

Of wealth, power, freedom, thou the cause ;
Foundress of order, cities, laws,
Of arts inventress, thou !
Without thee, what were human-kind ?
How vast their wants, their thoughts how blind !
Their joys how mean ! how few !

XVI.

Sun of the soul ! thy beams unveil !
Let others spread the daring sail,
On fortune's faithless sea :
While, undeluded, happier I
From the vain tumult timely fly,
And sit in peace with thee.

THE LIFE OF HARTE.

WALTER HARTE was born about the beginning of this century. Of the place of his birth there is no memorial. His father, the Rev. Walter Harte, had been Fellow of Pembroke College, Oxford, Prebend of Bristol, and Canon of Wells; but was dispossessed of his preferments in 1691, for refusing to take the oaths to King William. He obtained his Prebendary of Bristol, by the recommendation of Lord Chancellor Jeffries, in return for the manly freedom with which he remonstrated against his severities at Taunton. By the kindness of the nonjurant Bishops Kidder, Hooper, and Wynne, he received the little profits from his Canonry of Wells till the time of his death, which happened at Kentbury in Bucks, February 10. 1735. Lord Chancellor Harcourt offered him a Bishoprick from Queen Anne; but the favour was declined, with grateful acknowledgments.

He was educated, as he himself informs us, in the dedication to his Divine Poems, at the free school of Marlborough, in Wiltshire, under the care of the Rev. Mr. Hildrop, from whence he was removed to St. Mary-Hall, Oxford. Early in life he discovered a propensity to poetry; and, before he left Marlborough school, he had distinguished himself by his poetical compositions, as appears from the concluding lines of his Epistle to the Countess of Hertford.

First in thy shades, (where silver Kennet glides,
Fair Marlborough's turrets trembling in his tides):
To love's soft theme I tun'd the warbling lyre,
And borrow'd from thy eyes poetic fire.

In 1727, he published a volume of Poems on several Occasions, 8vo. inscribed to the Earl of Peterborough, the conqueror of Valencia; written, as he tells us, before he was nineteen.

He had already obtained the notice of Pope, who not only introduced him to the acquaintance of the wits of the time, but procured him the patronage of the Earl of Peterborough, Mrs. Nugent, and Edward Eliot, Esq. of Port Eliot (relations of Craggs), and the Earl of Chesterfield, as he himself gratefully acknowledges in the concluding lines of his Macarius.

My first, my latest bread, I owe to thee;
Thou, and thy friends, preserv'd my muse and me.
By proxy, from a gen'rous kindred spread,
Thy Craggs's bounty fell upon my head:
Thy Mordaunt's kindness did my youth engage,
And thy own Chesterfield protects my age.

With the elegant and amiable Fenton, he had the happiness of being closely connected in friendship, and held a very amicable correspondence with Parnassus, who was obliged to him for many kind offices of relief under his misfortunes.—“I have often,” says the biographer of Parnassus, “heard him acknowledge, with the greatest satisfaction, the happiness of the acquaintance he had cultivated with that sincere young gentleman, Mr. Walter Harte, of St. Mary-Hall, Oxon. The last letter he ever received was from this gentleman (being but two days before his death). He had wrote to him for his advice concerning a new version of “Ovid's Epistles;” and Mr. Harte, as he says himself, “at a moment's summons, dealt plainly, and communicated his sentiments.”

His letter to Parnassus on this occasion, is so curious and valuable, that it is impossible to avoid transcribing it.—“The little I can say in regard to Ovid will be of small service to your new version of his “Epistles.” I must own I have studied his manner much, and have often endeavoured to make a mixed sort of writing between him and Statius. But to enter into a long detail of criticism, would swell my letter too much; or, to speak more sincerely, I will never say a word after Dryden. Yet, methinks, I had better play the fool than be too ill-natured; for you press me hard to speak my thoughts impartially on the last translation. I should be glad to equivocate in this case, for of all things I hate detraction. You are sensible I do this very unwillingly, for the gentlemen are dead; and, may my own ill poetry never meet with any favour, if I take any pleasure in disturbing their ashes. To translate after them, is to do them no injury. To imitate an original, is every man's property, and he may assume it when he pleases. All we can do, is to alleviate their errors, and to avoid reflection. 'Tis ungenerous to upbraid a man for doing his best, either in life or writings.

“The epistles which I think to be capable of many amendments, are these following: “Phyllis to Demophoon,” by Poley and Lloyd, “Hypermenestra,” by Wright, “Ariadne to Theseus,” “Hermione to Orestes,” “Leander,” &c. by Tate, and “Cenone,” by Mrs. Behn (these are pretty good, but paraphrased), "Laodamia," "Paris to Helen," "Penelope," "Hypsipile," "Medea," "Phædra," by Otway, "Briseis," by Caryl (this has many fine lines), "Dejanira," "Acontius," and my own Cydippe. On the contrary, I need not tell you, that no man living can excel "Sappho to Phaon," by Mr. Pope; and, if I were to criticise on the "Epistles," I would draw my rules from his version. The same may be said of "Canace," "Helen to Paris," and "Dido to Æneas," by Dryden.—A reason may be given why these gentlemen succeeded no better. They left out many beauties, but seldom added or improved any. I shall just observe some general failings which run through them all.—Ovid's character was ease and softness; here they all lost him. Nothing can be more stiff and prosaic than the modern version. Ovid, methinks, is like some great man placed on an eminence,

Despicere unde potest illos, passimque videre,
Errare, utque viam palentes querere—

"In the next place, they have nothing pathological; or, if they had, the lameness of the verse would spoil it. 'Twere tedious to give you directions to copy, or rather to improve Ovid in this case; 'tis the very soul of all the "Epistles;" nor can a translator be supposed to be ignorant of so essential a beauty. "'Tis all in all in every part," as Suarez and the Schoolmen tell us. I think I have brought in this metaphysical notion very dextrously. In regard to the pathos above mentioned, I know not how to make you sensible of my own conceptions, for we conceive many things which cannot be defined. I never hear what Tully calls the distum ardens in poetry, but I tremble extremely, though at that instant I cannot give any exact reason why I am pleased. All I mean may be found in "Eloisa to Abelard," the "Faery Queene," and the most tender tragedies. But beware of any thing too subtle and abstruse in the notions of love and honour (a fault which Petrarch and Cowley mostly ran into); and, on the other hand, avoid too womanish a softness, such as we find in romances; for, let the French say what they will, a thing may be written too cavalierement. In regard to the mythological and historical part, you cannot be too short and plain: something like Sandys's translation of the "Metamorphoses." And, in the last place, I would advise you to follow no commentator whatsoever, in the first sketch of your verses; for, by adhering too scrupulously to the letter and context, the whole must of course be stiff, and the first error will grow worse and worse the more you strive to correct it. It puts me in mind of a fault in most ill poets, though I never saw the observation before; they make the former line of the couplet first, and, when they have taken the full force and extent of the thought into this one, 'tis impossible for the other to have either sense or sound. I have read a whole poem, of which every line was an anti-climax.

"Thus far I have ventured to give my opinion; and, if my letter should prove something of the longest, be pleased to take Cardinal du Perron's answer, who used to say on the same occasion, "he had not time to write a shorter." 'Twas begun and ended in one morning, without reading or thinking with any tolerable exactness; and, if you knew how ill I am, you would wonder I could say so much. Sickness excuses impertinence, as well as ill manners; so, without ceremony, adieu."

The same writer observes, that the productions of this unfortunate poet were mostly written, as well as his friend's, before the author was nineteen years of age. "And I doubt not," he adds, "but the Rev. Mr. Hildrop, master of Marlborough school, in Wiltshire, looks upon it as an honour to have had a Harte for his pupil, as Mr. Yates of Appleby expresses his generous pleasure at having educated a Pattison."

He took the degree of Master of Arts, January 20. 1730; and published, that year, An Essay on Satire, particularly the Dunciad, designed as a vindication of that admirable satire. He published also two sermons, one called, The Union and Harmony of Reason, Morality, and Revealed Religion, preached at St. Mary's, Oxford, February 27. 1786-7, which went through at least five editions: the other, a fast sermon, preached at the same place, January 9. 1739-40.

He was afterwards Vice-Principal of St. Mary-Hall, and a Tutor of great reputation.

His friends, Pope and Lyttleton, recommended him to Lord Chesterfield as a fit preceptor to his natural son, Philip Stanhope, Esq. with whom he travelled, from 1746 till 1750.

He is described by Lord Chesterfield, in his "Letters" to his son, published by Mrs. Stanhope, as "a man of consummate erudition," but as ill qualified to polish the manners of his pupil.

It appears that he was awkward in his person and address, had an unhappy impediment in his speech, and a total want of ear; yet he so well performed his office, that Lord Chesterfield rewarded him with a Canonry of Windsor, "procured with great difficulty," which probably arose from his college connections; as St. Mary-Hall, of which Dr. King was Principal, was at that time noted for Jacobitism.—"Mr. Harte," Lord Chesterfield writes his son, January 14. 1751, "goes this week to Cornwall to take possession of his living; he has been installed at Windsor; he will return hither in about a month, when your literary correspondence with him will be regularly carried on. Your mutual concern at parting was a good sign for both."

In 1759, he published his History of Gustavus Adolphus, in 2 vols. 4to. with a dedication to Lord Chesterfield.—"Next week," that nobleman writes his son, March 30. 1759, "Mr. Harte will send you his Gustavus Adolphus, in two quartos: it will contain many new particulars of the life of that hero, as he has had abundant and authentic materials, which have never yet appeared. It will, upon the whole, be a very curious and valuable history, though, between you and me, I could have wished that he had been more correct and elegant in his style. You will find it dedicated to one of your acquaintance, who was forced to prune the luxuriant praises bestowed upon him, and yet has left enough of all conscience to satisfy a reasonable man."

The success of the history was unequal to his hopes: and his health was sensibly affected by it.

"I had a dismal letter from Harte," Lord Chesterfield writes his son, December 6. 1761: "he tells me that he is at nurse with a sister in Berkshire; that he has got a confounded jaundice, besides twenty other distempers. The true cause of these complaints I take to be the same that so greatly disordered, and had nearly destroyed the most august house of Austria, about 130 years ago, I mean Gustavus Adolphus; who neither answered his expectations in point of profit nor reputation, and that merely by his own fault, in not writing it in the vulgar tongue; for, as to facts, I will maintain, that it is one of the best histories extant."

He now retired to Bath for the benefit of his health, where, excepting some few excursions to his sister, he spent the remainder of his life.

As he had marred his history by a strange affected style, "full of Latinisms, Gallicisms, Germanisms, and all isms but Anglicisms," he thought proper to publish an improved edition of it in 8vo. 1763.

"Harte," Lord Chesterfield writes his son, Nov. 27. 1762, "is going to publish a new edition of his Gustavus, in octavo; which, he tells me, he has altered; and which, I could tell him, he should translate into English, or it will not sell better than the former; for, while this world endures, style and manner will be regarded at least as much as matter."

In 1764, he published his Essays on Husbandry, in 8vo. written, as he tells us in the General Introduction, "in imitation of Cowley's essays on subjects of a like nature."

Of this pleasing and instructive work, Lord Chesterfield has given a very favourable account in his letter to his son, September 3. 1764: "I have received a book for you, and one for myself, from Mr. Harte. It is upon agriculture, and will surprise you, as I confess it did me. This work is not only in English, but good and elegant English; he has even scattered graces upon his subject; and, in prose, has come very near Virgil's Georgics in verse. I have written to him to congratulate his happy transformation. As soon as I can find an opportunity, I will send you your copy. You (though no Agricola) will read it with pleasure."

The success of his Essays produced no favourable change in the state of his health and spirits. He continued at Bath, dejected and dispirited, between real and imaginary distresses, till, in November 1766, he had a stroke of the palsy, which deprived him of the use of his right leg, affected his speech, and in some degree his head.

In 1767, he published his "great poetical work," which he had been long preparing, called The Amaranth, consisting of Fables, Tales, and Emblematic Visions, embellished with an engraved frontispiece, a vignette title page, and elegant head and tail pieces.

"Harte," Lord Chesterfield writes his son, December 18. 1763, "has a great poetical work to publish; he has shown me some parts of it. He had entitled it Emblems; but I persuaded him to alter that name, for two reasons; the first was, because they are not Emblems, but Fables; the second was, that if they had been emblems, Quarles had degraded and vilified that name to such a degree, that it is impossible to make use of it after him; so they are to be called Fables, though Moral Tales would, in my mind, be the proper name. If you ask me what I think of those I have seen, I must say that sunt plura bona, quædam mediocra, et quædam—"

In October 17. 1768, Lord Chesterfield writes his son, for the last time: "Poor Harte, who is here [Bath] still, is in a most miserable condition; he has entirely lost the use of his left side; and can hardly speak intelligibly. I was with him yesterday. He inquired after you with great affection, and was in the utmost concern when I showed him your letter."—His pupil, Mr. Stanhope, died November 16. 1768; and, in that melancholy condition, he lived till 1773, having survived him five years.

His Poems, published by himself, in 1727, 1730, and 1767, have not been reprinted. They are now, with some fugitive pieces dispersed up and down in the miscellanies, received, for the first time, into a collection of classical English poetry.

A copy of his Essay on Reason, published in folio, 1727, a very fine poem, which was much laboured, and went through Pope's hands, could not be procured for this collection.

The character of Harte seems to have been highly amiable and respectable. He was beloved, esteemed, and revered by his friends. The testimonies of Pope, Fenton, and Lyttleton, are unquestionable authorities in favour of his intellectual and moral endowments. Even Chesterfield concurs in the fullest commendation of his amiable worth and consummate erudition, though his fastidious delicacy unfitted him to balance the excellence of his moral qualities against his deficiency in the graces of personal behaviour.

As a poet, he does not seem to have hitherto obtained so much attention as he deserves. His poems afford indubitable proofs of the elegance and correctness of his taste, and the mildness and fervency of his piety. Pope is the model whom he professes to imitate, and it must be acknowledged, that he is often very successful in copying the cast of his diction and the peculiar structure of his versification. The servility of his imitation is most remarkable, in his earlier productions, particularly in his translations from Statius and Ovid, and in his Verses to Pope and To a Lady with Fenton's Miscellany, &c. In the concluding lines of the Verses to a Lady, &c. the language and the thought are evidently borrowed from Pope, with much skill and propriety.

Of his Miscellaneous Poems, the Essay on Painting is the longest and most elaborate. Considering the difficulty of the subject, it is executed, upon the whole, with much judgment and taste, and may be read with pleasure by the admirers of the sister arts of poetry and painting. The distinctness, and, as far as the present writer is competent to judge, the justness with which it marks the character of the different schools, and of the most celebrated masters, will be particularly acceptable. In his Essay on Satire, he has sometimes caught the spirit, and sometimes acquired the elegance and accuracy of Pope. Some lines are vigorously written, and several of the characters are sketched out with animation and precision; but the temper in which many parts of it are written cannot altogether be approved of. The translations from Statius and Ovid, are, in general, classical and elegant, and rendered with such fidelity, that they convey to the reader, not only the grandeur and spirit of the originals, but the florid epithets and injudicious prettinesses by which they are diminished and debased.

In his Divine Poems, there is a spirit of piety, which, as it seems to be perfectly sober and unaffected, is truly venerable. Nor is there a want of genius. Most of the Fables and Emblematical Visions are embellished with lively imagery, picturesque scenery, brilliant allusions, and other poetical ornaments. The versification is smooth in general, and the language is elegant. The sentiments are marked with the genuine stamp of good sense, rational philosophy, and an improved knowledge of human life. The lyric part of The Aseetic is beautifully descriptive; and the passages versified from the "Imitation of Christ" are sensible and nervous. The Vision of Death abounds in sublime sentiments, striking imagery, and poetical fiction, in a superior degree. His Eulogius is an elegant, interesting, and instructive historical fable. His Macarius contains an affectionate tribute to the memory of a pious and respectable parent, and pleasing memorials of his friends. The Epistle from Boetius to his Wife Rusticiana, abounds in sentiments of general use; they come near to the heart, and require nothing but application to render them successful.

From the general commendation bestowed on the compositions of Harte, particular criticism may make many deductions. His versification, it must be acknowledged, though generally flowing and harmonious, is frequently laboured, artificial, and monotonous; and his sentiments, particularly in his Divine Poems, are sometimes rendered obscure by allusions to circumstances which require to be explained at the bottom of the page. For the same reason, the frequent introduction of passages imitated from other writers is injudicious; but, when every deduction is made which criticism requires, the general poetical merit of his compositions, which are considerably above mediocrity, will be sufficient to vindicate his fame, and to preserve his memory.

THE WORKS OF HARTE.

TO THE RIGHT HONOURABLE

CHARLES EARL OF PETERBOROUGH AND MONMOUTH.

MY LORD,

I FANCY the public will be much surprised, when I say your Lordship was the first person who was pleased to take notice of me. How little I deserve so much partiality, I leave the world to judge. Yet thus much I can affirm; I only wish that these poems may live to posterity, to be a memorial of the gratitude rather than the genius

Of your Lordship's

most humble, most obliged,

and most dutiful servant,

W. HARTE.

ADVERTISEMENT.

It will be necessary to inform the reader, that the author was under nineteen when all these poems were written.

I ought here to say a word or two of my Essay on Painting. This performance is by no means correct in all its parts; I had neither health, leisure, nor abilities equal to my design. It was written at intervals, upon such remarks as casually occurred in my reading. Of course no exact connection must be expected: though I might allege, that Horace uses as little in his Art of Poetry. I had finished the whole before ever I saw Du Fresnoy; as will appear by comparison.

ARGUMENT.

A parallel between painting and poetry—Advice to a good painter; instanced by Titian—An universal notion of beauty—That we must not despair—A luxuriant fancy, or too much exactness often faulty—Decency still to be preserved—Repose and solitude—Nature to be imitated—In a fault whether to be corrected or not—The Je ne sçai quoi of beauty—Draperies—An encomium on painting—The episode of Mimicina—Sculpture—Innovations faulty.—Sometimes to be admired—Invention—Union of colours—Immoderate ornament—The Landscape—Design—The principal figure of a picture—Modesty in a painter—Harmony of colours—The surprise—Optics—The obscura camera described; its use in painting—Disposition of objects—Two equal lights to be avoided in the same picture—Truth to be observed—Traveling, its use—Another parallel between poetry and painting—Their distinct excellencies considered—Painting far more lasting and universal—Yet derived its light first from poetry—Its rise and progress through all ages—An account of the most celebrated painters, with their several characters—Conclusion, with an address to the Earl of Pembroke.

WHATEVER yet in poetry held true,
If duly weigh'd, holds just in painting too:
Alike to profit, and delight they tend,
The means may vary, but the same their end.
Alike from heav'n congenial first they came,
The same their labours, and their praise the same:
Alike by turns they touch the conscious heart,
And each on each reflects the lights of art.

You nobler youths who listen to my lays,
And scorn by vulgar arts to merit praise:
Look cautious round, your genius nicely know,
And mark how far its utmost stretch will go;
Pride, envy, hatred, labour to conceal,
And sullen prejudice, and party-zeal;
Approve, examine, and then last believe—
For friends mislead, and critics still deceive.

Who takes his censure, or his praise on trust,
Is kind, 'tis true, but never can be just.

But where's the man with gen'rous zeal inspir'd,
Dear in each age, in ev'ry art admir'd?

* Blest with a genius strong, but unconfin'd,
A sprightly wit, with sober judgment join'd,
A love of learning, and a patient mind;
A vig'rous fancy, such as youth requires,
And health, and ease, and undisturb'd desires.

Who spares no pains his own defects to know,
Who not forgives, but ev'n admires a foe;
By manners sway'd, which stealing on the heart,
Charm more through ease, and happiness, than art.
Such Titian was, by nature form'd to please,
Blest in his fortunes, born to live at ease:

Who felt the poet's, or the painter's fire,
Now dipp'd the pencil, and now tun'd the lyre:
Of gentlest manners in a court refin'd,
A friend to all, belov'd of all mankind;
The † muse's glory, as a monarch's care,
Dear to the gay, the witty, and the fair!

But ah! how long will nature ask to give
A soul like his, and bid a wonder live?
Rarely a Titian, or a Pope appears,
The forming glory of a thousand years!

A proper taste we all derive from heaven,
Wou'd all but bless, and manage what is giv'n.
Some secret impulse moves in ev'ry heart,
And nature's pleas'd with gentle strokes of art;
Most souls, 'tis true, this blessing faintly charms;
A distant flame, that rather shines, than warms:
Like rays, through wintry streams reflected, falls
Its dubious light, in glimm'ring intervals.

Like Maro first with trembling hand design
Some humble work, and study line by line:
A Roman urn, a grove encircled bow'r,
The blushing cherry, or the bending flow'r.

* Sit vir talis, qualis verè sapiens appellari possit, nec moribus modo perfectus, sed etiam scientiâ, & omni facultate dicendi, qualis fortasse adhuc nemo fuerit. Quintilian.

† Titian was created Count Palatine by Charles V. and most intimately acquainted with Ariosto, Arétine, &c.

Painful, and slow, to noble arts we rise,
And long long labours wait the glorious prize;
Yet by degrees your steadier hand shall give
A bolder grace, and bid each object live.
So in the depths of some sequester'd vale,
The weary peasant's heart begins to fail:
Slowly he mounts the huge high cliff with pain,
And prays in thought he might return again:
'Till opening all at once beneath his eyes,
The verdant trees, and glittering turrets rise: }
He springs, he triumphs, and like light'ning flies.
Ev'n Raphael's self from rude essays began,
And shadow'd with a coal his shapeless man.
Time was, when Pope for rhymes would knit his
brow,

And write as tasteless lines—as I do now.

'Tis hard a sprightly fancy to command,
And give a respite to the lab'ring hand;
Hard as our eager passions to restrain,
When priests, and self-denial plead in vain:
When pleasures tempt, and inclinations draw,
When vice is nature, and our will the law.
As vain we strive each trivial fault to hide,
That shows but little judgment, and more pride.
Like some nice prude, offensive to the sight,
* Exactness gives at best a cold delight;
Each painful stroke disgusts the lively mind;
For art is lost, when overmuch refin'd.
So nice reformers their own faith betray,
And school-divines distinguish sense away.
To err is mortal, do what'er we can,
Some faulty trifles will confess the man.
Dim spots suffuse the lamp that gilds the sky,
If nicely trac'd through Galilæo's eye.
Wise are they, who each mad whim repress,
And shun gross errors, by committing less.

Still let due decencies preserve your fame,
Nor must the pencil speak the master's shame.
Each nobler soul in every age was giv'n
To bless mankind, for arts descend from Heav'n.
Gods! shall we then their pious use profane,
T' oblige the young, the noble, or the vain!
† Whoever meditates some great design,
Where strength and nature dawn at ev'ry line;
Where art and fancy full perfection give,
And each bold figure glows, and seems to live:
Where lights and shades in sweet disunion play,
Rise by degrees, or by degrees decay;
Far let him shun the busy noise of life,
Untouch'd by cares, uncumber'd with a wife.
Bear him, ye muses! to sequester'd woods,
To bow'ry grottoes, and to silver floods!
Where peace and friendship hold their gentle
reign,

And love unarm'd sits smiling on the plain.
Where nature's beauties variously unite,
And in a landscape open on the sight.
Where contemplation lifts her silent eye,
And lost in vision travels o'er the sky.

* Odiosa cura est—Optima enim sunt minime accersita, & simplicibus ab ipsa veritate profectis similia. Quintil. Lib. 8. Cap. 3. in Proem.

† Aptissima sunt in hoc nemora, sylvaque; quod illa cæli libertas, locorumq; amœnitas sublimem animum, & beatorem spiritum parent. Quintilian,

Soft as his ease the whisp'ring zephyrs blow,
Calm as his thoughts the gentle waters flow:
Hush'd are his cares, extinct are Cupid's fires,
And restless hopes, and impotent desires.

* But Nature first must be your darling care;
Unerring Nature, without labour fair.
Art from this source derives her true designs,
And sober judgment cautiously refines.
No look, no posture must mishap'd appear:
Bold be the work, but boldly regular.
When mercy pleads, let softness melt the eyes;
When anger storms, the swelling muscles rise.
A soft emotion breathes in simple love,
The heart just seems to beat, the eye to move.
Gently, ah! gently, languor seems to die,
Now drops a tear, and now steals out a sigh.
Let awful Jove his lifted thunders wield;
Place azure Neptune in the watery field.
Round smiling Venus draw the faithless boy,
Surmise, vain hopes, and short-enduring joy.
But should you dress a nymph in monstrous ruff,
Or faintly nun profane with modish snuff:
Each fool will cry, O horribly amiss!
The painter's mad, mend that, and alter this.

From heav'n descending, beauteous Nature
came,

One clear perfection, one eternal flame,
Whose lovely lights on ev'ry object fall
By due degrees, yet still distinguish all.
Yet as the best of mortals are sometimes
Not quite exempt from folly or from crimes;
There are, who think that nature is not free
From some few symptoms of deformity.
Hence springs a doubt, if painters may be thought
To err, who copy nature in a fault,
Led by some servile rule, whose pow'r prevails
On imitation, when th' example fails.
Poets and painters, here employ your skill;
Be this the doctrine of your good and ill,
Enough to pose the critics of a nation,
Nice as the rules of Puritan-salvation.

† Yet if the seeds of art we nicely trace;
There dawns a heav'nly, all-inspiring grace,
No tongue expresses it, no rule contains;
(The glorious cause unseen) th' effect remains:
Fram'd in the brain, it flows with easy art,
Steals on the sense, and wins the yielding heart.
A pleasing vigour mixt with boldness charms,
And happiness completes what passion warms,
‡ Nor is it thought a trifle, to express
The various shapes, and foldings of the dress,
With graceful ease the pencil to command,
And copy nature with a hasty hand.
Through the clear robe the swelling muscles rise,
Or heaving breasts, that decently surprise;

As some coy virgin with dejected mien
Conceals her charms, yet hopes they may be seen.

* Be ev'ry person's proper habit known,
Peculiar to his age, or sex alone.
In flowing robes the monarch sweeps along,
Large are the foldings, natural, and strong:
Wide ample lights in spreading glories play,
And here contrasted, deeper shades decay.
The virgin-pow'rs who haunt the silver floods,
And hoary hills, and consecrated woods,
Soft strokes, and graceful negligence demand,
The nice reluctance of an easy hand;
Loose to the winds their airy garments fly
Like filmy dews, too tender for the eye.

But ere these charms are to perfection wrought,
Adapted manuals must be nicely sought.
Gay vivid colours must the draught inspire,
Now melt with sweetness, and now burn with fire.

A northern sky must aid the steady sight,
Else the shades alter with the transient light.
Methinks the loaded table stands display'd,
Each nicer vase "in mystic order laid.
Here ocean's mistress heaps around her shells
Beauteous, and recant from the sea-green cells;
The taper pencils here are rang'd apart,
There chalk, lead, vials, and loose schemes of art.
So when bold Churchill with a gen'ral's care,
Eyes his brave Britons crowding to the war;
Watchful, and silent move the duteous bands,
One look excites them, and one breath commands.

Hail happy Painting! to confirm thy sway,
Ocean and air their various tributes pay.
The purple † insect spreads her wings to thee,
Wafts o'er the breeze, or glitters on the tree.
Earth's winding veins unnumber'd treasures hold,
And the warm champion ripens into gold.
A clearer blue the lazuli bestows,
Here umber deepens, there vermilion glows.
For thee, her tender greens and flow'rets rise,
Whose colours change in ever-mingling dyes;
Ev'n those fair groves (for Eden first design'd)
Weep in soft fragrance through their balmy rind:
Transparent tears! that glitter as they run,
Warm'd with the blushes of the rising sun.

Here cease my song---a gentler theme inspires
Each tender thought, and wakes the lover's fires.
Once more your aid celestial muses bring;
Sacred the lays! nor to the deaf we sing.

† In ancient Greece there liv'd, unknown to fame,

A nymph, and Mimicina was her name.
Smit by a neighb'ring youth betimes she fell
Victim to love, and bade the world farewell.
Thoughtful and dull she pin'd her bloom away
In lonely groves, nor saw the cheerful day.

† The Cochineel.

† This story, with several others, is mentioned by most ancient writers. I have chosen it as the most poetical.

This might be borne---but lo! her lovely swain
Must part, ah, never to return again!
One mutual kiss must mutual passion sever,
One look divide 'em, and divide for ever!
See, now she lies abandon'd to despair,
And to rude winds unbinds her flowing hair:
Beauteous neglect! when melting to her woes,
A sylvan maid from her dark grotto rose:
(Long had she view'd the solitary fair,
Her bleeding bosom heav'd with equal care)
A heav'nly picture in her hand she bore,
She smil'd, she gave it, and was seen no more---
Pleas'd Mimicina, speechless with surprise,
Ey'd the fair form, and lightning of the eyes:
She knew---and sighing gave a tender kiss;
Her noble passion was content with this:
No more his absence, or her woes deplor'd,
And as the living, she the dead ador'd.

Thus Painting rose, to nourish soft desires,
And gentle hopes, and friendship's purer fires:
Thus still the lover must his nymph adore,
And sigh to charms, that ought to charm no more.
Thus when these eyes, with kind illusions blest,
Survey each grace Pathenia once possess'd:
Her winning sweetness, and attractive ease,
And gentle smiles that never fail'd to please;
Heav'n's! how my fancy kindles at the view,
And my fond heart relents, and bleeds anew!
Fair faithless virgin! with constraint unkind,
Misled by duty, and through custom blind:
Perhaps ev'n now, from pride and int'rest free,
Thou shar'st each pang of all I felt for thee;
Ah, no---my pray'rs, my tears, my vows resign,
Alas, 'tis now a crime to call me thine,
To act the tender, or the friendly part;
No---hate, forget me, tear me from thy heart.

Yet still thy smiles in breathing paint inspire,
Still thy kind glances set my soul on fire.
Thither each hour I lift my thoughtful eye,
Now drop a tear, now softly breathe a sigh;
Sacred 'till death my gentlest vows shall be,
And the last gasp of life be breath'd for thee!

You too, O Sculpture, shall exalt my lays,
Pictura's sister-candidate for praise!
Soft Raphael's air divine, * Antonio shows;
And all Le Brun in mimic * Picart glows.
Hither ye nations, now direct your eyes,
Rise crown'd with lustre, gentle Albion rise!
Now thy soft Hollar, now thy Smith appears,
A faultless pattern to succeeding years;
There † sacred domes in length'ning Vista's charm,

And British beauties here for ever warm.

Most painters of less judgment, than caprice,
Are like old maidens in amously nice:
It matters nought if rules be false or true,
All should be modish, whimsical and new;
Fond of each change, the present still they praise,
So women love---and actors purchase plays.
As if self-love, or popular offence,
Receiv'd a sanction to mislead our sense;

 Two engravers, famous for their prints copied from Raphael and Le Brun.

† Alluding to Hollar's etchings in the Monasticon.

Or party-notions, vapours, faith, and zeal
Were all, at proper times, infallible.
True wit, and true religion are but one,
Though some pervert 'em, and ev'n most have none.

Who thinks what others never thought before,
Acts but just that his sons will act no more.
Yet on a time, when vig'rous thoughts demand,
Indulge a warmth, and prompt the daring hand:
On purpose deviate from the laws of art,
And boldly dare to captivate the heart;
Breasts warm'd to rapture shall applaud your
fire,

May disapprove you, but shall still admire.
The Grecian artist, at one dash, supply'd
What patient touches and slow art deny'd.
So when pale Florio in the gloomy grove
Sits sadly musing on the plagues of love,
When hopes and fears distract his tim'rous mind,
And fancy only makes the nymph unkind:
Desp'rate at last he rushes from the shade,
By force and warm address to win the maid:
His brisk attack the melting nymph receives
With equal warmth, he presses, she forgives;
One moment crowns whole tedious years of pain,
And endless griefs, and health consum'd in vain.

Of ev'ry beauty that conspires to charm
Man's nicer judgment, and his genius warm,
To just invention be the glory giv'n,
A particle of light deriv'd from heav'n.
Unnumber'd rules t' improve the gift are shown
By ev'ry critic, to procure it, none.

Some colours often to the rest impart
New graces, more through happiness, than art.
This nicely study'd, will your fame advance,
The greatest beauties seldom come by chance.

Some gaze at ornament alone, and then
So value paint, as women value men.
It matters nought to talk of truth, or grace,
Religion, genius, customs, time, and place.
So judge the vain, and young; nor envy we:
They cannot think indeed—but they may see.
Excessive beauty, like a flash of light,
Seems more to weaken, than to please the sight.
In one gay thought luxuriant Ovid writ,
And Voiture tires us, but with too much wit.

Some all their value for Grotesque express,
Beauty they prize, but beauty in excess:
Where each gay figure seems to glare apart,
Without due grace, proportion, shades, or art.
(The sad remains of Goths in ancient times,
And rev'rend dullness, and religious rhymes)
So youthful poets ring their music round
On one eternal harmony of sound.

"The lines are gay," and whoso'er pretends
To search for more, mistakes the writer's ends.

Colours, like words, with equal care are sought,
These please the sight, and those express the
thought,

But most of all, the landscape seems to please
With calm repose, and rural images.
See, in due lights th' obedient objects stand,
As happy ease exalts the master's hand.
See, absent rocks hang trembling in the sky,
See, distant mountains vanish from the eye;
A darker verdure stains the dusky woods:
Floats the green shadow in the silver floods;

Fair visionary worlds surprise the view,
And fancy forms the golden age a-new.

True just designs will merit honour still;
Who begins well, can scarcely finish ill.
Unerring truth must guide your hand aright,
Art without this is violence to fight.—

The first due postures of each figure trace
In swelling out-lines with an easy grace.
But the prime person mostly will demand
Th' unweary'd touches of thy patient hand:
There thought, and boldness, strength, and art
conspire,

The critic's judgment, and the painter's fire;
It lives, it moves, it swells to meet the eye:
Behind the mingling groups in softer shadows die.

Never with self-design your merits raise,
Nor let your tongue be echo to your praise.
To wiser heads commit such points as these,
A modest blush will tell how much they please.

In days of yore, a prating lad, they say,
Met glorious Reubens journeying on the way:
Sneering, and arch, he shakes his empty head,
(For half-learn'd boys will talk a Solon dead)
Your servant, good Sir Paul, why, what, the devil,
The world to you is more than fairly civil;
No life, no gusto in your pieces shine,
Without decorum, as without design---

Sedate to this the heav'n-born artist smil'd,
"Nor thine nor mine to speak our praise, my child!"

"Each shall expose his best to curious eyes,
"And let th' impartial world adjust the prize.

Let the soft colours sweeten and unite
To one just form, as all were shade, or light.
Nothing so frequent charms th' admiring eyes
As well-tim'd fancy, and a sweet surprise.

* So when the Grecian labour'd to disclose
His nicest art, a mimic lark arose:
The fellow-birds in circles round it play'd,
Knew their own kind, and warbled to a shade.
So Vandervart in later times excell'd,
And nature liv'd in what our eyes beheld.
† He too can oft, (in optics deeply read)
A noon-day darkness o'er his chamber spread.
The transient objects sudden as they pass
O'er the small convex of the visual glass,
Transferr'd from thence by magic's powerful call,
Shine in quick glories on the gloomy wall;
Groves, mountains, rivers, men surprise the sight,
Trembles the dancing world, and swims the wavy light.

† Each varying figure in due place dispose,
These boldly heighten, touch but faintly those.
Contiguous objects place with judgment nigh,
Each due proportion swelling on the eye.

* See Pliny's Natural History, lib. 35. cap. 10.

† This practice is of no late invention. Baptista Porta, who flourished about the year 1500, gives an ingenious account of it in his Natural Magic, lib. 17. How useful this may be to young painters, is not my province to determine.

† Singula quæque locum teneant sortita decer.

Hoc amat obscurum, vult hoc sub luce videri.

HORAT.

Rempter views insensibly decay,
And lights, and shadows sweetly drop away.
In bluish white the farthest mounts arise,
Steal from the eye, and melt into the skies.
Hence sacred domes in length'ning isles extend,
Round columns swell, and rising arches bend :
Obliquer views in side-long Vista's glance,
And bending groves in fancy seem to dance.

Two equal lights descending from the sky,
O'erpow'r each other, and confuse the eye.

The greatest pleasures tire the most, and such
Still end in vices if enjoy'd too much.
Though painters often to the shades retire,
Yet too long ease but serves to quench the fire.
Wing'd with new praise, methinks they boldly fly
O'er airy Alps, and seem to touch the sky.
Still true to fame, here well-wrought busts decay,
High turrets nod, and arches sink away.
Ev'n the bare walls, whose breathing figures glow'd

With each warm stroke that living art bestow'd,
Or slow decay, or hostile time invades,
And all in silence the fair fresco fades.
Each image yet in fancy'd thoughts we view,
And strong idea forms the scene a-new :
Delusive, she, Paulo's free stroke supplies,
Revives the face, and points th' enlight'ning
eyes.

'Tis thought each science, but in part, can boast
A length of toils for human life at most :
(So vast is art !) if this remark prove true,
'Tis dang'rous sure to think at once of two,
And hard to judge if greater praise there be
To please in painting, or in poetry ;
Yet painting lives less injur'd, or confin'd,
True to th' idea of the master's mind :
In ev'ry nation are her beauties known,
In ev'ry age the language is her own :
Nor time, nor change diminish from her fame ;
Her charms are universal, and the same.
O, could such blessings wait the poet's lays,
New beauties still, and still eternal praise !
Ev'n though the muses ev'ry strain inspire,
Exalt his voice, and animate his lyre :
Ev'n though their art each image shou'd combine
In one clear light, one harmony divine ;
Yet ah, how soon the casual bliss decays,
How great the pains, how transient is the praise !
Language, frail flow'r, is in a moment lost,
(That only product human wit can boast)
Now gay in youth, its early honours rise,
Now hated, curst, it fades away, and dies.

Yet verse first rose to soften human kind,
To mend their manners, and exalt their mind.
See, savage beasts stand list'ning to the lay,
And men more furious, and more wild than they ;
Ev'n shapeless trees a second birth receive,
Rocks move to form, and statues seem to live.
Immortal Homer felt the sacred rage,
And pious Orpheus taught a barb'rous age ;
Succeeding painters thence deriv'd their light,
And durst no more than those vouchsaf'd to write.

At last t' adorn the gentler arts, appears
Illustrious Xeuxis from a length of years.
Parrhasius' hand with soft'ning strokes express
The nervous motions, and the folded vest :

Pregnant of life his rounded figures rise,
With strong relieve swelling on the eyes.
Evenor bold, with fair Apelles came,
And happy Nicias crown'd with deathless fame,
At length from Greece, of impious arms afraid,
Painting withdrew, and sought th' Italian shade ;
What time each science met its due regard,
And patrons took a pleasure to reward.
But ah, how soon must glorious times decay,
One transient joy, just known, and snatch'd away !
By the same foes, which painting shunn'd before,
Ev'n here she bleeds, and arts expire once more.
Ease, lust, and pleasures shake a feeble state,
Gothic invasions, and domestic hate ;
Time's slow decays, what these ev'n spare, con-
sume,

And Rome lies bury'd in the depths of Rome !

Long slumber'd Painting in a stupid trance
Of heavy zeal, and Monkish ignorance :
(When faith itself for mere dispute was giv'n, Subtle was wise, and wranglers went to heav'n.)
Till glorious * Cimabue restor'd her crown,
And dipp'd the pencil, studious of renown.
Masaccio taught the finish'd piece to live,
And added ev'ry grace of perspective.
Exact correctnes^s Titian's hand bestow'd,
And Vinci's stroke with living labour glow'd.
Next Julio rose, who ev'ry language knew,
Liv'd o'er each age, and look'd all nature through.

In happy Paulo strength and art conspire,
The graces please us, and the muses fire.

Each nobler secret others boast alone,
By curious toil Caracci made his own :
Raphael's nice judgment, Angelo's design,
Correggio's warmth, and Guido's pleasing line.
Thrice glorious times, when ev'ry science charms,
When rapture lifts us, and religion warms !
Vocal to heav'n the swelling organs blow,
A shriller consort aids the notes below ;
Above, around the pictur'd saints appear,
And list'ning seraphs smile and bend to hear.

Thence Painting, by some happy genius led,
O'er the cold north in slow approaches spread.
Ev'n Britain's isle that blush'd with hostile gore,
Receiv'd her laws, unknown to yield before ;
Relenting now, her savage heroes stand,
And melt at ev'ry stroke from Reuben's hand.
Still in his right the graceful Jervas sways,
Sacred to beauty, and the fair one's praise,
Whose breathing paint another life supplies,
And calls new wonders forth from Mordaunt's eyes,
And Thornhill, gen'rous as his art, design'd
At once to profit and to please mankind.
Thy dome, O Paul's, which heav'nly views adorn,

Shall guide the hands of painters yet unborn ;
Each melting stroke shall foreign eyes engage,
And shine unrivall'd through a future age.

Hail, happy artists ! in eternal lays
The kindred muses shall record your praise ;
Whose heav'nly aid inspir'd you first to rise,
And fix'd your fame immortal in the skies ;

* Giovanni Cimabue, born at Florence in the year 1240 ; he was the first person who revived painting after its unfortunate extirpation.

There sure to last, till nature's self expires,
Increasing still, and crown'd with clearer
fires:

High-rais'd above the blasts of public breath,
The voice of hatred, and the rage of death.

Ah, thus for ever may my numbers shine,
Bold as your thoughts, but easy as your line!
Then might the muse to distant ages live,
Contract new beauty, and new praise receive:
Fresh strength, and light ev'n time itself bestow,
Softens each line, and bid the thought to glow;
(Fame's second life) whose lasting glory tears
Nor change, nor envy, nor devouring years.

Then should these strains to Pembroke's hand be born—

Whom native graces, gentle arts adorn,
Honour unshaken, piety resign'd,
A love of learning, and a gen'rous mind.

Yet, if by chance, enamour'd of his praise,
Some nobler bard shall rise in future days,
(When from his Wilton walls the strokes decay,
And all art's fair creation dies away:
Or solid statues, faithless to their trust,
In silence sink, to mix with vulgar dust;)—
Ages to come shall Pembroke's fame adore,
Dear to the muse, till Homer be no more.

AN ESSAY ON SATIRE;

PARTICULARLY ON THE DUNCIAD.

ARGUMENT.

I. THE origin and use of Satire. The excellency of Epic Satire above others, as adding example to precept, and animating by fable and sensible images. Epic Satire compared with Epic Poem, and wherein they differ: Of their extent, action, unities, episodes, and the nature of their morals. Of parody; of the style, figures, and wit proper to this sort of poem, and the superior talents requisite to excel in it.

II. The characters of the several authors of Satire. 1. The ancients; Homer, Simonides, Archilochus, Aristophanes, Menippus, Ennius, Lucilius, Varro, Horace, Persius, Petronius, Juvenal, Lucian, the Emperor Julian. 2. The moderns; Tassone, Coccaius, Rabelais, Regnier, Boileau, Dryden, Garth, Pope.

III. From the practice of all the best writers and men in every age and nation, the moral justice of Satire in general, and of this sort in particular is vindicated. The necessity of it shown in this age more especially, and why bad writers are at present the most proper objects of Satire. The true causes of bad writers. Characters of several sorts of them now abounding; envious critics, furious pedants, secret libellers, obscene poetesses, advocates for corruption, scoffers at religion, writers for deism, deistical and arrian-clergymen.

Application of the whole discourse to the Dunciad; concluding with an address to the author of it.

T' exalt the soul, or make the heart sincere,
To arm our lives with honesty severe,
To shake the wretch beyond the reach of law,
Deter the young, and touch the bold with awe,
To raise the fall'n, to hear the sufferer's cries,
And sanctify the virtues of the wise,
Old Satire rose from probity of mind,
The noblest ethics to reform mankind.

As Cynthia's orb excels the gems of night:
So Epic Satire shines distinctly bright.
Here genius lives, and strength in every part,
And lights and shades, and fancy fix'd by art,

A second beauty in its nature lies,
It gives not things, but beings to our eyes,
Life, substance, spirit animate the whole;
Fiction and fable are the sense and soul.
The common dulness of mankind, array'd
In pomp, here lives and breathes, a wond'rous maid:

The poet decks her with each unknown grace,
Clears her dull brain, and brightens her dark face:
See! Father Chaos o'er his first-born nods,
And Mother Night, in majesty of gods!
See Querno's throne, by hands pontific rise,
And a fool's Pandæmonium strike our eyes!
Ey'n what on C—l the public bounteous pours,
Is sublimated here to golden show'rs.

A Dunciad or a Lutrin is complete,
And one in action; ludicrously great.
Each wheel rolls round in due degrees of force;
E'en episodes are needful, or of course:
Of course, when things are virtually begun
E'er the first ends, the Father and the Son:
Or else so needful, and exactly grac'd,
That nothing is ill-suited, or ill-plac'd.

True epic's a vast world, and this a small;
One has its proper beauties, and one all.
Like Cynthia, one in thirty days appears,
Like Saturn one, rolls round in thirty years.
There opens a wide tract, a length of floods,
A height of mountains, and a waste of woods:
Here but one spot; nor leaf, nor green depart
From rules; e'en nature seems the child of art.
As unities in epic works appear,
So must they shine in full distinction here.
Ev'n the warm Iliad shoves with slower pow'rs:
That forty days demands, this forty hours.

Each other Satire humbler arts has known,
Content with meaner beauties, though its own:
Enough for that, if rugged in its course
The verse but rolls with vehemence and force;
Or nicely pointed in th' Horatian way
Wounds keen, like Syrens mischievously gay.
Here, all has wit, yet must that wit be strong,
Beyond the turns of epigram or song.
The thought must rise exactly from the vice,
Sudden, yet finish'd, clear, and yet concise,

One harmony must first with last unite ;
As all true paintings have their place and light.
Transitions must be quick, and yet design'd,
Not made to fill, but just retain the mind :
And similes, like meteors of the night,
Just give one flash of momentary light.

As thinking makes the soul, low things express
In high-raised terms, define a Dunciad best.
Books and the man demands as much, or more,
Than he who wander'd to the Latian shore :
For here (eternal grief to Duns's soul,
And B——'s thin ghost!) the part contains the
whole :

Since in mock-epic none succeeds, but he
Who tastes the whole of epic poetry.

The moral must be clear and understood ;
But finer still, if negatively good :
Blaspheming Capaneus obliquely shows
T'adore those gods Æneas fears and knows.
A fool's the hero ; but the poet's end
Is, to be candid, modest, and a friend.

Let classic learning sanctify each part,
Not only show your reading, but your art.

The charms of parody, like those of wit,
If well contrasted, never fail to hit ;
One half in light, and one in darkness dress'd,
(For contraries oppos'd still shine the best.)
When a cold page half-breaks the writer's heart,
By this it warms, and brightens into art.
When rhet'ric glitters with too pompous pride,
By this, like Circe, 'tis undeify'd.
So Berecynthia, while her offspring vie
In homage to the mother of the sky, (Deck'd in rich robes, of trees, and plants, and flow'rs,

And crown'd illustrious with an hundred tow'rs)
O'er all Parnassus casts her eyes at once,
And sees an hundred sons—and each a Dunce.

The language next : from hence new pleasure
springs ;

For styles are dignify'd, as well as things.
Though sense subsists, distinct from phrase or sound,
Yet gravity conveys a surer wound.
The chymic secret which your pains would find,
Breaks out, unsought for, in Cervantes' mind ;
And Quixot's wildness, like that king's of old,
Turns all he touches into pomp and gold.
Yet in this pomp discretion must be had ;
Tho' grave, not stiff ; tho' whimsical, not mad :
In works like these, if sustian might appear,
Mock-epics, Blackmore, would not cost thee dear.

We grant that Butler ravishes the heart,
As Shakspeare soar'd beyond the reach of art ;
(For nature form'd those poets without rules,
To fill the world with imitating fools.)
What burlesque could, was by that genius done ;
Yet faults it has, impossible to shun :
Th' unchanging strain for want of grandeur cloy,
And gives too oft the horse-laugh mirth of boys :
The short-legg'd verse, and double-gingling sound,
So quick surprise us, that our heads run round :
Yet in this work peculiar life presides,
And wit, for all the world to glean besides.

Here pause, my muse, too daring and too young !
Nor rashly aim at precepts yet unsung.
Can man the master of the Dunciad teach ?
And these new bays what other hopes to reach ?

'Twere better judg'd, to study and explain
Each ancient grace he copies not in vain ;
To trace thee, Satire, to thy utmost spring,
Thy form, thy changes, and thy authors sing.

All nations with this liberty dispense,
And bid us shock the man that shocks good sense.

Great Homer first the mimic sketch design'd ;
What grasp'd not Homer's comprehensive mind ?
By him who virtue prais'd, was folly curst,
And who Achilles sung, drew * Dunce the First.

Next him Simonides, with lighter air,
In beasts, and apes, and vermin, paints the fair :
The good Scriblerus in like forms displays
The reptile rhymesters of these later days.

More fierce, Archilochus ! thy vengeful flame ;
Fools read and dy'd : for blockheads then had shame.

The † comic-satirist attack'd his age,
And found low arts, and pride, among the sage :
See learned Athens stand attentive by,
And Stoics learn their foibles from the eye.

‡ Latium's fifth Homer held the Greeks in view ;
Solid, though rough, yet incorrect as new.

Lucilius, warm'd with more than mortal flame,
Rose next §, and held a torch to ev'ry shame.

See stern Menippus, cynical, unclean ;
And Grecian Cento's, mannerly obscene.

Add the last efforts of Pacuvius' rage,
|| And the chaste decency of Varro's page.

See Horace next, in each reflection nice,
Learn'd, but not vain, the foe of fools, not vice.

Each page instructs, each sentiment prevails,
All shines alike ; he rallies, but ne'er rails :

With courtly ease conceals a master's art,
And least expected steals upon the heart.

Yet ¶ Cassius felt the fury of his rage,
(Cassius, the We——d of a former age)

And sad Alpinus, ignorantly read,
Who murder'd Memnon, though for ages dead.

Then Persius came, whose line, though roughly wrought,

His sense o'erpaid the stricture of his thought.
Here in clear light the stoic-doctrine shines,
Truth all subdued, or patience all resigns.

A mind supreme ! impartial, yet severe :
Pure in each act, in each recess sincere !

Yet rich ill poets urg'd the stoic's frown,
And bade him strike at dulness and a crown **.

The vice and luxury Petronius drew,
In Nero meet : th' imperial point of view :

The Roman Wilmot, that could vice chastise,
Pleas'd the mad king he serv'd to satirize.

The †† next in Satire felt a nobler rage,
What honest heart could bear Domitian's age ?

See his strong sense and numbers masculine !
His soul is kindled, and he kindles mine :

* Margites. † Aristophanes.

‡ Ennius.

§ — clarumq. facem præferre pudori,
Juv. S. 1.

|| See Varro's character in Cicero's Academica.

¶ Alludes to this couplet in his second Satire,
Compositum jus fasq. animi sanctiq. recessus,
Mentis, et incolam generoso pectus honesto.

 See his first Satire of Nero's Verses.

†† Juvenal.

Scornful of vice, and fearless of offence,
He flows a torrent of impetuous sense.

Lo! savage tyrants who blasphem'd their God
Turn suppliants now, and gaze at * Julian's rod.

Lucian, severe, but in a gay disguise,
Attacks old faith, or sports in learned † lies;
Sets heroes and philosophers at odds;
And scourges mortals, and dethrones the gods.

Then all was night—But Satire rose once more
Where Medici and Leo arts restore.

Tassoni shone fantastic, but sublime:

And he, who form'd the Macaronic-rhyme:

Then westward too by slow degrees confest,
Where boundless Rabelais made the world his jest;
Marot had nature, Regnier force and flame,
But swallow'd all in Boileau's matchless fame!
Extensive soul! who rang'd all learning o'er,
Present and past—and yet found room for more.
Full of new sense, exact in every page,
Unbounded, and yet sober in thy rage.

Strange fate! Thy solid sterling of two lines,
Drawn to our Tinsel, through whole pages shines! ‡

In Albion then, with equal lustre bright,
Great Dryden rose, and steer'd by nature's light.
Two glimmering orbs he just observ'd from far,
The ocean wide, and dubious either star,
Donne teem'd with wit, but all was maim'd and bruise'd,

The periods endless, and the sense confus'd:
Oldham rush'd on, impetuous, and sublime,
But lame in language, harmony, and rhyme.
These (with new graces) vigorous nature join'd
In one, and center'd 'em in Dryden's mind.
How full thy verse? Thy meaning how severe?
How dark thy theme? yet made exactly clear.
Not mortal is thy accent, nor thy rage,
Yet mercy softens, or contracts each page.
Dread bard! instruct us to revere thy rules,
And hate like thee, all rebels, and all fools.

His spirit ceas'd not (in strict truth) to be;
For dying Dryden breath'd, O Garth! on thee,
Bade thee to keep alive his genuine rage,
Half-sunk in want, oppression and old age;
Then, when thy § pious hands repos'd his head,
When vain young lords and ev'n the flamen fled.
For well thou knew'st his merit and his art,
His upright mind, clear head, and friendly heart.
Ev'n Pope himself (who sees no virtue bleed
But bears th' affliction) envies thee the deed.

O Pope! instructor of my studious days,
Who fix'd my steps in virtue's early ways:
On whom our labours, and our hopes depend,
Thou more than patron, and ev'n more than
Above all flattery, all thirst of gain, [friend!
And mortal but in sickness, and in pain!
Thou taught'st old Satire nobler fruits to bear,
And check'd her licence with a moral care:
Thou gav'st the thought new beauties not its own,
And touch'd the verse with graces yet unknown.
Each lawless branch thy level eye survey'd,
And still corrected nature as she stray'd:

* The Cæsars of the Emperor Julian.

§ Dr. Garth took care of Mr. Dryden's funeral, which some noblemen, who undertook it, had neglected.

Warm'd Boileau's sense with Britain's genuine fire,
And added softness to Tassoni's lyre.

Yet mark the hideous nonsense of the age,
And thou thyself the subject of its rage.

So in old times, round godlike Scæva ran
Rome's dastard sons, a million, and a man.

Th' exalted merits of the wise and good
Are seen, far off, and rarely understood.
The world's a father to a Dunce unknown,
And much he thrives, for, Dullness! he's thy own.
No hackney brethren e'er condemn him twice;
He fears no enemies, but dust and mice.

If Pope but writes, the devil Legion raves,
And meagre critics mutter in their caves:
(Such critics of necessity consume
All wit, as hangmen ravish'd maids at Rome.)
Names he a scribler? all the world's in arms,
Augusta, Granta, Rhedecyna swarms:
The guilty reader fancies what he fears,
And every Midas trembles for his ears.

See all such malice, obloquy, and spite
Expire ere morn, the mushroom of a night!
Transient as vapours glimm'ring through the glades,
Half-form'd and idle, as the dreams of maids,
Vain as the sick man's vow, or young man's sigh,
Third-nights of bards, or H——'s sophistry.

These ever hate the poet's sacred line:
These hate whatever is glorious, or divine.
From one eternal fountain beauty springs,
The energy of wit, and truth of things, [tend,
That source is God: from him they downwards
Flow round—yet in their native centre end.
Hence rules, and truth, and order, Dunces strike;
Of arts, and virtues, enemies alike.

Some urge, that poets of supreme renown
Judge ill to scourge the refuse of the town.
Howe'er their casuists hope to turn the scale,
These men must smart, or scandal will prevail.
By these the weaker sex still suffer most:
And such are prais'd who rose at honour's cost:
The learn'd they wound, the virtuous, and the fair,
No fault they cancel, no reproach they spare:
The random shaft, impetuous in the dark,
Sings on unseen, and quivers in the mark.
'Tis justice, and not anger, makes us write,
Such sons of darkness must be drag'd to light:
Long-suff'ring nature must not always hold;
In virtue's cause 'tis gen'rous to be bold.
To scourge the bad, th' unwary to reclaim,
And make light flash upon the face of shame.

*Others have urg'd (but weigh it, and you'll find
'Tis light as feathers blown before the wind)
That poverty, the curse of providence,
Atones for a dull writer's want of sense:
Alas! his dullness 'twas that made him poor;
Not vice versa: We infer no more.
Of vice and folly poverty's the curse,
Heaven may be rigid, but the man was worse,
By good-made bad, by favours more disgrac'd,
So dire th' effects of ignorance misplac'd!
Of idle youth, unwatch'd by parents eyes!
Of zeal for pence, and dedication lies!
Of conscience modell'd by a great man's looks!
And arguings in religion—from no books!

No light the darkness of that mind invades,
Where Chaos rules, enshrin'd in genuine shades;
Where, in the dungeon of the soul enclos'd,
True Dullness nods, reclining and repos'd.

Sense, grace, or harmony, ne'er enter there,
Nor human faith, nor piety sincere;
A midnight of the spirits, foul, and head,
(Suspended all) as thought itself lay dead.
Yet oft a mimic gleam of transient light
Breaks through this gloom, and then they think they write;

From streets to streets th' unnumber'd pamphlets
* Then tremble Warner, Brown, and Billingsly.

O thou most gentle deity appear,
Thou who still hear'st, and yet art prone to hear;
Whose eye ne'er closes, and whose brains ne'er rest,
(Thy own dear Dullness bawling at thy breast)
Attend, O patience, on thy arm reclin'd,
And see wit's endless enemies behind!

And ye, our muses, with a hundred tongues,
And thou, O Henley! blest with brazen lungs;
Fanatic Withers! fam'd for rhimes and sighs,
And Jacob Behmen! most obscurely wise;
From darkness palpable, on dusky wings
Ascend! and shroud him who your offspring sings.

The first with Egypt's darkness in his head
Thinks wit the devil, and curses books unread.
For twice ten winters has he blunder'd on,
Through heavy comments, yet ne'er lost nor won:
Much may be done in twenty winters more,
And let him then learn English at threescore.
No sacred Maro glitters on his shelf,
He wants the mighty Stagyrice himself.

See vast † Coimbria's comments pil'd on high,

Yet worse is he, who in one language read,

Talks flights to grooms, and makes lewd songs at pray'rs.

His pride, a pun: a guinea his reward,
His critic, G-ld-n, Jemmy M-re his bard.

What artful hand the wretch's form can hit,
Begot by Satan on a M——ly's wit:
In parties furious at the great man's nod,
And hating none for nothing, but his God:
Foe to the learn'd, the virtuous, and the sage,
A pimp in youth, an atheist in old age:
Now plung'd in bawdry and substantial lies,
Now dabbling in ungodly theories;
But so, as swallows skim the pleasing flood,
Grows giddy, but ne'er drinks to do him good:
Alike resolv'd to flatter, or to cheat,
Nay worship onions, if they cry, come eat:
A foe to faith, in revelation blind,
And impious much, as Dunces are by kind.

Next see the master-piece of flatt'ry rise,
Th' annointed son of Dullness and of Lies.

¶ Whose softest whisper fills a patron's ear,
Who smiles unpleas'd, and mourns without a tear,

* For well he knows the vices of the town,
The schemes of state, and int'rest of the gown;
Immoral afternoons, indecent nights,
Enflaming wines, and second appetites.

But most the theatres with Dullness groan,
Embrio's half-form'd, a progeny unknown:
Fine things for nothing, transports out of season,
Effects un-caus'd, and murders without reason.
Here worlds run round, and years are taught to
Each scene an elegy, each act a play †. [stay,
Can the same pow'r such various passions move?
Rejoice or weep, 'tis every thing for love.

The self-same cause produces heav'n and hell:
Things contrary as buckets in a well;

One up, one down, one empty, and one full:
Half high, half low, half witty, and half dull.

So on the borders of an ancient wood,
Or where some poplar trembles o'er the flood,
Arachne travels on her filmy thread,
Now high, now low, or on her feet or head.

Yet these love verse, as ‡ croaking comforts frogs,
And mire and ordure are the heaven of hogs.

Or passive matter immaterials see,

As these should write by reason, rhyme, and rule,
Or he turn wit, whom nature doom'd a fool.

If Dryden err'd, 'twas human frailty once,
But blundering is the essence of a Dunce.

Some write for glory, but the phantom fades;
Some write as party, or as spleen invades;

A third, because his father was well read,
And murd'rer-like, calls blushes from the dead.

Yet all for morals and for arts contend——
They want 'em both, who never prais'd a friend,

More ill, than dull; for pure stupidity
Was ne'er a crime in honest Banks, or me.

See next a crowd in damasks, silks, and crapes,
Equivocal in drefs, half-belles, half-trapes:

A length of night-gown rich Phantasia trails,
Olinda wears one shift, and pares no nails:

Some in C——l's cabinet each act display,
When nature in a transport dies away:

Some more refin'd transcribe their opera-loves
On iv'ry tablets, or in clean white gloves:

Some of Platonic, some of carnal taste,
Hoop'd, or un-hoop'd, ungarter'd, or unlac'd.

Thus thick in air the wing'd creation play,
When vernal Phæbus rouls the light away,

A motley race, half insects and half fowls,
Loose-tail'd and dirty, May-flies, bats, and owls.

Gods, that this native nonsense was our worst!
With crimes more deep, O Albion! art thou curst.

No judgment open prophanation fears,
For who dreads God, that can preserve his ears?

ACONTIUS TO CYDIPPE. FROM OVID.

ARGUMENT.

In a religious assembly at the temple of Diana in Delos, Acontius was much enamour'd with Cydippe, a lady of remarkable wit and beauty. Besides this, her fortune and family were much above his own : which made him solicitous how to discover his passion in a successful manner. At last he procured a very beautiful apple, upon which he wrote a distic to this purpose, " I swear by chaste Diana I will for ever be thy " wife." So soon as he had written it, he threw the apple directly at the feet of Cydippe, who imagining nothing of the deceit, took it up, and having read the inscription, found herself obliged by a solemn oath to marry Acontius. For in those times all oaths which were made in the temple of Diana, were esteemed inviolable. Some time afterwards, her father, who knew nothing of what had happen'd espoused her to another lover. The marriage was just upon the point of celebration, when Cydippe was seized with a violent fever. Acontius writes to her, he reminds her of a former solemn obligation, and artfully insinuates that her distemper is inflicted as a just punishment from Diana.

ONCE more, Cydippe all thy fears remove,
'Tis now too late to dread a cheat in love.
Those rosy lips in accents half divine,
Breath'd the soft promise in the Delian shrine;

Dear awful oath ! enough Cydippe swore,
No human ties can bind a virgin more.
So may kind heav'n attend a lover's pray'r,
Softens thy pains, and comfort my despair.
See, the warm blush your modest cheeks inflame ;
Yet is there cause for anger or for shame !
Recall to mind those tender lines of love,
Deny you cannot—though your heart disprove.
Still must I wait in impotent desires,
And only hope revive the fainting fires ?
Yet did'st thou promise to be ever mine——
A conscious horror seem'd to shake the shrine,
The pow'r consenting bow'd ; a beam of light
Flash'd from the skies, and made the temple bright,
Ah ! then Cydippe, dry thy precious tears :
The more my fraud, the more my love appears.
Love ever-watchful, ev'n by nature charms ;
Inflames the modest, and the wise disarms ?
Fair yet dissembling, pleasing but to cheat
With tender blandishment, and soft deceit.
Kind speaking motions, melancholy sighs,
Tears that delight, and eloquence of eyes.
Love first the treach'rous dear design inspir'd
My hopes exalted, and my genius fir'd :
Ah ! sure I cannot——must not guilty prove ;
Deceit itself is laudable in love !
Once more inspir'd such tender lines I send,
See, my hand trembles lest my thoughts offend.
Heroes in war inflam'd by beauty's charms,
Tear the sad virgin from her parents arms ;
I too, like these, feel the fierce flames of love,
Yet check my rage, and modestly reprove.

Ah, teach me, heav'n, some language to persuade,
 Some other vows to bind the faithless maid;
 O love all-cloquent, you only know
 To touch the soul with elegies of woe!
 If treach'ry fail, by force I urge my right,
 Sheath'd in rough armour, formidably bright:
 So Paris snatch'd his Spartan bride away,
 A half denying, half consenting prey;
 I too resolve——whate'er the dangers be,
 For death is nothing when compar'd to thee,
 Were you less fair, I then might guiltless prove,
 And moderate the fury of my love.
 But ah! those charms for ever must inspire,
 Each look, each motion sets my soul on fire.
 Heav'n's! with what pleasing ecstasies of pain
 Trembling I gaze, and watch thy glance in vain.
 How can I praise those golden curls that deck
 Each glowing cheek, or wave around thy neck:
 Thy swelling arms, and forehead rising fair,
 Thy modest sweetness, and attractive air;
 Adjoin to these a negligence of grace,
 A winning accent, and enchanting face.
 Dear matchless charms! I cease to name the rest,
 Nor wonder thou that love inflames my breast.

Since all alike to Hymen's altars bend,
 Ah, blest at once the lover, and the friend!
 Let envy rage, and int'rest disapprove,
 Envy and int'rest must submit to love.
 By pray'rs and vows Hesiore was won
 To share the joys of hostile Telamon.
 Soft gen'rous pity touch'd the * captive dame
 Who warm'd Achilles with a lover's flame.
 To bless the wretched, shows a soul divine——
 Be ever angry——but be ever mine.
 Yet can no pray'rs thy firm resentment move?
 Wretch that I was so ill to fix my love!
 See, at thy feet despairing wild I roul,
 Grief swells my heart, and anguish racks my soul,
 There fix my doom; relentless to my sighs,
 And lifted hands, and supplicating eyes.
 Then wilt thou say (for pity sure must move
 A virgin's breast) "how patient is his love!"
 "Ev'n my heart trembles, as his tears I see;
 "The youth who serves so well, is worthy me."
 Still must I then in sad distraction moan?
 My cause unheeded, and my grief unknown.
 Ah, no——Acontius cannot write in vain;
 Sure ev'ry wretch has license to complain!
 But if you triumph in a lover's woe,
 Remember still Diana is your foe!
 Diana listen'd to the vows you made,
 And trembled at the change her eyes survey'd.
 Ah, think, repent, while yet the time is giv'n,
 Fierce is the vengeance of neglected heav'n!
 By Dian's hand the Phrygian matron fell,
 Sent with her race, an early shade to hell.
 Chang'd to a stag, Acteon pour'd away,
 In the same morn the chaser and the prey.
 Althea rag'd with more than female hate,
 And hurl'd into the flames the brand of fate.
 Like these offensive, punish'd too like these
 Heav'n blasts thy joys, and heightens the disease.
 Nor think Cydippe (as my fears foresee)
 A thought unworthy of thyself, or me!
 Think not I frame this seeming truth, to prove
 Thy stern disdain, a pious fraud in love;

* Briseis.

Rather than so, I yet abjure thy charms,
 And yield thee scornful, to another's arms!
 Alas, for this pale sickness haunts thy bed,
 And shooting aches seem to tear thy head;
 A sudden vengeance waits thy guilty loves;
 Absent is Hymen, Dian disapproves.
 Think then, repent—recall the parting breath
 O'er thy lips hov'ring in the hour of death.
 See, on thy cheeks the fading purple dies,
 And shades of darkness settle on thy eyes.
 But whence, ye pow'rs, or wherefore rose that Still must I mourn in absence, or despair; [pray'r?
 Forc'd, if she dies, the promise to resign——
 Ev'n if she lives, I must not call her mine!

Like some pale ghost around thy house I rove,
 Now burn in rage, and now relent with love;
 A thousand needless messages I make,
 A thousand mournful speeches give, and take.
 O that my skill the sov'reign virtues knew
 Of ev'ry herb that drinks the early dew,
 Then might I hear thy moans, thy sickness see,
 Nor were it sure a crime to gaze on thee.
 Perhaps ev'n now, (as fear foresees too well)
 The wretch I curse, detest, avoid like hell,
 Beside thee breathes a love-dejected sigh,
 And marks the silent glances of thy eye.
 Some faint excuse he raises, to detain
 Thy swelling arm, and press the beating vein:
 Now o'er thy neck his glowing fingers rove,
 Too great a pleasure for so mean a love!
 Villain beware! the sacred nymph resign——
 Avoid, detest her, dread whate'er is mine;
 Elsewhere a lover's preference I give,
 But cease to rival here, or cease to live.
 The vows you claim by right of human laws,
 At best but serve to vindicate my cause.
 To thee alone by duty is she kind;
 Can parents alienate a daughter's mind?
 First weigh the crime, the vengeance next explore,
 The father promis'd, but the daughter swore:
 That merely vain on human faith relies;
 But this obtests the sanction of the skies.

Here cease my woes——ah, whither am I
 A woman's triumph, and a rival's scorn? [borne
 Vain are my vows, unheeded is my pray'r,
 The scatt'ring winds have lost 'em all in air;
 Yet think Cydippe, e'er thy lover dies!
 Banish that wretch for ever from thy eyes;
 Scorn, envy, censures are conferr'd on me,
 And pain,—and death is all he brings to thee.
 Gods! may some vengeance crimes like these a-
 And snatch his life, to mediate for thy own [tone,
 Nor think to please avenging Cynthia's eyes
 With streams of blood in holy sacrifice:
 Heav'n claims the real, not the formal part,
 A troubled spirit, and repenting heart.
 For ease, and health the patient oft requires
 The piercing steel, and burns alive in fires;
 Not so with you——ah, but confirm the vow!
 One look; one promise can restore thee now;
 Again thy smiles eternal joys bestow,
 And thy eyes sparkle, and thy blushes glow.

Suppose from me for ever you remove,
 Once must you fall a sacrifice to love;
 And then, ah, then will angry Cynthia close
 Thy wakeful eyes, or ease a matron's throes?
 Yet wilt thou ever find a cause for shame?
 No sure——a mother cannot, must not blame.

Tell her the vow, the place, the sacred day
 I gaz'd on thee, and gaz'd my heart away :
 Then will she surely say (if e'er she knew
 But half that tender love I feel for you)
 " Ah, think Cydippe, and his consort be ;
 " The youth who pleas'd Diana, pleases me !
 Yet if she asks (as women oft require)
 Tell her my life, my nation, and my fire :
 Not void of youthful vanities I came,
 Nor yet inglorious in the world of fame ;
 From ancient race I drew my gen'rous blood,
 Where Cea's isle o'erlooks the watery flood :
 Add, that I study ev'ry art to please,
 Blest in my genius, born to live at ease.
 Wit, merit, learning cannot fail to move,
 And all those dearer blessings lost in love !
 Ah ! had you never sworn, 'twere hard to choose
 A love like mine——and will you now refuse ?
 In midnight dreams when wakeful fancy keeps
 Its dearest thoughts, and ev'n in slumber weeps,
 Diana's self these mournful strains inspir'd,
 And Cupid when I wak'd, my genius fir'd.
 Methinks, ev'n now, his piercing arrows move
 My tender breast, and spread the pains of love.
 Like me beware, unhappy as thou art !
 Direct at thee Diana aims her dart
 To drink the blood that feeds thy faithless heart. }
 The loves thou never can'st enjoy, resign ;
 Nor rashly lose another life with thine,
 Then will we, eager as our joys, remove
 To Dian's shrine, the patroness of love !
 High o'er her head in triumph shall be plac'd
 The golden fruit, with this inscription grac'd ;
 " Ye hapless lovers, hence, for ever know
 " Acontius gain'd the nymph who caus'd his woe !"
 Here cease my hand——I tremble, lest each line
 Should wound a soul so griev'd, so touch'd as thine.
 No more my thoughts th' ungrateful toil pursue ;
 Pleasure farewell, and thou, my dear, adieu !

PART OF PINDAR'S FIRST PYTHIAN
 ODE PARAPHRASED.

Χρυσία φόρμιξ Ἀπολλῶ——

ARGUMENT.

THIS Ode is addressed to Hieron king of Sicily, as is also the first of the Olympics. Pindar takes occasion to begin with an encomium on music, finely describing its effects upon the passions. We must suppose this art to be one of his hero's more distinguishable excellencies ; as it appears from several passages in the Ode above. From thence he expatiates in the praise of poetry ; and inveighs very severely upon those who either contemn, or have no taste for that divine science. Their misfortunes and punishments are instanced by those of Typhœus : whom the poets imagine to be imprisoned by Jupiter under mount Ætna. The digressions in this Ode are the most inartificial and surprising of any in the whole author. We are once more in the hero's native country ; every thing opens agreeably to the eye, and the poem proceeds after Pindar's usual manner.

STROPHE I.

GENTLE lyre, begin the strain ;
 Wake the string to voice again.

Music rules the world above ;
 Music is the food of love.
 Soften'd by the pow'r of sound,
 Human passions melt away :
 Melancholy feels no wound,
 Envy sleeps, and fears decay.
 Entranc'd in pleasure Jove's dread eagle lies,
 Nor grasps the bolt, nor darts his fiery eyes.

ANTISTROPHE I.

See, Mars awak'd by loud alarms
 Rolls o'er the field his sanguine eyes,
 His heart tumultuous beats to arms,
 And terrors glare, and furies rise !
 Hark the pleasing lutes complain,
 In a softly-breathing strain ;
 Love, and slumber seal his eye
 By the gentle charms oppress'd :
 From his rage he steals a sigh,
 Sinking on Dione's breast.

EPODE I.

Verse, gentle verse from heav'n descending came,
 Curst by the wicked, hateful to the vain :
 Tyrants and slaves profane its sacred name,
 Deaf to the tender lay, or vocal strain.---
 In fires of hell Typhœus glows,
 Imprison'd by the wrath of Jove ;
 No ease his restless fury knows,
 Nor sounds of joy, nor pleasing love,
 Where, glitt'ring faintly on the eye,
 Sicilian Ætna props the sky
 With mountains of eternal snow ;
 He darts his fiery eyes in vain,
 And heaves, and roars, and bites his chain
 In impotence of woe.

STROPHE II.

Angry flames like scarlet glowing
 Fiery torrents ever flowing,
 Smoke along the with'ring plain
 Ere they rush into the main.
 When the sable veil of night
 Stretches o'er the shaded sky,
 Fires of sulphur gleam with light,
 Burning rocks disparted fly.
 Sudden, by turns the flashing flames arise,
 Pour down the winds, or tremble up the skies.

ANTISTROPHE II.

In fair Sicilia's rich domain,
 Where flow'rs and fruits eternal blow,
 Where plenty spreads her peaceful reign,
 And seas surround, and fountains flow,
 Bright religion lifts her eye,
 Wand'ring through the kindred-sky.
 Hail thou, everlasting Jove,
 Parent of th' Aonian quire ;
 Touch my raptur'd soul with love,
 Warm we with celestial fire !

EPODE II.

The pious mariner when first he sweeps
 The foaming billows, and exalts his sails,
 Propitiates ev'ry pow'r that rules the deeps,
 Led by new hopes, and borne by gentle gales.
 So e'er the muse disus'd to sing,
 Emblazons her fair hero's praise :
 (What time she wakes the trembling string,
 Attemper'd to the vocal lay ;
 Prostrate in humble guise she bends,
 While some celestial pow'r descends.

To guide her airy flights along ;
 God of the silver bow, give ear ;
 (Whom Tenedos, and Chrysa fear)
 Observant of the song !

STROPHE III.

Gentle wishes, chaste desires,
 Holy Hymen's purer fires :
 Lives of innocence and pleasure,
 Moral virtue's mystic treasure ;
 Wisdom, eloquence, and love,
 All are blessings from above.
 Hence regret, distaste, dispraise,
 Guilty nights, uneasy days :
 Repining jealousies, calm friendly wrongs,
 And fiercer envy, and the strife of tongues.

ANTISTROPHE III.

When virtue bleeds beneath the laws,
 Or ardent nations rise in arms,
 Thy mercies judge the doubtful cause,
 Thy courage ev'ry beast alarms.
 Kindling with heroic fire
 Once again I sweep the lyre.
 Fair as summer's evening skies,
 Ends thy life serene, and glorious ;
 Happy hero, great and wise,
 O'er thy foes, and self victorious.

THE EPISODE OF ORPHEUS AND EURYDICE,

Translated from the fourth Georgic of Virgil.

At chorus æqualis Dryadum—

HER sudden death the Mountain-Dryads mourn'd,
 And Rhodope's high brow the dirge return'd :
 Bleak Orythya trembled at their woe,
 And silver Hebrus murmur'd in his flow.
 While to his mournful harp, unseen, alone,
 Despairing Orpheus warbled out his moan.
 With rosy dawn his plaintive lays begun,
 His plaintive voice sung down the setting sun.

Now in the frantic bitterness of woe
 Silent he treads the dreary realms below,
 His loss in tender numbers to deplore, [fore.
 And touch the souls who ne'er were touch'd be-
 Mov'd with the pleasing harmony of song,
 The shadowy spectres 'round the poet throng :
 Num'rous as birds that o'er the forest play,
 (When evening Phœbus rous'd the light away :
 Or when high Jove in wintry seasons pours
 A sudden deluge from descending show'rs.)
 The mother's ghost, the father's rev'rend shade,
 The blooming hero, and th' unmarry'd maid :
 The new-born heir who soon lamented dies,
 And feeds the flames before his parent's eyes ;
 All whom Cocytus' fable water bounds,
 And Styx with thrice three wand'ring streams surrounds.

See, the dread regions tremble and admire !
 Ev'n Pain unmov'd stands heark'ning to the lyre.
 Intent, Ixion stares, nor seems to feel
 The rapid motions of the whirling wheel.
 Th' unfolding snakes around the furies play,
 As the pale sisters listen to the lay.

Nor was the poet's moving suit deny'd,
 Again to realms above he bears his bride.

When (stern decree !) he turns his longing eyes,
 'Tis done, she's lost, for ever ever flies---
 Too small the fault, too lasting was the pain,
 Could love but judge, or hell relent again !
 Amaz'd he stands, and by the glimpse of day
 Just sees th' unbody'd shadow flit away.
 When thus she cry'd---ah, too unthoughtful spouse
 Thus for one look to violate thy vows !
 Fate bears me back, again to hell I fly,
 Eternal darkness swims before my eye :
 Again the melancholy plains I see,
 Ravish'd from life, from pleasure, and from thee !
 She said, and sinking into endless night,
 Like exhalations vanish'd from the sight.
 In vain he sprung to seize her, wept, or pray'd,
 Swift glides away the visionary shade.

How wilt thou now, unhappy Orpheus, tell
 Thy second loss, and melt the pow'rs of hell ?
 Cold are those lips that blest thy soul before,
 And her fair eyes must roll on thine no more.
 Sev'n tedious moons despairing, wild he stood,
 And told his woes to Strymon's freezing flood.
 Beneath his feet eternal snows were spread,
 And airy rocks hang nodding o'er his head,
 The savage beasts in circles round him play,
 And rapid streams stand list'ning to the lay.

So when the shepherd-swain with curious eyes
 Marks the fair nest, and makes the young his prize :
 Sad Philomel, in poplar shades alone,
 In vain renews her lamentable moan.
 From night to morn she chaunts her tender love.
 And mournful music dies along the grove.

No thoughts of pleasure now his soul employ,
 Averse to Venus and the nuptial joy :
 Wild as the winds o'er Thracia's plains he roves,
 O'er the bleak mountains, and the leafless groves,
 When stung with rage the Bacchanalian train
 Rush'd to the bard, and stretch'd him on the plain (Nor sounds, nor pray'rs their giddy fury move,
 And he must cease to live, or learn to love)
 See, from his shoulders in a moment flies
 His bleeding head, and now, ah now he dies !
 Yet as he dy'd, Eurydice he mourn'd,
 Eurydice, the trembling banks return'd ;
 Eurydice, with hollow voice he cry'd,
 Eurydice ran murmuring down the tide.

TO THE RIGHT HONOURABLE LADY
HERTFORD,

UPON THE BIRTH OF LORD BEAUCHAMP.

ONCE more inspir'd, I touch the trembling string ;
 What muse for Hertford will refuse to sing ?
 Thine are the favourite strains, and may they be
 Sacred to praise, to beauty, and to thee !

Sudden, methinks, in vision I survey
 The glorious triumphs of th' expected day :
 Fair lovely fights in opening scenes appear,
 And airy music trembles on my ear ;
 Surrounding eyes devour the beauteous boy,
 And ev'ry bosom beats with sounds of joy.

Rise from thy slumbers, gentle infant, rise !
 Lift thy fair head, unfold thy radiant eyes,
 Whose lovely light must other courts adorn,
 And wound the hearts of beauties yet unborn,
 Subdue the sex that triumphs in its pride,
 And humble those, who charm the world beside.

Descend ye gentle nine! descend, and spread
 Laurels and bays around his infant-head.
 Bid noble passions in his bosom roll,
 And beams of fancy dawn upon his soul;
 In soften'd music bid his accents flow,
 Piercing, and gentle as descending snow;
 Bid him be all that can his birth commend:
 The daring patriot, and unshaken friend:
 Admir'd, yet humble, modest, though severe,
 Abroad obliging, and, at home sincere;
 Good, just, and affable in each degree:
 Such is the father, such the son shall be!

These humble strains, indulgent Hertford, spare;
 Forgive the muse, O fairest of the fair!
 First in thy shades (where silver Kennet glides,
 Fair Marlbro's turrets trembling in his tides:
 Where peace and plenty hold their gentle reign,
 And lavish nature decks the fruitful plain:
 Where the fam'd mountain lifts its walks on high,
 As varying prospects open on the eye)
 To love's soft theme I tun'd the warbling lyre,
 And borrow'd from thy eyes poetic fire.

THE ARMY OF ADRASTUS, AND HIS ALLIES,

MARCHING FROM ARGOS TO THE SIEGE OF THEBES.

From the fourth Thebaid of Statius.

Jamq. suos circum——

AROUND the pomp in mourning weeds array'd,
 Weeps the pale father, and the trembling maid:
 The screaming infants at the portals stand,
 And clasp, and stop the slow-proceeding band.
 Each parting face a settled horror wears,
 Each low-held shield receives a flood of tears.
 Some with a kiss (sad sign of future harms)
 Round the clos'd beaver glue their clasping arms,
 Hang on the spear, detain 'em as they go,
 With lifted eyes, and eloquence of woe.
 Those warlike chiefs, whom dread Bellona steel'd,
 And arm'd with souls unknowing once to yield,
 Now touch'd with sorrows, hide their tearful eyes,
 And all the hero melts away and dies.

So the pale sailor, launching from the shore,
 Leaves the dear prospects that must charm no more:
 Here shrieks of anguish pierce his pitying ears---
 There strangely wild, a floating world appears---
 Swift the fair vessel wings her watery flight,
 And in a mist deceives the aching sight:
 The native train in sad distraction weep,
 Now beat their breasts, now tremble o'er the deep,
 Curse ev'ry gale that wafts the fleet from land,
 Breathe the last sigh, and wave the circling hand.

You now, fair ancient truth! conduct along
 Th' advent'rous bard, and animate his song:
 Each godlike man in proper lights display,
 And open all the war in dread array.
 You too, bright mistress of th' Aonian quire,
 Divine Calliope! resume the lyre:
 The lives and deaths of mighty chiefs recite,
 The waste of nations, and the rage of fight.

VOL. IX.

A SIMILE,

UPON A SET OF TEA-DRINKERS.

So fairy elves their morning-table spread
 O'er a white mushroom's hospitable head:
 In acorn cups the merry goblins quaff
 The pearly dews, they sing, they love, they laugh;
 Melodious music trembles through the sky,
 And airy sounds along the green-wood die.

THE SAME,

DIVERSIFIED IN ANCIENT METRE.

So, yf deepe clerkes in tymes of yore faine trew,
 Or poets eyne, perdie, mought sothly vew,
 The dapper Elfins thyr quaint festes bedight
 Wyth mickle plesaunce on a mushrome lite:
 In acorne cuppes thy quassen daint liquere,
 And rowle belgardes, and defflie daunce yfere;
 Ful everidele they makin musike sote,
 And fowns aeriall adowne the grene woode flote.

A SOLILOQUY,

OCCASIONED BY THE CHIRPING OF A GRASS-HOPPER.

HAPPY insect! ever blest
 With a more than mortal rest,
 Rosy dews the leaves among;
 Humble joys and gentle song!
 Wretched poet! ever curs'd,
 With a life of lives the worst,
 Sad despondence, restless fears,
 Endless jealousies and tears.

In the burning summer, thou
 Warblest on the verdant bough,
 Meditating cheerful play,
 Mindless of the piercing ray;
 Scorch'd in Cupid's fervors, I
 Ever weep, and ever die.

Proud to gratify thy will,
 Ready nature waits thee still:
 Balmy wines to thee she pours,
 Weeping through the dewy flow'rs:
 Rich as those by Hebe giv'n
 To the thirsty sons of heav'n.

Yet alas! we both agree,
 Miserable thou like me!
 Each alike in youth rehearses
 Gentle strains, and tender verses;
 Ever wand'ring far from home;
 Mindless of the days to come,
 (Such as aged winter brings Trembling on his icy wings)
 Both alike at last we die;
 Thou art starv'd, and so am I!

THE STORY OF ARETHUSA.

TRANSLATED FROM THE FIFTH BOOK OF OVID'S
 METAMORPHOSES.

Connection to the former

The poet describes Ceres wandering over the world in great affliction, to search after her daughter Proserpina, who was then lost. At last Arethusa (a river of Sicily) informs the goddess that her daughter was stolen away by Pluto, and carried down into hell. Now it was ordained by fate, that Proserpine should return again, if she tasted not of any fruit in the other world. But temptations were strong, and the woman could not resist eating six or seven kernels of a pomegranate. However, to mitigate the sentence, Jupiter decreed that she should reside but half the year with Pluto, and pass the rest with her mother. Upon these terms Ceres is very well pacified, and in complaisance desires Arethusa to relate her life, and for what reasons she was changed into a river.

Hush'd in suspense the gath'ring waters stood,
When thus began the parent of the flood:
What time emerging from the wave, she prest
Her verdant tresses dropping on her breast.

Of all the nymphs Achaia boasts (she said),
Was Arethusa once the fairest maid.
None lov'd so well, to spread in early dawn
The trembling meshes o'er the dewy lawn:
Though dress and beauty scarce deserv'd my care,
Yet ev'ry tongue confess'd me to be fair.
The charms which others strive for, I resign,
And think it ev'n a crime to find them mine!

It chanc'd one morn, returning from the wood
Weary I wander'd by a silver flood:
The gentle waters scarce were seen to glide,
And a calm silence still'd the sleeping tide;
High o'er the banks a grove of watery trees
Spread its dark shade, that trembled to the breeze.
(My vest suspended on the boughs) I lave
My chilly feet, then plunge beneath the wave;
A ruddy light my blushing limbs dispread,
And the clear stream half glows with rosy-red.
When from beneath in awful murmurs broke
A hollow voice, and thus portentous spoke:

"My lovely nymph, my Arethusa stay,
"Alpheus calls; it said, or seem'd to say"—

Naked and swift I flew (my clothes behind),
Fear strung my nerves, and shame enrag'd my mind.
So wing'd with hunger the fierce eagle flies,
To drive the trembling turtles through the skies:
So wing'd with fear the trembling turtles spring,
When the fierce eagle shoots upon the wing.

Swift bounding from the god, I now survey
Where breezy Plophis and Cyllenè lay:
Elis' fair structures open'd on my eyes;
And waving Erymanthus cools the skies,
At length unequal for the rapid chase
Tremble my limbs, the god maintains the race:
O'er hills and vales with furious haste I flew;
O'er hills and vales the god behind me drew.
Now hov'ring o'er, his lengthening shadow bends,
(His length'ning shadow the low sun extends)
And sudden now, his sounding steps drew near;
At least I seem'd his sounding steps to hear.
Now sinking, in short sobs I gasp'd for breath,
Just in the jaws of violence and death.

Ah, Cynthia help! ('twas thus in thought I pray'd)
Ah, help a ravish'd, miserable maid!

The virgin-pow'r consenting to my pray'r,
Diffus'd around a veil of clouded air:

Lost in the gloom he wanders o'er the plain,
And Arethusa calls, but calls in vain

In misty steams th' impervious vapours rise,
Perplex his guesses, and deceive his eyes.

What fears I felt as thus enclos'd I stood,
What chilling horrors trembled through my blood?
So pants the fawn in silence and despair,
When the grim wolf runs howling through the lair:
So sits the lev'et, when the hound pursues
His trembling prey, and winds the tainted dews.

Sudden my cheek with flashing colour burns,
Pale swoons, and sickly fears succeed by turns:
Cold creeps my blood, its pulses beat no more:
Big drops of sweat ascend from every pore;
Adown my locks the pearly dews distill,
And each full eye pours forth a gushing rill;
Now all at once my melting limbs decay,
In one clear stream dissolving fast away.

The god soon saw me floating o'er the plain,
And strait resum'd his watery form again—
Instant, Diana, smote the trembling ground;
Down rush my waters with a murmur'ing sound;
Thence darkling through th' infernal regions stray,
And in the Delian plains review the day,

ANGERIANUS DE CÆLIA,

(EPIG. 40.)

QUUM dormiret Amor, rapuit clam pulchra pharetram

Cælia, surreptâ flevit Amor pharetrâ.
Noli (Cypris ait) sic flere Cupido; pharetram
Pulchra tibi rapuit Cælia, restituit.
Non opus est illi calamis, non ignibus: urit
Voce, manu, gressu, pectore, fronte, oculis.

CUPID MISTAKEN.

FROM THE SPORTS OF CUPID, WRITTEN BY ANGERIANUS.

Imitated and enlarged.

As fast beside a murmuring stream,
In blissful visions Cupid lay,
Chloe, as she softly came,
Snatch'd his golden shafts away.

From place to place in sad surprise
The little angry godhead flew:
Trembling in his ruddy eyes
Hung the pearly drops of dew.

So on the rose (in blooming May,
When purple Phœbus rises bright)
Liquid gems of silver lay,
Pierc'd with glitt'ring streams of light.

Fair Venus with a tender languish
Smiling, thus her son address'd,
As he murmur'd out his anguish
Trembling on her snowy breast:

Peace, gentle infant, I implore,
Nor lavish precious tears in vain;
Chloe, when the jest is o'er,
Brings the useless shafts again.

Can Chloe need the shafts of love,
Young blooming, witty, plump and fair?

Charms and raptures round her move,
Murmuring sighs, and deep despair.

Millions for her unheeded die,
Millions to her their blessings owe;
Ev'ry motion of her eye
Murders more than Cupid's bow.

TO A YOUNG LADY,

WITH MR. FENTON'S MISCELLANY.

THESE various strains, where ev'ry talent charms,
Where humour pleases, or where passion warms:
(Strains! where the tender and sublime conspire,
A Sappho's sweetness, and a Homer's fire)
Attend their doom, and wait with glad surprise
Th' impartial justice of Cleora's eyes.

'Tis hard to say, what mysteries of fate,
What turns of fortune on good writers wait.
The party-slave will wound 'em as he can,
And damns the merit, if he hates the man.
Nay, ev'n the bards with wit and laurels crown'd,
Bless'd in each strain, in ev'ry art renown'd:
Mistaken by pride, and taught to sin by pow'r,
Still search around for those they may devour:
Like savage monarchs on a guilty throne,
Who crush all might that can invade their own.

Others who hate, yet want the soul to dare,
So ruin bards—as beaux's deceive the fair:
On the pleas'd ear their soft deceits employ;
Smiling they wound, and praise but to destroy.
These are th' unhappy crimes of modern days,
And can the best of poets hope for praise?

How small a part of human blessings share
The wise, the good, the noble, or the fair!
Short is the date unhappy wit can boast,
A blaze of glory in a moment lost.
Fortune still envious of the great man's praise,
Curses the coxcomb with a length of days.
So (Hector dead) amid the female quire,
Unmanly Paris tun'd the silver lyre.

Attend ye Britons! in so just a cause
'Tis sure a scandal, to withhold applause;
Nor let posterity reviling say,
Thus unregarded Fenton pass'd away!
Yet if the muse may faith or merit claim.
(A muse too just to bribe with venal fame)
Soon shalt thou shine * “in majesty avow'd;
“As thy own goddess breaking through a cloud.”
Fame, like a nation debt, though long delay'd,
With mighty int'rest must at last be paid.

Like Vinci's strokes, thy verses we behold;
Correctly graceful, and with labour bold.
At Sappho's woes we breathe a tender sigh,
And the soft sorrow steals from ev'ry eye.
Here Spenser's thoughts in solemn numbers roll,
Here lofty Milton seems to lift the soul.
There sprightly Chaucer charms our hours away
With stories quient, and gentle roundelay.

Muse! at that name each thought of pride recall,
Ah, think how soon the wise and glorious fall!
What though the sisters ev'ry grace impart,
To smoothe thy verse, and captivate the heart:

* Epistle to Southerne.

What though your charms, my fair Cleora! shine
Bright as your eyes, and as your sex divine:
Yet shall the verses, and the charms decay,
The boast of youth, the blessing of a day!
Not Chaucer's beauties could survive the rage
Of wasting envy, and devouring age:
One mingled heap of ruin now we see;
Thus Chaucer is, and Fenton thus shall be!

TO THE PRINCE OF ORANGE,

ON HIS PASSING THROUGH OXFORD, ON HIS RE-TURN FROM BATH.

At length, in pity to a nation's prayer,
Thou liv'st, O Nassau, providence's care!
Life's sun, which lately with a dubious ray
Gave the last gleams of a short glorious day,
Again with more than noon-tide lustre burns
The dial brightens, and the line returns.

Some guardian power, who o'er thy fate presides,

Whose eye unerring Albion's welfare guides,
Taught yonder streams with new felt force to flow,
And bade th' exalted minerals doubly glow.
Thus cold and motionless Bethesda stood,
Till heavenly influence brooded o'er the flood.

Lo, while our isle with one loud pæan rings,
Equal, though silent, homage Isis brings;
Hers is the task of reason, not of art,
Words of the mind, and actions of the heart!

And sure that unbought praise which learning
brings,

Outweighs the vast acclaim that deafens kings;
For souls, supremely sensible and great,
See through the farce of noise, and pomp of state;
Mark when the fools huzza, or wise rejoice,
And judge exactly between sound and voice.

Hail, and proceed! be arts like ours thy care,
Nor slight those laurels thou wert born to wear:
Adorn and emulate thy glorious line,
Take thy forefathers worth, and give them thine.
Blest with each gift that human hearts can move,
In science blest, but doubly blest in love.

Power, beauty, virtue, dignify thy choice,
Each public suffrage, and each private voice.

How to grow bold with conscious sense of fame,
And force a pleasure which we dare not blame:
To charm us more through negligence than pains,
And give ev'n life and action to the strains:

Led by some law, whose pow'rful impulse guides
Each happy stroke, and in the soul presides:
Some fairer image of perfection, giv'n
T' inspire mankind, itself deriv'd from heav'n.

O ever worthy, ever crown'd with praise;
Blest in thy life, and blest in all thy lays!
Add that the sisters ev'ry thought refine:
Or ev'n thy life be faultless as thy line;
Yet envy still with fiercer rage pursues,
Obscures the virtue, and defames the muse.
A soul like thine, in pains, in grief resign'd,
Views with vain scorn the malice of mankind:
Not critics, but their planets prove unjust:
And are they blam'd who sin because they must?

Yet sure not so must all peruse thy lays;
I cannot rival—and yet dare to praise.
A thousand charms at once my thoughts engage,
Sappho's soft sweetness, Pindar's warmer rage,
Statius' free vigour, Virgil's studious care,
And Homer's force, and Ovid's easier air.

So seems some picture, where exact design,
And curious pains, and strength and sweetness join:
Where the free thought its pleasing grace bestows,
And each warm stroke with living colour glows:

Soft without weakness, without labour fair;

Wrought up at once with happiness and care!

How blest the man that from the world removes
To joys that Mordaunt, or his Pope approves;
Whose taste exact each author can explore,
And live the present and past ages o'er:
Who free from pride, from penitence, or strife,
Move calmly forward to the verge of life:
Such be my days, and such my fortunes be,
To live by reason, and to write by thee!

Nor deem this verse, though humble, thy disgrace;

All are not born the glory of their race:

Yet all are born t' adore the great man's name,

And trace his footsteps in the paths to fame.

The muse who now this early homage pays,

First learn'd from thee to animate her lays:

A muse as yet unhonour'd, but unstain'd,

Who prais'd no vices, no preferment gain'd:

Unbias'd or to censure or commend,

Who knows no envy, and who grieves no friend;

Perhaps too fond to make those virtues known,

And fix her fame immortal on thy own.

Curritur ad vocem jucundam, et carmen amicæ
Thebaidos, lætam fecit cum Statius urbem,
Promisitque diem: tantâ dulcedine captos
Afficit ille animos—

JUV. SAT. VII.

THE ARGUMENT TO THE WHOLE THEBAID.

ŒDIPUS the son of Laius, king of Thebes, was, in his infancy, exposed to wild beasts upon the mountains; but, by some miraculous preservation, he escaped this danger, and, afterwards, by mistake, slew his own father, as they contended for the way. He then married Jocasta, Queen of Thebes, whom he knew not to be his mother, and had by her two sons, Eteocles and Polynices; who, after their father had put out his eyes, and banished himself from Thebes, agreed between themselves to govern year by year interchangeably. But this agreement was ill observed. Eteocles, when his date of government was expired, refused to resign it to Polynices; who, in his rage, fled to Adrastus, King of Argos, to implore assistance against his brother. Adrastus received the young prince with all imaginable tenderness, and gave him in marriage to his fair daughter Deipyle, as the oracles had appointed. He then, with the assistance of his allies, undertakes to settle Polynices on the throne, and to depose Eteocles. Upon this, Thebes is besieged, and, after several encounters, the difference is at last decided by the duel and death of the two brothers. This is the main action of the poem.

Besides this, by way of an under action, the poet has interwoven another distinct story. The goddess Venus is resolved to revenge herself upon the Lemnians, because they neglected all sacrifices to her. She first disgusts the men with their wives, and then, in return, spirits up the women into a resolution of murdering their husbands. This horrible design was executed by each of them, except Hypsipyle, who saved her father Thoas. Some time afterward this also was discovered. Hypsipyle, to avoid the fury of the women, fled to the sea-shore, where she was taken by the pirates, and presented by them to King Lycurgus, who made her nurse to his son Archemorus. The dominions of this prince lay directly in the way from Argos to Thebes. As Adrastus and his Allies were marching thither, the troops were ready to perish for want of water. They chanced in a wood to meet Hyppipyle, who, pitying their misfortunes, lays down in haste her young child, and shows them a spring that could never be drained. She receives the thanks of Adrastus; and having, at his request, recited her own adventures, returns back, and finds the young infant Archemorus just killed by a serpent. Her confusion and fears are described in an excellent speech upon that occasion. The Grecians kill the serpent; and, in honour of the dead prince, perform all the rites of burial; which is the subject of this present book.

First of all, it begins with an historical account of the Nemæan games, then follows the funeral, with a more particular description of hewing the forests, and offering their hair to the deceased. The anguish of Adrastus, the lamentations of Eurydice, and the silence of Hyppipyle, are extremely well adapted to nature. A monument is erected to the memory of Archemorus, which is ornamented with the whole story in sculpture. After this succeed the funeral games; the chariot-race, the foot-race, the discus, the fight with the castus, the wrestling, and shooting with arrows; which last ends with a prodigy, foreboding that none of the confederate princes should return from the war except Adrastus.

Soon mournful fame through ev'ry town pro-
The rites of sepulture, and Grecian games: [claims
What mighty chiefs should glory give or gain,
Prepar'd to combat on the list'd plain.

These honours first the great Alcides paid
To please old Pelops' venerable shade.
What time near Pisa he inhum'd the dead,
And bound with olive wreaths his dusty head.
These, with new hopes, glad Phocis next bestow'd,
When Python sunk beneath her bowyer god. 10

These still religion to Palæmon pays,
(Religion blinded with a length of days)
When hanging o'er the deep in anguish raves
His royal mother to the founding waves;
O'er either Isthmus floats the mingled moan,
And distant Thebe answers groan for groan.

The pious games begin, with loud alarms,
Here the young warriors first prelude in arms:
Each blooming youth Aonia sends to fame,
And each dear object to the Tyrian dame; 20
Who once imbru'd in blood, shall heap around
High hills of slain, and deluge all the ground.

The youthful sailors thus with early care
Their arms experience, and for sea prepare:
On some smooth lake their lighter oars essay,
And learn the dangers of the wat'ry way;
But once grown bold, they launch before the wind
Eager and swift, nor turn their eyes behind.

Aurora now, fair daughter of the day,
Warm'd the clear orient with a blushing ray; 30
Swift from mankind the pow'r of slumbers flew;
And the pale moon her glimm'ring beams with-
O'er the long woods the matten dirges run, [drew.
And shrieks of sorrow wake the rising sun.

Th' unhappy father, father now no more,
His bosom beat, his aged hairs he tore:
Beside him lay each ornament of state,
To make him wretched, as they made him great.
With more than female grief the mother cries,
And wringing both her hands, obtests the skies;
Bending she weeps upon th' extended slain, 41
Bathes ev'ry wound, returns, and weeps again.

But when the kings in sad and solemn woe,
Enter'd the dome, majestically flow:
(As if just then the trembling babe was found,
And life's last blood came issuing through the wound)

* Leucobœe.

Breast took from breast the melancholy strain,
And pausing nature wept, and sob'd again.
Confus'd each Grecian hangs his guilty head,
And weeps a flood of tears to wail the dead. 50

Meanwhile Adrastus bears the friendly part,
And with kind words consoles the father's heart.
He marks th' eternal orders of the sky,
And proves that man was born to grieve and die;
Now tells him heav'n will future children send
To heir his kingdom, and his years defend.

In vain the charmer pleads, unbounded flow
The parent's tears, in violence of woe.
He hears no more than storms that thund'ring rise, 60
Regard the sailors vows, or piercing cries,
And the wild horror of their stony eyes.

Apart, a crowd of friends the bier bestrow
With cypress boughs; then place the straw below.
The second rank with short-liv'd flow'rs they spread,

Which soon must fade, and wither like the dead.
Arabian odours from the third diffuse
A grateful smoke, and weep in fragrant dew.
Above from heaps of gold bright colours stream,
And deeper purple shoots a sanguine gleam.

Inwoven on the pall, young Linus lay 70
In lonely woods, to mangling dogs a prey.
Heart-wounded at the sight, in anguish stands
Eurydice, and spreads her trembling hands;
Then turns her eyes, half dying with a groan,
For kindred miseries so like her own.

Arms, sceptres, jewels, on the dead they throw,
And sacrifice all grandeur to their woe.
As if the hero, deck'd with warlike spoil,
Was born in triumph to the fun'ral pile.
Yet as due rites with kind affection paid, 80
Can add some honours to the infant shade;
Hence rose magnificence, and solemn tears,
With presents suited to maturer years.

Long time with early hopes Lycurgus fed
A breed of coursers sacred to the dead.
A glitt'ring helm was safely plac'd apart,
And purple trappings of Sidonian art:
And consecrated spears (a deadly store),
Radiant and keen, as yet unstain'd with gore.
The pious mother thus, deceiv'd too late, 90
Like her fond spouse, reserv'd a crown of state,
And royal robes, o'erwrought with rising flow'rs;
The silent growth of solitary hours.

These and the rest at once, the furious fire
Dooms in distraction to the greedy fire.

Meanwhile, assembled by the seer's commands,
To raise the pile, crowd thick the Grecian bands,
From Nemeæ these, and Tempe's lofty crown,
Tumble whole heaps of crashing forests down:
Their airy brows the naked hills display, 100
And earth once more beholds the face of day.
Deep groan the groves: On rustling pinions rise
Birds after birds; the angry salvage flies.
Sacred through time, from age to age it stood,
A wide-spread, gloomy, venerable wood:
Older than man, and ev'ry sylvan maid,
Who haunts the grot, or skims along the glade.
Stretch'd o'er the ground the tow'ring oaks were
seen,

The foodful beech, and cypress ever green:
The nuptial elm, and mountain-holm entire,
The pitchy tree that feeds the fun'ral fire: 110
The resin soft, and solitary yew,
Forever dropping with unwholesome dew;
The poplar trembling o'er the silver flood,
The warrior ash that reeks in hostile blood,
Th' advent'rous fir that sails the vast profound,
And pine, fresh bleeding from th' odorous wound—
All at one time the nodding forests bend,
And with a crash together all descend.
Loud as when blust'ring Boreas issues forth,
To bring the sweeping whirlwind from the north:
Sudden and swift as kindling flames arise, 121
Float o'er the fields, and blaze unto the skies.
The sinking grove resounds with frequent groans,
Sylvanus starts, and hoary Pales moans,
Trembling and slow the guardian nymphs retire,
Or clasp the tree, and perish in the fire.

So when some chief (the city storm'd) commands
Revenge and plunder to his furious bands:
E'er yet he speaks the domes in ruin lay;
They strike, they level, seize, and bear away. 130

Sacred to heav'n and hell, the mourners rear
Two massy altars, pointing in the air.
The pious rites begin, in mournful strains
The music of the Phrygian pipe complains;
Whose pow'rful sounds th' unwilling ghosts obey,
And pale, and shiv'ring, mount the realms of day.

First Pelops taught these melancholy strains,
When Niobe's fond offspring prest the plains:
Six blooming youths, and six fair virgins fell,
Sent by fierce Cynthia to the shades of hell. 140

Incense and oil upon the pile they throw,
And mighty monarchs mighty gifts bestow.
High rais'd in air the mournful bier is borne,
Dejected chiefs Lycurgus' train adorn;
The female sex around the mother crowd,
And weep, and sob, and vent their griefs aloud:
Behind Hyppolyte's soft sorrows flow
Silent, and fast, in eloquence of woe.
Each heaving bosom draws a deeper sigh,
And the big passion bursts from ev'ry eye. 150
Thus while the crystal tears unbounded ran,
In piercing shrieks Eurydice began.

Ah! dearest child! amid these mournful dames
I never thought to give thee to the flames!
How could I dream of sorrows and of death,
In the first moments of thy infant breath?
How could I dread these bloody wars to see;
Or deem that Thebes should ever murder thee?

What sudden vengeance wing'd with wrath divine

Pursues me still, and curses all my line? 160
Yet Cadmus' sons in ease and plenty live,
Blest with each joy th' indulging pow'rs can give;
No mourning dames in sable weeds appear,
To bathe the last cold ashes with a tear.

Wretch that I was, too fondly to believe
A faithless slave, a wand'ring fugitive!
Pious she told the melancholy tale
With fair invention, pow'rful to prevail;
Is this that guardian of the Lemnian state,
Who snatch'd her father from the jaws of fate? 170

Ah no! herself the bloody furies join'd,
And vow'd like those, destruction to mankind!
Is this her care; to leave in woods alone
Her prince, nay more, an infant not her own?
Suppose through pity or neglect she stray'd,
(While my dear child lay trembling in the shade)
Unknowing of the monsters wild and vast,
Who haunt the gloomy groves, or dreary waste;
Each murmur'ing fount that quivers to the breeze,
Each dying gale that pants upon the trees, 180
Sudden by turns distract an infant's ears,
And death attends th' imaginary fears.

Hail thou dear infant! wretched, early ghost,
Murder'd by her who ought to love thee most.
Whose hands sustain'd thee, and whose music
charm'd,
Whose eye o'erfaw thee, and whose bosom warm'd:
Who dry'd thy cheeks with streams of chrystal
drown'd, [sound.

And taught thy voice to frame the fault'ring
Ungrateful wretch, may grief thy years consume,
And pains eternal bend thee to the tomb! 190

Tear her, ye warriors, tear her from my eyes,
Deaf to her vows, her penitence, or cries:
Deep in her bosom drive th' avenging dart,
To drink the blood that feeds her faithless heart.
In the same moment I'll resign my breath,
Sate with fury, and content in death!

She spake, and starting saw the Lemnian maid,
As in the silence of her soul she pray'd:
Sudden her rage rekindles at the view,
And trickling down her cheeks descends the drops of dew. 200

Bear, oh ye chiefs, this female curse away,
Who adds a horror to the fun'ral day,
Who with a smile profanes the matron's moan,
And triumphs in misfortunes not her own.
She said, and sinking drew a fainter sigh. [eye;
Rage stopp'd her voice, and grief o'erwhelm'd her
Thence slowly moving through the crowd she
By silent steps, in sullen discontent. [went

So when the holy priest with curious eyes,
Dooms some fair heifer to the sacrifice, 210
Or the gaunt lion bears her through the wood,
As down her side distils the life-warm blood:
The mother-beast dejected, and alone
Pours to the winds her lamentable moan,
With mournful looks she paces from the plain,
And often goes, and often turns again.

The father now unbare his rev'rend head;
His silver locks he scatters o'er the dead:
Then with a sigh, the venerable man
Thus to the parent of the gods began. 220

If Jove's almighty wisdom can deceive,
Curst is the man who fondly will believe!

These sacred hairs, long from the razor free,
I bore, a pious gift reserv'd for thee:
What time Opheltes' youthful cheeks resign
Their tender down, an off'ring at thy shrine.
In vain—the fullen priest refus'd my pray'r,
And scatt'ring winds dispers'd it all in air.
Tear them my fingers, tear them from my head,
The last sad office to the worthy dead! 230

Meanwhile the kindling brand awakes the fire,
Th' unwilling parents silently retire:
High-lifted shields, that intercept the light
In one dark circle, hide the mournful sight.
The flying em'ralsd crackle in the blaze,
And fiery rubies stream with sanguine rays.
In shining rills the trembling silver flows,
And clearer gold with flaming lustre glows.
In balmy clouds Arabia's odours rise,
To waft their grateful fragrance to the skies. 240

Rich urns of milk, tott'ring, their streams incline,
Mingling with blood, and ting'd with fable wine.
Sev'n mournful cohorts (as their chieftains lead)
With arms revers'd pace slowly round the dead;
Now moving to the left, enclose the pyre,
And scatter heaps of dust to sink the fire;
Thrice join their spears, thrice clash their founding shields; [the fields.

Four times the females shriek, and clamour fills
Remote from these, another fire they feed
With firstling victims of the woolly breed. 250
Intent in thought the pious augur stands,
Approves the rites, inspires the fainting bands:
Calmly dissembling in his anxious mind
Each sad presage of miseries behind.

Returning from the right with loud alarms,
Again the warriors beat their clatt'ring arms;
Shields, lances, helms, the sinking flames o'er-
spread,

A friend's last pledges to the warlike dead.
Full on the winds the swelling music floats,
And Nemæ's shades pour back the length'ning
notes. 260

So when the trumpeter with lab'ring breath
Shakes the wide fields, and sounds the charge of
The blood fermenting feels a gentle heat, [death:
Quick roll the eyes, and fast the pulses beat:
E'er yet their rage the martial god controuls,
Nor swells their nerves, nor rushes on their souls.

Now careful night in sober weeds array'd,
O'er the clear skies extends her dusky shade.
They bend the copious goblet o'er the pyre, 269
And quench with wine the yet remaining fire.

Nine times his course bright Lucifer had roll'd,
And ev'ning Vesper deck'd his rays with gold:
Now o'er the urn the sacred earth they spread,
And raise a monument to grace the dead.
Here in relieve the Lemnian virgin stands,
Who points the grateful spring to Grecia's bands:
There young Opheltes breathes his dying moan,
And seems to shiver, and turn pale in stone;
In waving spires the serpent floats along,
And rolls his eyes in death, and darts his fork'd
tongue. 280

By this, the pleas'd spectators in a row,
Throng the green circus, and enjoy the show.
Deep in the bosom of a vale it stood,
Sacred to sports, and overhung with wood:
A darker green its grassy surface crowns,
And smoothly swims the car along the downs.

Long e'er the dawn of morn the mingling throng
Spreads o'er the plain, and man bears man along:

(Not half such numbers crowd the sacred space,
Where yearly honours dead Palæmon grace;)
Confus'd delight! the fair, the gay, the sage, 291
And boastful youth, and deep-discerning age.

Twice fifty steers along the plains they drew,
As many mother-cows of fable hue;
As many heifers raise their youthful horns,
Whose front as yet, no blaze of white adorns.

High o'er the people, wrought with lively grace,
Shine the fair glories of their ancient race:
Each speaking figure seems to touch the soul,
And life and motion animate the whole.

Here lab'ring Hercules with anguish prest 300
The roaring lion to his manly breast.

Inspir'd with art th' historic figures rise,
And ev'n in sculpture live, and meet the eyes.

Here rev'rend Inachus extends his side
O'er the green margin of his silver tide:

Transform'd, behind him fearful lo stood,
And cropt the grass besides her father's flood;
She mixes with the herd her mournful cries,
And often turns, and watches Argus' eyes.

Her, from the Pharian coast indulging Jove 310
Transferr'd immortal, to the realms above:

Still in her fanes the fable Memphian bows,
And eastern Magi pay their early vows.

Here Tantalus amid the pow'rs divine
Lifts the deep goblet crown'd with sparkling wine:

Nor stands (as poets sing) in streams below,
Still curs'd with life, yet fated still to woe,

The wretch for ever pines, the streams for ever flow.

There Pelops lashes on with loosen'd reins
Neptune's fleet courfers o'er the smoking plains:

Behind his rival o'er the rapid steed 321
Hangs imminent—and drives with equal speed.

Acrysius here in thoughtful posture stands:
There brave Choræbus lifts his bleeding hands.

Here am'rous Jove descending as of old,
Impregnates Danae with a show'r of gold.

Her blushes Amyclone strives to hide,
Comprest by Neptune in the silver tide.

Alcmena there young Hercules admires,
As her head blazes with three lambent fires. 330

Here Belus' sons at Hymen's altars stand,
And join with hearts averse the friendly hand:

A faithless smile of ill-dissembled grace
Seem'd most to flatter in Egysthus' face:

As the calm villain with severe delight
Acts in his mind the murders of the night.

Now ev'ry bosom beats with hopes, or fear,
The clamours thicken, and the crowd draws near.

Inspire the muse, to sing each hero's deeds, 339
O pow'r of verse! and name, and gen'rous steeds.

Before, afar, Arion beats the plain;
Loose to the breeze high danc'd his floating mane:

Immortal steed! whom first th' earth-shaker's
hand

Tam'd to the lash, and drove along the strand:
Though restless as the wintery surges roll,

And furious still, and unsubdu'd of soul.
Mix'd with his watery steeds the god he bore

To Lybian Syrtes, or th' Ionian shore:
Swift flew the rapid car, and left behind

The noise of tempests, and the wings of wind. 350

To glory next great Hercules he drew,
 O'er hills, and vales, and craggy rocks he flew:
 Then to Adrastus' government was giv'n
 Th' immortal courier, and the gift of heav'n.
 The royal hand by due degrees reclaim'd,
 And length of years his stubborn spirit tam'd:
 Him now with many a wish and many a pray'r,
 Adrastus lends to Polynices' care;
 Shows him to urge his fiery soul along 359
 With tim'rous hand, and gentleness of tongue:
 The reins to guide, the circling lash to wield,
 And drive victorious o'er the dusty field.

So sad Apollo with a boding sigh
 Told his fond child the dangers of the sky:
 Careful the parent, such advice to give! [lieve!
 Could fate be chang'd, or headstrong youth be-

Th' Æbalian priest moves second o'er the plain,
 Who boasts his courfers of immortal strain:
 Sprung from fair Cyllarus in days of yore;
 (The guilty product of a stoll'n amour) 370
 When Castor griev'd in bitterness of soul,
 Where seas scarce flow beneath the Scythian pole.
 White were the steeds that drew him o'er the
 field,

White was his helm, his ribbands, and his shield.
 Next, bold Admetus whirling from above
 The sounding scourge, his female courfers drove:
 Nor strokes, nor blandishment their rage controuls,

They bound and swell with more than female souls,
 Sprung from the cloud-born Centaurs, such their force,

Their lustful heat, and fury in the course. 380

Then fair Hypsipile's bold offspring came,
 Two lovely twins, alike intent on fame,
 Their steeds, their chariots, and their arms the same.

(This Thoas call'd, the name his grandfire bore;
 And Euneos that, to sail from shore to shore)
 Each wish'd the glorious victory his own,
 If not—his brother to be blest alone.

Last Chromis and Hippodamus succeed,
 Each checks the reins, and each inspires his steed:
 Alike with martial eminence they shone, 390
 Ænomaus' this, and that Alcides' son;
 One drove the courfers e'er at Pisa bred,
 And one the savage steeds of Diomed.

Whence first they start, a stony fragment stands,
 Of old, a limit to contiguous lands.

An aged oak of leaves and branches bare,
 Presents a goal to guide the circling car.
 Their distance such, as the wing'd arrow flies
 Thrice from the bow sent hissing through the skies.

Meanwhile, high-thron'd amid th' Anian quire
 Divine Apollo strikes the silver lyre;
 He sung the wars on Phlegra's fatal plain,
 And Python o'er Castalia's fountain slain.
 He sung what order rules the world on high,
 Who bids the thunder roar, and lightning fly:
 Who feeds the stars, or gave the winds to blow:
 What springs eternal swell the seas below;
 Who spread the clouds, who rolls the lamp of light

O'er heav'n's blue arch, or wraps the world in night.

Here ceas'd th' harmonious god, his lyre he laid
 With decent care beneath a laureat shade; 411

Then in rich robes his beauteous limbs he dress'd:
 A starry zone hung blazing o'er his breast.

Sudden a shout confus'dly strikes his ears—
 He bends his awful eyes, the crowd appears.
 Each chief he knows, and honours each, but most
 The * priest, and † ruler of Thessalia's host.
 What pow'r (he cries) has fir'd with thirst of fame
 These two adorers of Apollo's name?

Equally dear and good, alike renown'd
 For piety, alike with favours crown'd. 420

When once a swain the lowing herds I drove,
 (Such was the doom of fate, and wrath of Jove)

Still did Admetus' pious altars blaze,
 And every temple rung with hymns of praise;

While at my shrine Amphiaras stands,
 And lifts his eyes, and spreads his trembling hands;

O dearest, best of men; alas no more—
 Black fate impends, and all thy joys are o'er.

Soon must the Theban earth in funder rend
 Her opening jaws, and thou to hell descend! 430

Admetus' life to distant times shall last,
 And ev'ry year add glories to the past:

Unknowing of repentance, cares, and strife,
 These hands shall guide him to the verge of life.

Each bird of omen told the fatal day—
 He said, and weeping turn'd his eyes away:

Then sudden from Olympus' airy height,
 To Nemæ's shade precipitates his flight;

Swift as a sudden flash of lightning flies,
 Bending he shoots adown the shining skies: 440

Ev'n while on earth the god pursues his way,
 Behind, aloft the streams of glory play,

Dance on the winds, or in a blaze decay.

Now in his helm impartial Prothous throws
 The flying lots, and as the lots dispose,

Around him rang'd in beauteous order came
 Each ardent youth, a candidate for fame.

Here wild mistrust, and jealousies appear,
 And pale surprise, and self-suspecting fear:

Restless impatience, cold in every part, 450
 And a sad dread that seems to sink the heart.

There shouts of triumph rend the vaulted sky,
 And fame and conquest brighten ev'ry eye.

"Th' impatient courfers pant in ev'ry vein,
 "And pawning seem to beat the distant plain:

The burning foam descends, the bridles ring,"
 And from the barrier-bounds in thought they

spring;

"The vales, the floods appear already crost,
 "And ere they start, a thousand steps are lost."

T' exalt their pride, a crowd of servants deck 460
 Their curling manes, and stroke the shining neck.

Instant (the signal given), the rival throng
 Starts sudden with a bound—and shoots along.

Swift as a vessel o'er the waters flies,
 Swift as an arrow hisses through the skies:

Swift as a flame devours the crackling wood,
 Swift as the headlong torrents of a flood.

Now in one cloud they vanish from the eye,
 Nor see, nor know their rivals as they fly:

They turn the goal: again with rapid pace 470
 The wheels roll round, and blot their former trace;

Now on their knees they steer a bending course,
 Now hang impatient o'er the flying horse.

From groaning earth the mingling clamours rise, Confusion fills their ears, and darkness blinds their eyes.

* Amphiaras, and † Admetus.

Instinct with prescience, or o'erawed by fear,
 Arion feels an unknown charioteer
 Pois'd on the reins; to sudden thought restor'd,
 He dreads the fury of his absent lord:
 Enrag'd now runs at random, and disdains 480
 To bear a stranger: wonder fills the plains.
 All think the steed too eager for the prize;
 The steed breathes vengeance, from the driver
 flies,
 And seeks his master round with wishful eyes.

The next, though mighty far the next, succeeds
 Amphiarus with his snow-white steeds:
 Close by his side Admetus whirls along,
 Euneos and Thoas join the flying throng:
 Next Chromis and Hippodamus appear,
 Who wage a dreadful conflict in the rear: 490
 Skill'd of themselves, in vain they urge the chase,
 (Their steeds too heavy for so swift a race)
 Hippodamus flew first, and full behind
 Impatient Chromis blows the sultry wind.

Admetus now directs the side-long horse
 To turn the goal, and intercept the course:
 His equal art the priest of Phœbus tries,
 The goal he brushes, as his chariot flies;
 While mad Arion wanders o'er the plain, 499
 Nor minds the race, nor hears the curbing rein.
 Unable to controul, the trembling chief
 Sits sadly silent, and indulges grief:
 Pleas'd with his liberty, the sea-born horse Springs with a bound, and thunders o'er the course:

Loud shouts the multitude; in wild debate
 Of fears and terrors Polynices fate,
 Flings up the reins, and waits th' event of fate.

So spent with toils, and gasping after breath,
 Pants the pale sailor in the arms of death;
 In sad despair gives ev'ry labour o'er, 510
 And marks the skies and faithless winds no more.

Now horse with horse, to chariot chariot clos'd,
 Wheels clash'd with wheels, and chief to chief oppos'd.

War, war it seem'd! and death ten thousand ways--
 So dreadful is the sacred lust of praise!
 Each chief by turns his panting courfers fires,
 With praise now pleases, now with rage inspires.
 By fair address Admetus soothes along
 Iris the swift, and Pholœe the strong.

Amphiarus hastens with a blow 520
 Fierce Aschetos to rush before the foe,
 And Cynus whiter than the new-fall'n snow.
 With vows and pray'rs Hippodamus excites
 Slow-moving Calydon, renown'd in fights:
 Strimon encourag'd by bold Chromis flies,
 And swift Æchion starts at Euneos' cries:
 And fair Podarce fleck'd with purple stains,
 By Thoas summon'd, beats the sounding plains.
 In silence Polynices drives alone,
 Sighs to himself, and trembles to be known. 530

Three times the smoking car with rapid pace
 Had turn'd the goal, the fourth concludes the race.

Fast and more fast the panting courfers blow,
 And streams of sweat from ev'ry member flow.

Now fortune first the crown of conquest
 brings,
 (Suspending in mid air her trembling wings)
 In act to hurl Admetus to the plain,
 Revengeful Thoas gives up all the rein;

Hippodamus survey'd the fraud from far:
 Full in its course he met the driving car, 540
 Loud clash'd the wheels; Hippodamus withdrew,
 To turn the chariot ardent Chromis flew
 Instant before, in angry fight oppos'd,
 Chief strove with chief, to chariot chariot clos'd.
 In vain th' impatient courfers urge along,
 Lock'd in th' embrace indissolubly strong.

So when the summer winds in silence sleep,
 And drowsy Neptune stills the watery deep:
 O'er the clear verdant wave extended lies
 Th' unmoving vessel, till the gales arise. 550

Again the warriors strive, the fields resound:
 Hippodamus, all sudden with a bound
 Shock'd—from his chariot tumbled to the ground.
 The Thracian courfers (but their chief withstood)
 Spring to devour his limbs, and drink his blood:
 Instant the gen'rous victor turn'd away,
 And gain'd more glory though he lost the day.

Meanwhile the god, who gilds th' ethereal space
 Descends, himself a partner of the race:

(Just where the steeds their stretching shade extend,
 And the long labours of the circus end) 561

A Gorgon's head aloft in air he bore,
 Horrid with snakes, and stain'd with human gore:
 One ghastly look were able to dismay
 The steeds of Mars, or those that lead the day:
 Ev'n hell's grim guardian might surcease to roar
 And furies fear, unknown to fear before.

Sudden Arion ey'd the sight from far,
 And loudly snorting stopp'd the driving car:
 Cold darts of ice shot trilling through his blood,
 His fearful flesh all trembled as he stood: 571

Abruptly shock'd, and mindless of the rein,
 The Aonian hero tumbled to the plain;
 Again recover'd, fleetier than the wind
 Arion flies, and leaves his chief behind.
 Beside the prostrate chief, the rival throng
 Obliquely bending, swiftly rush'd along.
 Slow from the dust he rose, and sadly went
 Through the long crowd in sullen discontent.

O happy hour! had fate but deign'd to close 580
 Thy eyes in death; the period of our woes!
 Thee Thebes should honour, and her tyrant shed
 Some tears in public to bewail the dead.
 Larissa's groves should fall, to raise thy pyre:
 And Nemeæ's woods augment the funeral fire.
 All Greece a nobler monument should raise
 Than this, now sacred to Opheltes' praise.

Furious the prophet drove with rapid pace,
 Sure of the prize, yet second in the race:
 Before, afar the sea-born courser drew 590
 His empty chariot rattling as he flew.

Yet still the prophet thunders o'er the plain,
 Eager of praise, amaz'd, enrag'd,—in vain;
 The pow'r of wisdom more than mortal strong,
 Swells ev'ry nerve to lash the steeds along:
 Instinct with rage divine his steeds renew
 The rapid labour bath'd in streams of dew.

The glowing axle kindles as they fly,
 And drifts of rising dust involve the sky.
 Earth opening seems to groan, (a fatal sign!) 600
 Still they rush on, advancing in a line:

Now with redoubled swiftness Cynus flies,
 But partial Neptune the whole palm denies:
 Arion won the race, the prophet bore the prize.

A massy bowl (the pledge design'd to grace
 The gen'rous chief victorious in the race)

Two youths present him: antique was the mold,
Blazing with gems, and rough with rising gold:
In this, Alcides each revolving night
Was wont to drown the labours of the fight: 610
Grav'd on the sides was seen the dreadful fray
When brutal Centaurs snatch'd the bride away.
With living terrors stare the chiefs around,
These aim the dart, and those receive the wound:
Each in distorted postures heaves for breath,
And seems to threaten in the pangs of death.

A costly vesture was reserv'd to grace
Admetus, next in merit as in place;
Embroider'd figures o'er the texture shine,
And Tyrian purple heightens the design. 620
Here pale and trembling with the wintery air,
Leander stands, an image of despair.

Now bending from the beach, he seems to glide
With eyes up-lifted through the rolling tide;
Aloft, alone the melancholy dame
Eyes the rough waters, and extends the flame.
Half-weeping Polynices takes his prize,
A beauteous handmaid with celestial eyes.

August rewards are destin'd next to grace
The spritely youth contending in the race. 630
A blameless sport! and sacred sure the praise
To grace a festival in peaceful days:
Nor yet unuseful in th' embattl'd plain
When death is certain, and resistance vain.

First cheerful Idas in the lists appears,
Idas, a lovely boy in blooming years
(Idas who late his honour'd temples bound
With palms that flourish'd on th' Olympian
ground)

Loud shouts each chief that from high Elis leads
His native train, and Pisa's watery meads: 640
Then Phædimus proclaim'd in Isthmian games,
And Alcon first of Sicyonian names;
Next aged Dymas rose, whose youthful speed
Surpass'd the swiftness of the flying steed:
And last in infamous disorder came
A clam'rous multitude unknown to fame.

But ev'ry voice cheers Atalanta's son,
And ev'ry eye devours him ere they run.
Lives there a warrior in the world of fame,
Who never heard of Atalanta's name? 650
Like Cynthia's self she seem'd, a sylvan grace:
Matchless alike in beauty or the race.
The mother's glories all their thoughts employ,
And raise expectance from the lovely boy.
He too in speed outstrips the wings of wind,
As through the lawns he drives the panting hind:
Or when he catches sudden with a bound
The flying jav'lin ere it touch the ground.

The modest youth unbinds with decent care
His damask vesture dancing to the air: 660
Then by degrees unveils to public view
His snowy limbs like marble, vein'd with blue.
His rosy cheeks that glow'd with warmth before,
His tresses wav'd in ringlets please no more;
A thousand charms appear! in stupid gaze
The crowd devours him, silent with amaze.
Conscious he stands, his head declining down,
And blushes oft; and chides them with a frown:
Decent confusion! mindful of the toil 669
He bathes his shining limbs in streams of oil;
Alike the chiefs——Intent, th' encircling host
Admires 'em all, Parthenopeus most.

So when the night in solemn silence reigns,

And one clear blue o'erspreads th' ethereal plains:
The glittering stars with living splendours glow,
And dance, and tremble on the seas below;
High o'er them all exalted Hesper rolls,
Itself a sun, and gilds the distant poles.

The next in beauty, as in speed appears
Fair Idas in the strength of youthful years: 680
A party-colour'd down but just began
To shade his chin the promise of a man.

A signal sounds. The ready racers start
Double their speed, and summon all their art.
Low at each step their straining knees they bend,
Then springing with a bound, again ascend,
Swifter than thought; nor seem to run, but fly,
Stretch on the winds, half-vanish'd from the eye.

Now side by side, or breast to breast they close,
While each alike by turns outstrips his foes. 690
Scarce half so swiftly o'er the Nemean plains
Just now, the courser pour'd with loos'ned reins.
Each like an arrow from the Parthian yew
Sent with full force, along the circus flew.

So when a tim'rous herd of list'ning deer
The roaring lion hears, or seems to hear:
(What time the lordly savage haunts the wood
And longs to bathe his thirsty jaws in blood)
Close and more close they join, a trembling train,
And wildly stare, and scour along the plain. 700

Yet furious still, Parthenopeus flies;
Him step by step impatient Idas plies,
And pants aloud with vengeance in his eyes;
Now hanging o'er, his hov'ring shade is seen,
That lengthens still, and floats along the green:
And sudden now, by unperceiv'd degrees
Full on his neck he blows the sultry breeze.
Next Phedimus and aged Dymus past
Along the circus, Alcon came the last. 710

As the fair offspring of the sylvan grace
With matchless swiftness speeds along the race:
His golden tresses wav'd in curls, behind
Flow loosely down, and dance upon the wind:
(These from a child with pious hopes he bore
Sacred to her who treads the * Delian shore;
What time from Thebe's distant plain he came
Renown'd for conquests of immortal fame:
Too fondly pious! in a Theban urn
Soon must thou sleep, ah, never to return!) 720
These vengeful Idas saw with ardent eyes:
Resolv'd by force or fraud to obtain the prize;
Sudden he stretch'd his impious arm, and drew
Supine on earth the stripling, as he flew:
Then starting reach'd the goal, and claim'd the prize.

Arms! arms! aloud th' Arcadian nation cries:
Vengeance at once they vow, or else prepare
To leave the circus and renounce the war.
Tumultuous murmurs echo through the crowd,
Those praise the fraud, and these detest aloud. 730

Slow-rising from the plains the youth appears,
His eyes half angry, and half drown'd with tears,
He bends his head, the tears in silence flow;
A mournful image, beautiful in woe!
Now beats his bosom, frantic with despair:
And rends the ringlets of his golden hair.

A busy murmur deafens ev'ry ear,
Nor yet the crowd the royal judgment hear.

At last Adrastus rose with awful grace,
And thus bespoke the rivals in the race. 740
Cease gen'rous youths! once more your fortunes try,

In sep'rate paths each starting from the eye.

So spake the king, and sudden from the view,

In sep'rate paths the ready racers flew.

But first th' Arcadian youth with lifted eyes

Thus sent his soul in whispers to the skies.

Queen of the silver bow, and wood-land glades;

The heaven's fair light, and empress of the shades:

Sacred to thee alone, with decent care

I nurs'd these curls of long-descending hair; 750

At thy desires I fell, yet hear my pray'r!

If e'er my mother pleas'd thee in the chase,

If e'er I pleas'd thee—banish my disgrace;

Nor let these omens prophesy my fall

(As sure they must) beneath the Theban wall!

So pray'd the youth. The goddess heard his pray'r,

Rapid he shot along, half poiz'd in air:

Fast and more fast the flying fields withdrew;

Scarce rose the dust beneath him as he flew.

Shouting, he reach'd the goal, with transport fir'd

Soon sought Adrastus, and his right requir'd.

Panting and pale he seiz'd the palm. At hand

To close the game the ready prizes stand.

Th' Arcadian youth a brals-hoof'd courser gain'd:

A buckler fraudulent Idas next obtain'd,

But Lycian quivers for the rest remain'd.

Adrastus next demands what chiefs prepare

To whirl the massy discus through the air.

A herald bending with the burthen, threw

Th' enormous circle down in public view. 770

Starts every Grecian speechless with surprise;

Much wondering at the weight and shapeless size.

First two Achaians round the labour came

With ardent Phlegyas, candidates for fame:

An Arcarnanian next accepts the toil,

And three brave chieftains from Ephyre's soil,

With numbers more—but eager of renown,

Sudden Hippomedon flings thundering down

A disk of double weight; amaz'd they stand,

The vast orb rings, and shakes the trembling land.

Warriors (he cries) in fighting fields renown'd,

Whose arms must strike Thebe's bulwarks to the ground:

On tasks like these your mighty prowess try,—
Boastful he spoke, and whirl'd it up the sky.

Amaz'd each chief the wond'rous cast admires,
And conscious of th' event betimes retires.

Pisæan Phlegyas only keeps the field,

With great Menestheus, yet untaught to yield:

Brave warriors each, too noble to disgrace

By one mean act the glories of their race. 790

The rest inglorious leave the lifted ground,

And tremble to survey th' enormous round.

First Phlegyas rose the mighty toil to try:

Dumb was each voice, attentive ev'ry eye;

He rolls the quoit in dust with prudent care,

And poises oft, and marks its course in air.

Ev'n from a child, (where old Alphæus leads

His mazy stream through Pisa's lowly meads)

Not only when with mighty chiefs he strove

At sacred games to please Olympian Jove: 800

Thus with full force the massy weight he threw

Far o'er the stream, half-shaded as it flew.

At first he marks the skies and distant plain,

Then summons all his strength from every vein.

Couch'd on his knees the pond'rous orb he swung

High o'er his head, along the air it sung.

Now wasting by degrees, with hollow sound

Fell heavily, and sunk beneath the ground.

Fond of his art and strength in days of yore,

Well pleas'd he stands, and waits th' event once more: [praise.

Loud shout the Greeks, and dwell on Phlegyas'

Hippomedon with scorn the chief surveys. 812

Some nobler arm the pond'rous orb must throw

With care, directly in a line below.

But fortune soon his mighty hopes withstood,

Fortune still envious to the brave or good!

Alas, can man confront the pow'rs on high?

While distant fields are measur'd in his eye,

Just when his arm he stretch'd at full extent:

Couch'd on one knee, his side obliquely bent. 820

Struck by some force unseen, th' enormous round

Dropt from his hand, and idly prints the ground.

Much griev'd the pitying host, yet griev'd not all:

Some inly smil'd to see the discus fall.

Next, sage Menestheus stands prepar'd to fling

The disk, and rolls it in the dusty ring:

Intent of mind he marks its airy way,

And much implores the progeny of May.

Well-aim'd it flew half o'er the cirque; at last

Heavy it fell. An arrow mark'd the cast. 830

Slow rose Hippomedon, and e'er he rose

Much weigh'd the fate and fortune of his foes.

He pois'd and rear'd the mighty orb on high;

Swung round his arm, and whirl'd it through the sky,

Forth-springing with the cast. Aloft it sung

Far o'er the mark where er'ft Menestheus flung:

And o'er those hills with grassy verdure crown'd,

Whose airy summits shade the circus round—

There sunk, and sinking shook the trembling ground.

So Polyphemus more than mortal strong,

Hurl'd a huge rock to crush th' Ulyssæan throng:

Blind as he was, the vengeful weight he threw,

The vessel trembled and the waters flew.

Soon good Adrastus rises, to repay

With sumptuous gifts the labours of the fray.

Safe for Hippomedon apart was roll'd

A tyger's skin, the paws o'erwrought with gold.

His Gnosian bows and darts Menestheus took;

Then thus to Phlegyas with a mournful look

He said: This sword, unhappy chief, receive;

(A boon so just Hippomedon might give:) 851

This sword which once immortal honours gain'd,

Which sav'd Pelægus, and his pow'r maintain'd.

A warlike toil Adrastus next demands,

In iron gloves to sheath their hardy hands:

First Capaneus prepar'd for combat stands;

A mighty giant, large, and tow'ring high,

Dreadful in fight, and hideous to the eye.

Around his wrists the hard bull-hides he binds,

And vaunts his strength, and deals his blows in winds: 860

Stand forth some chief, he cries (if such there be,

Who dares oppose an enemy like me!)

Yet might some Theban sink beneath my blow;

Glorious and sweet is vengeance on a foe.

So spake the chief. Half-trembling with amaze

In speechless horror all the circle gaze.

At last Alcidimas, with gen'rous ire
Sprung forth, unask'd. The Doric bands admire.
All but his friends. They knew the daily care
Which Pollux us'd, to train him to the war. 870
(He taught him first to bind the gauntlets round
His nervous wrists, and aim the crashing wound:
Oppos'd in fight, he heav'd him high, or prest
The youth loud panting on his naked breast.)

Him Capaneus survey'd with scornful eyes,
Insults his years, and claims a nobler prize.
Provok'd, he turns to fight. Each warrior stands
At full extent, and lifts his iron hands.
Well temper'd casques their hardy brows surround,
To break at least the fury of the wound. 880

This tow'rd like Tytius on the Stygian shore,
When the fierce vultures cease to drink his gore:
So high in air his spreading shoulders rise,
So swell his muscles, and so flame his eyes;
That at his side in blooming youth appears,
Yet promis'd wonders from maturer years;
The favours of the crowd alike succeed
On either side: none wish'd the chiefs to bleed.

Low'ring at first they met, nor silence broke,
Each lifts his arm, and only aims the stroke. 890
Some moments thus they gaz'd in wild surprise,
A hasty fury sparkled in their eyes;
Now conscious fear succeeds. The chiefs essay
Their arms, and slowly first provoke the fray.

This on nice art and diffidence relies,
That on mere courage, and stupendous size;
Void of all fear, and without conduct brave,
He wastes that strength himself has pow'r to save:

Still blindly drives where fury leads the way,
And storms, and falls the victor and the prey. 900
With steadfast glances this surveys his foe,
And either shuns or wards th' impending blow:
Now lowly bends (his elbow o'er him spread)
The stroke impetuous sings above his head.
Now nearer draws, the more he seems to fly;
So much his motion varies from his eye!
Now with full force he aims a pond'rous blow,
And tow'ring high o'er shades his mighty foe.
Thus in some storm the broken billows rise 909
Round the vast rock, and thunder to the skies.

Once more with wary footsteps wheeling round,
Full on his front he deals a mortal wound:
Crashing it falls—unfelt the trickling blood
Spreads o'er his helmet in a crimson flood.
A sudden whisper murmurs round; alone
To Capaneus the cause remains unknown.
At last he lifts his hand on high, the gore
Forth-welling fast, distains his castus o'er.
Grief swells his heart, and vengeance and disdain—
So foams the lion, monarch of the plain: 920
And loudly roaring with indignant pride,
Gnaws the barb'd jay'lin griding in his side:
Now springs with rage; supine along the ground
Pants the bold youth whose hand infix'd the
wound.

Fast and more fast his lifted arms he throws
Around his head, and doubles blows on blows.
Part waste in air, part on the castus fall
With mighty force; his foe returns 'em all.
Still seems to fear him with dissembling eyes,
Yet still persists, and combats, while he flies. 930
Panting they reel; the youth retreats more slow,
The weary giant scarcely aims a blow,

They sink at once—so sailors on the main
Who long have toil'd through adverse waves in vain, [more,

All drop their hands. The signal sounds once
Again they start, and stretch the lab'ring oar.

Thus rose the chiefs, with recollected might
Rush'd Capaneus like thunder to the fight.
Low bends Alcidimas with watchful eyes:
Short of his aim the giant o'er him flies;
Up starts the youth and as he stagger'd round 940
Clasp'd firm his neck, and bow'd him to the ground.
As rising from th' inglorious plain contends
Fierce Capaneus, a second blow descends
Full on his head: beneath the stroke he bent;
The youth turn'd pale, and trembled at th' event,
Loud shout the Greeks: the shore and forest rings.

Then thus in haste exclaims the king of kings.
(As from the ground the furious Argive rose,
And vow'd and aim'd intolerable blows) 949
Seize him, ye chiefs, his bloody hands restrain,
Give all the palm, but lead him from the plain.
Haste, see, he raves! ah, tear him from my eyes,
He lives, he rises, the Laconian dies!

He said. Hippomedon, and Tydeus rose:
Scarce both their hands restrain his mighty blows.
Then thus they spoke. The prize is thine, forgive.
'Tis double fame to bid the vanquish'd live;
A friend, and our ally—he storms the more,
Rejects the prize, and thus devoutly swore.
By all this blood, at present my disgrace: 960
These hands shall crush that more than female face:
These hands shall dash him headlong to the plain—
To Pollux then he weeps, but weeps in vain,
He said. By force they turn'd his steps away.
Stubborn he still persists, nor yields the day.
Far off in secret, the Laconian host
Smile at his fury, and their hero boast.

Meanwhile with conscious virtue Tydeus burns,
Renown and praise inflame his heart by turns:
Swift in the race he still the guerdon bore, 970
Now tof'd the discus, now the gauntlets wore;
But most for Pales' active arts renown'd,
To hurl his foe supine, along the ground.
By Hermes tutor'd, on th' Cretan plain,
He made whole nations bite the dust in vain.

Full terrible he look'd. For arms he wore
The savage trophies of a mountain-boar,
Once Calydonia's dread! the bristly hide [pride.
Broad o'er his shoulders hung with barb'rous
Unbound, he flings it down, then waits his foes.
Besides him tow'ring, huge Agylleus rose, 981
A monstrous giant, dreadful to mankind;
Yet weak he seem'd, his limbs were loosely join'd.
Low Tydeus was. What nature there deny'd,
Strong nerves, and mighty courage well supply'd;
For nature never since the world began,
Lodg'd such a spirit in so small a man!

Soon as their shining limbs are bath'd in oil,
Down rush the heroes to the wrestling toil.
Deform'd with dust (their arms at distance spread)
Each on his shoulder half reclines his head. 991

Now bending 'till he almost touch'd the plain,
Tydeus the giant heav'd, but heav'd in vain,
The mountain-cypress thus, that firmly stood
From age to age, the empress of the wood,

By some strong whirlwind's sudden blast declin'd,
Bends arching down, and nods before the wind:
The deep roots tremble till the gulf blows o'er,
And then she rises, stately as before.

So vast Agylleus scarcely mov'd below, 1000
Hangs imminent upon th' Ætolian foe. [sound,
Breasts, shoulders, thighs, with mighty strokes re-
And all appears an undistinguish'd wound.
On tiptoe rais'd, their heads obliquely bent,
Each hangs on each, stretch'd out at full extent.

Not half so bloody, or with half such rage,
Two furious monarchs of the herd engage.
Apart the milk-white heifer views the fight,
And waits to crown the victor with delight. 1009
Their chests they gore, the mighty shock resounds;
Love swells their hate, and heals the gaping wounds.

So shaggy bears in strict embraces roll, [soul.
And from each corse squeeze forth th' unwilling
Thus Tydeus storm'd; nor heats nor toils al-
His furious strength, or mitigate his rage, [suage
Agylleus pants aloud, nor scarce contends;
Black'ned with dust a stream of sweat descends.
Tydeus press'd on, and seem'd to aim a blow
Full at his neck: the force was meant below
Where well-knit nerves the knees firm strength supply; 1020

Short of their reach, his hands the blow deny.
He sinks; o'er him, like some vast mountain fell
Agylleus, and half squeez'd his soul to hell.

So when th' Iberian swain in search of oar
Descends, and views the light of heav'n no more:
If some strong earthquake rocks the mould'ring
ground,
(High o'er him hung) down rush the ruins round;
Deep under earth his batter'd carcase lies,
Nor breathes its spirit to congenial skies.

Full of disdain Ætolian Tydeus rose; 1030
No peace, no bounds his fierce resentment knows:
Swift from th' inglorious hold he springs like wind,
And circles round, then firmly fix'd behind.
His hand embrac'd his side, his knees surround
The giant's knees, and bend 'em to the ground.

Nought boots resistance now. Agylleus makes
One more essay. That moment Tydeus takes,
And rears him high. The mingling shouts arise,
And loud applause runs rattling through the skies.

So Hercules, who long had toil'd in vain, 1040
Heav'd huge Anthëus from the Lybian plain;
Erect in air th' expiring savage hung, [sprung,
Nor touch'd the kindred earth, from whence he Long Tydeus held him thus. At length he found

The point of time, and hurl'd him to the ground
Side-long—Himself upon the giant lies,
And grasps his neck and firmly locks his thighs.

Prone o'er th' inglorious dust, Agylleus quakes
Half-dead: his shame alone resistance makes:
Then rose at last, and stagg'ring through the Slowly he trail'd his feeble legs along. [throng

When Tydeus thus. (His nobler hand sustain'd
The palm, his life the warlike gifts he gain'd:)
What though my blood o'erflow'd yon guilty
ground,

When singly arm'd, whole numbers press'd me
round;

(So prov'd all contracts with the Theban name,
Their honour such) yet Tydeus lives the same.
He spoke, and speaking sent the prize away,
Aside, a breast-plate for the vanquish'd lay.

Others in arms their manly limbs enclose; 1060
To combat Epidaurian Agreus rose:
Him with the shining blade the Theban waits,
An exile still by unrelenting fates.

Then thus Adrastus. Gen'rous youths give o'er;

Preserve all rage: and thirst for hostile gore.
Ye Gods! what slaughter and what combats call;
Then waste your fury, Thebes demands it all!
But you, O prince! a kinsman, and our friend!
Whose cause such numbers with their lives defend:
For whom, our natives, towns and countries lay,
Unpeopled half, to other foes a prey; 1071
Trust not th' event of fight; nor bleed, to please
Th' inhuman hopes of base Etheocles!

Avert it heav'n! the ready chiefs obey'd.
Their brave attempt a glitt'ring helm repaid.

Howe'er in sign of conquest and renown,
He bids the warriors Polynices crown
With wreaths, and hail him victor—no portent,
(So will'd the sisters) prophecy'd the event.

Him too the chiefs with kind persuasions pray
To rise, and close the honours of the day: 1081
(And lest one victory be lost) to throw
The missile lance, or bend the Lycian bow.
Well-pleas'd Adrastus to the plain descends
In pomp, his steps a youthful crowd attends.
Behind, a squire the royal quiver bore,
Deep fill'd with shafts, a formidable store.

'Tis plain. Shall man deny? Each human cause
Proceeds unseen from heav'n's eternal laws.
All fate appear'd: the chiefs perversely blind
Neglect the sign, nor see th' event behind. 1091
We deem from chance unerring omens flow;
While fate draws near, and aims a surer blow.

By this the monarch strain'd the bending yew:
Full on its mark the feather'd weapon flew,
Nor enter'd there. Th' impassive ash resounds:
Again with double force the shaft rebounds,
In the same line wing'd back its airy way,
Then prone on earth before Adrastus lay. 1099

Each reasons, as his wayward thoughts decree;
These think the shaft rebounded from the tree;
And those, that winds with unresisted force
Drove clouds on clouds, to intercept its course.
Meanwhile th' event and dreadful omen lies
Deep wrapt in night, nor seen by human eyes.
One chief in safety must return alone,
Through woes, and blood, and dangers yet unknown.

NOTES UPON THE SIXTH THEBAID OF STATIUS.

MR. Dryden, in his excellent preface to the Eneid, takes occasion to quarrel with Statius, and calls the present book an ill-timed and unjudicious Episode. I wonder so severe a remark could pass from that gentleman, who was an admirer of our author even to superstition. I own I can scarce forgive myself, to contradict so great a poet, and so good a critic; tantum enim virorum ut admiratio maxima, ita censura difficilis. However, the present case may admit of very alleviating circumstances. It may be replied in general, that the design of this book was to give a respite to the main action, introducing a mournful, but pleasant variation from terror to pity. It is also highly probable, that Statius had an eye to the funeral obsequies of Polydore and Anchises, mentioned in the third and fifth books of Virgil. We may also look upon them as a prelude, opening the mind by degrees to receive the miseries and horror of a future war. This is intimated in some measure by the derivation of the word Archemorus.

Besides the reasons above mentioned, we have a fine opportunity of remarking upon chief of the heroes who must make a figure hereafter; this is represented to the eye in a lively sketch that distributes to each person his proper lights, with great advantage.

It must certainly be an infinite pleasure to peruse the most ancient piece of history now extant, excepting that in holy scripture. This remark must be understood of the action of the Thebaid only, which Statius, without question, faithfully recited from the most authentic chronicles in his own age. The action of the Iliad and Odyssey happened several years after. This is evident from Homer's own words. Agamemnon, in the 4th Iliad, recites with great transport the expedition of Tydeus: and Ulysses mentions the story of Jocasta (or Epicaste, as he calls her) in a very particular manner. It is in his descent to hell, Odyssey XI.

Μητέρα δ' Οιδιπόδαο ἴδον, καλὴν Ἐπικάστην,
 ἥ μιν γὰρ ἔργον ἔρεξεν αἰδομένησι νόειο,
 Γηραιήν τ' αὖ Νέη. ὃ δ' ὦν παῖρ' ἐξαναριζας Γῆμεν.
 Ἄλλ' ὃ μιν ἐν Θήβῃ πολυηράτω ἄλγιστα πάσχων
 Καδμείων ἦνατσε, θεῶν ὀλοὰς διὰ βελάς, ἥ δ' ἔβη εἰς αἶδαο πυλάριον κρατεροῖο
 ὦν ἀχρῖ σχομένη, τῷ δ' ἄλγιστα κάλλιπ' ὀπίσσω
 Πολλὰ μάλ', ὅσα τὲ μητρὸς ἐρίννευς ἐκτε-λήσει.

The antiquity of the Thebaid may be considered also in another view. As the poet was obliged to conform the manners of his heroes to the time of action, we in justice ought not to be so much shocked with those insults over the dead which run through all the battles. This softens a little the barbarity of Tydeus, who expired gnawing the head of his enemy; and the impiety of Capaneus, who was thunderstruck while he blasphemed Jupiter. Whoever reads the books of Joshua and Judges will find about those times the same savage spirit of insolence and fierte.

Ver. 4. The Nemeæan Games.] I beg to be excused from giving a long account of the Nemeæan games. What the world calls learning, differs very little from pedantry; and I am sensible many an honest man may deserve that imputation when he means no manner of harm: so much harder it is to conceal knowledge, than first get it. The best and most ancient information now extant is to be collected from Pindar's odes in general. However, I must just take notice of a funeral oration spoken in honour of Archemorus, as it is mentioned by Clemens Alexandrinus, in his Admonit. ad Gentes.

Ver. 23. The youthful sailors thus with early care
 Their arms experience——

It is worth while here to take notice of Statius's similes in general. They are sometimes proper, but not often: a common fault with most young authors, who can reject nothing; though a more judicious writer at the same time would either suppress the thought, or at most content himself with a metaphor. I am apt to think similes must seldom be used, except they convey to the mind some very pleasing, or strong piece of painting. For all similes are descriptions (or pictures) whose only beauty proceeds from an excellence in the imagery. In these cases, painting must always be consulted.

Another oversight in Statius, is want of purity in the circumstances: but this is owing to the irregularity of his genius, which was above insisting upon particulars, and gave only some bold strokes of likeness.

If a translator can leave out such similes (or other passages) in Statius as are not proper, without violating the context: or if he can supply any of their defects in a very short compass, I think he ought. Though these liberties are not to be taken with more correct writers.

Ver. 31. Swift from mankind the pow'r of slumbers flew.

This place is not translated exactly to the letter, nor indeed would our language bear it. The original is extremely poetical, and correspondent to the best paintings in those times.

——cornu fugiebat somnus inani.

For Somnus (or sleep) was represented as a deity pouring dews out of a horn, over the temples of the sleeping person. Statius alludes to this in another passage, upon the same occasion.

—cornu perfuderat omni.

This remark I owe to Lactantius, who has given us the only tolerable comment upon Statius. Care has been taken to read him entirely over, though to little purpose. His notes are learned, short, and clear, but seldom poetical. Most of them are like the old Scholia upon Homer, explaining one word by another. He is full of apostrophes and exclamations, yet gives no reasons. Such as exquisite dictum! pictum egregie! &c.

Ver. 51. Meanwhile Adrastus bears the friendly part,
And with kind words consoles, &c.

Chaucer, who was perhaps the greatest poet among the moderns, has translated these verses almost word for word in his Knight's Tale. I shall make this remark once for all: As nothing particularizes the fine passages in Homer more than that Virgil vouchsafed to imitate them: so scarce any thing can exalt the reputation of Statius higher, than the verbal imitations of our great countryman. I prefer this to a volume of criticisms; no man would imitate, what he could exceed.

Ver. 70. Inwoven on the pall, young Linus lay
In lonely woods—

Linus was the son of Apollo, and the nymph Psamathe. No picture could be introduced with more propriety; his death was almost exactly the same with that of Archemorus. The story is related at large by Adrastus in the first Thebaid; and admirably translated by Mr. Pope.

How mean a fate, unhappy child! is thine?
Ah! how unworthy those of race divine?
On flow'ry herbs in some green covert laid,
His bed the ground, his canopy the shade,
He mixes with the bleating lambs his cries;
While the rude swain his rural music tries,
To call soft slumbers on his infant eyes.
Yet ev'n in those obscure abodes to live,
Was more, alas! than cruel fate would give!
For on the grassy verdure as he lay,
And breath'd the freshness of the rising day,
Devouring dogs the helpless infant tore,
Fed on his trembling limbs, and lapt the gore.

Ver. 90. The pious mother thus, deceiv'd too late
Like her fond spouse—

I scarce ever met with a more incoherent passage than this, in any author. The sense is fine, and easily apprehended by the context: the words are obscure to a fault, and the transition too sudden and violent.

Namque illi & pharetras, brevioraque tela dicat

Festinus voti pater, infantesque sagittas.
Jam tunc & notâ stabulis de gente probatos
In nomen pascebat equos, cinctusque sonantes,
Armaque majores expectatura lacertos—
Spes avidæ! quas non in nomen credula vestes
Urgebat studio? &c.

Spes avidæ must certainly be spoken of the mother, or else credula has nothing to agree with. In short, it must never be defended, but by one of these two excuses, either that Statius left his poem unfinished, or that the verse immediately preceding is now lost. It might mean perhaps no more than this, "Thus too was the unhappy mother deceived! With what cure—&c." This consideration clears the sense, and solves all objections at once. However 'tis a mere conjecture, and may be truer to the author's reputation, than his first meaning.

All grave readers will reject this as a whimsical young man's notion; nor do I lay any stress upon it. To show I can be serious upon occasion, I shall just refer them to Virgil's Third Georgic, where will be found a transition from horses to cows, as obscure almost as this in Statius.

Gronovius (without any authority) thinks we should read spes avidi, instead of avidæ, still preserving the context, and referring credula to spes. I cannot approve of this emendation for many reasons; we at once lose half the beauty. Besides, the repetition of in nomen would be tautology, if it did not refer to another person: nor can urgere vestes be so properly applied to the father.

Whoever reads this positive Dutchman's Preface to Ammianus Marcellinus, will never think him to be a man of sense or candour.

Ver. 108. Stretch'd o'er the ground the tow'ring oaks were seen, &c.

This description is inimitably beautiful, and I might spend a whole page in admirations. 'Twere easy also, by drawing parallel places (a common, but unfair practice), to prefer Statius to all the ancients and moderns. Most of the poets have exercised their genius upon this occasion; particularly Ovid in the 10th book of his Metamorphosis.

—Non Chaonis abfuit arbor,

Non nemus Heliadum, non frondibus esculus
altis:

Non tiliæ molles, non sagus, & innuba laurus,
Et coryli fragiles, & fraxinus utilis hastis,
Enodisque abies, curvataque glandibus ilex,
Et platanus genialis, acerque coloribus impar,
Amnicolæque simul salices, & aquatica lotos.

As also Claudian, in the rape of Proserpina, Book II. Chaucer seems to have a particular eye to this passage throughout all his poems. See his Knight's Tale, the Assembly of Fowls, and Complaint of the Black Knight. I am also much pleased to find this passage finely imitated by two other of our ancient English poets. I shall first cite Fairfax, who understood the harmony of numbers better than any person then living, except Spenser. All the world knows his excellent version (or paraphrase rather) of Tasso's Gierusalem liberata. The other, whom I mean, is Mr. Drayton, whose Fairy-tale is a masterpiece in those grotesque writings.

Down fall the sacred palms, and ashes wild—
The fun'ral cypress, holly ever green.

The weeping fir, thick beech, and sailing
 pine,
 The married elm fell with his fruitful vine;
 The shooter-yew, the broad-leav'd sycamore,
 The barren platane, and the walnut found:
 The myrrh that her foul sin doth still deplore,
 The alder, owner of all wat'rish ground,
 Sweet juniper, whose shadow hurteth sore,
 Proud cedar; oak, the king of forests crown'd.

FAIRFAX.

The tufted cedar, and the branching pine . . .
 Under whose covert, (thus divinely made)
 Phœbus' green laurel flourish'd in the shade;
 Fair Venus' myrtle, Mars his warlike fir,
 Minerva's olive, and the weeping myrrh;
 The patient palm that strives in spite of hate,
 The poplar to Alcides consecrate, &c.

DRAYTON.

I ask pardon for the tediousness of this note, and the reader in justice ought to acknowledge I writ it to gratify my pleasure, rather than my vanity; and surely no person who has the least taste can be displeased with so much variety. I insist only to produce one description more out of Statius. The verses are extremely natural, and carry something with them as awful and venerable as the subject.

*Sylva capax ævi, validaque incurva senectâ,
 Æternum intonsæ frondis, stat pervia nullis Solibus.*

*Subter opaca quies, vacuusque silentia servat
 Horror, & exclusæ pallet mala lucis imago,
 Nec caret umbra Deo.*

THEBAID IV.

Ver. 131. Sacred to heav'n and hell the mourners rear
 Two massy altars——

It may be asked why the Grecians raised two altars. Lactantius answers that one only was for Archemorus, and the other for the serpent that killed him.

If the reader supposes this to be too much honour for the latter, it must be remembered, that those creatures were almost always esteemed by the ancients, as sacred to some deity. But Statius mentions this in particular. See the death of Archemorus, in the 5th Thebaid.

——Nemoris sacer horror Achæi
 Erigitur Serpens.

And a little afterwards,

——Inachio sanctum dixere Tonanti
 Agricolaë——

So Virgil, speaking of the two serpents that strangled Laocoon, Æneid the 2d.

Their task perform'd, the serpents quit their prey,

And to the tow'r of Pallas make their way:
 Couch'd at her feet they lie protected there
 By her large buckler, and protended spear.

DRYDEN.

Ver. 137.——In mournful strains
 The music of the Phrygian lute complains.

The Phrygian measure in music was made use of, to call the spirits of the deceased from Hades. Pelops was the first person who invented, and set it to the lyre, and from him it came to the Grecians.

LACTANTIUS.

Ver. 147. Behind Hypsipyle's soft sorrows flow
 Silent, and fast——

Nothing can be more finely imaged than this character of Hypsipyle; it seems a perfect picture of beauty in distress. Her very silence is eloquent: She knows her innocence, but must not speak one word to defend it. She moves along by herself the very last of them all, while every eye seems to threaten and accuse her. And even after all this, there is still a dejected sweetness, a tenderness, a confusion that cannot be expressed. I know not how to make the reader any ways sensible of my own images, except I refer him to the character of Briseis in Homer's first Iliad, and the picture of Sigeambis in Darius's tent.

This puts me in mind of some fine strokes in Spenser, though upon a different occasion. What I mean is the silence and confusion of Britomart, when the red-cross knight discovers her to be a lady, and inquires after her adventures.

Thereat she sighing softly, had no pow'r
 To speak a while, ne ready answer make,
 But with heart-thrilling throbs, and bitter
 stow'r,

As if she had a fever-fit, did quake,
 And ev'ry dainty limb with horror shake;
 And ever and anon the rosie red
 Flash'd through her face, as it had been a flake
 Of lightning, through bright heaven fulmin'd.

FAIRY QUEEN, Lib. III. Cant. ii.

See also the same canto, stanza the 15th.

Ver. 153. Speech of Eurydice.

Statius has equally shown his conduct in this speech of Eurydice. She is injured, and indeed deserves a liberty to resent it. She condole, she repents, she heightens her misfortunes, and then seems to wonder why providence should inflict them. This she aggravates by considering the prosperity of her neighbours, which certainly gives the deepest remorse in all afflictions. Nothing can be finer than these two last particulars. They arise immediately from human nature, and give a lively picture of self-respect, and indulgence to our own frailties. What follows is more abrupt and violent; she draws the author of her misery in the most disagreeable colours, makes her treacherous, negligent, and even insensible of gratitude or pity.

Ver. 185. Whose hands sustain'd thee, and whose music charm'd,

Whose eye o'erfaw thee——

I am far from being disgusted with these little particularities that attend the most serious and noble passions. Nothing has a better effect in poetry or painting. An incident may be small, and at the same time not trifling. This puts me in mind of an observation in Longinus: it is made upon Sappho's love-ode, translated afterwards by Catullus. "The poetess (says he) has assembled with admirable skill all the little accidents to that passion. Her heart beats fast, her tongue trembles, her sight seems to swim, and her colour vanishes all in one moment."

This confusion suits admirably well with the wandering irresolutions of the soul upon such occasions.

LONGINUS, Chap. viii.

Ver. 209. So when the holy priest with curious eyes

Dooms some fair heifer.

I must not forget that Statius has copied this simile from Lucretius. 'Tis hard to say which is the more excellent. Lucretius's lines are these, after he has described the young heifer slain in sacrifice.

At mater virideis saltus orbata peragrans,
Omnia convivens oculis loca, si queat usquam
Conspicere amissum fœtum, completque querelis

Frondiferum nemus adstans, & crebra revivit
Ad stabulum, desiderio perfixa juvenci,
Non teneræ falices, atque herbæ rore vigentes
Fluminave ulla queunt summis labentia ripis
Oblectare animum, subitamque avertère curam:
Nec vitulorum aliæ species per pabula læta
Derivare queunt aliò, curâve levare.

Lib. ii.

Ver. 217. The father now unbare his rev'rend head;

His silver locks he scatters o'er the dead.

The practice of cutting off the hair, and strewing it over the deceased, was so common with the ancients, that all testimonies are needless. It prevails among the Slavonians to this day, who (as Lord Bunsen observes in his Epistles), neque modo capillos, sed etiam supercilia sibi (in luctu) demunt.

Ver. 221. If Jove's almighty wisdom can deceive,
Curs'd is the man who fondly will believe!

This apostrophe contains a fine picture of human nature in distress. Heaven itself cannot escape our censure: its unerring justice is called into question, and we fancy more to be inflicted on us than we ought to suffer.

Much of this kind is the speech of Aſius in Homer's 12th Iliad. Eustathius makes a very moral remark upon it, which I shall transcribe, as I find it admirably translated to my hands. "The speech of Aſius is very extravagant: He exclaims against Jupiter for a breach of promise, not because he had broken his word, but because he had not fulfilled his own vain imaginations. This conduct, though very blameable in Aſius, is very natural to persons under disappointments, who are ever ready to blame heaven, and turn their misfortunes into a crime." Thus far Eustathius.

VOL. IX.

Æneas (whose chief character is piety) could not help accusing men and gods when he lost Cræusa. Though in justice to Virgil it ought to be observed, that he softens, or rather disapproves of the impiety at the same time; for so the word amens must be understood.

Quem non inculavi, amens, hominumque deorumque?

As this note is capable of very serious reflections, it may not perhaps be amiss to look a little into the holy scriptures. The impatience of Job's wife, as also the diffidence and irresolutions of David in the lxxiii psalm, are extraordinary instances of this sort. But Jeremiah carries it yet farther: He proceeds to an expostulation with his Maker. "Let me talk with thee, O Lord, of thy judgments. Thou hast planted (the wicked) yea, they have taken root: they grow, yea, they bring forth fruit. But thou, O Lord, knowest me, thou hast seen me, and tried my heart towards thee. I have forsaken my house, &c." Chap. xii. 1, 2, 3, & 8.

Lactantius solves the extravagance of this speech of Lycurgus very oddly, by a reflection on his priesthood. His words are these: "Priests may be as angry as they will," for so must he be understood according to the purport of the original. I much question whether his name sake would have allowed this concession to the clergy: and if the translator may have leave to give his opinion, he thinks them to have less need of it, than any other part of the nation.

Ver. 271. Nine times his course bright Lucifer had roll'd,
And ev'ning Vesper deck'd his rays with gold.

This particularity is so far from being ornamental, that it preserves a valuable piece of antiquity; namely, the closing of the funeral games after nine days end: which ceremony the old Romans called Novemdialia.

BERNARTIUS.

Ver. 297. High o'er the people wrought with lively grace,
Shine the fair glories of their ancient race.

I do not remember any thing more noble, or judicious than this historical picture. The description of a shield was already worn out: it was impossible to add any thing of moment after Homer and Virgil. Nor is it introduced merely for ornament; it contains no less than the story of their ancestors, magnanimi series antiqua parentum. Its effects are visible: to inspire them with courage in the funeral games. Besides, it happily avoids most of the objections that have been made against the shields of Achilles and Æneas. Its size answers all multiplicity of figures; and even every figure bears a plain reference to the subject of action. The rules of painting are exactly preserved: we have not only a contrast of passions in different persons, but variety of place in each distinct compartment.

It is reasonable to think our author designed this as a compliment to a common ceremony, then among the Romans, who used at all solemn funerals to carry before the corpse of the deceased the pictures of their ancestors. Thus Horace, Epode the 8th.

—Fumus atque imagines
Ducunt triumphales tuum.

See also Cicero's oration for Milo, and the 35th book of Pliny. Perhaps Statius owed the first hint of his historical picture to the custom we now mention.

Ver. 324. —Brave Choræbus lifts his bleeding hands—

Lactantius gives two meanings to this hemistich; the venerable or undaunted figure of Choræbus. I have chosen the latter, because it agrees best with his character in the first Thebaid. The story is too long to be transcribed.

Ver. 331. Here Belus' sons at Hymen's altars stand,

And join with hearts averse the friendly hand.

The contract of Danaus and Egyptus is too well known to be repeated. However, for the sake of the curious, I shall not pass by the Epistle of Hypermnestra to Linus, and some remarkable passages in Pindar's ninth Pythian Ode. Statius seems pleased with this story, and has chosen it in another place to ornament the shield of Hippomedon. There is something very masterly in the expression, and the Tout-ensemble makes a fine piece of night-painting.

—humeros, & pectora latè
Flammeus orbis habet—vivit in auro
Nox Danaï, fontes furiarum lampade nigrâ
Quinquaginta ardent thalami, pater ipse cruentus
In foribus, laudatque nefas, atque inspicit en-

THEBAID IV.

Ver. 349. Swift flew the rapid car, and left behind

The noise of tempests, and the wings of wind.

These verses are somewhat too bold in the original.

—stupuere relicta
Nubila, certantes Eurique Notique sequuntur.

Whoever translates Statius must have liberty to soften some of these hyperboles. Yet Lactantius was of another opinion, who admires this place in the true spirit of criticism. Divine dictum! dedit illis quæstorie votum, sed ademit effectum. His remark is not worth translating.

Ver. 363. So sad Apollo with a boding sigh
Told his fond child—

We may perceive something very remarkable in this simile, not without a fine commiseration for unhappy Polynices. Instead of accusing the rashness or folly of Phæton, all is attributed to fatal destiny. As much as to say, Polynices lost not the race through his own imprudence, but by the interposition of a deity.

Ver. 431. Admetus' Life, &c.] This alludes chiefly to the story of Alceste, Admetus's wife, who was so honourable, it seems, as to lay down her own life to atone for her husband's. Juvenal makes an agreeable use of this female gallantry.

—spectant subeuntem fata mariti

Alcesten.

LACTANTIUS.

Euripides has written a tragedy upon this occasion. I am afraid few modern ladies would give such an example, but indeed husbands are much altered since the days of Admetus. I may add, that Statius takes notice of the death of Alceste in his Sylva, intituled, The Tears of Etruscus, lib. iii. I the rather cite this poem because it contains some fine strokes of humanity, and filial affection. Of the same nature is his Epicedion in Patrem. I wonder these two admirable copies have never yet been translated.

Ver. 454. "Th' impatient coursers pant in every vein,

"And pawing seem to beat the distant plain:

"The vales, the floods appear already crost,

"And ere they start, a thousand steps are lost."

The Latin of these verses is wonderfully fine, as Mr. Dryden acknowledges in his preface to Du Fresnoy. He cites them as a true image of our author.

Stare adeo miserum est, pereunt vestigia mille
Ante fugam, absentemque ferit gravis ungula campum.

Which would cost me, says he, an hour to translate, there is so much beauty in the original. Since that, Mr. Pope has imitated these verses almost verbatim in his Windsor-Forest: And I thought fit to transfer them hither, rather than expose my own weakness. I never was heartily mortified before; I just know how to admire him, and to despise myself! The reader may be assured, I durst not presume to do this without that gentleman's consent, who not only gave me leave to use his translation, but also to alter any circumstances that might not correspond with the original. I remember a paper in the Guardian that consists chiefly of parallel descriptions upon this occasion; and thither I refer the curious.

Balde the Jesuit has some bold strokes in an ode whose title I forget, though it is written partly in imitation of the war-horse in Job. I mention this, purely to do justice to that poet's memory, who, notwithstanding some extravagancies, came nearer to the spirit and abruptness of Pindar, than any of his contemporaries.

Ver. 600. Earth opening seem'd to groan (a fatal sign!)

Because Amphiaræus was afterwards to be swallowed under ground. See the latter end of the seventh Thebaid.

Illum ingens haurit specus, et transire parentes
Mergit equos: non arma manu, non fræna remittit

Sicut erat, rectos desert in Tartara currus:

Resperitque cadens cœlum, campumque coite
Ingemuit——

I take this to be one of the most noble descriptions I ever met with in any language.

Ver. 639. Loud shouts each chief that from high Elis leads

His native train, &c.

I have opened this passage a little, but with due respect to geography. See the fourth Theb. Resupina Elis, demissa Pisa.

Ver. 642. Lives there a warrior in the world
Who never heard of Atalanta's name?

The commentators are all mighty merry upon these verses. It seems Statius has confounded the history of Atalanta (there being two of that name) and takes the wife of Hippomenes for that of Pelops; the famous racer in days of yore. This, say they, is a remarkable oversight, and very few of them can heartily forgive it. The matter is hardly worth debate: Poets were never thought infallible. Whoever reads the critical discourse upon the Iliad, will find many errors even in Homer; though not so many as La Motte fancied. Aristotle, Cicero, and Dionysius of Halicarnassus, were seldom right in their quotations. Macrobius tells, that Virgil ran into many palpable mistakes, purely to disengage himself from too much exactness, and to imitate Homer. Mons. la Mothe le Vayer has written an entire treatise upon this subject; and I think it worth reading, merely as a mortification for human vanity.

In deference to the above mentioned criticism, I thought fit to leave out, vestigia cunctis indeprentata procis; for there lies all the confusion.

Ver. 766. Foot-race.] I must own, I think this foot-race an inimitable piece of poetry. The design itself is equally as just; the circumstances perhaps are more beautiful than those upon the same subject in the Greek or Roman poet. Had Statius given the prize to Idas (than which nothing was more easy), I cannot but think the moral would have been highly defective. Yet Euryalus in Virgil wins the race by downright fraudulence. In the descriptive parts our author borrows nothing considerable from either of the above cited poets. I wish he had taken one circumstance from Homer, which pleases me much. It is the passage where Ulysses follows Ajax:

———ἄνδρ' ὀπίθεν

Ἰχθυα τῶν τε ποδῶσσι πάρος κόνιν ἀμφιχυθῆναι.

———His foe he plies,

And treads each footstep, e'er the dust can rise.

Ver. 909. Thus in some storm the broken billows rise

Round the vast rock——

'Tis with great judgment the poet introduces this simile, which admirably paints the size and unmoveableness of Capaneus. I have endeavoured to give it this turn, adding the epithet vast, to strengthen the idea. A translator can seldom do his author this justice, and I see no reasons against it, if the deviation exceeds not one word. However, it is manifest the original alludes only to the noise and sudden overflowing of the waters. It is impossible to give a more lively image of Alcidas. Statius has comprised himself also into a shorter compass than usual, that the mind might not be too much suspended in the midst of so important an action. Besides, there is a particular beauty in the versification: it seems to run by starts, short and violent:

*Afflit, ut præceps cumulo salit unda, minaces
In scopulos, et fracta redit——*

Ver. 966. The fight of the cæstus.] I have taken notice in the Foot-race, that Statius has varied from Virgil with admirable judgment. The same may be advanced here in respect to Homer, who, in his fight of the cæstus, rewards insolence and pride, instead of punishing them. There is an exact parity of character between Capaneus and Epeus: but not the same success. The boaster in this place meets with the most manifest disadvantage: A great improvement of the moral.

Upon the whole, it may be required I should attempt something like a comparison between the descriptions of this game in Homer, Virgil, and Statius. To speak my own sentiments, I cannot but prefer the latter, not only for its greater variety of incidents, but for the character of arrogance, which is wrought up to much more perfection: it was this they all laboured at. Capaneus is so far blinded with his own admiration, that he still fancies himself the conqueror, though the odds appeared visibly against him; so apt is pride to magnify. This is superadded to the characters in Homer and Virgil, and I think it a most natural improvement.

Ver. 994. The mountain-cypress thus, that firmly stood

From age to age———

Originally,

Ille autem Alpini veluti regina cupressus Verticis———

I have read in one of our modern critics, or in some book of travels, that no cypresses grow upon the Alps. The author upon this takes occasion to fall foul upon an eminent Roman poet, and wonders at his ignorance. It is no matter where I met with this remark, it not being of much consequence: Yet I thought fit to leave out Alpinus, and added a more indefinite epithet.

Since my writing this note, I chanced to read Bernartius's comment upon Statius. He is much chagrined at this oversight. As a specimen of his humanity and taste for criticism, I shall transcribe his own words at length: "Attigit ut videtur Papinius hic guttam è flumine Lethes. "Nam in Alpibus nusquam cupressi: nisi forte speciem pro genere posuit, quod non inepte affirmare possumus."

Ver. 1006. Not half so bloody, or with half such rage,

Two mighty monarchs of the herd engage.

Statius seems to have copied this simile from the combat of Hercules and Achelous, in the ninth book of Ovid's Metamorphoses. I shall pleasure the reader with them both. And first Ovid:

Non aliter vidi fortes concurrere tauros,
Cum pretium pugnae, toto nitidissima saltu
Expetitur conjux: spectant armenta, paventq.
Nescia quem tanti maneat victoria regni.
Non sic ductores gemini gregis, horrida tauri
Bella movent: medio conjux stat candida prato
Victorem expectans; rumpunt obnixa furentes
Pectora——

The latter, in my opinion, is far more natural than the former. There is a beautiful contrast, or variation of numbers, very tender and flowing, in ——medio conjux——&c.

Which is somewhat faintly preserved in the translation.

Spenser has a simile something of this nature in the combat between the Red-Cross Knight and Sansfoy, Lib. I. Canto ii.

Ver. 1029. Nor breath'd its spirit to congenial skies.

Or to congenial stars more literally, according to the philosophy of Pythagoras. The wicked, says Lactantius, were punished by their stars (ab ipsis astris, stellisque are his words) the good enjoyed their light for ever. For a farther explication of this ancient doctrine, I refer the reader to Servius and Rutenus's notes upon the 227th line of Virgil's fourth Georgic, Syderis in numerum, &c. See also Plato in Timæo.

Ver. 1040. So Hercules, who long had toil'd in vain,
Heav'd huge Antheus.

I cannot but admire this noble simile; besides the parity of circumstances, the savage character of Antheus suits admirably well with the brutal fury of Agylleus: nor is it a small compliment to little Tydeus, to compare him with Hercules for strength. I fancy Spenser drew the story of Malger at large from this picture. I am the more inclined to think so, because in the combat of Prince Arthur and Pyrrhocles, he translates almost literally from Statius those verses that describe Agylleus after his fall; though it must be owned, he has interwoven a simile that much improves them.

Nought booted it the paynim then to strive,
But as a bittoir in an eagle's claw,
That may not hope by flight to 'scape alive,
Still hopes for death, with dread and trembling
awe,
So he now subject to the victor's law
Did not once move, nor upwards cast his eye.

Here end the funeral games, which are put off (as in Virgil) by a prodigy, foreboding that none of the seven captains should return, except Adrastus: As that in Virgil foretold the burning of the ships by the Trojan matrons.

To conclude, whosoever will read the original impartially, will find Statius to be a much better poet than the world imagines. What the translation is, I know not; nor can the notes be extraordinary, when no body has written any thing tolerable before me. The reader may believe or disbelieve them as he pleases; I deliver conjectures, not doctrines. If my present version has the fortune to please, I may perhaps proceed farther: if not, I cannot but think myself happy in reviving, at least, so fine a piece of poetry. I have but just given the sketch of a picture, it remains for others to deepen the strokes, and finish the whole. Whoever can take such pains, will oblige me, as much as the world.

DIVINE POEMS.

DEDICATION.

To the Reverend Mr. Hildrop, Master of Marlborough-School (under whom I had the honour of receiving my education) these Divine Poems are humbly dedicated by his most obliged,

and obedient Servant,

PSALM CIV. PARAPHRASED.

AWAKE, my soul! in hallow'd raptures praise
Th' Almighty God, who in th' empyreal height
Majestic shines, too glorious to behold.
Methinks the broad expansion of the sky
O'er spreads thy throne: in air thy chambers hang Eternal, and unmov'd. Clouds roll'd on clouds
Thy chariot form; in thund'ring wrapt and fires
Thou walk'st, incumbent on the wings of wind.
Active as flames, all intellect, God forms
Angels of essence pure, whose finer parts
Invisible, and half dissolv'd in light,

Should fleet through worlds of air. Th' Almighty hand

Fix'd earth's eternal basis, and prescrib'd
Its utmost limits to the raging main.

Forth from their deeps a world of waters rose
And delug'd earth. He spoke, the waves obey'd
In peace, subsiding to their ancient springs.
Part murmur headlong down the mountain's sides:
Part through the vales in flow meanders play,
As pleas'd, yet loath to leave the flow'ry scene.

Thither by instinct savage beasts repair
To slake their thirst. Along the margin trees
Wave in the wat'ry gleam, amid whol' boughs

The winged songsters chaunt their Maker's pow'r.

God with prolific dew, and genial rain

Impregnates earth, then crowns the smiling fields

With lively green: the vegetative juice

Flows briskly through the trees; the purple grape

Swells with nectareous wines t' inspire the soul.

With verdant fruits the clust'ring olive bends,

Whose sprightly liquor smooths the shining face.

On Lebanon the sacred cedar waves,

And spiry fir-tree, where the stork conceals

Her clam'rous young. The rocks bare, unadorn'd,

Have ules too: there goats in quest of food

Hang pendulous in air, there rabbits form

Their mazy cells—In constant course the moon

Nocturnal sheds her kindly influence down,

Marks out the circling year, and rules the tides.

In constant regularity the sun

Purples the rosy east, or leaves the skies.

Then awful night o'er all the globe extends

Her sable shades: the woods and deserts ring

With hideous yell, what time the lions roar

And tear their prey; but when the glimm'ring
morn

Dawns o'er the hills, their depredations cease,

And sacred silence reigns. Then painful man

Commences with the sun his early toil,

With him retires to rest O pow'r supreme,

How wonderful thy works! the bounteous earth

Pours from its fruitful surface plants and herbs

Adapt for ev'ry use: its bowels hold

Rich veins of silver, and the golden ore.

Unnumber'd wonders in the deeps appear,

Incredible to thought. There tow'rs of oak

Float o'er the surges; there enormous whales

In awkward gambols play, th' inferior fry

Sportive through groves of shining coral glide.

These with observance due, when hunger calls

Expect their meat from God, who sometimes gives

A just sufficiency, or more profuse

Show'rs down his bounty with a copious hand.

When God withholds his all-sustaining care,

To dust, their former principle, they fall.

Then thy prolific spirit forms anew

Each undecaying species. Mighty God,

How great, how good thy pow'r; that was, and is,

And e'er shall be immutably the same!

Earth at thy look with reverential fear,

Ev'n to the centre shakes: the mountains blaze

Beneath thy touch! Hail awful pow'r of heav'n,

Eternal Three and One! The slaves of vice

Thy vengeance, like a sudden whirlwind's rage,

Sweeps from mankind. My muse, thrice glorious task!

While my blest eyes behold the cheerful sun,

While life shall animate this mortal frame,

In heavenly flights shall spread a bolder wing,

And sing to him, who gave her first to sing!

PSALM CVII. PARAPHRASED.

MORTALS, rejoice! with raptures introduce

Your grateful songs, and tell what mercies God

Deigns to bestow on man: but chiefly you

The progeny of David, whom the Lord

Selected from each region of the globe

Beneath the Arctic or Antarctic pole:

Or where the purple sun with orient beams

Strikes parallel on earth, or prone descends
T' illumine worlds beyond th' Hesperian main.

With weary feet, and mournful eyes they pass'd

Erroneous through the dreary waste of plains,

Immeas'able: the broad expanse of heav'n

Their canopy, the ground of damp malign

Their bed nocturnal. Thus in wild despair

Anxious they sought some hospitable town,

In shame and bitterness of soul, once more

They recogniz'd the Lord, and trembling cry'd

Have mercy on us! he, the source of mercy,

Kindly revisited his fav'rite race,

Consol'd their woes, and led the weary train

Through barren wilds to the long promis'd land,

Then plac'd 'em there in peaceful habitations.

Chorus.

"O that the sons of men in grateful songs

"Would praise th' unbounded goodness of the

"Lord,

"Declare his miracles, and laud his pow'r!"

He cheers the sad, and bids the famish'd soul

Luxuriant feast till nature craves no more.

He often saves th' imprison'd wretch that lies

Tortur'd in iron chains no more to see

The cheerful light, or breathe the purer air.

(The due reward imperious mortals find,

When swell'd with earthly grandeur they despise

The pow'r supreme) thus Jesse's sacred seed

Elated with the num'rous gifts of heav'n,

Slighted the giver: then the wrathful Lord

Withheld his hand. They impotent to save

Their forfeit lives, in piercing accents cry'd

Help Lord, we die! he soon with aspect mild

Commiserates their anguish, and reliev'd

Those limbs, which sedentary numbness erst

Had cramp'd, when they in doleful shades of death

Sate intolerable—"O then that men

"Would praise th' unbounded goodness of the

"Lord,

"Declare his miracles, and laud his power!"

Man, thoughtless of his end, in anguish reaps

The fruits of folly, and voluptuous life.

Sated with luxury his stomach loaths

Most palatable meats: with heavy pain

His eyes roll slowly; if he drops to rest,

He starts delirious, and still seems to see

Horrible fiends, that tear him from mankind.

His flushing cheeks now glow like flames of fire:

Now chill'd, he trembles with extremes of cold

That shoots, like darts of ice, through every vein.

Ev'n then, when art was conquer'd, pray'rs and vows

Lenient of anger soon appear'd the Lord,

Whole saving providence restor'd his health,

And snatch'd th' expiring from the jaws of death.

But mostly they who voyage o'er the deeps

Observe the works of God. Sudden, from high

Down pours a rushing storm, more dreadful made

By darkness: save what light the flashing waves

Disclose. The vessel rides sublime in air

High on the surging billows, or again

Precipitous through yawning chasms descends.

Heart-thrilling plaints, and hands up-rear'd to

heav'n

Speak well their anguish, and desires to live.

Shock'd by each burning wave that whirls 'em

round,

They stagger in amaze, like reeling men
 Intoxicated with the fumes of wine.
 Yet when they cry to God, his saving pow'r
 Hushes the winds, and bids the main subside.
 Instead of storms the whisp'ring zephyrs fan
 The silent deep, and wave their pendent sails.
 Then ev'ry heart exults: joyous repose
 Dismisses each terrific thought, when once
 (At heav'n's command) the weary vessel makes
 Her long-expected haven. "O that men
 "Would praise th' unbounded goodness of the
 "Lord,
 "Declare his miracles, and laud his pow'r!"
 To him once more address your songs of praise
 In every temple sacred to his name,
 Or where the reverend senators conven'd
 In council sit. He turns the limpid streams,
 And flow'ry meadows to a dreary waste.
 Where corn has grown, and fragrant roses fill'd
 The skies with odoriferous sweets, he bids
 The baleful aconite uplift its head.
 (The curse of impious nations) and again
 In lonely deserts at his high behests
 Soft-purling rills in sportive mazes glide
 Meander'd through the valleys: there he bids
 The hungry souls increase and multiply.
 His bounteous hand the while pours goodness down
 Ineffable, and guards their num'rous herds.
 Though thousands fall, his mercy still renews
 The never-ending race—When tyrants, proud
 Of arrogated greatness, without law

Unpeople realms, and breathe, but to destroy;
 Then God his high prerogative asserts,
 Resumes his pow'r, and blasts their guilty heads:
 Then raises from the dust the humble soul
 Who meekly bore indignities and woe.

TO MY SOUL.

FROM CHAUCER.

FAR from mankind, my weary soul retire,
 Still follow truth, contentment still desire.
 Who climbs on high, at best his weakness shows,
 Who rolls in riches, all to fortune owes.
 Read well thyself, and mark thy early ways,
 Vain is the muse, and envy waits on praise.
 Wav'ring as winds the breath of fortune blows,
 No pow'r can turn it, and no pray'rs compose.
 Deep in some hermit's solitary cell
 Repose and ease and contemplation dwell.
 Let conscience guide thee in the days of need;
 Judge well thy own, and then thy neighbour's deed.

What heav'n bestows with thankful eyes receive;
 First ask thy heart, and then through faith believe.
 Slowly we wander o'er a toilsome way,
 Shadows of life, and pilgrims of a day.
 "Who wrestles in this world, receives a fall;
 "Look up on high, and thank thy God for all!"

FABLES, VISIONS, EMBLEMS, &c.

—DEUS ORA MOVET; SEQUAR ORA MOVENTEM
 RITE DEUM!—

PREFACE.

I SHALL not trouble the public with excuses for venturing to send these Religious Poems into the world; having long since observed, that all apologies made by authors, far from gaining the end proposed, serve only to supply an ill-natured critic with weapons to attack them. This being the case, it shall suffice me to say, that I drew up the present writings for my own private consolation, under a lingering and dangerous state of health, which it has pleased God to make my portion: Nor had I any better opportunity or power of discharging the duties of my profession to mankind. The goodness of my cause may perhaps supply the defects of my poetry; since, in this sense, the very gleanings of the grapes of Ephraim will be better than the vintage of Abiezer. I promise my readers no extraordinary art in composition or style; but flatter myself they will find some nature, some flame, and some truth.

Parables, Fables, Emblematic Visions, &c. are the most ancient method of conveying truth to mankind. Upwards of forty of the finest and most poetical parts of the Old and New Testament are of this cast, and force their way upon the mind and heart irresistibly, though they are written in prose.

From a just sense of this humble simplicity, I have here translated the plainest and least figurative parable that our blessed Saviour has delivered to us, relating only to a few unornamented circumstances in agriculture.

To express such humble allusions with clearness, propriety, and dignity, was, it must be confessed, one of the hardest pieces of poetry I ever yet undertook; nevertheless, I flattered myself that I was in some degree master of one part of the subject, [namely, the culture of land] upon which the parable is founded.

Yet the great and real difficulty still recurred:

Difficile est propriè communia dicere.—

How far I have succeeded in this, or any other particular, is more than I shall take upon me to conjecture. Nor shall it be dissembled, but that I had a great inclination to give a paraphrase (or metaphrase rather) of the xxviiith chapter of Deuteronomy; which, I believe, hath never yet been turned into English verse. It is doubtless one of the noblest pieces of poetry in holy scripture; being at the same time sublime, and yet plain; seemingly familiar, and yet richly diversified.

In this chapter, the change of ideas and events from a state of obedience to a state of disobedience, exhibits a power of language, imagery, and just thinking, which no uninspired writings ever have laid claim to with justice, or ever shall. But, when I came to take a closer view of the precipice and its dangers, my heart trembled, as Job says, and was moved out of its place; I threw down the pencil in despair, and left the undertaking to some abler hand; namely, to some future Milton, Dryden, or Pope.

Upon the whole, I may perhaps venture to persuade myself, that the intention of the present work is commendable, and that the work, when perused, may prove useful (more or less) to my fellow Christians.

Conscious of my own inabilities, and being desirous that the reader may receive some advantage by casting his eyes over these poems, I have added, in a few notes, the most remarkable passages I had an eye to in the holy scriptures, and in the writings of the primitive fathers; they being the only compass and charts which I have made use of in my navigation.

A mixture of pleasing and instructive poetry cannot fail to engage the attention of all rational and serious readers: For, as it is hurtful to drink wine, or water alone; and as wine mingled with water is pleasant, and delighteth the taste; even so speech, finely framed, delighteth the ears of them that read the story.

CHRIST'S PARABLE OF THE SOWER.

I will incline mine ear to a parable: I will open my dark saying upon the harp. Psalm xlix. 4.

All these things spake Jesus unto the multitude in parables. Withoutt a parable spake he not unto them. Matth. xiii. 34.

A wise man will hear, and increase learning, and a man of understanding shall attain unto wise counsels: To understand a proverb (a parable) and the interpretation; the words of the wise, and their dark sayings. Prov. i. 5. 6.

INTRODUCTION.

LONG e'er th' Ascrean * bard had learnt to sing,
Or Homer's fingers touch'd the speaking string;
Long e'er the supplemental arts had found
Th' embroid'ry of auxiliary sound;

* Hesiod.

The heav'n-born muse the paths of nature chose:
Emblems and fables her whole mind disclose,
Victorious o'er the soul with energy of prose!

True poetry, like Ophir's gold, endures
All trials, yet its purity secures;
Invert, disjoint it, change its very name,
The essence of the thoughts remains the same.
Something there is, which endless charms afford;

And stamps the majesty of truth on words.

The son of Gideon *, 'midst Cherizim's snow,
Unskill'd in numbers taught the stream to flow,
With conscious pride disdain'd the aids of art,
And pour'd a full conviction on the heart:
His cedar, fig-tree, and the brier convey
The highest notions in the humblest way †.

In Nathan's fable strong and mild conspire,
The suppliant's meekness and the poet's fire:
Till waken'd nature bade the tears to flow,
And David's muse assum'd the voice of woe ‡.

The wise, all-knowing Saviour of mankind
Mix'd ease with strength, and truth with emblem
join'd:

Omniscience, vested with full pow'r to choose,
O'erlooks the strong, nor does the weak refuse §.
Leaves pageantry of means to feeble man,
And builds the noblest, on the plainest plan:
Divine simplicity the work befriends,
And humble causes reach sublimest ends.

True flame of verse, O sanctifying fire || !
Warm not my genius, but my heart inspire!
On my cleans'd lips permit the coals to dwell
Which from thy altar on Isaiah fell ¶ !
Cancel the world's applause; and give thy grace
To me, the meanest of the tuneful race.
Teach me the words of Jesus to impart
With energy of pow'r, but free from art.
Thy emanations light and heat dispense;
The sucklings speech, to children eloquence !—
Like Habakkuk , I copy, not indite;
Tim'rous like him, I tremble whilst I write!
But Jeremiah with new boldness sung,
When inspiration rush'd upon his tongue ††
The pow'rs of sacred poesy were giv'n
By him, that bears the signature of heav'n ††

PARABLE.

WHEN vernal show'rs and sunshine had unbound
The frozen bosom of the torpid ground,
When breezes from the western world repair
To wake the flow'rs and vivify the air,
Th' industrious peasant left his early bed,
And o'er the fields his seeds for harvest spread.

With equal hand, and at a distance due,
(Impartially to every narrow view)
The life-sustaining grain he justly sows*.
As was the culture, such was the return;
Of weeds a field, or a grove of corn.
But, where he sows the gift on grateful soils,
Harvests of industry then-gain his soils.
Some seeds by chance on brashy † grounds he sows,

And some the winds on airy head-lands blow:
Foldest they matured, premature of birth,
But put & and taken &, unsluggish & with earth:
Whilst burning suns their vital juice exhal'd,
And, as the seeds decay'd, the bulwark fall'd.
Some seeds he sows on ungrateful lands,
Tough chert-like clays, and hard unyielding sands;
The deep down soil refus'd a mule's care:
The plants were scabby, pinched, pale, and bare.

On another patch a casual portion fell,
Condemn'd in heavy genary to dwell,
And half-bury'd in the matrix of a cell:
While other seeds, less fortunate than they,
Slips—saw'd and sowed on the hard high-way,
From frosts de-cay'd, and to birds a prey.
Here darts with various candles heat,
And changes, the circumference of grain, succeed;
Here winged pupas take their flight stand,
And sparrows bat, the gleaners of the land.

Another portion mock'd the seedman's toil,
Dispers'd upon a rock, but windy soil:
For unknown juices gurg'd the rock-bed o'er;
And pleasures of the ground & no fruit.
Hence, where the life-sustaining grain was sown,
The few now deck appear in moment's hour;
Infinite dillies, organs of the plume;
And hard henlocks, and & with peas now stain.
What sick might spare, the' crowding shows demand;

Exhaust earth's virtue, and perplex the land;
At last, of precious grain a chosen share
Was sown on profitable land with care:
(A cultur'd spot, acquir'd & no more
All previous aids that industry can give;)
The well-cup'd soil with autumn brightness glows,
Mellow'd with mellow air and genial sun:
As harmony of mould, by nature mix'd!
Not light as air, nor as a serpent fix'd:
Just firm enough to embrace the thriving root,
Yet give less expence to the firm root;
Dilating, when disturb'd by labouring hands,
And swelling sweet, when form's refresh the lands.
Scarcely could the reapers' arms the sheaves contain,
And the full garners swell'd with golden grain;
(Unlike the harvests of desolate days.)
One sower sown, one hundred fold reaps:
Rich product, no a bountiful earth;
Nor ought we more to ask, nor more possess!

* "Bless God, who hath given that the true doctrine, namely, the law and the gospel, is necessary for the salvation and labour." CARTER. How in Lat. 10.

† Barren lands, in an husbandry-sense, signify lands that are dry, fallow, gravelly, and stony. Such sort of grounds the old Romans call'd sterni.

; See Eccl. 1. 4. and 5.

The harvest overcomes the sower's toil:
So justice is the seed, so living the soil*.
Man's sower thus the parallel express'd:
The due hath ears to hear, may feel the rest.

NOTES ON THE WORKS.

The gift of knowing is to all men given †;
All know, but few perceive, the will of heaven;
They hear the sound, but miss the fruit convey'd,
And lose the substance, whilst they view the shade.

When specious theories hover round a mind
Which is not really with heaven's command,
The visionary objects float and pass
Transient as figures, gliding o'er a glass:
Each but a momentary vision makes,
And each supplies the place, the last forsakes—
Tempt for ever fond to be employ'd,
(And changing minds ev'n ask to be destroy'd †),
Mark well the infernal snare; and soon supplies
Phantoms of truth, and substances of lies:
Killing the living, he a conquest gains;
And from a little, seeds the power remains.
Reason, man's guardian, by neglect, or sleep
Loses that castle, he was meant to keep.

The seeds upon a fiery surface cast,
Denote the worldly-wile, who think in haste:
Who change, for changing's sake, from right to wrong,

Constant to nothing, and in nothing long;
To-day they hear the word of God with joy,
To-morrow they the word of God deny;
Indifferent, to assist, or to deny:
With zeal they fasten, and with zeal decay.
Such is the seed of wit, who strives with pains
To life that perishes the present gains.
Whenever adverse fortune clouds the way,
When danger threatens, or evils o'ercast the day,
This plant of carnality, with'd at root,
Shakes with the blast, and casts his unripe fruit;
But, when the storms of poverty arise,
And persecution ev'ry virtue tries,
Mindless of God, and trusting to himself,
He stands here a's freightage on a dangerous shelf.
A wreck to learn, and more wreck to hear,
He sinks, the object victim of despair!

The men of power and pomp resemble seeds
Sown on rich earth, but chok'd with thorns and weeds.

Religion strikes them, but they shun the thought;
Behold the profit, and per profit sought.

Paul J. Taylor was said to a lady, "Madam, if you do not employ your children, the devil will." The son of David gives also the following advice: "Send thy son to labour, that he be not idle; for idleness breedeth much evil." C. xxiii. V. 17.

† "We are all careful about small matters, and negligent in the greatest; of which this is the reason, we know not where true felicity is." ST. HIERON.

Heav'n's high rewards they silently contemn,
And think the present world suffices them.
Meanwhile ambition leads the soul astray,
Far from its natal walk, th' ethereal way;
Int'rest assassins friendship ev'ry hour,
Truth warps to custom, conscience bends to
pow'r,

Till all the cultivating hand receives
Is empty blossom, and death-blasted leaves.
Idiots in judgment; baffled o'er and o'er;
Still the same bait, still circumvented more;
Self-victims of the cunning they adore!
Wise without wisdom, busy to no end;
Man still their foe, and heav'n itself no friend!

The chosen seed, on cultur'd ground, are they
Who humbly tread the evangelic way.
The road to heav'n is uniform and plain:
All other paths are serpentine and vain.
The true disciple takes the word reveal'd,
Nor rushes on the sanctuary conceal'd,
Whilst empty reas'ner's emptiest arts employ;
Nothing they build, and all things they destroy!

The provident of heav'n unlocks his store,
To clothe the naked, and to feed the poor:
To each man gen'rous, and to each man just,
Conscious of a depositary trust.
Patient of censure, yet condemning none:
Placid to all, accountable to one.
Ev'n in prosperity he fears no loss,
Expects a change, and starts not at the cross.
All injuries by patience he surmounts;
All suff'rings God's own med'cines he accounts*:
Studious of good, and penitent for ill,
Still short of grace, yet persevering still;
As just and true as erring nature can,
(For imperfection sets its stamp on man.)
Heav'n marks the saint, her mansions to adorn,
And, having purg'd the chaff, accepts the corn.

ADVERTISEMENT TO THE READER.

AT the end of the XIIth stanza in this poem, I had several inducements for venturing to change the ode into heroic measure. The first was, that I might diversify the doctrinal part from the descriptive. The second was, that our excellent and most learned poet, Cowley, had given me his authority for making this change, in his poem de Plantis. But the third and truer reason was, that I found it next to impracticable, to deliver short, unadorned, didactical sentences consistently with the copiousness, irregularity, and enthusiasm peculiar to ode-writing.---Let the reader only make the experiment, and I flatter myself he will join with me in opinion.---Nor have I departed any further than in a metaphor or two from that original simplicity which characterizes my author, however difficult and self-denying such an undertaking might be in a poetical composition. What gave me warning was, that Castalio and Stanhope had both spoiled Thomas à Kempis by attempting to adorn him with flowery language, false elegance, and glaring imagery. And, by the way, to this cause may be attributed the miscarriages of many poets (otherwise confessedly eminent), in their paraphrases of the psalms of David, the book of Job, &c. The grandeur of scriptural sublimity, or simplicity, admits of few or no embellishments. George Sandys, in the reign of Charles I seems only to have known this secret.

And in the morning, rising up a great while before day, he went and departed into a solitary place, and there prayed. MARK I. 35.

When lo ! a venerable fire appears,
With sprightly footsteps hast'ning o'er the plain ;
His tresses bore the marks of fourscore years,
Yet free from sickness he, and void of pain :
His eyes with half their youthful clearness shone †.
Still on his cheeks health's tincture gently glow'd,
His aged voice retain'd a manly tone,
His peaceful blood in equal tenor flow'd ;
At length, beneath a beechen shade reclin'd,
He thus pour'd forth to Heav'n the transports of his mind.

† Thomas à Kempis had no manifest infirmities of old age, and retained his eye-sight perfect to the last.

All that I have ever been able to learn in Germany, upon good authority, concerning him, is as follows: he was born at Kempis, or Kempen, a small walled town in the dutchy of Cleves, and diocese of Cologne. His family-name was Hamerlein, which signifies, in the German language, a little hammer. We find also that his parents were named John and Gertrude Hamerlein. He lived chiefly in the monastery of Mount St. Agnes; where his effigy, together with a prospect of the monastery, was engraven on a plate of copper that lies over his body. The said monastery is now called Bergh-Clooster, or, as we might say in English, Hill Cloyster. Many strangers in their travels visit it. Kempis was certainly one of the best and greatest men since the primitive ages. His Book of the Imitation of Christ has seen near forty editions in the original Latin, and above sixty Translations have been made from it into modern languages.

Our author died August the 8th, 1471, aged 92 years.

In the engraving on copper above-mentioned, and lying over his grave, is represented a person respectfully presenting to him a label, on which is written a verse to this effect :

" Oh ! where is Peace ? for Thou its paths hast trod."—

To which Kempis returns another strip of paper, inscribed as follows :

" In poverty, retirement, and with God."

He was a canon regular of Augustins, and superior of Mount St. Agnes' monastery. He composed his treatise On the Imitation of Christ, in the sixty-first year of his age, as appears from a note of his own writing in the library of his convent.

" To thee I come" (my heart replies)
" O Patron of eternal rest !"
" Who walks with me" (rejoins the voice)
" In purest day-light shall rejoice,
" Incapable to err, or fall."
With thee I walk, my gracious God ;
Long I've thy painful footsteps trod,
Redeemer, Saviour, Friend of all * !

Heav'n in my youth bestow'd each good
Of choicer sort : in fertile lands
A decent patrimony stood,
Sufficient for my just demands.
My form was pleasing : health refin'd
My blood ; a deep-discerning mind
Crown'd all the rest ; ---The fav'rite child
Of unaffected eloquence
Plain nature, unscholastic sense---
And once or twice the muses smil'd !

Blest with each boon that simpler minds desire,
Till Heav'n grows weary of their nauseous pray'rs,
I made the nobler option to retire †,
And gave the world to worldlings and their heirs ;
The warrior's laurels, and the statesman's fame,
The vain man's hopes for titles and employ,
The pomp of station, and the rich man's name,
I left for fools to seek, and knaves t' enjoy † ;
An early whisper did its truths impart,
And all the God conceal'd irradiated my heart.

Happy the man who turns to Heav'n,
When on the landscape's verge of green
Old-age appears, to whom 'tis giv'n
To creep in sight, but fly, unseen !
Stealer of marches, subtle foe,
Sinon of stratagem and woe !
Thy fatal blows ah ! who can ward ?
Around the lurks a motely train
Of wants, and fears, and chronic pain,
The hungry Gtroats of thy guard.
(Thus on the flow'r-enamel'd lawn,
Unconscious of the least surprise,
In thoughtless gambols sports the fawn,
Whilst veil'd in grass the tygress lies.
The silent trait'reis crouches low,
Her very lungs surcease to blow :
At length she darts on hunger's wings ;—
Sure of her distance and success,
Where Newton could but only guess,
She never misses, when she springs §.)

§ This parenthesis was inserted by way of imitating the famous parenthesis in Horace's Ode, which begins

Qualem ministrum fulminis alitem, &c.

More truly wise the man, whose early youth
Is offer'd a free off'ring to the Lord,
A self-addicted votary to truth,
Servant through choice disciple by accord!
Heav'n always did th' unblemish'd turtle choose,
Where health conjoin'd with spirit most abounds.
Heav'n seeks the young, nor does the old refuse,
But youth acquits the debt, which age compounds!
Awkward in time, and sour'd with self-disgrace,
The spendthrift pays his all, and takes the bankrupt's place.

Thus spoke the venerable sage,
Who ne'er imbib'd Mæonian lore,
Who drew no aids from Maro's page,
And yet to nobler flights could soar.
Taught by the Soliméan maid;
With native elegance array'd
He gave his easy thoughts to flow;
The charms which anxious art deny'd
Truth and simplicity supply'd,
Melodious in religious woe.

Poet in sentiment! He feels
The flame; nor seeks from verse's aid!
The veil which artful charms conceals,
To real beauty proves a shade.
When nature's out-lines dubious are,
Verse decks them with a slight cymarr†;
True charms by art in vain are dress'd.
Not icy prose could damp his fire:
Intense the flame and mounting high'r,
Brightly victorious when oppress'd!

By this time morn in all its glory shone;
The sun's chaste kiss absorb'd the virgin dew:
Th' impatient peasant wish'd his labour done,
The cattle to th' umbrageous streams withdrew:
Beneath a cool impenetrable shade,
Quiet, he mus'd. So Jonas safely sat
(When the swift gourd her palmy leaves display'd)
To see the tow'rs of Ninus bow to fate‡.
Th' Ascetic then drew forth a parchment-scroll,
And thus pour'd out to Heav'n th' effusions of his soul.

THE MEDITATION OF THOMAS A KEMPIS.

(1.) 'Tis vanity to wish for length of days;
The art of living well is wise men's praise.
If death, not length of life, engag'd our view,
Life would be happier, and death happier too (a).
Nature foreshows our death: 'tis God's decree;
The king, the insect dies: and so must we.
What's natural, and common to us all,
What necessary—none should evil call.
Check thy fond love of life, and human pride;
Shall man repine at death, when Christ has dy'd?

* "Even from the flower till the grape was ripe, hath my heart delighted in wisdom."

(2.) He that can calmly view the mask of death,
Will never tremble at the face beneath:
Probationer of Heav'n, he starts no more
To see the last sands ebb, than those before*.

(3.) in vain we argue, boast, elude, descant;—
No man is honest that's afraid of want.
No blood of confessors that bosom warms †,
Which starts at hunger, as the worst of harms. (b)

(4.) The man with Christian perseverance fir'd‡,
Check'd but not stopp'd; retarded but not tir'd;
Straiten'd by foes, yet sure of a retreat,
In Heav'n's protection rests securely great §:
Hears ev'ry sharp alarm without dismay;
Midst dangers dauntless, and midst terrors gay;
Indignant of obstruction glows his flame,
And, struggling, mounts to Heav'n, from whence

it came:
Oppress'd it thrives; its own destroyers tires,
And with unceasing fortitude aspires (c).
When man desponds (of human hope bereft,
Patience and Christian heroism are left (d).
Let patience be thy first and last concern;
The hardest task a Christian has to learn ||:
Life's pendulum in th' other world shall make
Advances, on the side it now goes back.

By force, a virtue of celestial kind
Was never storm'd; by art 'tis undermin'd ¶.

(5.) All seek for knowledge. Knowledge is no more
Than this; to know ourselves, and God adore.
Wouldst thou with profit seek, and learn with Unknown thyself, in solitude remain (e). [gain?—
Virtue retires, but in retirement blooms,
Full of good works, and dying in perfumes **,

“ The vestments of eternity are thine.

“ Art thou a widow ?—God's thy comfort true.

“ Art thou an orphan ?—He's thy father too.”

And know just what imports them not to know (h).

(Once having miss'd the truth, they farther

Sighs for lost joys, and never turns to God (m).

Heav'n more than meets her child with sorrows

Man gives but once, and grudges when we sue ;

Heav'n makes old gifts the precedents for new.

(9.) Afflictions have their use of ev'ry kind ;

At once they humble and exalt the mind :

The ferment of the soul by just degrees

Refines the true clear spirit from the lees (o).

Boast as we will, and argue as we can,

None ever knew the virtues of a man,

Except affliction sifts the flour from bran (p) :

When God for thee thy nature deign'd to wear ?

If slander vilifies the good man's name,

It hurts not, but prevents a future shame.

The censure and reproaches of mankind

Are the true Christian mentors of the mind.

No other way humility is gain'd ;

No other way vain-glory is restrain'd.

Nor worse, nor better we, if praise or blame

Lift or depress—The man is still the same (q).

The happy, if they're wise, must all things fear ;

Nor need th' unhappy, if they're good, despair.

 to strive :

Perfection is the lot of none alive ;

How could we suffer for the sake of God (r) ?

CONTENTMENT, INDUSTRY, AND ACQUIESCENCE UNDER THE DIVINE WILL.

AN ODE.

Written in the Alpine parts of Carniola, 1749.

The wilderness and solitary place shall be glad for them (the children of the Lord): and the desert shall rejoice and blossom like the rose.
It shall blossom abundantly, and rejoice even with joy and singing: The glory of Lebanon shall be given unto it, the excellency of Carmel and Sharon: They shall see the glory of the Lord, and the excellency of our God.

ISAIAH XXXV. 1, 2.

Why dwells my unoffended eye
On yon blank desert's trackless waste;
All dreary earth, or cheerless sky,
Like ocean wild, and bleak, and vast?
'There Lyfidor's enamour'd reed
Ne'er taught the plains Eudofia's praise:
'There herds were rarely known to feed,
Or birds to sing, or flocks to graze.
Yet does my soul complacence find;
All, all from thee,
Supremely gracious Deity,
Corrector of the mind*!

The high arch'd church is lost in sky,
'The base † with thorns and bry'rs is bound;
The yawning fragments nod from high,
With close encircling ivy crown'd:
Heart-thrilling echo multiplies
Voice after voice, creation new!
Beasts, birds obscene, unite their cries:
Graves ope, and spectres frees the view.
Yet nought dismays; and thence we find
'Tis all from thee,
Supremely gracious Deity,
Composer of the mind!

Earth's womb, half dead to Ceres' skill,
Can scarce the cake of off'ring give;
Five acres' corn can hardly fill
The peasant's wain, and bid him live.
The starving beldame gleans in vain,
In vain the hungry chough succeeds:
'They curse the unprolific plain,
The scurf-grown moss, and tawdry weeds.
Yet still sufficiency we find;
All, all from thee,
Supremely gracious Deity,
Corrector of the mind!

December's Boreas issues forth,
In sullen gloom and horror dress'd,
Charg'd with the nitre of the north,
Abhorr'd by man, by bird, and beast.
All nature's lovely tint embrown'd
Sickens beneath the putrid blast:
Destruction withers up the ground,
Like parchment into embers cast*.
Yet health, and strength, and ease we find:
All, all from thee,
Supremely gracious Deity,
Composer of the mind!

Tremble, and yonder Alp behold †,
Where half dead nature gasps below,
Victim of everlasting cold,
Entomb'd alive in endless snow.
The northern side is horror all;
Against the southern Phœbus plays;
In vain th' innoxious glimm'rings fall,
'The frost outlives, out-shines the rays:
Yet consolation still I find;
And all from thee,
Supremely gracious Deity,
Corrector of the mind!

Bless me! how doubly sharp it blows;
From Zemblan and Tartarian coasts!
In sullen silence fall the snows,
The only lustre nature boasts;
The nitrous pow'r with tenfold force
Half petrifies earth's barren womb,
High arch'd cascades suspend their force,
Men freeze alive, and in the tomb.
Yet warmth and happiness we find;
All, all from thee,
Supremely gracious Deity,
Composer of the mind!

Then, in exchange, a month or more
The sun with fierce solstitial gleams
Darting o'er vales his raging pow'r,

The solar darts like lightning fly,
Transpierce the skull, and scorch the brain.

He left his empire to his foes,

With his own hands the monarch wrought,
And chang'd a throne for Ceres' wealth.

ADVERTISEMENT.

As this poem is an imperfect attempt to imitate Dryden's manner, I have of course admitted more triplets and Alexandrine verses than I might otherwise have done. Upon the whole, many good judges have thought (and such was the private opinion of my much honoured friend Elijah Fenton in particular) that Dryden has too many Alexandrines and triplets, and Pope too few. The one by aiming at variety (for his ear was excellent) was betrayed into a careless diffusion; and the other, by affecting an over scrupulous regularity, fell into sameness and restraint.

We speak this with all due deference to the two capital poets of the last and present century; and say of them, as the successor of Virgil said of Amphiaras and Admetus:

AMBO BONI, CHARIQUE AMBO.—
Theb. vi.

INTRODUCTION.

DRYDEN, forgive the muse that apes thy voice,
Weak to perform, but fortunate in choice.
Who but thyself the mind and ear can please
With strength and softness, energy and ease;
Various of numbers, new in ev'ry strain,
Diffus'd, yet terse, poetical, though plain:
Diversify'd 'midst unison of chime;
Freer than air, yet manacled with rhyme?
Thou mak'st each quarry which thou seek'st thy
prize,
The reigning eagle of Parnassian skies;
Now soaring 'midst the tracts of light and air,
And now the monarch of the woods and lair*.—
Two kingdoms thy united realm compose,
The land of poetry, and land of prose.
Each orphan-muse thy absence inly mourns;
Makes short excursions, and as quick returns:
No more they triumph in their fancy'd bays,
But, crown'd with woodbine dedicate their lays.

Thy thoughts and music change with ev'ry line;
No sameness of a prattling stream is thine,
Which with one unison of murmur flows;
Opiate of inattention and repose!
(So Huron-leeches, when their patient lies
In sev'rish restlessness, with unclos'd eyes,
Apply with gentle strokes their osier rod,
And tap by tap invite the sleepy god †.)

* Layer, lair, and lay, the surface of arable or grass-lands. Chaucer, Folkingham, 1610; Dryden. Laire also signifies the place where beasts sleep in the fields, and where they leave the mark of their bodies on young corn, grass, &c.

† Voyages du Baron La Hontan.

No—'tis thy pow'r (thine only), though in rhyme,

To vary ev'ry pause, and ev'ry chime;
Infinite descant*! sweetly wild and true,
Still shifting, still improving, and still new!—
In quest of classic-plants, and where they grow,
We trace thee, like a lev'ret in the snow.

Of all the pow'rs the human mind can boast,
The pow'rs of poetry are latest lost:
The falling of thy tresses at threescore,
Gave room to make thy laurels show the more †.

This prince of poets, who before us went,
Had a vast income, and profusely spent:
Some have his lands, but none his treasure'd store,
Lands unmanur'd by us, and mortgag'd o'er and o'er!

"About his wreaths the vulgar muses strive,
"And with a touch their wither'd bays revive ‡"
They kiss his tomb, and are enthusiasts made;
So Statius slept, inspir'd by Virgil's shade §.
To Spenser much, to Milton much is due;
But in great Dryden we preserve the two.

* Milton.

† The verses of Robert Waring (a friend of Dr. Donne's) on a poet in the beginning of the last century, may be applied to Dryden:

gistræ. SYLV. Lib. IV.

What muse but his can nature's beauties hit,
Or catch that airy fugitive call'd wit?

From limbs of this great Hercules are fram'd
Whole groups of pigmies, who are verse-men
nam'd:

Each has a little soul he calls his own,
And each enunciates with a human tone:
Alike in shape; unlike in strength and size;
One lives for ages, one just breathes and dies.

O thou, too great to rival or to praise;
Forgive, lamented shade, these duteous lays.
Lee had thy fire, and Congreve had thy wit;
And copyists here and there, some likeness hit;
But none possess'd thy graces and thy ease;
In thee alone 'twas natural to please!

More still I think, and more I wish to say;
But bus'ness calls the muse another way.

In those fair vales by nature form'd to please,
Where Guadalquiver serpentine with ease,
(The richest tract the Andalusians know,
Fertile in herbage, grateful to the plough),
A lovely villa stood (suppose it mine),
Rich without cost, and without labour fine;
Indulgent nature all her beauties brought,
And art withdrew, unask'd for, and unsought.
For lo, th' Iberians by tradition found
That the whole district once was classic ground;
Here Columella first improv'd the plains,
And show'd Ascrean arts to simple swains:
Taught by the Georgic muse the lyre he strung,
And sung what dying Virgil left unsung*.

Fatigu'd with courts, and votary to truth,
Hither I fled, philosopher, and youth:
And, leaving Olivarez to sustain
Th' encumbering falces of ambitious Spain,
(As once rash Phaeton usurp'd a day,
Mistled the seasons, and mistook his way),
I chose to wander in the silent wood,
Or breathe my aspirations to the flood,
Studying the humble science to be good.
From the brute beasts humanity I learn'd,
And in the pansy's life God's providence discern'd.

'Twas now the joyous season of the year:
The sun had reach'd the Twins in bright career;
Nature, awaken'd from six month's repose,
Sprung from her verdant couch; and active rose
Like health refresh'd with wine; she smil'd,
array'd [glad,
With all the charms of sun-shine, stream, and
New drest, and blooming as a bridal maid.

Yet all these charms could never lull to rest
A peevish irksomeness which teaz'd my breast;
The vernal torrent, murmur'ing from afar,
Whisper'd no peace to calm this nervous war;
And Philomel, the syren of the plain,
Sung soporific unisons in vain.
I sought my bed, in hopes relief to find;
But restlessness was mistress of my mind.
My wayward limbs were turn'd, and turn'd in vain,
Yet free from grief was I, and void of pain.
In me, as yet, ambition had no part;
Pride had not sour'd, nor wealth debas'd my heart.

Et quæ

Virgilius nobis post se memoranda reliquit.

COLUM. de Hortis. L. X.

I knew nor public cares, nor private strife;
And love, the blessing, or the curse of life,
Had only hover'd round me like a dream,
Play'd on the surface, not disturb'd the stream.

Yet still I felt, what young men often feel;
(Impossible to tell, or to conceal),
When nothing makes them sick but too much wealth,

Or wild o'erboiling of ungovern'd health;
Whose grievance is satiety of ease,
Freedom their pain, and plenty their disease.
By night, by day, from pole to pole they run;
Or from the setting seek the rising sun:
No poor deserting soldier makes such haste,
No doves pursu'd by falcons fly so fast;
And when Automedon at length attains
The place he sought for with such cost and pains,
Swift to embrace, and eager to pursue,
He finds he has no earthly thing to do;
Then yawns for sleep, the opium of the mind,
The last dull refuge indolence can find*.

Most men, like David, wayward in extremes,
Languish for Ramah's cisterns, and her streams:
The bev'rage sought for comes; capricious, they
Lothe their own choice, and wish the boon away†.

Such was my state. "O gentle Sleep," I cry'd,
"Why is thy gift to me alone deny'd?
"Mildest of beings, friend to ev'ry clime,
"Where lies my error, what has been my crime?
"Beasts, birds, and cattle feel thy balmy rod;
"The drowsy mountains wave, and seem to nod:
"The torrents cease to chide, the seas to roar,
"And the hush'd waves recline upon the shore."
Perhaps the wretch, whose God is wealth and
care,

Rejects the precious object of my pray'r:
Th' ambitious statesman strives not to partake
Thy blessings, but desires to dream awake:
"The lover rudely thrusts thee from his arms,
"And like Ixion clasps imagin'd charms.
"Thence come to me.—Let others ask for more;
"I ask the slightest influence of thy pow'r:
"Swiftest in flight of all terrestrial things,
"Oh only touch my eyelids with thy wings‡!"

So spoke I restless; and, then springing light
From my tir'd bed, walk'd forth in mere despite.
What impulse mov'd my steps I dare not say;
Perhaps some guardian angel mark'd the way.
By this time Phosphor had his lamp withdrawn,
And rising Phœbus glow'd on ev'ry lawn.

|| The Spanish author introduces the following passages from Lucretius.

Why dost thou not give thanks as at a plenteous feast, [thy rest?

Cramm'd to the throat with life, and rise and take
But, if my blessings thou hast thrown away,
If indigested joys pass'd through and would not stay,

Why dost thou wish for more to squander still?

If life be grown a load, a real ill,
And I would all thy cares and labours end,
Lay down thy burthen, fool! and know thy friend.
To please thee, I have empty'd all my store,
I can invent and can supply no more:
But run the round again; the round I ran before.

Suppose thou art not broken yet with years,
Yet still the self-same scene of things appears,
And would be ever, couldst thou ever live;
For life is still but life, there's nothing new to give.

What can we plead against so just a bill?

We stand convicted, and our cause goes ill.

But if a wretch, a man oppress'd by fate,
Should beg of nature to prolong his date,
She speaks aloud to him, with more disdain;
Be still, thou martyr-fool, thou covetous of pain.

But if an old decrepid sot lament;

What, thou! she cries, who hast outliv'd content?

Dost thou complain, who hast enjoy'd my store?—

But this is still th' effect of wishing more!

Unsatisfy'd with all that nature brings,

Loathing the present, liking absent things.

From hence it comes, thy vain desires at strife

Within themselves, have tantaliz'd thy life;

And ghastly death appear'd before thy sight

E'er thou hast gorg'd thy soul and senses with delight.

Now leave those joys, unsuited to thy age,
To a fresh comer, and resign the stage. [thy head.

" Meantime, when thoughts of death disturb

Consider, Ancus, great and good, is dead:

Ancus, thy better far, was born to die;

And thou, dost thou bewail mortality?*

Charm'd with these lines of reason and good sense,

(No matter who the author was, nor whence),

I stopp'd, and into contemplation fell;

Amaz'd an impious wit should think so well;

Who often (to his own and reader's cost)

To show the atheist, half the poet lost.

(Knowing too much, makes many a muse unfit;

'Tis not the bloom, but plethora of wit.—)

At length a drowsiness arrested thought,

And sleep (as is her custom) came unsought.

Now listen to the purport of my tale.

Methought I wander'd in a fairy vale:

Replete with people of each sex and age;

Good, bad, great, small, the foolish, and the sage:

Whilst on the ground promiscuously were laid

Stars, mitres, rags, the sceptre, and the spade.

At length a haughty dame approach'd my view;

Whom by no single attribute I knew;

For all that painters feign, and bards devize,

Is mere mock-imag'ry, and artful lyes.

Boldly she look'd, like one of high degree;

Yet never seem'd to cast a glance on me;

* Lucret. L. III. translated by Dryden

At which I inly joy'd; for truth to say,
I felt an unknown awe, and some dismay.
She pass'd me: her side-face was smooth and fair;

When, turning short, and unperceiv'd by me,
She grasp'd my throat, and spoke with stern authority:

The future doubtful, and the former past!
Yet, as I read contrition in thy eyes,
And thy breast heaves with terror and surprize,
(I, who as yet was never known to show
False pity to premeditated woe)

She spoke, and led me by a private way,
Where a small winding path half-printed lay:
Then turning short, an avenue we 'spy'd,
Long, smoothly pav'd, magnificently wide.
Dark cypresses the skirting sides adorn'd,
And gloomy yew-trees, which for ever mourn'd:
Whilst, on the margin of the beaten road,
Its pallid bloom sick-smelling henbane show'd;
Next emblematic rosemary appear'd,
And lurid hemlock its stain'd stalks uprear'd,
(God's signature to man in evil hour!—)
Nor were the night-shades wanting, nor the pow'r

Of thorn'd Stramonium, nor the sickly flow'r

Of cloying mandrakes; the deceitful root
Of the monk's fraudulent cowl *, and Plinian fruit †.
Hypericon was ‡ there, the god of war,
Pierc'd through with wounds, and seam'd with many a scar:

Add pale nymphaea § with her clay-cold breath;
And poppies which suborn the sleep of death.

This avenue (mysterious to relate)
Surpris'd me much, and warn'd me of my fate.
Its length at first approach enormous seem'd;
Full half a thousand stadia || as I deem'd:
But then the road was smooth and fair to see:

(With such insensible declivity)
That what men thought a tedious course to run,
Was finish'd oft the hour it first begun.

Sudden, arriving at a palace-gate,
I saw a spectre in the portal wait:
An ill-shap'd monster, hideous to be seen;
She seem'd, methought, the mother of the queen ¶.

Opening their valves, self-mov'd on either
side,

The adamantine doors expanded wide:
When death commands they close, when death commands divide.

Then quick we enter'd a magnificent hall,
Where groups of trophies over-spread the wall.
In fable scrawls I Nero's name perus'd,
And Herod's, with a sanguine stain suffus'd;
While Numa's name adorn'd a radiant place,
And that of Titus deck'd a milk-white space.

Now, cry'd the Pow'r of Death, survey me
well:

Thy shame, remorse, and disappointment tell;
Why dost thou tremble still, and whence thy dread?

Why shake thy lips, and why thy colour fled?
Speak, vassal, recognize thy sov'reign queen:
Hast thou ne'er seen me? Know'st thou not me,
seen?

"Liege-mistress, whom the greatest kings adore,
I own my homage, and confess thy pow'r.
Alone, that sov'reignty on earth is thine,
Which justly proves its claim to right divine:
Thine is the old hereditary sway,
Which mortals ought, and mortals must obey.
But, empress, thou hast not the form I deem'd:
Velasquez † painted lies, and Camoens ‡ dream'd:
I thought to meet, (as late as heav'n might grant!)
A skeleton, ferocious, tall, and gaunt;

dangerous sort of aconite.

This plant is called by us the herb of war, not merely because its juice is of a bloody colour, but because it is one of the principal vulnerary herbs used in making the fa-

‡ The reason is, that what here happens is a vision, and not a reality.

Whose loose teeth in their naked sockets shook,
And grinn'd terrific, a Sardonian look *.
I thought, besides, thy right-hand aim'd a dart,
Resistless, to transpierce the human heart,
And that thy likeness of a head sustain'd
A regal crown †: but all was false, or feign'd.

" I see thee now, delusive as thou art,
Without one symbol to alarm the heart:
Not ev'n upon thy flowing vest is shown
An emblematic dart, or charnal-bone;
I rather see it, glorious to behold,
With rubies edg'd, and purpled o'er with gold:
Gay annual flow'rs adorn each vacant space,
Of short-liv'd beauty, and uncertain grace.—
Artificer of fraud and deep disguise!
Prompt to perform, ingenious to surprize:
In ev'ry light (as far as man can see
By thy consent) supreme hypocrisy!
Punish thy hopelefs captive if he lies.—
Instead of a scalp'd skull, and empty eyes,
Bones without flesh, and (as we all suppose)
Vacuity of lips, and cheeks, and nose,
(So dextrous is thy sorcery and care!)
I see a woman tolerably fair.

" Instead of sable robes and mournful geer, }
Cameleon-like, a thousand garbs you wear, }
Nor bear the black and solemn thrice a year;
Drest in gay robes, whose shifting colours show
The varying glories of the show'ry bow,
Glowing with waves of gold; sea-tinctur'd green,
Rich azure, and the bloomy grideline ‡.

" Thus in appearances you cheat us all,
Plan our disgraces, and contrive our fall;
Something you show, that ev'ry fool may hit,
With mirth you treat, and bait that mirth with wit:

False hopes, the loves and graces of your train,
(Pimps to the great, th' ambitious, and the vain,)
Summon your guests, and in attendance wait;
While you, like eastern queens, conceal'd in state,
O'erlook the whole: th' audacious jest refine,
Smile on the feast §, and sparkle in the wine.
Arachne thus in ambush'd covert lies;
Wits, atheists, jobbers, statesmen, are the flies.
Doom'd to be lost, they dream of no deceit,
And, fond of rum, overlook the cheat;
Pride stands for joy, and riches for delight:—
Weak men love weakness, in their own despite;
And, finding in their native funds no ease,
Assume the garb of fools, and hope to please.—
Wretches, when sick of life, for ratbane call:
*Twere worth our while to give them foolbane all:
Since by degrees each misconceiving elf
Is ruin'd, not by nature, but himself.

* According to the ancients the herba fardoa, or apium risus, (by some supposed to be the water crow-foot) brought on, after being eaten, such horrid convulsions, that the party died grinning, through the extremity of agony.

Stat. Theb. L. IV. v. 527.

" Too late I see thy fraudulent face entire:
One half halfmimics health; halfmeans desire;
And, though true youth and nature have no part,
Yet paint enlivens it, and wiles, and art;
Colours laid on with a true harlot-grace;
They only show themselves, and hide the face.
The other half is hideous to behold,
Ugly as grandame-apes, and full as old.
There time has spent the fury of his course,
And plough'd and harrow'd with repeated force:
One blinking eye with scalding rheum suffus'd,
A leg contracted, and an arm difus'd;
An half-liv'd emblem, fit for man to see;
An hemiplegia of deformity!

" But, princess, to thy cunning be it known, }
This emblematic side is rarely shown; }
Man would start back if wedded to the crone. }
Side-long it is your custom to advance,
Show the fair half, and hide the foul, askance;
And, like a vet'ran tempter, cast an eye
Of glancing blandishment in passing by.

" By stealing side-ways with a silent pace,
Man rarely sees the moral of your face:
And (what's the dang'rous frenzy of the whim)
Concludes, you've no immediate call for him.
Adjoin to this, your necromantic pow'r,
Contracting half an age to half an hour.
Just so the cyphers from the unit fled,
When Malicorn the demon's contract read *.
The unit in the foremost column stood,
And the two cyphers were obscur'd with blood †.

" Two other mistress-arts you make your own;
To Circe and Urganda arts unknown:
When men look on you, and your steps survey,
You seem to glide afloat another way:
But the first moment they withdraw their eye,
Swift you take wing, and like a vulture fly,
Which snuffs the distant quarry in the wind,
And marks the carcase she is sure to find.—
The next deception is more wondrous still;
O grand artificer of fraud and ill!
When the sick man up-lifts the fash t' inhale
Th' enlivening breezes of the western gale,
To snatch one glimpse of ease from flow'ry fields,
And (fancying) taste the joy which nature yields;
Far as the landscape's verge admits his view,
He sees a phantom, and concludes it you.
A gleam of courage then relieves his breast,
Be calm my soul, he cries, and take thy rest ‡:
When at that moment, dreadful to relate,
(For all but he that ought observe his fate),

* D. of Guise, a Tragedy. Dryden.

† Malicorn was an astrologer advanced in years, but, being ambitious of making a great figure in this world, made over his soul to Satan, upon condition that he enjoyed earthly grandeur for 100 years more. The contract was written, signed and sealed in due form, when lo, at the expiration of one year, the evil spirit entered Malicorn's chamber, preceded by thunder and lightning, and demanded him as his forfeit. The astrologer was exceedingly terrified, and, after making many remonstrances, insisted on seeing the original contract; but the cyphers in number 100 were written with evanescent ink, and the figure 1 only remained legible. The moral of this fiction is incomparable. See Act V. Sc. 5.

Behind his curtains with up-lifted hand,
Thee, real thee! to drive the deadly dart,
And at one sudden stroke transpierce the heart!"

"Culprit, thou hast thy piteous story told,
As trite as Priam's tale, and twice as old,
Reply'd the Queen: painters and bards, 'tis true,
Have neither lung me right, nor justly drew:
I am not the gaunt spectre they devise [eyes.—
With chop-fall'n mouth, and with extinguish'd
Whether enlighten'd with a heavenly ray,
Or whether thou hast better guess'd than they,
I say not; yet thus much I must confess,
Thy knowledge is superior, or thy guess.
I own the fei, n'd retreat, th' oblique advance,
The flight I take unseen, th' illusive glance,
The blandishments of artificial grace,
The sound, the palsy'd limbs, and double face.
All I contend for (there the question lies)
Is this; let men but look through wisdom's eyes,
And death ne'er takes them by a false surprise."

"Did not thy Maker, when he gave thee birth,
Create thee out of perishable earth?
Where hot, and cold, the rough, and lenient fight,
The hard, and soft, the heavy, and the light:
Whilst ev'ry atom fretted to decay
The heterogeneous lump of jarring clay?—
Was not just death entail'd on thee and all,
(Such the decree of heav'n) in Adam's fall?
The parent-plant receiv'd a taint at root,
Hence the weak branches, hence the sickly fruit."

"Thus with spring's genial balm and sunshine
The annual flowret lifts its tender head, [fed
In summer blooming, and at winter dead;
Nay, if by chance a lasting plant be found,
Whose roots pierce deep th' inhospitable ground;
Whose verdant leaves (life's common autumn past)
Bid fair t' outlive the bitter wintry blast,
And green old age predicts a vernal shoot;—
I lend my hand to pluck both branch and root.—
Man is no more perennial than a flow'r;
Some may live years, some months, and some an hour."

When first thou gav'st the promise of a man,
When th' embryon-speck of entity began,
Was not the plastic atom at a strife,
'Twixt death ambiguous and a twilight life,
Struggling with dubious shade and dubious light,
Like the moon's orb; whilst nations in affright
Hope for new day, but fear eternal night?

When motionless the half-form'd fœtus lay,
And doubtful life just gleam'd a glimm'ring ray,
When nature bade the vital tide to roll,
I cloth'd with crust of flesh that gem the soul;
My mortal dart th' immortal stream defil'd,
And the fire's frailties flow'd into the child.
The very milk his pious mother gave
Turn'd poison, and but nurs'd him for the grave*.
In ev'ry atom that his frame compos'd
I weak to strong, unsound to sound oppos'd.
Cruel, and proud of a deputed reign,
I ting'd the limpid stream with gloomy pain;

* Consider, O man, what thou wert before thy birth, what thou art from thy birth to thy death, and what thou shalt be after death. Thou wast made of an impure substance, and clothed and nourished in thy mother's blood.

 Triumphant, like an eygre*, o'er the waves:
 Casually lucky, fortunately great,
 Ten times his planet overcame his fate.
 Riches flow'd in; and accidents were kind;
 Health join'd her opium to delude the mind†;
 Whilst pride was gratify'd in ev'ry view,
 And pow'r had scarce an object to pursue;
 Cramm'd to the throat with happiness and ease,
 Till nature's self could do no more to please.—
 Vain-glorious mortal, to profusion blest!
 And almost by prosperity distressed!
 Whilst poets, the worst pandars of the age,

† Prosperous health and uninterrupted ease are often the occasion of some fatal misfortunes. Thus a long peace makes men unguarded, and sometimes unmindful, in matters of war: It being observed, that the most signal overthrow is usually given us, when an unexpected enemy surpriseth us in the deep sleep of peace and security."

ST. GREGOR, the Great.

‡ Parasitical plants, according to the language of botanists, will not grow in the common matrix of the earth; but their seeds, being dispersed by winds, take root in the excrementitious parts of a decayed tree, or arise as an excrescence from the exsudations of some tree or plant.
 Thus the dodder (cuscuta) formerly called pella-mountain, grows usually on flax; and therefore the Italian peasant calls it podagra di linio.

§ The Arabians and Italians (imitating the Greek word ἐπιθιμία) call this adscititious plant esitimo and epithimio; but very few of our English botanists make mention of it. As far as I have hitherto seen, only one of our herbalists has touched upon it, namely
 Peter Treveris, who flourished about the reign of Henry
 VII. He calls it epithimy. For my own part, not caring to invent new words in poetry, I have thought proper to retain the word which he (Treveris) has used,
 as it is well-sounding, and not inelegant.

And kept her love alive and like to last,
 Beyond the date her Pompey was disgrac'd.
 But nothing certain (as the wise man* found)
 Is to be deem'd on sublunary ground.

Join'd to good fortune, 'twas our courtier's lot
 To serve a prince who ne'er his friends forgot:
 Humane, discreet, compassionate, and brave;
 Not milder when he lov'd, than when forgave.
 Gen'rous of promise, punctual in the deed;
 Grac'd with more candor than most monarchs
 A milkiness of blood his heart possess'd; [need.
 With grief he punish'd, and with transport blest'd†.

As noblest metals are most ductile found,
 Great souls with mild compassion most abound.
 The golden eye with soft complacence takes
 Each speaking lineament th' engraver makes,
 And wears a faithful image for mankind,
 True to the features, truer to the mind:
 Whilst stubborn iron (like a barren soil
 To lab'ring hinds) eludes the artist's toil;
 To ev'ry stroke ungrateful and unjust,
 Corrodes itself, or hardens into rust.

Good-nature, in the language from above‡,
 Is universal charity and love:
 Patient of wrongs, and enemy to strife;
 Basis of virtue, and the staff of life!
 Whilst av'rice, private censure, public rage,
 Are th' old man's hobby-horse, and crutch of age,
 Party conducts us to the meanest ends;
 Party made Herod and a Pilate friends§.

Scorn'd be the bard, and banish'd ev'n from schools,
 Who first immortaliz'd man-killing fools;
 Blockheads in council, bloody in command:
 Warriors—not of the head, but of the hand;
 True brethren of the iron-pated Swede||:
 They fight like Ajax, and like Ajax read.

Of all the great and harmless things below,
 Only an elephant is truly so.
 (Thus writes a wit¶, well-known a cent'ry past;
 Forgotten now; yet still his fame shall last).
 Kings have their follies; statesmen have their arts;
 Wealth spoils the great; beauty ensnares our hearts;
 And wits are doubly dup'd by having parts.
 Some have ten times the parts they ought to use;
 "A great wit's greatest work is to refuse‡!"
 Never, O bards, the warning voice despise;—
 To add is dang'rous, to retrench is wise.
 Poets, instead of saying what they could,
 Must only say the very thing they should.
 This mighty ΕΤΡΗΚΑ reserv'd for few,
 Virgil and Boileau, Pope and Dryden knew.

Who quits the solid road, and well-beat lanes,
(Sick of his track, and punish'd for his pains),
To mimic galloping on green-swarth plains.
So, in the daily work she labours at,
The swallow toils, and rises with a gnat.—

It chanc'd as through his groves our monarch
stray'd,

T' enjoy the coolness of a summer shade,
Wrapt up in virtuous schemes of means and ends,
To reconcile his foes or bless his friends,
He spy'd a figure, which by shape he knew,
In a lone grotto half-conceal'd from view:
Thither the prudent wanderer had retir'd,
As modesty and well-bred sense requir'd:
Studious of manners, fearful to intrude
On precious hours of royal solitude.

Amariel, cry'd the Prince, I know thee well,
Invelop'd in the umbrage of a cell:

I like thy modesty, with manners fraught;
But, as my spirits ask a pause from thought,
Walk with thy master, and with him inhale
The cooling freshness of the western gale.

Amariel, added he, and gently smil'd,
This grove's my kingdom, and each tree my child:

§ The Heliotrope, or sun-flower, called by the Italians, orologio dei cortegiani.

|| Sir Martin Marr-all, in a comedy of Dryden's writing.

Whatever then my bounty can provide;
Whatever by my friendship be supply'd;
As far as faith can bind, or speech can say,
Ask, and I meet thy wishes half the way.

The servant bow'd, and gratitude express'd;
Such gratitude as dwells in courtier's breast:
Pleas'd to the height of transport he retir'd;
His fears were calm'd, and his ambition fir'd.
Unhappy man, in both his objects wrong;
The weak he trusted, and forgot the strong!

Six years were past, when lo, by slow degrees,
A fever did his limbs and spirits seize:
Advancing gently, no alarm it makes,
(Like murr'ring Indians gliding through the brakes:)

But, having mark'd her sure approaches well,
She storms, and nothing can her force repell.
Instant, a liquid fire inflames the blood,
Whilst spasms impede the self-refining flood:
Petechial spots th' approach of death proclaim,
Redd'ning like comets with vindictive flame;
Whilst wand'ring talk, and moppings wild, pre-
sage

Moon-struck illusion, and conclude in rage.
Inevitable death alarms the heart;
Nature stands by, and bids her aim the dart.

The sick man, stupify'd with fear and woe,
Had hardly words to speak, or tears to flow;
At length in broken sounds was heard to cry,
Grant me to see my master, ere I die.

The master came. Ah, prince, Amariel said,
Now keep thy promise, and extend thy aid;
Unfurl my tangled thread of human breath,
And call me back one year, before my death.

The prince (for he was wise, and good withall),
Stood like a statue, mortiz'd to the wall:

At length, recov'ring from amazement, broke
An awful silence, and thus gravely spoke:
Amariel, sure thy pangs disturb thy brain:
The boon you ask is blasphemous and vain:
Am I a god, to alter death's decree?
That's the prerogative of heav'n, not me!

Then, cried Amariel, with a hasty tone,
Gain me a week, three days, or gain me one.

Impossible again! the prince reply'd;
Sure thy disease to madness is ally'd:
Ask me for riches—freely I resign
A third or half, and bid thee make them thine.
Whate'er the world can human greatness call,
Pow'r, rank, grants, titles, I'll bestow them all.
Then die in peace, or with contentment live,
Nor ask a gift no mortal pow'r can give.

With eyes that flash'd with eagerness and fire
The sick man then propos'd a new desire:

“As deaths dread tyranny has no controul,
“Can you ensure the safety of my soul?”

Anxious and doubtful for my future state,
I read the danger, but I read too late.

The prince stood mute; compassion and amaze
Tore his divided heart ten thousand ways:
And, having rightly weigh'd the sick man's pray'r,
Thus he replied in sorrow and despair:

“Salvation of the soul by grace is giv'n;—

“Unalienable is the grace of Heav'n.

“I tremble at the rash request you make,

“Which is not mine to grant, or yours to take.”

Amariel then, with disappointment spent,
Turn'd from his prince in mournful discontent.

And, lifting up to heav'n his hands and eyes,
Thus in a flood of tears obtests the skies:

"Wretch that I am, unworthy of my breath;
"Deceiv'd when living, and deceiv'd in death!
"Why did I waste my strength, my cares, my
fame

"To serve a master—master but in name?
"An ethnic idol, for delusion made;
"Eyes without sight, protection without aid?
"Unable to bestow the good we want,
"And ready, what avails us not, to grant!
"Deceitful, impotent, unuseful pow'r;
"Which can give di'monds, but not give an hour!
"At Rimmon's shrine no longer will I bow,
"But thus to th' all-pow'rful King address my
"vow:

"O thou, the only great, and good, and wise,
"Ruler of earth, and monarch of the skies;
"Thou whom th' intents of virtuous actions please;
"Whose laws are freedom, and whose service
"ease*:

"Whose mercy waits th' offender to the grave,
"Willing to hear; omnipotent to save!
"Who ne'er forgot one meritorious deed,
"Nor left a servant in the hour of need.
"To mercy and to equity inclin'd;
"Who mind'st the heart and tenor of the mind†.
"Forgive my error, and my life restore;
"Thee will I serve alone, and thee adore!
"Farewell earth's deities and idols all!

"Moloch and Mammon, Chion‡, Dagon, Baal:
"Whose Chemarims § tread their fantastic rounds
"O'er Aven's || plains, and dance to Tyrian sounds.
"Hence false Astarte ¶, who the world suborns;
"Life's lambent meteor gliss'ring round her horns.
"Let Thammuz moan his self inflicted pain,
"And Sidon's stream run purple to the main.
"No star of Remphan  shall attract my sight,
"Shorn of its beams, and gleaning sickly light:
"Malignant orb! which tempts bewilder'd swains
"To gulfs, to quicksands, and waste trackless
"plains!

"By thee the false Achitophel was led; [bed.
"And Haman †† dy'd aloft, and made a cloud his
"From worldly hopes and false dependance
"freed,

"I'll seek no safety from a splinter'd reed;
"Which causes those to fall, who wish to stand;
"Or, if it aids the steps, gangrenes the hand ††.
"How vain is all the chemic wealth of pow'r!
"Sought for an age, and squander'd in an hour;
"Full late we learn, in sickness, pains, and woe,
"What in high health 'twas possible to know.

One Pope is the slow child-birth of one age.

He often used to say, that for ten years together he firmly resisted the importunity of friends and flatterers, when they solicited him to undertake a translation of Virgil after Dryden. Nor did he ever mistake the extent of his talents, but in the following trivial instance; and that was, when he writ his Ode to Music on St. Cecilia's day, induced perhaps by a secret ambition of rivalling the inimitable Dryden. ¶ This alludes to a well-known fact in the duchy of Carniola, where the present ode was written.

About the year 1675, a nobleman was riding at night upon a road which goes near the edge of the precipice here mentioned. Mistaking his way (and that for a few steps only) his horse stopped short, and refused to go on; upon which the rider, who, in all probability was heated with liquor (otherwise he ought to have known the precipice better, it being not far from his own castle), lost both his temper and prudence, and spurred the horse with great anger; upon which the poor beast took a desperate leap, intending, as was imagined, to have reached another angle of the precipice on the same side which the road lay. The horse fell directly into the torrent, two or three hundred feet beneath, and was hurried away with such rapidity that the body was never found. The nobleman was discovered next day in an opening of the rock, about half-way down, where a few bushes grew; and as the saddle was found not far from him, it was supposed that the horse, by the violence of the effort he made, burst the saddle-girths. The rider lived many years after this wonderful escape, and, out of gratitude to God, erected a beautiful chapel on the edge of the precipice, dedicated (if I mistake not) to St. Anthony of Padua.

I made a drawing of the chapel, precipice, torrent, and nobleman's castle; of which a copy was taken afterwards by the celebrated draftsman Visentini, at Venice, in 1750.

We want, we wish; we change, we change agen;
Yet know not how to ask, nor what, nor when.

DRYDEN.

It is a German word, and adopted by our best writers
in the beginning and middle of the last century.

He gave, whilst aught he had, and knew no bounds;
The poor man's drachma stood for rich men's pounds,

He learnt with patience, and with meekness taught
His life was but the comment of his thought.

Hence, ye vain-glorious Shaftesburys, allow
That men had more religion then than now.
Whether they nearer liv'd to the blest times
When man's Redeemer bled for human crimes;
Whether the hermits of the desert fraught
With living practice, by example taught;
Or whether, with transmissive virtues fir'd,
(Which Chrysostoms all-eloquent inspir'd,)
They caught the sacred flame—I spare to say.
Religion's sun still shot an ev'ning-ray.

On the south aspect of a sloping hill,
Whose skirts meand'ring Peneus washes still,
Our pious lab'rer pass'd his youthful days
In peace and charity, in pray'r and praise.
No theatres or oaks around him rise, [skies;
Whose roots earth's centre touch, whose head the
No stately larch-tree there expands a shade
O'er half a rood * of Larissæan glade:
No lofty poplars catch the murmur'ing breeze,
Which loit'ring whispers on the cloud-capp'd trees;
Such imagin'ry of greatness ill became

A nameless dwelling, and an unknown name!
Instead of forest-monarchs, and their train,
The unambitious rose bedeck'd the plain:
Trifoliate cytusus restrain'd its boughs
For humble sheep to crop, and goats to browse.
On skirting heights thick stood the clust'ring vine
And here and there the sweet-leav'd eglantine;
One liliac only, with a statelier grace,
Presum'd to claim the oak's and cedar's place,
And, looking round him with a monarch's care,
Spread his exalted boughs to wave in air.

This spot, for dwelling fit, Eulogius chose,
And in a month a decent home-stall rose,
Something, between a cottage and a cell.—
Yet virtue here could sleep, and peace could dwell,
From living stone (but not of Parian rocks),
He chipp'd his pavement, and he squar'd his blocks:
And then, without the aid of neighbours' art,
Perform'd the carpenter's and glazier's part.
The site was neither granted him, nor giv'n;
'Twas nature's; and the ground-rent due to heav'n.

Wife he had none: Nor had he love to spare;
An aged mother wanted all his care.

They thank'd their Maker for a pittance sent,
Supp'd on a turnip, slept upon content.

Four rooms, above, below, this mansion grac'd,
With white-wash deck, and river-sand o'er-cast:
The first, (forgive my verse if too diffuse,)
Perform'd the kitchen's and the parlour's use:
The second, better bolted and immur'd,
From wolves his out-door family secur'd:
(For he had twice three kids, besides their dams;
A cow, a spaniel, and two fav'rite lambs:)
A third, with herbs perfum'd, and rushes spread,
Held, for his mother's use, a feather'd bed:
Two moss-matresses in the fourth were shown;
One for himself, for friends and pilgrims one.

* See the note to page 880.

A ground-plot square five hives of bees contains;
Emblems of industry and virtuous gains *!
Pilaster's jas'mines 'twixt the windows grew,
With lavender beneath, and sage and rue.
Pulse of all kinds diffus'd their od'rous powers,
When nature pencils butterflies † on flow'rs:
Nor were the cole-worts wanting, nor the root
Which after-ages call Hybernian fruit.
There, at a wish, much chamomile was had;
(The conscience of man's stomach good or bad;)
Spoon-wort ‡ was there, scorbutics to supply;
And centaury to clear the jaundic'd eye;
And that §, which on the baptist's vigil sends
To nymphs and swains the vision of their friends.
Else physical and kitchen-plants alone
His skill acknowledge, and his culture own.
Each herb he knew, that works or good or ill,
More learn'd than Mesva ||, half as learn'd as Hill;

For great the man, and useful, without doubt,
Who seasons pottage—or expels the gout;
Whose science keeps life in, and keeps death out!

No flesh from market-towns our peasant sought;
He rear'd his frugal meat, but never bought:
A kid sometimes for festivals he slew;
The choicer part was his sick neighbour's due:
Two bacon-flitches made his Sunday's cheer;
Some the poor had, and some out-liv'd the year:
For roots and herbage, (rais'd at hours to spare),
With humble milk, compos'd his usual fare.
(The poor man then was rich, and liv'd with glee;
Each barley-head untaxt, and day-light free:)
All had a part in all the rest could spare,
The common water ¶, and the common air **.

Meanwhile God's blessings made Eulogius thrive,
The happiest, most contented man alive.
His conscience cheer'd him with a life well-spent,
His prudence a superfluous something lent,
Which made the poor who took, and poor who gave, content.

Alternate were his labours and his rest,
For ever blessing, and for ever blest.
Such kindness left men nothing to require,
Prevented wishing, and out-ran desire.
He sought, not to prolong poor lives, but save:
And that which others lend, he always gave.
Us'ry, a canker in fair virtue's rose,
Corrodes, and blasts the blossom e'er it blows:

Eusebius, hermit of a neighb'ring cell,
His brother Christian mark'd, and knew him well:
With zeal unenvying, and with transport fir'd,
Beheld him, prais'd him, lov'd him, and admir'd.
Convinc'd, that noiseless piety might dwell
In secular retreats, and flourish well;
And that Heaven's king (so greater a master he)
Had servants ev'rywhere, of each degree.

"All-gracious pow'r," he cries, "for forty years
"I've liv'd an anchorete in pray'rs and tears:
"Yon' spring, which bubbles from the mountain's
"Has all the luxury of thirst supply'd: ["side,
"The roots of thistles have my hunger fed,
"Two roods † of cultur'd barley give me bread,
"A rock my pillow, and green moss my bed. }
"The midnight-clock attests my fervent pray'rs,
"The rising sun my orisons declares,
"The live-long day my aspirations knows,
"And with the setting sun my vespers close!
"Thy truth, my hope: Thy providence my guard:
"Thy grace, my strength: Thy heav'n, my last
"reward!"

"But, self-devoted from the prime of youth
"To life sequester'd, and ascetic truth,
"With fasting mortify'd, worn out with tears,
"And bent beneath the load of sev'nty years,
"Nothing from my industry can gain
"To ease the poor man's wants, or sick man's pain:
"My garden takes up half my daily care,
"And my field asks the minutes I can spare;
"While blest Eulogius from his pittance gives
"The better half, and in true practice lives.
"Heav'n is but cheaply serv'd with words and show,
"I want that glorious virtue—To bestow!
"True Christianity depends on fact:
"Religion is not theory, but act.
"Men, seraphs, all, Eulogius' praise proclaim,
"Who lends both sight and feet to blind and lame:
"Who soothes th' asperity of hunger's sighs,
"And dissipates the tear from mournful eyes;
"Pilgrims or wand'ring angels entertains;
"Like pious Abraham on Mamre's plains.
"Ev'n to brute beasts his righteous care extends ‡,
"He feels their suff'rings, and their wants be-
"friends;

"From one small source so many bounties spring,
"We lose the peasant, and suppose a king;
"A king of heav'n's own stamp, not vulgar make;
"Blessed in giving, and averse to take! [live,
"Not such my pow'r! Half-useless doom'd to
"Pray'rs and advice are all I have to give:
"But all, whate'er my means or strength deny,
"The virtues of Eulogius can supply.
"Each, in the compass of his pow'r, he serves;
"Nor ever from his gen'rous purpose swerves:
"Ev'n enemies to his protection run,
"Sure of his light, as of the rising sun.

* "No man shall take the nether or upper mill-stone to pledge; for he taketh a man's life to pledge."

Deut. xxiv. 6.

† Two roods, i. e. half an acre.

‡ "The righteous man regardeth the life of his beast."

Prov. xii. 10.

"What pity is it that so great a soul,
 "An heart so bountiful, should feel controul?
 "Warm in itself, by icy fortune damp't,
 "And in the effort of exertion cramp't;
 "Beneficent to all men, just, and true:
 "As nature bounteous, and impartial too.
 "Thus sometimes have I seen an angel's mind
 "In a weak body wretchedly confin'd:
 "A mind, O Constantine, which from thy throne
 "Can take no honours, and yet add her own!

"Then hear me, gracious Heav'n, and grant
 "my pray'r;

"Make yonder man the fav'rite of thy care:
 "Nourish the plant with thy celestial dew,
 "Like manna let it fall, and still be new:
 "Expand the blossoms of his gen'rous mind,
 "Till the rich odour reaches half mankind.
 "Give him Bizantium's wealth, which uselefs
 "Sicilian plenty, and the Indian mines; [shines,
 "Instead of Peneus, let Pactolus lave
 "His garden's precincts with a golden wave;
 "Then may his soul its free-born range enjoy,
 "Give deed to will, and ev'ry pow'r employ:
 "In him the sick a second Luke shall find;
 "Orphans and widows, to his care consign'd,
 "Shall bless the father, and the husband kind:
 "Just steward of the bounty he receiv'd,
 "And dying poorer than the poor reliev'd!"

So pray'd he, whilst an angel's voice from high
 Bade him surcease to importune the sky:
 Fate stopp'd his ears in an ill-omen'd day,
 And the winds bore the warning sounds away;
 Wild indistinction did their place supply;
 Half heard, half lost, th' imperfect accents die.
 Little fore-saw he that th' Almighty pow'r,
 Who feeds the faithful at his chosen hour,
 Consults not taste, but wholesomeness of food,
 Nor means to please their sense, but do them good.
 Great was the miracle, and fitter too,
 When draughts from Cherith's brook Elijah drew*:
 And wing'd purveyors his sharp hunger fed
 With frugal scraps of flesh, and massin-bread†.
 On quails the humble prophet's pride might swell,
 And high fed lux'ry prompt him to rebell.

* 1 Kings xvii. 4. &c.

† Massin bread, i. e. miscellaneous, or miscellaneous bread, an ancient English word, given to a plain sort of household bread. When people in a middling station used it, they generally mixed two gallons of oats and rye, with six gallons of wheat. The poorer people mixed in equal quantities wheat, barley, oats, rye, buck-wheat, pulse, &c. But such is the luxury of the present age (even among the poor), that not only the thing, but the very name is forgotten; and a preference given to a whiter, but more unwholesome sort of bread, if alum enters into the composition; which, indeed, cannot be concealed.

One of the first cares of a prime-minister (who ought also to be considered as proveditor-general of a kingdom), is to see the people supplied with bread, and of an wholesome nature, at as reasonable price as possible.

Hence the great Gustavus used to say, "That it required more talents to feed a large army in the field, upon easy terms, in times of war, than to conduct the fighting part."

VOL. IX.

Nor dreamt our anchorite, that, if his friend
 Should reach, O virtuous poverty! thy end,
 That conscience and religion soon might fly
 To some forsaken clime and distant sky.

Ign'rant of happiness, and blind to ruin,
 How oft are our petitions our undoing!

Jephtha, with greater sense of vict'ry fir'd,
 Made a rash vow, and thought the vow inspir'd:
 In piety the first, his daughter ran,
 To hail with duteous voice the conqu'ring man:
 Well-meaning, but unconscious of her doom,
 She sought a blessing, and she found a tomb*!

The pow'r supreme (my author so declares),
 Heard with concern the erring hermit's pray'rs:
 Heard disapproving; but at length inclin'd
 To give a living lesson to mankind;
 That men thence forward should submissive live;
 And leave omniscience the free pow'r to give.—
 For wealth or poverty, on man bestow'd,
 Alike are blessings from the hand of God!
 How often is the soul ensnar'd by health?
 How poor in virtue is the man of wealth?

The hermit's pray'r permitted, not approv'd;
 Soon in an higher sphere Eulogius mov'd:
 Each sluice of affluent fortune open'd soon,
 And wealth flow'd in at morning, night, and noon.

One day, in turning some uncultur'd ground,
 (In hopes a free-stone quarry might be found),
 His mattock met resistance, and behold
 A casket burst, with di'monds fill'd, and gold.
 He cram'd his pockets with the precious store,
 And ev'ry night review'd it o'er and o'er;
 Till a gay conscious pride, unknown as yet,
 Touch'd a vain heart, and taught it to forget:
 And, what still more his flagg'ring virtue try'd,
 His mother, tut'rels of that virtue, dy'd.

A neighb'ring matron, not unknown to fame
 (Historians give her Teraminta's name),
 The parent of the needy and distress'd,
 With large demesnes and well sav'd treasure
 blest;

(For like th' Egyptian prince † she hoarded store
 To feed at periodic dearths the poor);
 This matron, whiten'd with good works and age,
 Approach'd the sabbath of her pilgrimage;
 Her spirit to himself th' Almighty drew;—
 Breath'd on th' alembic, and exhal'd the dew.
 In souls prepar'd, the passage is a breath
 From time t' eternity, from life to death‡.
 But first, to make the poor her future care,
 She left the good Eulogius for her heir.

Who but Eulogius now exults for joy?
 New thoughts, new hopes, new views his mind employ.

Pride push'd forth buds at ev'ry branching shoot,
 And virtue shrunk almost beneath the root.

‡ The time in which we now live is borrowed from the space of our existence: What is past is dead and vanished; what remaineth is daily made less and less; insomuch that the whole time of our life is nothing but a passage to death."

ST. AUGUST. de Civitat. Dei, X.

High rais'd on fortune's hill, new Alps he spies,
O'ershoots the valley which beneath him lies,
Forgets the depths between, and travels with his eyes.

The tempter saw the danger in a trice,
(For the man slider'd upon fortune's ice):
And, having found a corpse half dead, half warm,
Reviv'd it, and assum'd a courtier's form:
Swift to Thebais urg'd his airy flight;
And measur'd half the globe in half a night.

With flowing manners exquisitely feign'd,
And accent soft, he soon admission gain'd:
Survey'd each out-work well, and mark'd apart
Each winding avenue that reach'd the heart;
Displaying, like th' illusive fiend of old,
Thrones deckt with gems, and realms of living
Bad spirits oft intrude upon the good; [gold *,
Adonis' grot near Christ's presepio stood †.

Th' artificer of fraud (though here he fail'd),
Strait chang'd approaches, and the ear assail'd;
This only chink accessible he finds;

For flatt'ry's oil pervades ev'n virtuous minds.

Virtue, like towns well fortify'd by art,

Has (spite of foresight) one deficient part.

With lenient artifice, and fluent tongue.
(For on his lips the dews of Hybla hung),
Libanius like †, he play'd the sophist's part,
And by soft marches stole upon the heart:
Maintain'd that station gave new birth to sense,
And call'd forth manners, courage, eloquence:
Then touch'd with spritely dashes here and there,
(Correctly strong, yet seeming void of care),
The master-topic, which may most men move,
The charms of beauty and the joys of love!

Eulogius falter'd at the first alarms,
And soon the 'waken'd passions buzz'd to arms;
Nature the clam'rous bell of discord rung,
And vices from dark caverns swift up sprung.
So, when hell's monarch did his summons make,
The slumb'ring demons started from the lake.

Eulogius saw with pride, or seem'd to see,
(Not yet in act, but in the pow'r to be),
Great merit lurking dormant in his mind:
He had been negligent—but nature kind:
Till by degrees the vain, deluded elf,
Grew out of humour with his former self.
He thought his cottage small, and built in haste;
It had convenience, but it wanted taste.

His mien was awkward; graces he had none;
Provincial were his notions and his tone;
His manners emblems of his own rough stone.

Then, slavish copyist of his copying friend,
He ap'd him without skill, and without end:
Lariffa's gutturals convuls'd his throat;
He smooch'd his voice to the Bizantine note.

With courtly suppleness unfurl'd his face;
Or screw'd it to the bonno mine of grimace;
With dignity he sneez'd, and cough'd with grace.

The pious mason once, had time no more
To mark the wants and mis'ry of the poor;
Suspicious thoughts his pensive mind employ,
A fullen gratitude, and clouded joy.
In days of poverty his heart was light:
He sung his hymns at morning, noon, and night.
Want sharpens poetry, and grief adorns;
The spink * chaunts sweetest in a hedge of thorns †.
Tir'd of an house too little for his pride,
Tir'd of himself, and country friends beside,
He sometimes thought to build a mansion fit
For state, and people it with men of wit;
Knowing (by fame) small poets, small musicians,
Small painters, and still smaller politicians;
Nor was the fee of ten score minæ wanting,
To purchase taste in building and in planting.

A critic too he was, and rul'd the stage;
The fashionable judgment ‡ of his age:
When Crito once a panegyric show'd,
He beat him with a staff § of his own ode.
Ah what, he cry'd, are Pindar's flights to me?
I love soft home made sing-song, duty free.
Write me the style that lords and ladies speak;
Or give me pastorals on Doric Greek:
I read not for instruction, but for ease;
The opium of the pen is sure to please: [bright;
Where limpid streams are clear, and sunshine
Where woos and coos, and loves and doves unite:
Where simply married epithets are seen,
With gentle Hyphen keeping peace between,
Whipt cream; unfortify'd with wine or sense!
Froth'd by the flattern muse, indifference;
And deck'd (as after ages more shall see)
With poor hedge-flow'rs, y-clept simplicity!
Pert, and yet dull; tawdry and mean withall;
Fools for the future with it nature call.

He learnt his whims, and high flown notions too,
Such as fine men adopt, and fine men rue:
(Mere singularity the point in view.)
Julian with him was statesman, bard and wit;
Julian, who ten times mis'd, and one time hit;
Who reason'd blindly, and more blindly writ.
Julian, who lov'd each sober mind to shock;
Who laugh'd at God, and offer'd to a cock.

He learn'd no small regard for Arius too:
And hinted what—nor he, nor Arius knew.
But most (as did his pregnant parts become)
He lov'd th' old pageantry of pagan Rome.
Pompous idolatry with him was fashion;
Nay, he once dream'd of transubstantiation.—

EULOGIUS: OR, THE CHARITABLE MASON.

883

Now, muse, return, and tread thy course again;
I only tell the story of a swain.

Pirasmus (for that name the demon bore
Who nurs'd our spark in fashionable lore)
Lik'd well this wayward vanity of mind,
But thought a country stage a niche confin'd;
Too cold for lux'ry, nor to folly kind:
Bizantium's hot-bed better serv'd his use,
The soil less stubborn, and more rank the juice.
My Lord, he cries, (with looks and tone compos'd,

Whilst he the mischief of his soul disclos'd).
Forgive me, if that title I afford
To one, whom nature meant to be a lord;
How ill mean neighbourhood your genius suits?
To live like Adam midst an herd of brutes!
Leave the mere country to mere country swains,
And dwell where life in all life's glory reigns.

At six hours distance from Bizantium's walls,
(Where Bosphorus into the Euxine falls)
In a gay district, call'd th' Elysian vale*,
A furnish'd villa stands, propos'd for sale:
Thither, for summer shade, the great resort;
Each nymph a goddess, and each house a court:
Be master of the happier Lares there,
And taste life's grandeur in a rural air.

He spoke. Eulogius readily agreed,
And sign'd with eager joy the purchase deed.
Div'd in the Theban vales an home-spun swain,
And rose a tawdry sop in Asia's plain.
Dame nature gave him comeliness and health,
And fortune (for a passport) gave him wealth.
The beaux extoll'd him, the conquers approv'd:
For a rich coxcomb is by instinct lov'd.

Swift Atalanta (as the story's told†)
Felt her feet bird-lim'd to the earth with gold:
The youth ‡ had wealth, with no unpleasing face;
That, and the golden apples, won the race.
Had he been swifter than the swiftest wind,
And a poor wit—He still had sigh'd behind.—

Here Satan vanish'd:—He had fresh commands—

And knew his pupil was in able hands.
And now, the treasure found, and matron's store,
Sought other objects than the tatter'd poor;
Part to humiliated Apicius went,
A part to gaming confessors was lent,
And part, O virtuous Thais, paint thy rent.
Poor folks have leisure hours to fast and pray;
Our rich man's bus'ness lay another way:
No farther intercourse with heav'n had he,
But left good works to men of low degree:
Warm as himself pronounc'd each ragged man,
And bade distress to prosper as it can:
Till, grown obdurate by mere dint of time,
He deem'd all poor men rogues, and want a crime§.

By chance he ancient amities forgot,
Or else expung'd them with one wilful blot:
Nor knew he God nor man, nor faith nor friends,
But for bye purposes and worldly ends.
No single circumstance his mind dismay'd,
But his low extract, and once humble trade;
These thoughts he strove to bury in expence,
Rich meats, rich wines, and vain magnificence:
Weak as the Roman chief, who strove to hide
His father's cot (and once his father's pride),
By casing a low shed of rural mold
With marble walls, and roof adorn'd with gold*,

Who but Eulogius now is prais'd and known,
The very ignus fatuus of the town?
Our ready scholar in a single year
Could he, forget, swear, flatter, and forswear†.
Rough to the tim'rous, timid with the brave;
Midst wits a witling, and with knaves a knave.

Fame, not contented with her broad highway,
Delights for change, through private paths to stray;
And, wand'ring to the hermit's distant cell,
Vouchsaf'd Eulogius' history to tell.

At night a dream confirm'd the hermit more;
He started, scream'd, and sweat from every pore.
He dream'd that on his throne th' Almighty sat
In th' awful valley of Jehoshaphat‡.
Where, underneath a spreading cedar's shade,
He spy'd his friend on beds of roses laid;
Round him a crowd of threat'ning furies stands,
With instruments of vengeance in their hands.

The Judge Supreme soon cast a stedfast eye,
(Stern, yet attemper'd, with benignity),
On the rash hermit, who with impious pray'r
Had been the sponsor of another's care.

"Wretch, thou art lost in part, and in the whole!
"Is this the mortgage for thy brother's soul?"

An apoplex of dread Eusebius shook:
Despairing Judas glar'd in all his look.
Trembling he fell before th' Almighty throne;
Importunate as Abraham § t' atone
For others crimes: O Power Supreme said he,
Grant me once more, th' ungrateful wretch to see:
Suspend thy doom till then: on Christian ground
No graceless monster, like my friend, is found.

He spoke, and wak'd aghast: He tore his hair,
And rent his sackcloth garments in despair;
Walk'd to Constantinople, and inquir'd
Of all he met; at length the house desir'd

your horses champ upon bridles whose bits are gilt with gold, the people die with hunger:—whereas one of your diamonds might save the lives of an hundred families."

§ Why dost thou doat on the image of a king stamped on coin, and despiseth the image of God that shines in human nature? ST. AUGUST.

Minutius Felix addresses himself very pathetically to great and opulent men devoid of charity and almsgiving

"A man," says he, "asks bread of you.—Whilst

By chance he found, but no admission gain'd;
A Thracian slave the porter's place maintain'd, (Sworn foe to thread-bare suppliants), and with pride

His master's presence, nay, his name, deny'd.

There walk'd Eusebius at the dawn of light,
There walk'd at noon, and there he walk'd at night.

In vain.—At length, by providence's care,
He found the door unclos'd, nor servants near.

He enter'd, and through sev'ral rooms of state
Pass'd gently; in the last Eulogius sat.

Old man, good morrow, the gay courtier cry'd;
God give you grace, my son, the fire reply'd;
And then, in terms as moving and as strong,
As clear, as ever fell from angel's tongue,
Besought, reprov'd, exhorted, and condemn'd:—
Eulogius knew him, and, though known condemn'd.

The hermit then assum'd a bolder tone;
His rage was kindled, and his patience gone.

Without respect to titles or to place,
I call thee (adds he) miscreant to thy face.

My pray'rs drew down heav'n's bounty on thy
And in an evil hour my wishes sped. [head,

Ingratitude's black curse thy steps attend,
Mentor to God, and faithless to thy friend!

With all the rage of an insulted man
The courtier call'd his slaves, who swiftly ran;

"Androtion, Geta, seize this aged fool,

"See him well scourg'd, and send him back to "school.

"Teach the Old Chronicle, in future times

"To bear no mem'ry but of poor rogues' crimes."

The hermit took the chastisement, and went Back to Thebais full of discontent;

Saw his once-impious rashness more and more,
And, victim to convinc'd contrition, bore
With Christian thankfulness the marks he wore. }

And then on bended knees with tears and sighs
He thus invok'd the Ruler of the skies:

"My late request, All-gracious Power forgive!

"And—that yon miscreant may repent, and live,

"Give him that poverty which suits him best,

"And leave disgrace and grief to work the rest."

So pray'd the hermit, and with reason pray'd.—

Some plants the sunshine ask, and some the shade.
At night the nure-trees spread, but check their bloom

At morn, and lose their verdure and perfume.

The virtues of most men will only blow,

Like coy auriculas, in Alpine snow*:

Transplant them to the equinoctial line,

Their vigour sickens, and their tints decline.—

Heav'n to its predilected children grants

The middle space 'twixt opulence and wants.

Meanwhile Eulogius, unabash'd and gay,

Pursu'd his courtly tract without dismay: }

Remorse was hood-wink'd, conscience charm'd
away.

Reason the felon of herself was made,

And nature's substance hid by nature's shade!

Our fine man, now completed, quickly found
Congenial friends in Asiatic ground.

Th' advent'rous pilot in a single year
Learn'd his state cock-boat dext'rously to steer;
Versatile, and sharp-piercing like a screw,
Made good the old passage, and still forc'd a new:
For, just as int'rest whistled on his mind,
He Anatolians left, or Thracians join'd;
Caught ev'ry breeze, and sail'd with every tide;
But still was mindful of the leeward side:
Still mark'd the pinnacle of fortune's height,
And bark'd—to be made turnspit of the state.

By other arts he learns the knack to thrive;
The most obsequious parasite alive:
Chameleon of the court, and country too;
Pays Cesar's tax, but gives the mob their due;
And makes it, in his conscience, the same thing
To crown a tribune, or behead a king:
All things to all men;—and (himself to please)
Assimulates* each colour which he sees.

If patriots pay him, willow-wreaths he bears,

Listen'd---unto th' artificer of fraud:

The doctrine came not from th' all-righteous
When Satan tells a lie, 'tis all his own † [throne:

He spoke, and vanish'd. Swift Eulogius fled,

And to the Emulous of empire sped.

Here, were it not too long I might declare

The motives and successes of the war,

The prowess of the knights, their martial deeds,

Their swords, their shields, their surcoats ‡ and their steeds;

Till Belisarius at a single blow

Suppress'd the faction and repell'd the foe.

By a quick death the traitors he reliev'd;

Condemn'd, if taken; furnish'd, if repriev'd.

Now see Eulogius (who had all betray'd

Whate'er he knew) in loathsome dungeon laid

A pris'ner, first of war, and then of state:

Rebel and traitor ask a double fate!

But good Justinian, whose exalted mind

(In spite of what Piræmus urg'd, inclin'd

To mercy, soon the forfeit-life forgave,

And freed it from the shackles of a slave.

Then spoke with mild, but in majestic strain,

Repent, and haste thee to Larissa's plain,

Or wander through the world, another Cain.

Thy lands and goods shall be the poor man's lot,

Or feed the orphans, you've so long forgot.

Forlorn, helpless, recogniz'd by none,

Proscrib'd Eulogius left th' unprop'ious town:

For succour at a thousand doors he knock'd;

Each heart was harden'd, and each door was lock'd.

A pilgrim's staff he bore, of humble thorn;

Pervious to winds his coat, and sadly torn:

Shoes he had none: a beggar gave a pair,

Who saw feet poorer than his own, and bare.

He drank the stream, on dew-berries he fed,

And wildings harsh supply'd the place of bread;

Thus homeward urg'd his solitary way;

(Four years had he been absent to a day.)

Fame through Thebais his arrival spread,

Half his old friends reproach'd him, and half fled:

Of help and common countenance bereft,

No creature own'd him, but a dog he left.

Compunction touch'd his soul, and, wiser made

By bitter suff'rings, he resum'd his trade: [pelf,

Thank'd Heav'n for want of pow'r and want of

That he had lost the world, and found himself.

Conscience and charity reviv'd their part,

And true humility enrich'd the heart,

Da vocem magno, Pater, ingeniumque dolori.

STAT. Epiced. Patris.

AN EPISTLE TO THE REV. DR. ROBERT HORT,

CANON OF WINDSOR.

ALL sober poets with thy bard * agree,
Who sung, "That truth was truest poetry."---
Alike to me, and the deceas'd, a friend;
O Hort, to these my pious strains attend.

* COWLEY. See his Davideis.

Thou knew'st the man; and thy good sense is such,
I dare not say too little, or too much.---
Under his eye the self-same views combin'd
Our studies, and one horoscope conjoin'd.
He check'd th' impatient wand'rings of our youth,
And grafted on our fancy facts and truth.
Together we amus'd our youthful prime,
Days seem'd but hours, and time improv'd on time:

Mindless of cares (and how they pass'd or came),
Our sports, our labours, and our rest the same *.

See'st thou yon' yews, by pensive nature made
For tears, and grief, and melancholy shade;
Wide o'er the church they spread an awful light,
Than day more serious, half-compos'd as night,
(There, where the winding Kennet gently laves Britannia's Lombardy † with silver waves);
There sleeps Macarius, foe to pomp and pride;
Who liv'd contented, and contented dy'd.

Say, shall the lamp where Tullia was entomb'd,
Burn twice sev'n ages, and be unconsum'd?
And not one verse be sacred to a name
Endear'd by virtuous deeds and silent fame?
True fame demands not panegyric aid;
The fun'ral torch burns brightest in the shade;
Too fast it blazes, fann'd by public air;—
Thus blossoms fall, before their tree can bear.
True fame, like porcel'ain earth, for years must lay
Bury'd, and mix'd with elemental clay ‡.

His younger days were not in trifling spent,
For pious Hall § a kind inspection lent:
He show'd him what to seek, and what to shun:—

Harcourt § with him the thorny journey run,
Companion of his studies; and a friend
Sincere in youth, and steadfast to the end.

Courts and the world he knew, but not admir'd;
He travell'd through them wisely, and retir'd:
Giving to solitude and heav'nly care
Those moments which the worldling cannot spare,
Thus, half a century, his course he run
Of pray'r and praises, daily, like the sun:
Happy! Who truth invariably pursues,
And well-earn'd fame by better fame renews ¶!

His books, like friends were chosen, few and good;
Constantly us'd and truly understood.
The Sacred Scriptures were his chief delight **;

STAT. SYLV. Lib. I.

ARGUMENT.

BOETIUS flourished in the former part of the sixth century. He was descended from the Manlian family, and was one of the first persons of Rome in fortunes and dignity. He received his education at Athens; after which he was thrice consul, and always renowned for his eloquence in the senate. He was upon all occasions inflexibly honest and veracious.

His book, intituled the Consolation of Philosophy, may be looked upon as a master-piece of fine writing. The poetry of it is equal to most compositions in the Augustan age; and that even in the classical purity of style: but something, which manifests the declension of the Roman language, may be discovered in the prose part.

In his prose writings he made Aristotle his model; and, like him, is always clear, though concise: leaving an infinite fund for the mind of the reader to work upon. Many works pass under his name: some are genuine; and some are looked upon as supposititious.

This book of Philosophical Consolation (from which a large part of the present epistle is extracted) has been universally admired in all ages, in so much that there are many more fine manuscripts extant of it, than of Virgil, Horace, and Cicero, all taken together. The work we here speak of has been the particular delight and study of princes and good politicians. Chaucer translated it into our language, and afterwards it was translated by Queen Elizabeth, &c.

Boetius had two wives: The first was Helpes a Sicilian*, whose conjugal affection is celebrated by him in an epitaph still extant. His second wife (to whom the following letter is supposed to be addressed) was Rusticiana, the daughter of Symmachus, a Roman senator and consul; one of the most virtuous, learned, and amiable persons of that age. As to Rusticiana, historians give her all perfections of mind and body. By her Boetius had several children: and two of his sons, when young, had the honour to be publicly carried to the senate-house in a consular chair, by way of extraordinary compliment to their father.

When Theodoric the Goth made himself master of the kingdom of Italy, he wisely made choice of Boetius to be the director of his councils, and governed for many years, to the universal satisfaction of his subjects. From a principle of self-interest, he had long concealed his inclination for Arianism; but a series of prosperous government made him ambitious, self-confident, and jealous of Boetius's glory. In addition to this, the Gothic chieftains that belonged to him were uneasy to see all power in the hands of a Roman; and one of them in particular, named Trigilla, having gained a new and great ascendancy over the king, contrived our statesman's ruin, by suborning false witnesses, and devising treasonable letters between him and Justin, emperor of the East.

* Edward Philips, who writ one of the best accounts we have of the Poets, ancient and modern, says, some authors assert that Helpes was daughter of a Sicilian king, and that she writ hymns in honour of the Apostles, after she embraced Christianity.

Philips's authority carries weight with it: For Milton was the instructor of his youthful studies, and afterwards revised the work we here allude to; Philips's mother being Milton's sister.

Philips's book was published in 12mo, 1665, and intituled, Theatrum Poetarum. One Winstanley, a barber, transcribed the lives of the English Poets from our author's work, almost verbatim, and published them in 1687. A most notorious plagiarism; it being but 22 years after the Theatrum Poetarum was published.

Boetius was first banished to Pavia, and, after four years confinement, privately executed in prison. His father-in-law, Symmachus, incurred the same fate. Theodoric soon afterwards died with remorse, under all the agonies of a disturbed mind.

It has been looked upon by many good Christians as no small misfortune, that Boetius, in his Consolation, has not derived his arguments from divine wisdom, as well as prophane philosophy. One may perceive here and there several hints taken from Scripture, but nothing, as I remember, in totidem verbis: Yet his general belief of Christianity has never been suspected, nor even his orthodoxy; for he writ an express treatise on the consubstantiality of the Trinity, which is still preserved, and looked upon to be genuine.

These circumstances induced me to conclude this Epistle in a manner not unworthy of our philosopher, and highly agreeable to his imitator.

It has often been thought, that a Second Part added to Boetius's Consolation, written in the same manner of a Vision, and consisting of verse and prose interchangeably, where Divine Wisdom is introduced as the speaker and comforter, would afford us one of the finest and most instructive works that could be composed. The Sieur de Ceriziers, almoner to Louis the XIIIth, made an attempt of this kind about the year 1636, and executed it with some degree of success.

Boetius was commented upon by no less a person than Thomas Aquinas, who was one of the clearest and purest writers of his time. This shews the esteem in which the scholastic ages held him.

In our country, King Alfred was the first who translated the Consolation of Philosophy; and this translation is still extant. Chaucer, as we have already hinted, gave us another version; and a third, I think, was published by the Monks of Tavistock, at the second press that was established in England. A fourth translation was made (as some say) by Queen Elizabeth; and one or two more preceded the version published by Lord Preston.

I have nothing farther to add, but that my worthy friend, to whom this elegy is addressed, will be pleased to bear in memory these beautiful verses of antiquity; which may be applied (not improperly) both to him and me.

GENESIS xxxix. 5.

INTRODUCTION.

THE man, that's truly read in virtue's laws,
Improves from censure, and distrusts applause.
Firm in his hope, he yields not to despair *;
The cube revers'd is still erect and square †.

Eliot ‡, to whom kind nature did impart
The coolest head, and yet the warmest heart:
Blest in thy nuptials, blest in thy retreat,
Privately good, and amiably great;
Accept with candour these spontaneous lays,
And grant me pardon, for I ask not praise:—
In proof the Muse true oracles recites,
Hear what Boetius to his consort writes.
Mark well the man, and Heav'n thy labour
blest;—

In all be like him, but unhappiness!
Thus he aspir'd on meditation's wings,
And, to the best of comforts, thus he sings:

RUSTICIANA, loveliest of thy kind,
Most in my eyes, and ever in my mind;
Exil'd from all the joys the world can give,
And---(for my greater grief!) allow'd to live:
(By him §, I train'd to glory, basely left);
Of all things, but my innocence, bereft:
Patrician, consul, statesman but in name;
Of honour plunder'd, and proscrib'd in fame:
(Betray'd by men my patronage had fed,
And curs'd by lips to which I gave their bread);
To thee I breathe my elegies of woe;
For thee, and chiefly thee, my sorrows flow:
Joint-partner of my life, my heart's relief;
Alike partaker of my joys or grief!

All-bounteous God, how gracious was the care
To mix thy antidote with my despair!
Rusticiana lives to smooth my death,
And waft with sighs to Heav'n my parting breath.
Hence hope and fortitude inspire my breast:
Be her's the earthly part, and thine the rest!
Still I am happy, human and divine;
Th' assistant angel she, th' assistance thine.

O wife, more gentle than the western breeze,
Which (loth to part) dwells whisp'ring on the trees:
Chaste as the lamb th' indulgent pastor leads
To living streams through Sharon's flow'ry
meads;

temning the flatteries of prosperity, and overcoming the fears of poverty."

§ The Emperor Theodoric.

Mild as the voice of comfort to despair;
Fair as the spring, and yet more true than fair *;
Delightful, as the all-enlivening sun;
Brighter than rills, that glitter as they run,
And mark thee spotless;—air thy purity
Denotes, thy clearness fire, and earth thy constancy †.

Weep not to read these melancholy strains:
Change courts for cells, and coronets for chains.—

No greatness can be lost, where God remains!

Say, what avails me, that I boast the fame
And deathless honours of the Manlian name;
Th' unsoil'd succession of renown'd descent,
Equal to time's historical extent ‡?

One of my ancestors receiv'd his doom
There, where he sav'd the liberties of Rome!
Did not another plunge into the wave
The Gaulish champion, and his country save?
Did not a third (and harder was his fate)
Make his own child a victim for the state?
And did not I my wealth and life consume,
To bless at once Theodoric and Rome?—
But all is cancell'd and forgotten since;
Past merits were reproaches to my prince!

As my own glory serv'd to ruin me,
Thy birth from Symmachus avails not thee:
Thy meekness, prudence, beauty, innocence,
Thy knowledge, and thy virtues, gave offence.
When excellence is eminent, like thine,
Our eyes are dazzled with too bright a shrine;
Death must the medium give, that makes it mildly shine.

What visionary hope the wretch beguiles,
Who founds his confidence on Princes smiles?
True to their int'rest, mindless of their trust,
Convenient is the regal term for just.
The plant, my cultivating hands had made
A spreading tree, oppress'd me with its shade;
Ambition push'd forth many a vig'rous shoot,
And rancid jealousy manur'd the root:
Ingratitude a willing heart misled,
And sycophants the growing mischief fed,

Till th' Arian sophist * crept through all restraint;

The tempter ply'd him, and there split the faint.
Th' assassin-hand which Odoacer slew,
Once more, distain'd with blood, appear'd to view:
Not foe by foe in hostile fields oppress'd,
But friend with friend, th' inviter and the guest †.

And O, how weak my skill, how vain my toils,
To sow religion's seeds in courtly soils!

The few surviving plants that fix'd their root,
O'ercharg'd with specious herbage, bore no fruit,
Gorg'd to satiety with unctuous juice
From a fat earth, and form'd for bulk, not use;
Till all the cultivating hand receives
Is steril plenty of luxuriant leaves ‡.

Or, where we sow'd the grain of life, succeeds
A copious harvest of pernicious weeds.

Where corn once stood, th' insatiate thistle

And deleterious hemlock choaks the lands.

If errors purely human are forgiv'n,
I dare present my last appeal to Heav'n.
Religion and clear honesty, combin'd,
Made up the short full system of my mind.
Nicely I mark'd the quicksands of the state,
The crown's encroachments, and the people's hate:

Fore-warn'd my prince of arbitrary sway,
And taught his subjects willingly t' obey:
Thus ev'ry thing conspir'd to one great end,
The nation was my child, the king my friend.
Both still I serv'd with uniform intent,
The good of both, with equal fervour meant;
And, wherefoe'er th' infraction first arose,
Still judg'd th' aggressors man's and nature's foes.

Monarchs, sometimes, discard, through fear or hate,

Those whose good sense and virtues poise the state:
So mariners, when storms the ocean sweep,
Commit their guardian-ballast to the deep.

Methinks, in these my solitudes, I hear
Tricilla whisp'ring in the tyrant's ear §,
Assert the glories which are all thy own;
And lop the branch that overshades the throne;
When he and malice know, I taught no more
Than ev'ry righteous statesman taught before.

§ L. I. Prof. 4.

|| The precepts of government, comprised in the following lines, and recommended by Boetius, are extracted almost verbatim from Cassiodorus's Letters.
Cassiodorus was secretary to Theodoric and Atha-laric, kings of the Goths. He was a statesman

(Swift to encourage, eager to redress,
The steward of a nation's happiness);
Taught him, each gift he gave, by truth to scan;
T' adapt the man to place, not place to man;
To guard the public wealth with anxious care,
Studious of peace, but still prepar'd for war:
Taught him, that princes of celestial kind,
Like Numa, cultivate the field and mind *:
Warn'd him 'gainst pow'r, which suffers no con-
troul;

But mostly that, which persecutes the soul:
Then by examples, or from reason, show'd,
That none are true to man who're false to God †;
And that our lives, except by freedom blest,
Are a dull passive slavery at best."

Hence righteous kings of softer clay are made;
Not for their subjects mis'ry, but their aid ‡.
True liberty, by pious monarchs giv'n,
Is emblematic manna rain'd from heav'n:
Without it, ev'ry appetite is pall'd,
The body fetter'd, and the mind enthrall'd §.

Thus when by chance some rustic hand invades
The nightingale's recess in poplar shades,
And bears the pris'ner with offensive care
To Nero's house of gold, and Nero's fare;
Th' aerial chorister, no longer free,
Wails and detests man's civil cruelty:
Still dumb th' imprison'd sylvan bard remains;
(Your humanbards make music with their chains);
And when from his exalted cage he sees
The hills, the dales, the lawns, the streams, the trees,

He looks on courtly food with loathing eyes,
And sighs for liberty, and worms, and flies ||.

of great genius, and an author of wonderful invention.

An ancient writer of the Church has justly marked out the difference betwixt a king and a tyrant: "They have both," (says he), "absolute power, and abundance of people under their command; but exert their authority and power in a very different manner: For the former seeks only the good of those whom he governs, and hazards all, even his life, that they may live in peace and safety." He then gives the contrast of their characters in more full detail.

‡ The character of a just and pious prince is finely marked by Isaiah, xvi. 5. "In mercy shall the throne be establish'd, and he shall sit upon it in truth, in the tabernacle of David; judging and seeking judgment, and hastening righteousness."

§ Much to this purpose is a passage in the Son of Sirach:—"As long as thou livest, and hast breath in thee, give not thyself over to any. In all thy works keep to thyself the pre-eminence, and leave not a stain in thine honour."

†† What follows is extracted from the Philosophical Consolation of Boetius.

One night, with grief o'ercharg'd, with cares oppress'd,

Like a sick child, I moan'd myself to rest:

When lo, a figure of celestial mien,

(Known indistinctly once, and faintly seen)

Approach'd me; fair and graceful as a queen.

Now, (strange to tell)! she seem'd of human size,
And now, her form august half reach'd the skies *.

Sweet-smiling, with an accent, soft she said,

"Is this Boetius? Or Boetius' shade?"

"What sudden stroke of unexpected woe

"Congeals thy tears, and wants the pow'r to
"flow?"

"Incapable of comfort or relief,

"See a dumb image petrify'd with grief!

"Th' impetuous storm arose not by degrees,

"But bursts like hurricanes on Adria's seas †."

She spoke, and to my throbbing heart apply'd

Her tender hand: "My son, my son," she cry'd,

"Med'cines, and not complaints, thy pangs must
"ease;

"False greatness, and false pride, are thy disease."

Then with her other hand she touch'd my eyes ‡,

Soft, as when Zephyr's breath o'er roses flies:

Instant my sense return'd, restor'd and whole,

To repossess its empire of the soul.

So, when o'er Phœbus low-hung clouds prevail,

Sleep on each hill, and sadden ev'ry dale;

Sudden, up-springing from the north, invades

A purging wind, which first disturbs the shades;

Thins the black phalanx; till, with fury driv'n,

Swift disappears the flying wreck of heav'n:

To its own native blue the sky refines,

And the sun's orb with double radiance shines §.

The dame celestial mark'd with glad surprise

Recover'd reason lab'ring in my eyes,

And, kindly smiling, said, or seem'd to say:

"At length, my son, the intellectual ray

"Just gleams the hopeful promise of a day.

"Patients like thee must cautiously be fed

"With milk diluted, and innoxious bread:

"Permit me then, in gentlest strains, to give

"Rules to die happy, and contented live;

"And, when thy stomach can strong food digest,

"My prudence shall administer the rest ||.

"But lead each pilgrim to his blest abode ¶.

" T' implore, like your's, a pausing time for death *?—

" Place in thy sight Heav'n's confessors resign'd,

 " Extremes of grief or joy are rarely giv'n,
 " And last as rarely, by the will of Heav'n." }
 So spake philosophy, and upwards flew,
 Inspiring confidence as she withdrew.

Here let my just resentments cease to flow,
 Here let me close my elegies of woe.

Rusticiana, fairest of the fair,
 My present object, and my future care ;
 Be mindful of my children, and thy vows :—
 And ('gainst thy judgment) O defend thy spouse,
 My children are my other self to thee :—
 Heav'n you distrust if you lament for me.

Weep not my fate: is man to be deplor'd,
 From a dark prison to free air restor'd ?
 Admir'd by friends, and envy'd by my foes,
 I die, when glory to the highest rose.
 I've mounted to the summit of a ball ;
 If I go further, I descend, or fall.

Hail death, thou lenient cordial of relief ;
 Preventive of my shame and of my grief !
 Kind nature crops me in full virtue's bloom †,
 Not left to shrink and wither for the tomb.
 Shed not a tear, but vindicate thy pow'r,
 Enrich'd like Egypt's soil without a show'r.
 Fortune, which gave too much, did soon repine,
 There was no Solstice in a course like mine.
 With calmness I my bleeding death behold ;
 Suns set in crimson streams to rise in gold.

Farewell, and may Heav'n's bounty heap on thee,

(As more deserving) what it takes from me § !—
 That peace, which made thy social virtues shine, }
 The peace of conscience, and the peace divine, }
 Be ever, O thou best of women, thine !

Forgive, Almighty Pow'r, this worldly part ;
 These last convulsions of an husband's heart :
 Give us thy self; and teach our minds to see
 The Saviour and the Paraclete in thee !

RELIGIOUS MELANCHOLY,

AN EMBLEMATICAL ELEGY.

ADVERTISEMENT.

It is to be hoped the reader will pardon me, if I take the liberty of prefixing to this elegy a slight advertisement, instead of inserting what might seem too long for a note in the body of the poem.

Having ventured (and I am sure it is licentia sumpta prudenter *) to introduce three or four new expressions in a volume of near five thousand lines, and one, namely, dew-ting'd ray, in the 279th page of the present elegy, I thought myself obliged to make some apology on that subject; since all innovations in poets like me, (who can only pretend to a certain degree of mediocrity) are more or less of an affected cast, and rarely to be excused; inasmuch as we have the vanity to teach others what we do not thoroughly understand ourselves.

And here permit me to call that language of ours Classical English, which is to be found in a few chosen writers inclusively, from the times of Spencer till the death of Mr. Pope; for false refinements, after a language has arisen to a certain degree of perfection, give reasons to suspect that a language is upon the decline. The same circumstances have happened formerly, and the event has been almost invariably the same. Compare Statius and Claudian with Virgil and Horace: and yet the former was, if one may so speak, immediate heir at law to the latter.

I have known some of my contemporary Poets (and those not very voluminous writers) who have coined their one or two hundred words a man; whereas Dryden and Pope devised only about threescore words between them; many of which were compound epithets: But most of the words which they introduced into our language, proved in the event to be vigorous and perennial plants, being chosen and raised from excellent offsets †. —Indeed the former author revived also a great number of ancient words and expressions; and this he did (beginning at Chaucer) with so much delicacy of choice, and in a manner so comprehensive, that he left the latter author (who was in that point equally judicious and sagacious) very little to do, or next to nothing.

* HORAT.

† I must here make one exception. Dryden showed some weakness, in anglicizing common French words, and those not over elegant, when at the same time we had synonymous words of our own growth. Thus, for example, he introduced levée, couchée, boutefeu, fimagres, fraîcheur, levé, couché, boutefeu, fimagres, fraîcheur, fongue, &c. Nor was he more lucky in the Italian faliaré

—“his shield

Was falsify'd, and round with jav'lin's fill'd.”
DRYDEN'S Virg.

Some few of Dryden's revived words I have presumed to continue; of which take the following instances; as gridelien, filamot, and carmine, (with reference to colours, and mixtures of colours;) cy-mar, eygre, trine, ETPHKA, Paraclete, panoply, rood, dorp, eglantine, orijons, aspirations, &c. I mention this, lest any one should be angry with me, or pleased with me in particular places, where I discover neither boldness nor invention. —I owe also to Fenton the participle meander'd; and to Sir W. Davenant the Latinism of funeral Illicet.

As to compound epithets, those ambitiosse ornamenta * of modern poetry, Dryden has devised a few of them, with equal diffidence and caution; but those few are exquisitely beautiful. Mr. Pope seized on them as family diamonds, and added thereto an equal number, dug from his own mines, and heightened by his own polishing.

Compound epithets first came into their great vogue about the year 1598. Shakspeare and Ben. Johnson both ridiculed the ostentatious and immoderate use of them, in their prologues to Troilus and Cressida, and to Every Man in his Humour. By the above named prologues it also appears, that Bombast grew fashionable about the same era. Now in both instances an affected taste is the same as a false taste. The author of Hieronimo (who, as I may venture to assure the reader, was one John Smith †) first led up the dance. Then came the bold and self-sufficient translator of Du Bartas ‡, who broke down all the flood-gates of the true stream of eloquence (which formerly preserved the river clear, within due bounds, and full to its banks) and like, the rat in the low country dikes, mischievously or wantonly deluged the whole land.

Of innovated phrases and words; of words revived; of compound epithets, &c. I may one day or other say more, in a distinct criticism on Dryden's poetry. It shall therefore only suffice to observe here, that our two great poetical masters never thought that the interposition of an hyphen, without just grounds and reasons, made a compound epithet. On the contrary, it was their opinion, (and to this opinion their practice was conformable) that such union should only be made between two nouns, as patriot-king, idiot-laugh, &c. —or between an adjective and noun, or noun and adjective, vice versa, or an adjective and participle; as laughter-loving, cloud-compelling, rosy-finger'd, &c. —As also by an adverb used as part of an adjective, as you may see in the words well-concocted, well-digested, &c. —But never by a full real adverb and adjective, as inly-pining, sadly-musing, and, to make free with myself, (though, I only did it by way of irony) my expression of simply-marry'd epithets; of which sort of novelties modern poetry chiefly consists. Nor should such compound epithets be looked upon as the poets making; for they owe their existence to the compositor of the press, and the intervention of an hyphen.

* HORAT.

† John Smith writ also the Hector of Germany, ‡ Joshua Sylvester,

Much of the same analogy by which Dryden and Pope guided themselves in the present case, may be seen in the purer Greek and Roman languages: but all the hyphens in the world (supposing hyphens had been then known), would not have truly joined together the dulce ridentem, or dulce loquentem, of Horace.

In a word, some few precautions of the present kind are not unnecessary: English poetry begins to grow capricious, fantastical, and affectedly luxuriant; and therefore (as Augustus said of Haterius) sufflamini paululum debet.

Shall not every one mourn that dwelleth therein?

PAINS and diseases; stripes and labour too *!

“What more could Edom and proud Ashur do?”
Scourge after scourge, and blows succeeding blows?—

Lord, has thy hand no mercy, and our woes

No intermission? Gracious Being, please

To calm our fears, and give the body ease!

The poor man, and the slave of ev'ry kind,

Midst pains and toils may gleams of comfort find;

But who can bear the sickness of the mind?

The pow'r of melancholy mounts the throne,

And makes the realms of wisdom half her own †:

Not David's lyre, with David's voice conjoin'd,

Can drive th' oppressive phantom from the mind ‡?

No more the sun delights, nor lawns, nor trees;

The vernal blossoms, or the summer's breeze.

No longer echo makes the dales rejoice

With sportive sounds, and pictures of a voice ||:

* The hint of this emblem is taken from our venerable and religious poet, F. Quarles, L. III. Embl. 4. Mr. Dryden used to say, that Quarles exceeded him in the facility of rhyming.

Quarles's book, and the emblematical prints therein contained, are chiefly taken from the Pia Desideria of Hugo Hermannus. The engravings were originally designed by that celebrated artist C. Van Sichem.

|| Agreeably to this is a lovely piece of imagery in the holy Scriptures:

“The earth mourneth and languisheth; Lebanon is ashamed, and bewen down; Sharon is like a wilderness; Basban and Carmel shake off their fruits.”

ISAIAH xxxiii. 9.

Th' aerial choir, which sung so soft and clear,

Now grates harsh music to the froward ear:

The gently murm'ring rills offend from far,

And emulate the clangour of a war:

Books have no wit, the liveliest wits have none;

And hope, the last of ev'ry friend, is gone!

Nor rest nor joy to virtue's self are giv'n,

Till the disease is rectify'd by heav'n.

And yet this Iliad of intestine woes

(So frail is man) from seeming nothings rose:

A drop of acrid juice, a blast of air,

Th' obstruction of a tube as fine as hair;

Or spasm within a labyrinth of threads.

More subtle far than those the spider spreads *.

What sullen planet rul'd our hapless birth,

Averse from joys, and enemy of mirth?

Wat'ry Arcturus in a luckless place

South'd †, and portended tears to all our race:

With him the weeping Pleiades conjoin,

And Mazzaroth made up the mournful trine ‡:

Orion added noise to dumb despair,

And rent with hurricanes the driving air;

And last Abinthion || his dire influence shed

Full on the heart, and fuller on the head.

Oft have we fought (and fruitless oft) to gain

A short parenthesis 'twixt pain and pain;

But, sick'ning at the cheerfulness of light,

The soul has languish'd for th' approach of night:

Again, immerst in shades, we seem to say,

O day-spring ¶! gleam thy promise of a day §.

On this side death th' unhappy sure are curst,

Who sigh for change, and think the present worst:

Who weep unpity'd, groan without relief;

“There is no end nor measure of their grief!”

The happy have waste twelvemonths to bestow;

But those can spare all time, who live in woe!

Whose liveliest hours are misery and thrall;

Whose food is wormwood, and whose drink is gall **.

Banish their grief, or ease their irksome load;

Ephraim at length was favour'd by his God ††.

Ah, what is man, that demigod on earth?

Proud of his knowledge, glorying in his birth;

Profane corrector of th' Almighty laws,

Full of th' effect, forgetful of the cause!

‡ Job xxxviii. 31, 32. According to Scripture-Astronomy, these three were all watery signs, and emblematical of grief. The fourth constellation, named Orion, threatened mankind with hurricanes and tempests. Sandys understood the passage in the same manner as I do. See his excellent paraphrase on Job, folio, page 49, London 1637. Mention is again made of the Seven Stars (Pleiades), and of Orion, Amos v. 8.—and Job ix. 9.

Why boast of reason, and yet reason ill?
 Why talk of choice, yet follow erring will?
 Why vaunt our liberty, and prove the slave
 Of all ambition wants, or follies crave?
 'Tis the lot of him, furnam'd the wife,
 Who lives mistaken, and mistaken dies!
 The sick less happy, and yet happier live;
 For pains and maladies are God's reprieve:
 This respite 'twixt the grave and cradle giv'n,
 Is th' interpos'd parenthesis of heav'n!
 Too often we complain—but flesh is weak;
 Silence would waste us, and the heart would break.

Behold yon rose, the poor despondent cries,
 (Pain on his brow, and anguish in his eyes)
 What healthy verdure paints its juicy shoots,
 What equal circulation feeds the roots:
 At morning-dawn it feels the dew-ting'd ray,
 But opens all its bosom to the day.
 No art assists it, and no toil it takes*,
 Slumbers at ev'ning, and with morning wakes†.

Why was I born? Or wherefore born a man?
 Immense my wish; yet tether'd to a span!
 The slave, that groans beneath the toilsome oar,
 "Obtains the sabbath of a welcome shore:"
 His captive stripes are heal'd; his native soil
 Sweetens the memory of foreign toil.

"Alas my sorrows are not half so blest;"
 My labours know no end, my pains no rest!
 Tell me, vain-glorious Newtons, if you can,
 What heterogeneous mixtures form the man?
 Pleasure and anguish, ignorance and skill,
 Nature and spirit, slav'ry and free-will:
 Weakness and strength, old-age and youthful prime;

Error and truth; eternity and time!—
 What contradictions have for ever ran
 Betwixt the nether brute and upper man‡?
 Ah! what are men, who God's creation scorn?
 The worm their brother;—§ brother elder-born!
 Plants live like them, in fairer robes array'd,
 Alike they flourish, and alike they fade.
 The lab'ring steer sleeps less disturb'd at night,
 And eats and drinks with keener appetite,—
 Restrain'd by nature just t' enjoy his fill;
 Useful, and yet incapable of ill.

Say, man, what vain pre-eminence is thine?
 Each sense impair'd by gluttony and wine||:
 Thou art the beast, except thy soaring mind
 Aspires to pleasures of immortal kind:
 Else, boasted knowledge, hapless is thy curse,
 T' approve the better, and embrace the worse!

 Latin treatise lately published in Sweden.

§ Job xvii. 14.—There is a remarkable passage in the Psalms upon this occasion, where the worm takes place of the monarch: "O praise the Lord, ye mountains and all hills; fruitful trees and all cedars; beasts and all cattle; worms and feathered fowls; kings of the earth and all people; princes and judges of the world."

 In doleful cell by osier-bars secur'd,
 Laments her fate; till, flitting swiftly by,
 Th' aerial prize attracts her eager eye:
 Instant she summons all her strength and fire;
 Her aspect kindles fierce with keen desire;
 She prunes her tatter'd plumes in conscious pride,
 And bounds from perch to perch, and side to side:
 Impatient of her jail, and long detain'd,
 She breaks the bounds her liberty restrain'd:
 Then, having gain'd the point by heav'n design'd,
 Soars 'midst the clouds, and proves her high-born

Thy bleeding Saviour * asks a short delay:
What trifling blifs is still to be enjoy'd,
What change of folly wings thee on thy way?
Look back a moment, pause a while †, and stay.
For thee thy God assum'd the human frame;
For thee the guiltless pains and anguish try'd;
Thy passions (sin excepted) his became:
Like thee he suffer'd, hunger'd, wept, and dy'd.

Nor wealth nor plenty did he ever taste,
The moss his pillow, oft his couch the ground;
The poor man's bread completed his repast;
Home he had none, and quiet never found,
For fell reproach pursu'd, and aim'd the wound ‡:

fered for you, innocent as he was. This consideration will enable you to say in the event, that your sufferings lasted only for a moment.* IDEM.

He wept unpity'd, and unhonour'd dy'd.

For ever mournful, but for ever dear,
O love stupendous! glorious degradation!
No death of sickness, with a common tear;—
No soft extinction claims our sorrows here;
But anguish, shame, and agonizing passion!
The riches of the world, and worldly praise,
No monument of gratitude can prove;
Obedience only the great debt repays,
An imitative heart and undivided love!

To see the image of th' All-glorious Pow'r
Suspend his immortality, and dwell
In mortal bondage, tortur'd ev'ry hour:
A self-made pris'ner in a doleful cell,
Victim for sin, and conqueror of hell *!
Lustration for offences not his own!
Th' unspotted for th' impure resign'd his breath;
No other off'ring could thy crimes atone:—
Then blame thy Saviour's love, but not his death.

From this one prospect draw thy sole relief,
Here learn submission, passive duties learn;
Here drink the calm oblivion of thy grief:
Eschew each danger, ev'ry good discern,
And the true wages of thy virtue earn.

Thy nature and our lives are everlasting foes!

“ Severe thy truth, yet glorious is thy scheme;
Complete the vengeance of thy just desire;
See from our eyes the gushing torrents stream,
Yet strike us, blast us with celestial fire;
Our doom, and thy decrees, alike conspire.
Yet dying we will love thee and adore:—
Where shall the flaming flashes of thy ire
Transpierce our bodies? Ev'ry nerve and pore
